I suggest that if the provinces decide to bring as part of the provincial delegation representatives of the municipalities it would, of course, be their right to do so. As things now stand under the constitution and arrangements, Mr. Speaker, the federal government cannot by itself invite the municipalities.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I understand, of course, the provinces can bring along municipal representatives to the constitutional conferences as observers or indeed active participants in their delegations. Is it not correct that the Council of Mayors and Municipalities proposes to submit to the secretariat of the constitutional conference specific proposals which would enable municipal governments in the future to participate actively in the deliberations of intergovernmental bodies which involve matters of municipal concern? Is this not what the Prime Minister has agreed to the association submitting to the secretariat?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there was no discussion or agreement on the substance of their submissions. In a very general way, Mr. Lawless said he wanted to submit to the secretariat of the Federal-Provincial Conference certain proposals concerning their representation.

To repeat my first answer, I said that was the proper procedure, rather than making representations to the federal government. If they have representations to make along these lines, they should either be represented as part of the provincial delegation or, if they wanted to address themselves to the conference proper, they should do it through the federal-provincial secretariat, not through the federal government.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In order to strengthen the representations made by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, would the Prime Minister undertake to consult with the provinces with a view to reaching some agreement as to the techniques by which the municipalities could be involved in having a voice in the various federal-provincial meeting, where decisions affecting them are being discussed?

Mr. Trudeau: I have no objection to this consultation, Mr. Speaker, apart from any that might be proposed by the provinces themselves. It seems to me the provinces would be on justifiable ground if they were to say to any such consultation, "Well, we will decide how you will be represented." That is why, to repeat what I said in my answer to the Leader of the Opposition, I prefer that the initiative come through the secretariat which serves both levels of government. If it were to come from the federal government it would more likely bring about resistance from the provinces, based on the question of constitutionality.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the Prime Minister if he would be prepared to consider having placed on the agenda of the conference the advisability of setting up an urban affairs council on which all three levels of government would be represented, for the purpose of discussing the co-ordination of the three levels of government on matters affecting particularly large urban municipalities?

Mr. Trudeau: I am inclined to think that such an initiative would be premature on our part. The question of the division of powers between the federal government and the provinces under the constitution is a subject which is being discussed now at the official level. This, it would seem to me, would be the proper way in which the question of municipal representation and jurisdiction under the constitution should be arrived at, as part of the discussion of the division of powers between the federal government and the provinces.

Mr. Stanfield: As a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister considering or is he prepared to suggest to the constitutional conference that its terms of reference be broadened to include a consideration of participation by municipal units in inter-governmental conferences?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. I think it would be unwise to do so. The municipalities, legally speaking and constitutionally speaking, are creatures of the provinces. I hope this subject will be brought before a conference, but I do not think it would be proper for the federal government to press it or to impose it on the provinces. I hope it would come by way of initiative from the municipalities themselves, as they suggested they would do, or by way of provincial action at the first initiative; but I repeat that the federal government would of course be very happy and anxious to discuss all these aspects of it.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell us whether, in agreement with the provinces, he would put on the order paper an item for the consideration of the possible use of the Bank of Canada to help finance municipalities?

[English]

OPPOSITION REPRESENTATIVES AT MEETINGS HELD IN CAMERA

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the information which the Prime Minister gave the house some days ago, that this time the conference would be in camera, I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether, in spite of the fact that it is not going to be open to the public, he and the prime ministers of the provinces are giving consideration to inviting members of opposition parties as observers to these in camera discussions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This had not been contemplated, Mr. Speaker, for the reason that I gave the other day about holding the conferences proper in camera. They will not be conferences merely of the representatives of the public, the ministers and the prime ministers, but will be conferences which officials will also be attending. This mixture was requested by some of the provinces themselves. It was not a federal initiative, but we agreed to it because it seemed like a plausible and acceptable idea. When we have such a mixture of ministers and officials we feel the conferences should be held in camera.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, as a further supplementary question, precisely because of the nature of the meeting I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would not reconsider the refusal, and again discuss with the prime ministers of the provinces that because the conference will be held in camera, there would not be value in having other members of parliament and other members of the legislatures in opposition parties knowing what is going on in this on-going dialogue about the constitution?

Mr. Trudeau: I would be prepared to hear representations from the provinces on this, but I stated my own personal inclination and I understand that is also the inclination of the provinces. If they feel otherwise, I would be prepared to reconsider.

Hon. Robert Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Do I understand that the Prime Minister would object to a member of an opposition party being included in a provincial delegation to the conference? Does he not feel it might increase national understanding, or the understanding generally in respect of the problems involved in constitutional reform, if observers from opposition parties both at the provincial and federal level were included in this confidential discussion?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, in so far as the Leader of the Opposition is repeating part of the question of the member of the New Democratic party my answer is the same; but if he is suggesting that some province might wish to include any member of the opposition as part of its delegation, then it is up to the officials of that province if they want to be assisted by persons from the opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: Do I understand my hon. friend to suggest that he does not require any assistance from us on this side of the house?

Mr. Trudeau: That is a different matter, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADA COUNCIL

GRANT RECEIVED BY CHANDLER DAVIES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

I am informed that Mr. Chandler Davies, from the University of Toronto, considered as a notorious Communist in the United States, received last year from the Canadian government a $6,350 grant for research purposes in Russia and that this year he will receive $15,-130 for research purposes at the University of Toronto.

Could the Prime Minister tell us whether he intends to set up some kind of inquiry to find out whether or not Mr. Chandler Davies is indeed a notorious communist?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if this grant has been given by the Canada Council. If such is the case, I think that the question should be directed to the Secretary of State.

AIRPORTS

INQUIRY AS TO COST OF STE SCHOLASTIQUE SITE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the statement made by the Quebec Minister of Municipal Affairs to the effect that choosing Ste Scholastique as the site of the new Montreal international airport will cost the province of Quebec an additional $120 million, can the minister explain this difference for the guidance of the house?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that, in those terms, the question—

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Yes—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

The hon. member is asking the minister to make a statement and explain the difference between two amounts. To my mind, the question should be expressed differently.

Mr. La Salle: Is it true that because of the site chosen for the airport, the project will cost $120 million more to the province of Quebec?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

[English]

Mr. Hellyer: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker. The figures which were prepared and which were made public by the Department of Transport at the time the government decision was announced were based on the cost of providing ground transportation to service the airport, the traffic to the airport and the extra traffic generated as a result of the location of the airport. This was a consistent yardstick which was used in the evaluations of each of the sites.

The province has added the additional cost of supplementary road systems necessary or perhaps desirable to provide economic growth along the corridor bordering the river. They have also added a part of the cost of the trans-Canada highway. This of course may be a desirable expenditure but it is an expenditure which, as is apparent, is not directly related to the airport. If one were to do an evaluation on that basis he would have to add the same kind of additional costs to each of the figures in order to have a fair comparison. The answer is that the figures we gave were quite correct. These additional figures are related to consequent industrial development, which is desirable but not an essential part of the cost of the airport.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

According to a statement made by Hon. Robert Lussier, Minister of Municipal Affairs of the province of Quebec, the purchase of the land will cost the Canadian taxpayers $91 million more than that of the land located south of Montreal. Will the minister tell us whether the government will reconsider its decision and begin discussions with the Quebec government?

[English]

Mr. Hellyer: I do not have too much confidence in Dr. Lussier's figures, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ricard: They are just as good as yours, if not better.

Mr. Hellyer: I prefer to use our own which were arrived at with care and with the same kind of comparison as to the various sites.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Since the government of the province of Quebec has produced an estimate concerning the cost of the new airport that is at variance with that provided by the federal government, would the Minister of Transport look into the matter to see whether it would be advisable to review both studies to arrive at a proper conclusion, for the Canadian people are anxious to know what they will have to pay for that airport.

[English]

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, we did re-study it. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and myself spent three hours with the representatives of the provincial government a few days ago, at which time we looked at the figures they had. As I indicated subsequently, there was nothing new. They had added the cost of supplementary roads desirable for the future economic expansion of that part of the province of Quebec. If one were making that comparison, he would have to do so in respect of the other potential sites as well. I have confidence that the comparisons reproduced were as fair as any comparison could be, with the information available, and I can see no reason for reopening the discussion in so far as the basic data is concerned.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether in arriving at the estimates he or the government was able to draw upon the same expertise which was used in connection with the Bonaventure and the National Centre for the Performing Arts?

Mr. Hellyer: The expertise was not identical, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Could the minister tell us today whether the decision of the government is final?

DRUMMONDVILLE, QUE.—RECOMMENDATION AS SITE FOR INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question to the Minister of Transport.

Could he tell the house if, during the negotiations concerning the international airport the provincial government recommended to the Minister of Transport the site of Drummondville?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the provincial government indicated its preference for one of two sites on the south shore of the river. One of those was near Drummondville and the other was close to the United States border. In both cases there were technical objections, cost considerations and considerations of the accessibility for passengers and other users of the airport, which we felt were over-riding those reasons advanced for choosing one of those sites.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Is he aware that yesterday afternoon the Quebec Minister of Municipal Affairs stated that his government had never recommended that the new airport be built at Drummondville?

[English]

AIR CANADA

STRIKE OF MECHANICS—TRANSPORTATION OF PERISHABLE GOODS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the air strike has the minister had any negotiations in respect of the transportation of perishable goods by certain Canadian industries, such as chicks by the poultry industry and flowers by the florists, using C.P.A. or other companies?

An hon. Member: What kind of chicks did you have in mind?

Mr. Woolliams: Not the kind that have been written up recently in a weekly magazine by some of the girls.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must confess I did not quite catch the first part of my hon. friend's question. Did he ask whether I had received representations from these people?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hellyer: Not to my knowledge, but they may have come into my office since I have had a chance to check.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether the minister would consider the representations from this side of the house and see if those perishable goods could be moved across the land in the fashion followed by Air Canada, because there is no room for them in the aircraft of other air companies in Canada. As a result, this situation is costing the industry millions of dollars.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we will be glad to check on the chicks, and make every possible arrangement to see that the needs of the shippers are met within the capability of the equipment available.

Mr. Woolliams: I know the minister is trying to be humorous, Mr. Speaker, but I am talking about all perishable goods. I am asking him whether he will make a serious representation to these companies to assist Canadian industry in the transportation of perishable goods.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, of course, Mr. Speaker. I am sure they are already aware of the problem. I will be glad to pass on my hon. friend's representations, together with my own.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Transport. I point out that when the strike was first anticipated last week I asked the Prime Minister whether any consideration was being given to the matter of alternative forms of transportation for perishable commodities. He said that a committee of cabinet was doing this. When I asked him on Friday to what members the representation should be made, he named the Minister of Transport. Since that time, after contacting the minister's office and the Board of Transport Commissioners I can find no arrangements at all. I am wondering whether the minister would undertake to make a statement tomorrow as to what alternative arrangements have been made for the movement of perishable goods. I think in particular of perishable goods from Vancouver Island to the prairies, which are adversely affected by this strike. I ask the minister to make such a statement so that the public will know what arrangements he has made. At the present time we have been unable to obtain any information in this respect.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend would like to give me specifics, such as the one he has just indicated, I would be glad to look into the matter. But as he knows, the Canadian Transport Commission have authorized a number of temporary routes, with the end in mind of doing exactly what has been suggested, namely providing service to the Canadian travelling public. I am sure that where excess space is available, cargo will be carried as well.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

STRIKE OF MECHANICS—DEPARTMENTAL AIRCRAFT TO HANDLE AIR FREIGHT

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Communications. I wonder whether the minister is now in a position to answer the question I asked him yesterday concerning the possibility of using D.O.T. and D.N.D. aircraft to transport the mail, so as to liberate freight space on C.P.A. and other air lines, thus making it possible for flower growers and other people to make use of commercial air transport services.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my first responsibility is to ensure that the mails go through.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Baldwin: When do we start?

Mr. Ricard: You have not yet accepted your responsibility.

Mr. Kierans: We have not yet found it necessary to look for aircraft from D.N.D. Perhaps my colleague could liberate some of his own aircraft for the transportation of chicks across the country. We are quite satisfied at the moment with the facilities that are being made available to us to transport the mail across all areas of Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put this one, last supplementary question. Can the Minister of Transport tell us which crisis he will end the sooner, the housing crisis or the transportation crisis?

AGRICULTURE

ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS IN COMPENSATION FOR LACK OF GRAIN SALES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. As a result of the recent visit of the agricultural committee to the west, where they found ample evidence of economic stagnation, does the minister intend to recommend to the government that emergency assistance be provided, in line with the Prime Minister's concern over regionally depressed areas, in the form of acreage payments or any other form which would alleviate the situation temporarily, pending further action?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman knows, I returned to Ottawa just this morning. I am expecting to have a report from the agricultural committee which made a tour of western Canada, as soon as it is convenient for them to meet with me.

POTATOES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ASSISTANCE TO P.E.I. GROWERS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement made earlier by the minister in the house with regard to the meeting he had with representatives of the agricultural industry in Prince Edward Island with respect to the very serious situation there in terms of potato markets, and the plight of the growers for this season, would the minister be prepared this week to make a statement on policy as to the form of assistance his department will give in order to alleviate this very serious situation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware that we initiated the diversion of some of the inventory of potatoes to starch plants. This program is now operating to the full capacity of starch plants in the maritime provinces. Whatever favourable effect this diversion program had on the potato market of New Brunswick is, of course, reflected in the market for all the maritimes. I am prepared to admit that it has not been significant. But to date the plans that have been presented to us by the government of Prince Edward Island would not in our view be practical inasmuch as they have been tried before and have not proved satisfactory.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that time is running out for the growers this season, would the minister reconsider the action taken by the government last season? While he himself expressed some reservations about its effectiveness, I believe it was as effective as possible, in terms of a short term solution, in easing the situation of Prince Edward Island farmers.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, we have considered this a number of times, and on balance I am persuaded by the representations that have been made to me, namely, that the program we undertook last year was not particularly popular or favoured among the producers themselves.

POTATOES—PROGRAM FOR QUEBEC GROWERS

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture.

If a second assistance program for potato-growers were established, would Quebec potato-growers be able to take advantage of it?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will admit that his question is hypothetical.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It certainly is with this government.

GRAIN

WHEAT—SUPPORT PRICE AND TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Could he tell us whether he supports the two-price policy requested by the Saskatchewan farmers and the Saskatchewan "Wheat pool"?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the "two-price policy for wheat" is a pretty vague term that is subject to many interpretations. I am sure my hon. friend realizes that there are many specific details that are attached to the term "two-price system". But, generally speaking, we have taken a number of measures in order to alleviate the serious situation, and we are willing as well to consider specific proposals respecting this concept.

Mr. Baldwin: The government's policy is pretty vague, too.

WHEAT—SALES UNDER COMPETITIVE PRICING

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatchewan. Could the minister inform the house what significant sales of wheat have taken place to foreign buyers since the Wheat Board decided recently to adopt a policy of competitive pricing?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, it is the custom to answer questions of that sort by saying it is not the custom in this house to report on sales of wheat.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see quite a few hon. members rising to ask supplementaries on this question. I wonder whether all should be recognized, because we are running short of time. Perhaps the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), who raised the matter originally, might be allowed a supplementary question.

WHEAT—SALES TO JAPAN

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, the minister's reply to my question indicated that he had just returned from a visit to Japan. We notice that he inspected some fish during that visit; but I wonder whether, for the benefit of the wheat farmers, he could indicate if there have been any sales of wheat in that area.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Brown).

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question—

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand that the hon. member for Selkirk is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Schreyer: My question of privilege is this, Mr. Speaker. The matter raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie is vital and urgent. Inasmuch as no member of this party, representative as we are of several hundreds of thousands of wheat producers in western Canada, has had an opportunity to ask a question on this subject, perhaps Your Honour would allow one further supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point is perhaps well taken. As the hon. member for Selkirk and a few other hon. members, I understand, are anxious to speak on this question, perhaps I might allow a few supplementary questions after the hon. member for Brant has asked his question.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PLEA FOR SIMPLICITY IN LANGUAGE OF AMENDING MEASURE

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would the minister advise the house as to whether the government will make sure that the new Indian Act will be drafted in simple, basic English and French, and not in legalistic terms, so that all Indians in Canada may comprehend it without difficulty?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I can assure the hon. member that the new policy which will make Indians of Canada equal citizens in this country will be very clear and simple.

GRAIN

WHEAT—MINIMUM GUARANTEED PRICE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is he in a position to indicate to the house what action the government proposes to take in terms of establishing a minimum guaranteed price for wheat in order to meet the present marketing situation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member is well aware of the price ranges that are spelled out in the International Grains Arrangement, and I am sure he is also well aware of the fact that the Canadian government is playing a very positive role in attempting to encourage the countries of the world to respect the terms of that agreement.

Mr. Gleave: I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of the fact that the prices are not being maintained at the minimum level specified in the International Grains Arrangement, will the government establish a minimum price for the farmer, so that he knows what his income will be?

Mr. Olson: It is the hope of the government that the minimum price range within the I.G.A. will be respected.

WHEAT—SUPPORT PRICE AND TWO PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether, in his desire to have specifics on the two price system, and in view of the briefs presented by the premier of Saskatchewan on behalf of that government and of the briefs of the Saskatchewan wheat pool and of the government of Alberta, he would now advance the proposal to his colleagues that sufficient specifics are available for the implementation of the two price system. I should also like to ask him whether, as a further source of specifics, he would read his own speeches which he made when he was a member of the Social Credit party on this side of the house.

Mr. Baldwin: That would be too much to ask.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

IMMIGRATION

DECREASE IN NUMBER OF ENTRANTS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the reported drop of 40,000 immigrants allowed into Canada in 1968, would the minister at an early opportunity announce what plans the government has to remedy this serious drop in entries into this country?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): There was a drop—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that this question is in order only to the extent that the hon. member is asking whether a statement will be made. Otherwise the minister cannot make a statement now.

RUDOLPH HOLATA—PROTEST AGAINST HOLDING IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): May I take this opportunity to put another question to the minister. Has the Canadian government made a strong protest regarding the holding of Rudolph Holata, head electrician at Vancouver International Airport, by the government of Czechoslovakia, without trial and without a charge being laid?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I have not identified the case which my hon. friend mentioned but I will investigate it and give him the information.

Mr. Paproski: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it a fact that Mr. Holata has been in custody since January 6, and if a strong protest has not been made, why not? I should like to point out, sir, that he is a member of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Paproski: And we should know what is going on there.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made his representations to the minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMISSION OF DRAFT DODGERS AND DESERTERS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I should like to ask him whether he will soon be making a statement on motions dealing with the question of the admission as immigrants of so-called deserters.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I cannot exactly forecast when I will be able to make a statement on this subject. The matter is under consideration, and as soon as the consideration is completed I will be making the deliberations known to the house.

SHIPBUILDING

SAFETY FEATURE IN STEEL TUG HULL PRODUCTION

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I desire to direct a question of the utmost importance to the west coast to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the Canadian Merchant Service Guild are prepared to consider a tie-up of all steel-hulled tow boats on Canada's west coast following the sinking of the Emerald Straits, with a loss of three lives, adding up to a loss of 29 men in similar tugs since 1958, will the minister immediately take into consideration an investigation of the possibility of accepting a previous safety recommendation for a one-compartment subdivision in the construction of steel tug hulls?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the recommendations of the guild are being investigated by the department on an urgent basis.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ALLEGED PREFERRED TREATMENT OF COMMUNIST PUBLICATIONS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): I have a question, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Communications.

Following the numerous changes made in the Post Office Department, several publications no longer enjoy second class mail privileges, and I wonder whether the minister could tell us why the following publications: Canada-Vietnam News Letter, Combat, Progressive Worker, American Exile, Lagos, La Lutte Ouvrière and The Workers' Vanguard which are all communist-slanted, are still considered as second class mail in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This type of question should be put on the order paper.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUGGESTION OF SABOTAGE IN DERAILMENT NEAR TORONTO

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In his absence yesterday I asked the Prime Minister whether he had any information to give the house in connection with the tragic railroad accident which occurred near Toronto a few days ago. Can the minister give us any information on that now?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I am not sure that I can add much to what has already been reported publicly, but, as hon. members know, at 5.35 p.m. on April 20, C.N.R. train number 151, consisting of two diesel electric units and six cars entered the facing point switch of Dosco siding, mile 12.4 Weston subdivision, where it struck an empty tank car, derailing both locomotives and five cars.

One employee, the locomotive fireman, and one passenger were killed. Two employees and 24 passengers were injured; the engineman's condition is reported to be critical.

The switch was found lined for the siding with the lock in the keeper. Investigation has revealed that the loop of the lock was cut through by hacksaw. The target was not displaced and indicated the switch lined for the siding.

The matter is under investigation by the Canadian Transport Commission, the investigation department of Canadian National Railways and the Ontario Provincial Police and metropolitan Toronto police.

Mr. Howe: In view of the situation that has developed in this regard in Toronto, what steps are being taken to make these types of switches electrically controlled, particularly in areas where trains are travelling fast, to ensure that such an accident could not occur again?

Mr. Hellyer: I think I should take that question as notice. This type of accident is most unusual and normally cannot occur. In this case there has been evidence of some unusual action. A deliberate attempt has been made by someone to cause an accident.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—CRITERIA APPLICABLE IN PROJECTS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): May I ask the Minister of Transport, in this Don Messer hep week, on what day of this week the minister expects to place before us the new criteria for public housing programs.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): We were discussing them this morning and made considerable progress. I hope to be able to make them available to my hon. friend fairly soon.

SURVEY OF URBAN RENEWAL PROJECTS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. On the premise that the minister visited the cities of Vancouver and Calgary, can he now assure the house that no further trips are envisaged before he is in a position to bring down his conclusions with respect to urban renewal and public housing? I ask this question because it appears to me that at one time the minister indicated to the house that he was going to visit eight or nine cities.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

FRENCH COMMENTS FOR PROJECTION OF SLIDES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

In view of the fact that the minister has stated on two occasions that he would show slides with comments in French for the benefit of French-speaking members of parliament, in connection with the inquiry on housing, may I ask him when his promise will materialize?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DIEPPE PRISONERS—SEARCH OF FILES

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs and it arises out of a meeting held by the minister some time ago with the Dieppe Prisoners of War Association. I should like to know whether the minister's department has begun or completed the research work on its files requested by the Dieppe veterans.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the research work has begun. It has not yet been terminated.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

SEA TRIALS OF HYDROFOIL

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Further to a question which I attempted to ask the other day, and in order to offset any detrimental rumours, I wonder whether the minister could briefly report on the trials of the hydrofoil?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as every member of the house knows, I hope, we have had very successful trials with H.M.C.S. Bras d'Or. I do not believe we are experiencing any serious difficulty, though there were some rumours that we were experimenting with hydrodynamic vibration, when the ship was in transit, from hull to foilborne. These are matters that we would like to know more about, but they are not of a serious nature. We expect the experiments that we are conducting now will prove that they have been worth while.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE ON CRIMINAL CODE AMENDING BILL

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order at this point for the information of members. Because of certain confusion may I ask the house leader when the recorded votes will take place in respect to the first 11 amendments?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the disposition of the Chair would be to put the votes at the end of the debate on the first 11 amendments.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REPORT STAGE

The house resumed, from Monday, April 21, consideration of Bill C-150, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. And the motion of Mr. Knowles:

That Bill C-150, An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act, be amended by deleting from clause 13 thereof paragraph (a) and paragraph (b) of subsection (1) of the proposed new section 179-A of the Criminal Code.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we were discussing a motion to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) designed to make it illegal for the federal government and the provinces to set up a lottery.

Last night, at the beginning of my speech, I listed some arguments to justify my opposition, not to the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre but to the provisions of clause 13 of the omnibus bill.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that I am not against lotteries, but rather opposed to the reasons, avowed or not, which prompt the federal, provincial or municipal governments to set up a lottery for their benefit rather than in the interest of the Canadian people.

I said last night that the intent of starting a national, provincial or municipal lottery was an admission of the inability of the present Canadian monetary system to finance the public sector, at a time when demands of citizens are ever increasing.

Mr. Speaker, I unreservedly support the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because I feel that it will not solve the problem and that it will only defer its settlement.

In my opinion, hon. members should be serious and responsible enough to take over the administration of public affairs. It is disgraceful to make annual journeys to New York, France and other countries to obtain the necessary funds to finance the administration of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the governments can no longer tax directly or indirectly nor overtax the Canadian people.

The people are overtaxed, their purchasing power is inadequate and the unemployment rate has reached its maximum level. It is more than ever advisable to take our responsibilities and to ask ourselves whether a national lottery can truly improve financial conditions in Canada.

Even if we have nothing against lotteries, we have to ask ourselves whether they can still improve the situation. I feel, Mr. Speaker—

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to be allowed one more minute.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree to let the hon. member carry on his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I think that if it is logical and rejects the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg-North-Centre, not because lotteries are immoral and a bad thing as such, but because they fail to provide an answer to the major problem facing Canada at present, the government would be wise to seriously consider the possibility of making use of the Bank of Canada, which is a tool which should be of use to the Canadian people. In fact, one could resort to the Bank of Canada to finance the public sector, the construction of roads, bridges, schools, and help the provinces.

It is obvious that municipalities and governments both federal and provincials are in a financial state of stagnation. This should prompt us to assume our responsibilities, instead of being satisfied with a makeshift solution, such as lotteries. Let us tackle the real problem and particularly let us make use of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words to what the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) just said.

First of all, I must say that I agree with him about the advisability of a bank reform. In fact, many years ago, I was advocating the establishment of banks which would be the counterpart of those which now exist in Europe, under the name of "communal funds" and which are designed to assist municipalities and school boards.

Of course, the hon. member for Lotbinière would have to show me how that can be carried out but I recognize in principle the merits of the solution he proposes.

However, I might bring some clarification concerning his arguments against lotteries.

By this bill, the government wishes to relinquish exclusive control over lotteries and to stop prohibiting them as it used to, giving the provinces the power to allow charitable organizations especially to conduct lotteries, that is to levy taxes without it being too painful, as the mayor of Montreal is now doing.

As long as our friends of the Ralliement Créditiste fail to reform the monetary system, that could be useful. However, I would remind the hon. member for Lotbinière that during conventions of the Union of Quebec Municipalities and of the Canadian Federation of Mayors, the Quebec mayors have moved, for a great many years, resolutions requesting the provincial and federal governments to transfer control over lotteries to the provinces.

Naturally, if the federal government gives the provinces control of the lotteries in their territory, it can reserve the right to establish a national lottery, but that is unlikely for the time being. It does not seem to be its desire, but we cannot stop it from doing what we authorize the provinces to do.

I believe that the hon. member for Lotbinière will admit that it is significant that the mayors of the province of Quebec, for at least 12 to 15 years, promoted the idea that the federal government should leave the control of the lotteries to the provinces, that would operate them for purposes they would deem acceptable.

I remember that, in 1963, when the Canadian Federation of Mayors held its annual conference in Toronto, the mayors of the province of Quebec brought forward this idea which has been discussed now for at least twelve years and which has always been rejected. In 1963, the majority of the Canadian mayors present accepted the proposition of the mayors of Quebec to recommend that the federal government hand over to the provinces control of the lotteries established for charitable or other purposes.

Of course, I do not think it necessary that we discuss the morality or the advisability of lotteries. It will be each province's responsibility to decide if it can be done.

In Montreal, a lottery has been created, even though it was given a structure which is more acceptable than a lottery as such. It can be useful, until such time as our hon. friends of the Ralliement Créditiste manage to reorganize the international monetary system, which will provide us with banks, provincial or municipal, designed to help finance municipalities and school boards.

Is it justified to prevent the federal government from giving control of lotteries to the provinces? My hon. friend must have noted that I did not try to make fun of him and did not even mention the opinions he has expressed on the reorganization of the monetary system, because I support them to the extent that they are feasible.

However, I want to say that if most mayors in Quebec, within the Union of municipalities and the Canadian Federation of Mayors have seen fit during the last 12 years or so to exert pressure on the federal government to bring it to transfer the control of lotteries to the provinces, I think this recommendation should be supported.

[English]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the amendment before us is extremely important. I was surprised and shocked last night to hear the minister give a very inadequate explanation for the proposal to amend the Criminal Code to authorize the federal and provincial governments to establish lotteries if they see fit to do so. Instead of the cavalier way the minister dealt with this matter last evening I should have preferred to hear convincing arguments, if they exist, in support of his proposition. The only explanation the minister gave, I believe, appears at page 7780 of Hansard where he is reported as having said:

> It seemed logical to the government that if the criminal law were to be withdrawn from lotteries managed by private organizations, charitable and religious, or by agricultural fairs, an option should also lie with the provincial government itself or with an agent of a provincial government, and, since this was being done, that the criminal law should be totally withdrawn in its application to the federal government in this area as well.

It was most illogical of the minister to talk about lotteries, raffles and bingoes conducted by charitable organizations and then make a transition in his argument and ask the house to legalize the entry by the federal and provincial governments into lotteries. Most of us know that when we buy raffle tickets or take part in various innocent games of chance we are really making contributions to charities. Added to our contribution is the extra excitement of knowing that someone, somewhere, will win a prize—very often one he does not need and does not want. But the excitement makes it easier to sell these raffle tickets. While these innocent games of chance cannot be construed as any form of crusade for the carrying out of charitable work, I doubt that we can stop them and I do not think it is wise to try. But saying that we are willing to allow charitable organizations, religious bodies and agricultural fairs to conduct small games of chance is totally different from saying that we will permit lotteries in general—

Mr. Mongrain: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he convinced that the raffles conducted by charitable organizations are legal now? As they are now operated in Canada, do they come within the law?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I think it is pretty well conceded that many of them are not legal. I presume that is why the code is being liberalized, if I may be pardoned for using that word. We want to put a stop to a great deal of misunderstanding that has surrounded this question. The administration of the law affecting games of chance, lotteries and bingoes has been left almost exclusively with the provincial attorneys-general. In many cases they have simply shut their eyes to these small games of chance, especially where they have been convinced that they are being carried on for charitable purposes and that someone is not trying to make a quick profit or get rich quickly. I do not complain about liberalizing the Criminal Code to allow people, within proper limitations, to conduct raffles, bingoes and small games of chance. But saying that we will allow charitable organizations, religious bodies and agricultural affairs to conduct lotteries and bingoes is a far cry from saying that we must also give the federal and provincial governments the option of entering into lottery schemes.

What is the purpose in giving provincial governments and the federal government the power to operate lotteries? It is understandable in the case of a charitable organization. Its purpose is to try to get money and to do so on a voluntary basis. These organizations have no other way of raising funds except by donations from people interested in the cause they are seeking to promote. The government is something entirely different. In our democracy the government is the constituted organization which carries on the business of the people. The government has ways of raising money by means of various forms of taxes. The government has access to the fields of taxation set out in the constitution of Canada.

Why does the government need the power to raise money by lotteries? Does it envisage that the provincial governments and the federal government itself are now going to seek to raise part of their revenue by lotteries? Will they endeavour to discharge some of their responsibilities not by taxation based on ability to pay but by means of lotteries, which is raising money on the basis of human credulity?

Mr. Woolliams: Will the hon. member answer a question?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): As soon as I finish this sentence. If the government is going to be fair, democratic and just, surely it ought to be endeavouring to raise its revenue on the basis of people's ability to pay, not on the basis of selling tickets to the most credulous. The hon. member wanted to ask a question?

Mr. Woolliams: I am not being critical, Mr. Speaker. I am most interested in what the hon. member is saying. I take it he is really against the kind of lottery being run in the city of Montreal. After all, cities are creatures of the jurisdiction of the province so far as their powers are concerned. That is what I think is being legalized here.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Yes. I am suggesting that any level of government has at its disposal certain areas of taxation. If they are not adequate, then we need some readjustment in our constitutional apportionment of tax fields and sources of revenue. To substitute lotteries based on credulity for taxation based on ability to pay is to reverse the whole process of social justice. I do not know whether the minister has visited any of the countries that have state lotteries, but it is an education to do so. If you go to countries operating state lotteries and which receive a considerable portion of their revenue from that source, you will find that a major part of their revenue is coming from the poorest and most desperate people. These people probably have one hope in a million of striking it rich. They are spending money they can ill afford to buy tickets in state lotteries.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Surely that is not the basis on which we ought to be inviting the provinces or the federal government to finance the requirements of this country. If governments in Canada need more revenue, then that revenue ought to be collected from people on the basis of their ability to pay and according to the size of their income. It ought not to be obtained by appealing to the avarice of individuals or holding out hopes to people who have very little chance of improving their lot by buying lottery tickets. This is a complete reversal of the whole idea of fiscal policy in Canada.

There is nothing in the constitution about governments raising revenue by means of lotteries. The constitution sets out the various areas in which the respective levels of government may levy taxes. I admit readily that the municipalities and the provinces, whose responsibilities have grown whereas their access to sources of revenue has not grown, face very serious financial difficulties. To solve these difficulties we ought to re-allocate the tax fields or reassess the fields of jurisdiction for which the different levels of government are responsible. We are not going to solve our fiscal problems by allowing provinces to embark upon lotteries. In the long run it will be self-defeating. As more and more cities and provinces get into it, they will be taking in each other's washing. They will be selling tickets to each other in order to solve their municipal and provincial problems.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is a pretty unsavoury thought.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is a pretty dirty wash.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am really surprised that an administration which has talked so much about the just society, social justice and economic equity should now suggest that it is prepared to permit the governments of Canada, provincial and federal, to replenish their coffers by selling lottery tickets.

The explanation given by the minister for including the federal government is even more nebulous and irrational than the one for including the provinces. The minister said he had included the federal government because he wanted the bill to be symmetrical. That is not a very good reason. I can assure the minister he is more symmetrical than the bill.

The minister says that the government has no present intention of entering this field. I hope hon. members will take a look at the bill we are being asked to pass because not only does it state that the federal government will have the right, if it desires, to establish a lottery but it will be able to do so by Order in Council without any reference to this house. If a provincial government wants to establish a lottery, it will be required to introduce legislation setting out the terms and conditions under which the lottery will be operated, who will be the agents to act for the government, and for what purpose the money will be used. All the details will be subject to debate and discussion. But if the federal government decides to set up a lottery it will not need to refer to parliament at all. It will be done simply by an Order in Council setting forth the terms and conditions, naming some person or group of persons to act for the government, and, presto, a full lottery will be in operation.

When I asked the minister about this last night, he said we will always have the right to deal with the matter by means of a motion of non-confidence in the house. Isn't that a marvellous concession! Parliament will not be permitted to examine any such proposal, amend it in any particular or, as my colleague points out, even discuss the details of what is a tax proposal. All parliament will be allowed to do is vote yes or no on whether it has confidence in the Order in Council which the government has passed. There are totalitarian régimes in the world where the members of the legislative bodies are strictly limited to saying yes or no, but I thought we had not reached that low level in Canada.

However, the minister is seriously telling us that he thinks it is all right for the federal government, by Order in Council if it so desires, to set up a lottery, to determine by Order in Council the terms and conditions of that lottery, how it will be operated, how much of the money will go into the federal treasury, how much will be paid out in prizes and the purposes for which the funds will be used, and parliament will have nothing to say about it except that it may be provided with an opportunity on an allotted day to move a motion of no confidence. This to me, Mr. Speaker, is preposterous. It is preposterous for a government that has talked so much about participatory democracy, about the need for involvement, about the value of dialogue and consensus, to say now that a plan can be introduced and that hon. members will have no opportunity to discuss it and amend it in any particular. All they will have will be an opportunity to deal with the matter by a vote of confidence or non-confidence in the government.

I hope that the Liberal members of the house who support the government will take a good look at this provision. I suggest it is a dangerous precedent. I suggest democracy means more than just having the right periodically to vote yes or no, and that if parliamentary democracy means anything it means playing a part in the process of formulating legislation. We have a process here whereby legislation is discussed on second reading and then sent to a committee where experts can be called, where discussion can be heard, where it can be amended and brought back to the house to go through report stage and third reading. But this is the thin edge of the wedge. We are sweeping all that aside and saying that by Order in Council so important a thing as a national lottery can be established and parliament will have nothing to say about it until after it has been established. To me this is shocking and scandalous.

When hon. members on the other side of the house look carefully at the implications of the precedent now being established by the Minister of Justice, I think they will join us in asking him to remove these provisions from the bill. I say that the press has a responsibility to tell the people of Canada what is in this legislation, not just the idea that the federal and provincial governments will have the right to set up state lotteries but also that the federal government will have the right to establish a state lottery without reference to parliament, that it will have the right to bypass parliament, that it will have the right to set up machinery to collect possibly millions of dollars and dispose of that money in whatever way it thinks best, to determine how much will be paid out in prizes and how much will be paid into the federal treasury or into whatever aspect of federal expenditures it decides, without referring the matter to parliament. If the Canadian people were made fully aware of this very serious innovation, and I suggest the press has a responsibility to make them aware of it, I believe they would speak out in no uncertain terms and say that this type of legislation ought not to be passed.

I make an appeal, even to those who are in agreement with the government about the advisability of government lotteries, provincial or federal, that if we are going to have such lotteries then at least the federal government should be on the same basis as the provincial governments. If the federal government is going to establish a lottery it should be required to bring in legislation, submit that legislation to the house, have it examined by members of the house and by the appropriate standing committee, and have it dealt with as any other measure would be dealt with. What we are being asked to do here is to give the government a blank cheque, to say to the cabinet, "You can draft any kind of plan you like. You can completely reverse the process of fiscal policy and take from the many and give to the few, and you can do this without reference to parliament, without parliament having one word to say about it until after you have established the plan and it is in operation." And the only privilege which the Minister of Justice says that we will be allowed then is that on an allotted day we may say we like it or we do not like it. If that is democracy, then we are going down a very dangerous road toward the kind of totalitarianism that is all too common in other parts of the world.

Mr. Stanfield: I wish to ask the Minister of Justice a question. Is it his opinion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition but under our Standing Orders my understanding is that the only way he can pose a question is if the Minister of Justice has the floor, and the minister has already spoken—unless, of course, there is unanimous consent. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: No.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, to assess the amendment now before us, it is important to analyse the reasons that have led the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to move it.

Under our present economic system, the taxpayer is called to depend exclusively on taxes to promote his welfare, and this brings us to make some particular remarks.

In principle, it is abnormal at this time to rely on the exploitation of some passions to obtain additional revenue, for the fact of exploiting the fondness of the public for gambling is, in my opinion, a tax on passion. Several bodies, among which the various religious denominations of this country, make it clear, from a moral standpoint, that we exploit the passion for gambling through lotteries.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

In the present economic system, we endeavour by all available means to tax, surtax and over-overtax. However, there may be a more pleasant way of getting money out of the taxpayers' pockets in order to finance the general administration of the country. Therefore, the legalization of lotteries would be based on the reaction of the people.

I agree with the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) because I know that for many years provincial governments, and more particularly that of the province of Quebec, as well as municipalities have been asking that the Criminal Code be amended in order to enable provinces and municipalities to conduct lotteries.

If one agrees with the distinction I have just made, I think that the people would behave in the following way: they would back the legalization of lotteries not because it is good in itself but because in the present system different solutions must be found, and that lotteries may be acceptable.

It is only in view of those considerations that I say I do not entirely agree with the contents of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

This is proof that members of the Ralliement créditiste, are not afraid of freely expressing their opinions. In spite of the fact that our leader (Mr. Caouette) and the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), have already declared themselves in favour of the amendment, none of us remains silent. We exert no control whatsoever on individual freedom and we are all free to express ourselves. Were all the other members as free as we are, especially on the government side, the administration of the country would be healthier, more efficient, and much more representative of the people. That is why, Mr. Speaker, we have requested that this bill be split.

One can readily agree to most of the clauses on this bill and still be compelled to vote against it because of some clauses forced upon us.

To come back to the amendment, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with this particular part of it which tends to delete paragraphs (a) and (b). The first reads as follows:

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of this Part relating to gaming and betting, it shall be lawful,

(a) for the government of Canada to conduct and manage a lottery scheme in accordance with regulations made by the governor in council and for that purpose, for any person, in accordance with such regulations to do anything described in any of paragraphs (a) to (f) of subsection (1) or subsection (4) of section 179;

Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of deleting that paragraph. I cannot see why the central government which has at its disposal far better means than lotteries, or, as the leader of the Ralliement créditiste termed it, the "national barbotte" would legalize gambling. It could use for instance the excellent means of the Bank of Canada to improve the purchasing power of the people. The government has really no need for lotteries. Deleting that paragraph would be perfectly all right and I therefore support that suggestion.

To my mind, this house would enhance its prestige by saying that it does not see why the federal government should assume certain rights in that field. Why? Because the amendment concerning lotteries was brought forth as a result of certain representations. Whose? Certainly not those of the federal government. They must therefore have been made by welfare groups, charitable organizations, various religious groups and public associations.

In fact, those bodies have been calling for the legalization of lotteries for several years. A little later, the municipalities and the provinces, especially that of Quebec have also asked that lotteries be legalized.

No representations have ever been made at the federal government level asking that it conduct and manage lotteries. I therefore do not see why we should accept that paragraph.

On the other hand, I accept paragraph (b) which would also be deleted through this amendment. I agree with it, Mr. Speaker, all the more so because of the present federalist concept which prevails, especially since the present right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has come to power, whereby it seems that the provincial governments are to be considered merely as large municipalities and gigantic benevolent societies.

That is so true, Mr. Speaker, that we notice, as representatives of the people, that the majority of the requests which are made to us as members of parliament, concern various problems to be solved, most of which fall within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Provinces have become enormous welfare societies within which there is a run on social welfare allowances. As a matter of fact, this run has become a real lottery and people are vying with one another to get one as soon as possible.

Provincial governments having become, according to the present federalist concept, enormous charitable societies, it is, therefore, almost normal in this crazy system in which we live, that we should avail ourselves of the necessary means to help the large and the small welfare societies solve their financial problems in organizing lotteries, in exploiting the passions of the mass and,—I say so again,—the gambling instinct by which people are possessed.

That is why we should recognize the merits of such a solution until it is understood that we should resort to more realistic means. But, for the time being, we are against the principle of lotteries.

I have been agreeably surprised a moment ago, to hear the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) say that he accepted some of the Social credit theories. If he could study them in depth, so as to understand them better, we would be even happier.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

It is almost four years now since I came to this house and I keep harping away at that matter.

Mr. Matte: I hope there will be an ever increasing number of my colleagues willing to grapple with the Social Credit economic theories and that they will eventually put them in practice, even only as an experiment.

But we shall not adopt that way of thinking until we renounce tax and surtax as the sole means of administering the country. We shall have to find more palatable means to snatch away—not to say steal—the people's money.

I have nothing against that clause, provided paragraph (a) is deleted. Therefore, to a certain extent, I am in favour of the amendment. Nonetheless, I would like my reasons to be examined and understood, and I think that the real problems which led us to discuss lotteries should be taken into consideration.

I would go even further. I wonder why, for instance, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), of the New democratic party, which, as a rule, is in favour of any measure of socialization, does not support state lotteries. I would even go as far as wondering if it would not be possible, in order to make the pill easier to swallow for the taxpayers, to set up not only a voluntary but a compulsory lottery. It could be interesting to collect an additional $2 from each taxpayer. Then, while paying taxes we would have a chance of winning $10,000, $100,000, $1,000,000, and this would be a little more pleasant.

I would go a little further than our good friends of the New Democratic party usually do. I would say that if the provincial government was conducting a lottery, it should make it compulsory, otherwise it would not pay.

That is what happened in Montreal when the mayor threatened to resign. Now, as the Montrealers could not take the risk of losing their mayor at a time when the economy was booming, they saw to it that the lottery regain its appeal and a few months later it is again showing a profit. In fact, a lottery is a rather precarious undertaking since we do not know exactly where we are going. This is why I say that if ever a provincial government decides to establish a lottery it would have to make it compulsory.

Mr. Speaker, within the present system, it is more tolerable to offer a small chance to the taxpayer in exchange for his taxes. Even if it is not everybody who wins in a lottery, deep down there is always the hope that someday one may be a winner.

If we are ready to accept such a solution, why not give serious consideration to some other means? One is always ready to look for revenue sources that are contrary to morality and logic, while one neglects to give thought to real remedies, that is to the reform of our present economic system.

That is evidence of the need for Créditiste members in the house and of the importance of the part they are playing here. We beg the house and the people to give consideration to effective ways of correcting our administrative system instead of thinking always of taxes and surtaxes. In other words, it is imperative that human development be promoted, and that is what we have been preaching for many years.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief in my contribution to this part of our consideration of the amendments to the Criminal Code. As this debate proceeds it becomes more and more strange and more difficult to comprehend or understand. I am supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) because I think it gives the minister a good out from a very unhappy situation.

For the past several days we have found the state promoting gross indecency. As the result of further amendments in respect of the legalization of lotteries, both private and government, we now find the state promoting one of the seven deadly sins, avarice and greed. I do not think there has been any great public demand for this sort of thing, and I am at a loss to understand why the government is taking such a strong and stubborn initiative in respect of these matters.

We might speculate and say that the motivating principle behind these amendments to the code is to find a panacea to overcome the fiscal situation in which the government finds itself. This is not peculiar to the federal level of government; it applies also to other levels of government.

We have noted the strong protests against exorbitant taxation in the press of Ottawa during the past few days. In promoting the vice of avarice and greed by authorizing the state's indulgence in particular in lotteries, I suggest to the minister that he is dealing with a panacea that is a snare and a delusion. There is no substitute in public finance for the principle of fiscal responsibility. I was reading a commentary on the editorial page of the Ottawa Citizen by the editor of that journal, Mr. Christopher Young, who was reviewing the first year of the just society. In that commentary Mr. Young said that when the just society began it was faced with a fiscal crisis of extreme proportions. That was brought on, of course, by another Liberal administration which practised fiscal irresponsibility.

If the government is moving into the area of lotteries and gambling to get itself out of its dilemma, it is operating, of course, in the same never-never world as the compulsive alcoholic who takes just another drink to overcome the hangover from which he is suffering by reason of overindulgence. Obviously, as I have indicated, the government is very stubborn in these matters and is completely committed, it would seem, to the promoting of these aspects of irresponsibility in the Canadian body politic.

The amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gives the government at least half an out. It simply underlines a principle of government fiscal responsibility which makes it possible for the minister, without losing any face whatsoever, to remove the government from the support of greed and avarice with respect to public finances.

This debate grows more weird, strange and confusing every day. On the one hand we have the state, with respect to gross indecency, explaining its stand on the ground that the state has no place in the bedrooms of the nation, and on the other hand we have the state saying it does have a place in the gambling dens of the nation. There is a fundamental inconsistency here that must considerably disturb the Minister of Justice. I hope the minister will accept the amendment and at least extract himself from the dilemma in which he finds himself with regard to these very basic and important moral issues.

I know the tendency is to criticize anyone who takes a stand on these issues as being antediluvian, a sort of social jingoist, if I may use that word, or someone suffering from what might be called a residual puritanism. These measures are put forward in terms of reform and progress. This is not a progressive step. This is the most retrogressive step that any government could take. Look at history. The problem of gambling is not new among mankind. Indeed, as I have already indicated, it is one of the seven deadly sins. The progress of the human family has been in the reverse direction; as mankind and his society became more enlightened and progressive, the vice of gambling was gradually abolished. One can follow the pattern throughout most of the western world.

It is governments which are confused about fiscal policy and lack social responsibility which have authorized state lotteries. I can refer, of course, to South American republics. Sometimes I think Canada is becoming more like a South American republic every day under this just society. State lotteries are a retrogressive step; they are a step back into a period when governments were less stable and less fiscally responsible. I urge the minister, because he is responsible for putting this bill through the house, to exert the authority that must be his and not take Canada back in the direction of official sponsorship by the state of the vice of gambling.

I could go on at some length on this matter, but I think the point has been made by many speakers. As a final word may I say that perhaps one of the worst aspects of the state's indulgence in the promotion of lotteries and gambling is the blow it strikes at genuine philanthrophy and charity. It permits the something for nothing philosophy. It militates against the war on poverty, because the people who tend to be caught up in the vicious grip of gambling are those who can least afford to be involved. It undermines the strength of human personality. It promotes greed and avarice, and it is compulsive like alcoholism.

I am sure that if we took a referendum on this matter the minister would find that the vast majority of Canadians are against the state's participation in gambling and lotteries. As the leader of the New Democratic party said just a moment ago, it is being provided for at the national level surreptitiously, so there is a double affront to the people of Canada. Surely the majority of Canadians have some rights and privileges. I hope the Minister of Justice will not carry the charade further and will accept a reasonable amendment which at least removes the state from this sort of promotion of social vice.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, would my hon. colleague allow a question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Certainly.

Mr. Mongrain: I am quite at a loss to follow the trend of his reasoning.

Mr. Dinsdale: I can understand that.

Mr. Mongrain: That is why I am asking him the question. The hon. member has told us about the seven deadly sins, among which are greed and avarice, and the state having to take these measures in order to help its fiscal situation. Am I right?

Mr. Dinsdale: You have it absolutely right.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Mongrain: How does the hon. member reconcile this train of thought with the fact that in this country, for as long as I can remember, churches of all denominations have organized raffles and bingoes which are, after all, games of pure luck?

Mr. Dinsdale: I think the hon. member missed the point of my contribution completely. We cannot deal with the vices of individuals or of organizations, because ours is a pluralistic society. As a member of parliament it is not my obligation to try to urge that the state legislate morality. Morality cannot be legislated. The point I was making was simply that the state should not promote immorality in this bill.

Mr. Gilbert: Would the hon. member permit another question? Is he aware of the statement yesterday by the Minister of Justice that it was not the intention of the federal government to conduct a lottery? If so, his argument that the government is proposing this amendment as a panacea to counteract the present monetary crisis has little or no strength.

Mr. Dinsdale: I think that one of the main evils, if I may use that word, of this legislation was pointed out by the Leader of the New Democratic party—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There are some formidable members in that party.

Mr. Dinsdale: —and it is why I am doubly critical of the legislation. It was effectively pointed out by the Leader of the New Democratic party that the federal government is authorized to introduce a national lottery without reference to parliament, surreptitiously, by bureaucratic means, through an Order in Council. This fact intensifies my opposition to the bill.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief because much has already been said on lotteries.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. membear for Champlain is anxious to ask a question, provided it is the disposition of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris to accept it. However, I should like to caution hon. members against too long an extension of this practice on every speech.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member, since he referred to the seven deadly sins whether or not, in his mind, the government is vindicating the seven deadly sins. He talked about lust yesterday; today, it is avarice.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: I am afraid the government will have to reply to that. I cannot speak for the government.

Mr. Woolliams: If I may, I should like to speak on lotteries for about five minutes. I think it is one subject that has not really been understood. In fact, I believe much of this bill has not been understood by the general public. The arguments we have heard this afternoon with regard to lotteries strengthen the argument which was made at the beginning of the debate on this bill that it should have been divided so that those hon. members who are in favour of certain portions but not in favour of others could express themselves in accordance with their conscience and the consciences of their constituents. That is the first point.

We have to differentiate between two principles with regard to lotteries. One concerns state control of lotteries operated by clubs and religious groups set up for charitable or religious purposes, which is an entirely different matter from a state controlled lottery. It means that a province may say to such groups through the Attorney General that this type of activity is good because it has a charitable or religious purpose. In regard to state controlled lotteries, I cannot envisage a provincial government needing consent for that because such a lottery would fall within their civil rights jurisdiction.

Here we are dealing with the criminal law and with matters of morals. The lotteries with which the house is concerned were referred to by the minister last night when he endeavoured to answer questions, as well as by my leader and the Leader of the New Democratic party. It was said that in a bill affecting the criminal law the state is given the right to set up a lottery without referring the matter to parliament. In other words, when parliament closes on June 27—and many of us hope it will close then—from that date to September or October when parliament meets again the government, provided this bill goes through, could pass an Order in Council implementing immediately without reference to parliament the right of the federal government to bring in a federal lottery and by that method collect the taxes of the land. In other words, they could almost start a new budget by lotteries.

In my opinion this is exactly the point which was made this afternoon by the Leader of the New Democratic party and which was made yesterday by the leader of our party. I do not know where all the members of my party stand in that regard because we intend to have a free vote on this bill. We believe in freedom so far as this matter is concerned. However, I can speak for some members of my party. Some of us are against any kind of gambling or lotteries, and I think the last speaker might be put into that category.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is right.

Mr. Woolliams: He agrees with me, so I have not misunderstood or misquoted him. However, some of us are not against state controlled lotteries which are set up for charitable or religious purposes, or lotteries the proceeds of which go for scientific or medical research or for other purposes in which philanthropists believe. But on this side of the house the majority of the members question the right of the federal government to set up a state controlled lottery which might be used to raise the revenue of the country. This was the argument which was presented this afternoon by the Leader of the New Democratic party, and I am glad that it is catching on to some extent among the members of that party.

So there are two kinds of lotteries: Those that are under state control and which will be exempt from the code, and those that are run by provincial governments. If there are lotteries such as the one run by the city of Montreal, they would have to be legalized by the provinces because the cities are creatures of the provincial legislatures and their jurisdiction comes from a provincial act. In most of our provinces there are city acts which have been passed by the legislatures. So the powers of the cities, their jurisdictions and their constitutions are really under provincial statutes. This is why I rose to speak on this matter. These amendments are pretty complicated and I hope that when they are voted on what I have said will have clarified them.

I have one last thought on this matter. I and other members of my party have great respect for the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, but this is the way I see the argument. I do not have the statistics before me but a lady in Calgary collected many thousands of signatures—although many people do not know what they are signing when such petitions are brought to them. As a result of her research she found that perhaps $90 million is raised in Canada from the class of people to whom reference was made today, namely, those in the low income brackets, and that great amount goes out of the country to the Irish sweepstakes. If it is right to raise money in Canada for a purpose outside Canada, then perhaps it might be right to raise money here for the good of the people who live within our boundaries. We should give some thought to that point.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: Of the $90 million for the Irish sweepstakes, which I am advised is a private corporation and not all that charitable, only $6 million finds its way back to Canada in prizes. If those figures are correct, $84 million goes out of the country. I got these figures from the lady in Calgary who did much research in that regard and who came to see the then minister of justice, now the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), on this subject. There are lotteries in other countries, tickets for which are sold here.

There is a point here about which I have thought for years. As a member of the legal profession and a member of parliament I cannot believe that we should have a law which, as was said in Oliver Twist, is an ass, in other words, a law which cannot be enforced or endorsed. I am sure there is not a member of this house who, on hearing that Mr. Jones had won $150,000, would pick up the telephone and ask the Minister of Justice or the Attorney General to prosecute the man. If a person wins a sweepstake, accepting the winnings is just as illegal as buying the ticket. Yet there are never any prosecutions in such cases.

Having listened to the arguments that have been made on the other side of the house, I can only say that if we really believe the law is as it has been put forward by my distinguished friend we should pick up the telephone as citizens of Canada and ask for the prosecution of people like Mr. Jones who, having bought a ticket on the Irish sweepstakes and won $150,000, has told the newspapers that he is going to buy a new house for his son, educate his daughter, take his wife on her first trip and buy her a fur coat. If the law is as the minister outlined, then in our consciences and in our hearts we should enforce it. If we do not believe that this is the law, then surely we should accept lotteries for charitable, religious and other good purposes. But again I repeat that this is not an endorsement of the kind of lottery about which the minister is talking, namely, state-operated lotteries.

I must be fair with the minister. If the government were to pass an Order in Council to authorize a state lottery for the purpose of raising revenue I assume that the opposition in this house could move a vote of non-confidence in the government on returning from the recess, assuming the Order in Council was passed while parliament was not sitting, which is the way the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) operates in regard to NATO and some other statements he has made.

The trouble with this sort of thing is that although it may be successful with minority governments, today the Liberals are saying every day that they have a mandate, that they love each other like brothers and sisters and always vote together, that they always think alike. They are the only party in Canada that all think alike. All I can say in this regard is that when we all think alike there is no thinking. Certainly in regard to matters in the code such as we are discussing the Liberal party is the only party that, irrespective of its members' religious beliefs and consciences, puts every member into the same pot and declares they all hold the same traditions and spiritual convictions. To me this is beyond comprehension. I have often wondered what it would be like to be a Liberal for a short time and find out what goes on in these secret caucuses. Then I would discover how they are disciplined.

Mr. Mongrain: You would be surprised!

Mr. Woolliams: I sure would. Of course, the hon. member has been out of the caucus two or three times, so he has some experience.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, I must rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member is usually very honest with the house but I should like to make it plain that I have never left the federal Liberal caucus—never.

Mr. Woolliams: Well, Mr. Speaker, I would be the last to be offensive to my hon. friend. I only wondered because he did sit for a time as an independent. It seems he must have been a Liberal when the caucus met but an independent in the house. However, I accept his word in this regard.

When we come to vote, I would ask hon. members to consider the two different kinds of lotteries. First, there are those that are run for state purposes, controlled and operated by the state. Then there is the kind that is run under state control for charitable and religious purposes. Let us also consider those lotteries operated by other countries that are supported within this country. These are being endorsed every day as a result of non-enforcement of the law.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): There will be other opportunities.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I know that the minister is looking forward to the defeat of several amendments that were moved.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, I am still ready to listen to the golden voice of the hon. member.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his patience, for he will still require a lot of it. However, some arguments have already been set forth and others soon will be. It is extremely important that this be put on the official report of the House of Commons debates.

I have here what I could call "some portable facts" that I found very interesting and that I would like to put on the official report of the House of Commons debates. These facts will make it easier for us to study these amendments.

[English]

Slot machines are habitually rigged so that 40 to 80 per cent of all coins that go into the machine are retained by the owner.

After two and a half centuries of experience the British parliament outlawed lotteries in 1828.

The French government, after five years of public lotteries in the 1930's, abandoned the experiment. Only 3½ per cent of the money paid by the people for tickets reached the treasury.

Those are facts.

Senator Wiley of Wisconsin, in advising the new state of Alaska not to utilize gambling, said that every dollar raised from such sources means $5 spent on higher police costs, high court costs, higher penitentiary costs, higher relief costs.

The total income of Irish hospitals from the Irish sweepstakes, counting all money now gathered from Canada, the United States, Britain and elsewhere, amounts to about $4 million a year. This is less than 19 per cent of the money paid by those who bought genuine sweepstakes tickets. (The percentage is still smaller when one takes into account the enormous sums spent on counterfeit tickets.)

In Canada:

—Hospitals for acute disease alone require over $100 million annually;

—Hospital maintenance runs over $800 million annually;

—Construction and renovation costs another $100 million annually.

"The painful fact is that Canadian sweepstakes equal to that created by Ireland for 33 years would keep Canadian hospitals going only for four days, and not a cent toward new construction."

That statement appeared in the Financial Post of October 12, 1963.

No other single act could be as demoralizing to Canadian hospitals as turning from dependence on public taxes and enlightened philanthropy to the dubious resources of a lottery.

A royal commission in Britain has rightly said that no other mode of raising public money has proved "so burdensome, so pernicious and so unproductive".

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, these few facts prove that this legislation that we are asked to approve will bring no real assistance to our charitable institutions, our schools and our hospitals. It is unfortunate to go as far as to want to legalize what they have been trying to legalize in other countries for three or even five centuries. They have given it up because it was thought that despite the few advantages that could be derived from lotteries, it would raise problems and increase governmental expenditures in the field of social welfare and the administration of justice.

It is a shame to see that through legislation we will push the public more and more towards vice.

The hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) mentioned that many mayors have asked to conduct municipal lotteries. However, several municipal councils have passed resolutions asking the federal government to find other means of raising money.

I think the government should have the same attitude in respect of these resolutions already proposed by various municipalities. I could have several put on record.

These same municipalities have also suggested that the federal government use the Bank of Canada to take care of their financing.

In fact, the city of Granby, passed three years ago a resolution suggesting that the Bank of Canada be used to make money available to municipalities, school boards and public bodies. However, the federal government failed to act upon that resolution.

Why not start by enacting some measures that would help financially not just a few individuals, but also our municipalities and our school boards.

Whatever lotteries could bring to municipalities, hospitals, school boards or various organizations would be only a drop in the bucket as compared to their needs.

Why try in 1969 to legalize lotteries, when the government of Alberta tried, in 1935 to put money on the market, not paper money, but crédit money? And yet, the Prime Minister of the time, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, had promised, after the general elections of 1935, that he would authorize the Alberta government to apply the principles set forth during the election campaign of Mr. William Aberhart. It had been said that the federal government would create no restriction to prevent the government of Alberta from applying the principles the citizens of that province had voted for.

The federal government "will take his hands off". Those were the very words of the Prime Minister of the time. However, after the general elections of 1935, the federal government, as well as the Supreme Court, did everything to prevent the Alberta government from applying those principles.

It was not a lottery, nor some kind of hoax or fraud. It was something really serious and scientific. Why, then, was the government of Alberta not given the opportunity to apply those principles, since it was not a bunch of idiots who had been elected? Why were they not given the chance to carry out the wishes of Mr. William Aberhart?

Why pay attention to mayors when they ask that lotteries be put at the service of the provinces? Why not do what they also requested many times? The mayor of Thetford Mines, for instance, once laughed at a resolution passed by the Union of Municipalities asking precisely what the Créditistes have been requesting in the house for 30 years, that the Bank of Canada be used to finance public capital, in order to solve our present problems.

If lotteries were legalized, it would be an admission that there is not enough money in circulation. Despite lotteries, there will not be a penny more in circulation. Lotteries will not solve the problems of hospitals and will not replenish the funds of some religious organizations.

The creation of lotteries is an undeniable proof that our present economic system is unsound. It is not by allowing the provinces to legalize vice that we will settle our financial problems.

If we legalize vice to replenish the Treasury, why not apply the same absurd argument and legalize prostitution also? Why not, like other countries, legalize prostitution to bring money into the Treasury, if we must speculate on vice? Why not, for that matter, make money out of all vices? In that manner, we could replenish the Treasury with all the money that vice monopolizes now.

I have on hand several statements from authorized persons who have already given their views on what we are discussing presently.

First, lotteries will contribute to the exploitation of the poor. They will be lured with illusory promises which will keep them hoping that they might become rich overnight.

The poor will be taken advantage of. They will be deluded into the belief they might get rich. There will be more and more victims.

Mr. Laniel: This is human nature.

Mr. Rondeau: This is taking advantage of human nature as the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Laniel) remarked. We are not here to take advantage of the vices of people, but to protect them from them.

If last year we were deluded into believing that electing the Liberal party would help us find a solution to our problems, we soon found out that we had been entertaining illusions in that respect. Today, we want to establish a lottery; it is nothing more than an economic illusion.

At the same time, this is a wrong conception of morality, since we know by experience that wealthy peoples have lost their fortune by indulging in their vice: card playing or some other form of gambling. We have even seen people lose considerable amounts of money betting on cock-fights. Families who had been led to believe in illusory solutions were ruined. The purpose of lotteries is to take advantage of the vices and of the immorality of the people.

I have here another book entitled: Lotteries, the Great Illusion, written by Mr. E. M. Howse, in which he says, and I quote:

[English]

All the old arguments, discredited long since by past misery and corruption, are being marshalled again to promote this sordid device for paying our legitimate bills for hospitals, education and honourable philanthropy.

[Translation]

This means that to save hospitals, to help education and religious works, we are reduced to exploiting vice.

I have just said that the proceeds of lotteries could provide the various religious organizations or hospitals with an income that would enable them to operate four days more, according to the figures supplied to us.

[English]

In 1963 race track betters in Ontario alone poured into parimutuel machines $153,506,144—a total of $28,506,000 more than they took out in all their winnings . . .

The Irish sweepstakes annually take from Canadians several times what they return in prizes. (Counterfeit tickets take the gullible public for enormous extra amounts) . . .

It was said of the Bourbons of France, before the collapse of the ancien régime, that they forgot nothing and learned nothing. Proponents of lotteries as a means of supporting hospitals, education or the vast philanthropies of a democratic people, seem to outdo the Bourbons.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

It is noteworthy, Mr. Speaker, that every country resorted to lotteries before going bankrupt. I believe that today, the fact that we want to legalize gambling in Canada is a premonitory sign of bankruptcy.

It is often said that life is a gamble that life is at the mercy of hazard.

[English]

"All life's a gamble." This is nonsense. What people mean is that life has risks. But there is a clear distinction between a gamble and merely a risk. Risk is a necessary element in life, an element to be intelligently reduced. One of the astronauts, when asked about the risks that he took, replied that he took no risk. He was right.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I believe that we are on the point of legalizing risks. This bill which deals mostly with lotteries, threatens to lead the nation to moral decadence for which we will have to pay later.

It is clear that when vice is rampant and legalized, it is soon necessary to check its consequences. And the amount of money that we will have spent for this purpose will be far greater than what the government hopes to put at the disposal of religious organizations and provincial governments by allowing them to conduct lotteries.

If it is wished to help religious organizations, it should be ascertained that they approve of them themselves. As a matter of fact, I have in hand many documents that I do not have time to put on record, but which prove that even religious organizations are opposed to lotteries, because they prefer to respect their principles rather than to fill up their coffers.

A Baptist organization from Ontario and Quebec has passed the following resolution aiming at a special study of the historic background of lotteries:

Considering that approval of such provisions would be of assistance and accessory to a quick development of gambling in Canada;

Considering that lotteries appeal to the poor, who become the victims of an illusory hope regarding the solution of their problems;—

This organization firmly states its opposition to lotteries.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for these reasons, we believe that the paltry sums lotteries might bring to church organizations are not worth endangering morals. Thousands of people who might trust such illusory solutions may gamble the welfare of their children, in the hope of becoming rich overnight. Advertising will sell them on the idea that such lotteries will allow their lifelong dreams to materialize in dazzling colour.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks on the subject of lotteries.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that some people are made to build and others to destroy. I have the feeling that the government to which I belong falls in the category of the builders and I need not indicate who the destroyers are. We have just heard their remarks showing that they are to accept an opinion contrary to theirs. The worst is that they have not enough common sense to listen to those who intend to express their views as strongly as they do.

Some remarks are called for about lotteries, which through the ages have been seen in different lights. At times, their morality or their opportunity has been questioned, but finally their principle has apparently become accepted almost everywhere.

It would not be exaggerated, I think, to maintain that it is human to want sometimes to try one's luck.

Would I be going too far if I said that in life everything is in a way a lottery. Birth as well as success are the results of chance which sometimes changes completely the life of a man. An unexpected event, a road accident, in short a mere nothing can change the course of his life. Very often man's destiny is the product of chance.

Some sceptics will suggest that I fail to recognize the fundamental characteristics of man, namely will and intelligence, which permit him to make his way alone if he wants to. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I recognize these qualities as essential. I only say that sometimes they are not sufficient.

Moreover, for every human being gambling is an obsession. As I said, every man wants to try his luck. Betting is an ordinary thing, whether it be in sports or in speculations.

Ask anyone if from time to time he does not like to try his luck. If he replies no, take his word for it. If he says nothing, you can wonder.

Lotteries have their roots in man's age-old thirst for gambling. The first are reported to have existed in ancient Rome under Augustus and Nero. I admit that they had quite a simple form at that time: when games or circuses were being held, small tickets were dropped among the crowd; some of them had something written on them, for instance the words: a slave, a horse or an earthen pot, and others were blank. People hurried to pick them up, and those lucky enough to pick up one with an inscription could claim whatever was written on it.

The first organized lottery made its appearance in Italy in the fourteenth century.

Habits have not evolved much since then, Mr. Speaker, for what I have just said is derived from a speech delivered in 1934 by Hon. Athanase David, then Secretary of the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the more times change, the more alike they are. People think today that a lottery would meet a need.

The best thing would be for Canadians to start saving their money or investing it, but some of them feel they can channel it into games of chance. I do not know how we could prevent them from doing so, but in any event millions of dollars are swallowed up by gambling and go abroad whereas they could be put to use in this country for our own people.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this legislation will enable our modern society to go one step ahead.

I ask our friends of the Ralliement Créditiste to show enough common sense to join the majority of members in endorsing the principle of lotteries.

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to discuss the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I am somewhat agreeable to it. I should like to say that we are not opposed to lotteries, in view of the circumstances but if our economic situation rated better, there would be no need for national, provincial, municipal or school barbottes.

Today reference is made to the legalization of lotteries in Canada and in the provinces especially because the provinces, the school boards, the municipalities, and the religious institutions can no longer pay off their tremendous debts.

I would say to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) that the citizens who wish to buy tickets will have to go and borrow the money because there is not one red cent which has not been borrowed free of interest. However, special taxes and rates empoverish the citizens.

Every time a citizen visits those barbottes he will have to borrow money, go into debt and pay back an interest ranging from 10 to 24 per cent to high finance which has the support of the hon. member for Lapointe and other members of this house, the Prime Minister, (Mr. Trudeau) the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and all those who do not want to listen to reason.

Those who do not want to understand that money is but a tool for the use of man, are inhuman. Money is not a tool for the exploitation of man but they are using it as such and they become themselves exploiters of the nation.

This is the picture of the situation. When the hon. member for Lapointe tells us that we are off our rocker, that we want destruction and ruin, I ask him to tell us who has led this system to ruin?

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Latulippe: Who has led it to bankruptcy? Is it the Social Credit or this evil system?

Mr. Marceau: I raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member for Compton in his flight of oratory but the hon. member for Lapointe raises the question of privilege.

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind my hon. friend that I never said he was out of his mind. I also wish to tell him that I would not go as far as that but if he himself wants to say he is, I do not want to prevent him from doing so.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Marceau: I do not want him to ascribe to me—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Marceau: —something I did not say.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no point of privilege here.

The hon. member for Compton has the floor and we will listen with pleasure to the remainder of his speech.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, we are really the real builders of the nation. We are those who want to build upon the ruins of the present system, completely worn out by the extravagance of the old parties during many generations.

They were never willing to listen to reason. They never tried to understand the facts of life. They never wanted to recognize facts and apply solutions to enable a nation to develop itself adequately and freely in a country that abounds in resources. There is no lack of abundance nor of production, but of distribution and consumption, on account of the lack of purchasing power. That is one of the reasons why we are establishing barbottes of all kinds.

I apologize for using such a word, Mr. Speaker, but I have to use expressions of that kind in order to interest the hon. members.

Mr. Speaker, in reply to my hon. friend from Lapointe, I have here quotations from the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, who was Prime Minister of this country in 1935. He was a good Liberal, a man who had an understanding of business and a sense of responsibility, in short, someone who wanted to do something good for the nation. Unfortunately, those around him would not understand anything, they called him a bluffer and told him all kinds of unseemly things for he had more insight than they had. We have much respect for that illustrious Prime Minister whose opinions were sound and practical.

This is what he said:

> In a world where the priority of financial credit is every day more prevalent, it is easy to understand that the present system which grants to private interests the privilege and the monopoly of establishing credit has met and is still meeting with a strong opposition.

Several Liberals, at that time, were in disagreement with their Prime Minister.

For instance, commenting on the results of the general elections vote of October 1935, the new prime minister of the day, William Lyon MacKenzie King made the following statement:

> "The election is an endorsement of the Liberal view that credit is a public matter, not of interest to bankers only, but of direct concern to every citizen. It is a verdict against a privately owned and controlled central bank, and in favour of a properly constituted national bank to perform the functions of rediscount, and the control of currency issue considered in terms of public need. There can be no mistaking the demand for a restoration to the government of Canada of control over credit and currency issue."

There is no possible misunderstanding: it means asking to entrust to the government the control over credit and over money.

How is it then that the present Liberal government would disagree and refuse to acknowledge what the former prime minister said.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if I should interrupt the hon. member but may I remind him that we have now under consideration an amendment on the question of lotteries? I wonder whether this question, which to me seems rather limited, would allow the hon. member to criticize the monetary system of Canada.

I daresay he is going far beyond the limits of the motion we are now considering.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, it may be true that I am going beyond the limits of the motion under consideration but on the other hand this motion is surely related to our economic system.

If we have reached the point where we have to establish such lotteries, it is precisely because our economy is topsy-turvy, is day by day more unbalanced, and leads us to request the setting-up of lotteries to enable us to manage our business.

Lotteries are growing into a necessary financial means. I should point out at what the great men of that time, following the Liberal leader, have demonstrated to the government, to the people of Canada, and to the whole world and that is the necessity for reforms. He specifically pointed at them but no one, I believe, in his government ever understood him.

Today, we are claiming the same thing, and we are scorned by the Liberals.

Everything that is good remains good. We want to build our society, not destroy it. But the citizens do not have the required purchasing power to spend on "barbottes" and we are sure that the people who will gamble will have to find the money somewhere. Social welfare will have to step in to provide for the needs of families at the expense of the taxpayers who earn an honest living.

Mr. Speaker, we must point out the problems and what remedial measures should be taken to correct that degrading, disappointing and economically unhealthy situation.

We are not opposed to the present system, and we would not do away with it, for it is the best system in the world. But we do object to the abuses of the capitalistic system. And if we, elected by the people, do not assume our responsibilities with a view to correcting the awful abuses which corrupt this fundamentally good system, then we are responsible for them.

I could quote you Winston Churchill, who said that the monetary system—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member starts reading those quotations to the house, I should like to remind him, as I mentioned a moment ago, that the house is now dealing with an amendment on lotteries; the hon. member should limit his observations to that matter without discussing, for the benefit of the house and hon. members, the far more general topic of the Canadian monetary system.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for calling me back to order. I may not be completely in order, but there were others who were not strictly in order. Mr. Speaker, you have more sympathy for some people than for others, but I shall comply with your decision.

I would like to know why they want to legalize lotteries, at the federal and the provincial level. Why are we discussing this ambiguous measure? It is supposed to settle the financial problems of the provinces, of the federal government and of the municipalities, burdened with unredeemable debts, which carry tremendous rates of interest. Lotteries are not a healthy proposition, for they cannot settle any problem.

The city of Montreal has not settled its problems, though it has a lottery. As a matter of fact, the federal government had to intervene and it will have to do so for a long time, for that city cannot repay its debts. Moreover, all municipalities are in the same position.

• (5:00 p.m.)

On the matter of lotteries, we intend to support the amendment, but we will vote against the bill, because it contains several immoral clauses and it has not been divided. The government has refused to divide this bill as asked by the opposition so that we could approve certain things which we find unnecessary, but that we call urgent, because they could be of assistance to a number of institutions in Canada. We would be in favour of lotteries but as there has been unwillingness to divide this bill and to comply with the will of the people and of the opposition, we will vote against this bill and therefore against lotteries.

If it is not too late, I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) to divide this bill. We could then decide in favour of some provisions and against some others.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot decide in favour of this bill, although we shall vote in favour of the amendment. We feel, however that it makes sense. We want to help religious bodies and school boards wishing to conduct lotteries in order to pay their debts or to promote education, as they have no other means to do so.

Several other organizations could benefit by it.

Those who want a house would need lotteries, because they cannot afford to build a house and borrow money at a 10 per cent interest rate.

Mr. Speaker, due to all the consequences of the present disastrous administration, we have to resort to means that I would term illegal, because I believe lotteries are illegal. Indeed, it is not altogether legal to squeeze money out of the taxpayers by extraordinary means, on a few individuals' instigation in order to obtain the necessary money to finance various institutions.

On that point, Mr. Speaker, we could say many things.

For example, we might refer to the hospitals' financial problems, even though they are being subsidized by the provinces. The latter can no longer meet their obligations towards the hospitals, and the federal government does absolutely nothing to lower the interest rate in order to allow the hospitals to carry on their work.

Charity institutions are in the same boat. They need capital, and they are provided with money at a 10 per cent interest.

Municipalities do the same when urgent works have to be undertaken.

Many things are physically, if not financially possible. We should take the time needed to face facts and to ask ourselves frankly if we can finance all that is physically possible by other means, instead of amending the existing laws which now exploit the people. We are satisfied with talking of something else, wasting our time trying to impose lotteries and all sorts of systems which can in no way solve the problem.

Mr. Speaker, we are here to solve that problem. We are here to find solutions to the various problems of our system, to build, not only to destroy. The present system is most certainly not constructive, since the 10 per cent interest rate is destructive. That is robbery, and it has been the downfall of many economic organizations in Canada. Not one member of the Progressive Conservative party—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[English]

The question is on the amendment by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre). Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion negatived on division.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Section 11 of Standing Order 75 the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred. The house will now proceed—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order and invite the attention of the Minister of Justice and those who are acting as house leaders of the other parties. I am sure we all agree with Your Honour's decision to defer the taking of the recorded divisions on this and other amendments, but I wonder whether I may draw attention to the slight problem we are now running into.

If the debate on the other two amendments included in the first eleven is prolonged beyond tonight, hon. members will realize what this will mean. Tomorrow and Thursday we are to have a debate on a defence and external affairs matter. I presume the debate on the Criminal Code may continue on Friday, but one knows that attendance in the house on Friday is not always 100 per cent.

I wonder, therefore, whether there would not be general agreement in the house to take the votes on the matters that have been deferred at nine thirty o'clock tonight, whatever stage we may have reached? In other words, we could take the votes on those amendments that have been disposed of not later than 9.30 p.m. If amendments Nos. 11 and 9 have also been disposed of they could be voted on at that time. I am not trying to cut off the debate on the amendments that my friends have proposed, No. 11 and No. 9, but perhaps in view of the broad debate we have had in respect of lotteries on amendment No. 10 the debate on the other two might be shortened.

The sum of my remarks is that we take the votes not later than 9.30 o'clock tonight in order that we may clear up what we have disposed of at that time.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the suggestion appears satisfactory to us at first blush. I assume that if we are left with two amendments which have not been concluded by 9.30 the hon. member suggests we group those with other amendments that Your Honour intends to group later for a series of votes.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as far as amendment No. 8 is concerned.

With regard to amendments Nos. 9, 10 and 11, I do not agree for the reason that they refer to the same clauses of the bill.

According to indications you gave at the outset of the debate on bill C-150, those amendments would be debated as far as amendment No. 11. If we voted as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that might indicate a change in the speeches on amendments Nos. 9 and 11.

For the same reasons put forward with regard to amendments Nos. 3 and 4, we could agree to the proposition made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre until we reach amendment No. 8.

[English]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, in respect of the suggestion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I think the more logical course would be for us to complete the debate on amendments 9 and 11 since amendments 10 and 11 fit logically together. At that point we should vote on everything. I understand the hon. member suggests that if at 9.30 this evening we have not completed the debate on amendments 9 and 11 we should hold any recorded votes that arise on amendments preceding No. 9 so we will keep everything in neat packages. This should commend itself to Your Honour as providing some protection to those members in the corner of the chamber to my left who moved other amendments or have not had the opportunity to speak on them, although the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has had this opportunity. I believe there should be a mixture of both common sense and democratic procedure adopted in respect of these votes.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I think the last remark of the hon. member who preceded me was not intended as a shot at the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who made it very clear that he did not want to interfere with anyone's right to carry on the debate.

I rise mainly to bring out the following point in respect of this point of order, and I hope the hon. members who gave notice of amendments Nos. 9 and 11 will not take umbrage at what I am about to say. I have not taken part in the debate on amendment No. 10 regarding lotteries but I sat here much of yesterday listening to the debate, which I might add was very interesting.

Let me address myself particularly to the amendments of the members of the Creditiste Party and ask them whether this is a fair statement. I have noticed that the debate so far on amendment No. 10 has by no means always been limited to that amendment. Amendment No. 10 deals only with the deletion from the amendments to the Criminal Code of the reference to provincial and federal lotteries. A number of speeches were not at all limited to that question but dealt with the whole question of lotteries private and public, the whole ambit of legislation concerning lotteries, and the whole ambit of the amendments proposed to the Criminal Code concerning lotteries.

I am wondering, therefore, whether the hon. member for Abitibi, whose contribution to the house and whose sincerity I very much respect, and the other members of his party would not agree that having had this kind of discussion, wandering all over the question of lotteries, we could set ourselves a goal of ending the discussion on amendments Nos. 9, 10 and 11 by 9.30 this evening. If hon. members of the Creditiste party, or two or three of them, were to speak again on amendment No. 9 or 11, they would merely be repeating what they have already said on amendment No. 10. I have great respect for their ingenuity to say it in a different way, but it would in substance be repetition.

This is the fifth day of the report stage of this bill. There are some 40 amendments; I do not recall how many have been declared out of order and what combinations are being made. But we are only on the ninth one; it is No. 10 but it is really the ninth because we dealt with No. 8 and went on to No. 10. This raises a pretty horrendous proposition.

When we reach the amendments with regard to abortion there will be a great deal of honest and sincere feeling on that subject which will require and should have many days of discussion. I repeat that since we have had last evening and this afternoon, and will continue to have some time this evening, on the question of lotteries, and since many speeches dealt with the entire subject rather than being limited to the narrow points of amendment No. 10, which the Chair presumably could have insisted upon but which in its usual wisdom it did not do. I wonder whether we could not agree to end the debate on amendments 9, 10 and 11 by 9.30 this evening.

Mr. Woolliams: Or before.

Mr. Lewis: Or before, but at least by 9.30, and take the votes on everything up to No. 11. I suggest this merely for the consideration of hon. members.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, according to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), we are bent on extending the debate. I want to make it clear that we intend to do so. It is as simple as that. We have no objection to a vote being taken on everything that has been discussed up to now, including the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

However, I think that amendments Nos. 9 and 11 moved by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) must also be discussed because we still have something to say, even though we may have to repeat in other terms what we already said, as the hon. member for York South remarked. We can express our argument differently, and we will surely use all our cleverness to stretch this debate.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. We have now completed up to amendment No. 10 and are down to No. 11. I agree with the suggestion with one exception. Do not let us set the hour of 9.30. We should be able to complete this discussion long before that. But let us set a target of 9.30 at the latest with respect to lotteries. I agree that the debate has been useful, but everybody who has spoken and to whom I have listened has covered the whole subject in reference to all the amendments. They have not particularized.

In making this suggestion I am not trying to recommend any form of closure, but surely we should not set a target of 9.30. We have had a full discussion and we might, as reasonable people, be able to finish this matter as early as 5.30 or 8.30. I do not know why we have to say 9.30. Perhaps that is because it is near the closing hour. I think the suggestion made is a good one, but we should be able to complete discussion of this question before 9.30. We should be able to accomplish what we have to accomplish before that time. There are other points in this bill that I know many members want to talk about.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could now make the suggestion that at the dinner hour there be consultations among representatives of the parties to see if we can come to some agreement that will meet the wishes of all of us. I think there is a general desire to have some of the votes tonight, knowing that we cannot have them on Wednesday or Thursday and that there might not be a universal desire to have them on Friday.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We will have our representative there, Mr. Speaker. Naturally we are in favour of any reasonable arrangement that can be made, but we want to reserve our position to see where we stand at 9.30.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members know that the original decision was that amendments 1 to 11 would be voted on together. That was the official decision arrived at after hearing the views of all hon. members. I would not think the Chair could change this position now, unless there is agreement on the part of all hon. members. I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and concurred in by other hon. members, is probably very valid but that no change should be made to the original decision unless there is some measure of agreement following the usual consultations among hon. members. I would therefore proceed at this point to put to the house the adjournment proceedings.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are the following: The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Combines—drugs—price fixing by B.C. pharmacists; the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—National Parks—alteration of land tenure principle.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REPORT STAGE

The house resumed consideration of Bill C-150, to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

• (5:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi) moved:

That Bill C-150, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act, be amended by deleting from clause 13 at lines 41 and 42, page 31, the words: "either alone or in conjunction with the government of another province"; and by deleting also at lines 44 and 45 the words: "in that province, or in that and such other province"

Mr. Speaker, I moved that amendment to clause 13 of Bill C-150 regarding lotteries in order to clear up some clauses of the bill.

However, I would have preferred to consider first amendment No. 9 whose effect would be to delete clauses 12 and 13 from Bill C-150. If the house had agreed to delete both clauses, the two other amendments on the same subject would have been unnecessary and we would therefore have avoided a few more hours of discussion on this subject.

For reasons I do not understand very well but that I accept, the Chair has steered us towards amendments Nos. 10 and 11 before reverting to amendment No. 9. During the few minutes allotted to me, I shall speak on clause 13 which deals with lotteries.

The amendment I am moving simply aims to correct subparagraph (b) of paragraph (1) of the new clause 179A which reads as follows:

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of this part relating to gaming and betting, it shall be lawful

(b) for the government of a province, either alone or in conjunction with the government of another province, to conduct and manage a lottery scheme in that province, or in that and such other province, in accordance with any law enacted by the legislature of that province and for that purpose for any person in accordance with such law to do anything described in any of paragraphs (a) to (f) of subsection (1) or subsection (4) of section 179;

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the amendment I am moving is to delete certain words from this clause, which would now read as follows, and I quote:

—for the government of a province, to conduct and manage a lottery scheme, in accordance with any law enacted by the legislature of that province.

Then, the government of a province could conduct and manage a lottery scheme, as enacted by the amendment I am moving to clause 13 of Bill C-150.

Mr. Speaker, I first moved an amendment to delete clause 13 completely from Bill C-150, as well as clause 12 which deals with the same subject.

If I moved this amendment, it is because I do not know exactly what the law provides with regard to lotteries in Canada.

I am fairly well aware, however, of the manner in which it is applied in the province of Quebec. I believe that the latitude given by the Criminal Code, with regard to this matter, is wide enough to allow any charitable organization or agricultural fair to set up lotteries.

We also know that Mayor Drapeau has succeeded in organizing his own lottery, which seems quite legal to me, since those who have tried to prevent the city of Montreal from operating its lottery did not have much success.

Proceedings may have been held in Superior Courts to have the Montreal lottery declared illegal, but I think it is already too late and that a precedent has been established. Even if one succeeded in proving that the Montreal lottery is illegal, nothing could be done now, because the mayor of Montreal could not be forced to take back the thousands of dollars he has distributed through his lottery, nor could he be forced to return to all those who purchased tickets the two dollars he received from each of them. He could not be forced either to dismiss all employees who run the lottery.

For all those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I believe there is nothing we can say against the lotteries now being operated in the province of Quebec and in Canada.

That is one of the reasons why I appprove the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, even if I have not spoken in favour of it. I support the amendment because it simply deletes paragraphs (a) and (b) of clause 13 and leaves charitable organizations free to operate lotteries.

So, whether one is for or against clause 13, that will not have much effect on what presently takes place in Canada.

We are asked to amend the Criminal Code in order to legalize lotteries operated by the federal government, the provincial governments and the municipalities, for certain reasons.

But that has been going on for many years, on the pretext, for instance, of helping municipalities to carry out their administrative duties.

We are told that they could help hospitals to meet their obligations.

Those are not valid arguments, in my view, because there are other means, more efficient and much more equitable, of realizing the same objectives.

• (5:30 p.m.)

If the government has yielded to pressures, it was in order to satisfy the numerous requests made by the provinces. To obtain new fields of taxation, the provinces come to Ottawa, not once but two or three times a year.

Municipalities make pilgrimages to their capital city to get from the provincial government greater powers of taxation.

So, faced with reiterated representations from the various public bodies of the provinces, the government which is no longer willing or able to give such powers, now offers them this indirect form of taxing the Canadian citizen.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this method of disguised taxation is unfair because even a brief study of income tax will show that is entirely different.

Our fiscal system is based on two distinct sources of revenues: taxes on the income of individuals and corporations, and excise tax.

Mr. Speaker, I recognize the merits of the first method, but I deny those of the second, because it is used to levy indirect taxes, both on those who are unable to pay and those who can, while the personal income tax could be set up in such a way as to tax only those who can pay.

Mr. Speaker, when I say that I support an income tax system, I mean that we should leave the worker enough take-home pay to allow him to provide a decent living for his family. That is why we urge that the amount of non-taxable income be raised to $5,000 a year, at least, for married persons.

In my opinion, this way of imposing a disguised or voluntary tax is unjust, because it affects even those who cannot afford to pay taxes.

This new method of taxation is unjust and ineffective, because it is too unsteady a source of revenue. It is therefore surely impossible to use that means of taxation. If we want to allow municipalities to use that tax system—Mayor Drapeau of Montreal was in a position to realize it—no municipality will be able to prepare a reasonable budget based on revenues from a lottery.

This is why we cannot rely on receipts from lotteries to replenish municipal funds or help finance hospitals.

In my opinion, the lottery system is not valid, since changes to the tax structure should be made through adequate legislation based on the opinion of tax specialists, as is advocated by the Carter report and other official documents.

Mr. Speaker, if we are to develop a taxation system, I suggest we should proceed in an orthodox way so that people may know exactly where they stand. This is why I wanted clauses 12 and 13 to be deleted or clause 13 to be amended.

Another reason that made me bring this motion forward is that if a province is permitted to set up its own lottery system, another province cannot be denied that right. Can you imagine what would happen if all ten provinces decided to organize lotteries. It would be a mad competitive rush for the citizen's dollar. Provincial governments would be at each other's throats, and so would the inhabitants of the various provinces, who would resent a neighbouring province reaching from across the border for their own resources. This would cause discord within Canada and would be another subject for the governments and citizens in the provinces to wrangle over.

This is why we think that the present act should not become more lenient.

I have another point to draw to the attention of the house. I have listened carefully to every speech since the beginning of this debate on lotteries and nobody raised that point.

I do not wish to venture into any intricacies, Mr. Speaker, but as far as the administration of the province of Quebec is concerned, I know it well enough to be aware of the greediness of some civil servants. Naturally, this does not apply to all of them, but I know that some civil servants are extremely greedy and this may lead to abuses in the administration and the conduct of a provincial lottery.

The same goes for municipalities. According to the Maclean's magazine, a gang of criminals in the United States earned $13,500 and $14,000 unlawfully.

Mr. Speaker, there is also the danger that the underworld could creep in, even without knowledge of a province or a municipality, to take over the giving of prizes.

We remember what happened not long ago at the Montreal Forum. It was discovered that, unknown to the management, the time-keeping system at hockey games had fallen into the hands of quite unscrupulous persons. It is a danger we could face.

The example of a social club which was for a quite worthwhile project is also quoted. The company involved received $100,000 for the administration, in addition to $69,000 in gifts, while the profits for charitable organizations only reached the sum of $30,000 for a 4-year period.

Mr. Speaker, the dangers arising from the administration of such indirect systems of taxation are very serious and the profits will be small in comparison with the money spent by the people.

Mr. Speaker, I think that it is unadvisable to bring in any amendment to the section on lotteries. Anyhow, I suggest to the house, in case amendment No. 9 is not carried, to take at least the trouble of considering amendment No. 11 to paragraph (b) now under discussion which would prevent any confusion should the provinces wish to avail themselves of that legislation. This in order to avoid disputes within provincial lottery systems.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend at this stage to continue my comments on the matter. I know that the house is already acquainted with many views on the subject and I will be pleased to hear others which will be stated.

• (5:40 p.m.)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is the house ready for the question?

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I think I should speak on the motion of the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) to delete clauses 12 and 13 in the omnibus bill. These clauses, as we know, are intended to legalize national as well as provincial lotteries.

Mr. Speaker, I would not want to waste the time of the house, but I should like to put forward some arguments in support of the assertions of the hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the remarks of the hon. member for Abitibi a while ago, give cause for reflection to all members interested in the administration of our country and give us the opportunity to think about the establishment of a national lottery.

Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest this afternoon the comments of the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) and I am pleased to see that he considers several of our proposals as acceptable.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that members will give more and more consideration to these proposals so as to come to some conclusion.

With regard to lotteries, I think the problem is rather complex. It has often been said since this debate started that the acknowledged purpose of a lottery was to supply an additional source of revenues tc the State.

To confirm such statements, I have here an article of La Presse dated January 20, 1968, which some members may have read. It is excellent and was written by Mr. André Béliveau. I quote:

No doubt that the main quality of a lottery is that it can be a source of considerable revenues to the State.

Mr. Speaker, the reporter even thinks it his duty to recognize that ultimately the object of a national lottery is indeed to provide the State with additional revenues

So governments have here a financial, a monetary problem. And the reporter goes on to say:

—In its report tabled in December 1965, the royal commission on taxation whose chairman was Mr. Marcel Bélanger, roughly estimated the net revenue that would accrue to the State of Quebec at $10 million per annum. Although the Bélanger Commission considers that amount as a maximum, several proponents of the legalization of lotteries question it and point out that the New Hampshire lottery, established in 1934, even in its first year produced almost twice the amount that had been expected and that the receipts from the New Zealand lottery, created in 1961, exceed by 500 per cent the experts' forecasts.

Anyway, the $10 million foreseen by the Bélanger Commission would already represent 0.55 per cent of all the revenues the province of Quebec got in 1966. Although comparatively small at first sight, such extra returns are not negligible in a country in full expansion where needs are urgent in all sectors.

I think that document most interesting for whoever wants to know all that a lottery scheme entails.

Mr. Speaker, right now, let us say that we see no immorality in the establishment of a lottery. For my part, I see nothing moral or immoral in it.

A lottery is simply a financial scheme inviting people, according to the definition given, to buy tickets on which they hope to win a very attractive prize.

In my opinion, that financial scheme designed to get money out of the taxpayers' pockets is different from the taxation system. As the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) has said, the taxation system affects all the activities of our daily lives. If one buys some goods, he pays the sales tax, and if he produces something, he pays the production tax; the same thing goes as regards consumption, and so forth. At all times, the presence of the governments is felt. The taxes that are levied reduce our buying power.

• (5:50 p.m.)

This is one form of taxation because, in fact taxes are called by several names: surcharge, social development, and so on.

There is another way of getting money out of the pockets of the taxpayers, it is the income tax.

Minimums and maximums are imposed, tax rates are established and the product of labour is taxed. There are also other kinds of taxes and dues, of course, such as land tax, for instance.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Today we notice that our financial obligations are growing increasingly while our ability to pay back becomes increasingly limited. Thus because our resources are limited we have to realize that our financing and administrative system is inadequate. Within the administration, municipal as well as provincial or federal gaps develop which are difficult to fill. The municipalities are aware of it because they have commitments to meet and they do not have the money to do it.

This is one of the reasons why governments promise from one election to the next a reduction in taxes, and once in office nothing happens. No government has ever reduced taxes because obligations are increasing and economic expansion is conceived only on the basis of taxes. Therefore taxes can only but increase under this system.

Mr. Speaker, faced with this inability of the present financial system to reach its goal, several people interested in economic matters say that a lottery system might help us make ends meet. Lotteries, we are told, could bring in some money. What is the basis for saying that?

Mr. Speaker, those who favour lotteries claim that every year a fantastic, scandalous and unacceptable amount of Canadian capital goes abroad, and that if we had national, provincial or municipal lotteries, that money would stay in Canada.

This argument based on an economic nationalism is used, according to which Canadian capital should stay in Canada to foster its economic expansion. Statistics, ideas are put forth to try to prove that theory.

In the La Presse dated January 20, an article signed by André Béliveau was published under the title: Un exode de 150 millions, and I quote:

It is therefore not surprising, in those conditions, that Canadians also should have such an inclination to gambling. For there is much gambling in Canada. One of Maclean's writers, Alan Phillips, estimated in 1964 the total annual stake—legal and clandestine—of Canadians at close to $2 billion. As the only form of game under the control of the government is the race track pari-mutuel, it is difficult to get more accurate statistics.

It is estimated that the outflow of Canadian capital to some 70 countries which offer us their sweepstake tickets amounts to roughly $150 million a year.

Mr. Speaker, I admit that Canada loses fantastic amounts of money every year, money which goes to 70 countries where lotteries are legal. But, while agreeing with this argument, I do not feel that it is necessarily conclusive, and that to check this outflow of money we should set up a lottery system.

When you want to control a flooding, you build a dam. You do not bring in more water, because it would not make sense.

Because of the outflow of capital, we should have our own lottery system. It would only be one more lottery. Indeed, if a state lottery were set up in Canada, under this omnibus bill introduced by the Minister of Justice and if the provinces and municipalities were to do likewise, would it be illegal for Canadians to participate in foreign lotteries?

If we do not make it illegal for Canadians to take part in foreign lotteries such as the Irish sweepstake for instance, Canadian capital will not only go abroad, but it will also go to the various provinces and the problem of the outflow of Canadian capital will not be solved.

To prevent such an outflow, we should raise barriers, instead of legalizing lotteries,—as we did for instance during the Kennedy round negotiations.

It would be one way, though possibly not the best, of solving the problem. So this is my suggestion: let us be consistent, Mr. Speaker and stop saying we need a state lottery system under the pretence that Canadian capital is going abroad. Such a suggestion does not make sense, it does not hold water.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) has moved this motion tending to delete from the omnibus bill the clauses pertaining to lotteries, because, as any Canadian, I realize there is a flow of Canadian capital going abroad and also that this solution which is considered as sound, is not really effective and is unlikely to settle the problems of the municipalities, of the provinces and of federal government.

It matters little whether we shall set up 10 lotteries or just one, or whether we shall need 25 lotteries to meet our financial requirements. The basic problem goes deeper than that. We have ignored it for too long and, unfortunately, it is overlooked by too many people.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to tell the house that there is nothing wrong with a lottery system. I believe everybody likes an occasional bet. In my opinion there is nothing wrong with that, provided it is done honestly.

However, they should not try to convince us that without a lottery system there can be no public financing or that such a system stops the outflow of Canadian capital. In my opinion, those arguments do not wash from the economic point of view and we are just running around in circles.

Therefore, I deem it my duty—and I hope many members will do the same—to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Abitibi.

I suggest that in the interest of Canada's economic growth we give it some serious thought.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair to resume the same at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is the house ready for the question?

[Translation]

The motion is on amendment No. 11 by Mr. Laprise amending section 13 of Bill C-150.

All those in favour will please say yea.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11) the vote on this amendment stands deferred.

[Translation]

We will now proceed with consideration of amendment No. 9 by Mr. Laprise.

Mr. Laprise moved:

That Bill C-150, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act, be amended by deleting therefrom clauses 12 and 13.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal now with amendment No. 9.

The purpose of this amendment, as I pointed out earlier, is to delete completely the new provisions concerning federal and provincial lotteries.

As I already explained, I am not against lotteries, but I believe those who wish to set up lotteries at the present time can do so. Certain municipalities, for instance, have done it. I already referred to the city of Montreal —I do not wish to stress the matter any further. We should leave it at that as far as the lotteries are concerned.

I note that certain charity organizations, social clubs, farm associations, agricultural fairs or local exhibitions may conduct bingos etc., in order to help certain sporting clubs. It is relatively easy at the present time, under the provisions of the Criminal Code, to resort to such means to help out organizations in need of additional funds to pursue their work during the year.

We know also that some catholic parishes have from time to time to conduct lotteries to pay the interest of their debts owing to the construction of churches, for instance. I do not know what goes on in protestant parishes, but as far as catholic parishes are concerned, to build a church, money must be borrowed and the church is thus paid for two or three times over. In order to pay the interest, during the year, raffles and parties must be organized to get some assistance and people may be entertained and practise charity at the same time.

Under the provisions of the Criminal Code those kinds of lotteries are legal. The amendment to the Criminal Code serves an altogether different purpose. It aims at enabling provinces, as well as the federal government, if needed, to conduct lotteries in order to finance Administration out of a concealed tax. The coffers must be filled, for not only are the funds inadequate, but the people are fed up; they pay enough taxes of all kinds, and they balk at each new tax which the government slaps on.

It seems as if, through that amendment, the governments of the different provinces as well as the federal government would be allowed to use an act to extend the tax system and turn lotteries into a hidden tax.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the government has some needs, that it has to meet heavy expenses, to finance public works, at the federal as well as provincial levels, but if the government wants it, it can use any means to reinforce its fiscal system.

I think the government should use, as some of my colleagues have suggested earlier today, a truly Canadian institution, namely the Bank of Canada, to finance public administration—I am not speaking of private business—at any level. Then the government would not have to pass regulations or measures such as we see here this evening to secure additional revenue to finance its administration.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to delete from bill C-150 clauses 12 and 13, which deal with lotteries.

Mr. Speaker, we should consider this amendment, as well as amendments 11 and 10. I think they are similar. As we study them, we come to the conclusion that they recommend the status quo with regard to lotteries.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, towards the end of the afternoon I heard the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) accusing us of making the same speeches over and over again.

Mr. Speaker, I was a teacher for 13 years before becoming a member of this house and I learned that when one has to deal with thick-headed people, with blockheads, one has to keep trying relentlessly and repeat oneself several times in order to be well understood. This is why we want to make sure we are well understood and we are stressing our views on bill C-150 generally and particularly on the amendments now before us, aiming to delete clauses 12 and 13 from the bill.

The hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise), who moved this amendment, has just given us some reasons justifying the deletion of those two clauses.

I have given my views on the subject of lotteries this afternoon when I said that I am not in favour of the establishment of a national lottery, but that considering the present system, we find ourselves nevertheless compelled to accept lotteries in order to replenish the funds of some organizations, and, in particular, those of the provincial governments or municipalities, as it is now being done in Montreal.

Some religious, social and charitable non profit organizations, manage in this way to collect funds to alleviate poverty and misery.

We are still convinced that the principle of lotteries is somewhat immoral, since we are staking on the passion and the taste for gambling of the people. However, I admit that within some limits, one must give way to one's instincts and this gambling spirit which is linked to the desire to make a fast buck.

Therefore, if we want to replenish the public treasury by exploiting that passion, it is not desirable to that extent, but as has been repeated many times—and we take pleasure in doing so—as long as we do not cure that ill and administer the proper remedy, we will have to accept, whether we like it or not, these various palliatives which are an attempt to solve, in a way, the taxation problem.

I do say "settle in some way" since this morning, in the house, my colleague, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau), pointed out for a fact that lotteries organized in various countries have only succeeded in financing administrative costs of hospitals for three or four days. So, this is not a very interesting solution. If some consideration had been given to other means, we would not be facing such problems now. Should we favour lotteries or not? It is unfortunate that we have not been able to give serious consideration to other solutions to the financial problems.

And, as lotteries that we are asked to legalize, are generally held for the purpose of helping the under-privileged and various welfare institutions, the matter is directly related to the human being.

Instead of letting us debate such matters, the government should propose various economic solutions to be applied in order to avoid surtax, to help the poor as well as such organizations whose object is to protect human beings.

If we had to discuss that, it would be more interesting than to be kept in the dark and to have to wonder whether or not it would be advisable to legalize lotteries. It is not funny really to talk about rather unimportant and artificial things which offer no solution to the economic problems.

Heaven knows how often the Créditistes have put the finger on these problems these past years. And they also suggested true solutions. We must unfortunately realize that we are not taken seriously enough. But some day the reason behind the legalization of lotteries will be taken into consideration and it will be realized then that this was a big step forward. In the meantime, we are in the dark.

Where will the money to be invested in lotteries come from? Will it be a new form of credit? Where will the participants find the money? The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) said this afternoon that some people are so eager to gamble that they would go as far as borrowing in order to be able to take part in lotteries. Well, then money is not fulfilling its true function which should be to serve the individual and help him achieve personal development.

Mr. Speaker, we are talking about lotteries, games of chance and I would like to indicate that I am more interested than usual in the hockey game, tonight, precisely because I have made a few bets.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to make a few comments on the amendment of the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) because it concerns lotteries, a subject I have been interested in for many years.

It is probably known, Mr. Speaker, that since 1951, I have advocated amendments to the Criminal Code, to legalize lotteries, both at the provincial and federal levels.

The motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Abitibi, intends to delete such amendment to the Criminal Code. I am somewhat surprised since, in the past, some of his leagues of the Ralliement Créditiste, in bills they introduced in the house, sort of plagiarized the one I myself proposed in past years for the establishment of a provincial lottery. I must say that I am somewhat disappointed, since it has taken the house more than 10 years of consultations, discussions, hesitations and studies of all kinds to finally arrive at a solution.

I would have been easy several years ago to make that amendment to the Criminal Code, in order to legalize lotteries if there had been less partisanship in this house on the matter, since most Canadians are in favour of it.

I remember having introduced in this house a few years ago a bill, the passage of which had been moved by a member of the New Democratic Party. Unfortunately, the bill was defeated because it was considered during the private members' hour and time ran out before it could be passed by the house. But on that occasion, all the hon. members supported my motion.

I am pleased, even if it is a little late that this house has listened to reason and has decided that the committee on justice and legal affairs should recommend the passage of that legislation for the establishment of provincial lotteries and giving to the federal government the authority to act in that field.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention now that I had made a study and some inquiries myself. I had written to nearly all the Canadian mayors in order to inquire from the councillors as to whether the people of Canada were in favour of lotteries.

Contrary to what many may think, not a single province in Canada objected to the passing of such legislation.

In a province which I do not want to mention and which was the least in favour of the bill 67 per cent of its citizens approved the establishment of provincial lotteries in Canada.

In the province of Quebec, the figure was over 90 per cent while in Ontario it was over 80 per cent. Most people in all the provinces were agreeable to such a measure.

So we are respecting, I think, the will of the Canadian population which is asking us to legalize lotteries. I should like to emphasize that since the leader of the New Democratic party is against the legalization of lotteries. I would invite him to refer to the official report of the house where he will find that his own party had already recommended and moved the passing of that legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the lottery scheme is a must in the context of modern Canada. Anyone knows that every day millions of lottery tickets are sold in Canada. Lotteries have been established all over the world, in Jamaica, Ireland, Britain, New Zealand, Mexico, and so forth. Over 70 countries in the world have set up lottery schemes. I might point out that New Zealand has set up what is called a "Peewee" lottery, designed to provide the federal government with an indirect source of revenue.

In some cases, it is really an indirect tax, paid, all the same, on a voluntary basis. In that country, the lottery scheme has succeeded so well that the government had to increase the amounts of the prizes and reduce the price of tickets because it showed excess revenues.

Those are facts that the hon. members can readily check through relevant statistics.

Concerning that amendment to the omnibus bill, it remains to be seen whether, by means of the legislation, we shall prevent an outflow of millions of Canadian dollars abroad. According to Progressive Conservative quarters, they are estimated at $300 million. They serve for such purposes as welfare, social assistance or hospitalization, while we are in great need of them here in Canada.

I am surprised to hear the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) advocate the passage of a legislation depriving Canadian citizens of some benefits they would obtain without any levy of new taxes.

I regret that it took us so long to pass this legislation.

We are aware of one fact: the Mayor of Montreal, Mr. Jean Drapeau, has set up what he calls a voluntary tax, which is in fact a lottery. All this shows the hypocrisy of this government. By its indecision and its delays, it incited people to indulge in this hypocrisy, since a lottery has been simply established under the disguise of a voluntary tax. I want to point out the danger of a government which is not willing to meet the needs and the conditions of our time.

Should we have legalized lotteries a long time ago, we would not have induced the people to indulge in hyprocrisy openly and to scorn the law. As far as I am concerned, Mayor Drapeau's lottery is surely a lottery, and under section 179 of the Criminal Code, it is illegal. I do not want to dwell on this subject, because the matter is before the High Courts. Since this matter is sub judice, it would not be proper to discuss it here.

Mr. Speaker, some people across Canada have shown a very great interest in this matter.

Among others, a lady who had no other obligation left all her savings there. She spent several years to get thousands of signatures in favour of this bill. I am referring to Mrs. Mary English, whom I greatly admire. She travelled across Canada for many years to show the benefits that Canadians would derive from a lottery. Of course, she lost her last penny and the shirt off her back. She made great sacrifices and I am glad of this opportunity to pay a tribute to her. When Canadians really take an interest in public matters, they can accomplish great things for the good of Canada. I have looked into her work and this is why I feel I must speak of it.

It would be useless, Mr. Speaker, to elaborate further on the advantages of lottery and on the proposed amendment. I hope that as soon as the bill is passed in Parliament, the provincial governments will be able, through well-concerted measures, to avoid competition; a non-competitive position is what we are after, and this amendment proves it. Of course, rumours are being circulated as to possible friction between the provinces. Besides, the legislation itself is, in parts, rather ambiguous. I think we should make certain corrections aiming to prevent prosecution, which would make the legislation ineffective, since the provinces will benefit from complete freedom in this field.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I shall unavoidably vote in favour of every amendment aiming to legalize lottery. Unfortunately, it will not be possible for me, as for several members, to vote in favour of this legislation, since this amendment is part of a whole series.

Some of those amendments relate to homosexuality, others to abortion. Some reforms, however, are quite acceptable. However, I object to homosexuality and to abortion. I will be forced, on third reading, to vote against the legalization of lotteries. It is a contradiction to which we have been driven by the government. Many times, we asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) to try to understand the problem facing hon. members and to take a fair administrative decision.

Several hon. members want to vote for the legalization of lotteries and for penitentiary reforms.

Several accept the reform of the Criminal Code on firearms, but others are against abortion and homosexuality. To show the Canadian people that we object to those measures, we will be forced when the vote is taken on the amendments as a whole to vote against the legalization of lotteries and against penitentiary reform.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order.

Mr. Valade: As for the amendments on firearms—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I remind the hon. member that we are now considering the amendment moved by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) which reads as follows:

—deleting therefrom clauses 12 and 13.

I do not think that the hon. member should now make the speech he will make on motion for third reading.

Mr. Valade: I respect your opinion, Mr. Speaker, and I recognize that you are justified in calling us to order. But I happen to be talking of that very amendment designed to eliminate from the bill omnibus the clause dealing with the legalization of lottery.

I intend to vote for the lotteries, like many of my colleagues, but it will be impossible to vote for such measures on third reading of the bill, since we are introducing a group of amendments among which some are acceptable, while others are not.

That is why Mr. Speaker, I am happy that the government proposed this legislation. Like several of my colleagues, I find it rather difficult to vote against this legislation at the third reading stage because by voting for the whole of the bill we would indicate that we approve provisions which we consider unacceptable, and yet, we are obliged to reject some which would like to adopt.

I take this opportunity to ask the government to revise its position, and the Minister of Justice to shed some light on the proposed legislation.

In all fairness, he should do it, because we, in the opposition, have no way of expressing our opinion clearly when comes voting time, and are thus obliged to do it at the time of the vote on the amendments.

• (8.30 p.m.)

Mr. Bernard F. Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, when I heard the previous speaker state that the Montreal lottery is going well and bringing in tremendous revenues, I wondered whether he was defending his constituents, trying to make political hay or to make a statement on the amendment concerning lotteries.

Back in Montreal after a trip through Western Canada where I had seen Canadian people living more seriously perhaps than in Montreal, I wondered if such measures as the one before us were not meant to turn French Canadians in Quebec into people like those of ancient Rome, who were demanding bread and games. It is rather funny that a member for Montreal of the Quebec National Assembly proposed that Man and His World be made into a gambling casino. The previous speaker was in favour of gambling of this kind. I for one can speak about the seriousness of the people of Vancouver, Saskatoon, Regina, Edmonton that make them live the life we were living ourselves in the old days. We were living a simple country life and those people are reminding us that we should be less interested in gambling and consider the more serious side of things.

If the young people of today protest everyday, as they did at Sir George Williams University and elsewhere, and do such awful things, it is because they have lost confidence in us, their parents, we who are proposing measures that bring nothing but opportunities for people to have fun.

If there are so few members present here this evening, it is because there is a great hockey game to watch on TV.

I am not against sport nor against moderate gambling, but when I see men as responsible as the administrators of the country, while we are discussing an amendment to the Criminal Code concerning lotteries, when we see—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I would ask the hon. member to restrict his remarks to the amendment now under study.

Mr. Dumont: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, because I realize that the amendment is less important than the hockey game. Though I am 40, I am touched when I see people who are not more responsible, an attitude they have been taking since the beginning of the debate on the omnibus bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, I would ask the hon. member to be responsible and to discuss the amendment under study.

Mr. Dumont: There is an obvious lack of seriousness in this discussion of such an important amendment intended to prevent lotteries from proliferating in Canada.

In the province of Quebec several school boards and even several parish priests have asked in the past that bingos be allowed so that every parish might survive and many times those bingos were prohibited, preventing by the same token the financing of religious works.

Today the amendment under consideration would make it possible to continue these bingos in our parishes. That is why, as an exception, I would favour the amendment which would authorize lotteries so that certain religious orders might get the income they lack because of our inadequate monetary system.

Because of that illogical system crops are left to rot in the west and now they would have the people of Quebec enjoy ourselves more thanks to lotteries.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that ancient Rome that asked for bread and games is coming back to life in our midst. We have the proof tonight that this very important discussion is not taken seriously mainly because the government will not express its views. The party in power would rather laugh and try to stop us from telling the truth in this house, the truth that the people in our ridings want us to tell. This is what we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, are doing; we approve this amendment to prevent lotteries from going too far.

An attempt has been made in Montreal to make it a city of pleasure, and I do not agree. I am no better Catholic than the Pope, but I would not like to face overwhelming temptations.

Mr. Speaker, as anybody else, when I see a beautiful woman or a place where one can get lots of fun, I feel tempted. If we have lotteries at will, what will be left of the dignity of Parliament? People will come and play cards behind the curtains, for there are people like me who do not smoke. If all those things are legalized, we shall take it easy with those swarming lotteries.

Personally, I object to that. I have a family of seven children and I do not want them to be subject to the temptation of all sorts of gambling games which will prolify tomorrow across Canada.

The people of Western Canada have shown us how dignified they are; why could we not follow their example?

They have preserved their sense of dignity, as I said earlier, because they have preserved the traditions we used to have in our families and parishes in Quebec. But we no more have them and to show us how little serious the Catholic French-Canadian nation is, gambling is offered to us. That is why I very much regret that we should not have had our say in drafting of this omnibus bill which tends to prevent lotteries from spreading everywhere. This amendment gives me serious second-thoughts. Actually, it is the fate of the next generation which is at stake. They will not endorse the frolics of our generation.

We should stick together in our effort, including the government members who are laughing from behind the curtains. But they refuse to state their opinion and to allow their constituents to realize what they really stand for. This is the moment of truth. The people should know where are the trustworthy. Where is the truth, where are the electoral funds which enable the government members to laugh at us and to approve, placidly and without uttering a word, an unacceptable bill.

A sensible amendment is being discussed and they laugh instead of talking seriously. They try to make fun of those who speak, but the voice of truth comes out in the end and will finally reach the people.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, last week when I dealt with the clause in the omnibus bill concerning homosexuality, I told the minister that this bill included acceptable provisions and how much I regretted to see him force certain members to toe the party line and vote against the bill. In fact the minister has refused since the outset of the debate to accept the proposal put forward by the opposition, namely to divide the bill into four parts, so as to enable members to vote on each part according to their conscience.

Tonight, we have before us an amendment dealing with lotteries. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I must say I am in favour of the provision of the omnibus bill dealing with lotteries. Its object is to legalize something which exists already in practice almost everywhere in Canada, and more particularly in the province of Quebec which I know better, and where lotteries, bingos, serve to finance our recreational activities and charitable organizations. In practice, we want to prevent charitable societies and organizations from being liable to criminal proceedings whenever they wish to raise funds in order to pursue their work. Therefore I am in favour of the lottery bill.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a digression and say that this house has been hearing about lotteries for a long time. I believe that every year since 1958, a bill concerning lotteries was put on the order paper and the sponsor of such a measure was, in most cases, the member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) that I wish to congratulate tonight because in fact, he reaps the benefit of his work. The government is asking us to pass a measure designed to legalize lotteries and that is what the member for Sainte-Marie has been asking for since 1958.

Mr. Speaker, lotteries will allow Canadians to keep their money at home. How many Canadians win Irish sweepstake prizes every month or other prices in countries where lotteries are allowed? How many Canadians send money, reported to amount to millions of dollars, to foreign countries, to help their lotteries? The government should legalize lotteries here so that our Canadian money can stay at home and help charitable organizations, for instance, and the provinces to finance recreation which is not a luxury.

I do not agree with the previous speaker when he claims that we speak of nothing but gain and games, for I say that in a modern society organized recreation is a necessity, and we want lotteries to be legalized so that we can organize recreation.

Mr. Speaker, the bill the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has put before us is excellent, and we should pass it. I would have voted for the legalization of lotteries, but unfortunately I shall have to vote against the bill for, as I said at the beginning the minister did not divide the bill in order that the members might decide, according to their conscience, on abortion, homosexuality, lotteries and firearms. The minister thus creates an illogical situation. I am in favour of lotteries, but I must vote against the omnibus bill because some parts of it seem to me unacceptable.

It will be difficult to enforce the provision relating to lotteries, Mr. Speaker. The federal government will allow the provinces to grant lottery licenses. But suppose the province of Quebec decided to use its right to conduct a provincial lottery and that the Attorneys-general of Ontario or of New Brunswick objected to a lottery being conducted in their province. What would be the position of the taxpayers of the other provinces who would come to Quebec to buy lottery tickets? Those people would come under the ambit of the Criminal Code, since the Attorney-general will be free to conduct or not in his province a lottery that the federal government will have legalized. In my opinion, the minister should, before preparing the provision relating to lotteries, have met the Attorneys-general of the provinces in order to know whether they agree upon that matter. I do not know if the minister was in the house, when I indicated my opposition a while ago. It is possible that the province of Quebec will decide to use the power given to it by the federal government to organize a lottery, and that the Attorneys-General of Ontario or New-Brunswick will refuse to do so in their territory.

I therefore ask the minister to enlighten us on that situation, so that we will know what would be the situation of a taxpayer of another province who would come to Quebec to take advantage of a law accepted by that province, since the federal government has given it the authority to establish a lottery.

That is a problem, Mr. Speaker, which I find difficult to resolve. I hope that when the minister has the opportunity to speak on that question he will agree to provide us with details, so that I will know if the citizens, if the taxpayers of a province who do not have the right to take part in a lottery, because it will be illegal in their own province, will be punished or if they will be allowed to go and buy tickets in a province where a lottery is permitted, under the terms of the power given to it by the federal government.

I hope that the minister will help us out by giving details on that point. I also hope that he will tell us if he has discussed that question with the attorneys general of the other provinces and what conclusions that he will pass on to us the results of such discussions.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I admire the parliamentary leadership of the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) who tirelessly participated usefully in this debate, by trying through his amendments to improve this legislation.

The nefarious effects of this bill are being felt already. I wonder if members are aware that a homosexual club has already been opened in Montreal, although the bill has not been passed yet. It is the Gemini I Club, and it has already 4,000 members. Things are moving, Mr. Speaker! If some members want to get a membership card, they should call a gentleman by the name of Bédard, in Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, what will be the outcome of this bill when it is passed, if it already worries the people?

It is my duty to take part once again in this debate to support an amendment moved by the hon. member for Abitibi and which is designed to clarify the situation.

Mr. Speaker, I just listened to the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin) who, considering the innumerable lotteries which seem at first sight prohibited by the Criminal Code, is inclined to favour their legalization.

Mr. Speaker, in our opinion, those are not serious reasons militating in favour of this legislation, even if we do not object to the principle of lotteries, because there is nothing wrong with that. However, we are opposed to the motives for which this government has introduced this bill.

Everyone knows that radio or T.V. "quiz" are common nowadays. Just remember "La poule aux œufs d'or" and other similar games, which are disguised lotteries.

We could consider all the agricultural fairs, parish bingos, raffles organized by businesses, charitable organizations, churches and schools. I remember what that wonderful and great

Liberal party organized during the 1965 elections, in order to attract votes.

Mr. Speaker, lotteries are widespread. However, it is interesting to note that under the terms of the Criminal Code, lotteries are forbidden in Canada. In fact, section 179 of the Criminal Code, adopted in 1893, considers lotteries as illegal and even provides for a two-year period of emprisonment for anyone taking part in the organization or in the management of a lottery.

I think of course, that this legislation is obsolete. However, I cannot believe that one would want to pass legislation under the pretence that one has lost control over its field of application. I cannot accept the argument this legislation makes it possible to keep our capital at home while at the same time we are competing with the English lotteries, and with the lotteries of 70 other countries, which allow Canadians to participate in them clandestinely.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think those are valid arguments.

The hon. member for Abitibi was telling us a few moments ago that bingos and lotteries for the benefit of churches do exist today. Why have we always tolerated such a situation in Canada? The law is not effective. Let us simply delete in paragraph (c) "for a charitable organization", because this is a fact. Lotteries do exist. Unless, of course, we provide more funds for our police forces so that they can exercise a stronger control. This situation is difficult to control because lotteries are being practised on a very high scale in Canada, whether it has to do with hockey games, quizzes, or fairs or the bingos I was referring to earlier.

Mr. Speaker, in this regard, I think that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Abitibi is valid, because it is in line with the present situation. It does not forbid anything more, but it merely allows charitable organizations to continue to benefit from the proceeds of some lotteries that they are allowed to conduct.

Mr. Speaker, the conduct of a lottery in Canada will not solve any financial difficulty; it will only skirt the problems, instead of meeting them head-on.

Governments imagine they will find there a gold mine that will enable them to finance their projects. They are wrong, and if they cling to that idea, it is because they are poor managers. No government should build its budget on a lottery, whether that lottery is federal, provincial or local. The proof of this is all around us.

Nevertheless, it is true, Mr. Speaker, that a lottery, good in itself, is desirable and the present situation leads us to believe that not only could we tolerate this measure but, even pass it, in respect of charitable organizations which have no other financial means.

• (9:00 p.m.)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to indicate to the house that even if the hon. members admit lotteries in principle, whether they are held at the federal or the provincial level, they cannot cast a favourable vote on that point since thereby they would decide in favour of abortion, homosexuality and many other provisions that are unacceptable, at least to us, of the Ralliement Créditiste.

Even while trying to be consistent and recognizing the merit of lotteries, we cannot support such a legislation. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has known for a long time that we cannot support this bill since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) definitely refuses to have it split. He is the only one on the government side to insist on such a procedure.

We are therefore in a rather impossible situation. We can discuss and speak for hours on lotteries. However, when the time to vote will come, even members claiming to be in favour of lotteries will not be able to vote because they will have to vote at the same time for abortion, which is against their principles.

In short, Mr. Speaker, we are once more deluding ourselves with words, with illusions. There is no sense to that. As I said many times, this bill remains a stupid measure, which obliges us to repeat such nonsense for the very simple reason that the debate itself is not logical.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, we must be absolutely realistic and ask ourselves whether the legalization of lotteries would be beneficial to the Canadian people and solve financial problems. Then, we should take a stand.

As for us, even if we are puzzled about the value of a state lottery, we are in favour of lotteries organized for charitable purposes.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question on the amendment of Mr. Laprise?

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Division

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Before calling in the members I draw to the attention of hon. members that this motion is deferred until we have voted on previous motions numbered 3, 6, 7, 10, 11, and finally 9. Therefore, we will now call in hon. members for the purpose of voting on No. 3.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I rise briefly on a point of order. We will now be voting on the various amendments you have just identified. I wonder if Your Honour will say something in each case so that people reading Hansard will know what we are voting on. It might also be a good idea for hon. members to know what they are voting on.

Mr. Speaker: This is precisely the point I had in mind. I thought hon. members might be confused, and therefore before each vote is called the actual motion being voted on will be read to the house for the purpose of the division. Call in the members.

• (9:10 p.m.)

The question is on amendment No. 3 (Mr. Valade) which reads:

That Bill C-150, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act, be amended by deleting therefrom clause 7.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Division

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether at this time the government house leader would indicate when we will resume this debate. Secondly, there might be some disposition in the house not to proceed with the adjournment proceedings tonight. Thirdly, Your Honour might consider advising the Montreal forum that the score at the end of the game in the House of Commons tonight was: Lions, 6; Christians, no score.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): We will resume this debate on Friday after the two-day debate on NATO. Perhaps the two hon. members on the "late show" tonight might be agreeable to suspending their questions until Thursday night.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house leader would permit a question. Would the government consider, in view of the events of the last hour, bringing an electronic voting system into this House of Commons?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: It being after ten o'clock this house stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

It being ten minutes before 11 o'clock p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

6. What is the hourly salary of the miners?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and the Department of Labour as follows: 1. $25,501,319.22 for fiscal year 1967-68; nil since April 1968 except for certain holdback and adjustment amounts owing on coal shipped prior to April 1, 1968. No breakdown of these further payments is available until final accounting and auditing are completed.

2. 2,865,693.89 tons in fiscal year 1967-68 at an average subvention cost of $8.90 per ton.

3. Actual selling prices are matters between vendors and purchasers. Except where there have been public announcements of the terms of individual contracts, available information regarding such prices has been confidentially received, is not amenable to averaging and cannot be disclosed without contravention of Section 15 of the Statistics Act.

It can, however, be stated that 1967-68 price ranges for various kinds, sizes and qualities of Cape Breton coal, f.o.b. mines, as reported by the mining companies, ran from a low of $7.00 per ton for certain types to a high of $18.15 for others. The average value of the coal, f.o.b. mines, although not a selling price, can also be given. As compiled by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics from reports required of the producers, this was $14.05 per ton in 1967.

4. The latest available information for all Nova Scotia coal mines is the annual survey of the Dominion Coal Board for 1967. This report indicates that the average total cost per ton for the production and distribution of Nova Scotia coal in 1967 was $13.98.

5. During the year 1967, the average number of employees in the coal mining industry in Cape Breton, N.S., was 4,920.

6. As of October 1, 1968, the average hourly rate of pay in Cape Breton coal mines for miners on an incentive or production basis was $2.63 per hour for an eight-hour day.

NEWFOUNDLAND—ADVANCES TO C.M.H.C.

Question No. 1,411—Mr. Marshall:

Under the section on Loans, Investments, and Advances in the Estimates for 1969/1970, L175, how much money is allocated the Province of Newfoundland in (a) advances to CMHC in respect of housing and land development projects undertaken jointly with the governments of the provinces (b) advances to CMHC in respect of loans to municipalities for the construction or expansion of sewage treatment projects (c) advances to CMHC in respect of loans made to assist in the implementation of an urban renewal scheme?

[Mr. Forest.]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Vote L175 of the Corporation's Estimates for 1969/1970 includes the following estimated requirements to meet outstanding commitments for the Province of Newfoundland: (a) $2,000,000; (b) $100,000; (c) $500,000.

PROGRAM IN TEACHING ENGLISH TO ESKIMOS

Question No. 1,448—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What program, if any, has been devised to assist teachers who have the task of teaching Eskimo children English?

2. Do they attend special in-service training courses before beginning teaching English?

3. If so, for how long and who conducts the courses?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. In 1968, all Northwest Territories and Arctic Quebec schools concerned were supplied from Ottawa with the NEW Let's Begin English Kit prepared by Curriculum Section specialists. This included seven reference books for teachers, records, filmstrip, charts, objects and other material. At the same time, each regional library was supplied with a recommended set of professional references on second language instruction. A 16mm film series prepared by the Centre for Applied Linguistics, Washington, D.C., was obtained and used in teacher education services. Commercially prepared remedial and developmental materials and equipment were also purchased and sent to selected schools for use and appraisal.

In 1968, manuscripts for 16 northern-oriented developmental readers were prepared for non-graded use at the primary level. Text was articulated with the prerequisite oral English program described above. These readers are now being illustrated and printed with a target date of October 1, 1969. Related materials for reading readiness, spelling, and handwriting were also prepared. These materials were added to previous listings of supplementary reading books and guidebooks for teachers.

In 1968, the first draft of a northern preschool program was also prepared—a program intended to involve an informal transition from vernacular languages to English as a second language. Related to this, a revised approach to the duties and training of bilingual classroom aides was prepared.

2 and 3. Second language teaching is one of the components of the Orientation Course given to all teachers before they commence teaching in the North.

Most materials used in second language instruction were developed at summer workshops attended by northern teachers. Until 1967, summer courses involving curriculum specialists and experienced teachers as staff were conducted by the Education Division. Teacher consultants who are experienced in second language teaching visit new teachers in their classrooms and assist in teacher workshops during the school year.

Reliance is now placed on the availability of one common basic program for introducing English as a second language in northern schools. Reliance is also placed on the increased number of university and Department of Education summer courses in second language teaching. These courses are normally of five to six weeks duration.

C.M.H.C. INDEBTEDNESS ON HOUSING

Quetsion No. 1,459—Mr. Caouette:

1. What amount does Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation owe to the government with regard to the various Acts on housing?

2. What interest rate does Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation pay to the government for these loans?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): 1. $3,846,319,427.00 at December 31, 1968.

2. Interest rates at which the Corporation borrows from the government are established quarterly by the Minister of Finance. The interest rates, therefore, on its debt structure are very numerous and vary from 2 per cent to 7½ per cent, depending on when the loan was made and the term of the loan. For the quarter ending December 31, 1968, the rates were: 10-15 years, 6-11/16 per cent; 15-20 years, 6¾ per cent; 20 years or more, 6-11/16 per cent.

PUBLIC SERVANTS LANGUAGE TRAINING

Question No. 1,465—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. How many public servants have successfully completed language training at public expense?

2. How many who were enrolled failed to complete the course?

3. What is the estimated total cost of salaries, for those attending this course for the time spent away from their employment, since the course was started?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. The second-language training provided by the Public Service Commission is conducted at four levels. Level I is designed to provide minimum oral skills while level IV is expected to give students working proficiency in all four skill areas (reading, writing, speaking and oral comprehension).

Employees attend courses at succeeding levels until the skills needed by the duties of their positions have been acquired.

In the period from January 1964 to August 1968, the numbers of public servants who completed training courses were: Level IV, 703; level III, 1,409; level II, 2,267; level I, 6,224.

2. During the same period 1,176 public servants withdrew from training courses before completing the particular course in which they were enrolled. Many of these withdrew for reasons related to their duties or health; others withdrew because they had reached the level of proficiency required for their respective positions.

3. The Public Service Commission does not maintain records of the salaries of language students. However, on the basis of a significant sample, the Commission estimates that the average earnings of trainees is about $1,100. On this basis, total earnings of those engaged as trainees over the four and a half year period approximates $12 million. However, trainees are not usually replaced while attending language courses and in that case there is no additional salary cost attributable to language training. In addition, each student on language training contributes about one hour of his own time for every two working hours he spends in language training.

WHEAT ACREAGE AND QUOTAS

Question No. 1,660—Mr. Southam:

Is it the intention of the government to (a) adopt the proposal of the federal Agricultural Task Force to cut back the Prairie wheat acreage by 33% by 1980 (b) if the government adopts this policy does it mean progressively tighter wheat quotas each year in order to bring about this objective (c) what proposal has the government to utilize the acreage and maintain farm income if the 10 million acres are taken out of the present 30 million acres planted to wheat?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No proposal to cut back prairie wheat acreage has been made to the government by the Agricultural Task Force. The proposal referred to in this question is contained in an interim position paper on the Task Force's studies on grains to date which has been prepared for use as a position paper for discussion at the Canadian Agricultural Congress to provide the Task Force with the views on grain production of all segments of the agricultural industry in Canada.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a) Mr. Harold Cardinal, President of the Indian Association of Alberta. (b) Mr. Walter Dieter, President, National Indian Brotherhood.

2. Mr. Cardinal's request was by letter dated February 14, 1969, and Mr. Dieter's request was during discussions with the Minister of Indian Affairs in late February.

3. The nature of the communications were an expression of concern that insufficient time was available for the associations to study the position of the other provinces as outlined in their reports.

COST STUDY OF SATELLITE COMMUNICATIONS

Question No. 1,881—Mr. Schreyer:

1. Has the Post Office Department undertaken a cost-benefit study related to the proposed satellite communication system and, if so, what was the cost-benefit ratio and what specific alternatives were evaluated?

2. Did the Treasury Board request a cost-benefit study from the Department regarding the proposed satellite communication system and, if not, why were other alternatives under the PPBS system utilized for the evaluation of the satellite system?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): In so far as the Communications Department is concerned: 1. A number of cost benefit studies of various configurations of domestic communications satellite systems were undertaken prior to the publication by the government of the White Paper on a Domestic Satellite Communications System for Canada. Alternatives evaluated included various satellite configurations and terrestrial alternatives. The results were most favourable for a 3 to 6 transponder satellite.

2. No, because a cost-benefit study had been carried out as explained in the answer to Part 1 of this question.

STEAM HEATING OF LOCK MACHINERY

Question No. 1,887—Mr. McCleave:

1. Is the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority using steam heating of lock machinery and ice diversion channels to provide a longer shipping season?

2. If so, what are the costs involved and are these paid for by special charges on vessels taking advantage of same?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority advises as follows: 1. The St. Lawrence Seaway Authority uses heating devices and ice diversion channels to provide better control of icing conditions in the Canal between the Cote Ste. Catherine and St. Lambert Locks during the close of the official navigation season, which now extends to December 10th. In years when icing occurs late in the season, this has the effect of lengthening what would otherwise be a shorter than normal season.

2. No. Since the costs involved are related to the normal navigation season, they are paid by the vessels which use the system during the entire season.

QUEBEC GOVERNMENT SUBMISSIONS ON STE SCHOLASTIQUE AIRPORT SITE

Question No. 1,893—Mr. Godin:

When Ste Scholastique was being studied as the future site for the new Montreal International Airport, did any departments of the Government of Quebec express opinions and, if so, which ones?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Discussions with the Province of Quebec were held on a continuing basis over the period from August 1968 almost up to the moment of the site announcement. Ste Scholastique was one of the 4-5 sites that were discussed extensively out of the original 20 possibilities.

The Government of Quebec expressed opinions on all of these sites and certainly on Ste Scholastique. These opinions were formerly presented by the Honourable Dr. R. Lussier, the Minister of Municipal Affairs of the Province of Quebec who was the representative of the Government of Quebec in these discussions. We are aware that he received opinions from other Quebec Departments including the following: Ministère de la Voirie; Ministère des Affaires intergouvernementales; Ministère de l'Industrie.

MOTORCAR RECALLS

Question No. 1,898—Mr. Robinson:

1. How many motor vehicles have been recalled by (a) General Motors (b) Chrysler Corporation (c) American Motors (d) other companies, during each of the years 1960-69 inclusive?

2. Were any of the recalls of motor vehicles due to faulty workmanship?

3. Has the government investigated any of the reasons for recall?

4. Is the government proposing to set adequate automobile standards and inspection services for the automobile industry?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): 1. No information is available on the number of motor vehicles recalled during the years 1960-61. During the five years 1962-1966 the total number of motor vehicles recalled in Canada was 780,609. A complete breakdown of this number by Company and year is not available.

From January 1, 1967 to April 11, 1969, the number of motor vehicles recalled was as follows:

	Number of Vehicles
Company	1967	1968	1-1-69 to 11-4-69
American Motors	3,227	Nil	Nil
Chrysler	23,210	318	246
Ford	22,298	6,514	1,166
General Motors	195,651	49,773	554,184
Kaiser-Jeep	Nil	Nil	191
Rolls-Royce			97

The figure of 554,184 for General Motors includes motor vehicles sold from 1965 to date.

2. It is not possible to classify defects by workmanship as distinct, for instance, from design, assembly and wear in use.

3. The federal government has obtained from the manufacturers complete and satisfactory explanations of the reasons for each of the recalls since January 1, 1967.

4. As announced in the House of Commons recently, the federal government is presently considering legislation for mandatory safety standards for motor vehicles and parts manufactured in or imported into Canada. The need for inspection services to ensure compliance with mandatory standards is also being studied.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

J. F. PARKINSON OF C.M.H.C.

Question No. 1,905—Mr. Skoberg:

1. Is J. F. Parkinson a Director of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and, if so, when was he elected as a Director and what is his remuneration?

2. What criteria was used in his selection as Director of the Corporation?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): 1. Yes. Mr. Parkinson was appointed May 20, 1954. He receives no additional salary or fee for his services as a director.

FRASER VALLEY DYKING ASSISTANCE

Question No. 1,909—Mr. Rose:

1. Which Fraser Valley municipalities have applied for dyking assistance under the Federal-Provincial Fraser River Flood Control Program signed in December, 1968?

2. What Fraser flood crest are the present Fraser Valley dykes capable of withstanding?

3. In which areas of the Fraser Valley are the dykes considered to be less than adequate to withstand a greater than normal spring freshet?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. Applications have been received by the Province of British Columbia from 13 municipalities and dyking districts for assistance under the Fraser River Flood Control Program covered by the federal-provincial agreement signed on May 24, 1968. The Province is forwarding to the Fraser River Joint Program Committee for its consideration the applications made by the Municipalities of Kent, Pitt Meadows and Richmond. The remaining 10 applications are being reviewed by the Province prior to their transmittal to the Program Committee.

2. The present Fraser Valley dykes were constructed after the 1948 flood to withstand a river elevation of 26 feet at Mission City, which elevation is equivalent to the flood of record. The present dykes withstood peak elevations of 23 feet at Mission City in 1964 and again in 1967; however, in both years emergency dyke repairs were required at a number of locations. Although the present dykes are not in completely uniform condition, it is presumed that they would be capable of again withstanding a peak elevation of about 23 feet at Mission City.

3. The mean annual peak high water elevation at Mission City is about 19.5 feet, which would represent the normal spring freshet on the Fraser River. All of the present Fraser Valley dykes have withstood spring freshets with peak elevations higher than 19.5 feet on a number of occasions.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion No. 94 is acceptable to the government, subject to the usual reservations concerning privileged papers and authorization of the government authorities concerned.

[English]

FEDERAL PARKS IN QUEBEC

Motion No. 94—Mr. Fortin:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of any documents exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec concerning the establishment of federal parks in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary is it the pleasure of the house that Notice of Motion No. 94 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, would you kindly call notices of motion Nos. 82, 84, 86, 88, 92, 93, 95, and 101?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining notices of motion be allowed to stand.

INDIANS—REPORT OF WORKING GROUP

Motion No. 82—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the document entitled "Report of Working Group I—Indians to the Executive Committee" which Working Group had its terms of reference set out in February, 1968 and which was formed to examine and outline the problems relating to Indians and to make recommendations concerning strategy, policy and programming.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I move this motion on behalf of the hon. member for Skeena?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that his departmental officials were unable to identify the document requested by the hon. member for Skeena and he has been informed of this fact. I understand that the hon. member is willing to withdraw the motion under the circumstances.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Under the circumstances I guess I have to agree.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Motion withdrawn.

BACKGROUND REPORTS ON WATKINS REPORT

Motion No. 84—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all background reports and papers prepared for the Watkins Report on Foreign Ownership and the Structure of Canadian Industry.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, these studies were prepared under special arrangements. In the case of the studies prepared by arrangement with the authors there were two understandings. The first was that the studies were confidential when prepared for the task force, and the second was that the authors were to have the right of publication afterwards. There is a third limitation, namely that some of them were prepared on the basis of confidential material in government files. The government would be prepared to table such studies as are not covered by those inhibitions, and in addition we can seek the consent of those particular authors for the tabling of those documents that do not contain confidential material. If the hon. member is agreeable to those limitations the motion could pass subject to them.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I agree, although I am somewhat doubtful about how much I will get.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations, conditions and inhibitions expressed by the minister is it the pleasure of the house that Notice of Motion No. 84 be adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

RESEARCH STUDIES ON LABOUR RELATIONS

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of each of the research studies commissioned and completed by and for the Labour Relations Task Force.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think it might be agreed that this should stand for another week.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

[Mr. Forest.]

DIPLOMATIC RECOGNITION OF VATICAN

Motion No. 88—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and other documents received by the Prime Minister or any other member of the government since January 1, 1969 relating to the proposal that Canada extend diplomatic recognition to the Vatican.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, dare I offer to move this one on behalf of the hon. member?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): You can try.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I shall try.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am advised with respect to this that the correspondence concerning diplomatic recognition of the Vatican exceeds over 10,000 separate pieces. The exact number between January 1st and March 31st is 10,275, and in order to comply with the rules of the house two copies of each would have to be prepared so that more than 20,000 copies would be necessary to comply with this motion. Under the circumstances I wonder would the hon. member not prefer to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps it can stand until the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) comes back to the house.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

HIGGIN'S REPORT ON QUEBEC INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Motion No. 95—Mr. Broadbent:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Higgin's Report regarding the selection of the International Airport site in Quebec referred to by the Prime Minister in Hansard on Friday, March 28, 1969.

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the report requested in this notice of motion was tabled on Friday last, and I think the hon. member will agree that the motion may now be removed from the order paper.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

Motion withdrawn.

STUDIES ON DEFENCE DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Motion No. 101—Mr. Broadbent:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the cost-benefit studies on the Defence Development Sharing Program showing a 24:1 ratio, referred to by Mr. David Mundy, Assistant Deputy Minister for External Service of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, at the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on April 1, 1969.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that he is prepared to produce a copy of the cost-benefit analysis showing sales resulting from defence industry productivity program support to Canadian industry referred to by an official of the department at the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on April 1, 1969.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I did not understand the statement. I wonder whether it could be repeated.

Mr. Forest: Yes. I am informed by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that he agrees to produce a copy of the cost-benefit analysis showing sales resulting from defence industry productivity program support to Canadian industry referred to by any official of the department at the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on April 1, 1969.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the parliamentary secretary, is it the pleasure of the house that notice of motion 101 be adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

STANFORD RESEARCH INSTITUTE STUDY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might put this as a question of privilege. More than three months ago it was agreed that the documents I was looking for with regard to the Prince Edward Island causeway construction, particularly the Stanford Research Institute study, would be presented by the government and tabled in the House of Commons. More than three months have gone by and these statements have not been produced. I wonder whether there should be some time limit, when the government has agreed to produce documents, within which they should be tabled in the house.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): They were to be produced, subject to the normal restrictions of consent being obtained from the appropriate provincial authorities. I have had correspondence which I hope will result in the final consents being obtained, but at the moment they have not been obtained.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It is my understanding that some weeks ago the specific provincial governments indicated they wanted these documents tabled in the house.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

WHEAT—DECLINE IN EXPORTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, in view of the general expectation of another serious decline in wheat exports this year, whether he can say if an early statement will be made by one of his colleagues indicating whether there is any hope for improvement in the situation and, if not, whether we may expect a decision soon on the request for interim assistance to western farmers.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will discuss that with my colleagues.

Mr. Stanfield: Could the Prime Minister tell the house whether the U.S.S.R. intends to fill the original terms of its long term wheat agreement with Canada, which I believe expires July 31.

Mr. Trudeau: I think it would be preferable if the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is concerned with the negotiations reported to this house on that in due course.

Mr. Stanfield: There is one further point in this regard which the minister might answer when he makes his report. Would he say whether it is the view of the government that shipments of grain this year are expected to be minimal, as forward sales of wheat other than Durums are very disappointing and should be amply covered by stocks already in store in St. Lawrence ports.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not think I would be willing to agree with the prophecy of the Leader of the Opposition.

Inquiries of the Ministry

WHEAT—COMPETITION FROM U.S. FOR U.S.S.R. AND CHINESE PURCHASES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary probably falls peculiarly within the knowledge of the Prime Minister. Has he any information on whether the United States is considering bidding for Russian or perhaps Chinese wheat markets? Did the Prime Minister receive any information on this subject in his discussions with President Nixon?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

WHEAT—SUGGESTED EXPANSION OF SALES PROMOTION ACTIVITIES

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary arises from the statement made by the Chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board in Winnipeg on Friday last to the effect that the Wheat Board would welcome any supplement to the sales staff of the Wheat Board by means of an expansion of the trade promotion bureau of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Will the government give consideration to the observation made by the Chairman of the Wheat Board in respect of the sales promotion staff of the Canadian Wheat Board being supplemented by other officials of the government.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am sure the minister will take note of the representations of the member, Mr. Speaker.

WHEAT—ATTRACTIVE TERMS TO POTENTIAL IMPORTERS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister in respect of what I consider to be a matter of grave urgency. In view of the fact that the recent tour of the agricultural committee through western Canada indicated that the basic problem facing grain farmers was the huge pileup of unsold grain, will the Prime Minister in full co-operation with his ministers immediately develop trade policies with potential importers, such as long-term low interest rate credit arrangements, reciprocal trade agreements and the like, so that our Wheat Board will have some practical support in moving our large stocks of prairie grain?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question takes the form of a submission or representation. I assume the minister has made note of it.

EXCHANGE OF WHEAT FOR JAPANESE MANUFACTURES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance, who, along with the Minister of Agriculture, has just returned from Japan. During these discussions did Japanese authorities offer to take more western wheat in return for the importation by Canada of certain industrial goods from Japan? Was there any deal or discussion in this regard?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister said not to his knowledge, but I should like to know whether there was any discussion in respect of this matter. He was present during the discussions. Did he stimulate any thought in this regard?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, we stimulated a great deal of thought in respect of Japan importing more wheat, rapeseed and many other products of Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: Are you prepared to give us a statement?

GRAIN

JURISDICTION BY WHEAT BOARD OVER FEED GRAINS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the tremendous reception given the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board at a mass meeting of the Saskatchewan Farmers Union in Saskatoon on April 10, at which time a brief was presented to the government of Canada, the government of Saskatchewan and the Canadian Wheat Board, concerning the return of feed grains including flax, rye and rapeseed, to the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board, can the Prime Minister advise whether this report has been considered by the government and indicate what action the government proposes to take as a result of this request on the part of this farm organization?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This also will be dealt with by the relevant minister, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I submit when there is a continuing serious crisis the government and the Prime Minister should forget the arbitrary, highly improper and illegal roster system the Prime Minister has introduced, and have someone here to answer the questions.

CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO REDUCE POVERTY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question regarding representations made to the Senate standing committee yesterday by the Canadian Economic Council, requesting that the war on poverty program as outlined in its annual review be implemented forthwith. Does the Prime Minister intend to re-constitute the special planning secretariat whose task it was to mastermind the war on poverty program?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Is it not the Prime Minister's intention to reconstitute this special planning secretariat, is he going to name any agency to co-ordinate the efforts of his ministers in respect of this war on poverty program and, if so, what agency?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we have at least two cabinet committees co-ordinating the economic and regional development aspects of this matter.

QUEBEC—LOCATION OF INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Is the government still negotiating with the Quebec government about the matter of the site for the international airport?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the decision final or is it still possible to carry out other studies and negotiations on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the hon. member is asking a question already asked yesterday.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, circumstances change from day to day, on account of the kind of government we have. I wonder if the minister has not changed his mind overnight.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unfortunately for the hon. member, the rules of the house do not change from day to day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

INQUIRY AS TO COST OF STE SCHOLASTIQUE SITE

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Minister of Transport tell us whether the Quebec government authorities have advised him that they would refuse to build the access roads to the new international airport at Ste Scholastique?

[English]

Mr. Hellyer: Certainly not officially, to the best of my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. They have indicated their displeasure with the choice of the site, but they have not officially advised us that the necessary co-operation will not be forthcoming.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. Is he not of the opinion that a supplementary expenditure amounting to $91 million to be borne by the Canadian people would justify pursuing negotiations with the government of the province of Quebec and showing as much co-operation—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it seems to me that his question is rather an argument and is therefore unacceptable.

AIR CANADA

STRIKE OF MECHANICS—INQUIRY AS TO MATTERS IN DISPUTE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour. Now that he has indicated that the question of money is not the chief difference between the union of machinists and Air Canada, and that the union has admitted this is not the principal difference, would the minister kindly advise the house what are the issues between this international union and Air Canada, in a matter which is so disrupting communications in this country?

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the question was posed by such an experienced member of the House of Commons, who really appreciates that a wide and sweeping statement as to all the issues involved could only jeopardize what are very delicate negotiations. Provided the house has a little confidence in the Minister of Labour—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: —and will not aggravate a very delicate situation for the sake of curiosity, we may be able to bring this matter to a successful conclusion pretty soon.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I refrain from comment on that answer. Perhaps the minister could take the house and the country into his confidence and tell us in general terms—we are not asking for the dollars and cents—whether it is a question of wages, fringe benefits, seniority; or what are the problems?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has done a very capable job of outlining the problems yet to be resolved in all these areas. I can assure the house that if the matter is not settled fairly soon, and I think one party or the other is to blame, I will assume my responsibility as Minister of Labour to inform the Canadian public, in the house, what I think is the reason for this dispute. I will have no hesitation in telling the house and the country who is the culprit, if there is a culprit, in the dispute.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question. Is the minister now preparing to apply his well known personal magnetism to bring about a speedy settlement of this dispute?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With all due deference, I am not trying to fix any blame. I am just asking the minister, because of his interest—I am sure his interest is shared by all—in getting this dispute settled, whether he will tell the house in general terms just what might be the issues.

Mr. Mackasey: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

STRIKE OF MECHANICS—ALTERNATE SERVICE BY REGIONAL AIR CARRIERS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Is the government considering the expansion of services by regional air carriers both for the present and future, so that in the event of disruption of air service as at present the public will have more alternate service available?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the air policy announced several years ago does provide for the strengthening and growth of the regional air carriers, as business available to support them increases.

Mr. Baldwin: Is that 30 years ago?

STRIKE OF MECHANICS—TRANSPORTATION OF PERISHABLE GOODS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday, in reply to a question on the subject of baby chicks, the minister indicated that he would check into the situation with a view to making all possible arrangements to facilitate the movement of these baby chicks. Has the minister had a chance to look into the situation, and can he report on the success of his investigation?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have had a preliminary look at it. The regional carriers are able to undertake shipments over the distances they operate. There are, I understand, two regional carriers in a position to offer charter flights which might be useful for the chicks.

It has been suggested to some of the producers that they might get in touch with these operators to see if it is possible to charter flights which would help them out in the situation. In addition, I think there are one or two circumstances in which it will be necessary to have the co-operation of the Canadian Pacific Airlines, and I will make representations directly to the airlines to see if they will not help out.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister would take kindly the suggestion that he get in touch with the Department of Transport to see whether they could move perishable goods, including chicks, to the domestic market in Canada and also to the export market in Japan.

Mr. Hellyer: We do not have transoceanic airplanes, Mr. Speaker, but if we did we would consider it.

Mr. Woolliams: May I put the following question to the minister with regard to his suggestion concerning C.P.A.: Is the minister aware that C.P.A. is so choked with the mail of the Postmaster General, and other goods, that they have openly said there is no room for those kinds of goods in their aircraft?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE BUDGET

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PRESENTATION OF BUDGETARY PROPOSALS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Is he in a position now to inform the house whether he intends to present a budget, and if not a budget then an economic survey, and if so, when may we expect him to do so?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): As I stated previously, I intend to make a budget speech of one form or another, and the time for it would be some time toward the end of May or in the early part of June.

INCOME TAX

REQUEST FOR EXEMPTION OF OLD AGE PENSIONERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In preparing his budgetary statement, is the minister still considering including in it a provision so that taxation will not continue to be levied on old age pensioners who have only their pensions and the guaranteed income supplement on which to live?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): In the preparation of the budget we consider all submissions which have been made to the government in this regard.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT ACT

DELAY IN QUEBEC PARTICIPATION

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Saint-Henri): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the serious accusations made by the Hon. Gabriel Loubier, minister of tourism, fish and game of the province of Quebec, regarding the federal government's reluctance to allow Quebec to enter the federal fitness and amateur sport program, would the Minister of National Health and Welfare explain this delay to the house?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There has been no reluctance on our part since the inception of the fitness program. We have had agreements with other provinces, and Quebec has chosen not to enter those agreements. Lately, during the last year of the current three year agreement, Quebec has indicated some interest. We are more than happy to have them come in, but some of their suggestions are novel ones and we are carrying out discussions with regard to them. We are prepared to carry them on with Quebec.

I have endeavoured on several occasions to talk to the minister to whom the hon. member referred, but apparently he has not been in a position to reply, other than to send his telegram.

RESEARCH

AUSTERITY MEASURES IN ANIMALS PROGRAM

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to page 6891 of Hansard on which appears a question which I asked of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It reads as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the statement that appeared in a leading newspaper to the effect that Canada's reputation in animal research, and even the health of scientists engaged in that field, has been put in jeopardy by the government's austerity measures, would the Minister of National Health and Welfare state what measures are now being taken to correct this terrible situation?

On that date you said, Mr. Speaker, that the minister could probably give the answer in the form of a statement on motions. Therefore I ask that this information be put in the form of a statement on motions tomorrow by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or by the Minister of Agriculture, so that we are informed of what is going on.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am not aware of the fact that our research program in this area has been jeopardized as a result of any cutback in the health resources fund, or whatever fund the hon. member is talking about. As he knows, we have more than doubled the millions of dollars we have already allocated to the research field, so far as medical research is concerned.

Mr. Rynard: It is apparent that the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not understand my question. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture could make this statement tomorrow on motions.

CANADIAN CULTURE

EDUCATION AGREEMENT BETWEEN QUEBEC AND FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Would he tell the house whether his meeting with the Quebec minister, Mr. Jean-Noël Tremblay, regarding a federal-provincial agreement on education, indicates the possibility of negotiations in a climate of co-operation and understanding?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, first I must correct the wrong impression under which the hon. member seems to be. Nothing was said about education. Only cultural affairs were discussed.

As a result of the meeting, it has been agreed that the representatives of the two departments would keep mutually informed, that they would endeavour to act in a complementary way and to co-ordinate their activities and that they would meet again in order to determine how this co-operation and this co-ordination could best be put into practice.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Could the minister tell us whether as a result of having been in touch with Mr. Tremblay, the Quebec minister of Cultural Affairs, he has enriched his own culture?

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MAINLAND CHINA—U.S. REACTION TO CANADIAN RECOGNITION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the minister's revelation a day or so ago that the United States voiced a contrary view to Canada's proposed recognition of China, will the minister undertake shortly to fill in the house and Canadians generally on the details of the U.S. position, since this is something which should be known to Canadians before any decision is taken?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I do not think it is necessary for us to do that. The U.S. secretary of state made a statement which was published many weeks ago. I will get it for the house and table it if necessary.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): May I ask the minister whether the government intends to go ahead in its negotiations with Red China, regardless of the attitude taken by the United States or by the people of Canada?

Mr. Sharp: I hope we make our own decisions in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: It is about time.

AIR TRANSPORT

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATORY AIR FREIGHT CHARGES

Mr. Hue Harries (Edmonton-Strathcona): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the International Air Transport Association is now discussing international air freight rates at the Athens meeting, I wonder what instructions the Canadian delegation has received to pursue vigorously the removal of the existing discriminatory, unreasonable and prejudicial air freight charges now being levied on all shipments between western Canada and Europe. If there have been no such instructions, I wonder whether the minister would be prepared to intervene to correct this prejudicial situation.

Mr. Baldwin: It sounds like a description of Benson's budget.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I would be pleased to take these representations to the appropriate officials, and to see that they are given consideration.

TRANSPORT

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY RATES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance concerning the passenger and automobile rates on the Borden-Tormentine ferry service, a matter of real urgency in this causeway defunctus era. Can he advise if a decision to increase the rates has been taken, and if so when such an unwelcome measure is to go into effect?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): That is a question that should be referred to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Stanfield: Don't disclaim responsibility for it.

An hon. Member: Rise and shine.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I put a somewhat similar question some days ago to the Minister of Transport and he assured me that within a day or two he would be prepared to make a statement both on the rates and on some of the difficulties that have been encountered recently with regard to the C.N.R. operations. Is that being postponed again, or may we expect a statement this week?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I doubt that it will be possible to make it this week, but I hope that we can have this matter settled in a just manner within a few days.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister prepared to say to the house whether a decision has been taken to raise the rates on this important service this summer?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The answer is no as of now.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Having in mind the fact that this month a great many consumers across the country are having to pay a great deal more money for a much reduced mail service, I wonder whether the minister would investigate those responsible for this situation, possibly starting with the Postmaster General?

EXPROPRIATION

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of past assurances by the minister that legislation to amend the Expropriation Act would be introduced to the house this session, can the minister inform the house when this might be?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I said, in answer to a question from the hon. member for Peel South a few days ago, that I hope the legislation will be introduced in the next two or three weeks.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

WORLD HOCKEY CHAMPIONSHIPS IN SWEDEN

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): My question is directed to the Secretary of State and it relates to the coverage by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation of the recent world hockey championships in Sweden. In view of the government's declared intention to avoid waste, can the minister report to the house the reason for sending 56 C.B.C. employees to Sweden for three weeks, when the television contract for the world hockey games had already been secured by C.T.V.?

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid this question should be placed on the order paper.

PEST CONTROL

USE OF D.D.T. IN CANADA

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I would direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that Sweden has banned outright the use of d.d.t. in that country because of its harmful effects on human beings and other higher forms of life—

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Baldwin: He must mean Conservatives.

Mr. Gleave: —is the effect of this chemical and its use in Canada being investigated?

Mr. Speaker: The question can be placed on the order paper or debated at the time of the adjournment.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

A.B.M. SYSTEM—MISSILE SITE IN MICHIGAN AREA

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): My question is for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister tell the house whether the United States anti-ballistic missile site for the Michigan-Ohio area will be located in the vicinity of Sault Ste. Marie, in the upper peninsula of Michigan?

Mr. Speaker: I would think that this question, if it is in order, should be placed on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EDUCATION

ASSISTANCE TO ALBERTA YOUTH CORPS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. Has the Secretary of State received a submission from the province of Alberta requesting assistance in financing the Alberta Youth Corps, a voluntary organization active in the field of education and mental health in that province?

Mr. Speaker: I fail to see the urgency of the question, but if the hon. member thinks it is urgent I shall be pleased to return with him at the time of the adjournment.

Mr. Mazankowski: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

DRUGS

CANADIAN ACTION IN MARKETING OF ANTIBIOTICS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Last week, Mr. Speaker, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare about the decision of the food and drug administration in the United States to ban the marketing of some 78 drugs because they contained antibiotics suspected of exposing patients to unnecessary risk. May I ask what action the hon. gentleman's department has taken to ban similar drugs in this country? The minister promised to consider this question and reply at a later date, and I wonder whether he now has anything to report to the house.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I hope to be in a position to report on this question, perhaps tomorrow.

UNITED NATIONS

POSSIBLE DISCUSSION OF NIGERIA-BIAFRA CONFLICT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he proposes to take any new initiative with regard to the conflict in Nigeria, particularly in view of the apparent breakdown of efforts by the appropriate association of African states in this area. In particular I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he proposes to take any initiative at the United Nations in this regard.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Since the breakdown of the negotiations undertaken by the Organization of African Unity we have looked at this question again, and the same difficulty appears—that we are not likely to obtain sufficient support in the United Nations for this question to be raised in a constructive way. The hon. gentleman is aware, as I am sure are all hon. members, that the problem arises from the fundamental difference which now exists as to what should be the future of Nigeria. Until there is some agreement on this I do not think negotiations can proceed.

Mr. Stanfield: Is the hon. gentleman making any effort of an orderly sort to persuade the countries involved to reach agreement as to an appropriate method by which to proceed?

Mr. Sharp: As I have said before, there is no lack of intermediaries. There are many, including ourselves, who would be only too happy to act in such a capacity. But until there can be agreement on whether there ought to be one Nigeria or an independent Biafra, I really do not see that there is much to be done.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the minister whether he is now prepared to disclose to the house the message he sent to the government of Nigeria and the suggestions made to that government some weeks ago, which he declined to disclose until ample time had passed for the message to be delivered.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I had better answer that question tomorrow. I shall take the question as notice. I have a report and will make it tomorrow.

BIAFRA—DISCUSSION OF ACTION FOR HUMANITARIAN RELIEF

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Would the hon. gentleman tell us whether any progress is being made in connection with the proposal of the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, endorsed by him I believe in his speech on November 26, that international action for humanitarian relief should be considered in the United Nations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): If the hon. gentleman will look up Hansard he will find I have answered this question.

Mr. Brewin: The hon. minister answered it by saying he would look into the matter further and report later. Is he ready to report to the house now?

Mr. Sharp: That was the first answer I gave. I gave a supplementary answer later.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL DEFENCE

RECOMMENDATIONS FROM STANDING COMMITTEE ON NIGERIA-BIAFRA CONFLICT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs advise the house when he intends to make a statement concerning the recommendations conveyed to him by the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence with regard to the whole Nigeria-Biafra conflict?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): When that report was presented to the house, I did make a statement, but I will review that statement now to see whether it needs to be modified in the light of later events.

AIRPORTS

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the Province of Quebec does not seem to want a new airport, and since the workers in Montreal and Air Canada do not seem to want to work, while we know that workers in Winnipeg will work, could the management—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the house will have to surmise the rest of the hon. member's question.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

"DON MESSER'S JUBILEE"—RESOLUTION OF NEW BRUNSWICK LEGISLATURE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): My question is for the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. Will the hon. gentleman send along to the appropriate C.B.C. authorities the resolution which members of the New Brunswick legislature passed expressing unanimous agreement on the need to retain Don Messer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ALLEGED MONOPOLISTIC ACTION OF OIL COMPANIES

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. According to news reports this morning a statement has been made by an executive of the National Automotive Trade Association inferring that because of monopolistic action by the oil companies Canadians are paying too much for gasoline and auto parts. In view of this statement and its implications as far as the cost of living of every Canadian is concerned, would the minister institute an examination of this industry to insure that Canadians are being given fair treatment?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Of course, this is a matter which is constantly under surveillance by the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act. I would also point out that I have not seen the statement to which the hon. member alludes, but the T.B.A. report is presently before the Economic Council of Canada for consideration, together with the report recently made in Alberta on the same subject. I expect to have a report from the Economic Council some time this spring.

Mr. Baldwin: Always we have surveillance but never action.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the minister to make a statement some day in the house on these reports he is receiving, so all the people of Canada may understand what is going on.

Mr. Basford: If and when that is appropriate, Mr. Speaker, yes.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister ask his prices commission to make a report in the matter?

COMBINES

FAILURE BY SUGAR REFINERIES TO OBEY COURT ORDER

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It has to do with monopolies. Has the minister received a formal complaint charging that Canada's big three sugar refineries have failed to obey a court order restricting them from monopolistic practices. If so, what action does the government propose to take?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is long established practice not to reveal names of those who lodge complaints or information with us. Those people lodging complaints or information are free, of course, to make their own names public.

Mr. Saltsman: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. My question to the minister did not concern privacy. I did not ask him for the names of any people involved in the matter. I asked him whether such complaint had been made and what the government intends to do in this regard?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act is, as always, carrying out his statutory duties.

AIR CANADA

WINNIPEG—TRANSFER OF BASE TO NORTHWEST INDUSTRIES LIMITED

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. A week ago today I asked him a question with respect to the transfer of the Air Canada Winnipeg base at Winnipeg to Northwest Industries Ltd. I asked what steps the government is taking to make sure that the employees affected will not be either unemployed or forced to take work at lower wages than they have had under Air Canada. The minister said he would give me an answer in a few days. Is that answer now available?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I got in touch with the officers of Air Canada at once. Unfortunately, the senior personnel of the corporation have been occupied in pressing negotiations with the machinists union during the last few days. This has made it impossible for them to obtain all the information I should like to have before answering my hon. friend's question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister not aware that I asked what steps the government was taking? Will he not answer that question now?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, that is already known. The government indicated that it wanted fair treatment at the time the direction was given to Air Canada in the first place.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister not aware that the government not only said that it wanted fair treatment, but that it assured fair treatment in this matter. I ask, what has been done to keep this commitment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is debate, and not a supplementary question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

All Canadians recognize that the Prime Minister is very fond of sports and that during the election campaign of 1968 he collected kisses. But, since he collected tomatoes in Calgary recently, could he tell us if they were grown in Canada or imported?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the hon. member, or others think that tomatoes were thrown at me. They were thrown at the newspapermen and they are the ones who assume they were being aimed at me and not at them.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ADDITIONAL PASSPORT ISSUING SERVICE

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will he use his influence with the cabinet to expand facilities for our most excellent and efficient passport department so that the department can carry on its excellent work in more efficient quarters.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet has already given me that authority.

SPORTS

NATIONAL HOCKEY TEAM—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CHANGE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Considering the poor standing of the national hockey team during the last world tournament, is it true that the minister is ready to announce changes likely to ensure a better Canadian performance in the future?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking the minister to confirm or deny a report or a rumour. I do not think the question as asked is in order.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PRESENTATION OF MUSICAL RIDE IN ENGLAND

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Thank you for recognizing me again, Mr. Speaker. I wish to direct my question to the Solicitor General, since I know he is interested in cutting out waste. My question has to do with the visit of the R.C.M.P. to England, where they will partake in a musical ride. I understand that 14 constables have already arrived in the old country—

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member at this time must not make a speech, even if it is a musical speech. He ought to ask a question.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, since 14 constables have arrived in England may I ask the Solicitor General, where are the horses?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, they are in the United Kingdom.

AGRICULTURE

POTATOES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ASSISTANCE TO P.E.I. GROWERS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It has to do with the comprehensive development plan of which the federal government is a signatory, and to which it will contribute something. Have the minister's officials had occasion recently to contact responsible provincial officials with regard to bringing immediate assistance to some persons engaged in a basic industry covered by the plan, namely, the agricultural industry. In short, are there any plans to assist farmers engaged in potato growing.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. Is the hon. member asking a question.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I wish to know whether the minister or his officials have been discussing with provincial officials the question of providing assistance under the plan I referred to for potato growers.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, personally, I have not discussed the matter. As regards officials of my department, I shall inquire before replying to the hon. member.

THE MINISTRY

SPEECH TO QUEBEC EAST LIBERAL ASSOCIATION

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to our honourable and fearless Secretary of State.

In a speech he delivered before the Quebec East Liberal Association, he is reported as having said that the western world has received—

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I have to remind him that he cannot ask questions referring to speeches delivered by ministers outside the house. He can only ask the Prime Minister whether a speech made outside the house reflects government policy.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Speaker, according to the English text, the minister is reported as having said, and I quote:

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I am afraid the question cannot be asked in this way.

Mr. MacInnis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The original question was not allowed; therefore there can be no supplementary.

NATO

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I remind Your Honour that previously when you ruled a question out of order the Prime Minister nevertheless was permitted to answer.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. May I ask the minister why there are two versions of an important speech he gave. There is a French version and an English language version of the speech he made to the Quebec Liberal Association. He made a very important statement which appears in the English version but it is missing entirely from the French version.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think this is a matter which can be brought up as a question of privilege. Perhaps a question ought to be directed to the translator.

TRANSPORT

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY RATES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which relates to an earlier question of privilege. I did not wish to bring the matter up earlier because I did not wish to take up the time of the house. During the course of questioning with regard to increases in ferry rates the Minister of Transport may have misled the house. He misrepresented, I submit, the position that was adopted before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications where it was indicated no decision had been taken. In the house he indicated that ferry rates governing the Northumberland Strait crossing by the Canadian National were to be increased. I therefore submit that he misled the standing committee and the house on a very important matter affecting transportation to and from one of our provinces. I think the house deserves an explanation from the minister with regard to this particular question.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can clear up the misunderstanding at once by saying that the government has decided in principle to increase the ferry rates. Secondly, no decision has yet been taken with respect to the new level of the rates which the government is presently considering. I am afraid that this has been a question of semantics. I did not mean to mislead the house.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

MOTION FOR APPROVAL OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house supports the government's policy of continued Canadian participation in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the intention of the government, in consultation with Canada's allies, to take early steps to bring about a planned and phased reduction of the size of Canadian forces in Europe.

[Translation]

He said: Mr. Speaker, the government welcomes this debate for it provides an occasion to discuss in the House of Commons those aspects of Canadian defence policy which were announced earlier this month.

The government's decision to engage in a thorough review of its foreign policy was, I think it fair to say, welcomed by most Canadians and indeed by representatives of all political parties. Some years have passed since the last careful re-evaluation of our external relations was conducted, and much has changed in the world in the interval. Our decision to review was taken with care, and the review in its several aspects is being pursued with care. In an exercise as important and as infrequent as this, haste is not a criterion which we on this side regard as necessary. Far better, we believe, to proceed with deliberate speed and attention than to meet artificial deadlines with incomplete studies and hurried decisions.

This comprehensive foreign policy review fulfils an undertaking given by the Liberal party in the last election campaign. I stated late last May that a thorough re-examination was needed "because of the changing nature of Canada and the world around us."

I also said and I quote:

—our approach will be pragmatic and realistic—above all to see that our policies in the future accord with our national needs and resources, with our ability to discharge Canada's legitimate responsibilities in world affairs.

It is our intention that the review will, prior to conclusion, encompass all aspects of our foreign relations, including trade, economic assistance programs, and defence. Some parts of the review are, of course, more advanced than others. In all aspects, however, it has been our decision to return to fundamental principles; to make no assumptions about the validity of previously pursued policies.

It can, of course, be said that widespread studies were not needed in order to learn that the problems facing Canada in the foreign and defence areas are in broad dimension those that we have faced for some time—global and regional tensions, under-development, and economic disruptions. Nor to know that Canada's objectives have not varied much; we still seek a peaceful and secure world fortified by a general economic stability which will permit men and women everywhere to pursue the individual dignity which is their natural right. Fresh studies were needed nevertheless to review some of our traditional positions. They were needed because the breath-taking pace of change in this decade, whether measured in technological, demographic, or economic terms, has so altered the complexion and the scope of those problems, and so emphasized the desirability of those objectives, that we are in a very real sense in a new world.

[English]

What the government is seeking in the review, therefore, is something more than a catalogue of current problems, useful though that would be. We are attempting to learn whether Canada, by reassessing in a systematic fashion its own and the world situation, may play a more effective role in pursuing its objectives. We want to be sure that we are doing, so far as we are able, the right things in the right places. Canada's resources, both human and physical, are immense, but they are not limitless. We must establish priorities which will permit us to expend our energies in a fashion that will best further the values that we cherish.

We do not further those values by withdrawing from the world, nor will this government ever suggest that we should. But neither do we further those values effectively by needlessly fragmenting our efforts, by doing things that others can and should do better. Above all, we accomplish nothing by refusing to recognize that in the past two decades there have been changes in the world and in Canada which demand fresh policies and adjusted viewpoints.

In some respects, Mr. Speaker, it may be said that the foreign policy review is a clinical test of Canada's maturity. The policies that are being examined were formulated and pursued over a period of time that can only be described as an outstanding chapter in the history of this country. Canada's contribution to the betterment of international relations in the post-war era is one of which all Canadians are justifiably proud. But the record of that period reveals that Canada's efforts were successful largely because of our ability to innovate, to meet new problems with new solutions, and to be aware that the world is a constantly changing place.

The man whose name is associated with brilliant statesmanship by millions of people around the globe, the Canadian who rightly earned for this country a proud place in the councils of the world, and was honoured with a Nobel Peace Prize, did not achieve his success by adhering stubbornly to old policies. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson is today celebrating his 72nd birthday in Tokyo where he is still exercising a service for the benefit of the world community. Had Mr. Pearson not approached new problems with new solutions, we would not regard him now with the respect he so richly deserves as a servant of peace.

And so it is today. Canadians must be prepared to face the world of actuality, the world of 1969.

We begin with the realization that we in Canada are in a relatively happy and unusual position. Not since Confederation has there existed a viable threat to our territorial integrity. The good fortune of geography has removed Canadian territory from physical contact with wars elsewhere; the good fortune of history has given us land frontiers with only a single, friendly nation. But we must remember that while there may be no present threat to Canada's territorial integrity, we are not able to say that there is no present threat from without to Canada's physical security. Should a major world conflict break out it will not likely involve territorial aggrandizement at Canada's expense, but it could easily involve mass destruction within Canada.

In a world as interdependent as that of today, with instant world-wide communications systems, and pre-targeted nuclear armed rockets only minutes flying time distant from all major European and North American cities, Canada's security is dependent on a peaceful world. Our efforts to achieve such a world are therefore a necessity; they should be made as effective as possible. Physical security now, and in the long run, can be secured only if the nations of the world recognize that certain conditions must obtain. I believe that there are five such conditions; in the long run the final three offer the only hope for lasting security.

1. Prevention of the erosion or serious imbalance of the nuclear arms stalemate which has so far been successful in deterring a nuclear holocaust;

2. Co-operation in preventing, or in promptly settling conflicts of a nature that might, by their location, escalate into nuclear war;

3. Participation in international peacekeeping forces and in non-military initiatives which will foster trust and strength in international conflict-resolution procedures and in an effective system of world order;

4. Dedication of adequate resources to the study and negotiation of arms limitations and disarmament agreements;

5. Contribution of an increasing percentage of national resources to activities which are designed to relieve or remove such causes of unrest as economic insecurity.

These conditions must prevail in the international community if mankind is to survive the 20th century. International mechanisms now exist to co-ordinate and further activities leading to these ends; they deserve and require the support of all governments, of men of all political leanings.

The Canadian government must consider which of these five conditions is deserving of the greatest expenditure at any given time, and toward which Canadian activity can be most effectively directed. Because none of the conditions can obtain through the efforts of any single nation, Canada's decisions in these matters must be taken after consultation with other states in the world community, but not necessarily with the same states in each instance.

[Translation]

The foregoing, Mr. Speaker, are some of the foreign policy considerations which are particularly pertinent to any discussion or evaluation of a Canadian defence policy. They make obvious the requirement that the defence policy of a country such as Canada must not be permitted either to estrange itself from its foreign policy or to become the dominant influence in that policy. Still more important, our defence policy must not become totally dominated by any single military consideration or alliance. The broad foundation of all Canada's external relations must be its foreign policy. Flowing out of that foreign policy—and as a part of it—is our defence policy. The defence policy in turn will determine the nature of our military alliances and the deployment of our forces.

Described in these terms, it becomes apparent that Canada's NATO relationship is not, primarily, a military decision. It is a political decision. As such the Canadian government is acting in a responsible fashion when it observes that the European members of NATO now have a combined population of 300 millions, and a combined Gross National Product of 500 billion United States dollars. The remarkable post-World War II recovery of the states of Western Europe has increased considerably their capability of defending their own region. This increased capability in turn reduces the present need for a sustained Canadian military contribution.

I might emphasize as well that, apart from the United States, Canada is at present the only member of NATO which is carrying out an extensive NATO military role on two continents. In summary, we feel that Europe, twenty years after NATO, can defend itself better and we hope that NATO's European member countries, with the support of the United States and Canada, can reach some agreement with the Warsaw Pact countries to de-escalate the present tension. For our part we are not now advocating a reduction of NATO's total military strength, although we hope that this may become possible, but a readjustment of commitments among NATO members.

It follows, and our defence review has made it clear, that a Canadian military presence in Europe is not important so much on the grounds that we fulfill a military role as we do a political role. We contribute in some measure to the "resolve" of the organization; to the will of the Alliance to respond to any aggression. This being the case, the Canadian military function in NATO may be seen to be a manifestation of our political policy.

This is consistent with one of the important roles of NATO, which is political—the accommodation with the Warsaw Pact countries of the outstanding differences between the two alliances and agreement on arms controls and arms limitation.

It is this search for détente which is one of the compelling reasons for remaining a member of NATO. Quite apart from any military role, there is, we believe, an important political role for NATO and for Canada within NATO in this attempt to remove or reduce the underlying political causes of potential conflict through steps toward political reconciliation and settlement.

The government's NATO decision is based on the belief that, during the forthcoming years, there are better uses of the Canadian forces, and that there are better political means of pursuing our foreign policy than through a continued military presence in Europe of the present size. For this reason we propose a planned and phased reduction.

[English]

The maintenance, Mr. Speaker, of the five conditions that I mentioned a few moments ago remains our objective: nuclear stability, resolution of conflicts, peacekeeping, disarmament, and economic assistance. It is in an attempt to further these conditions in a rational and effective fashion that the government has taken its first decisions in the defence policy area. We have undertaken the development of a defence policy based on Canada's interests and place in the world, a policy which will at the same time be supported by Canadians generally and accepted by our friends and allies.

Those aforesaid decisions I have already announced. They appear as an appendix to Hansard for Friday, April 18. They mean that this government is willing to state that the efforts expended in search of a secure Canada and a peaceful world in the last 25 years are in some ways inappropriate for the next 25 years. And they mean that following the same careful type of study and with the same resolve that launched Canada in 1945 into a then new and effective role in the world, we believe Canada is now on the threshold of another new role. This does not mean, however, that our present posture or our present attitude must necessarily be totally changed.

It is obvious from the foregoing that the government has rejected, for example, any suggestion that Canada assume a non-aligned or neutral role in the world. To do so would have meant the withdrawal by Canada from its present alliances and the termination of all co-operative military arrangements with other countries. That would be wrong; it is necessary and wise to continue to participate in an appropriate way in collective security arrangements with other states in the interests of Canada's national security and in defence of the values we share with our friends.

The precise military role which we shall endeavour to assume in these collective arrangements will be a matter for discussion and consultation with our allies and will depend in part on the role assigned to Canadian forces in the defence of North America in co-operation with the United States. They will be consistent as well with our belief that, as a responsible member of the international community, we must continue to make forces available for peacekeeping roles.

I wish to pause at this point, Mr. Speaker, to emphasize that the government's decision should not in any sense be construed as a criticism of the personnel of the Canadian forces. We are all here aware, and take justifiable pride, in the high degree of professional ability which these forces demonstrate in their NATO roles in Europe and on the North Atlantic ocean.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: The air division, the mechanized brigade, and our maritime force are first-class formations and carry out their respective NATO missions superbly. They set a standard of performance which other NATO forces find difficult to match.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: The government has not the slightest doubt that this same high standard of performance will continue to be observed by the Canadian forces in the new roles which will be assigned to them.

[Translation]

Measured in terms of nuclear weapons and destructive capacity, Mr. Speaker, the threat to the continued existence of mankind is incomparably greater today than it was in the nineteen forties. In the early days of NATO it was said that the West could not wait for political settlements, but had to tackle first the security issue.

That remains true. Equally true, however, is the statement that we cannot wait for solutions of the security issue without at the same time accelerating our efforts toward political settlement, and particularly arms control.

In all history, arms by themselves have never guaranteed security for long. And just as there is no single cause of conflict, so is there no single technique of arms control. The present balance of deterrents is an absurdly unsatisfactory substitute for real security. A more stable alternative is necessary.

Coincidental with the search for a solution to this military problem is the necessity that nations recognize the social pressures now building up around the world. We cannot ignore the forces of history now on the move in Asia, Africa, and South America. It is the sorry record of mankind that, through history, there has always been recurring resistance to arms control and the avoidance of violence as a means of change; and of the failure to recognize promptly social elements which cry out for relief.

Our goal must be one of an international world community which controls conflict but which at the same time permits elements in the community to satisfy their need for change and progress as circumstances require. A balance must be struck between the demands of nations and the needs of the world community. In order to ensure opportunity for such a balance, we must imaginatively and resolutely seek arms control and disarmament agreements.

Canada's record at the Eighteen Nation Disarmament Conference is an outstanding one. The contribution made by General E.L.M. Burns is likely unsurpassed by that of any other single person. It is the intention of this government that our foreign policy should provide for a growing investment of intellectual resources in this important area, and that one of the most important foreign relations tasks in which Canada is engaged is that which is directed to arms limitations and disarmament.

We think that our defence policy decisions are consistent with this scheme of priorities. We believe that a careful evaluation of Canada's present NATO military commitment, including the tactical nuclear role now assigned to our forces is a necessary first step. Our acts must not be shown to be inconsistent with our aims. Underway at the moment is an examination of the means by which our new defence policy will be instituted in order to meet these aims.

[English]

The world, Mr. Speaker, is embarked upon a revolutionary period which dwarfs by comparison the changes of the past centuries. Our era combines a technological revolution with a revolution of rising expectations of billions of persons who for the first time in history are projecting themselves to the forefront of our consciences as they seek their proper place in the international community. This is the excitement, this is the challenge, recognized by so many of our youth. This is the need which tens of thousands of young persons in Ottawa and Hull alone recognized last Saturday as they participated in the "Miles for Millions" march.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: We as Canadians would not be fulfilling our potential for good if we remained aloof from these events. This government intends to reorganize our resources and our energies to play a role in the world as it is, not to dream of things as they were. Those in this house and elsewhere who say that our defence policy represents a turn toward isolationism are proclaiming only that, in their fixation on old wars and on old problems, they are isolated—isolated from the world of now and the world of the future.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You wouldn't know.

Mr. Trudeau: Canada has the opportunity to play a role in the world of today, Mr. Speaker, a role which, hopefully, will act as an incentive to other like-minded states, a role which will emphasize the need to devote energies to the reduction of tension and the reversal of the arms race—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: —a role which will acknowledge that humanity is increasingly subject to perils from sources in addition to an east-west conflict centred in Europe, and which will permit us to make the intellectual and resource investments necessary to do our part to meet those perils. This is why we are insisting that our defence policy be directed by our foreign policy, and not vice-versa. This is why we are placing emphasis on imaginative concepts of assistance to developing countries. This is why we are insisting that our defence policy be rational and not a rationalization.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The government, Mr. Speaker, recognizes that the challenge of future world social and political events will not be met by a stagnant, cautious attitude. We must anticipate, not react; we must think, not conform; we must have courage to discard conventional wisdom in our quest for a secure and peaceful world. If this requires change, so be it.

Mr. Lewis: Amen.

Mr. Trudeau: To those who will tell me that this is not the time for change—tomorrow perhaps but not now—to them I refer to the nostalgic lyrics of the popular song "Those were the days, my friend, we thought they'd never end." They did end, Mr. Speaker. In the history of mankind, many days have ended and those who have been unprepared to adapt to new forces have ended with them. We do not propose that fate for Canada and our civilization. We on this side are saying to Canadians: "These are the days, my friend".

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might begin by suggesting that this is not one of the Prime Minister's better days. We have heard a lot of general discussion this afternoon and a lot of high-flown sentiment, most of which I suggest really has nothing to do with the motion before the house. The motion asks us to support continued Canadian participation in NATO, which we do. It also asks us to support the intention of the government, in consultation with our allies, to take early steps to bring about a planned and phased reduction of the size of Canadian forces in Europe. Those words could mean that only 12 servicemen will be left in Europe, that only 12 servicemen will be brought home from Europe, or anything in between. That is exactly what this resolution was designed to do, to mean anything anybody wants it to mean.

Is this the way honest men in government, to use the Prime Minister's self-portrait in Calgary, state their policy? Is this the way a responsible leader of government tells Canada and the world what is the intent in respect of Canada's foreign and defence policy, by making statements deliberately intended to mean different things to different people? This tactic would only be justified, sir, if it confused our enemies as much as it confuses the people of Canada.

Some people say that this technique is extremely clever, that it is cute and is smart politics, but I thought this was the age of meaningful dialogue between the government and the people. I thought this was to be a participatory democracy and that people were going to be plugged into the political process and the process of decision-making. I thought the dominant characteristics of the just society in the relationship between the government and the people was to have been a rigorous, intellectual honesty. Some intellect and some honesty, Mr. Speaker! Not even Mackenzie King at his most devious, or Jack Pickersgill with his bag of tricks, would have tried to mislead and confuse the country to the extent now being attempted by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It is just not credible, it is just not believable, that the government has formulated a policy of making a planned and phased reduction of our forces in Europe without having come to some decision as to how big a reduction will be made, what kind of a reduction is likely and what the timing will be. Even the Liberal backbenchers do not believe that. They have to pretend they believe it, but we do not.

The Prime Minister says the government has not decided on how big a reduction, what kind of reduction or what the timing will be. Then what are we being asked to vote on in this motion? It is a nothing motion designed, as I said, to mean anything anybody wants it to mean. I feel sure it means something different to the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) than it does to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). I do not know why the Prime Minister bothers to dissemble in the way he does. He would not have any trouble with this cabinet. If he were to decide to join the Warsaw Pact I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs would rationalize that decision for him. These cabinet members are as docile a bunch of kittens as one could find anywhere, and when the Prime Minister puts his tongue in his cheek at his press conference and told how "strong men have strong opinions", you could have heard them purr.

As to the timing of the reduction and the method of bringing it about, of course the statements of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have been contradictory. Both of them have contradicted the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister has contradicted both of them. Now the Prime Minister has contradicted himself. On April 3, at his press conference, the Prime Minister said:

> The Canadian force commitment for deployment with NATO in Europe beyond this period will be discussed with our allies at the meeting of the defence planning committee of NATO in May.

He meant beyond the year 1969. Later at the same conference the Prime Minister said in reply to a question:

> We intend to go to the alliance in May and say that this is what we want to do with our forces.

A week later the Secretary of State for External Affairs was in Washington and at a press briefing given by the minister at the Canadian embassy he was asked when the Canadian government was going to tell NATO what is proposed by way of reduction and, quoting from the transcript, he replied:

Mr. Sharp: The Prime Minister announced that at the meeting of the defence planning committee that the plans of the Canadian government would be laid before the defence ministers.

Question: So the decision is going to be taken before the meeting?

Mr. Sharp: Well, obviously.

Then we come back to the House of Commons and on April 14 the Prime Minister said, no, that is not right, the decision will be taken before, and the final decision will be made in August of this year. Just two days later the Minister of National Defence said the discussion would go on until December of this year before there was any final decision.

• (3:40 p.m.)

The Prime Minister succeeded in further shrouding the whole subject in mystery in his Calgary speech when he said:

And that is why we will not say, until our foreign policy has been determined and presented to parliament, and presented to the country—we will not say, in a final way, what forces we will put into NATO and what forces we will draw out of NATO.

That sounds like one of the statements on bank deposits by a former minister of finance. But unfortunately it does not enlighten us very much on the question of defending Canada or the free world. The Prime Minister explained that this process of policy review would be a long one. If we have to wait until it terminates, and if it is as long as he indicated in Calgary it would be, the Nato allies will not get any firm proposition from the government and we will not be told about it in May or August and probably not in December.

We all know that the Prime Minister went out west to ski, but some of us have the impression that he did some pretty fancy skating while he was in Calgary. The point is, how can anybody in Canada or in the world at large now have the slightest confidence in anything these gentlemen say about their plans in this respect?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Having allowed for the attempt to confuse people, including his own colleagues, as to what the policy actually is, and leaving aside the very obvious ignorance of his own responsible ministers as to what this policy is and when it is to be determined, what do we have as a basis for judging the policy intentions and policy directions of this government? Principally, we have the Prime Minister's statement of April 3, his Calgary speech of April 12, and what I would call his non-speech of today in terms of further enlightening us on this matter.

I mean no offence to the Secretary of State for External Affairs or to the Minister of National Defence when I say that their utterances on this subject are of minimal importance, because like the rest of us they have to study the Prime Minister's speeches and then read Anthony Westell's column to get an idea of what the policy is going to be. The Prime Minister said in Calgary:

I think the people in the armed forces have a right to know where we are going.

That is one sentiment we can all heartily endorse. When they find out, let us hope they will tell the rest of us. The Prime Minister, no doubt after long reflection, has concluded that foreign policy comes before defence policy, that defence policy must flow from foreign policy. This, of course, is a vast oversimplification; the two obviously must be interrelated. It would be virtually just as foolish to develop a foreign policy without regard to defence policy as it would be to try to develop a defence policy without regard to foreign policy. They must be interrelated. The Prime Minister pronounced a geometric theorem in Calgary, and I quote him again. I hope he is flattered by all the careful attention I have given to his comments there. The Prime Minister said:

—NATO had in reality determined all of our defence policy. We had no defence policy, so to speak, except that of NATO. And our defence policy had determined all of our foreign policy. And we had no foreign policy of any importance except that which flowed from NATO.

It reads almost like the Old Testament, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Euclid himself could not have evolved a theorem more clearly designed to demonstrate the incompetence of previous Liberal administrations in this country. When the Prime Minister of Canada says that we had no foreign policy of any importance except that which flowed from NATO, I say to him that is not so. I say to him that is a slander on the man he attempted to praise here today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: It is a slander on the many and varied constructive roles that the Canadian people and Canadian governments have played in world affairs and in furthering world peace in the last 20 years. The Prime Minister says our foreign policy is under review; it is not yet determined and it will not be determined for a long time. He is going to be very careful about it. Foreign policy, says the Prime Minister, must determine defence policy. But foreign policy is not yet decided. Therefore anyone as naïve as I am would assume that defence policy will not be decided until foreign policy has been decided.

But in the same speech in Calgary the Prime Minister indicated that he and his government had settled upon four priorities of a new defence policy. They had not settled their foreign policy but they had settled the four basic priorities of a new defence policy. The emphasis was to be put, first, on the defence of Canadian sovereignty. I do not know what that means, but "sovereignty" seems to be a word that fascinates the Prime Minister. The emphasis was to be, second, on the defence of Canadian territory and continental defence; third, on our association with NATO and, fourth, on U.N. peacekeeping. These were the four priorities of a new defence policy announced by the Prime Minister.

The government has decided to redeploy, not reduce, troops to give effect to the new order of priorities, to this change in emphasis in our defence policy. I emphasize that at the press conference the Prime Minister, referring to NATO and NORAD, said that the total number of troops committed to these two alliances is not being reduced by virtue of Canada's present action. Do not let anybody misunderstand what we are talking about. We are not talking about reducing military expenditures and making that money available for other purposes. We are talking about a redeployment of the defence forces which are to be maintained. We are not talking about anything more than that at the present time.

The change is from emphasis on a wider defensive alliance to emphasis on continental or territorial defence. What other interpretation can be placed upon the priorities outlined by the Prime Minister in his statement of April 3 and repeated in his speech of April 12? Having made this decision, having changed the priorities of defence policy, having changed the emphasis of our defence effort and our military alliances, where does this leave the Prime Minister's declaration that defence policy flows from foreign policy and that foreign policy is still under review? Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made nonsense of his own statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister has announced that we will reduce our defence participation in Europe and increase our participation in North America. How has this change in defence policy come about? From what new foreign policy does it flow? What changes have there been in our foreign policy that dictate this change in our defence policy? The only change in our foreign policy of which I know is that there has been talk of exchanging representatives with the Vatican. I do not know what redeployment of defence forces this would involve. I know also that initiatives are being taken to establish diplomatic relations with Peking. Does this mean that the Minister of National Defence is going to blast his way in to Peking or, failing that, into the Vatican?

There is not the slightest connection between this new defence policy and the new foreign policy that has been indicated. The Prime Minister is just playing with words. He has not been able to demonstrate that a Canadian soldier on Canadian soil will make a more effective contribution to the security of Canada than a Canadian soldier now with NATO in Europe. The Prime Minister has not been able to demonstrate that increasing our participation in continental defence in partnership with the United States will contribute more to world peace, world security and Canadian security than our broader and wider partnership including European countries. Surely these questions go to the very heart and soul of Canadian foreign policy.

What are the new considerations in foreign policy that have led to this change in emphasis in our defence policy? We do not know. The Prime Minister has not told us about the changes in foreign policy, if there are any. He has criticized past methods of developing foreign policy. He says that they were dictated by the defence decisions made by the governments of the day. I presume the truths announced by the Prime Minister are not only eternal but apply to himself as well. Yet here we have the Prime Minister of Canada today determining a new defence policy before he has determined his foreign policy.

Are we to assume that the new foreign policy will flow from the new defence policy which he is working out before he has worked out his new foreign policy? How are we to judge the worth of this new defence policy? The burden of proof is certainly on the government. Surely they have to demonstrate, or at least present some semblance of an argument, that we can make a better contribution to Canadian security and world peace by reducing our role in Europe at this time, on the one hand, and increasing our role in North America, which is the other side of the coin presented by the Prime Minister. After all, this is really what he was saying in his statement of April 3 and in his speech of April 12. There is no indication at all that the purpose of the change is to reduce the defence budget or to reduce our defence forces. Indeed, may I remind the house again that the Prime Minister specifically denied that this was the purpose of what he was announcing, although my good friend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, tried to say the opposite when he was in Washington, pretending that the reason for the NATO reduction was that we needed the money for national development.

I have to say regretfully that this is another instance of the sort of double-talk that is going on which creates confusion among ourselves and distrust among people we have always regarded as our friends.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: What we are talking about then is the redeployment of defence forces, a shift in our defence commitments. It has nothing to do with Canada's economic problems, with foreign aid or with national development, and I would like someone on the other side of the house to tell me how the announcement made by the Prime Minister will contribute in any way to the establishment of the five necessary conditions to peace. In what way will this country be any better off in making a contribution toward these five points by simply shifting troops from a broader based alliance to our own territory within the framework of North American security?

What can be said for a redeployment of our defence forces a shift in our defence commitments? First of all, it does not flow from any new foreign policy. Second, it has not been demonstrated that it will make a better contribution to the peace of the world or the security of Canada to reduce our participation in Europe and increase our participation in North America. The Prime Minister also announced:

> —to the extent that it is feasible we shall endeavour to have those activities within Canada which are essential to North American defence performed by Canadian forces.

If this is going to have any meaningful significance, including the provision of what the Prime Minister has called "an effective multi-purpose maritime coastal shield", the cost will be many million dollars more than our present expenditures on NATO.

The Prime Minister has not disclosed any new considerations of foreign policy that would justify this change. I ask every member of this house very seriously: How can Canada make a better contribution by drawing farther away from a more broadly based alliance including European countries and closer to defence integration with the United States? The Prime Minister spoke in Washington of what it is like to sleep with an elephant. It is clear he would not enjoy sleeping with an elephant.

An hon. Member: Would you?

Mr. Stanfield: I cannot imagine why he would want to marry the elephant.

What is Canada trying to prove by this unilateral decision? What contribution does this decision make to the alliance of which we have been a part and to the peace of the world in general? This year is the 20th anniversary of NATO, and the countries of NATO are discussing among themselves the over-all structure and strategy and the objectives of NATO. From this kind of discussion might well flow logically a discussion of how each member can best make a contribution in the future to NATO's agreed objectives. Certainly there is room for improvement in NATO, a full realization of its broad purposes in addition to its military role, the achievement of social and economic purposes. Certainly we on this side of the house are just as interested in a détente as my hon. friends opposite, but we do not think that we improve our chances of achieving a détente by weakening our position. I suggest that Canada will not have a very meaningful role to play in the kind of discussions now going on in NATO because the government of Canada has already decided to reduce its contribution and to demote NATO on its list of priorities.

There has been some discussion of a détente between the east and the west, some hope of a mutal de-escalation of forces on the part of the Warsaw Pact countries and the NATO countries. I suggest that the Prime Minister has weakened the prospect and perhaps postponed the détente by embarrassing NATO and by placing it in a position where it would have a somewhat weaker negotiating hand if it entered now into discussions with the Warsaw Pact countries.

I am not merely talking of the troops we are withdrawing, which are perhaps marginal in the over-all picture. I am also talking of the psychological damage done to the alliance. Six years ago the right hon. Mr. Pearson put it in this way:

> Today, defence policy is based more on the interdependence, than the independence, of nations. No country can defend itself alone. The only security, especially for a country like Canada, lies in collective action through a defensive alliance such as NATO, which rests, or should rest, in so far as its military side is concerned, on a pooling of strength.
> Canada . . . must do nothing to weaken continental or NATO collective policy and action, while insisting that this requires full and continuous consultation between partners. Otherwise the defence coalition will not survive and the defence policies of its members will go their separate ways, along with their foreign policies.

To the extent that the alliance to which we belong is broadly based, there is somewhat less risk of a unilateral confrontation between the two major powers.

It is surely in the interest of Canada to strengthen the NATO alliance rather than increase emphasis on some concept of preserving Canadian sovereignty in a system of North American defence. Analogies are dangerous, of course, but I suggest we should be delighted, if we were not so dependent on the United States economy to have involved with us in an act of alliance a number of countries so that we would not be in bed alone with that big elephant the Prime Minister does not enjoy sleeping with. These and other advantages of NATO justify the continued expenditure of Canadian funds to maintain this Canadian commitment.

I suggest that no alternative the Prime Minister has put forward is credible. No alternative which he put forward in connection with the five goals he has established is credible. We know a committee of the House of Commons found that the role of Canada in NATO ought to be maintained. Certainly there is always room for discussion and improvement. NATO is not perfect; I do not know of any perfect institution in the world, Mr. Speaker, not even the Liberal party.

We could be neutral of course, and unaligned. The Prime Minister has properly rejected neutrality as a policy for Canada. But if we choose, as the Prime Minister says we have chosen, to reject neutralism and belong to alliances, why does the right hon. gentleman wish to downgrade the broader alliance and bring us into more intimate association with a continental partnership, and to do so probably at a greater financial cost and at the cost of some influence in a broader sphere? At this point we come face to face with the truth about the Prime Minister's philosophy in this regard. His concept is that of a "fortress America". It contains two ideas which most Canadians long ago rejected—isolationism and continentalism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: During the election campaign the Prime Minister spoke grandly of abolishing concepts of foreign policy which were 20 years old. He returned to the same theme today. Who would have thought he would try to replace those 20-year old concepts with concepts which are 40 years old or more?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: To younger people especially, who expected imagination and creative new leardership from the Prime Minister, the disappointment is nowhere greater than in the area of foreign policy. The right hon. gentleman uttered a monotonous series of legalisms to avoid any effective role in assisting in connection with Biafra. At the Commonwealth Conference, Canada played the most insignificant role it ever has in the history of that organization. Now, in the words of Professor Peyton Lyon, the Prime Minister and I quote:

> —has repudiated the best in our diplomatic tradition and revived the most shortsighted and shabby. His invocation to worship at the shrine of national sovereignty is nothing less than a call to return to the self-centred and ultimately disastrous isolationism of the inter-war period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I remember that period, Mr. Speaker, and so does the Prime Minister. This is a philosophy which is illiberal and reactionary and therefore, seconded by my friend, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the words "the Government's policy of," and by deleting everything after the word "and", and adding the following:
> "strongly condemns the retreat from internationalism to isolationism contained in the Prime Minister's statement of April 3 and his speech of April 12."

NATO

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, today the house is being asked to place its stamp of approval on the NATO policy statement which was made by the Prime Minister on April 3 last and which he repeated with some embellishment today.

I think it is significant that the statement the Prime Minister made on April 3 was made on the day after parliament recessed. The Prime Minister seems to have adopted the de Gaulle technique of bypassing the elected representatives and facing the television cameras which are not capable of answering back. The statement the Prime Minister made on that occasion and the statement he has made today are in reality statements of no policy. He says, first of all, that the government proposes that Canada should remain in the NATO alliance. That constitutes no change. He says, in the second place, that in consultation with our allies there is to be a planned and phased reduction of our NATO forces in Europe. But when the Prime Minister was asked in the television interview which followed his statement when this would take place, he replied that he could not say. He was asked about the extent to which our forces would be reduced, and again he replied that he could not say. This was phase one, he explained, and we would have to wait for phase two. Mr. Speaker, how can we judge phase one if we know nothing about phase two?

I have been watching the Prime Minister for the last 12 months while he has been in office and I have been impressed by the extent to which he has reminded me of the late William Lyon Mackenzie King who once conducted a referendum in this country on the question, "conscription if necessary, but not necessarily conscription." The Prime Minister's policy now is "reduction if necessary, but not necessarily reduction"—referring, of course, to our forces in NATO.

When we consider the statement the Prime Minister made today, discounting all its meaningless banalities and tired clichés, we find that the government really proposes no major change either in foreign policy or in defence policy. The Prime Minister tosses off phrases such as "We must think and not conform" or "the time has come for change, we must not fear change", but what change do we find here? To what change has the government actually committed itself? Absolutely none. The Prime Minister's decision means that we will remain in NATO and that at some indeterminate time there will be, possibly, some indeterminate reduction of Canada's forces in Europe. Surely this is not the kind of challenging, adventuresome policy the Prime Minister was talking about one year ago.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

As a matter of fact, the Prime Minister once again put the cart before the horse in his statement. When speaking in Calgary on April 12 he said that "it is a false perspective to have a military alliance determine your foreign policy." But this is precisely what the government is doing. While it professes to be waiting for a review of foreign policy it has committed itself to NATO and NORAD, thereby limiting its ability to deal effectively with its other obligations and opportunities in the field of foreign policy.

The Prime Minister has given us the usual list of vague generalities which are supposed to pass for a Liberal foreign policy. He has talked about nuclear imbalance, co-operation in settling international conflicts, an international peacekeeping force, arms limitation and foreign aid. These are precisely the goals set out by his predecessor six years ago. They are precisely the kinds of things Liberal spokesmen have been talking about for 20 years.

An hon. Member: What about Cyprus?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): But policies and programs so vaguely outlined in general terms have not been followed up. There has been no carry-through.

The Prime Minister said we must do the right things in the right places. Having committed himself now to NATO and to retaining Canadian troops in Europe, to what extent has he been limited and restricted? Has his ability to do the right thing in the right place not been restricted?

As the first N.D.P. spokesman this afternoon I propose to advance three basic propositions. First, Canada should withdraw all its military forces from Europe. Second, Canada should insist on a reassessment of NATO's role in world affairs. Third, Canada should place its major emphasis on promoting and strengthening those international organizations and agencies most likely to foster world peace and security. At the conclusion of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I propose to move a subamendment to inculcate the three basic propositions I now propose to argue.

First, I say that the time has come for a complete withdrawal of Canadian troops from Europe. It should be remembered that when Canada signed the NATO agreement in 1949 that did not impose any obligation on us whatsoever to maintain armed forces in Europe. As a matter of fact, not until the Korean War broke out in 1950 was the question of sending Canadian troops to Europe raised. Although we had signed the NATO agreement, our defence expenditures in 1950 were still in the neighbourhood of $300 million. They have now risen to about $1,800 million.

When Canadian forces were sent to Europe they were sent there to meet an emergency situation. No government spokesman suggested at that time that what was being done constituted a permanent obligation on the part of Canada to continue maintaining armed forces in Europe. There was a good argument for sending Canadian troops to Europe in 1950 and 1951. They were sent there to strengthen NATO ground forces, and their presence lent military support to NATO. That situation has altered radically in the last 20 years. I submit that what made sense in 1949 does not necessarily make sense today. In 1949 there was a great, monolithic Communist empire stretching throughout a great part of the world. Today that Communist monolith has been fragmented. There is a split between the Soviet Union and Mainland China. Eastern European satellites are no longer as responsive to Kremlin orders as they were at one time. Yugoslavia has broken away; Rumania and Czechoslovakia have been seeking closer ties with the west. There is greater demand on the part of eastern European countries for a détente than there was 20 years ago.

Some argue that the action of the Soviet Union last August shows that there is still a great threat of Communist aggression. I think the invasion of Czechoslovakia was not a sign of Russian strength but of Russian weakness. The fact that the Russians had to display their hand and the fact that they had to keep their satellite in line by the use of force indicates that this great structure of World Communism is no longer as united or monolithic as it once was.

It should also be remembered that western Europe is no longer prostrate and defenceless as it was 20 years ago. I visited Germany in 1945, in 1948 and again in 1951. I flew there with a group of parliamentarians. As a matter of fact, I visited Berlin during the blockade and the R.A.F. flew us in. Without doubt Germany at that time was open to any aggressor and there was a need to strengthen NATO forces in Europe. That concept made good sense and we supported it. Today West Germany is the third most powerful military nation in the world. As the Prime Minister himself admitted, the populations of the NATO countries in Europe number some 300 million people with an annual gross product of $500 billion. It is therefore farcical to say that one Canadian brigade and six Canadian fighter squadrons are essential for the safety of western Europe.

The fact that France, which has been invaded three times in the last 100 years, has withdrawn its troops from NATO command shows that the situation in Europe is not what it was 20 years ago. Canada is neither a European nation nor a great power. I feel that we are going along with NATO because of our ingrained habit of tagging along behind the United States or Great Britain, or both. We have developed this habit of paying our dues so that we can belong to the NATO club. I suggest these are expensive dues and the money could be used in more meaningful ways to promote peace and security throughout the world.

It should be remembered that conventional forces are far less important now than they were when NATO was formed. Nuclear missiles have now produced what Sir Winston Churchill called the balance of terror. The two great superpowers have the ultimate weapons of destruction. These will largely be the deciding factor in determining the future of mankind. In this nuclear confrontation the United States, as the leader of the western powers, has an advantage in strategic weapons of four to one and in tactical nuclear weapons of seven to one.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that every argument that has been put forward by the Prime Minister for a phased and planned reduction of our forces in Europe argues logically and rationally for a withdrawal of our forces from Europe. The Prime Minister himself has stated that we do not have a military but a political role. If we have no military role and mainly a political role, why then should we continue to maintain a force in Europe which is no longer required under the present circumstances? The money to support such a force might better be used in other fields of international affairs.

The second point I want to argue is that Canada should insist on a reassessment of NATO's role in world affairs. NATO has become solely a military alliance. From time to time gestures are made in the direction of Article II dealing with economic programs, but nothing is done. We have allowed NATO to be permeated almost exclusively by military thinking. The time has come to reassess its political role in bringing about a détente and military disengagement in Europe.

I suggest as far as NATO is concerned that we have developed a Maginot line complex. We have reached a stalemate in which the only solution is to pile up more arms and more military forces or to find some way out of the dilemma. It takes one back to the pre-1914 days when the triple entente and triple alliance faced each other in Europe, each building bigger and better battleships and each recruiting larger armies, always with the assurance to the public that the construction of more arms was the best guarantee that the arms would never be used. This is exactly what we are doing today. Our thinking has been completely dominated by those who are interested in preserving the kind of stalemate that provides jobs for generals and contracts for military armament manufacturers.

In the New Democratic party at our successive conventions we have supported retaining our membership in NATO in the hope that Canada might be able to exercise sufficient influence so that NATO would be used as the political vehicle by which a rapprochement might be affected between east and west in Europe. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I personally am becoming increasingly sceptical about the ability of NATO to fulfil this role. Recently they have turned a cold shoulder on the proposal for a conference made by the Warsaw Pact Countries at their meeting in Budapest last month. In answer to a question from my colleague, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Schreyer), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) said on Monday that the NATO powers had not really turned it down. The fact is, if one reads the record that, Pietro Nenni of Italy and Willy Brandt of Germany were sympathetic to it.

Mr. Sharp: They were at the meeting and concurred.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Exactly. They were sympathetic to the idea of a conference.

Mr. Sharp: So were we.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Others were not. We have yet to hear whether Canada was sympathetic or not. Let me point out what Canada agreed to and what was finally issued as part of the communiqué. They resolved:

> —to explore with the Soviet Union and the other countries of Eastern Europe which concrete issues best lend themselves to fruitful negotiation and an early resolution.

If that is not turning the cold shoulder on a forthright offer to hold a conference between the Warsaw Pact and NATO nations, I don't know what it is. Some will argue that the Warsaw Pact nations are just bluffing and are not sincere. That may be true, but the only way we will find out will be by going to the conference table. One has the strong suspicion that there are those who are not at all keen about going to the conference table. We will make no progress toward a settlement in Europe if we continue to accept the concept that the "enemy" must always be opposed and ignored because an ultimate military confrontation is inevitable. In my opinion, if we cannot get a reassessment by NATO of its role in the world, then I think Canada has to reconsider seriously whether its membership in NATO fulfils any useful purpose.

I believe NATO has lost sight of its basic political objectives, among which is a commitment by each signatory to strengthen and safeguard its democratic institutions. Has Greece been safeguarding its democratic institutions? Has Portugal, waging a colonial war in Angola, been safeguarding and strengthening democratic institutions? The council of ministers has been silent on this question. Our Secretary of State for External Affairs has been silent on this question. I believe the time has come when Canada must say to the NATO council of minister that if countries like Greece and Portugal are going to continue their policy of repressing democracy and freedom and are in NATO, we are out.

The third proposition I want to argue is that Canada should place its major emphasis on promoting and strengthening those international organizations and agencies most likely to foster world peace and security. Of course we must be concerned about our defence, but this must be part of our defence program and strategy. One has the uncomfortable feeling when the Prime Minister talks about Canada's defence that it is increasingly being integrated into the defence program of the United States, that we are now not only an economic colony of the United States but are rapidly becoming a military satellite of that country. This is in spite of the promise of the Liberal government last year given by the former prime minister and former secretary of state for external affairs that nothing would be done about renewing the NORAD agreement until this house had an opportunity to debate it. The present Prime Minister did renew NORAD and it has not been debated in the house. There has been no opportunity to debate it.

According to reports we are getting from Washington we are now being tied up with the airborne warning control system, about which we have been told nothing. The statements of Defence Secretary Laird indicate that consultation has been going on about the A.B.M. system, about which we have been told nothing. More and more we are being tied into the American military juggernaut.

The Bomarc missile bases, about which the Prime Minister railed in 1963 and bitterly criticized his predecessor, are still there. If the Prime Minister, instead of the glowing phrases that he used today about peace and security, wants to prove to this house that he is sincere, he will start by carrying out his own proposition that the nuclear Bomarc missiles be removed from Canadian soil.

I want to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that Canada's major contribution, in addition to its defence of its own territory, lies in two areas of international activity. The first is that we ought to take a much more active role in the work of the United Nations, because with all its structural weaknesses, its emergence as a world arbiter offers the only real hope for lasting peace and the rule of law in the world. Canada should assume an active role by joining with other middle powers in bringing conflicts to this world organization for resolution. We should have brought the question of Biafra to the United Nations long before this, and also the question of Viet Nam. We should be pressing the United Nations for the admission of Mainland China to that body.

I am glad the government is now going to try to seek diplomatic relations with Mainland China. It is going to be hard to recover the 20 years that the locusts have eaten and to explain to the Chinese why we opposed again and again their admission to the United Nations. We could prove our good faith by heading the forces in the United Nations that are seeking to give Mainland China the right to sit in that important body.

Of course we should always be ready to supply peacekeeping forces because we in Canada are in the position that our forces would be acceptable in many parts of the world, particularly in new, developing countries, whereas peacekeeping forces from some of the great powers with colonial backgrounds would not be acceptable. That is the kind of role Canada should be playing rather than trying to imitate some of the great military powers, which we do so poorly.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I think our second contribution in the realm of international affairs should be to help cope with the growing gap between the wealthy nations and the two-thirds of the world where people live in the direst poverty. The greatest threat to the peace of the world today lies in the widening disparity between the "have" nations and the "have-not" nations. The greatest threat to the peace of the world lies in the poverty, ignorance and disease which are all too prevalent in two-thirds of the world. Some of the billions of dollars spent on armaments over the last 20 years would have gone a long way to resolve this problem.

Today the Prime Minister almost brought tears to my eyes when he talked about the need to help the underdeveloped areas of the world. But talk is cheap. Paying lip service to helping the hungry people does not cost very much. People are judged by their deeds. By their fruits ye shall know them. That is how we judge men and that is how we will judge the government. The government pledged itself to increase its foreign aid to one per cent of our gross national product by 1970. Now that target has been pushed back until 1975. The government has not even spent the full amount appropriated by parliament each year to help underdeveloped areas.

As Mr. Escott Reid pointed out in an article recently, there are two deterrents in the world. One is a military deterrent to stop aggression and the other is a deterrent against anarchy by helping to feed the hungry, clothe the naked and lift up the fallen, but we spend six times as much on the military deterrent as we do on foreign aid. Mr. Escott Reid pleaded, and I share his views, that the time should come in Canada when our total deterrent costs ought to be in the neighbourhood of $3 billion. We ought to be able to reduce our military commitments to $1 billion and spend $2 billion on aid to help fight disease, ignorance and poverty wherever they are found throughout the world. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if anything stands out as one studies the history of mankind it is that in the long run bigger armaments and more power blocs do not lead to peace, that in the long run love is stronger than hate, that kindness is better than cruelty, that the outstretched hand will do more than the clenched fist. A country like Canada, bursting with food supplies, some of which we cannot get rid of, with our great productive capacity, with our technological know-how to help underdeveloped countries to help themselves, with a generation of young people who will go to the four corners of the earth to help people as teachers, doctors, nurses, farmers and artisans, could play a major role in helping to remove what in the final analysis is the basic cause of war, man's frustration arising out of his difficulties in trying to survive.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis):

That the amendment be amended by deleting all the words after the word "condemns" and by substituting therefor the following words:

"the failure of the government to announce the withdrawal of the Canadian forces from Europe, its failure to demand, as a condition of Canada's continuing membership in the Alliance, that NATO change its role from concentration on military measures to one of energetic pursuit of détente in Europe, and also its failure to propose a substantial reduction in defence expenditures and a large increase in assistance to developing nations."

• (4:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, an amendment moved by the Conservatives and a sub-amendment moved by the New Democratic party are now before the house.

The Conservatives are vigorously protesting against the shift from internationalism to isolationalism reflected in the statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on April 3 and 12.

However, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) forgot to make concrete proposals as to the part that Canada must play within NATO. The sub-amendment moved by the New Democratic party sets forth three reasons why the government is to blame. I quote:

—the withdrawal of the Canadian forces from Europe, its failure to demand, as a condition of Canada's continuing membership in the Alliance, that NATO change its role from concentration on military measures to one of energetic pursuit of détente in Europe, and also its failure to propose a substantial reduction in defence expenditures and a large increase in assistance to developing nations.

Mr. Speaker, we are not bringing in any amendment because we are prohibited from doing so under standing orders, but nevertheless we want to express our opinion on Canada's role within NATO since its inception in 1949.

A brief look at the history of NATO reveals immediately why it was instituted. In fact, the second world war lasted from 1939 to 1945, when the Russians were our allies. The allied forces won the war in June 1945.

When hostilities ended in Berlin and the Russians were not yet occupying that city, the Americans, the English and the Canadians were asked to postpone their triumphal entry into Berlin so that the Russians could take that part of the city which they are now occupying. This agreement was reached with the consent of all the countries that were members of the Alliance during the war.

However, following that memorable victory, the Russians wanted more than just a victory. They wanted to spread their economic theories, through international communism, in as many countries as possible. And this is when came the idea of uniting the North Atlantic countries into an alliance, which was to become NATO and of which Canada was to become a member, so as to ward off any possible attack from the Russians against any of the countries concerned, whether the United States, Canada or any other member country of the Alliance.

[English]

The North Atlantic Treaty signed in Washington on April 4, 1949 by the foreign ministers of Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Iceland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, the United Kingdom and the United States was ratified by the legislatures of the member countries within five months after signing. It came into force on August 24, 1949. Greece and Turkey joined the alliance on February 18, 1952 and the Federal Republic of Germany on May 9, 1955.

[Translation]

On May 9, 1955, that is about six years after the formation of NATO, the Federal Republic of Germany, where our forces are stationed at the present time, became a member of NATO.

Mr. Speaker, the avowed aims of the Organization, when it was created, were the following, and I quote:

[English]

In summary, the parties agreed to settle international disputes by peaceful means, to refrain from the threat or use of force "in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations"—

[Translation]

Now, at the time of the foundation of that Organization, the U.S.S.R. strongly opposed the initiative and exerted all possible pressures to disrupt it, but this could only strengthen its hope of winning over some countries signatories to the agreement.

Mr. Speaker, now, in 1969, the U.S.S.R. seems to be reaching its goal, by means of trade agreements or as a result of the attitude of the member states, and it is succeeding, little by little, in getting various countries to withdraw their forces.

For instance, France, which is directly involved, as a neighbour of West Germany, where the troops are stationed, has withdrawn its own forces. It remains a member of NATO, but has almost no men outside its territory.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that Canada, at the present time, is facing a stalemate. We are asked to withdraw our troops from Germany in order to meet the wish of the U.S.S.R.

• (4:50 p.m.)

On the other hand, the United States contend that forces must be kept in West Germany, in case of aggression. The core of the problem lies in the fact that several European countries are afraid to see the reunification of Germany.

We were told that in Russia, in 1964, when a Canadian parliamentary delegation had accepted an invitation from the Kremlin. They have a deadly fear of the reunification of Germany. France feels the same way.

In Canada, we do not know what to think about our role in NATO. As the leader of the New Democratic party, Mr. Douglas, was saying a moment ago, the Prime Minister tells us: perhaps we will withdraw our forces, and again perhaps we will not withdraw them.

Mr. Lewis: Reduce our forces.

Mr. Caouette: Reduce them, but eventually withdraw them. That is the objective that the government is trying to achieve.

Mr. Lewis: No.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, they want to reduce our forces, but in what sense? The Leader of the Opposition, I believe, asked whether we were to withdraw 12 men from our NATO force.

Mr. Speaker, one thing is sure: Russia wants us to reduce our forces as much as possible and the United States are against it. That is the situation where the Canadian government finds itself.

The Prime Minister does not want to displease anybody, therefore, he says today that we will do something, that we should adapt ourselves to present conditions; that our foreign policy should no longer be directed by our military policy, but vice-versa.

In the past, the army brass used to tell departments, the government, how they should act, and the government obediently followed those suggestions and dictates.

Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister just said, we must revise our policy of participation in NATO. The Prime Minister tells us that from now on the objectives of Canada must be peace and justice in the world.

I for one wonder whether we really need to keep forces in Germany and in all NATO's member countries in Europe. I know that some countries wish their troops to remain over there. They are not interested in bringing them home. In Germany, our soldiers are actually on vacation, which costs a great deal of money to Canadian taxpayers.

I know why those soldiers do not want to come back to Canada. They are wondering what will happen to them here. "Will we become veterans? Will we have to learn a new trade? We have been in the army for the last 10, 12 or perhaps 20 years, and we have been living in Europe for five years. What are we going to do back in Canada?" Those are question they are asking themselves.

There is one fact, however, and that is that once they are back in Canada, we shall not be able to throw them on the street. We shall have to continue to pay them. As far as the Department of Defence is concerned, it will not be able to save a cent. However, the Prime Minister will be able to say that we have reduced our forces overseas.

Canada alone could not, even with its armaments and its forces overseas, maintain peace in case of aggression. With their pea-shooters and their sling-shots, I do not think that our forces are very efficient. In my opinion, peace and justice are commendable purposes, but before preaching them up to the world, we should see to it that they prevail in our own country, and set an example for the rest of the world.

U.S.S.R. is not seeking to gain ground by means of weapons, but rather by its ideology. When we visited Russia, we saw a subway being constructed, but the Soviet government did not have, to carry out its projects, to appeal to the Washington market for funds.

We also visited house building projects, but we did not hear the minister say that there was no money for housing. Work or tools are not provided to build houses, because the subway, the transportation system, in short, everything belongs to the government.

We are against such a government control and we wonder why, in a world which we consider as free and developed, which has huge opportunities and unparalleled resources, we could not do, with all our freedom, what the Soviets are able to do, despite their communist ideology.

Let us station as many soldiers as we want in western Germany, let us go to Europe with the 20 million Canadians to safeguard peace in case of aggression, and let us kill, if it suits us, as many Communists as we can, we will realize that it is not with guns, cannons or shells that we will destroy the communist ideal.

We can check the rise of communism in the world by fighting it, not with weapons, or boxers, or soldiers, but with a superior idea, a philosophy of life which will allow the human being to develop normally. Only then, Mr. Speaker, will we be able to fight international or national communism effectively.

We make feeble attempts to establish peace and justice in the world, but we cannot even manage that here in Canada. There is talk of withdrawing our troops from NATO. What good will that do? We actually spend more than $1.5 billion for national defence. We build war installations which may never be used, at the rate technological changes are happening. That is why I spoke of peashooters a while ago.

Mr. Speaker, of course everybody wants peace and justice, but we will get it only if we take the steps capable of helping us reach those objectives.

We have been a member of NATO for 20 years, and for 10 years there has been talk of a review of our commitment to this organization. And now the Prime minister tells us that we must review our positions, so that NATO will serve for purposes other than military.

A while ago, I heard the leader of the NDP say that we should help the low income people first, in order to fight subversion or economic policies that do not respect the rights of the individual. That is what we should do. However, we have to think first about ourselves.

I just got back from western Canada. The farmers there are in a terrible situation. Several members are unaware of what is going on there. One may see, in some farms, that last year's crop is rotting after remaining all winter under snow, because it could not be stored. Those farmers will never be able to see their wheat. Right now, they have to obtain substantial loans from chartered banks, credit unions, credit co-ops and finance companies, in order to start their spring sowing. They should have another crop next fall and there is still no possibility in sight of selling last year's production.

Mr. Speaker, I agree that there are underdevelopped countries, but the situation in Canada is far from perfect, and the government does not seem to care. It aknowledges the situation and says it is unfortunate.

The Prime Minister, who tells us we should strive to establish peace and justice in the world, went to western Canada some ten days ago and told the farmers: If you have wheat, get out and sell it. Sell it yourselves. That is the domestic policy of this government.

However, we should call the attention of the Canadian people to the underprivileged of this world. Let us withdraw our troops from NATO, totally or partially. Let us reduce our forces and become the promoters of peace and justice all over the world. Mr. Speaker, there are fine promoters for you!

This morning we read in a paper that four million Canadians are underfed at present! They represent 20 per cent of the population of a rich country, teeming with all kinds of things, and the Prime Minister wants us to be the promoters of peace and justice in the world.

Mr. Speaker, there is an inconsistency somewhere. There is a lack of responsibility, of sincerity and of frankness. International problems are discussed in order to divert the attention of the needy in Canada.

Let us reduce our forcees to save money! The Prime Minister is fully aware that no savings will be made. However, we are allowed to help under-developped countries.

Mr. Speaker, we have also heard what our responsible government should have done in connection with Biafra, South Africa, the recognition of Red China, etc.

Mr. Speaker, of course we should contribute to and participate in the establishment in the world of a system enabling every human being to live a full life. However, we should establish that system in our own country, thus setting an eaxmple for other countries. Above all, let us not abandon our people in trying to set an example for others, because that would not be fair.

We hear all kinds of complaints in this house. All hon. members have good intentions. Those of the Prime Minister are excellent. However, Mr. Speaker, hell is paved with good intentions. That does not solve the problem but the implementation of efficient measures would. With a specific program and our good will, we could solve the problems.

When the New Democratic party demands that Canadian forces be withdrawn from Europe, we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, agree with it, because we are in favour of withdrawing Canadian forces from wherever they are. If we do not have the money to enable our people to live, then we do not have any either to keep in foreign countries people who do not build anything.

First of all, if we had an economic system guaranteeing security and freedom to everyone, then the threat of war would disappear, understanding would prevail as well as cooperation between individuals; fraternizing between human beings would be made easier than when shortages are allowed to exist throughout the world.

We are in favour of helping needy countries such as India, Turkey, Greece, Iran, which could benefit from our help, but we must not, for all that, neglect our own citizens.

An old proverb says: Charity begins at home. We should therefore start with ourselves, not through selfishness, no, but to set an example for the others. Other countries must be helped, not only by giving them goods but by going over to show them how to do things, as Canadians do.

Yet, even here in Canada, we have any number of Canadians who know how to do many things, but who are not able to do them. Our unemployed, for instance, do not ask to live on unemployment insurance or on welfare.

When you consider that in Montreal alone you have 80,000 unemployed, and 30,000 or 35,000 families on social welfare, it seems as if it were high time to correct the situation. We should change living conditions while wishing the same for other peoples.

As for the Russians, as I said earlier, they do not so much try to win with the help of their guns than through their marxist philosophy.

NATO

To counteract this philosophy, we must have one of our own which should be extremely clear and able to ensure the freedom of the individual. That is what the Ralliement Créditiste has been putting forward in Canada, for the past 30 or 35 years but government and businessmen alike laugh at us when we ask that the public sector of our economy be financed through the Bank of Canada, without interest, as we finance other countries. Businessmen simply laugh at us for they would not make any profit out of that.

Those businessmen, however, are the same who control the economy of all the so-called free countries because all of them, without any exception, come and drink from the financial wealth of Washington.

A year ago, France, a member of NATO and economically, the strongest country in the world, was obliged by her great "General" to bow the knee to the World Bank, in other to salvage the franc.

This year, it was Western Germany that was supposed to be, economically speaking, the strongest country in the world, for businessmen had so decided. If, next year, the same businessmen decide to bring Western Germany down on her knees in front of the same powers, she will be declared an outcast and her monetary system will be on the rocks as was that of France a few months ago.

England has been through that, kneeling to ten finance controllers, to borrow $3 billion. And all those countries are members of NATO.

And there is only bickering and squabbling and destitution more than ever. Why? It is very simple. It is because our system is a debt system. When we borrow $1,000, we have to pay back $2,000, which is practically a mathematical impossibility.

I gave previously the official figures concerning the cost of the famous Jacques-Cartier bridge in Montreal. The original cost was $18 million; the interest has reached to date $20 million and we still owe $14 million on that bridge. Such a system discourages enterprise, discourages a country and drowns it in unpayable debts.

Our position in Canada is not much better. We benefit by the nearness of the United States, but we come under their direct influence. When a crisis develops in the United States, Canada feels its after-effects. If there is an economic boom there, there is also one in this country. If a war breaks out, we are also in it. If we withdraw troops, the United States say no.

But agreements of some kind are reached, perhaps for diplomatic reasons, under which Canada is asked to serve as a go-between, for instance between Communist China and the United States or between the U.S.S.R. and the United States. That is what is going to happen and it seems that hon. members do not realize it.

The Prime Minister knows very well why he is advocating his present participation policy towards peace and justice in the world.

Mr. Speaker, we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, feel that too much money is spent on armaments. One and a half billion a year is too much. Parasites benefit from these expenditures, contractors and financial party backers in particular. The government is aware of the situation while the citizens should be served and respected by parliament.

Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister wants to withdraw some of our troops from Germany, it is not for the same reasons. If he does not want to offend Russia and at the same time not to offend the United States too much, he should agree to our proposal and use available funds for the economic development of our country, to provide our people with security along with personal freedom.

However, we do not want security at the expense of freedom. We do not want the freedom of the individual to be dependent upon the good will of the state. We consider the individual as the most important element in a well organized economy. We maintain that a government must serve the individual and not enslave him and that all available resources must be used in the interest of the human beings and not for destruction purposes.

This is why we do not object to a reduction in our military establishments but we regret that the Prime Minister and the government take no concrete action to establish in Canada a system which would show the whole world, including Russia and Communist China, that men fully free—and not slaves of finance companies—can fight efficiently those who would like to hamper the freedom of the world.

The individual is the most important factor in a society. Let us legislate on the basis of the individual and Canada not only will have set an example but will also have provided the social, economic and political balance of the Canadian nation.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Mr. Ian Wahn (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, the subject raised by this resolution is not a subject on which to be partisan or deliberately controversial. Nevertheless, I should observe that if we have any difficulty answering the criticisms of members of the opposition it is simply because the criticisms are contradictory. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) declared that we were making a fundamental and disastrous change in our defence and foreign policies. The Leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas), on the other hand, complained bitterly because we were making no change at all. As is usually the case, the truth probably lies somewhere between these two extremes; in other words, our policy is probably just about right, and that naturally annoys members of the opposition.

The right hon. Leader of the Opposition, to loud cheers from his supporters, also claimed that he was very confused. With that I think we can all agree. But in order to lessen his confusion perhaps we should try to avoid oratorical flourishes and instead examine the problem before us quietly and rationally.

It is entirely right that Canada should review its NATO obligations and decide its future military role at this particular time. Canada was one of the founders of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization over 20 years ago. At that time western Europe was poor and weak. Its economy had been disrupted by war and it possessed very little effective military strength. The western European countries lived in fear of Soviet aggression and had no effective defence against it. Military and financial help from North America was essential. Through NATO it was made available in generous measure, and the fear of aggression from the east was removed. Since that time, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said, the western European countries have made a remarkable recovery, until today they rival the Soviet Union and its allies in the Warsaw Pact not only in population but in wealth, productivity and potential power.

Mr. Thompson: Everything except military strength.

Mr. Wahn: It is important to realize that the North Atlantic Treaty did not impose any specific military obligations on its members. Its members agreed that aggression against one was to be considered aggression against all, but the type and amount of assistance to be rendered were left entirely to the discretion of each member state. In time, however, a joint command was established and member countries in effect put their national forces under this joint command.

At the present time, as hon. members know, Canada has its first air division of about 4,000 men stationed in south Germany and its mechanized infantry brigade of about 6,000 men in north Germany. In addition, certain maritime and ground forces in Canada are allocated to NATO.

The North Atlantic Treaty was binding for 20 years, after which any member could withdraw on one year's notice. The 20-year period expires in August this year, so this is indeed an appropriate time to review our NATO commitment.

As hon. members know, the House of Commons Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence presented its report to this house on March 26. This followed extensive hearings in Canada and a two-week tour of the countries of western Europe. It is fair to say that in the course of this review it became clear that for every argument in favour of continuing our NATO commitments there was a counter argument, and vice-versa. Many of these arguments involved intangibles which are very difficult to assess. It is a subject on which the opinions of honest and sincere men may and do differ greatly.

Briefly, the committee report recommended that Canada continue its present NATO commitments until the mid-1970's when the main items of equipment for our air division and our mechanized brigade would require replacement.

However, the report specifically recognized the vital importance of making decisions with regard to future roles in NATO. Moreover, these decisions must be made promptly because of the time required to negotiate changes with our allies, to acquire new equipment, and to retrain our forces. However, the committee decided not to make specific recommendations on this subject until it could obtain more information with regard to alternative roles.

The cabinet's decision to remain in NATO but to make a planned reduction in our European forces went one step farther. With the air division in south Germany, in effect under U.S. command, the mechanized infantry brigade in north Germany, in effect under British command, and with neither of these two Canadian forces being related to each other or to anything we are doing in Canada, members of the committee had doubts about the continued value of these roles. But the committee said in effect: We want more evidence before we make recommendations as to new military roles. The cabinet, which had been working on the problem for many months before the committee commenced its work, said in effect: We have sufficient evidence to satisfy us that our present roles in Europe are not right; our forces in Europe must be reduced, but we will work out the necessary changes, which will be phase two, in consultation with our allies. Personally, I welcome that decision and I think it is right.

This decision marks a vital change in Canada's defence and foreign policy. The Prime Minister declared emphatically that Canada's defence roles must depend upon Canada's foreign policy, upon the foreign policy of this country, not upon the foreign policy of the United Kingdom, the United States or any other country.

I think it is the failure of the Leader of the Opposition to understand the significance of this statement which has led to a great deal of his confusion with regard to the statement made by the Prime Minister and by members of the cabinet. In the past we have not always placed as high a priority on our own interests as we should have done. In the past Canada's foreign policy has too often been a policy of dependency. For years Canada relied upon the British fleet for its protection and Canada's foreign policy was determined by Great Britain. More recently Canada has depended upon the American nuclear deterrent and our foreign policy has been determined largely by the United States.

I choose to construe the Prime Minister's announcement, therefore, as a declaration of independence, a declaration that in the future Canada will have a more independent and self-reliant foreign policy than in the past. The Leader of the Opposition obviously wishes to continue the policy of dependency to which I have referred—dependency upon the United Kingdom, the United States or other countries. He argued in favour of dependency by condemning what we want to do as being a policy of isolationism. We reject this. We do want an independent foreign policy but we do not consider that this involves a policy of isolationism.

Adoption of an independent foreign policy has many consequences. First and most important, it involves the acceptance of the principle that Canada's independence, not just political independence but economic independence as well, is not negotiable. Here we must think particularly of our American neighbour. In all our relations with the United States it must be made entirely clear that, while we are willing and anxious to enter into co-operative arrangements in many fields, these arrangements must be on terms which will preserve our sovereignty and basic independence and leave us free to make our own decisions.

I repeat that such an independent policy is not a policy of isolation. It recognizes that our most basic requirement is peace and that peace must be based on collective security. Specifically, it recognizes our continued interest in relations with western Europe and the Atlantic area. But it emphasizes, too, that we are also a Pacific power and have a vital interest in developing relations with the countries in the Pacific area. It recognizes that we have vast resources in the north and in the Arctic area to protect and develop and vital interests in the vast, rich, continental shelf extending many miles from our shores. It also recognizes that while regional alliances such as NATO may continue to be necessary for many years, they are not enough, and that Canada's vital interest in the maintenance of peace can only be achieved through the continued evolution and strengthening of a world organization such as the United Nations.

Some of the military consequences of the adoption of this independent foreign policy are now being worked out by the cabinet. One can only speculate as to the result of this review. However, it is possible that it may lead to a decision to emphasize a multi-purpose mobile force based in Canada which would be available for Canada's own needs, in protecting its own territories and coastal waters, in assisting its allies, and for United Nations peacekeeping operations.

The Prime Minister has been careful not to promise that the changes would result in cutting military forces or expenditures. However, if a multi-purpose force were adopted, such a decision could conceivably lead over a period of years to a substantial reduction in our armed forces and a similar reduction in our military expenditures. This would be a target worth shooting for. Certainly, if we do not reduce troop strength, military expenditures will increase rapidly simply because of the ever-increasing cost of equipment and services.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, our military expenditures amounted to approximately $1.8 billion. In the war years our annual average expenditure was $1.5 billion. I realize that today the dollar is worth less than two-thirds as much as it was during the war. Nevertheless, I was surprised to find that last year, in peacetime, our military budget was almost as high as our average military budget during the last great war, and I would hope it can be reduced very substantially if our forces are reorganized along the lines I have suggested.

As I have said, I interpret the Prime Minister's declaration as being a declaration of independence in foreign policy, a statement that henceforth we shall determine our foreign policy, in consultation with our allies and friends, basically in the light of our own national interests. The time has passed when we could rely on other countries to make these decisions for us. In future we must make our own decisions. Our policies may sometimes be right; they may sometimes be wrong. But the important thing, to my mind, is that they will be made in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I must say I was surprised that the previous speaker, like the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), should have followed the line of making some unflattering observations concerning the conduct of our foreign policy by the former prime minister and, indeed, by the former secretary of state for external affairs. However, I suppose these are matters of opinion.

I believe there is one thing upon which we all agree, namely, that peace in the world is the object and purpose of our foreign policy, first, in order that we may develop our own great resources and, second, because Canadians are morally opposed to the use of war to solve world problems. Another consideration, and perhaps the most important of all, is that we should all be destroyed in the event of a nuclear war breaking out between the two great powers in the world today, the Soviet Union and the United States.

One should be cautious, however, about assuming that all other nations share these foreign policy objectives or act from the same motives. I would point out that the Soviet Union has seized by force some 13 of its neighbours since 1939. We should not make the mistake of assuming that because we favour peace in the world everybody else does. This is certainly not the case. The difference of opinion which exists in this country seems to arise as to the way in which Canada can best achieve its objective, namely, world peace. In this regard, Canada can follow policies of a long range, short range or medium term nature. Those who offer opinions on foreign policy sometimes tend to make no distinction between the short and the long run; I believe it is essential to make such a distinction. Our policies, long or short run, have always been carried out in concert with others. It is often said that Canada has four cornerstones of foreign policy—our relations with the United Nations, our relations with the Commonwealth, our special relationship with the United States, and our membership in NATO. Of course, we also co-operate in maintaining world stability through other bodies such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

I agree, of course with the proposition of an old friend and former colleague, Mr. Escott Reid. About one year ago he enunciated a well known proposition, namely, that the two major problems facing us for the remainder of the century will probably be the development of the underdeveloped part of the world and the prevention of starvation and poverty in that underdeveloped part of the world, and the normalization of relations between the People's Republic of China and the so-called western world. I agree with Mr. Reid and with many others who hold this viewpoint. These policies are essentially long-run policies, as it were. They are essential, and there is little argument about that. But no one will say that long-term policies like these are necessarily in conflict with what may be very essential short-term policies. The two are not mutually exclusive; they are complementary.

Without doubt the immediate short-term policy we must follow is that of preventing immediate conflicts in the world. There have always been conflicts and threats of conflicts in the world around us. We have a very upset sort of world where force has become more and more important in the settling of disputes. We find this attitude reflected in our own country where people accept violence as a means of solving problems. I am sorry to say that in some cases people belonging to a generation younger than my own have promoted violence, although sometimes the idea of violence is promoted by people belonging to the older generation who have no good in mind.

To return to the subject of whether conflicts are likely to take place, we must remember that we face the possibility of conflict today in the Middle East. Many such potential conflicts could escalate into world war III. In the last few years Canada has done much more than her share in trying to contain those conflicts, some of which might be called bush-fire wars. Of course, many of them are larger than that. Probably we would have continued to carry out this duty in the Near East if our troops had not been dismissed a few years ago by Colonel Nasser. I also refer to the Congo, and to our present role in Cyprus. We have done a great deal to contain these smaller wars, some of which might have escalated into world war III if they had not been contained.

I agree with hon. members on the other side of the house who say that we should continue with this sort of work. I think it is very valuable. However, the one and only major threat to Canada at present is the threat of conflict between the Soviet Union and the United States of America. I am referring, of course, to a conflict that escalates into nuclear war. The reasons for my statement are too obvious, and I need not elaborate on them. We are the "ham in the sandwich". We are between the two major powers and if nuclear war were to break out there is no doubt that Canada as we know it would be destroyed. There is little argument about that. The immediate objective of our foreign policy should be to do everything we can to prevent this kind of war from taking place. This is not a long-run objective. This is an immediate, short-run, essential matter we must attend to now. We should do everything we can to prevent such a war. I do not say that we must not allow for some kind of defence of our "sovereignty" but, frankly, I do not know against whom we are to defend ourselves. The Prime Minister did not mention that. But if nuclear war were to break out between the major powers any number of troops we would muster would be of very little use indeed.

We must try to use our influence to prevent such a war from taking place. Can this be done by diplomacy alone, Mr. Speaker? I do not think so. We are not big enough nor powerful enough by ourselves to force a détente between the two giants. Only by acting with others can we exert any influence we may have.

Some say that perhaps we should let the United States defend us and then we could use our resources for some long-range projects such as those suggested by Mr. Reid. They refer to the increased development of the underdeveloped part of the world or the "third world", as some call it. We could do this and I suppose some say it would be much better if we did. But it has been suggested by some, and I agree with them, that if we did that sort of thing we would lose a great deal of our influence in the third world. We would very likely come to be regarded as a military province of the United States. Our money would be none too welcome because some might think strings were attached to it—strings going all the way back to Washington. If we offered any troops for peacekeeping purposes they would be regarded with suspicion. If we were to follow this policy our excellent record in peacekeeping would not be maintained.

Also, Mr. Speaker, most Canadians object to the idea of a free ride. Most Canadians have ethics. I think most Canadians—I did not say all—feel that we ought to carry our weight and that we ought to carry our part of the load in the matter of defence.

Where in the world is a conflict now, or in the immediate future likely to break out between the Soviet Union and the United States? There is the Near East of course; that is a distinct possibility. But the greatest danger is in Europe. The greatest danger spot is Germany. This is where vital spheres of influence of the United States and the Soviet Union overlap. Here is the place where in future as in the past we must contribute to peacekeeping operations. There is no doubt in the world that that is the most important peacekeeping operation. NATO, Mr. Speaker, is the world's most important peacekeeping operation today. I think it is generally agreed that NATO for the past 20 years has kept the peace by preventing Soviet expansion. But is this now necessary? Even the Prime Minister says yes by implication.

From 1963 to 1968 nearly everyone thought the Soviet Union had given up force as a means of obtaining her political objectives. However, Czechoslovakia proved them wrong. The motives of the Soviet Union are different from our motives. I referred to this before. We must not make the mistake of thinking that their motives are the same as ours. At present the Soviet Union is greatly increasing her conventional military capability. It is my understanding that at present the Soviet Union has nearly three times the number of tanks that NATO has in central Europe, as well as larger numbers of aircraft and considerably greater numbers of men. If the military principle of having a ratio in forces of two and a half to one is followed, it is clear that the Soviet forces are equipped not for defence. If they are not equipped for defence what is their purpose, particularly if they consist of large conventional forces equipped with increasing numbers of conventional weapons?

We are not told that existing NATO forces are capable of holding a Soviet thrust in Germany or Denmark. It is generally thought that neither side wants to start a nuclear war. It is hoped at the present that if the Soviet Union starts some misguided military adventure, Soviet forces can be held up until negotiations start. Of course, we know that the danger areas are Berlin or the Baltic.

It appears that President Nixon is not making a determined effort to settle political problems in Europe with the Soviet Union. If this works it is thought that troops can be reduced on both sides. But until this is done NATO forces must be kept at least at present levels. All NATO countries, and also Sweden, think NATO should continue. Bearing that in mind we must ask, is Canada's continued presence in NATO the best way or a good way even of carrying out our objective of doing what we can to prevent a war between the Soviet Union and the United States? First of all, it is futile to stay in NATO without supplying troops to NATO. It is like the old rhyme:

> Mother, may I go out to swim?
> Yes, my darling daughter.
> Hang your clothes on a hickory limb,
> But don't go near the water.

I do not think anyone will pay much attention to us unless we supply troops to NATO. Conversely, if we do not supply troops we will not wield much influence. Who pays attention to those giving gratuitous advice? Who will pay attention to us if we will not put our money where our mouth is? If we want to exert much influence in NATO we must at least keep up our present troop strength. After all, our NATO forces constitute only 10 per cent of our total armed strength. We are said to have about 100,000 men in our armed forces. Only Denmark spends a smaller percentage of her gross national product on defence than does Canada. She spends 2.6 per cent and we spend 2.7 per cent of our G.N.P. on defence.

We can exert influence because of our membership in NATO. We would not be a member of the 18-nation disarmament commission of the United Nations if we were not a NATO member. If we want to have any influence on the terms of any détente which the United States is trying to work out with Russia, we will not do it by withdrawing our troops. I have had some slight association with the Russians. You cannot deal with the Soviet Union from weakness. This is something they do not understand.

Canadians are well thought of and reliable. Our opinion is highly regarded abroad. The influence we can exert in NATO would be highly respected. If we reduce our forces in NATO there is a great danger they will be replaced by German forces. The Germans make no secret of this. We are told the Soviet Union would be greatly alarmed by even a moderate German rearmament. This might provoke the Soviet Union into some misguided military venture. We do not want to be responsible for increasing the dangers of war.

A troop reduction at the present time could be infectious. Other countries may decide to do the same thing. This would play into Soviet hands. The Soviets are trying to hold up NATO as some kind of a force run by the United States and Germany.

Finally, if we are to have military forces, where can 10 per cent of them be better employed than by peace-keeping at the principal friction point between the only two great powers at present? A war between them could destroy Canada. We can well use 85 per cent of our other forces for U.N. peacekeeping and protecting the Arctic, against whom I am not sure, and other places.

We have heard a lot of vague generalities murky thinking, and platitudes from the Prime Minister and other government spokesmen. We have not yet heard any real reason why we should reduce our forces at present in NATO.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate has agreed to the amendment made by the House of Commons to Bill S-28, an act to amend the Co-operative Credit Association Act, without any amendment.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

MOTION FOR APPROVAL OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Trudeau:

That this house supports the government's policy of continued Canadian participation in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the intention of the government, in consultation with Canada's allies, to take early steps to bring about a planned and phased reduction of the size of Canadian forces in Europe.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, like several others who have taken part or will take part in this debate, I have returned from a visit to Europe by the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. I would like to preface my contribution by stating that wherever we went we were assured that Canadian forces, whether on NATO assignments or on peacekeeping roles, were a great credit to Canada. I want to make it clear that although I propose a radically altered role for the Canadian forces, I believe that the Canadian armed services can make, properly directed, a decisively important contribution to the security of Canada and the world.

The basic problem of defence is to use the available resources to make the maximum contribution to the security of Canada and of the world. The security of Canada is tied up with the security of the world; it cannot be separated from it. We cannot buy security by piling up forces in a continental North American fortress if there is chaos and insecurity in the rest of the world.

It is our complaint that the government's current policy, so far as one can guess at it from the statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) elsewhere and in this debate, is directed at the wrong threats and therefore adopts the wrong priorities. The greatest threat to the world today does not lie in a likelihood of a massive nuclear attack on North America, or indeed of any sort of military attack on North America. With the massive invulnerable power of nuclear retaliation possessed by the United States, any such attack would be madness. To attribute madness to potential opponents is itself folly, which leads inevitably to colossal waste. Nor is the threat of an all-out attack by Soviet forces in Europe any longer a major threat. To concentrate a large part of our military resources in Europe would be a misdirection of effort, a slavery to mental attitudes appropriate to the past when western Europe may have lain open to possible attack.

Today the allied forces have 7,000 tactical nuclear weapons, a small fraction of which could devastate all of Europe. It is estimated that the Soviets have at least 1,000 such weapons. Any attack which might trigger a tactical nuclear exchange, let alone escalation to the use of strategical nuclear weapons, would again be madness. But in the rest of the world the instability caused by the gap between the rising expectation of newly independent people and their actual crushing poverty has caused conflicts and will cause more. The real danger lies in the fact that these conflicts may spread. It is not in Europe but in Asia that the tragic Viet Nam war has sapped the strength and strained the resources of the world's richest and most powerful country. It is in Africa that today an almost forgotten war goes on in which millions are threatened with extinction. Many conflicts in these areas are made additionally grave by racial hatreds.

Priority should therefore be directed to building a world community by putting the emphasis on the United Nations. This is low in the priorities of the Prime Minister but it has top priority with this party. In our view priority should be given to maintaining a highly mobile force, available for peacekeeping duties assigned by the United Nations. I know it is fashionable at the present time to downgrade the opportunities of such forces. In my judgment ample opportunities for valuable contribution in this field will inevitably recur. A mobile conventional contribution would be the most useful contribution that Canada could possibly make in Europe.

However, the major thrust of my remarks today is to make a plea to the government to clarify its stand on the proposal of the U.S.A. to deploy the A.B.M. system. This is primarily, of course, a United States decision. It is nevertheless one of vital importance to the world as a whole. Canada, as an ally, surely has the right to be heard in the debate which is going on in the United States and upon which so much depends. I would urge the government to make it clear that Canada wishes no part under NORAD or otherwise in such an A.B.M. system.

[Mr. Brewin.]

My reason for this is not because I do not believe that Canada should not be willing to contribute to United States security as part of the security of North America. It is rather because of my conviction that the proposed system contributes absolutely nothing to the security of North America or the world. Precisely the reverse is the case. It is my submission that the proposed A.B.M. system, whether in its thin or heavy form, as the jargon goes, whether a Sentinel system as proposed by the Johnson administration or the modified Safeguard system as proposed by the Nixon administration, represents a new step in what Mr. MacNamara described as "the mad momentum intrinsic to the development of all new nuclear weaponry."

What, briefly, is the nature of this proposed system? I will confine myself to the modified Safeguard system. It is estimated to cost between $6 billion and $7 billion. It is designed to protect the land-based retaliatory forces of the U.S.A. against a direct Soviet attack, to provide area defence to the United States against possible Chinese attack, and to protect against accidental launchings.

Phase one—they have phases in their American jargon dealing with these matters—will cover two large missile sites located in Montana and North Dakota. These are expected to be completed, if approved by Congress, in 1973. These bases will consist of 400 to 600 long-range Spartan missiles and short-range Spring defensive missiles.

There are a number of reasons why this system should be regarded as a colossal waste of money. The first is the question of whether it can be effective to protect either the American strategic missile sites or, second, American cities and the American population against nuclear attack.

It should be emphasized that neither President Nixon nor anyone else has ever suggested that the system, no matter how much it is expanded, can possibly afford any protection to cities or population against a Soviet attack. So far as protection of the missile sites is concerned, the fact is that the American offensive deterrent is so massive and so dispersed that it needs no such protection, and aside from the two Minutemen bases which contain 350 missiles will not receive any such protection.

The American strategic deterrent—and I am sure the Minister of National Defence

(Mr. Cadieux) can confirm this—is composed of 646 Polaris and Poseidon missiles on submarines and long-range bombers. These, combined with over 1,000 Minutemen I.C.B.M. and thousands of shorter range missiles in Europe and elsewhere, provide an arsenal of deterrents which gains nothing of significance from the proposed A.B.M. system.

Perhaps it is not necessary here to discuss the cost of the proposed system. The Americans may think they can afford billions of dollars for this purpose, though I doubt it, but that is their business. Opponents of the system have pointed out the inevitable tendency of such programs to expand. The thin system is a compromise and no more. It is almost certainly not the last word. They could go on to expand the system until, as reasonable opponents of the proposal have said, the cost could go up to $70 billion. The system will have the effect of aggravating the arms race and making it difficult to bring the non-proliferation treaty into effect.

I suggest that what is desperately needed is an effort not only to prevent proliferation to other countries not now possessing nuclear weapons but also to cut down the existing stockpiles of destructive weapons, and here I mention the development of multiple re-entry vehicles and other new and horrendous methods of destruction which are being vastly expanded at the present time. We in Canada have approved, as has the United States, a non-proliferation treaty. This pledges us to take measures toward the cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date. I say that this proposed A.B.M. system would be contrary to the intent and the spirit of that treaty.

The pretence is that the system has been designed to defend against a Chinese nuclear attack. That is still given as part of the rationale for its deployment, but even Senator Russell of the United States has said that there is nothing in this argument and that "the Chinese are not," as he says, "completely crazy." To base the system on defence against China, as being necessary against China, is not only unreal but is a contribution to that attitude of mind which perpetuates the isolation of the Chinese people to the great danger of the world as a whole.

It may be said that none of these arguments has any weight if the A.B.M. system can make a contribution to the national security of the United States or the continental security of North America. The answer is that the system would probably make it less secure. Escalation of the arms race would result. There would be bound to be over-response on the part of the U.S.S.R. if past history is any guide, and at the end of colossal expenditures and vast and staggering costs there would be no real gain in security.

Why, then, does the American government plan to proceed with this expensive and probably useless system? I think that James Reston and other distinguished Americans have given us the clue. He has said that the anti-ballistic missile is really aimed not at all at the Chinese but at the military-industrial complex and its Congressional spokesmen. The decision made is a political compromise. Such a charge is difficult to prove, but it has been made by responsible Americans. Surely Canada can take an independent line on the basis of the merits of the matter. What is the use of talking about independence if we do not have independence of mind, if we are going to be dragged into systems of this sort for no good reason but simply as part of the on-going mad momentum of which Mr. McNamara has spoken?

I have not got time, Mr. Speaker, to go into the NORAD situation in full. But I call on the Minister of National Defence, if he is to take part in this debate, to give us an assurance that we will not proceed with vast new systems, such as AWACS, or the replenishment of systems of interceptors probably against non-existent threats of manned bombers, or get involved in any contributions to anti-ballistic systems without giving the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence a full opportunity to investigate whether there is any real threat and whether the proposed methods are necessary to the security of this country and of the United States.

I see it is almost six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I want to end my remarks by asking a number of questions and by saying that what is really at stake in this debate is whether we are going to have an independent Canadian foreign policy. It can only be independent if we take our decisions for ourselves.

The next thing I want to know is, are we going to contribute, directly or indirectly, to the escalating arms race? Are we going to devote our defence policies to useless hardware or to building a world community, without which we shall all perish?

We in this party call on the government to fill in the blanks. So far it has presented us with a policy almost entirely blank. Even with the greatest of good will it is impossible for us to judge whether it is a step forward or a step backward. We call on the government to fill in the blanks, to make it clear where the government stands and to let us know what is the policy of Canada. We in this party, if the policy is an independent one directed to the future and to the real needs of this country, will be the first to support the government. But to date we have no knowledge at all and cannot even guess where the government really stands.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock this house stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

THE MINISTRY

RESIGNATION FROM GOVERNMENT OF HON. PAUL HELLYER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that I have this morning received a letter of resignation as a member of the government from the Hon. Paul Hellyer, Minister of Transport, and that I have recommended to the Deputy Governor General, the Right Hon. Mr. Justice Cartwright, that the minister's resignation be accepted.

I will table later in the day correspondence exchanged between the minister and myself relative to the resignation.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

HOUSING

RESIGNATION OF MINISTER AND FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PROVIDE ADEQUATE ACCOMMODATION—MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have a bit of a difficult problem which I have to bring to the attention of the house, in that earlier today the Chair received two notices provided for under Standing Order 26. One of the two motions preceded the other, and I might say had the additional qualification of having been tendered and received within the time limit set by the rules. In fairness, and in attempting to consider this matter as Solomon might have, I think that the first motion, the one received initially by the Chair, should be put, subject to the Chair reading both motions to the house. The first motion to which I have alluded is one which was tendered by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas).

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), to move the adjournment of the house under Standing Order 26, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the resignation of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), because of the failure of the government to agree to take action to increase the housing supply in Canada, and the consequent danger of further delay in the taking of adequate legislative and financial steps to meet the housing crisis that now faces this country.

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated a moment ago, I had received the motion which has now been read by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and a similar motion from the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) moving the adjournment of the house under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the resignation from the government of the Hon. Paul Hellyer as Minister of Transport, because of the failure of the government to reach decisions urgently needed to meet the housing crisis in Canada.

Since both notices cover exactly the same ground I might deal with both motions at the same time. The matter raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and the proposed motion by the Leader of the Opposition deal of course with a most important matter, so important indeed that there is some thought in my mind that it should be considered by the house as soon as possible. As hon. members know, the house, under a special order, has set aside two days sittings for a discussion of Canada's participation in NATO.

Resignation of Minister of Transport

I am of the opinion that it would not be desirable to alter our business for today. Whether the business for tomorrow should be altered is another matter to which I have given serious thought. In reviewing the request for adjournment of the house I have had difficulty in resolving the question of whether this matter should or might be raised in another form. It seems to me the matter of housing is in the circumstances a continuing problem but to that problem has been added another, the resignation of the Minister of the Crown who has been charged with the federal government's responsibility in the field of housing. The resignation of the minister is not necessarily in itself reason or ground for moving the adjournment of the house nor is the operation of the government's housing policy necessarily a matter of such urgent importance as to warrant a motion under Standing Order 26.

Having said that, however, when these two events are tied together it seems to the Chair there is a matter of urgency which may very well satisfy the provisions of Standing Order 26 in respect of the matter of urgency of debate. Having put aside any doubt in respect of the question of raising this matter as a matter of confidence in the government under Standing Order 58, I am inclined to allow the motion under the discretion vested in the Chair by citation (9) of Standing Order 26. I have said that I do not believe the business of the house for today should be disturbed, in view of the special order setting aside today for the consideration of government policy dealing with NATO. Any decision under Standing Order 26 would apply to tomorrow rather than today.

In view of the desirability of resolving certain procedural questions in relation to Bill C-150 I am directing that the matter be set down for consideration at two o'clock tomorrow afternoon provided the procedural matters relating to Bill C-150 have been disposed of earlier.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION FOLLOWING RESIGNATION OF MINISTER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question which arises out of the valedictory of the hon. member for Trinity this morning in which he said there is still no indication as to when a housing policy will be decided upon by the cabinet. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is still the plan of the government to bring forward housing legislation based upon the task force recommendations prior to the summer recess in view of the response by the Minister of Transport in reply to a question I asked him last week, that it was still the intention of the government to bring down legislation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps before the Prime Minister replies to the question I should refer to a ruling I made some time ago involving the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands when there had been an agreement to debate a particular subject. That hon. member at that time attempted to ask questions and I suggested that the hon. member might wait until the debate took place in the house.

I would think that position should apply generally, although I realize we are dealing with a matter of some urgency. I should not like to set down a hard and fast ruling, but I hope hon. members will exercize some discretion and remember that we have just agreed to hold a special debate tomorrow afternoon.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the intentions of the government have not changed. We do intend to introduce new legislation at this session within a matter of a few weeks.

RESIGNATION OF MINISTER—HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS WITHIN FEDERAL INITIATIVE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the statement made by the recent Minister of Transport, in which he said the delay in making a decision regarding housing policy is the result of a theoretical concept of federalism on the part of the Prime Minister, which does not accept housing and urban affairs as being in this area of the federal initiative, will the Prime Minister make an early statement to reassure the house and the people of Canada that this government does regard housing, pollution and other urban problems as national problems and that he is willing to accept responsibility for federal initiative in these fields, of course always respecting areas of provincial jurisdiction?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question by way of a statement of non-policy is not very helpful. Of course this involves the constitution, and this is part of the difficulty in dealing with matters such as housing and pollution. To this extent I agree completely with the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

In answer to the question as to whether this is a matter of national interest my answer is, of course it is. And we believe that, but we must then ask ourselves how all matters of national interest must be dealt with under the constitution. That is exactly the policy of this government.

AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has rejected the proposal that the federal government make funds available to the municipalities for housing purposes?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have just said that the government would be introducing new legislation in the house very shortly. It is now at the drafting stage. The policy matters have been decided by the government, and the hon. member will have to wait a few more days or, at the most, a couple of weeks before seeing what is in the legislation.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the former Minister of Transport, who was responsible for housing, is alleged to have made the statement at his press conference this morning that one of his disagreements with the Prime Minister was that the government refused his proposal to make housing funds available for municipalities, I wonder whether the Prime Minister might clear up that point for members of the house?

Mr. Speaker: I am wondering whether the hon. member is not now actually entering into a discussion of the very subject which in my view is the subject matter to be debated tomorrow afternoon. I doubt very much whether that type of question should be asked at this time, or whether in fact it should not rather be asked tomorrow afternoon, when we are debating this matter in an attempt to elucidate such points.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. With great deference to Your Honour I should like to point out that if we are to have any type of worth-while discussion tomorrow, surely the house is entitled to some statement as to whether or not the allegations made by the minister who has resigned were valid, and surely we are entitled to a statement from the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt very much whether the point raised by the hon. member is valid. He realizes that in ordinary circumstances such debates are allowed the same day, and there is no opportunity for members of the opposition or any member of the house to ask questions because the debate is brought on immediately. Therefore, I cannot think that the standing order makes provision for, first, a question period allowing hon. members to obtain information, and then to have an adjournment debate for the purpose of discussing the information obtained during the question period. This would be my interpretation of the rule.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I just submit this point for Your Honour's consideration. Tomorrow we will have the debate, with no opportunity for asking questions, and there is information which members are entitled to have before that debate begins.

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to enter into a discussion with the hon. member, but I must point out that there is a procedural difficulty here, because normally such debates are held on the same day. If the debate were held today, I doubt that there would be an opportunity for hon. members to ask questions on the matter, although it might be very useful for them to do so. This is not really provided for by the rules.

INQUIRY AS TO REPLACEMENT OF MINISTER FOLLOWING RESIGNATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, could the Prime Minister advise the house when he expects to make an announcement of the appointment of a new minister of transport to handle the rather sorry state of affairs described by the minister who resigned this morning?

An hon. Member: Let George do it.

Another hon. Member: Good idea.

Mr. Hees: Just hand it over.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE AS TO CONSTITUTIONALITY

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In view of the constitutional difficulties raised by the housing problem, in connection with the respective jurisdiction of the federal and provincial governments, is it the intention of the Prime Minister to call at his earliest convenience a federal-provincial conference where the parties concerned could agree on the constitutionality of the housing problem and take a decision in the best interests of all Canadians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is no doubt aware that many federal-provincial conferences have been held on housing, and it was precisely because no agreement was reached to give increased power to the federal government that we are now in such a predicament.

Also, a little more than a month ago the minister met in Toronto with the provincial ministers responsible for housing, and the matter was then discussed once again. Therefore, the house should not think there have been no consultations between the federal and the provincial governments on that subject and its constitutional aspect.

Mr. Asselin: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the Prime Minister assure us that at the constitutional conference to be held in June, the problem of housing will be on the agenda to enable the parties concerned to make a decision?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I assume the hon. member and his party question the provincial competence with regard to housing. The hon. member shakes his head in dissent. All I can say then, Mr. Speaker, is that the constitutional conference will take place as expected, according to the prepared agenda.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR HOUSING IN INTERIM PERIOD FOLLOWING RESIGNATION OF MINISTER

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not hear part of the announcement made by the Prime Minister, but I did not hear any date mentioned in the announcement. May I ask the right hon. gentleman when the resignation of the Minister of Transport is to become effective, and if it becomes effective immediately, would the right hon. gentleman inform us who has been put in charge of housing in the meantime, pending the appointment of another minister?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The minister asked that his resignation become effective on April 30, and it is this resignation that I have advised the Deputy Governor General to accept.

Mr. Lewis: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the right hon. gentleman inform the house whether the minister who resigned is to carry on all his duties relevant to transport and to housing for the next few days—there are about six days still left—or whether the housing matters, which include public housing, urban renewal and other matters under discussion, are to remain under the table until a new minister is appointed.

Mr. Trudeau: The relevancy of the date is that there would be no cabinet meeting before next Thursday, and by that time the minister's resignation will have become effective. In the meantime I expect that the minister wants to use the remaining days, not to initiate or discuss policy but to clear up some outstanding matters before his resignation becomes effective.

Mr. Lewis: Can one have an assurance from the Prime Minister that any requests or applications by municipalities for public housing assistance, urban renewal assistance or assistance in other fields will receive attention during the next week, or will they have to wait until a new appointment is made?

Mr. Fairweather: The mail will not be in anyway.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Témiscamingue wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): No, Mr. Speaker, my question deals with another matter.

[English]

POSSIBILITY OF FURTHER RESIGNATIONS—PARTICIPATION IN DEBATE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister indicated by his answer to the Leader of the Opposition that the resignation of the Minister of Transport will result in some decisive action in the housing field, can we look forward hopefully to other resignations shortly, including that of the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Prime Minister will assure us that he will take part in the debate tomorrow.

Mr. Trudeau: I will give that question consideration, Mr. Speaker.

In reply to the previous question I would be inclined to say that if resignation brings action, then there should be many resignations in the opposition ranks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: We have nothing to resign from.

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): If questions in reference to the Department of Transport, and in particular those with regard to housing are to be answered, will the Prime Minister inform the house whom the acting minister in the house to answer these questions will be.

Mr. Trudeau: As the hon. member knows, the roster system does not provide for the Minister of Transport to be present in the house today.

An hon. Member: How about tomorrow?

Mr. Trudeau: As for tomorrow, I can assure the house that there will be a minister answering questions with regard to the department.

Mr. Baldwin: How about the Holy Ghost today?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I bring to the attention of hon. members that many questions have been asked on what I realize is an important point, and I see that another seven or eight hon. members are anxious to ask supplementary questions on this subject. However, the hon. member for Témiscamingue and other hon. members are anxious to ask questions on other matters, so I believe we should not press the matter much further. I wonder therefore whether hon. members might not allow the Chair to call the hon. member for Témiscamingue, and if we run out of subjects in the next fifteen minutes we might return to this one.

NATIONAL PARKS

GASPÉ—MEETING WITH QUEBEC AUTHORITIES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

It was announced recently that a very important meeting between the minister and the authorities of the province of Quebec would be held in connection with the establishment of a national park in the Gaspé peninsula. Is the minister in a position to tell the house today if he met the provincial authorities and, if so, have they reached an agreement on the matter?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, this meeting has not yet been held.

[English]

FISHERIES

GROUNDFISH FLOOR PRICE—SALT COD POLICY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry which arises out of the statement released by the department today. Has the minister defined a floor price for groundfish, and has the department worked out the mechanics for the purchasing and receiving of the groundfish mentioned in the press release?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer is yes, the department has worked out the mechanics of this purchasing arrangement, both with the trade and in concert with some of the other fish exporting countries selling frozen groundfish in the United States. The Fisheries Prices Support Board will be buying at market prices fish which is offered at any price below the prevailing market price, with a view to supporting the price and bidding it up to a point where it covers the basic costs of our efficient Canadian producers.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, to ask the minister why he chose to make a statement on this subject outside the house at noon today instead of dealing with it on motions. Second, when may we expect a statement on salt codfish policy?

Mr. Davis: I hope to be able to make a statement on salt codfish policy tomorrow.

COMBINES

DRUGS—PRICE FIXING BY B.C. PHARMACISTS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): May I ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs a question? What action is the minister taking with regard to the request of the government of British Columbia for an investigation of a possible infringement of the combines legislation by the pharmacists of British Columbia in connection with the imposition of extra charges in the case of welfare recipients' prescriptions?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I am not aware I have received any such request from the government of British Columbia, but I will check to see whether one has come in without my knowledge. I made some comments on this situation the other day in answer to a question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INVITATION TO ATTEND PARIS EDUCATION MEETINGS

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Could he tell the house whether the government has been officially invited to the meeting of the Ministers of Education in Paris?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: While the matter is being considered—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Is the Secretary of State absent from the house, Mr. Speaker?

[Mr. Davis.]

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is to the Minister of Labour—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest the minister might be allowed to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Champlain.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The question was not directed to me, Mr. Speaker and I was therefore not quite sure whether I should reply. It was addressed to the Secretary of State. However, perhaps I ought to answer the question. The situation is this: Canada attended the Kinshasa conference as a full member, and incidentally took part in the decision of the conference to hold its second session in Paris. The arrangements arrived at between Ottawa and the provincial governments for Kinshasa worked well, and we have no reason to believe that the same arrangements cannot be applied for the second session; this was made clear last year. I do not think it would be helpful to comment on the suggestion that an attempt might be made to exclude Ottawa from the Paris meeting, other than to say I fail to see how it could be in the interests of any of the authorities concerned to adopt such a policy.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): In view of Quebec's acceptance of the invitation and in view of Canada's representation at the first conference, is it the government's intention to send a representative, having regard to its declared commitment to assist French speaking African states?

Mr. Sharp: I thought my answer was quite clear. We do not need an invitation. We have already been invited.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question.

Could the minister tell us who would represent Canada as Minister of Education at the Paris meeting?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: The arrangements were worked out with the Quebec government which was, I believe, quite satisfied, and I hope they can continue in Paris.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, could the—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already allowed a few supplementary questions, I think that we should move on to something else.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Only one supplementary on that point, and I will be finished.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): So will we.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will return to the hon. member for Témiscamingue in a few moments.

AIR CANADA

STRIKE OF MECHANICS—INQUIRY AS TO MATTERS IN DISPUTE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Yesterday I put the following question to the hon. gentleman:

> I am just asking the minister, because of his interest—I am sure his interest is shared by all—in getting this dispute settled, whether he will tell the house in general terms just what might be the issues.

The minister replied: "The answer is no."

Will the minister now tell the house what he told the radio and television commentators outside the house—information he refused to give inside the house in reply to this question?

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Earlier in the question period the hon. member for Edmonton West posed the following question—in fact, it was in the nature of a statement or a suggestion:

> Perhaps the minister could take the house and the country into his confidence and tell us in general terms—we are not asking for the dollars and cents—whether it is a question of wages, fringe benefits, seniority; or what are the problems?

To which I replied:

> Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has done a very capable job of outlining the problems yet to be resolved in all these areas.

That is precisely what I said on television ten minutes later.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is not so.

TRADE

WHEAT—DEMAND BY JAPAN FOR REBATE ON INFERIOR QUALITY

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address this question to the Minister without Portfolio temporarily in charge of the Wheat Board. Did the Japanese food agency demand $300,000 U.S. in compensation for rain-damaged wheat supplied in November, and did the Wheat Board offer to supply wheat free of charge—as they have some left over—and, if so, was a settlement reached?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): There were discussions between the Japanese and the Wheat Board in connection with wheat, not damaged but different in quality from what they had expected to receive, and these discussions are not yet in every respect completed.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Would the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatchewan advise the house whether the delay in the settlement of this claim has had an adverse effect on future sales to Japan?

Mr. Lang: No, Mr. Speaker, it has not had an adverse effect.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): May I address a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture in connection with this situation? Will he take steps to investigate the circumstances with relation to the Board of Grain Commissioners to find out how such a substandard shipment could have been made?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): From a technical point of view, the Board of Grain Commissioners has assisted the Wheat Board in all aspects relating to the testing of samples, and matters of that sort. This information has been made available to the Canadian Wheat Board.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROPRIETY OF CONTINUED SERVICE FOLLOWING RESIGNATION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I want to ask the Prime Minister a question which does not relate directly to housing though it relates to the question of resignations from the government. I ask it subject to your direction, Mr. Speaker. Has the Prime Minister given consideration to, or taken advice upon, the question of the constitutional propriety of the Minister of Transport remaining as a minister of the Crown for approximately a week after having openly expressed lack of confidence in government policies and disagreement with them?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Brewin: What was the result of that consideration?

Mr. Trudeau: The result I announced to the house, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): In view of the resignation of the Minister of Transport, will it now be possible to get Bill Lee through the Prime Minister's switchboard?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

SPORTS

NATIONAL HOCKEY TEAM—CO-OPERATION FROM N.H.L. TEAMS

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the urgency of planning now, if our National Hockey team is to make a creditable showing in next year's competitions, and in view of the recent announcement that Toronto Maple Leafs will make three of their players available for the team next year, can the minister tell the house if this type of co-operation is expected from the Montreal team?

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I always hesitate to refuse questions relating to hockey. Perhaps this one might be adjourned until ten o'clock.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF VISIT AT CHURCHILL

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. I refer to the current visit of His Excellency the Governor General to the northern regions of Canada. In that connection would the government consider suggesting a more lengthy visit to the town of Churchill, Manitoba, than is presently contemplated?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on these questions I give very general advice to the Governor General.

PUBLIC SERVICE

UNDUE EXTENSION OF BILINGUAL REQUIREMENTS

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister which arises out of recent extramural statements made by his parliamentary secretary. Was the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister stating the view of the government when he said that departmental directives have pushed civil servant bilingual requirements beyond the intent of the legislation by parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member knows that questions asked about statements made outside the house may only be put where they relate to statements made by ministers. I would not think this rule extends to parliamentary secretaries. I will say no more.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REQUEST FOR RETURN OF SIX-DAY MAIL DELIVERY AND COUNTER SERVICE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Communications in his capacity as Postmaster General. I ask it seriously and hope he will give it serious consideration. Since there are now only three days in the week, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, when we can mail letters with any assurance they will be delivered promptly, will the minister take a new look at the entire question of the five-day delivery week and review the possibility of re-establishing a six-day delivery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the minister like to discuss this question some night at ten o'clock?

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): May I direct a supplementary question to the Postmaster General, Mr. Speaker. While he is considering this matter would he also consider keeping post office counters or lobbies open on a six day a week basis.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, they are already open on a six day a week basis in many areas.

SUGGESTED DELAY IN CLOSING OF SMALLER OFFICES

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): A supplementary question to the Postmaster General, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister consider delaying the closing of some of the smaller post offices throughout the country until other major problems in the post office have been straightened out?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, we are proceeding on a number of different fronts. Last night I had dinner with the executive of the two national unions and we had a very good general discussion. There is now no need to reduce our efforts in one area in order to speed them up in another. I think most hon. members know, or have already noted, that service out of Ottawa has become considerably improved.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kierans: If hon. members opposite have not noticed that, at least some members of the press gallery have. Distinct improvements throughout the post office are taking place.

INSTALLATION OF ADDITIONAL STAMP VENDING MACHINES

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Last September the Postmaster General announced a program to instal additional vending machines for stamps. When is that program to start?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): We are at present actively engaged in that program, Mr. Speaker. Because of the changed design of our 25 cent pieces our first priority was to redesign existing machines.

THE MINISTRY

REQUESTED SEPARATE PORTFOLIOS FOR TRANSPORT AND HOUSING

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, may I revert for a moment to the question of housing. I address my question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether he would consider that this is an appropriate time to implement something that many people in this country have been urging for some time, the establishment of two different portfolios with respect to transport and housing, so that we could have a minister of transport and another minister to take charge of the housing field.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FLOODS

TRAIL, B.C.—ACTION TO CONTROL EMERGENCY SITUATION

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government of British Columbia asked for emergency help to cope with the flooding situation at the city of Trail, British Columbia. Has the demand been for financial assistance or for assistance under the Emergency Measures Organization. If so, is the government giving favourable consideration to this demand.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have had reports of some floods, starting in British Columbia in the area of Trail. Our indication of this moment is that neither the military nor the E.M.O. have received any request from the provincial or municipal authorities for help in combatting the situation. At the moment it is therefore considered a local problem which is dealt with by local volunteers.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. May I ask whether, in view of the wording of the motion now before the house, he accepts it as a motion of confidence. If defeated, is he prepared to resign? I ask this question in view of what took place on another, similar occasion a little over one year ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I think the hon. member will have to see what the result is.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

EXPENDITURES FOR NATIONAL MUSEUMS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. In view of the crisis in Canada's national museums, as represented by the resignation of Dr. Banfield, the director of the Museum of Natural Sciences, what action does the minister contemplate taking to restore confidence in this important cultural activity.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the board of directors of the corporation which comprises the National Museums is presently studying this question and will be making recommendations to us. The matter is also being studied within the department.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Secretary of State use his influence with the government to launch the development program deferred by the government back in 1965, which is the crux of the problem.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member is making a representation to the government which, I assume, has been noted.

AIR CANADA

STRIKE OF MECHANICS—CULPABILITY

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Yesterday, answering the hon. member for Edmonton West, the minister said while speaking of the Air Canada mechanics strike as reported at page 7858 of Hansard:

> I will have no hesitation in telling the house and the country who is the culprit, if there is a culprit, in the dispute.

Does the Minister of Labour not realize that in that statement he is questioning the word of his Prime Minister?

Mr. Trudeau: You are the culprit.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Prime Minister's remark is on record. He has just indicated that I am the culprit.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, in order to show the Minister of Labour just where he is questioning the Prime Minister may I refer to page 7623 of Hansard for April 17—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacInnis: —where the Prime Minister definitely identified the union.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. It seems to me that this is becoming a debate.

STRIKE OF MECHANICS—TRANSPORTATION OF PERISHABLE GOODS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Answering a question last Friday, he indicated that any problems related to the handling of perishable commodities ought to be directed to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Baldwin: He has become a perishable commodity himself.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Since many hon. members are receiving complaints from their constituents, may I ask to whom these problems are now to be referred, particularly since because of limited facilities, Canadian Pacific Airlines have refused to take any air cargo. What minister will be in charge of these matters from now on?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Any such complaints should be directed either to the Canadian Transport Commission or to the minister, directly, Mr. Speaker.

EDUCATION

EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN SCHOLARS IN CANADIAN UNIVERSITIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether he is concerned about any difficulties that Canadian scholars may be having in securing employment in Canadian universities? I ask him this question in full recognition of the fact that such matters are within provincial jurisdiction, and of course hirings are made by the universities. Is the Minister of Manpower and Immigration concerned about difficulties Canadians may be having in this area?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I would prefer to see an increasing number of Canadian scholars seek employment in Canadian universities. I am afraid the department cannot go beyond that.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister sufficiently concerned that he is making inquiries as to the cause of such difficulties, and whether there exists any unfortunate situation which might be influenced in a proper way?

Mr. MacEachen: The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

COMMUNICATIONS

INVESTMENT RETURN FROM TELESAT

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): My question Mr. Speaker, is directed to the Minister of Communications. Can the minister explain to the house how it was possible for him to say in reply to a question in the standing committee the other day that he was not in a position to indicate what the government target was in terms of a return on an investment in the Canadian Telesat Corporation, and then two hours later give that information to the press?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member questions my judgment, perhaps he should allow me to indicate that I think this is purely argumentative and not the type of question in any event which can properly be asked at this time.

Mr. Schreyer: May I submit to Your Honour what I consider might be regarded as a question of privilege. It would be on a subject concerning which the minister refused to give information in committee, and very soon thereafter gave specific information to the press.

Mr. Speaker: It may be difficult to explain, but I would think it is still not a question of privilege. If it were put as a question of privilege, I would have to consider it, but I gather this is not what the hon. member has done at this time.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker: In reply to the question raised by the hon. member—

Mr. Speaker: The minister may have a question of privilege on his own, but I have not allowed the hon. member for Selkirk a question of privilege and I have not allowed him to ask the question. I doubt whether the minister can now reply to a question which has not been allowed.

Mr. Kierans: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The reports in the press were taken entirely from the hearing. I spoke to no member of the press afterwards, to the best of my knowledge. During the hearings of the committee I did say I hoped that the corporation would achieve a profit between 8 and 12 per cent. This is the basis for the reports which appeared in the newspapers.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): On the point of order which Your Honour raised, may I say this practice is now becoming so shockingly prevalent that Your Honour might give consideration to varying the rule you have properly propounded. This procedure has prevailed in the past, that of ministers saying one thing in the house and saying something different outside the house. It has become so widespread and prevalent, Your Honour might give some thought to this matter.

Mr. Kierans: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: We are not making much progress. The minister made his point on a question of privilege. He has assured the house that he did not make a statement subsequent to his evidence given in committee. I do not see why the matter should be pursued further.

IMMIGRATION

RUDOLPH HOLATA—PROTEST AGAINST HOLDING IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker: I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration about a very serious matter the other day, and he was not in the house yesterday. It concerns Rudolph Holata who has been held in a Czechoslovakian prison. I do not know what is happening to him. He is a member of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the house would not mind the reply being given at this time.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I am aware of the interest of the hon. member. However, I have investigated the case and I find it is a matter within the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Paproski: Can he answer it, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: The President of the Privy Council can be recognized in a moment. The minister has been allowed to reply to the question in the time allocated for questions.

Perhaps we might dispose of that point, and then I will recognize the President of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton Centre asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration whether the government knew Mr. Holata had been arrested in Czechoslovakia and whether presentations had been made on his behalf.

The Canadian embassy in Prague learned on January 6, 1969, of the arrest of Mr. Holata, a dual national who emigrated to Canada in 1951 and obtained Canadian citizenship in 1957. Mr. Holata, who is employed as an electrician by the Department of Transport at Vancouver international airport, was arrested while visiting his parents in Joblanec for Christmas, and is charged with espionage on behalf of a nation other than Canada. The charge pertains to incidents which occurred prior to his immigration to Canada. Consular access was granted to the representatives of the embassy on January 23, 1969. The trial, which was to be held in early March, has been postponed pending completion of documentation by the prosecution. The embassy is providing all possible assistance to Holata and continues to press the Czechoslovakian authorities for an early trial.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in response to the inquiry about the business for the coming week, tomorrow we will call the omnibus bill to amend the Criminal Code. On Monday we will call it again. What the business will be for the balance of the coming week will depend very much on the progress made on that bill. Thursday will be an allotted day.

In view of the expressed intention of the Ralliement Creditiste to continue ad infinitum the debate on the Criminal Code bill, I think we can assume that for several more days at least we will be discussing that bill.

I will advise the house of any change in order of business.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Would the Chair permit a question on government business to the house leader? Would he tell the house when he expects to bring forward the debate for concurrence in the fifth report of the Transport Committee, in order to prevent the honourable and distinguished chairman of that committee from resigning and following in the steps of the hon. member for Trinity?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I assume the hon. member and his colleagues will continue to filibuster that matter, so there seems little point in bringing it forth again.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question with respect to the comments of the President of the Privy Council? Would he consider, perhaps on Monday or Tuesday, calling a meeting of the house leaders to see if we might reach an agreement in regard to the time to be spent on Bill C-150?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would be glad to make those efforts again, but I can advise the hon. member and the house that repeatedly in the past several days I have sought to see if there was any change in the position of the Ralliement Creditiste and that I failed to get any indication that an agreement would be possible.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Possibly we could help you.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

MOTION FOR APPROVAL OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Trudeau:

That this house supports the government's policy of continued Canadian participation in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the intention of the government, in consultation with Canada's allies, to take early steps to bring about a planned and phased reduction of the size of Canadian forces in Europe.

And the amendment thereto of Mr. Stanfield (p. 7875), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands) (p. 7880).

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, so far this debate has produced two amendments to the motion put forward by the government, one from the Official Opposition and one from the New Democratic party and, if I may say so, both these amendments were predictable. The amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is very good at negatives, but it fails to propose any alternative to the policies that the government has put forward. The amendment moved by the Official Opposition contends that Canada is retreating from internationalism to isolationism, according to the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) statement. But surely the Prime Minister's speech and the statement he made on April 3 indicate that the government is moving in exactly the opposite direction, in an outward direction in favour of more internationalism and less isolationism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: The Prime Minister's statement makes it very clear that Canada is broadening its horizons in every direction and is intent on playing a still more active role in world affairs. There was an absence of constructive, Conservative suggestions in the speech made by the Leader of the Opposition. I did not hear a single one although I listened most attentively to a very good political speech by him, a speech completely lacking in constructive suggestions. I really did admire the way in which he put in the needle, but the trouble, Mr. Speaker, was that there was nothing in his speech. It was just emptiness. It was without any constructive suggestions as to what Canada should do in the world today.

I suggest that the debate so far has indicated that it is the Conservative opposition which is isolating itself in this house. Members of the government party and of the New Democratic party have proposals to make, but what the Leader of the Opposition has said is, "Let us not disturb anything. It is now nice and comfortable. So far as my party is concerned I will not put forward any proposals for change."

An hon. Member: Where are your proposals?

Mr. Sharp: We have a motion before the house in very clear terms, and the Leader of the Opposition has done nothing but condemn the government for its statement. The subamendment offered by the New Democratic party does some condemning too, but at least it also makes some positive suggestions. The problem with their amendment, however, is one which appears to haunt that party. It is based not on the world as it is but on a world that they would like to think exists. But the government is in a position of responsibility and it has to deal with the world as it is. Canada and Canadians have to operate in a world that is much more dangerous and complex than members of the New Democratic party would lead us to believe.

The Leader of the Opposition has developed a complicated line of reasoning to suggest that in some way the government has determined upon its defence policy before settling upon its foreign policy. The superficiality of this argument becomes obvious when we consider the circumstances under which we are having this debate.

The government felt under an obligation, and certainly as Secretary of State for External Affairs I urged this upon the government, to give to our NATO allies as much information as we could about our future position before the Washington meeting of our NATO friends. It would have been very simple for the government to limit its announcement, in contemplation of that meeting, to its decision to remain in NATO. That would have been the simplest thing to do. It would have avoided the kind of debate we are having now. We could have avoided any mention of our decision to reduce, in due course and in an orderly way, the size of our forces on the ground in Europe.

I can well imagine the accusations that could properly have been made against the government if we had simply announced our intention to stay in the alliance prior to that meeting, and then later let people in on the fact that we intended to reduce our forces in Europe. That would have been dishonest. That would have been concealing. We felt that the only frank and honest thing we could do was to convey to our allies, first, our foreign policy decision to stay in the alliance and, second, our military decision, still incomplete, to reduce our forces in Europe. I say that this decision is still incomplete since it cannot in the nature of things be completed, and it was impossible for the government to have gone any further at that stage than to make the decision it made on April 3. I say to the Leader of the Opposition who made so much of this argument, who said the government's statement was deliberately intended to mean different things to different people, that it would have been quite impossible for us, in advance of our consultation with our allies, to have gone any further than we did at that stage.

As I say, we had an alternative. We could have said nothing. Then we could have been charged with deceit. As it is, I suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that we are being as frank and honest as it was possible for us to have been under the circumstances.

We said that the planned and phased reduction in our forces in Europe will be made in consultation with our allies. We have not undertaken to consult our allies on whether or not we should reduce our forces in Europe. This decision has been made by the government and is not, as such, negotiable. However, we will be consulting our allies about how this decision is to be put into effect. This is no more than the responsible behavior to be expected of this country.

The other NATO nations may wish to make adjustments arising from Canadian reductions in strength in Europe, and we will certainly want to carry out our plans causing the least possible difficulty to our allies who are also, it should be remembered, among our oldest and closest friends in the international community. As a matter of fact, under cross-examination at a press conference in Washington I said it was not our intention by our action to weaken the alliance, and that remains the policy of Canada.

Without attempting any general definition, let me make even more clear what we mean by consultation in these circumstances. As we work out how we are going to make the planned and phased reduction of our forces in Europe we will keep our allies informed, listen to their views, and discuss the matter with them. The problems they face, and the views they express, will be taken into account in our decision-making process, but eventually the decision can only be made by the Canadian government, having regard to our national interests, our capacities and our objectives.

In the course of his remarks yesterday the Leader of the Opposition seemed to be confused about the timetable of our decision-making process with regard to the planned and phased reduction of our forces in Europe. He tried to ridicule the apparent conflict in the statements made by the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) and myself on the decisions and when they would be made. This, I suggest, is a confusion of his own making. I expect that my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, will explain this timetable more fully in the debate. I shall content myself by setting out in the most general terms the steps as we expect them to occur.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Stanfield: Explain what you said at Washington.

Mr. Sharp: I will—all consistent with the government's policy. The decision in principle about Canada's future in NATO was announced on April 3. That was the first decision the government made. The NATO defence planning committee meeting in May will provide an occasion for us to outline in general terms to our allies how we propose to proceed with our program of planned and phased reduction of our forces in Europe. As I said, we have to make a decision before we put a proposal before our allies. We have to make that decision and there is nothing abnormal about that. This is the normal process of decision-making on force commitment in NATO which leads to the annual meeting of foreign and defence ministers in December when each country is required to make firm force commitments for the following year. So each of us was speaking about the respective decisions and was speaking within the terms and text of the NATO treaty. If my hon. friend does not know what is in the treaty, he should read it.

Mr. Stanfield: I read it.

Mr. Sharp: The fact that the decision-making process with regard to our military presence in Europe is still going on while the basic decision to stay in NATO could be announced on April 3 shows clearly how defence policy flows from foreign policy. We had to assess the importance to us of our membership in the alliance having regard to our other responsibilities and areas of interest. We had to make our own judgment of the usefulness of NATO to us as a means through which we can contribute to international stability and as an important element in our relations with Europe. We had to study NATO's capacity as an instrument for increasing contacts and improving relations with the U.S.S.R. and its associate states. These are by no means all of foreign policy considerations that went into our review of our place in NATO, but they are among the more important. It was only after we had dealt with all these and other foreign policy questions that we could turn our minds to the effect of our political decision upon our defence arrangements.

Foreign policy decisions must take into account Canada's position in tomorrow's world. The 1970's will be a period of accelerating economic, technological and social change, accompanied by persistent political and ideological rivalries and tensions, and by continuing civil unrest in many countries. We are not yet into the 1970's but still unrest is spreading and rising from many of these factors.

Mr. Stanfield: Even in this chamber.

Mr. Sharp: Could be, and even in this country.

An hon. Member: Even in this chamber.

Mr. Sharp: Even in that party.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Sharp: When I listened to the Leader of the Opposition and the kind of speech Dalton Camp made I wondered whether Dalton Camp ever belonged to that party.

It may also prove to be a time of hopeful evolution and promise in the relations between the western and Soviet worlds. There is a prospect of Soviet-United States talks on the limitation of strategic arms beginning soon, and substantial great power conversations on basic political issues such as the Middle East and in due course the problems of a divided Europe. There is beginning to be a real hope, shared by our partners in NATO, that a start can now be made on the long and difficult process of political and military de-escalation between east and west. Evolution, change, unpredictability—in this world situation Canada must be in a position to adapt its policies and its outlook quickly, flexibly and effectively to the challenges of the future. We must not isolate ourselves in the problems of the past.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sharp: As hon. members know, several of my colleagues and myself have just returned from several days in Japan. Coming as it did in the midst of our discussions of our NATO policy, this experience has been a most timely one for us. One gets a very different perspective on Canada from the other side of the Pacific. From Tokyo it is the west coast that is seen in high relief, in sharp focus; it is eastern Canada that lies behind the wide prairies and is more dimly perceived. Japan may soon be our second best customer, rivalling Britain.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the minister but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the house give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Stanfield: No, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to be small about this, but it was agreed as an order of the house that the opening speakers in each party would have 40 minutes, or whatever the time limit provided is, and that everybody else would be confined to 15 minutes.

An hon. Member: I thought you wanted to hear all about it.

Another hon. Member: He hasn't said anything yet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I object to any minister of this government calling out that I do not want to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs when all we are asking is that ministers conform to the order adopted by the house after discussion among all parties in the house. I resent that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It is correct that there is a special order of the house that speakers will have only 15 minutes except for the mover of the motion and the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he could conclude his speech in five minutes? If he can, I suggest we give consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder whether the house would give serious consideration to allowing the Secretary of State for External Affairs an extra few minutes. I think this would be an act of courtesy by those on this side of the house.

Mr. MacInnis: He is only speaking about degrees of honesty anyway.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Calgary Centre.

NATO

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) spent some time on what was bound to be an unsuccessful attempt to explain the unexplainable so far as the conflicts are concerned in what he, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and other ministers have said. In addition, he gave us a few generalities. The only definite point in his speech was that he made it plain that the consultation referred to in the motion means no more than telling our allies in NATO that our troops will be withdrawn and advising them to take the necessary steps to fill the gap. That is all the consultation amounts to. This is the one thing the Secretary of State for External Affairs did make clear.

The motion of the Prime Minister is in two parts. The first part states that Canada will remain in NATO. The second part states that we will withdraw from NATO our forces in Europe. It is quite evident that the two parts of the resolution are in direct contradiction of each other and therefore in essence the motion is a fraud.

During the past year there has been almost complete confusion as to the government's intentions in respect of NATO. This has been the result of the conflicting statements of the Prime Minister and other ministers about what the government intended to do in so far as NATO was concerned. The present motion and the Prime Minister's statement and explanation of it continue this confusion. We now know definitely that it is the intention of the government to remove a number of our troops from Europe. As pointed out yesterday by my leader, we do not know whether a few or practically all our forces in Europe will be withdrawn. The confusion still exists and we are still up in the air in this regard.

We must consider the whole matter in conjunction with the Prime Minister's earlier statements, both before he occupied his present position and since. For the most part these statements, particularly some of his earlier ones, were definitely along the line that Canada should withdraw its forces from NATO. Thus the only conclusion I can come to is that the Prime Minister intends to end our military contributions as quickly as possible.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: An hon. member opposite applauds. There is no doubt that his attitude is shared by a few members but not by the majority in this chamber, including many on the Liberal side.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard).]

Let me put this another way. The Prime Minister's policy is one of scuttle—get out just as fast as possible. This is the same policy General de Gaulle followed. The only conclusion one can come to is that the Prime Minister is using General de Gaulle as an example in this regard and intends to do exactly the same thing, with perhaps one difference in that he intends to do so in slower stages. The final result will be the same.

Yesterday the Prime Minister in effect accused those of us who do not agree with his views in respect of NATO of living in the past. As recorded at page 7867 of Hansard he said:

> Canadians must be prepared to face the world of actuality, the world of 1969.

That is exactly what the Prime Minister is not doing. He does not recognize that the basic threat to our security which brought NATO into existence in the first place still exists and that we have a responsibility to continue to play a role commensurate with our population and resources to counter that threat.

A great deal of wishful thinking has taken place in the last few years along the lines that the aggressive intention of Russia has disappeared and that a period of détente has occurred. Some people believe that all that is necessary is to treat Russia with kid gloves and in a nice way and this détente will continue. The events in Czechoslovakia last year ended these illusions very abruptly for most people. It did not end them for everybody. These events ended the hopes of those people in Europe who are under a direct threat. This was made abundantly clear to the members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence who spent two weeks in Europe immediately before Easter. This was the reaction we observed in every country we visited, whether a NATO country or a neutral country such as Switzerland or Sweden.

Let me point out that the first object of the foreign and defence policy of any country is to maintain its security and independence. In the past many countries were able to do this on their own; however, that time has long passed. Security and independence can only be maintained now by most countries, particularly countries of our size, and I have in mind population, through alliances with like-minded nations. These people face the same dangers and must combine to resist these dangers.

The most important of these alliances to our security during the past 20 years has been NATO. The purpose of that alliance throughout its existence has been the maintenance of peace and to prevent a third great war rather than having to fight such a war. This deterrent role of the alliance must be emphasized and re-emphasized because many people still think of NATO as an organization designed to fight a war rather than to prevent one. The alliance has prevented a major war or further aggression in Europe during the past 20 years. It can continue to do so only if it remains strong, and it will only remain strong if its members continue to contribute military forces relative to their ability to do so.

This is the very thing the present government through this motion is proposing to end. We will not contribute military forces to the alliance with any relationship to our ability, population and resources to do so. We will not be contributing forces in relation to any other factor. I am sure everyone will agree that France's withdrawal of its troops from the NATO alliance seriously weakened it. The result has been that other countries have had to increase their contribution to make up for the loss of French forces. Surely no one would attempt to argue that the withdrawal of Canadian forces from NATO will not further weaken the alliance.

While it is true that our forces are relatively small in numbers, they are very highly trained and very efficient, probably more so than any others in Europe. This again was made plain to us during our trip overseas. The withdrawal of Canadian forces will create a gap which will be hard to fill. This was also impressed upon us by the people in Europe.

More important than the military loss as a result of the withdrawal of Canadian troops is the psychological effect and the feeling it will produce in European countries. They will begin to feel that we are retreating to the American fortress and that they cannot count on us to give them help in the event of war. This is bound to result in a decline in morale and the feeling that perhaps the other small members of the alliance should do the same thing.

The Prime Minister has discounted the so-called domino theory that because one country takes a certain line of action others are likely to follow. The theory is that because a country such as Canada withdraws from NATO other European countries are likely to do the same thing. That may be his opinion and the opinion of some members of the committee, but it was not the opinion of one single individual we talked with in Europe. The European people were unanimous, including those in neutral countries such as Sweden and Switzerland, that a Canadian withdrawal of troops from NATO would weaken the alliance and have the effect of increasing this already existing feeling in the small European countries, with the result that they might follow Canada's example and do likewise. Therefore we must keep in mind the psychological effect from both these factors, that of perhaps inducing other people to follow the same course, and that of making the Europeans feel they are more isolated and cannot count on our help. These psychological effects will be very serious indeed.

• (3:30 p.m.)

> The government's NATO decision is based on the belief that, during the forthcoming years, there are better uses of the Canadian forces—

I ask the Prime Minister and every other member of the house, what better uses are there for Canadian forces than their use in NATO? How can they contribute more to Canada's security than by the role they are playing in NATO at the present time? I have given this question considerable thought, and I think I have some knowledge and experience in these matters. I can think of no single way, not one, in which Canadian forces could do more for the security of this country, the maintenance of peace and the independence of this country than the role they are discharging in Europe at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: The various statements the Prime Minister has made, particularly in his speech in Calgary, have left the impression that nearly all of our military forces are devoted to NATO. This, of course, is very far from being the case; it is a complete distortion of the facts. We are supposed to have about 100,000 people in our forces, though we are admittedly not up to strength, and only about 10,000 of them are on NATO service in Europe or about one-tenth of our forces. It is true that our maritime forces have a NATO-commitment, it is true that we have other possible commitments to NATO from the forces in Canada; but the fact is that the great bulk of our Canadian forces are not oriented to NATO or committed to NATO. The bulk of our forces are available for the other tasks the armed forces have to perform, the protection of the land, sea and air of our country, NORAD, peacekeeping missions, and so on. I object to the Prime Minister trying to convey the impression to the people of Canada that practically all our forces are devoted to NATO. This is just not so. Quite a small number of our forces proportionately are devoted to that end.

I repeat, in closing, what I said at the beginning of my remarks. The Prime Minister's policy is one of scuttle; it is a retreat to isolationism and continentalism, as stated by my leader yesterday and expressed in the amendment moved by this party, which I hope will receive the support of the house.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in this NATO debate primarily because I am a member of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence and have been since the beginning of the 28th parliament. As such I have some strong views in this regard and I would like to express those views today in the House of Commons. Prior to doing so, may I say I think it is important that the House of Commons and the people of Canada realize the scope of the study made by the committee on this very important problem.

On Thursday, January 16, 1969, pursuant to an order issued by the House of Commons, our committee was given the obligation of looking into policy changes in defence and external affairs. Following this, we held 24 meetings in Canada and heard evidence pro and con from people with divergent views, ranging from getting completely out of NATO, to staying in and getting in much more deeply, or to becoming an unaligned, neutral country. Name it, and we heard about it in that committee. In Canada we received testimony from 16 witnesses, and between March 8 and March 22 we travelled to Europe in order to see for ourselves the role our forces were playing in Europe and to discuss these problems with leaders and representatives of other countries. We also looked into the possibilities of neutrality in Sweden, and peacekeeping operations in Cyprus.

I speak on this subject because I think it is important that we establish the scope and depth of the study given this matter by the committee. But there were also certain limitations, the primary limitation being time. We found ourselves faced with a fact that we could not ignore, namely, the Washington NATO meeting on April 10, wherein the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) intended to outline broadly the conclusions of this policy review. We were forced, as a result, to come to conclusions prematurely. This is not to say that I back away from any of those conclusions; in fact, I support them very strongly. I did in the committee, and I do so here in the House of Commons.

The important thing is that defence and foreign affairs are not limited just to NATO. There is the whole problem of national defence, which takes in Canadian sovereignty, NORAD, peacekeeping and many other aspects of Defence. We must look at all avenues. Our committee, because of this limitation of time and our being forced to come to a conclusion by certain deadline, had to confine itself solely to our participation in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. We did not have enough time to hear evidence regarding all aspects even in regard to this limited question. I think every member of the committee would agree with this statement.

Our committee made a report which said that we could not make a recommendation in terms of role or numbers of forces in Europe, or whether we should be involved in a nuclear strike force or maintain a mechanized brigade. We could say nothing with regard to any of these matters. We felt that the matter was of sufficient importance that we as a committee, and the government, give these questions urgent consideration.

There is one element of our report that does not ring entirely true with the government's proposals. Recommendation No. 3 of the report said we should maintain our present role in Europe until such time as the major equipment of our mechanized brigade and air role in Europe was phased out and became obsolete. We made that recommendation in good faith. I think we felt it was quite important. But I am the first to admit that because I did not study the nature of this whole matter there is reason to question even one's own decision in this regard.

An hon. Member: You had lots of chance to study it.

Mr. Cafik: We did not study the question of role.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you?

Mr. Cafik: Because we did not have time. In any event, I would appreciate it if the hon.

member would be kind enough to save his interruptions for another speaker.

I would like to talk about the recommendations made by the committee. The first was that we remain in NATO. If you read the motion before the house today, you must come to the conclusion that this is exactly what the government wants to do.

In our second recommendation, which is a very important one and I think much of the controversy involves this question, we said that Canada should continue to maintain forces in Europe as a contribution to the collective defensive arrangements of NATO. I subscribe to this principle, the vast majority of the members of the committee subscribe to it and, in my interpretation of what the Prime Minister has said, he subscribes to it as well. In this regard I should like to quote the following from the motion:

—to take early steps to bring about a planned and phased reduction of the size of the Canadian forces in Europe.

A reduction is not a withdrawal. I do not think you can reduce the forces to nothing and still be honest with the terms of this motion.

Mr. Woolliams: Who said they were honest?

Mr. Cafik: I believe the Government said exactly what it means—a phased reduction. It is very important to know whether it is going to be reduced to such an extent that our contribution would become token and meaningless. I would be absolutely opposed to that now, and in the future on the basis of the information I now have. However, I do not think that that is the intent of this motion. I think that we are going to maintain our forces in Europe and we are going to play a role in the defence of the free world through our participation in the NATO alliance.

I will give a couple of arguments supporting my belief that it is extremely important that we maintain a physical presence in Europe. First of all I believe, on the basis of evidence, that the real threat to international peace lies in Europe. This is where the two superpowers have sufficient interest at stake that a nuclear war could occur. That is what the NATO alliance is all about, and I believe that is why we must remain a part of it.

The next point is that there is nothing more valuable for us as a parliament to do than to ensure that our government takes appropriate action to preserve peace and avoid a nuclear war. That is in the interest of every citizen, whether he has good or bad housing. Whatever his problem is I think he wants to live more than he desires some of these other things. The preservation of peace is the most important thing. Our job is to determine how we can best achieve this lofty objective. I believe it is very important that we maintain a presence in Europe in order to achieve that absolutely basic and essential objective.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cafik: Some may argue that we can rely upon the nuclear deterrent of the United States or upon the nuclear stalemate between the two superpowers. I say that this is not looking at the whole question, according to the evidence that I have heard from those who gave evidence and who spoke to us in Europe. The problem in Europe is to have a conventional force that would make the nuclear power of the U. S. credible.

If you withdrew all the conventional forces in NATO from Europe, you would do nothing more than to encourage Russia to expand its territory and dominate Europe completely. So we must do something to stop that. It is not reasonable to expect the United States to start a nuclear exchange with Russia, which would surely destroy both countries, in the event that Russia or the Warsaw Pact countries were to move forward a little bit in Europe. It is too monstrous to believe that any rational person would destroy his whole nation over such an issue. So to restrain them we must prove to Russia that we can respond in more than just a nuclear manner. We must have the conventional capacity to wage a conventional war in Europe in order to avoid a nuclear war. I think that that is part of the reason why our troops in Europe are necessary and important.

The third recommendation that we made in the committee regarding the long-term military role of Canada is consistent with phase two of the government's review. However, I would be very interested to find out what their conclusions will be, and I think we would all be interested in making this determination. I do not think you can predict from the resolution exactly what it means or where it leads. I believe the government intends to keep Canadian forces in Europe and to play a meaningful role there.

The fifth recommendation by the committee is in regard to the role played by Canada in NATO toward the achievement of a détente and balanced force reductions in Europe consistent with the Harmel report. I believe that that is totally consistent with all the statements ever made by the Prime Minister with regard to our foreign affairs and defence policy.

In conclusion I should like to say that I oppose the amendment proposed by the Leader of Her Majesty's Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). I do so because I do not honestly and sincerely believe that the government through this motion is retreating into isolationism. There is ample evidence that the government, probably more than any other government that I know of, is doing exactly the reverse. For this reason I cannot support the amendment. Second, I cannot possibly support the amendment to the amendment proposed by the New Democratic party, which in effect calls for real isolationism and for a complete withdrawal from Europe. I do not think this is in the interests of Canada or of the free world. Third, so far as the Prime Minister's motion is concerned I wish to say that I am willing to support it and I do so without any reservation, trusting that we will in effect play a meaningful role in the preservation of peace in this country and in the world. We Canadians have more to lose from a nuclear war than most countries in Europe. We are between two superpowers and we must ensure that they do not engage in nuclear war. I am confident we will play a meaningful, viable and realistic role for peace in the world in which we live today.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) speak eloquently on the trip we made with the committee on external affairs and national defense, in conjunction with the review of Canada's role within NATO.

The hon. member for Ontario seems to have changed his mind quite a bit since that trip on which he was one of those who recommended most strongly to the committee that Canada should continue to keep forces in Europe to participate in NATO's joint defence agreements.

His speech this afternoon contradicts the remarks and claims he made to the committee to the effect that Canada should be allowed, as before, to keep troops overseas under its NATO commitments, and to play the role it should.

During the election campaign, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke to us of a policy of participation. I wonder if that was his goal in advocating a review of Canada's foreign policy with regard to NATO, for we have heard several ministers say exactly the contrary to what they had formerly advocated in this house.

At this point, I should like to mention the statements made in this house by the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), and especially the firm and categorical assertions of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux), who repeatedly stated that Canada should stay in NATO and continue in the role it has played for 20 years.

I wonder whether the involved and timid statement of the Prime Minister on the role Canada should now play within NATO and on the reduction of its forces may not have had as sole purpose to save the face of the cabinet and tone down the differences of opinions within the cabinet and amongst government members.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, there were 17 Liberal members accompanying the delegation on the visits we made across Europe in the course of that trip. I may be mistaken but there were at least 14 of them who shared the opinion now expressed by the opposition, which is that Canada should remain in NATO, take time before reducing its forces and prevent its foreign policy from getting bogged in isolationism and continentalism.

Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of National Defence has, so far, tempered his statements about the position adopted by the cabinet and the Prime Minister, it is due to the fact that he is a very patient man. I am convinced that he shares the opinion of the opposition and whenever he feels he should state that our role within NATO should be maintained in order to preserve world peace and to sustain the prestige of Canada among the concert of nations, he will always win the admiration and support of the members on this side of the house.

Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Ontario said earlier, we have indeed visited many countries, including England where we met the Minister of Defence and the Foreign Secretary.

We also have been to Geneva where we met with Mr. Ignatieff, Canada's representative on the disarmament Commission, who said, it substance, that he did not believe that Canada would decide to review its role within NATO with the purpose of curtailing its military forces since by so doing Canada would jeopardize its prestige in the eyes of the Disarmament Commission of which it is now a member.

As I said a short while ago, we met the Defence Minister and the Foreign Secretary of Great Britain. Even if that country has already reduced its armed forces within NATO, we were asked not to follow suit because this would have dire results for the future of the Alliance.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that all the people that we met were wrong all at the same time. The Prime Minister and the cabinet surely cannot convince us that they are the only ones to be right when Canada's role within NATO is under review.

We also visited a neutral country, Sweden, and we know how much this country is spending for national defence in an effort to safeguard its neutrality. We were told that should that country be attacked, it would still go to NATO to find protection for the national territory.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe that all those experienced people who live in those circles, who have been dealing with NATO for 20 years, who keep in touch with defence experts, have been backing the wrong horse. I would rather support the argument of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) to the effect that we should stay within NATO as long as international relations are as tense as they are now.

The Prime Minister said in his speech that he was charged with having made a premature announcement, and, in my estimation, it was.

If we consider what happened recently in Czchoslovakia, we realize that Russia and its satellites have concentrated in Europe considerable forces of an extraordinary mobility that startled our allies. When it invaded Czechoslovakia, Russia initiated an international crisis. Had NATO, a deterrent force, not existed, we can wonder if the Russians would not have invaded Berlin, thus launching another world war.

In my view, that is the reason for the existence of NATO. In twenty years of existence, because of its deterrent capacity, its efforts to reduce international tension and its strength of which it convinced the enemy, the organization was successful in avoiding major and minor conflicts. At present, its role and its existence are still justified, if we do not want another world war to happen.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, I strongly support the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition, because I am convinced that it is still the best policy Canada could follow in 1969.

Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker for the Conservative party, the former Minister of National Defence, stated the reasons why we should not withdraw from NATO nor, least of all, reduce our forces.

It is obvious—and all the experts we met during our trip said so quite clearly—that should Canada decide to reduce its forces serving under NATO, it would create some kind of psychosis in the other member countries. It would weaken the morale of those countries which might then be inclined to follow the example of Canada as far as its foreign policy is concerned.

The decision of the present government will contribute shortly to the disintegration of NATO and it will also encourage some NATO members, as I was saying a moment ago, to follow the example of Canada and to reduce their forces.

The government's decision aimed at reducing its forces within NATO is going to diminish the prestige of Canada within international organizations, above all as far as disarmament and détente are concerned in the world.

How shall we be able, in the future, to be a member of the great international organizations which are engaged in disarmament if we are no longer interested in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization? We have allies that we must support and help, and we know also that the best defence for Canada is still that of Europe. Even if the Prime Minister would like to convince Canadians that his policy would enable taxpayers to save money, I think that if he withdrew Canadian troops to ensure a more adequate defence of our territory, Canadian taxpayers would not save anything. If air-borne forces were sent to help the members of the Alliance, I think, with figures to support me, that it would not save money to the Canadian taxpayers but that on the contrary it would entail additional expenditures.

So, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that the government's decision to reduce its forces within NATO will contribute to increase the antagonism of the Warsaw Pact countries.

What struck me most after the statement of the Prime Minister of Canada regarding the review of our role within NATO was that not a single allied country congratulated the Canadian government. We have received official congratulations only from the U.S.S.R.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all hon. members know that the main enemy for Europe, Canada and the United States is still the U.S.S.R. If I were the Prime Minister of Canada, I would beware of congratulations offered me by the U.S.S.R. for a reduction of our forces in NATO.

I feel that this will not lead the Warsaw Pact countries to behave in a more conciliatory manner in dealing with the NATO countries.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this decision is untimely. The Prime Minister should heed the advice of the Minister of National Defence who is supposed to have said several times the opposite in some statements he made in public.

This decision of the government will tarnish, as I said, our international image. Canada will no longer play the role it played before, when he was chosen as mediator in conflicts that arose now and then in the world.

For all these reasons, and after hearing all the evidence during that trip, I approve straight away the amendment proposed by my party leader. In my opinion Canada should reverse the decision to reduce our forces in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Mr. Speaker, during the last election campaign we were told about a policy of participation and I am wondering why members of the committee on external affairs and national defence were sent in Europe. We studied the problems on the spot. We gathered information. We rubbed elbows with experts and met important peoples. Upon our return, we presented immediately our report to the house and under paragraph 2 of this report we stated that Canada should continue to maintain forces in Europe according to the terms of the NATO collective defence agreements. We gave a lot of thought to this during our trip back and it was almost unanimously that we made this recommendation.

I wonder why the cabinet did not take our recommendations into account. What has become of the policy of participation of the present government and particularly what is the value, the importance given to the work of our committees? When reports presented to the house, like the one concerning NATO, are put aside by the Prime Minister, it is frustrating.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I must say that the amendment moved by the leader of my party is practical and clearly reflects the present circumstances as far as the international tension is concerned. I hope that the Liberal members who went on that trip and considered the problem of Canada's participation in NATO, will, upon thinking things over, support the amendment moved on behalf of my party, to show their disagreement with the Prime Minister's statement which is confusing and does not offer anything new in respect of the review of Canada's role in NATO.

[English]

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, having heard the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) speech yesterday and having given it much consideration, I respectfully submit that he has taken a bold initiative to strengthen our country's foreign policy. He has stated that no other parliament will make our foreign policy. I contrast that remark with those of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who said we have waffled, bungled and watered down our foreign policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gibson: He accused the government of being isolationist. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Our country at this time is busily engaged at Geneva at the disarmament conference. Ambassador George Ignatieff is taking a prominent part in the discussions in one of the highest councils of the world in an effort to secure world peace. He outlined to members of the committee some far-reaching, broadly visionary, and practical schemes to bring about détente. In light of that I ask, is this a government of isolationism? I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, it is absolute poppycock to call Canadian policy isolationist.

Hon. members probably know that the external affairs committee made a report.

An hon. Member: Where is it?

Mr. Gibson: They will also know that we visited Geneva and heard outlined a program for disarmament. That program is being negotiated at this time in the highest council of the world at Geneva. Efforts are being made by our Canadian representative. I ask, which country made an effort to bring the Warsaw Pact and NATO countries together at the conference table in order to secure détente? It was Canada. Is this the country of isolationism the Leader of the Opposition speaks of? If it is, it certainly is not the one I know and am proud to represent.

I believe our responsibilities toward NATO require a significant change. As the Prime Minister said yesterday, we should not always be tied to heavy armour and tanks.

An hon. Member: Nobody said that.

Mr. Gibson: We want to question NATO's present role, and to reserve the right to question it. That is what we are doing. We believe in leaving troops in NATO, but we also believe in locating them where they can be used most efficiently. At any rate, I advocate that. I believe the armoured brigade is too fixed in nature. Germany is better able to supply armour in Europe than is Canada.

Personally, I advocate a highly mobile armoured force. It should be lightly armoured but air transportable so that it can be used in Canada, Europe, or as a peacekeeping force in other areas. I think this would bring about a more practical use of our arms than has been the case in the past. Having an armoured brigade anchored to one spot and geared to staying in Europe ad infinitum, does not show much imagination. I think that the role of our forces ought to be changed significantly. As light, mobile forces they should be geared to undertaking operations anywhere in the world as peacekeeping forces.

Members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence visited Europe. We had an opportunity to examine Canada's role in NATO, and we began with Cyprus. It is with great pride that I report on the role Canadians are playing as part of the United Nations peacekeeping force in Cyprus. Our men are setting an example to the entire world. Do they come from a country geared to the isolationism the Leader of the Opposition speaks of? Our troops have preserved the peace in Cyprus for over two years in co-operation with other United Nations troops. I have heard predictions that, in co-operation with unarmed United Nations observers, we shall accomplish a very great step forward in peacekeeping roles under the United Nations.

On visiting France and Germany we saw that our forces were well trained, well equipped and doing a first rate job. Their morale was high. I wish to commend the way officers and men are carrying out their duties. As I said a moment ago, we saw Ambassador Ignatieff at Geneva and we also were able to capture the spirit which will lead to future disarmament. Fostering this spirit is, I believe, one of our primary roles.

In Sweden we were entertained by members of a civilized and neutral country. They were most hospitable and friendly. One must remember that Sweden is much smaller than Canada and does not share a 3,000-mile border with the United States. Neither do they lie between the United States and Russia. While neutralism may work for Sweden, it would be an unrealistic role for Canada to adopt.

After having heard relatively harsh discussions in Paris, we were heartened at Brussels, in Belgium, to hear the brilliant and hopeful words of Mr. Harmel, foreign minister of Begium. His belief, shared by many who served on our committee, is that we should seek multilateral withdrawal of troops from Europe as a means to détente. That is No. 5 among our recommendations, and we have viewed this matter very seriously indeed. We all stand by that recommendation so far as I know. Any members that I have spoken to certainly stand by our obligation to negotiate a détente with the Warsaw Pact nations.

I personally believe that our role in NATO must always be by physical presence. Any realistic alliance requires presence of forces to demonstrate solidarity of purpose. I believe that serious discussion must continue at the highest level toward multilateral disarmament. I am distressed that the NATO-Warsaw Pact Conference seems to have bogged down in interminable technical delay. I submit we should press on with those discussions immediately. I urge a demonstration of our intention to carry out our policy of détente. I believe détente can best be achieved by conferences such as are proceeding in Geneva. I urge the government to open up discussions with the Warsaw Pact countries and NATO immediately.

In keeping with my leader and members of the committee, I do not believe we have let this country down one bit by asserting our own independence. We stand as an independent nation. We are not dominated by those in Europe or anywhere else. We are very independent. We are being led forward to assert ourselves as an entity. I have confidence in the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux). We will maintain our genuine solidarity by keeping troops in Europe.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, it is puzzling to know what the main motion means. Of late it is being said that God is dead. Yesterday and today I have been thinking that whether or not that is true, surely Mackenzie King is still alive! There has been a great effort here to flutter with the hawks and coo with the doves at the same time.

We are today examining NATO itself. We are putting that alliance under scrutiny. We must look at the effect upon us of the dimunition of our role. That is exactly what it is. We must also look at the effect of Canada adopting such a policy. NATO has always been under attack by those who are our enemies. It has always been regarded by them as a militant group, a collection of war-like nations.

We find in the arguments put forward by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and others the suggestion that NATO has seemingly become an inhibitor to Canada in the whole field of foreign policy.

In Calgary the Prime Minister stated that NATO had become practically all of our foreign policy. He said we had no foreign policy of any importance except that which flowed from NATO. He said, "We do not want a military alliance or defence policy to pre-empt our choice." Does NATO pre-empt all our choices? Is it NATO which contributes to world tension? Is NATO deterring the détente? Is NATO a threatening alliance? Does NATO really menace eastern Europe? Would Canada be a better and more effective member of the United Nations if we were not a NATO member? Not much mention has been made of the United Nations by the Prime Minister. What would happen if we were a less active or non-member of NATO? Are we less competent in the world scene because of our membership in NATO?

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was also in Calgary. He said:

> This arrangement gives smaller members of the alliance like Canada a chance to participate in the making of policy on a wide range of major issues of concern to us that we would not have in any other circumstances.

Because of our NATO membership, are we inhibited in our pursuit of peace and in our efforts to play a more meaningful role in diminishing world tension and decreasing ignorance, want and starvation? I submit to the Secretary of State for External Affairs that on the question of suffering in Biafra other members of this alliance were able to do far more than we did and the alliance did not inhibit them. Are our efforts to bridge the gulf between the haves and the have-nots, the developed and developing nations, vitiated by our membership card in NATO? Is the NATO tag inhibiting the entrance to Peking? One of the first members to go through that door was Britain. Are we inhibited from relationships with the Vatican because we are a NATO member? Hardly! Have we really been tied in such a strait-jacket by our NATO membership? Has there been anything we could have done in the world scene to follow the goal set out by the Prime Minister which we were kept from doing because of being a NATO member?

Is the dimunition of our NATO role being put forward as a means whereby a greater degree of our national budget will be allocated for other activities such as external aid? This we do not hear. Another such suggestion which has been made is that if it is not harmful to our greater and broader efforts, NATO has reached a stage where our contribution can be diminished. It has been said that Europe can defend itself. We must look at this in a thoughtful way. We are not involved in NATO to defend Europe, but in fact to defend ourselves. The Secretary of State for External Affairs in his famous Calgary speech said:

> —I cannot escape the conclusion that what happens in Europe matters very much to Canada. Our interests there cover many areas—history, culture, trade and finance, to mention only a few. Perhaps the most fundamental of all, however, relates to the fact that it is in Europe that the vital interests of the superpowers are in starkest confrontation, so that there is the greatest chance of a conflict escalating into a nuclear war. Because of Canada's geographic position between the two superpowers, this war would be fought out above our very heads. This is why Canada has a direct, selfish interest in the prevention of war.

There is no suggestion there that Europe could take care of itself.

Mr. Sharp: That was the speech I was going to make when I was interrupted.

Mr. Thompson: You should have planned your time a little better.

Mr. Macquarrie: I do not want to be interrupted because I do not have much time. NATO by its continuing existence as an international alliance has established quite a record of longevity. It has demonstrated an emotional solidarity and common awareness of values which makes it quite a significant organization. I agree with those who believe it has done far better in military co-operation than in non-military matters. This I deplore and regret.

• (4:20 p.m.)

This is an area in which we should give an increasingly active lead. There are questions about military obsolescence about which we laymen do not know. I am a bit disturbed when I hear about submarine chasers whose top speed is a little slower than the submarines they are supposed to be chasing. There are questions of hardware. Of course there are. I think it would have been far more helpful in this instance if we had had a clear statement of what we are basing these decisions on. Are we withdrawing troops to save money? Are we to dismantle our military establishment and make an alternative use of this portion of our national budget? This has not been said. No one should suggest that Canada is inhibited by its NATO membership from doing the things which as a highly developed and long-time, internationalist-minded, sensitive nation it should be doing to help other nations.

The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) has gone back to the proposal for a cadre of peacekeepers. This is an attractive suggestion, but the sad part of it is that as I look at the decisions taken in the various bodies of the United Nations there seems not to be as great an acceptance of this idea as there was originally.

There are many decisions on foreign aid which the government could have taken long ago irrespective of whether or not Canada was to remain in NATO. We have a most excellent man directing our international development agency. We have built up a good reputation in the field of foreign aid, although it is true we have made a number of bloopers, but I cannot believe that a country with our limited resources can mount a meaningful program of aid to 64 countries all over the world. Surely we should approach more effectively the matter of foreign aid without divesting ourselves of our NATO role. It is not NATO which is preventing us from being more active in that important field.

I agree with those who stress that the great crisis ahead is between those who belong to the have nations and those who belong to the have-not nations of the world. At the United Nations a few years ago I heard a great statesman say that the decisions for the next generation may very well be decided by the people who live south of the equator, whose problems at present are monumental and whose resources are so very minimal. But there are many things we should do without looking on NATO as an excuse for inaction. There is an area to our south crying out for greater aid. The former British West Indies in the Caribbean area is a place where there are grave problems. A just mixture of Canadian interest and involvement could do wonderful things there, and perhaps make all the difference between economic and political stability and viability and something else.

I am sorry to say that this argument has been based not upon fundamentals but the suggestion that to change, to be contemporary, is somehow to be profound and to be clever. One remark I noted by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn), in a speech which impressed me as—I would not like to call it nationalistic jingoism, but if somebody else said that I do not have the argumentation to deny it—was that:

> Our policies may sometimes be right; they may sometimes be wrong. But the important thing, to my mind, is that they will be made in Canada.

I say that a homemade fiasco is still a fiasco. The important thing is that these policies be made wisely and well so that they will be in Canada's interests. It is in Canada's interests not to look upon itself only, not to turn inward but to look upon its place in the world scene, to consult with its allies, to look over the opportunities and the challenges of the broad world, and not to rest upon the laurels of being novel or of being excessively nationalistic so that whatever blunders are made we can proudly say in the future that not only did we do something new in the realm of stupidity but we did it alone here in Canada.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I intend to support the government motion because it goes in the direction I would like to go, but I want to make it clear that I do not find it completely satisfactory. Much will depend on what is meant by "early steps", and much will depend on what is meant by "planned and phased reduction." I would like "early" to mean as soon as possible, and I would like "planned and phased reduction" to mean a complete withdrawal of our forces from Europe.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced this policy on April 3 he said that the cabinet had only agreed to the following propositions, first, that Canada would remain in the NATO alliance and, second, that there would be a planned and phased reduction of Canadian forces in Europe. When he was questioned as to the extent and timing of the phased reduction he announced that these matters would be dealt with in phase two of his study. I understood by this that everything was open, including complete withdrawal. Of course I realize that this is an optimistic interpretation and that the statement could also mean that there could be a reduction of our troops in Europe but not a complete withdrawal. According to my colleague who sits behind me and to my left, it means that Canadian forces will definitely be left in Europe but, as I say, I hope the reduction will lead to a complete withdrawal.

As a member of the External Affairs Committee I participated in the complete study of the NATO question, including the two months' study in Canada and the two weeks' study in Europe. In reply to some of the criticism that was levelled against that committee I wish to say that I feel the study the committee made in Europe was extremely valuable. If the Canadian government is going to spend millions of dollars in Europe through defence and external affairs, it is important that the elected representatives of the Canadian people find out how this money is being spent and why.

As a result of our studies I came to the conclusion that we should remain a member of the NATO alliance and that there should be a withdrawal of our troops from Europe. I would like to discuss both of these propositions. The Prime Minister said that our foreign policy should come first and that our military policy should follow our foreign policy objectives. I fully agree. I feel that our foreign policy objectives should be peace between nations, justice between nations, and security for nations from aggression, intervention and domination, and I believe that in pursuing those objectives we should remain in the NATO alliance.

At present in Europe there is a situation that is potentially dangerous for world peace. There is much at stake in Europe which contains the two most completely devastating armed camps in the world, the Warsaw Pact nations and the NATO troops. It is in Europe that a minor incident could easily escalate into a major war quicker than in any other place in the world.

If the confrontation is between the Warsaw Pact and NATO then Canada should be sitting at the council table within NATO to make sure that the policies of NATO are those of détente and disarmament vis-à-vis the Warsaw Pact, rather than of war. Our policy within NATO should be one leading toward détente, as the Harmel report has said and as NATO itself has said on several occasions. It should be a policy of trying to bring about disarmament and limitation of arms with the Warsaw Pact countries. I would hope that Canada, within NATO, will continue to pursue that policy, especially now following the Czechoslovakian incident which some members of NATO seem to interpret as an opportunity for increasing our armaments in Europe. I would be opposed to that. I would hope we would not use it as an opportunity to escalate the arms race in Europe but would keep cool and try to still bring about some disarmament and some détente.

If our policy within NATO is one of détente, then I think our military role in NATO must follow our political role. Therefore I would think the only policy for Canada in NATO consistent with a policy of détente is to withdraw our troops from Europe and earmark for NATO troops that will be stationed in Canada.

I should like to discuss the reasons for that policy. Some members who have spoken in this debate, one of whom was the Leader of the Opposition, have said they would like someone in this house to prove it is better for our security to have troops in Canada than to have troops in Europe. Well, if by withdrawing our troops from Europe we bring about a situation of détente, then that in my opinion would be protecting our security. I believe it is in the interests of our security to try to reduce the confrontation in Europe and try to bring about a détente. Therefore I think it is much more in the interests of our security to have our troops here in Canada than in Europe. I do not think it is a natural situation in peacetime for the troops of a country situated across an ocean to be placed in a country in Europe and strung along a so-called front, what would almost appear to be a wartime front.

I also feel that we in Canada with our limited resources are trying to play too many roles. We are not a large country. We are a country of approximately 20 million people. Yet, we find our forces in five areas of the world. We find them within Canada playing a possible defence role. We have troops stationed here for several purposes. We play a military role in the Atlantic and we play a military role in the Pacific with the Pacific arm of our navy. We are playing a peacekeeping role in the United Nations and we have troops in Europe. I have not mentioned the fact that we also have an Arctic Ocean frontier.

Many people, especially those in Europe, who look at Canada think of Canada as only an Atlantic nation. It is not. We have ties with Europe and look toward the Atlantic and Europe, but we are also a Pacific nation. We are also a very large nation in territory and yet we have a sparse population. So I feel that if we are to make the best use of our resources for defence and security we must have a specialized role. I see that specialized role as one where we have armed forces stationed in Canada which would be of a nature that they could be used for Canadian purposes, for United Nations peacekeeping purposes and for NATO purposes, but stationed in Canada and earmarked for NATO to be used in an emergency.

Some members who have spoken during this debate have spoken as if our withdrawal of troops from Europe meant a withdrawal from the military role altogether. Several Conservative members have said that this afternoon. Either they have not read the motion or they have not been listening to the debate. Nobody on this side has suggested we should completely withdraw our troops from NATO. Many countries which are members of NATO do not have troops along the east-west German frontier, but they still have a military commitment to NATO. The North Atlantic Treaty does not say that members of NATO must keep troops in Europe. It says that if one of the countries of NATO is attacked the other countries must come to its assistance, all subject to the U.N. charter. As pointed out by the Prime Minister, many countries which are members of NATO have their troops on their own soil playing a home defence role but also earmarked for NATO. When we joined NATO we did not have any troops in Europe. We sent them to Europe only during the Korean war period.

One of the arguments against a policy of keeping troops in Canada rather than in Europe is that there will be a re-emergence of German militarism. It was suggested that with the withdrawal of our troops the gap would have to be filled by the German army. When I was in Europe with the committee we met many German politicians, prominent journalists and military people. I must say that I was greatly impressed by the democratic attitude of the Germans. I personally do not feel that the majority of the people of Germany today have any sympathy whatsoever with militarism or nationalism. I get the impression they are bending the other way. If they are to be our allies I think we must not be ambivalent in our attitude toward them. If they are to be our allies I believe we should trust them and let them play a role with us in the alliance that is suitable in relation to their size and so on. I do not suggest that they should have nuclear arms or that any other country in the alliance should have nuclear arms. I feel, however, that it is a red herring to bring into the argument a suggestion that we should not withdraw our troops from Europe because this will in some way encourage German militarism.

Second, there is the argument that if we did withdraw our troops from Europe we would not be paying our way or pulling our full load. Again I think this argument fails to recognize the fact that in withdrawing our troops from Europe we would still be earmarking troops for NATO but they would be stationed in Canada. We would be doing the same thing that is being done by many other countries in NATO which are not accused of not paying their way or not pulling their share of the load. I must point out that when people make that type of argument they do not realize that Canada, after all, is a NATO country and that Canadian territory is NATO territory. By keeping our troops in Canada and earmarking them for emergencies we are contributing to NATO and paying our way. As a matter of fact, right now and in the past few years I think we have been paying too much to NATO.

I should like to spend a few minutes discussing some of the arguments raised by other hon. members. I found the speech of the Leader of the Opposition very disappointing. He spoke for approximately 40 minutes and spent the whole time in a negative way attacking the speech made by the Prime Minister. He did not put forward an alternative proposal to that put forward by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Brewin: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Allmand: I am afraid not. I have only 15 minutes and it goes by quickly. If I have time at the end I would be pleased to answer a question. Even the amendment put forward by the Leader of the Opposition is expressed in negative terms. On the other hand, I am much in sympathy with the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), although I was not too much in sympathy with his speech which was the usual partisan speech filled with demagogic clichés and so on. He also attacked the Prime Minister, but at least he put forward an alternative policy.

The Leader of the Opposition, however, put forward no alternative policy and spent the whole 40 minutes in a very negative way. This was in great contrast to the Prime Minister who did not indulge in personalities and discussed foreign policy at a very high level. Personally I thought he made a very good speech and gave me encouragement that he will finally—

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member to tell him his time has expired.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, owing to the time one has, I can only deal with one or two points. I want to say at the outset that I find the announced government policy on NATO to be an unhealthy compromise resulting from a lack of will to do precisely what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) orated about yesterday, namely, to deal with the world of today and refuse to be bound by the actions of yesterday. I also say before I go any farther, and this follows the position our leader expressed yesterday along with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), that we cannot vote for the Conservative amendment because, despite its wording which was rather original, obviously what the Conservatives want is the status quo for Canada in NATO and, indeed, to strengthen our military contribution. We do not agree with this and will therefore vote against the amendment.

On April 13 when the Prime Minister first announced his so-called policy, and I have to say that because I do not yet know what it is, I said at a press conference in the absence of my leader that the Prime Minister's statement made that day was imprecise and confusing. That still remains true. His excuse appears to be that he has not yet completed the review of our foreign and defence policies. First, I cannot understand that or why it should take so long in view of the immense resources at the disposal of the government. In any case I would say, without intending to be offensive but very sincerely and firmly, that if the Prime Minister has not yet decided on his policies then he should stop talking as if he had. If he has nothing to tell parliament or the people of Canada he should say so instead of indulging in general lectures which merely add to confusion at home and to uncertainty abroad.

If the Prime Minister's statement means anything at all in so far as one can gather what it means, then his analysis leads to the clear and inevitable conclusion that Canada should withdraw all its forces from Europe as quickly as possible after consultation with its allies. Why do I say that? Time and again the Prime Minister at his press conference on April 3, in his speech on April 12 in Calgary, and in speech yesterday, emphasized that our military contribution in Europe is marginal that it is insubstantial and that our proper role in NATO is political rather than military. We agree with all of that and I agree with him also that the situation in western Europe has changed. When NATO was first established that part of the world was economically devastated and militarily dismantled. Today, fortunately, western Europe is economically and, therefore, militarily strong. The Prime Minister said this on more than one occasion and we agree with him in this analysis.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the Prime Minister had the courage of his convictions then the clear and inescapable conclusion from this analysis would be that Canada's forces in Europe serve no useful purpose and ought to be totally withdrawn. Instead of this unequivocal policy which the N.D.P. has proposed for a few years, and proposes now, we get from the government vague words about planned and phased reduction of our forces without being told when that reduction will take place, what the size of the reduction will be and at what point it will stop.

What is even more important, as far as I am concerned, is that I simply cannot follow the logic of a government which states that a mechanized brigade and six air squadrons in Europe provide no useful role but that a smaller commitment in Europe would. This is the kind of lack of logic which makes me question the integrity of the proposition that has been pushed on this parliament and the people of Canada.

I was a member of the external affairs committee and travelled through Europe. Every one of us got the impression that I suppose his predilections led him to receive. My experience from meeting with NATO military leaders all over Europe raised a very deep concern about that organization. It led me to the conclusion which I had been gradually working toward, but it emphasized an underlying conviction that NATO has become almost entirely a powerful military alliance.

What is worse, when you speak to the leaders of NATO you get the impression, at least I did, that it is almost entirely controlled by military objectives and psychology and that it is under the domination of military leaders. The political role of NATO, I suggest, has become minimal, but lip service continues to be paid to it with no effective steps being taken to seek détente in Europe. Nor has Canada taken any steps in NATO to seek such détente. Indeed, when a while ago the Warsaw Pact issued a direct invitation to meet with the NATO powers to discuss questions of a possible political solution and a reduction of forces in Europe, what did NATO do, with the participation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux)? NATO rejected that invitation.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): No.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, it rejected that invitation and substituted for that clear, intelligent and courageous invitation weasel words about the commencement of discussions to find out the subjects in respect of which further discussion might take place.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he know that the Budapest communique excluded the United States and Canada from the discussions?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the effect of the Budapest communique, but I put it differently. It was limited to European countries on both sides.

Mr. Sharp: Do you agree with that?

Mr. Lewis: No.

Mr. Sharp: Then why do you think we should accept it?

Mr. Lewis: It would have been wiser to acept the invitation, to arrive there as one NATO organization—

Mr. Sharp: We would not have been there.

Mr. Lewis: If they did not appear at that table then the hollowness of their attitude is exposed instead of the steps that were taken to—

Mr. Sharp: That is a political attitude, not a constructive one.

Mr. Lewis: It is a perfectly constructive one. Let me tell the minister that every time he does not do anything his excuse is that he is being constructive. That was his attitude in respect of Biafra and now of NATO. I am a little tired of this constructiveness of inaction.

The point I am making is that this latest act of the NATO political leadership is merely the end of a series of events showing a lack of serious steps toward détente or a discussion of détente. If I had the time I could go back to the Rapacki proposal and various other matters that have been discussed over the past 20 years, every one of which was stymied not only by the Soviet Union—indeed, not always by the Soviet Union—but by the military psychology of the NATO organization.

We were very glad yesterday to hear the Prime Minister emphasize that in his view NATO must pay more attention to the objectives of seeking a détente in Europe. I say, with the firmness of the words spoken by my leader yesterday, that the time has come for Canada to indicate that if it is to remain in the alliance the military control of NATO must cease, because that is the control now, and that a political direction must take priority in NATO's discussion of objectives. If NATO cannot make this adjustment, then no useful purpose can be served by Canada staying in it. Indeed, I want to say, speaking now for myself, I have reached the conclusion that Canada could play a more useful international role by withdrawing altogether from military alliances.

When one listens to members of the Conservative opposition, and to some extent to members of the Liberal party, one would think the world has never had any experience with military blocs. One would think there is not a whole history of the dangers of militant blocs, of the failure of military blocs to keep the peace. One would think that NATO, NORAD and SEATO were sudden inventions, post-second world war. The fact is that the world has been beset by military blocs for centuries, and every time they have failed to keep the peace. They may be necessary in some cases, they may even be useful in some cases, but by their very nature they are not the basis of possible peace and security for the world. One of the modern reasons why this is so was stated by the late President Eisenhower. When he warned us about the insatiable greed and hunger of the military-industrial complex in the United States, he knew what he was talking about. This American complex, aided and abetted by similar though smaller complexes in other countries, is in fact in control of NATO, as it is of other aspects of international and national policies, unfortunately.

I have, therefore, reached the conclusion that the time has come for a country like Canada to use its resources primarily to help raise the level of life in the developing nations, in the knowledge that the elimination of poverty and disease, lifting peoples who are now underdeveloped to a decent level of life, is an essential deterrent against war, an even more essential one than military confrontation. The time has come when Canada should use its resources in this way, rather than wasting them on military commitments of doubtful value, as the Prime Minister himself admits our commitment in Europe is. I suggest—and there is nothing original about this—that the time has come, and is in fact long overdue, when Canada should join with other, smaller countries in a relentless attack upon the insanity of the nuclear terror and on the international military-industrial complex which feeds it.

I suggest there are two facts in the modern world which any viable foreign and defence policy of a country like Canada—I am speaking only of our country—must take into account. The first is that the peace of the world now depends on the insane balance of nuclear terror, a balance that can at any moment be upset, either deliberately by some evil government or by accident by some stupid general. To rely upon the balance of nuclear terror seems to me to ask for the kind of destruction that all of us tremble may some time happen. Therefore in this case a country like Canada, without nuclear capability, not wishing to have any nuclear capability, ought in my opinion to give an immense amount of its resources, an immense amount of its energies, to every aspect of peace and disarmament negotiations in every part of the world. We should do more than that. We should speak out firmly and loudly against the continuing nuclear arms race. We should not be timid about telling Washington that we disapprove of the deployment of A.B.M.'s because they are a danger to the future peace of the world. We should do that.

An hon. Member: What about Russia?

Mr. Lewis: We should do that with Moscow, too, and every other military power. We should be one of the countries shouting against this kind of behaviour in the world. I am not naïve enough to think that merely Canada saying it will produce results, but I believe in something else and, if it is not true, there is no hope for the world. I believe that if a sufficient number of nations like Canada keep demanding that this insane nuclear arms race cease, if we all do it, if we all leave the military alliances so that no one can point the finger of satellite at us, as they can now, if a great enough number of countries make these demands and co-operate together to do so, at the United Nations and every other forum, eventually the sanity of the world's people will prevail. If this is not possible, there is no hope for the world.

The second major issue before the world is the question of hunger throughout the world and the danger this represents to the peace of the world. We ought to give a great deal of our resources and energies to this sphere of activity, to save and lift up the peoples of the world.

• (5:00 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to say a few words on the world situation, on NATO and on the present economic situation in Canada.

I believe it would be a good idea to give my speech the title: cannons at the expense of bread and Canadian lives. We must first establish peace amongst ourselves in Canada in order to ensure at the same time our security.

At the time present, we are faced with a rather complex international and national situation, as much for the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), as for the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux), for they must take sides and determine the nation's future, as well as the form of our participation in NATO.

Mr. Speaker, we have to remember, as was said by the leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas), that for the past 20 years we have contributed to the NATO forces and when we decided to follow that course it was for a major reason but on a temporary basis only. However the years have passed and this contribution continues.

I think the time has come to put an end to it.

The government should withdraw for two years all its troops from NATO and affect instead the money spent on defence to stimulate the Canadian economy, by building houses for the Canadian people who live in slums and pay rents of $200 or $300 a month which they cannot afford.

This is, Mr. Speaker, the humanitarian work we could do. The huge amounts spent on defence could be affected to building houses for the Canadian people, to develop industries with a view to providing work for Canadians. We could then two years later if necessary resume our participation to NATO.

But a pause of two years would enable the Canadian people to stabilize their economy because they are always faced with debts and outstanding taxes, and have to live in constant uncertainty only to pay off war debts or to contribute to some international defence system which might never be used.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that so much progress should enable us to provide our people and the destitute in other countries with the things that are essential to the well-being of man. Since we are called upon to live in a society where affluence and poverty exist side by side, our first duty, it seems to me, is to secure peace at home.

In the face of atomic war threats, there is no more urgent task than to ensure the protection of humanity. Rulers and ordinary citizens are all in the same boat, and if we are unable to find an effective means of securing peace, we are doomed to certain destruction.

In the face of all those nuclear arms and destruction hardware, we cannot afford to keep on maintaining our armed forces, which will be powerless against such tremendous weapons.

Mr. Speaker, people must put order and justice in their daily life, which is not what we are doing at present. We certainly do not put this principle into practice when we introduce bills such as the omnibus bill.

The solution to our problem is to live as men, to respect our fellowmen and to give every individual the opportunity to grow and to develop his personality.

Mr. Speaker, NATO forces should be reinforced, according to some people, under the pretext of fighting communism. But we are not even able to solve the problems of hunger and slums at home; yet, those are situations likely to promote communism. It is not with defence, or arms, or cold war that we shall fight communism.

With all our resources, our human capital, our monetary capital, our technology and our scientific research, we should be able to face communism.

Mr. Speaker, even if we are decided to do all that, we must be fully aware that it is only a materialistic force which will be used to contain communism for some time through strength and violence, but we shall never succeed by those sole means in ensuring order, justice and peace.

If we only set might against might and counterbalance ideology, we will never beat the communist world. Neither could we do so through fear or violence, in this atomic age.

We would only destroy ourselves because our system of debts and taxes, even with Canada's 21 million people and inexhaustible resources and with the help of American technology and increased aid. Our tremendous national debt paralyses our productive activities, our purchasing power and the development of our productivity.

We can no longer produce because industries are unable to borrow money at 10 per cent or even at 24 per cent.

If we increase our expenditures for defence and armaments in proportion to our responsibilities the government will have to increase taxes, when our debt is so high that owners have to sell their homes to pay taxes and the tribute to a few individuals who control the economic life of this country.

Without regard for human beings who have the right to live, all our initiatives are affected by the same cancer eating away the honest comfort of the people, in Canada as well as in Europe and in other parts of the world.

The same system is found everywhere, but with a few variations. We could, if we wanted to, make use of all our human and physical resources and continue to expand both our respective and our common means of defence.

We could also intensify research in all sectors and increase production in all fields, thus creating jobs for the unemployed who consider themselves as useless members of society and who live in insecurity, hardship and poverty. Those people form too large a part of our population.

The situation could be improved, provided we are determined to deal with the problems, instead of letting them grow until a war comes along to upset everything.

Technical problems call for technical remedies. That is why, Mr. Speaker, we are unable to find any solutions.

Hitler proved to us that war was not only a question of money, but a question of weapons and material. Germany did not lose the war because it lacked money, but because of a shortage of troops and material.

During the war, money was flowing freely all over the world. It was then a case of killing, slaughtering, destroying. However, when the war came to an end, the monetary problems and the European problems emerged once again. Development is only possible through borrowing, being loaded with debt, at extremely high interest rates. The rates varied from 2 to 3 per cent during the war. They have now reached 7, 9 and 10 per cent.

As far as the building of houses is concerned, we should consider the things I have just said. That is where the shoe pinches, that is what causes so much misery and so much worries to humanity in the sullied history which is ours. We could manage to find a solution for a good many of our problems by making financially possible what is physically possible, in every country, in accordance with their resources in manpower and material.

Mr. Speaker, in order to give my ideas a more concrete form, I would like the House to study a resolution regarding economy and finance. We are dealing with war and defence, and not of financial matters. We shall levy taxes, we shall overtax people—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the North Atlantic Treaty story goes back to the end of world war II. The western allies, demobilized and disarmed, determined to reconstruct and rebuild. Russia, with her forces intact, embarked on a program of expansion in Europe through communist subversion. By 1948 Berlin was blockaded and free Czechoslovakia fell to Soviet expansion. It is well to remind ourselves of these things. The western nations decided it was time to say to the communists: "Thus far—no farther." This required the organization of a collective defence system which could provide a credible shield for the entire Atlantic area. Thus the North Atlantic Treaty came to being and NATO was born. This was in 1949, just 20 years ago.

During the 20-year interval the people of Western Europe have enjoyed peace and prosperity. Why has this been so? The NATO-created balance of forces and a mutual determination to resist have prevented any further communist gains in Europe. As long as the Soviet Union shows no sign of reducing her forces, this balance must be maintained. The people of Europe understand these things very well, even though some in Canada do not. We who were with the defence committee in Europe recognized this attitude in every country we visited; it was reflected by everyone we spoke with.

Mr. Allmand: How did you know?

Mr. Thompson: I am referring to those who talked with us even though some of us may not have understood what they were saying.

It is strange that neither the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) nor any of the speakers on the government side have mentioned Czechoslovakia in this debate though in every country we visited every official to whom we spoke emphasized the events of last August when talking to us. Not one member on the other side has pointed out that the Warsaw Pact countries have continued a heavy military build-up.

The statistics are evidence of this situation. The combined strength of the Warsaw Pact countries in direct confrontation with the west is 170 divisions of ground forces with 7,000 aircraft. Combined NATO forces total 76 divisions and only 3,200 aircraft. In the central European sector where the Canadian forces are deployed the picture is even more lopsided. There are 100 ground divisions on the Warsaw Pact side with 3,400 aircraft. On the combined NATO side there are 26 divisions and 2,000 planes. These are the statistics for last year.

I come now to a further point, and I have not heard any member on the government side mention this either. Last year NATO reduced its forces by 80,000 troops. If the Warsaw Pact countries had any intention to de-escalate they would have decreased their forces in like number, as it was expected they might do because an attitude of détente was present in Europe. But this did not happen. Instead, the Warsaw Pact countries invaded Czechoslovakia.

Consider the case of Norway. At the time of joining NATO Norway required that no foreign troops should be located on its soil and that no nuclear arms should be placed there. With such a policy one might expect that the U.S.S.R. would place a lesser force on its common border with Norway than in other parts of Europe. But this has not been the case. There has been a continued build-up along this northern frontier as well.

It is obvious that Soviet policy regarding NATO is clear and simple: first, to weaken the will of individual NATO members to resist and, second, to split NATO into its European and United States components. I contend this is what the Prime Minister is bringing to pass with the policy he has now enunciated. We hear continued talk from some members of the government party and of the N.D.P. about the United States industrial-military complex. But I say that the industrial-military complex in the United States is ruled by a democratic government. Those same hon. members say nothing about the industrial-military complex in Russia where it is not ruled by a democratic process but rather where it is a law unto itself.

We need to remind ourselves that Khrushchev no longer rules in the Kremlin. The present rulers of the Kremlin are all older men trained under Stalin, men who have obviously reverted to a Stalinistic policy which, under Khrushchev, had perhaps begun to change. There is no evidence in modern history that the communists have ever been ready to talk in face of weakness. On the other hand, that there is plenty of evidence that they do talk in face of strength. What happened in Czechoslovakia is clear evidence that the Soviets will use brute force whenever they can get away with it. This is why the conventional role of military equipment has not yet seen its day in Europe. The Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia. The NATO alliance is just as necessary today on the military side as it was in 1949.

We are asked now to accept the views of a man who has been entrusted with the great responsibility of the office of Prime Minister but who holds a pre-conceived idea of the world based on a doctrinaire ideology that the U.S.S.R. is mellowing, that there is no longer any danger of confrontation. Well, Mr. Speaker, the United Kingdom minister of defence told the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence that this was an ideological perch. He urged that the committee come down from that ideological perch and face the facts.

The Hon. Mr. Denis Healey said that the practical reality of life was that the basis of security and peace in Europe still depended upon a strong NATO. The day might come, he added, when de-escalation of the military aspect would be possible, and Britain would welcome it when it came, but under the present leadership and policies of the U.S.S.R. it was not yet a reality.

I would remind members of the New Democratic party, including the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), that the labour-socialist government in the United Kingdom, which they claim to be a party similar to their own, made it very clear that the policy advocated by the N.D.P. in this country was wrong. Today Britain is increasing its commitment to NATO in response to the situation which exists at the present time.

The Prime Minister said yesterday that those who criticize his policy as being isolationist have a fixation on old wars and old problems. I say to the Prime Minister that he is altogether wrong in this assumption. It is he who lives in a dream world, refusing to face the facts of life in 1969. His philosophy is not new. He promulgated it when he was part of the Peace Research Institute a few years ago. Chamberlain did the same in 1938. The only people he pleases are the bitter isolationists in the United States and those who smirk behind the curtains. Certainly he is not pleasing the Canadian people.

On December 1, 1968, the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion revealed that 64 per cent of the Canadian people believed that Canadian troops should continue to stay in Europe as part of the NATO forces. No wonder the government is split on this issue. The consensus of government members on the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence was that we should continue to play our part in NATO. This difference of opinion caused Senator Aird to resign. He refused to accept the kind of policies being advocated at present. No wonder the government is split in this regard.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with the Prime Minister. For one who took the position during world war II that the war was being fought between the imperialists and had nothing to do with Canada, and who in the years following world war II took another, well known position it must now be extremely difficult to enunciate a realistic defence policy. I do not believe the leader of our nation has the right to formulate a minority policy which would mean a breaking away of Canadian foreign policy from that of our friends and allies. Neither has he the right to discuss and formulate defence policies which are out of context with what is going on today in the world.

The Prime Minister talked about Canada withdrawing to a continental role and of his hope that Canada will lead in the field of disarmament research. I ask, what has the 17-nation United Nations commission on disarmament been doing for the past ten years? Those 17 nations, of which Canada is one, have done a commendable job. Has that commission succeeded? No, it has not. I remind the Prime Minister that the secret of disarmament will be found in the willingness of the U.S.S.R. to agree to disarmament. It is as simple as that, and the representatives of the 17 nations on the commission know it.

Recently the members of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence visited four NATO countries in Europe, one neutral nation and one non-aligned nation. Without exception all those nations did not want Canada to weaken NATO by withdrawing from it. Neither did our senior diplomatic and military personnel serving in Europe, who are authorities on this subject, wish us to withdraw.

It is interesting to note that Canada's defence budget, when it is related to gross national product, is far lower than that of any other NATO country. When he appeared before our committee the foreign minister of Belgium was asked what he thought of the possibility of Canada withdrawing in whole or in part from NATO. He answered quickly by saying: "Such action is incredible. We smaller nations need and must have the support of a larger middle power such as Canada, free and freedom loving." The statesmen of Europe said that the purpose of NATO is to keep the peace in Europe. It is to prevent hell in Europe and not to create heaven.

I submit that the purpose of NATO in part is to give the smaller nations a collective power and force which without NATO they would not have. They must have that force and influence both within and without NATO. This applies not only to the military role of NATO but also to the economic, political and cultural aspects as well. May I also point out that NATO has a secondary function, that of keeping the balance of power in Europe. Here I refer to the fact that as part of NATO Germany is a lesser threat to Russia or to anyone else than she would be if she were on her own and out of NATO.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that Canada's role in NATO is a positive one. It is a morale-building role. We uphold the morale of the smaller nations of the Atlantic community. The purpose of NATO also is to bring about strength through collective security. It is to strengthen neighbours and friends who are part of the Atlantic community. Above all, Mr. Speaker, NATO is a peacekeeping force. In fact, when we participate in NATO we participate in the most important peacekeeping role there is today in the world.

It is inevitable that this situation will change, and I hope it will change for the better. I hope that when changes come we shall be able to adapt to them. In the meantime our role in NATO must continue as at present, I also hope that our role on the economic, political and cultural planes will be enlarged. At present, however, reality demands that we should remain in NATO and that we should make our military contribution in Europe. Any new role to be undertaken ought to be worked out in co-operation with our NATO allies. There is no other way for us to act.

[Translation]

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak after my good friend from Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) in this debate, because he has just stated, I believe, that after all he fully supports the policy advocated by the government. In fact, he has just said that we must keep our membership in NATO and that we must make a realistic contribution in Europe. This is precisely the significance of the governmental policy.

My friend, the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Asselin), referred a while ago to the various statements which I have already made in this connection. I do not know if he was trying to embarrass me, but if so, he failed, because in the past I have said two things, among others, namely that I considered NATO as being essential to the security of Canada and that it had a part to play in addition to its military role.

Now, after extensive studies by the ministerial committee, we have in the first place rejected any suggestion leading to the neutrality of Canada. In the second place, we have stated that we adhered to the principles of collective security and thirdly, that we were going to maintain our membership in NATO. Consequently, I do not see why the position of the government could in any way embarrass me now, as a result of my previous statements.

Mr. Speaker, I have also stated on several occasions that, in my opinion, those defence matters should also seek both a détente and disarmament.

Unlike my good friend from York South, I am convinced that the Atlantic Alliance has made some valid efforts which furthermore have already proved successful.

For example, he raised the matter of the Budapest communique, and he said that Canada had never taken any initiative towards a détente, and that we had advised to reject the proposal from the Warsaw group.

I would remind him that the communique of the meeting in Washington insisted precisely on the fact that the participating nations had asked that the proposal be examined carefully and that there be efforts made to overcome the obstacles which, at first sight, seemed to prevent us from initiating the necessary negotiations right now.

We have also indicated that the discussions on the Budapest communique resulted from a Canadian paper on East-West relations. Therefore, I sincerely believe, Mr. Speaker, that to the extent that such action can be effective, Canada has already made a useful contribution to the cause of disarmament through NATO.

At the time my good friend opposite was Minister of National Defence, our participation to NATO was reduced as it was last year or this year, when I announced that we had to close the Zweibrücken base. The opposition did not blame us, because it was a realistic decision. By concentrating our forces in two bases, we were able to save money in the fields of administration and staff.

It was said also that no government member reacted when Czechoslovakia was invaded. Has it been forgotten, for example, that our reaction was to delay the decision to make a 20 per cent reduction in our air forces? That was how the Canadian government reacted to the invasion of Czechoslovakia.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Thompson: Might I just say one word? I was referring—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has had his full time.

[Translation]

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, we have now reached phase 2 of this long-term study, as was announced by the Prime Minister. It is now up to the Minister and to the Department of National Defence to translate the government's decision into military and realistic terms.

[English]

The purpose of this phase is to determine the kinds of forces and equipment best suited to carry out the military roles to meet defence policy objectives outlined in the statement of principle issued by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on April 3, 1969. It is a military planning phase. It involves detailed military plans and since a change in the operation of a complex force, is also involved, some hon. members will appreciate that considerable time inevitably will be taken before it is completed. In this process, we will be considering, inter alia, a number of alternative plans for the reduction of our forces stationed in Europe, and what type of forces we should continue to maintain to enable us to contribute effectively to collective security abroad.

In his statement yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said that Canada's resources, although immense, are not limitless. Let me add, sir, that the share of these resources at the disposition of the government also is not limitless, and that defence is one of many competing demands made upon these resources. Amongst the objectives of the government's defence policy outlined in the statement issued by the Prime Minister on April 3, there are two which I wish to emphasize.

First, that our forces will be capable of playing important roles in collective security and peace keeping. This, sir, is not an isolationist or fortress America objective. Second, that the structure, equipment and training of our forces must be compatible with their performance of the four roles: the surveillance of our territory, the defence of North America, support of NATO, and international peace keeping. In their present roles, our forces committed to NATO require different equipment and different training from the forces we maintain in Canada for national purposes and to carry out international peace keeping missions. The differences or incompatibilities in maintaining two different kinds of forces increase our defence costs and, if continued in the future, would increase them even more.

An objective of our current studies is, therefore, to develop in the next few years fully compatible forces, which will provide at the same time a capacity to play important roles in collective security and peace keeping. Unless all are prepared to accept a large increase in our defence expenditures, the present roles of our forces now in Europe limit our ability to achieve the posture for the Canadian forces which the government believes appropriate for the future. To overcome this, we must start now to convert our forces from their present roles in Europe and to plan the reduction of the total number of Canadian forces which are stationed there. The size and timing of these reductions remains to be decided when our planning is completed.

We have said all along that all this would be done in consultation with our allies. I do not see where we differ with the members on the other side on this particular point. The government has stated that it will begin consultations with our NATO allies on our proposals for the planned and phased reduction of the Canadian forces stationed in Europe at the ministerial meeting of the NATO Defence Planning Committee, which is to be held at the end of May of this year.

The normal procedure used by the NATO member nations to consult with each other regarding any changes which they plan to make in their forces assigned or earmarked for assignment to the integrated NATO commands, such as the Allied Command in Europe or the Allied Command Atlantic, is the NATO defence planning review. The May meeting of the Defence Planning Committee will initiate a new cycle in the NATO defence planning review, which for the first time will be carried out over a period of two years.

The main task of the defence ministers at this meeting will be to decide, in the light of an appreciation of the military situation to be presented by the NATO military authorities, what guidance, political, economic and financial, should be given to the NATO military planners as the basis for their preparation of the over-all NATO force plans for the years 1971 to 1975, inclusive. The major NATO commanders and the NATO military committee will develop their force plans in the light of the guidance provided by the ministers. Again, I refer to some of the remarks that this is entirely a military organization controlled by generals. This is not so. The political direction is clearly indicated in that procedure.

NATO force planning must take into account the military plans of the member nations, and I think it only reasonable, at the beginning of a new NATO planning cycle, that Canada should provide its allies and the NATO military staffs with as much indication of its planning intentions as is possible. It is my expectation, Mr. Speaker, that phase II of our defence policy review will have advanced sufficiently by the end of May, that I shall be able to present to my NATO colleagues a fairly detailed outline of that part of our force plans affecting our present NATO undertakings.

[Mr. Cadieux (Labelle).]

Hon. members will be aware that national undertakings to commit forces to the NATO commands are given for a period of one year. Our present undertakings extend to the end of 1969. As a part of the NATO defence planning review running separately from, but in parallel with, the development of the over-all force plans for the years 1971-75, we shall be asked during the next few months to inform NATO what forces we plan to commit to the NATO commands during the year 1970. Our plans for this one year will be reviewed with the NATO military authorities and our allies in the fall and we shall be asked to adopt them as firm commitments until the end of 1970 at the ministerial meeting in December. I trust that this explanation will clear any misunderstandings that have recently come to light.

As the house will know, Mr. Speaker, well established procedures exist, through the Permanent Joint Board on Defence and other bodies, for continuing consultation with our United States allies on matters affecting our joint efforts in the defence of North America. As the plans to implement our new policy take shape, we shall be using these procedures to discuss with the United States government how we can best contribute in future to the defence of the continent. Joint studies have already begun on the plan for modernization of the system of bomber defence. We shall be able to decide how we can most usefully contribute both to the surveillance of our air space and to the modernized anti-bomber system as those studies proceed. We shall also be seeking early occasions to consult the United States government as to how we can employ the maritime and land forces which we require for our national purposes to the best advantage in furthering our mutual interests in defending the continent.

As hon. members will understand, this period of planning and consultation will take some time. No doubt during this time there will be conjecture as to what we plan to do. As Minister of National Defence, I am concerned that these conjectures will have an upsetting effect on the members of our forces. We, as members of parliament awaiting the results on election night, can understand the feelings of the forces during this period.

It will be a difficult period during which time a number of changes will be discussed and examined by the Defence Staff. Some of these plans will be incorporated into the over-all plan and others will be discarded. I want to assure hon. members, and especially I want to assure all of the members of the Canadian Armed Forces, that our plans will not be announced until we feel confident that every option has been fully analysed by itself and in relation to other options. I want to repeat to the forces that conjecture will be simply conjecture.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members will agree that defence problems never remain static. The members of the Canadian Armed Forces have demonstratively proved that they are ready and able to adapt to any new change, perhaps more than any other segment of our society. The Canadian Armed Forces must continually make readjustments to meet changing defence problems. As hon. members are well aware, the members of the Canadian Armed Forces have been undergoing a change towards unification for the past few years. It has not been an easy task, but their professionalism and sense of duty have overcome many of the obstacles.

Now, we must undertake new tasks to meet the new policy roles. How these tasks will be carried out, as I said before, is being examined by the Defence Staff. I am sure that we can expect the continued high degree of professionalism from the forces that they have so ably demonstrated in the past. In return, I think every Canadian should, by whatever means he can, recognize that our forces have made many sacrifices in the past and have endured many hardships in the performance of their duty. This is a part of their life which they are willing to accept, providing the objectives are clear and sensible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid the minister's time has expired and the only way we could proceed with a question is by unanimous consent. If there is unanimous consent to extend the minister's time, then we could allow the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) to put a question. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Brewin: May I put a question to the minister?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): By all means.

Mr. Brewin: During the debate the subject of Canada's contribution and attitude towards anti-ballistic missiles was raised. I appreciate the minister did not have time to deal with that subject, but will he arrange to discuss it as soon as possible with the Committee on National Defence and External Affairs? I think it is a subject of great importance and interest.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, what I would have to say would depend on whether the meeting was held in camera or not. I have had a brief prepared, which could be very extensive. It was not prepared by military people but by scientists of the Defence Research Board, and it could be presented to the committee.

Mr. Brewin: Thank you.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my remarks, following immediately upon the comments of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux), will be a little bit disjointed. I would like to make some comments on the minister's explanations, but in the absence of a text it is difficult to bring the whole thing into clear focus. I hope that later this evening someone will have an opportunity to deal with one or two points that the minister attempted to clarify, but about which questions were left dangling as a result of his explanations. The matter raised with him by direct question just a moment ago is one of them.

In the context of any defence review, it is difficult to ignore what is topical and of major concern. Here, I refer to the A.B.M. system. It is a matter of understandable regret that the minister was not able to deal with it. It is also a matter of regret that he was not able to give us more specific information, particularly from the standpoint of those who are serving in our armed forces. As long as questions such as this remain unanswered there will be uncertainty and fear in the minds of officers and men, not only among those serving in continental Europe but also those serving in Canada.

I join with everybody else who has said that we would welcome a proper opportunity to get out of the business of war, out of anything that has to do with war, so that we could bring our troops home from Europe. As a matter of fact in that context, we would even welcome the disbandonment of Maritime Command, but I caution the minister in any review he undertakes not to lay a finger on it.

I intend to restrict my remarks to the report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. That report represents several months of concentrated effort on the part of 30 men, not to mention 16 eminent witnesses from the academic and other fields in Canada and from as far away as Germany.

I think the questions and the arguments that developed were sound. The witnesses placed well thought out positions before the committee and these were deeply considered by members of the committee. The headings in the report are indicative of the extent to which witnesses and members went in trying to arrive at some rational conclusion on what Canada's defence posture should be in relation to NATO.

The committee dealt briefly with Canada's membership in the United Nations. We indicated to this house and to the country that we did not feel Canada was directly menaced by any threat of invasion, and that the threat to Canada lay elsewhere, primarily in Europe. We reviewed our existing alliances. I hope that the Minister of National Defence will include these in his review because I doubt if there is a living Canadian who can recite all 47 of them.

We dealt with NATO, with its history and its provisions. We were all very much aware of the role that Canada had to play within the terms of that alliance. We were all aware that we were not committed to send troops to Europe. We touched on NORAD and indicated to the people of Canada that members of the committee had not agreed on any definitive roles in this context. We felt the committee should go further into this matter in the near future. Our present military contribution to NATO was thoroughly reviewed, both here at home and by a physical tour of Europe.

We dealt with the question of neutrality for Canada. I might say I was pleased to see the government's rejection of this as an optional role for Canada at this particular time. I am one of those who has long believed we cannot afford the luxury of neutrality. We went on to deal with the question of whether or not Canada should rely on the United States for its sole protection. Here, we get closer to the matters with which I should like to deal. The presentations made before the committee in some part—not in whole because there was considerable opposition to this—argued that Canada could substantially reduce the amount of money presently being spent on defence because the geographic proximity of the United States makes it necessary for the United States, in a sense, to defend Canada in order to defend itself. This was referred to I think as the so-called "free ride" theory. These arguments were rejected by the committee. Quite to the contrary, there is a conviction among all members of the committee I am sure, and among most Canadians with whom I have had an opportunity to discuss this, that Canada should be prepared to incur its fair and reasonable share of military responsibility in the world. Particularly, we must be prepared to do that and indeed are prepared to do that, so far as our relations with the United States are concerned.

The question of foreign aid being substituted for defence expenditures was rejected by the committee. I indicate to the minister, as he is probably well aware, that this is a question the committee probably will want to examine in some depth at a very early opportunity. The question of our peacekeeping role has been dealt with. In this connection the minister surely is well aware, much more so than the members of the committee, of the difficulty in pursuing this as a primary line of defence posture for Canada.

This leads us to the impact of the effect of Canada's alliance membership, not only our political affiliation but our full role within our means within the integrated military structure of NATO. In our report at page 35, the second last paragraph, there is this conclusion:

> —Canada's influence with other nations of the world, including the non-aligned and developing nations—

The so-called third world.

> —will be determined more by the degree of independence, objectivity and fairness which Canada exhibits in its relations with other countries than by its alliance associations.

My dear friend from Hillsborough posed a number of questions which I think are valid. I would repeat one of them. He asked in what way does our association with NATO and NATO's integrated military structure inhibit those things that the so-called doves would pursue with eagerness and at the expense of Canada making a fair and equitable contribution to the defence of the western world. I fail to see any way. I fail to see any real argument that we should not bear the cost of maintaining a physical presence in Europe. At least I fail to see one that would persuade any individual who has bothered to look into the question.

Indeed, it is my understanding the cost of keeping our troops in Europe is approximately $20 million. I am perfectly aware that the paper figures run somewhere in the order of $140 million. In the absence of a clearly enunciated policy in respect of what we would do with these troops when we bring them home, that is whether they would be employed in the surveillance of our territory and whether or not maritime command might form the basis for a specialized military role, and in the absence of any indication that we would substantially expand our air capability here in North America or our ground troops, I can only conclude that it is premature to seriously consider even a phased reduction. I think we all know a phased reduction will mean a total reduction.

To those who have supported the government motion in the hope that a phased plan of reduction will mean the withdrawal from NATO of only a few troops, I say they are whistling in the dark. They know very well, as do all of us, that once reduction starts, phased or otherwise, it will be total. If the Minister of National Defence remains in that capacity I predict he will find shortly after August, the first point at which we can indicate to our partners in the Alliance that we intend to withdraw in one year's time, that it will be a sorry day for Canada and its integrity among not only the western nations of the world but among all the countries of the world.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six oclock this sitting stands suspended until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Esternal Affairs and National Defence committee and of the Defence committee since 1963, it is my duty to take part in this debate on the Canadian contribution to NATO. I fully support the government and the motion presented to the house.

The study undertaken during the last months has enabled me to come to certain conclusions which might even go somewhat beyond the views publicly expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

I must admit that my views have changed progressively during the past five years, especially since the visit of the committee to Halifax in 1964, my trip to Berlin in November of the same year with the NATO parliamentary delegation, the debate on the unification of the armed forces and finally this study by the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I must confess that sometimes I felt that I was going through so much brainwashing with regard to military matters that I was convinced for a while that no change in our foreign defence policies was possible unless that status quo was maintained.

On some occasions and in particular during trips and visits by members of the committee, I had a similar impression of being brainwashed by some military personnel. I first woke up when I finally realized that many other members around me were under the same pressures. Of course, as a veteran I was certainly slower than others to realize it because at that time you were either a member of the team or you were not. You had to agree with the commitments, the participation of Canada, and to accept without any reservation, the general policy of NATO and NORAD. Then, you were a responsible member of parliament, a representative of the people, who had the privilege of sticking out his chest and of being proud of the international stature of Canada, even though it was almost dictated to us by others and at times beyond our means.

The morale of our troops came first, as well as that of our generals, our admirals, not to mention that of the generals of our allies. The morale of our troops is most important, but not to the extent—and I realize that today—of keeping us from even thinking of the possibility of studying other possibilities for our external and our defence policies.

It is also true that the efficiency of our Canadian forces is recognized throughout the world and not merely with regard to our participation to NATO; our forces are also on duty in Cyprus and elsewhere. Why can our present role under SACEUR and SACLANT not be changed? Why has Canada's participation become sacrosanct to the extent where our allies, especially the military leaders in NATO, cannot even conceive of our changing it?

On the committee's last trip to Europe, I even argued a bit with an American general about this. He simply could not understand why Canada should consider revising its military participation to NATO. In reply, I said this and I quote:

[English]

Canada as a small nation with its limited financial capability is just as proud as others and just as proud as the United States, and it likes to do small things in a big way, giving them particularly a Canadian identification.

• (8:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

And he was quite surprised.

In times of peace, even when it seems uncertain, we should assign our armed forces to more correlated roles, and give them functions within peace organizations, or with the United Nations.

That would help to coordinate the work of the Army, the Navy and Air Force.

It is all very nice to go to Europe to Halifax, to win trophies and competitions—and at this stage, I wish to praise our brigade, our air division in Europe, and our Canadian Atlantic Force—but it is important to know, considering the tactics and present constitution of NATO, whether we would win if a war broke out.

Mr. Speaker, it is time we stopped taking pride in winning competitions because the ribbons we earn are costly for Canada. I agree, to give NATO credit for that, because as a rule, I believe in NATO and recognize its merits.

Surely, the balance of forces in Europe has been partly responsible for the absence of conflicts on the continent for the past twenty years. But by promoting that organization alone have we really made progress as regards détente and dialogue?

Will the arms race become a permanent thing? Will confrontation on the continent be a current thing 20 years from now, when our children have taken over? I hope Mr. Speaker.

That is why the fact that Canada is presently reviewing its defence policy, particularly as regards our participation in NATO, takes on a special importance, because Canada is thereby showing that it is truly concerned with the problem of the Atlantic Alliance. That is why everybody is concerned, everybody wonders if it will weaken NATO, which may serve to remind our allies that this international Alliance must do more to reduce the risks of this confrontation in Europe.

Up until now, it seems we have always asked at various meetings and various levels: where do we stand? And now, the moment has come when we must ask ourselves where we are going.

Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I have never really been satisfied with the report of the committee on external affairs and national defence, of which I am a member. I have nothing to say against its general contents, but I am very disappointed with the third part, which contains recommendations that I see as very timid and conservative, especially as to the future role of Canadian Forces. I realize that the door is still open, because it seems that the purpose was to appease those who wanted some change, and they were somewhat taken in. Moreover, I had no intention to submit a minority report.

However, I wish I had been able to convince the members of the committee—and I tried to do so—to include a recommendation suggesting that Canada should indicate officially to her allies her intention to change the role of Canadian forces in Europe, and to enter immediately into discussions on this possibility.

In my opinion, the Canadian armed forces must become a more homogeneous, ultra-mobile conventional military force where the three services, the army, the navy and the air force, must operate jointly. This kind of military force would give us more flexibility in the use of our troops for NATO, the North American defence and the United Nations.

Even if we wanted to recall our heavy brigade and our air division, we would not know what to do with them. This operation would be costly and useless. I do not mean that we have made a mistake when we accepted our present commitments, but today we must start to think of altering them. If we only had ultra-mobile troops for multiple purposes but without nuclear weapons, a reduction of our forces in Europe would have less disastrous consequences and would not bother everybody.

Due to the possibility of a decision to carry out the complete withdrawal of our forces—I do not advocate this today, but it could happen if conditions changed—I say that it would be possible to take such a decision without completely disorganizing the European defence under a single command.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude by stating some of my views on the defence policy of Canada. I do not pretend that I have in hand all the facts which would enable me to justify my conclusions and I do not know whether our allies would accept them. It is their problem and not mine. This is why I wish to respect all the same the views of others. I feel that it is time to alter our defence policy. Let us not be diffident at least with our allies.

I do not see how Canada could isolate itself in neutrality. That seems to me unthinkable, and the more so since the other countries in the world will never consider Canada as a neutral or non-aligned country, first of all and in particular because we are next door to the United States.

However, as I said before, we should change our role within the NATO forces and even foresee a long-term phasing out of our establishment, when tension eases in Europe, and thereby perhaps reminding our allies to be prepared to act more positively, and even sooner than expected, so as to accelerate the process.

As concerns our contribution to SACLANT, I have been puzzled about it ever since 1965. I wonder why, indeed, our Navy keeps chasing submarines in the Atlantic, especially if one considers how much it is costing us, particularly when it is time to renew our equipment.

Mr. Speaker, Canada owes it to itself to be identified, as it was in the past, with an international force known the world over, and I do not see why, especially since we discussed the Defence estimates this week, we could not find a way to reduce considerably our armed forces' salaries by establishing in Canada some kind of service—be it called compulsory or voluntary—in which young Canadians would be enlisted. We could then ask them to join a Canadian peace force. They would not necessarily be required to become experts or to make a military career of it, but simply to hold on to an ideal, as Canadians, in order to serve in Cyprus, in the Congo or anywhere else where their services could be needed.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian forces are made up of specialists. We have noticed from the estimates that they include more chiefs than Indians, since the number of private soldiers represents only 20 per cent of a total of 90,000 men.

I think however that by changing our defence policy to make our forces more homogeneous, we could have a place for volunteers willing to specialize in defence and, by the same token, a special branch for young people in order to attract more of them into our armed forces. We could ask them if necessary to sacrifice one year of their life for their country and for the promotion of peace.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, order!

[English]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to reflect on the number of speakers in a debate of this sort when the time limit for speeches is set at 15 minutes. It means that there can be participation from the back as well as the front benchers. We in Canada are fortunate that there are no political implications in the results of our National Hockey League games. In the city of Prague, where I was last week, the downtown buildings are marked with the results of two games of political and other importance to the people of Czechoslovakia. The scores are marked 4:3, 2:0, and the admonition is to remember, remember. Unfortunately, these admonitions are in chalk. At the institute of philosophy at Charles University the billboards, still of a transient nature, carried the projected weather reports advising of storms and thunder ahead, and inside the storm clouds the students had drawn Russian tanks. The slogans, of course, were gestures of defiance. Perhaps it can be said that because of this defiance, and that of the journalists as well as the trade unionists, the Soviet Union had no alternative but to cause the resignation of Dubcek. Just as in 1938 the poet, Edna Millay wrote: "There is no balm in Gilead", so in 1968 and 1969 there is no balm in the western world to salve the agony of Czechoslovakia.

• (8:20 p.m.)

But that does not mean that we should not do all in our power to maintain all possible contact with eastern Europe, diplomatic, trade, cultural, and even parliamentary. Détente, after all, and I think all speakers have agreed with this, is a legitimate policy objective of modest powers like Canada as well as of the so-called super powers. Perhaps these few sentences are a bit of a diversion, but diversion is not an unknown characteristic of parliamentary debates. It is interesting that under the Soviet system power blocs must be kept in line by means of invasion; witness Hungary in 1956 and last summer's episode in Czechoslovakia.

Of course, the alliance that we are debating today needs no such military intervention. Here, we are debating the alliance, and apparently it is stable enough even to survive yesterday and today. On April 10, in a lead editorial, the New York Times reminded us that the alliance has been reported in disarray almost annually since its inception. But there has always been more to unite it than divide it. The editorial goes on to say that the achievement of a European settlement remains the chief unfinished business of a troubled world.

May I remind the house that my leader and this party do not for a minute suggest that a European settlement is the only unfinished business in the world. Speakers from this side and in other parties have reminded us, and accurately so of course, of that third world, crowded, hungry and sick, which demands our attention and our compassion. It demands the attention and compassion of the NATO alliance.

The amendment proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was specifically designed to draw attention to the need for a widening and not a narrowing of our world wide obligations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fairweather: It was drawn up in recognition of the validity of the words of a distinguished Canadian diplomat, Escott Reid, who said that the two most important world issues of the next 20 years are how to speed up the dangerously slow rate of economic growth of the two thirds of the world that is poor and how to narrow the dangerously wide gap between China and the rest of the world.

I suggest that our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and our Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) have an obligation to exercise the leadership in the 1960s and 1970s that their predecessors did 20 years ago.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fairweather: This country must be in the vanguard of those seeking, through NATO, a multilateral east-west forum which can serve as a practical alternative to the sort of propaganda device suggested by the Soviet Union and billed as a conference on European security.

We need, in concert but not alone, mutual force reductions. We need, in concert but not alone, arms control. We need, in concert, a plan for access to all of Berlin. We need, in concert, freer west-east travel, trade and cultural exchanges.

I seriously suggest that the purpose of this debate is to question whether Canada can maintain a believable role in these and other objectives if we turn our backs on the collective principle of the alliance. The Economist of April 12 suggests:

> However small the amounts involved, the collective principle is endangered by any unilateral reduction.

There is the issue. Canada has embarked on a unilateral reduction. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said this afternoon that Canada's decision is not negotiable, which I think his colleague, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) would admit is a rather odd way in which to begin the government's heralded consultative process with our allies. If consultation still means to the government what it does to the editors of the Oxford Dictionary, namely to take counsel, to seek information and advice, one wonders how valid the process will be if, before taking counsel or seeking information and advice, the government has already closed the door by saying "not negotiable".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fairweather: When the Committee on External Affairs and Defence was hearing evidence, one of the distinguished witnesses was General Charles Foulkes who suggested a different military role for Canada within the alliance. If, out of the obscurity of the government's announcement, comes the creation of a highly mobile force, many would not quarrel with this military decision. But all the advice I listened to in Europe stressed the importance of the Canadian presence on that continent. There are reasons for this within the armed forces themselves, and I was naïve enough to ask this question in Brussels—an innocent abroad, perhaps. I asked whether, leaving aside every other aspect but the military aspect, it is not valid to think that it is useful to have troops in a different milieu than that of the North American continent. Of course the advice was, yes.

I do not look upon NATO and our participation in it as an extension of Canada's somewhat shopworn posture of tagging along behind the United States and the United Kingdom. In fact, NATO provides us with a role in Europe which continues no matter what other international aspirations and commitments we may have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fairweather: As the Economist said, it is a crucial aspect of our foreign policy. We are dealing, I hope, with facts of life. The former minister of transport used to call them "hard facts". One of them is that the United States, the United Kingdom and Germany, the three essential members of the alliance, no matter what we may do, mean to carry on the alliance.

• (8:30 p.m.)

I suggest that we must carry on, and that to keep our role within the alliance believable we must participate in it to the full. We realize we are not living in those days 20 years ago, and we thank God for it, when a massed, all-out armed assault by the Warsaw Pact powers in Central Europe, which would have been met by immediate nuclear retaliation, was a threat to be reckoned with. Today, this is no longer a probability. We know, however, that we must be prepared for possibilities.

May I again quote an edition of the Economist—an earlier edition this time, that of April 5. Here is an article entitled "What NATO Needs", offering the suggestion that three matters have to be put right.

First, NATO needs more formations to defend the rear areas in Germany. Both the Germans and the British are now trying to do something to sort this problem out. Second, NATO needs forces which can contain, or, by getting there fast, can deter, any scuffle which might develop along the German border were eastern Europe to be in an uproar. Third, it needs troops which can convincingly do much of the same anti-trespassing job on the flanks, particularly in the Balkans after the last Yugoslav scare, but in Scandinavia as well.

All three objectives could be secured were NATO to have active formations of "light" troops with tactical ability through the use of helicopters and strategic ability through the use of transport planes.

The author goes on to say:

But inevitably these light cavalry men of the air would be short of tanks and guns. So they would need plenty of anti-tank weapons, including helicopter-borne ones, a good sprinkling of engineers for laying minefields, setting up roadblocks and demolitions, and strong close support air cover.

If the government's proposal is based upon a reduction not only of the number of troops in Europe but of the proportion of the budget which the government must spend on defence, I fail to see that the right hon. gentleman has made any case. Comments we heard before the committee were to the effect that defence would continue to account for a large proportion of our budget. One of the witnesses before the committee, a German journalist, used a metaphor to describe the NATO situation. I am making a precis of his remarks. He said that moves toward a détente were like a house with three storeys. On the top floor were the super powers, the United States and the Soviet Union, which cleared their throats and made noises while suggesting new attempts to talk to each other. Now, this is my comment, Mr. Speaker: talk they must, before each side is committed irrevocably to costly, irrelevant and hugely expensive antiballistic missile systems.

On the next floor are other countries of the east and west of Europe represented by the NATO and Warsaw pacts. These countries have compelling reasons of history, geography and economics to move toward an ending of mutual suspicion and fear.

The ground floor of the metaphorical house contains West and East Germany, and common blood ancestry and tradition are added to the other reasons which make talking together mutually advantageous. Like other houses, the one I call to mind has windows facing outward and stairways leading up and down between the different levels. These are the windows which show us the third world, the world which Escott Reid and others have mentioned. In fact, it has all the attributes of a useful place in which to pursue understanding and peace.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. John Roberts (York-Simcoe): It is a disheartening thing that so much of the discussion of foreign policy at the present time is oriented toward the past rather than being an attempt to look ahead to see what are the prospects and opportunities for Canadian foreign policy in the future.

We cannot form an adequate foreign policy by resolutely looking to the past. The fact that we have always participated in certain arrangements is not, in itself, a sufficient reason for continuing to take part in them. That attitude seems to spring from a belief that if you can only see where you have been you will know where you want to go. But a man who tries to drive an automobile by looking in his rear-view mirror is likely to crash. We have all heard about those generals who make preparations for future battles as though they would be a continuation of previous wars. To keep going uncritically in the same direction as in the past is a recipe for disaster.

No one doubts that our policy has been successful in the past. We participated in Europe in the establishment of a credible, flexible response to forces of Soviet expansion. The purpose of this response, maintained through NATO, was to deter the Soviet Union from any military adventure in Europe. The question which confronts us today is whether Canadian participation in military arrangements in Europe is essential, or useful, in making this collective response effective in the future. Is Canada's participation important enough to give her influence on the design of these defence arrangements and could her resources be used to equal, or better, purpose in seeking some other foreign policy objective?

It appears to me that the maintenance of a credible, flexible response in Europe is the paramount responsibility of the European countries themselves. Our original commitment to keep forces resident in Europe was expressly temporary, designed to assist in defence until Europe was sufficiently recovered economically to provide for its own defence. One cannot argue that a renewed Europe remains economically incapable of providing an effective collective defence. Europe does not participate in the defence of North America and it is difficult to argue that the participation of Canada is essential to the defence of Europe.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Forrestall: The voice of experience.

Mr. Roberts: I am not suggesting a new policy. It is a reiteration of what has always been the basis of our commitment to Europe. I suggest we should now make it clear publicly to our allies that our commitment is still temporary, and that we look forward to terminating it in the near future as soon as it can be arranged without grave disruption to their interests. Above all, since re-equipment is now at a critical stage, we should not allow ourselves to undertake any re-equipping which could lock us into a commitment for several years and thus preclude us from exercising our option to withdraw.

It is clear that our present military role in NATO is unsatisfactory. There was almost unanimous agreement on this point among knowledgeable witnesses who appeared before the committee on external affairs. Almost all witnesses with military expertise stressed that our air-strike reconnaissance role in Europe, which costs $70 million each year, and the mechanised brigade, constitute an expensive and wasteful use of our military resources.

Mr. Forrestall: Nonsense.

Mr. Roberts: The hon. gentleman should simply look at the record of the committee. He can do it.

Mr. Forrestall: I have had a long look at it.

[Mr. Roberts.]

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Roberts: The hon. member did not look at it long enough or, if he did, he did not read it thoroughly enough. Rather than disperse our efforts in varied military tasks, our forces should be tailored to one concept, the mobile concept. The mobile concept gives an opportunity to do a very great variety of jobs. We have now two types of ground forces. We have a heavy brigade in Europe devised for limited nuclear warfare on the continent of Europe, which has to be supplemented, of course, by forces in Canada for the necessary rotation and we have the beginnings of a true mobile force which is much more lightly equipped fulfilling a different concept. It is an intervention force for small conflicts. We should drop our heavy ground force altogether and establish one type of mobile force. It would be much more economical because we could rotate from a much greater reservoir. We would not have to have two types of equipment and two types of training.

Similar arguments apply to our air role. Here, too, we have a force in NATO for a task that is not duplicated anywhere else in the Canadian defence organization—that is, the strike reconnaissance role. For our six squadrons we have to maintain rotational capabilities and training capabilities. We have to feed new crews into it. If all our air efforts were in the tactical field or supplementary to our mobile ground forces, then we could not provide squadrons of nuclear strike aircraft. I am not arguing, Mr. Speaker, that we have no interests in the defence of Europe nor in maintaining a deterrent capacity in North America. May I say, however, that the objectives we have do not require us to maintain our present military commitments.

I suggest that the NORAD bomber defence system is obsolete and, in any case, one cannot conceive that bombers would be used until I.C.B.M.'s have already been brought into play. Money spent on improved bomber interception is completely wasted, since it neither adds to our defence nor to our deterrent power. Anti-submarine warfare has reached a level of technological development which makes it inordinately expensive for us to continue in this activity.

The economic recovery of Europe and the increasing crystallization of a separate European strategic interest have removed the original justification for the presence of Canadian forces in Europe. The temporary nature of our original commitment to NATO forces in Europe should be reiterated and we should look forward to a withdrawal of our forces within, at most, five years. The strike reconnaissance force and the heavy brigade should be phased out and replaced by strengthening our mobile force. Under no circumstances should we re-equip in such a way as to lock ourselves into a NATO role which would preclude our military withdrawal in the near future.

May I submit, as my last point, that both NORAD and NATO are instruments of discussion and, perhaps, consultation, although these intangible benefits can be marginal. Nevertheless, there are very useful benefits—

An hon. Member: I am disappointed in you, John.

Mr. Roberts: Well, I was disappointed in the speech the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) made. It was an entirely negative speech. I am told he made it yesterday; unfortunately I only had the opportunity of reading it in Hansard to-day. From my reading of it, it contained not one positive point. If that speech were a declaration of the foreign policy of the Conservative party it would be a declaration of bankruptcy.

Today, in the House of Commons, the Leader of the Opposition refused to give unanimous consent for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to continue his speech.

An hon. Member: That was a house order, my boy.

Mr. Roberts: That was an ungenerous act. Also, it was uncharacteristic. The Leader of the Opposition was more than ungenerous in his discussion of the government's foreign policy. He did a disservice in distorting the presentation of our position.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Roberts: All this talk about "isolation" and "fortress America" has done great disservice. If one takes the trouble to read what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), said recently at Calgary, one will see what is this government's attitude toward foreign policy. Our Prime Minister said that our foreign policy ought to serve our national interests. In his speech the other night he went on to say:

> —when I say national interests I am not thinking in any egotistical sense of just what's happening to Canadians. It's in our national interest to reduce the tensions in the world, tensions which spring from the two thirds of the world's population who go to bed hungry every night, the two thirds of the world's population who are poor whereas the other third is rich, and the tensions which spring from this great ideological struggle between the east and the west.

That is the aim of our foreign policy. It has nothing to do with isolationism or fortress America. Also, if one examines the speech the Prime Minister made in the House of Commons, one will see that among the five points he proposed there are points relating to peace keeping, to arms limitation and to increasing our contribution for purposes of external aid. Those points have nothing in common with isolationism or the concept of retreating into fortress America. That approach has nothing in common with the approach described—inaccurately—by the Leader of the Opposition.

An hon. Member: Come on, John. Be honest.

Mr. Roberts: We cannot withdraw ourselves into a fortress America. We cannot adopt a policy of isolationism or of North Americanism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Roberts: I knew if I spoke long enough I would find my hon. friends supporting me.

Mr. Alexander: That's because you are coming to the meat of it.

Mr. Roberts: Slogans are no substitute for a foreign policy—even the out of date slogans of the Leader of the Opposition. We cannot wash our hands of what is happening outside our continent. We cannot hope to see permanent peace in the world if we adopt an approach in our foreign policy of isolationism and continentalism. I submit that the foreign policy of the government is not tailored to fit isolationism. It would equally be folly to adopt a rear view mirror approach to our foreign policy and to decide that we must do in future what has been done in the past. If we do that we fail to take into account the real threats to security in the world today. It is no use trying to fight again the battles of yesteryear.

An hon. Member: Who wrote that line, John?

Mr. Roberts: I should like to refer the hon. member to a speech that Mr. Khrushchev gave in 1961. In it he said that the real threat to security came from wars of national liberation; we would call it aggressive subversion. That is the kind of thing about which we ought to be concerned. These are not simple military problems. They are most complex, involving questions of military, political, social and economic relations. Those are the kinds of problems we are faced with when we deal with problems of subversive aggression.

It is all too easy to minsunderstand these problems. They are difficult, complicated, and not easy of solution. If we are to meet such problems we must be concerned about peace keeping and be ready to play our part in international aid efforts.

The first of two major objectives in our foreign policy is peace keeping. There have been over 50 wars since 1945 and there is a need for improved institutional arrangements in the world to control and contain these disputes. There is nothing isolationistic in that approach. The other objective of our foreign policy ought to be the encouragement of external aid and development work. The need for expanding Canada's efforts in external aid and development work, seem to me so obvious as not to need lengthy elaboration. We are a rich country and have access to technical skills and investment capital which underdeveloped countries badly need. We are a trading nation containing two major cultures, each speaking a world language. We spend about half of one per cent of our gross national product on external aid. That is not enough. We must do more.

There are many basic tasks for us to perform, valuable to others and useful for our own interests. We do not want for work, nor do we want for capacity to undertake it. Our task is to construct pragmatic policies to deal with a work-a-day world and not to yearn for a grander, more dramatic and more self-congratulatory role as saviour of Europe.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I hope that by speaking in this debate I shall contribute, if ever so slightly perhaps, to the dimension of the discussion that has been taking place in this chamber. It ought to be obvious by now that the debate that began yesterday afternoon is basic to the question of national security. We want to know how we are to preserve it. We want to preserve, in this nation, many of the values and benefits our people have enjoyed over the past century of development. It strikes me, however, that we ought to be concerned about three basic areas that touch our national security, and they will become obvious if we consider the problem in a methodical way. In the first place, we must be concerned about preserving some semblance of national unity and some simple law and order within this country. We must also be concerned about the possibility of revolution at home. Our first concern in maintenance of national security is that of peace at home.

Secondly, it is the preoccupation of every nation to take all reasonable steps to prevent aggression from abroad. We are a rather fortunate nation in the history of this world, even though we have been in existence for a century. We have only suffered direct aggression on our soil once. Perhaps it is one of the ironies of history that that particular aggression was by a country that has always been regarded as our best neighbour, the United States.

The third basic way in which we preserve our national security is in dealing with possible hostilities or confrontations in some other part of the globe that could eventually boil over and involve us in our own country. It is this third matter of national security which concerns us. We are concerned here specifically with the viability and vitality of our NATO commitment. It is, perhaps, not strange to think that our country has been preoccupied for the better part of this century with peace in Europe. It is not strange because we have given the best treasure that this nation possesses in two very ghastly world wars on that continent.

We have been concerned in a pre-eminent way, therefore, in maintaining the peace of Europe. The main contention of those who continue to argue the validity of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is that it has in the past 24 year period, a considerable passage of time, preserved peace on that continent. If the argument is accepted at face value, as so often it is, surely it is not a strong one because there are many countries in this world who have been involved in these two world conflicts in this century. Countries such as Australia, South Africa, Sweden and others could, in fact, say they have also known peace for this period but have not been involved in a similar alliance. They might be moved to say, because they were not involved in that alliance, their peace was preserved.

It is rather interesting to realize the nature of the NATO alliance. It is the enemies of yesterday who have, in fact, for this period of a quarter of a century been the allies of today. It may be when we speak freely of the prevention of war in Europe, that we are referring to the fact that the major combatants find themselves within the ambit of this particular organization. More recently this view has been given some validity by the fact that the NATO organization is its flexible response.

Since the discovery and realization of the nuclear weapon, it has been necessary for man to indicate what limits are involved in attempting to prevent or protect himself from aggression. The argument of flexible response has been used often and loudly. The suggestion that without it every provocation would become a danger, not only to the peace of Europe but the very security of the whole world, is an interesting argument. I think it is more than a little possible to argue from the other side. It has been suggested that once we have accepted the fact of a flexible response, then we give an indication not only to our allies but to our potential enemies that we are willing to suffer certain levels of hostility rather than press that button for massive retaliation.

Some may argue that is a weak, if not a ludicrous, argument. If that is so, we have not fully considered the implications of what occurred in Czechoslovakia last summer. What did we learn from Czechoslovakia? Most of us seem to be of the opinion that we learned Russia is still extremely aggressive. I find this to be no particular surprise because I think we have known that all along. We discovered with the invasion or occupation of Czechoslovakia the lightning speed with which Russia could move her forces. The NATO organization, in fact, made this great discovery. If it was a new discovery for NATO intelligence headquarters, it makes me a little uncomfortable about the accuracy of our intelligence. Next, and most important, is the belief that the knowledge of a flexible response, both in the east and west, was sufficient for the Russians to believe that they could occupy Czechoslovakia without greatly endangering their own security or that of their allies in the Warsaw Pact. It may not be an argument acceptable to many, but I think it is well worth considering in these changing times.

A large body of opinion in our time is that, militarily at least, NATO has been successful. If that is true, what then is our answer to those who subsequently ask, what about political success? As long as Germany remains divided in the heart of this confrontation, and as long as Russian leaders and Russian people suffer from the extreme German paranoia which I believe exists, we cannot believe we have secured very much either for ourselves or for our allies in what has been happening to date within the context of this alliance.

It is my purpose here this evening to raise basic questions which I think must be considered if we are in any way to have some sense in our foreign and military policies. What are the greatest dangers in 1969 to our national security? Who has told us in an official way in this debate what it is that we should fear most? I cannot recall the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) or the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) indicating to us in some definite way what these first priorities are. How have they, as the custodians of the government of this country, perceived the real threat which faces our own national security? We are in a rather strange situation when discussing military or foreign matters. We talk about defending ourselves and our security, yet we never point to what are our greatest dangers. We are a little like that well known fable about the emperor in the great parade going down the street of a very large city. Everyone is watching it go by, cheering and applauding this great man when suddenly a little child says, "He has no clothes". This is what has been happening so often in our debates on vital matters of defence and security.

We have not clearly stated the greatest threat to our national security. If I were to make that challenge in this debate, I would immediately hear from all sides of this house, "communism"! I am not afraid to use the word. We are afraid that communism is at the root of the danger to our national security. What form of communism is it we fear? Is it the Russian variety, Chinese, Yugoslavian, Albanian, Czechoslovakian, Rumanian, Polish, East German or some other form? Presumably, we have made some determination on one or all these different kinds of which we have some fear.

Yet in 1949, when we put together the Alliance that we used in one major way to cover the danger from this potential threat, we did not have to ask ourselves any questions with regard to these different forms of communism. I might also ask, if the threat is real why has communist success been so erratic from place to place? Is it really communism that is at the bottom of the threat to our security? Is it in fact, and I intend no pun, a red herring dragged across in front of us to distract our attention from the vital things, the basically dangerous things that do indeed threaten our security, those six devils we all have confronted from time to time in our concern as men in public office: hunger and disease, fear and despair, oppression and corruption?

Where and how have we recognized these as the real threats to our national security? If we try to delude ourselves into believing that these particular threats to our security have somehow diminished and gone into a state of unimportance, we are not recognizing the facts. We know only too well from reading our daily newspapers that the enemy has grown. The threat is not only real, it is increasing. It is a genuine threat to each and every member of this house and to each and every home in this country that we represent.

How can we say, as we so often do, that we are concerned about maintaining our national security if we do not address ourselves to these basic threats? In the beginning of this speech when I indicated the three broad areas of national security, I mentioned that the first one was maintaining security at home. How have we maintained harmony and peace at home over the decades? We have not done so with armies and ammunition, but through concern for our fellowmen. A public figure of our time has indicated that the new name for peace in our time is, and must be, development. We have known it all along. We have just not been willing to recognize it sufficiently. If we forget it in 1969 and the 1970's in this one world, we forget it in our peril.

Mr. Alastair Gillespie (Etobicoke): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this motion I wish to make it quite clear that I support the motion; that I interpret "planned and phased reduction" to mean reduction and re-arrangement, not to mean the effective withdrawal of our forces from Europe at this time as some hon. members opposite have done; that it means we will continue in Europe beyond the end of 1969 but on a reduced and different basis, a basis to be discussed with our allies.

I would like to deal with three points and to underline those three points. The first is that conditions are changing and that we must adapt to, indeed, anticipate change. More than that we should try to bring about the kind of change that we think is needed. We should not react passively but we should anticipate actively.

The second is that NATO is not just a military alliance. It is a political alliance with political objectives. Similarly, Canada as a participant in NATO participates in more than just a military way. Membership gives a country political benefits, and resident membership in the club provides just that many more.

Third, the decision to re-examine our nuclear role in Europe is timely and one which I hope will lead us to reject nuclear weapons as part of our armaments, after discussion with our allies.

I fear some of the things that the last speaker mentioned. I fear perhaps more than anything else miscalculation or accident. I fear misunderstanding, and misunderstandings will develop if there is not a clear intention on the part of the western alliance.

In speaking to these three points, I think it is important that we recognize the foreign policy framework within which our NATO posture must operate. First, defence policy should be a servant and not the master. This debate should have taken place before now. It should have taken place at the time of the unification debate, at that time or before it. It is long overdue.

Second, we should see our foreign policy objectives as a whole, not as component parts. Too often there is a tendency to look at foreign policy in terms of military objectives, set aside from cultural or political objectives, or set aside from trade objectives. In my view, we should examine each of our foreign initiatives against each of these tests. For instance, how does NATO serve our political objectives? How does it meet the test of our cultural or national identity objectives, and our trade objectives? In my view, it meets them all, and meets them well.

In foreign policy terms, obviously our primary role is a security one in NATO. We believe in collective security and in maintaining the stability of the world order; but it is also important that we see security not just in these military terms, not just in terms of survival, but that we see security in terms of economic strength and political understanding, in terms of composing national interests and ambitions.

Those within the alliance have trade objectives and objectives of national identity, and we are no different. Similarly, our trade interests in Europe are important to our economic health, which in turn determines our ability to play a part in the security system, and our ability to take initiatives in seeking ways of reducing tensions between east and west.

It seems to me that there is a real danger, and we have seen evidences of it in this debate, that we may lose our perspective and see our interests in Europe as being no more than military. I emphasize that we have infinitely more at stake than a mere military role. We need Europe, and Europe needs us.

Some 20 years ago, Mr. Speaker, Europe was recovering from a devastating war. There was all sorts of evidence of aggressive Russian intentions. Europe was weak and we were strong. We ranked behind the United States as the No. 2 power economically, and behind the United Kingdom and the United States as No. 3 militarily. But we also needed Europe because we needed collective security. And while Europe needs us today, it needs us in a different way.

Europe has recovered economically, but it requires our partnership in NATO for the political role that we can play. In this connection I would like to say something about the importance of Europe and NATO to our national identity. I think the sense of Canadian identity requires more than bilingualism or an acknowledgement of our multicultural nature. These are very important. They help to identify us, but bilingualism and multiculturalism by themselves are not the same thing as identity. We find our identity in the things we do well. It reposes in our self-respect and our national pride. It is revealed best when we share a common purpose with others. Our identity as a nation will not be viewed in the same way by all Canadians. Our experience and our cultural heritage will influence our point of view; but our identity as a nation will develop as we pursue common goals with others.

I should like to return to a view that has been put by some speakers. The voice has been heard in the land that today Europe is strong, that it no longer needs us. I should like to deal with two aspects of this as being misleading. I have already mentioned one. Europe today needs us for different reasons than it did twenty years ago. It needs us for the political contribution we can make by virtue of our military participation in Europe and our unique position within the alliance. Secondly, in my view the argument is false because it ignores, as I think I have already said, the other side of the coin; Canada still needs Europe. NATO is important to us because it is multilateral, because it provides an institutional connection with the second most powerful area in the western world.

NATO also provides Canadian parliamentarians with an opportunity to meet and communicate with parliamentarians of the NATO countries. While I would not want to overemphasize this as one of the benefits of our participation in NATO, I think it is something worth remembering and remarking on at this time. Again referring to the North Atlantic assembly, last November I was privileged to attend as a member of the Canadian parliamentary delegation, most ably led by Senator Aird. I very much regret his resignation but I respect his reasons for it. He will be missed.

Canadians do not have the same opportunities as Europeans to meet and discuss matters of public policy or of joint or international initiative at the parliamentary level; nor do we have the same opportunity to discuss conflicting international interests in a public forum with other parliamentarians. I think the North Atlantic assembly is important to Canadians because it provides them with an opportunity to discuss international matters with others so involved.

Thus, for reasons of collective security and stabilization of the world order, for reasons of national identity and for economic and trade reasons, NATO and Europe are important to us. More particularly, our membership is important to us because it will enable us to play a creative role in reducing the tensions of the world.

Finally, I should like to refer to one matter with which I dealt in my third point and which was dealt with in the Prime Minister's speech. I refer to the question of nuclear weapons. Surely, we have a major responsibility to seek ways of reducing and not just limiting the number of persons in the nuclear club. While we can take pride in the fact that we have signed the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, let us make every effort to reduce our own nuclear participation so that we may encourage others to take the same step. I refer in particular to the fact that Germany has not yet signed the non-proliferation treaty. I think this is a matter of concern to Canadians as I think it is to the people of many other countries. I feel our membership in NATO will be important in securing this objective.

For reasons then of change, and for reasons involving the security of Canada and the stability of world order, let us waste no time this evening in approving the motion before us.

THE MINISTRY

RESIGNATION OF HON. PAUL HELLYER—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I have unanimous consent to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Walker: Earlier today the Prime Minister indicated that correspondence relating to the resignation of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) as Minister of Transport would be tabled. I, therefore, would now like to table copies of that correspondence in French and in English.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

MOTION FOR APPROVAL OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

That this house supports the government's policy of continued Canadian participation in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the intention of the government, in consultation with Canada's allies, to take early steps to bring about a planned and phased reduction of the size of Canadian forces in Europe.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister recently suggested in two speeches, one in Calgary and one yesterday in this chamber, that foreign policy should dictate defence policy and not vice versa. I agree. I should like to demonstrate that, instead of contributing to our foreign policy objectives, continued membership in NATO at this time serves mainly as a hindrance.

First of all, I would suggest four objectives of foreign policy which I think most Canadians could agree upon. First is the preservation of international peace, particularly but not exclusively between the nuclear powers. The second is the provision of assistance to the developing nations of the world. The third is the fostering and protecting of democratic societies. The fourth is the maintenance of our national sovereignty.

NATO came into being 20 years ago because the economically and militarily weak nations of western Europe felt quite justifiably a threat coming from the Soviet Union. Canada was one of the initiators of NATO. We saw the threat of the Soviet Union and appropriately responded by helping to found NATO. At that time, we had both the financial and military resources that were badly needed by our western European friends. However, now, 20 years after, the North Atlantic world has changed in two important respects. First, western Europe is strong both militarily and financially. In short, the countries in western Europe can, in the main, look after their military needs.

The second point is that it has been recognized for some time that the main deterrent to Soviet expansion in western Europe comes from the nuclear capability of the United States of America. We all know that the United States is not going to withdraw from NATO. What then are the logical conclusions Canadians should draw? The first is that militarily we are no longer needed. The Prime Minister indicated this in his speech yesterday and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) this afternoon showed the logical implications of his own conclusions in that regard.

The western Europeans are quite capable of replacing our excellent but small military contribution. The only reason for remaining in NATO is, as the Prime Minister again suggested, that membership would be politically advantageous to Canada. It is my view that continued membership in NATO would have in fact a negative and not a positive effect upon our political objectives.

Let us consider the elements I have mentioned one at a time. The first is the preservation of international peace. I suggest Canada would be in a much better position to take meaningful initiatives in attempting to achieve an acceptable disarmament plan in Europe. It is illusory to believe this can be done effectively within NATO. Of course, there is a non-military clause in the charter, which has been there for 20 years, but does anyone seriously think it will be implemented? Does anyone seriously believe that the military figures who dominate NATO will initiate disarmament proposals? Just last week NATO turned down an offer by the Warsaw Pact countries to discuss disarmament.

Quite apart from western Europe, we would be much more acceptable in the world at large as a peace keeping force if we were not a member of NATO. This is particularly true of the developing nations, many of whom are in direct conflict with old colonial powers in NATO, and Portugal is a good example, or fear involvement with the United States or the Soviet Union. If any of us were members of a developing nation and we were asked in all seriousness, would we prefer to deal with a Canada which shared its military intelligence with Portugal, Greece and the Central Intelligence Agency of the United States? Of course, the answer is no, we would not like to be in that position, but would like rather Canada to be independent.

Canada, as a non-member of NATO, would be free at the United Nations to criticize equally the two dominant powers in the world. When we rightly criticized the barbarism of the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia it would have had more meaning to the rest of the world if we had also previously joined the thousands of United States citizens who condemned their country's invasions of the Dominican Republic and Viet Nam. Such freedom to criticize, of course, is not nearly so likely to come from fellow members of NATO.

Finally, on this point of withdrawal from NATO, this does not mean we would be unwilling to aid in the defence of our old allies if one or all should be attacked. A tactical mobile force, as suggested by many members of this house from all parties, could be made available to the United Nations and would be available to halt or check aggression anywhere in the world, whether in western Europe, southeast Asia or some other spot. Canada should be proud to make such a contribution.

The second foreign policy objective that Canada should follow has to do with assistance to the developing nations of the world. As has been said so many times, two thirds of the world's population lives in poverty. They are poor in health, in education and in housing. One of our main foreign policy objectives should be to do what we can to change this situation. I was pleased to note the Prime Minister's intention to take this objective seriously. However, answers to questions on the order paper by the hon. member for York South revealed very clearly that one of the great things that Canada emphasizes, our great assistance to developing nations, is a myth. The answers reveal very clearly that Canada's record is poor in this regard as compared with what other less prosperous industrial nations are doing.

By withdrawing completely from NATO and simultaneously changing our military requirements, it is possible to make massive reductions in our military expenditures. One expert, principal Escott Reid of Glendon College, York University, estimates in all seriousness that we could cut our military budget of $1.8 billion by half. Even if his estimate is exaggerated and we could not reduce it by that amount, it is certain that millions of dollars could be cut. We would then be able to contribute millions of dollars more to the poor countries of this world, to our friends in the Commonwealth, our friends who are members of the United Nations and our more recent friends in the Francophone world.

A third objective is the fostering and protection of democratic societies. Somewhere in the NATO charter there is the commitment to the protection of democratic societies. What a sham this is, Mr. Speaker. Should we not speak the truth? Portugal is a fascist country. Greece is a fascist or at best a quasi-fascist country. According to Andreas Papandreou, a respected senior member of the former democratic government of Greece, the Central Intelligence Agency of the United States was a very important instrument in establishing the new régime and removing the old one. Are we not hypocrites when we condemn the brutality and rape of human values by the Russians in Czechoslovakia but turn our eyes away from the same violence in Portugal and Greece? Once again, let me say that membership in NATO restricts our capacity to speak and act in defence of democracy.

The next objective or goal is maintenance of national sovereignty. Since the birth of nation states, one of the central goals of foreign policy has been to preserve national sovereignty. Militarily this has meant guarding one's borders. If we consider our geographic position and modern weaponry, it becomes appropriate to ask whether military defence is at all relevant to Canada's sovereignty. Who is going to attack us? Are the Russians likely to send troops over the North Pole? Is the United States likely to send troops to cross our southern border? Could we stop either country if it decided to do so?

We should completely abandon any futile attempt to defend our borders. Instead, we should be thinking very seriously about ways in which our geographic position can be used to avoid the most serious danger facing mankind. I refer, of course, to nuclear war. Should we not be devoting intellectual energy to devising schemes for preventing a first strike attempt by either the U.S.S.R. or the U.S.A. against one another?

The Prime Minister had the courage to raise questions about the legitimacy of the possible first strike role assigned to our "A" bomb carrying aircraft in Europe. We should apply this same reasoning here at home, and we should recognize that the Russians as well as the United States have a legitimate fear of being attacked first by nuclear weapons. Perhaps we, as Canadians, could make a major contribution to the avoidance of nuclear war by seriously considering means whereby our own geographic position might be used to reduce tensions on both of our powerful neighbours. It seems to me that continued membership in NATO would make such a possibility incapable of realization.

In conclusion, I should like to suggest that Canadians should choose a course of action which reveals emotional and intellectual maturity. We will not be abandoning our friends by leaving NATO. Rather, we will be striking off on a new course which is consistent with contemporary facts. Our democratic allies in Europe are now prosperous and strong, and they are capable of defending themselves. We are now in the position of being able to join those middle power nations like Sweden and Yugoslavia who seek to chart their own courses in world history.

We are part of the family of man. We have much to contribute to the preservation of peace and the alleviation of world poverty. It is to these ends we should now devote our energy.

Mr. H. E. Stafford (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, we have heard much about our forces in Europe. Much of this may apply to a reduction in size rather than a withdrawal of our forces. Like many others in this house, I have been attempting to put the many pieces of this jigsaw puzzle together but no matter how I place the pieces I cannot develop a clear picture of any definite policy. It may be that I have been too skilful in putting the pieces together. Many of our partners in the alliance have already expressed their concern. The West German Foreign Minister, Willy Brant, expressed his anxiety at home and when he was in Canada. Britain's defence minister, Denis Healey, warned that unilateralism is very infectious. This was one of the two major subjects discussed by the NATO members when they met in Washington for the 20th anniversary of the alliance. It is no exaggeration to say that the government's unilateral decision regarding NATO did not add to the general stability of the alliance.

On April 14 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) answered a question in the house from one of the hon. members opposite by stating, "We never talked about a planned withdrawal; we talked about a planned reduction". This answer would seem to indicate that we are planning only a reduction of our forces in Europe, and not a withdrawal.

I do not intend to review the many statements made in this regard. Reductions have been made in our NATO forces on four previous occasions. We did this after discussion and consultation with our partners in NATO. This time we made the decision without the usual consultation, and this has caused much consternation among NATO members. The government's announcement in this regard, although indefinite, would lead one to assume that the government has something more in mind than a slight reduction of our forces in Europe.

It seems rather unfortunate that such a decision had to be made at this time. The European balance of security has been altered by the presence of Soviet troops in Czechoslovakia. This new deployment of Warsaw pact troops puts West Germany, Austria and even Yugoslavia in a much more vulnerable position. Previously, the armed forces of Czechoslovakia, even though a member of the Warsaw pact, were not such a serious threat. I do not agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) that the invasion of Czechoslovakia is a sign of Russian weakness. The Soviet Union has also posed a new strategic threat by its naval build-up in the Mediterranean and in the North Atlantic.

I do not imagine that our military contribution to NATO causes the Warsaw pact nations any undue alarm. Only two countries, Iceland and Luxembourg, contribute less per capita to NATO. Our leaving NATO would not make any decisive difference militarily. It is quite a different matter politically. The Soviet Union is continually looking for some break-up or erosion of the NATO alliance. So, politically, any reduction or withdrawal at this time does suggest a weakening of the alliance and any such political disadvantage is a matter of importance.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands asserted yesterday that NATO had turned a cold shoulder to the proposal for a conference made by the Warsaw pact countries at their meeting in Budapest last month. For years, the alliance has been attempting to achieve a parallel and balanced force reduction on both sides. The Budapest communique has not been rejected, and all avenues are kept open. It is being studied in Washington. The alliance is approaching the communique with great concern. This concern is obvious, since there are conditions which NATO must accept if the proposed European security conference is to be successful, such as the acceptance of the present division of Germany, the present boundaries in Europe, and only European countries are to participate.

Since 1945, we have been involved in serious discussions on disarmament. At that time Canada felt so concerned that the government sent General McNaughton to New York to lead our delegation in these discussions. Since 1956, we have been participating in the 18-nation disarmament conference in Geneva. Despite the fact that some agreement has been reached on the peaceful uses of outer space and non-proliferation, the basic fact remains that Russia and its Warsaw pact allies have not made one move on the question of basic disarmament of their forces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stafford: We have sent two of our most prominent advocates of disarmament, General Burns and Ambassador Ignatieff, to lead the Canadian delegation at Geneva. The Russians have shown us that they are less than enthusiastic in agreeing to any bilateral reduction in armaments. In fact, they have gone in the opposite direction. The Warsaw pact has never been stronger. With the invasion of Czechoslovakia, NATO is now facing a hard core of front-line fighting Russian troops. At a time when NATO nations should be showing a solidarity of resolve and determination, we are the termites that are chewing away the very foundations of NATO. We are the ones who are demonstrating to the Warsaw pact nations that we no longer support in an effective manner the collective security and principles upon which NATO was founded 20 years ago.

Our present policy regarding NATO weakens the alliance and suggests to the communists that if they just wait, perhaps NATO will disintegrate by itself without their having to make any concessions in their forces for a reduction in NATO forces. The communist doctrine for the triumph of communism throughout the entire world has never changed. The Communists combine that fixed goal with any amount of tactical flexibility so they can change their line by adopting a hard line one moment and a soft one the next, but none of these zigs and zags indicate any change.

Surely, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands is not suggesting that we practice unilateral disarmament. In the 1930's the countries of the free world were the only ones to disarm, and the results were disastrous. Surely, the hon. member is not suggesting that NATO members are not willing to discuss bilateral disarmament and carry it out if possible. The whole history of the United States, for example, is in itself evidence that the United States would be only too happy to disarm if it could be done in safety. The hon. member seems so concerned that we differ with the United States that he does not even take the time to consider that the United States could be right.

Every member of this house would like to see us spend our money on feeding the hungry nations of the world, curing disease and developing the have-not nations instead of spending so much on defence. This is so obvious that it defies repetition. The advocates of such a policy, in venting their emotional theories, never reveal the secret of how it can be done in safety if only one side is willing to disarm.

Both Canada and the United States are members of the Atlantic community of nations, and NATO is as important to the preservation of freedom on this continent as it is in Europe. President Nixon, in his address to the NATO ministers council in Washington, when speaking of NATO said:

> We celebrate a momentous anniversary. We celebrate one of the great successes of the post-war world.

NATO members present at this momentous anniversary were very concerned over Canada's future in NATO. The U.S. State Department handled the situation very diplomatically. Instead of criticizing Canada for talking of pulling back, they praised Canada for deciding to stay in the alliance at all. They were looking at the positive side. The United States was very diplomatic because they realize the surest way to justify Canadian policy in the eyes of Canadian nationalists is for the United States to oppose it.

The United States has practised this attitude of restraint on many other occasions. The United States swallowed its anger when the North Koreans shot down an American EC-121 with 31 service personnel aboard. Washington sat silently while Moscow imposed its discipline on Czechoslovakia. Washington has looked the other way on many occasions and has aimed at negotiation instead of confrontation. Restraint is necessary if détente or arrangement with the Soviet Union is ever to be achieved. This same attitude of restraint is shown by all NATO members. They want us to continue in NATO, but it would be strictly counterproductive for them to denounce Canadian policy.

Our reasons for a planned and phased withdrawal are difficult to understand. The Prime Minister said on April 3:

> We want to play a role, which in the first instance will be essentially defensive of our sovereignty of North America.

I can think of no better way of defending our sovereignty than staying in NATO.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stafford: It is the purpose of NATO to prevent war in an area where there is the greatest concentration of power in the world today. That area is in Europe, where any conflict which will affect our sovereignty is most likely to occur. One thing is certain, that if any threat from the Soviet Union is involved we would certainly protect our sovereignty by very close collaboration with the United States and other western countries.

We have been actively discussing disarmament for many years. We cannot consider any unilateral disarmament. We have learned from past experience that most of the talk on disarmament with the Warsaw pact nations goes on an on for propaganda purposes. Even the Warsaw pact nations are obviously not going to break off negotiations on disarmament, as this would put them at a propaganda disadvantage.

I trust our policies on NATO have not been made to create a new independence, a new isolation or a new identity. This country was not built on isolationism. Canada's best friends are in NATO. In that group are those nations whose investment capital and technological capacity helped this country achieve the second highest standard of living in the world. Our partners in NATO have shown their concern. They know the political advantage of NATO as a great collective force against those forces in the world with which we do not agree. They want us to stay in, not with a mobile force which we can fly to Europe in an emergency but to be present in Europe as part of that great collective effort of NATO nations, the importance of which is out of all proportion to the cost as a deterrent to aggression.

We are often so critical of others in this search for peace and the preservation of freedom. If we have anything to offer, it can best be done as a contribution to the collective effort of NATO nations who, as history shows, have a strong desire for peace. If we want an effective voice in Washington and Europe, we will have to share the military burden. In this way we can put our efforts to work in an attempt to influence the attitudes of the NATO nations along the best road to peace.

President Nixon said at the 20th anniversary of NATO in Washington:

> The United States fully intends to undertake deep and genuine consultation with its allies both before and during any negotiations directly affecting their interests. That is a pledge I shall honour.

I do not think anyone in this chamber would deny that the Warsaw pact nations are far more liable to negotiate through strength than through weakness. The Leader of the New Democratic party who spoke yesterday said he feels that an outstretched hand will do more for the cause of peace than a clenched fist. It will, if the other side genuinely wants peace, but I am not aware of any positive indication in this direction.

Perhaps the hon. member might stretch his hand through the barbed wire entanglements of the Berlin wall and test the response to his theory. If it works we will be forever grateful. If it fails and he returns to this house minus his right arm, we will give him our sympathy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: No wonder you were separated from Steve Otto.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Would the hon. member permit a question? I wonder if the hon. member would be prepared at this time to say he believes that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) wants to get out of NATO as quickly as he can, and would the hon. member agree with the rest of us that we should stay in it?

Mr. Stafford: I have already said there have been so many statements made that I, for one, have been unable to put the jigsaw puzzle together to find out what it is all about. What I am concerned about, however, is the fact that at the Washington conference everyone was aroused. Whatever we have done, we have caused concern among the NATO allies that we have never caused before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It being 9.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to a special order made on Wednesday, April 16, 1969, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question. Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Call in the members.

FISHERIES

SALT COD—ANNOUNCEMENT OF DEFICIENCY PAYMENT PROGRAM

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce, in broad outline, the nature of the deficiency payment program which the government is establishing for salt cod fishermen in 1969. The object of this plan is to ensure that our salt cod fishermen will receive a price for their product which is comparable to that which they received in 1966 and 1967.

As hon. members are aware, devaluation of a number of foreign currencies together with an oversupply of salt fish in world markets resulted in a sharp price decline in 1968. The return to the average Canadian fishermen was down about 25 per cent as compared to 1967. Incomes, particularly in Newfoundland, were also depressed. These developments, together with increased costs of equipment, fuel and other supplies have resulted in severe hardship in many Atlantic communities.

While export prices in 1969 may increase, this is by no means certain. The government has therefore decided to make deficiency payments to salt cod fishermen this fall. These supplementary payments will bring the total price they receive up to a level which is more in line with the price which they received for their fish in 1967. These deficiency payments will be made directly to the fishermen after the fishing season is over and after the salted cod has been sold to the exporters. Payments will be made only on certain grades. Those of a high or medium quality will qualify for assistance. Ungraded fish and fish falling into the lowest grades will not. This selective approach is being followed in order to encourage the production of better quality fish. Inquiries in our traditional export markets also confirm the view that success in our salt cod industry lies in the direction of quality improvement. Our long-term plan therefore is to assist our fishermen to produce a better product.

In consultation with fishermen's representatives and the fish trade, my department has prepared a list of "target" prices for these select grades of salted cod. The prices may not be achieved in 1969. For this reason the government is prepared to supplement the prices which the fishermen actually negotiate with the buyers and exporters to an extent that will bring them reasonably close to the "target" price levels which we believe will be achieved in the early 1970's. More specifically, the government will pay directly to individual fishermen an amount in dollars equal to half the difference between our published "target" prices and the amounts actually received by the fishermen from the fish buyers. If, for example, the "target" price for a quintal of prime light salted fish is $28 and the buyer negotiates a price to the fishermen of $20, then the government will pay the fishermen an additional $4 in the fall. The end price will vary, of course, depending on size, quality and grade. But the 50 per cent support formula will be the same in all cases.

I wish to stress the fact, Mr. Speaker, that this deficiency payment program is intended to compensate the salt cod fishermen for the decline in prices which has taken place since 1967. Other measures, such as the establishment of a Salt Fish Development Corporation which will assist in the reorganization of the industry in 1970 and subsequent years will be announced shortly. An advisory committee, representing fishermen and the salt codfish trade, is being appointed to assist me in the administration of this new program and to assess its impact on the incomes of fishermen in Newfoundland, Quebec and the maritime provinces.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, when the government announced the end of the salt rebate program last year it was supposed to be the end of the interim programs to deal with various crises facing the fishing industry. In the words of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Jamieson) it was to be the end of the band aid philosophy. Yet here we have another interim program, another band aid. The problems facing the salt cod industry are unique, complex and stem from two factors. They are, a lack of quality control in production and the necessity for control of marketing. There is no question but that this is hurting us in our principal market in the West Indies. In my view this situation can only be coped with adequately by the establishment of a marketing board. The minister in his statement of February 20 said there was an examination into "the possible advantages of a salt cod marketing board", yet instead of an announcement in respect of this marketing board, today we have another band aid interim program. I agree that this program was necessary to correct the very serious situation that existed in 1968, when the prices were so low that the very survival of the industry was threatened, not to mention the very important aspects in relation to the hardships imposed on the fishermen, because it is the fishermen who suffer.

• (11:10 a.m.)

In this regard, in the preparation of what we hope will be the government's policy on this matter, it is necessary that steps be taken to eliminate the archaic barter system whereby a fisherman is outfitted by the merchant and repays the merchant at the end of the season from the returns from his catch. This imposes very severe hardships on the fisherman, and I hope the government will take steps to alleviate this archaic barter system, which amounts to a yoke on the fisherman, who is the producer. He has to bring in the fish and he depends on his catch for his livelihood.

In my view we should be taking greater advantage of our position to produce a top quality product, in view of the fact the fish is practically cured on the day it is caught. This gives a great advantage to Canada. Consideration should also be given to the packaging of the product for retail merchandising, thereby eliminating some of the middlemen.

Most important, Mr. Speaker, we must end the cut-throat competition that is doing so much to hurt us in respect of our principal markets. In the final analysis of course this is hurting the fishermen as well. In my view this can only be accomplished by the establishment of a marketing board. I also believe, and I think the minister shares my view, that this marketing board can be set up adequately under the Fisheries Prices Support Board by taking advantage of provincial agencies.

This important industry is today in a state of suspended animation, yet we are stuck with another interim program and faced with the prospect of having to go through the same thing next year. I have just about concluded; but on a final note I should like to state that I am very pleased to note that the government will be paying deficiency payments under this program on the basis of a target price system, thereby insuring that the minimum does not become the maximum and that the fishermen will benefit from the advantages of improved marketing conditions.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

AMENDMENT PERMITTING MENNONITES TO MAKE PAYMENTS TO ALTERNATE FUND

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-190, to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, in the years to come, the value of government programs like the Canada Pension Plan will receive increasing support and recognition.

Although the effectiveness of such programs depends upon universal coverage and contribution, care must be taken that adequate opportunity is given to groups who, for reasons of religious beliefs cannot accept the benefits and whose non-participation in the program would not jeopardize its success, if they were to exclude themselves therefrom.

The Old Order Mennonites of Waterloo County is such a group and this bill seeks to recognize their right on religious grounds to make payments into an alternate fund equal to the amount of their Canada Pension Plan premium.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

COLLECTION OF SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT TAX BEFORE APPROVAL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, in view of the expressed determination of the President of the United States to reduce the burden of taxation on the lower income groups in his country, the minister is reconsidering his unfortunate proposal to increase the burden on the same groups in this country; and in particular, is this perhaps the reason for the delay in his bringing forward the legislation to implement the so-called social development tax?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Leader of the Opposition is talking about the tax reform proposals in the United States being put forward by the President. As the house knows, our tax reform proposals will be presented in the form of a white paper, hopefully by the end of June. With respect to the tax measures contained in the budget, I am hoping to introduce the bill on Tuesday next.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EFFECT OF CONSTITUTIONAL PROBLEMS ON COST OF LIVING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that yesterday the Minister of Finance indirectly received honourable mention in the resignation statement of his colleague, the Minister of Transport, when he referred to the delay in dealing with inflation, is it the position of the government of Canada that constitutional problems are responsible for the continuing increase in the cost of living in this country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think the question is in order.

HOUSING

REMOVAL OF TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Is the minister now giving consideration to removing the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONSULTATIVE CONFERENCE—DISCUSSIONS AS TO CLAIMS COMMISSION, WESTERN REPRESENTATION AND LEGALITY OF TREATIES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that the Indian consultative conference is to begin Monday next, and to be continued until May 5, is it the intention of the minister to divulge to that conference the terms that will be included in any legislation dealing with the establishment of an Indian claims commission, in order that the native Indians who are attending the conference may have an opportunity of discussing this matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of limiting the discussion on any subject with the Indians next week. They themselves took the initiative of preparing the agenda, and if they wish to put before me their opinions about the Indian Claims Commisson, I will readily listen to them. But I do not intend to disclose the government's policy in that field, as all its aspects will be known in the weeks following the last conference with the Indians.

[English]

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister is not going to divulge to the Indian consultative conference the terms and conditions of any bill to establish an Indian claims commission, when is it the ministers' intention to give that information to the House of Commons, and when does he propose to introduce the legislation? Will it be this session?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I propose to inform the house before the adjournment in June on all aspects of our Indian policy, including the government's attitude regarding the Indian Claims Commission.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister heard from representatives of the western delegates attending the conference to the effect that they will not be joining in discussions with the representatives of the Department of Indian Affairs; and if so, how will this affect the terms of reference of the conference? I believe the point they raise is precisely the point raised by the leader of the New Democratic party.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I spoke with the President of the Canadian Indian Federation, Mr. Deiter, and we agreed that the Federation would prepare the agenda of the conference. The Minister without Portfolio in charge of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and myself, will be present when the Indians express the desire to meet us, and the same thing goes for the officials of my department.

[English]

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister be prepared to discuss fully with the Indian people at the meetings next week the legality of the treaties as they presently exist?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to discuss all matters that may be of interest to the Indians and I am sure this point will be raised.

[English]

PLEA FOR SIMPLICITY IN LANGUAGE OF AMENDING MEASURE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that I detected a faint touch of ambiguity in the minister's reply to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, and since he told us the other day that the new Indian Act would be couched in clear and simple terms which everybody, including members of parliament, would understand, is the minister prepared to say specifically now that members of parliament will have a chance to judge for themselves before the end of the session just how clear and simple the language of the act is. In other words, will he introduce the Indian Act—not legislation on the Indian claims commission—or amendments to the act before the end of the session?

An hon. Member: He said so.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the house will certainly have an opportunity to realize that our Indian Affairs policy is quite clear and that the Indian Act will be particularly clear, if there is one.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I did not ask the minister whether or not the act was clear. What I asked was whether the new Indian Act or amendments to it will be introduced to the house before the end of the session.

Mr. Woolliams: That is simple enough.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said that I would advise the house, before the month of June, of the government policy with respect to Indian Affairs.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Answer the question.

PRESENCE OF RESPONSIBLE MINISTER DURING DEBATE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise the house whether the minister responsible for housing will be in the house today at two o'clock when the debate dealing with this important matter begins?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Richardson, who is the Acting Minister of Housing, is in the house this morning.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is known that the minister who is still responsible for housing is in Ottawa and in the parliament buildings today. Can the Prime Minister give us any good reason why the minister is not in the house today when such an important matter is coming up for discussion?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Since this is a purely argumentative question, it is not acceptable.

Mr. Hees: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When a matter of such importance comes up for discussion in the house and the minister responsible is in Ottawa but is not present in the house, I think it is a matter of great importance.

Mr. Speaker: Many matters of great importance do not qualify for questions under the rules.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Assuming that the rules have been changed, I would ask Mr. Richardson if he is not—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The rules have not been changed. The hon. member must realize that the Prime Minister referred to the Minister without Portfolio by name in order to identify him. We all know that this is not regular, but when there is more than one Minister without Portfolio sometimes this practice is resorted to.

Mr. Woolliams: They are hard to find.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member for Calgary North would like to make a ruling for the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: The rule has not been changed.

Mr. MacInnis: I wish to ask the Minister without Portfolio from Winnipeg South whether he submitted his resignation to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO REDUCE POVERTY

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the warning given yesterday by the vice chairman of the Economic Council of Canada that failure to deal with poverty in a purposeful way may well result in violence in Canadian cities, will the government give this matter the priority that it so urgently demands? Many people would like an answer to that question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): My supplementary question arises from the fact that since the war on poverty was declared five years ago, the only sound of that has been the crackle of the press release from the Liberal backbenchers, I should like to ask the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot make a speech; he has to ask a question.

Mr. Schreyer: I should like to ask the Prime Minister or anyone representing the Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion if he can assure the house, in the light of mounting concern about this problem, that before the end of this session the government will submit to parliament concrete measures relative to poverty in Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: The minister has already announced his intention to introduce for first reading a bill concerned with this aspect of regional economic development.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I address this question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the findings in all the analyses of poverty in Canada, including that made by the Economic Council, show that poverty is by no means limited to the disadvantaged regions of Canada but that it also exists in the large urban areas—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should ask the question.

Mr. Lewis: I was just coming to that, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister tell us what organization has been set up inside or outside the cabinet to deal with the question of poverty, not only in the disadvantaged areas but elsewhere in the country?

Mr. Trudeau: I answered this question two days ago, Mr. Speaker.

RESEARCH

ACTION ON MACDONALD REPORT ON SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): This question is directed to the Prime Minister. What procedure does the government intend to follow to deal with the wide-ranging recommendations of the Macdonald Report on scientific research?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The President of the Treasury Board will deal with this question when he is in the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

OIL

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CANADA-U.S. CONTINENTAL POLICY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister or to the Acting Minister for Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the task force finished its report as far as the petroleum industry is concerned and, if so, is the government prepared to make a report to the house with reference to the consultations between Canada and the United States?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I am not quite sure which report the hon. member has in mind. It seems to me he is dealing with two different things. The task force concerned with northern development, in particular, has made an interim report, and this is being considered. With regard to the other matter referred to, continual reports are being received but no specific report has been made.

Mr. Woolliams: Perhaps I was a little ambiguous, Mr. Speaker. I was wondering whether the group concerned with the subject has returned from Washington, and made any deal affecting Canada and the United States as far as petroleum is concerned in connection with a new continental oil policy.

Mr. Lang: The discussions in Washington dealt with some narrow and specific matters as well as with some general issues of great importance. Talks with regard to all these aspects are continuing. There are no conclusions to report to the house at this time.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I wonder whether the federal government and the task force in their studies of the marketing of northern oil have consulted the Alberta government, and the possible conflict of interest in connection with oil sales there.

HOUSING

VANCOUVER—STATUS OF PROJECTS PENDING GOVERNMENT POLICY ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I be privileged to direct a question to the acting minister responsible for housing? Can we be advised whether any or all of the proposed public housing projects in Vancouver are presently being processed, or whether all such projects are stalled pending the announcement of new government policies on low rent housing?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. James Richardson (Acting Minister of Housing): Mr. Speaker, all public housing projects are not being stalled.

Mr. Winch: I asked the minister specifically with regard to the situation in Vancouver—projects which have been in process for many months. Have they been stalled? May I have an answer with regard to Vancouver, please?

Mr. Richardson: The Minister of Transport was in Vancouver—

An hon. Member: Who is the minister in charge of housing?

Mr. Richardson: The resignation of the Minister of Transport is effective the 30th of this month. He has visited Vancouver with particular concern for the public housing development in that city. He has made no final recommendation concerning it since his return only a few days ago.

TIMING OF PUBLICATION OF GUIDELINES

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): My supplementary question concerns the promise made by the Minister of Transport that the guidelines for public housing would be out not later than today. Can we be told when these guidelines will be made available?

Hon. James Richardson (Acting Minister of Housing): As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot give an exact date.

INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT INVOLVEMENT IN URBAN RENEWAL

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask about the guideline, but my colleague from Halifax-East Hants asked that question. And now we get into the area of urban housing about which we had a lot of dialogue from the former Minister of Transport. Can the acting minister advise this house when and if this government intends to make a statement as to whether it intends to be involved with urban renewal? If so, to what extent?

Hon. James Richardson (Acting Minister of Housing): Mr. Speaker, the recommendations of the task force on housing have been stated many times. Many of those recommendations were brought forward by the Minister of Transport and presented to the cabinet and studied by cabinet committees. Many have been approved and legislation is in an advanced stage of drafting. This legislation will be brought forward in the very near future and will answer all questions of that kind.

Mr. Alexander: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member does not feel we are anticipating to some extent the very important debate which will take place later today? Perhaps we should not have too many supplementary questions on this subject.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think with all due respect to Your Honour that this is a very important question. I know I am perhaps treading on ground that will be discussed a little later on. If Your Honour would allow me one further question: Would the minister advise this house now whether in fact all trips that were required have now been taken? Is the acting minister in a position to give the guidelines and commitments with respect to urban renewal? Trips have been made to Vancouver and Calgary. Are there any further trips contemplated? We cannot talk about Hamilton all the time. We also have to talk about the rest of the country.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. It has to do with urban renewal. A few weeks ago the Minister of Transport was in Kitchener and while there indicated that he would announce in the house the new guidelines for urban renewal. In view of the uncertainty that may prevail because of the resignation of the Minister of Transport, will the Prime Minister assure the house that a new minister will be appointed very quickly and that those guidelines will be introduced in this house as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again it seems this is an admirable subject for a speech the hon. member might want to make this afternoon or evening.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

POSSIBLE CHANGES IN MEASURE FOLLOWING DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is directed to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Can the right hon. gentleman state whether any discussions were held with provincial officials during the Easter adjournment or since on the question of language recognition from coast to coast? Also are any changes contemplated in the bill as a result of any such discussions?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Some meetings have been held, Mr. Speaker. I cannot vouch as to the date, but they were held by the Minister of Justice with some provincial officials and premiers. The minister would have to be asked as to the dates of these meetings, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): A supplementary question. Have any discussions been held with authorities of the province of Quebec with regard to language legislation in that province involving possible conflict with the proposed federal language bill?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes. The Minister of Justice has also been meeting with the Premier of Quebec and some of his ministers on this very subject.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): A supplementary to the Prime Minister. I ask the Prime Minister if the Minister of Justice has as yet put any amendments to the language bill before the cabinet?

Mr. Trudeau: Surely the house would not want me to break my Privy Councillor's oath, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SUGGESTION OF SABOTAGE IN DERAILMENT NEAR TORONTO

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Transport which is related to a question asked earlier this week by my colleague, the hon. member for Wellington-Grey. Has the minister taken any steps to make certain that further acts of sabotage resulting in death will not take place on the railroads? Has he given any instructions in this regard?

Hon. James Richardson (Acting Minister of Housing): Mr. Speaker, as has been reported to the house, the train derailment which was thought to be sabotage is being investigated not only by the railway, but by the police. Every step will be taken to see that there are no opportunities to repeat acts of this kind, but you cannot stop sabotage if someone is determined to be destructive. I do not know what steps can be taken, other than the ones which are being taken by the police force.

Mr. Nesbitt: I wish to ask the minister if additional special precautions have been taken since this incident? As we all know, sometimes these incidents evoke others.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSPORT

FENCING OF RIGHTS-OF-WAY

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): A supplementary to the Minister without Portfolio. Is the government considering amending Section 277 of the Railway Act to compel the railways to fence rights-of-way in densely populated areas?

Hon. James Richardson (Acting Minister of Housing): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that has been given careful consideration, but there is no plan at the present time to change the act in that respect.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY AS TO PERSONS INCARCERATED

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General. When the minister said the other night that there were no more in jail in Canada in the last five years, did he mean because there were fewer crimes or because there were more criminals getting away?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member the question should not be asked.

Mr. Bell: May I rephrase my question and ask the Prime Minister in this regard if he noticed in the paper at some time that the Solicitor General, after for 30 years threatening to retire, stated that he definitely would not be retiring? If so, what is the Prime Minister going to do about this?

HOGS—ALLEGED DISSATISFACTION WITH QUALITY PREMIUMS

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I have been wanting to ask the minister this question for a number of days, but because of the roster system I have not been able to do so. In view of the widespread dissatisfaction with the new quality premium being paid on hogs, was there any discussion between the federal government and the Canadian Swine Council before the recently announced alterations in policy on hog quality premiums were made?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I would like to advise the hon. member that I was in the house yesterday and he could have asked the question then. I would also like to advise him there was a great deal of discussion with the Canadian Swine Council and other people who were interested in the new grading system for hogs. Obviously the government has to assume the responsibility for the amount and level of subsidies paid on hogs or for any other purpose. While there was consultation with regard to changing the incentives paid through the marketplace respecting hogs, and this grading system, we have to accept the responsibility for the level paid out of the treasury.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I have a statement from the Canadian Swine Council which states they never had any discussions—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask the question.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): In view of the fact the Canadian Swine Council stated that no prior discussions took place, has there been any discussion with that body since the new policy was announced?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a supplementary question. Is the minister not aware that the removal of this quality premium will greatly reduce the production of first quality hogs in Canada? This will also very adversely affect our export trade.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FLOODS

TRAIL, B.C.—ACTION TO CONTROL EMERGENCY SITUATION

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the major flood disaster at the City of Trail which resulted in several million dollars worth of damage to municipal and private property and in view of the establishment of the joint disaster fund to assist in rehabilitating the damaged area, will the Prime Minister indicate to the house what assistance the government will contribute to this joint disaster fund, and on what basis?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary asked a similar question yesterday.

The answer is that I received a telegram late last night from the mayor—no—from the Premier of British Columbia.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Trudeau: It is in connection with the floods at Trail. I am sending him an answer today.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO REDUCE POVERTY

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Replying to a question asked this morning by the hon. member for York South, the Prime Minister said he had answered the question two days ago. The original question was whether the government was planning to introduce legislation to deal with aspects of poverty other than those associated with regional poverty. The Prime Minister, as reported at page 7857 of Hansard—

Mr. Speaker: Order please. There is no question of privilege. Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed to ask the question again.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will try to ask a specific question along the lines of the one the hon. member for York South raised. Does the government intend during the present session of parliament to introduce legislation dealing with urban poverty?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Thus far, Mr. Speaker, our efforts have been largely consumed in resisting the reckless economic demands of the New Democratic party.

HOUSING

THOMPSON, MAN.—AVAILABILITY OF MORTGAGE MONEY

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio from Winnipeg South in his capacity as minister in charge of housing. Prior to the Easter recess the former Minister of Transport assured me he intended to make C.M.H.C. mortgage money available for purposes of highrise apartment construction in Thompson, Manitoba. Will the minister look into this matter and tell us how it stands, in order that he may be able to report on it during the debate this afternoon?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made his submission to the minister which we must assume has been taken into account.

GRAIN

FUNDS FOR PLANTING OPERATIONS

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the minister must now be aware that it is mechanically impossible, owing to the tremendous volume of work, for the Standing Committee on Agriculture to report to parliament for some weeks, is the government contemplating any immediate measures to provide western grain growers with emergency operating capital prior to their planting season?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree that it will take several weeks or an undue length of time for the committee to make its recommendations or findings. Although I am not a member of the committee I have spoken to several members who have indicated that they intend to have a report ready very soon.

Mr. Danforth: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister of the opinion that no action will be taken prior to the time this standing committee makes its report?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking for an expression of opinion, which is contrary to the rules.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the committee makes its report will the minister take action on the recommendations of the committee, resulting from its tour of western Canada?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, we will be very interested in what the committee has to say as a result of its tour of western Canada.

TRADE

WHEAT—SUGGESTED EXPANSION OF SALES PROMOTION ACTIVITIES

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, may I address a supplementary question either to the Minister of Agriculture or to the Minister from Saskatoon-Humboldt. Since the chairman of the Canadian Wheat Board indicated to the members of our agricultural committee only a few days ago that it would be useful if the sales Promotion staff of the Canadian Wheat Board could be supplemented by trade department personnel, may I ask whether the government has given active consideration to that proposition?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the transcript of the proceedings referred to, but I understand that press reports of those proceedings are not completely accurate. The government of course is always considering the magnitude, strength and proper distribution of our trade force abroad; this matter is under constant review.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I point out to hon. members that we are short of time.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Speaker, I feel I have a valid point of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member might be allowed to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Schreyer: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The minister from Saskatoon-Humboldt has indicated that press reports in this connection may not be accurate. I attended the hearings and heard the Chairman of the Wheat Board make certain pronouncements. Therefore, the minister's observations about press reports are irrelevant. I ask the minister again, is the government taking under active consideration the specific proposition I referred to?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must bring to the attention of the hon. member that in my view in some of the questions which have been asked there seems to be a reference to the work of the committee, which has not yet reported. It is contrary to the rules to discuss evidence taken before a committee before that committee has reported.

FISHERIES

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE PRECEDING DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and arises from a statement he made in the house earlier today. Since payments under the deficiency payments program announced by the minister will not be available to fishermen until the end of the season, will the government make operating capital available to fishermen at the beginning of the season so that they will not have to enter into barter agreements with buyers.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

However, I know the hon. member is aware of the loans which have been made available to a number of other fish processing companies in his province and elsewhere.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I view of the financial crisis of 1968 it will be impossible for fishermen to go to the fishing grounds unless they receive interim financing. I do not see why that cannot be worked out.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is not a question.

IMPLEMENTATION OF 12 MILE EXCLUSIVE ZONE

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Since the matter is of great importance to the B.C. fishing industry may I ask the minister whether, before the house adjourns for the summer, amending legislation will be introduced affecting the established twelve mile limit extending from headland to headland in order to protect B.C. fishermen in waters off the Queen Charlotte Islands and in the Queen Charlotte Sound.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, legislation to that effect is under consideration.

[Later:]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question supplementary to that asked by my colleague from Vancouver East, and directed to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact that a few weeks ago the minister announced that he planned to have the 12-mile fishing limit delineated from headland to headland, I ask him when will this be implemented? Secondly, does he intend to introduce the legislation dealing with the Queen Charlotte Islands prior to the summer adjournment?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that the co-ordinates, in other words, the latitudes and longitudes defining the base lines along most of Canada's coast, will be published within the next two weeks. There are several gaps left, such as the gap at Queen Charlotte Sound, and it will be necessary to amend the existing legislation to deal with that particular matter. This is a matter of scheduling legislation and I must defer to the House Leader in this connection.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): As a further supplementary is it the intention of the minister to introduce such legislation at the present session?

Mr. Davis: I cannot answer that question definitely, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Before he releases the maps showing the co-ordinates, would the minister take the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry into his confidence, perhaps at an in camera session, so that a discussion can take place on this very important matter?

Mr. Davis: I will certainly consider that, Mr. Speaker, but I think that the co-ordinates will be obvious to the hon. member as ones which are defined by our geography, and they are not a matter for dispute from a policy point of view.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the importance of this matter and its acceptance internationally, what steps is the government taking to have another Law of the Sea Conference convened in order to obtain some agreement with regard to these measures?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer if this question were directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

TRANSPORT

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY RATES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Transport which relates to an answer the former Minister of Transport gave on Wednesday. I refer to the government's decision that, in principle, it will support an increase in ferry rates for Canadian National Ferries crossing to Prince Edward Island. Can the Minister inform the house whether there has been consultation with the government of Prince Edward Island on this matter and whether that government agreed to such a potential increase in the ferry rates?

Hon. James Richardson (Acting Minister of Housing): Mr. Speaker, as the minister stated recently in the house, the decision has been taken in principle to increase the rates, but the detail of the rate structure has not yet been determined. There has been consultation.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Before a final decision is taken will the minister assure the house that interested parties will have an opportunity to make representations on this vital matter affecting transportation to and from Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Richardson: There have been many representations, Mr. Speaker, and there has been that opportunity.

[Later:]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Transport with reference to the dismal decision regarding the ferry rates in Prince Edward Island. If the rates have not been determined, can he advise the house what time the new impost will become effective?

Hon. James Richardson (Acting Minister of Housing): No, Mr. Speaker. Both the actual rate structure and the timing of its implementation are being considered.

INCOME TAX

LATE FILINGS FROM DELAYED MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Will allowance be made for the late filing of income tax returns owing to the deterioration of postal service?

FARM MACHINERY

POSSIBILITY OF PRICE FIXING

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has he asked the royal commission on farm machinery to look into the circumstances under which a major farm machinery company offered in an advertisement to cut tractor prices for a limited period, in order to meet the lower cost of tractors being imported from England? Will he initiate an investigation into the possibility of the existence of price fixing in the farm machinery industry?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that Dr. Barber has already taken this into account. However, I will undertake to make sure that the hon. member's representations are conveyed to the chairman of the commission.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REDUCTION IN OTTAWA-MONTREAL SERVICE

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of transportation. In view of the fact that at the end of this week, the C.N.R. is reducing its passenger train service on trains Nos. 35 and 38 to one or two days a week, between Ottawa and Montreal, can the minister say whether the government condones the negation of existing government policy—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is obviously not a question that can be accepted.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPLACEMENT FOR CAMP PICTON

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Has he information that he could pass along to the house regarding an adequate replacement for Camp Picton which, as he knows, the government has phased out of military operations?

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member will soon agree with me that the future of Camp Picton has never been brighter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

OIL

MARKETING OF PRODUCTION FROM YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has the minister consulted the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta regarding future markets for oil and gas from the Yukon and the Northwest Territories?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am taking notice of this question, although I do not quite understand the purpose of it.

[Mr. Olson.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REPORT STAGE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, April 22, consideration of Bill C-150, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before resuming consideration of Bill C-150 it has been suggested that the Chair might indicate what its views are in connection with amendments Nos. 12 to 41 which will be the next group to be considered by the house. If hon. members are in agreement with my suggestion I might indicate to them which of these amendments appear to be doubtful from a procedural standpoint.

I shall run through these amendments from No. 12 to No. 41 in a brief manner, and then we might return to each one individually, to hear whatever arguments hon. members might want to submit for the consideration of the Chair before a final determination is made from a procedural standpoint.

I would like to suggest to hon. members that amendments Nos. 12, 14, 16 and 25 might very well be out of order on the grounds that they are in the nature of substantive motions of a kind that are normally considered on second reading of a bill. Then it would appear that amendments Nos. 17, 18, 20 and 32 should not be accepted by the Chair and put to the house because they would appear to go beyond the scope of Bill C-150—

Mr. Baldwin: On a question of clarification, Your Honour, did you say Nos. 17, 18, 20 and 32?

Mr. Speaker: I said amendments Nos. 17, 18, 20 and 32. My suggestion would be that consideration of amendment No. 19 should be deferred until amendment 37 has been disposed of, and I would also like to suggest to hon. members that amendments Nos. 21, 22, 23, 31, 39, 40 and 41 are in effect the same question, that they represent essentially the same question. I would like to suggest to hon. members that amendment No. 21 might be selected in accordance with Standing Order 75 (10), and that consideration of amendment No. 21 would effectively dispose of amendments Nos. 22, 23, 31, 39, 40 and 41. In other words, the suggestion is that these amendments are in order but they are essentially the same, and in accordance with the provisions of the Standing Order I suggest to hon. members that they should be marshalled and considered as one. Amendment No. 21 only should be put to the house, and the disposition of it eventually would apply to the others, Nos. 22, 23, 31, 39, 40 and 41.

Again, amendments Nos. 26 and 36 are identical. I suggest that No. 26 be selected for consideration, and that consideration of this amendment No. 26 should dispose of amendment No. 36. We now go to No. 28.

• (12 noon)

[Translation]

Amendment No. 28 appears unacceptable in its present form because, if it were adopted, it would give two different definitions to the words "accredited hospital" as used in the bill. However, as this is merely a technical error, the house would no doubt allow the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) to change his amendment by deleting therefrom the words "or approved". Then, the amendment would remain the same in substance and this technical difficulty would disappear.

If the hon. member so wishes, I could ask the house to give unanimous consent to this minor change to the amendment. If this is done, the house could take the amendment into consideration when it is called.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion is agreeable to me.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is the house in agreement that the amendment be amended in this way?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is suggested that the consideration of amendment No. 38 precede the consideration of amendment No. 37. As previously suggested, amendment No. 19 would follow amendment No. 37.

Perhaps hon. members would wish the Chair to return to the suggestion made to the house concerning amendments 12, 14, 16 and 25. I have serious doubts about these amendments because to my way of thinking they are substantive amendments which should not be moved at this time. However, I shall hear arguments or opinions of hon. members who may not be in agreement with the Chair on this point.

Mr. Woolliams: May I speak to the point of order. Mr. Speaker. As I understood it, I thought you questioned amendment No. 20. Yet you considered amendment No. 13 to be in order and permitted it. Am I correct in that regard?

Mr. Speaker: That is correct.

Mr. Woolliams: My argument may be premature, but I am prepared to submit that it is impossible to accept amendment No. 13 if amendment No. 20 is not accepted. These amendments should be read together. I am prepared to make that submission at the convenience of the Chair. My suggestion is that it would be illegal and impossible to allow amendment 13 to stand without amendment 20; they must be read together.

Mr. Speaker: I would think the hon. member is right on this point. Of course the decision of the Chair is only on procedural points and procedurally amendment 13 stands. The argument of the hon. member is that if amendment 20 is not put to the house amendment 13 does not make sense and may not be put to the house. Perhaps that should be considered. It is an interesting and important point. However, I would think we might start with the four amendments to which I have just referred, that is, amendments 12, 14, 16 and 25 which, as I suggested to the house a moment ago, would appear to be in the form of reasoned amendments. If there is no argument I think this should be the decision of the Chair.

I have not stretched a point at all in reaching this decision. Clearly in my view these are reasoned amendments declaratory of a principle. They are the type of amendment which ought to be moved normally on second reading but certainly not at this stage. Now we go to amendments 17, 18, 20 and 32 which in the view of the Chair would appear to go beyond the scope of the amending legislation now before the house. Again I would be pleased to hear the views of hon. members for the guidance of the Chair. I will, of course, take into account the arguments which may be submitted with regard to these four amendments.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak mainly to amendments 17 and 18. I say immediately that I find it difficult to argue against your suggestion with regard to amendment No. 17 because it makes reference to sections which are not in the bill at all. I submit to you, sir, that that is not the case in respect of amendment 18. I imagine the same would be true with regard to a later amendment but at this stage I limit myself to amendment 18.

The fact is that clause 18 of the bill starts out by saying that section 237 of the said act is amended in a certain way. I suggest to you that if the section is to be amended by the bill it is not going beyond the scope of the bill to say that the section it is proposed to amend in a certain way be repealed. This is what the proposed amendment does. Indeed, in looking at the clause in the bill and the proposed amendment of my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), it occurred to me that she could, I suppose, have worded her proposed amendment in this way; she could have said that clause 18 be amended by deleting all the words after the first line thereof and substituting therefor the word "repealed". I hope I am making myself clear. She could have left the first line of clause 18 entirely alone. Perhaps that might be better than the language she has used.

The hon. member could have put her amendment in the following form: That clause 18 be amended by deleting everything after the first line thereof and substituting therefor the word "repealed". This is precisely what her amendment does. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it would clearly be an amendment of the proposed amendment if she had used that language. In effect, this is exactly what her amendment proposes. It is an amendment to clause 18. Clause 18 proposes certain amendments to section 237 of the Criminal Code. My colleague says that is not the amendment which is desired and that the desired amendment is that section 237 be repealed.

I do not know whether I have persuaded Your Honour as I have been persuaded, but I should like to put to Your Honour with force the general suggestion, which I believe was made earlier in the debate, that there are four approaches to the particular problem with which we are dealing in regard to this list of amendments. There is the approach that what the Criminal Code now says should be left alone. There is the approach that what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has proposed is a good way to deal with this subject. There is the approach put by some hon. members that there ought to be no leeway at all in respect of abortion, and then there is the approach represented by the amendment of my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway which is to the effect that the problem of abortion has no place in the Criminal law at all. I submit that all these are valid approaches to the problem from the legislative point of view and that the approach of the hon. lady that this matter has no place in the Criminal Code, which by the way I happen to support strongly, is an approach which ought to be placed before the members of this house for a vote so that they can declare themselves on that approach to the problem.

The first reason why I believe her amendment is valid is that it does not go beyond the scope of the bill because the bill does deal with section 237, and we could have worded the amendment in the way I have suggested. Had I known about it earlier I might have made the suggestion earlier, and then it would clearly be an amendment to the language of the proposed clause. The second reason is that it deals with a subject which ought to be considered by this house. Therefore I would urge Your Honour to reconsider your suggestion in respect of the wording of amendment No. 18.

As I have said, I can see no valid argument I might make in respect of amendment No. 17 inasmuch as it does include references to sections of the code not referred to in the amending bill.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, in view of the legal arguments that have been set forth so ably and clearly by my colleague, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), there are just one or two points I wish to emphasize. Before submitting amendment No. 17 I drafted two other versions in an attempt to put it in language which would be acceptable. On one previous occasion I made an attempt to put an amendment in language that might be acceptable. On this occasion I would be glad if the suggestion made by the hon. member for York South were accepted and the necessary changes were made to put this amendment into acceptable form.

It is very important that hon. members have an opportunity to express themselves as to the appropriate manner of dealing with this subject. Such an opportunity is not provided by any of the other amendments. One other matter that was before the house was handled by removing it from the Criminal Code in order that we might deal with it in another way. If that is legitimate, I should like to follow the same procedure in respect of this contentious matter. It should be dealt with at this time and perhaps it might be considered by removing it from the Code.

Amendment No. 18 is worded in language which I believe is acceptable, and I feel we should be able to deal with the subject of abortion under this amendment in that it seeks to amend the amendment now before us.

At an earlier stage of the proceedings mention was made of the fact that this amendment might possibly be in order as a result of an arrangement which was not agreed upon by the four parties in the house. At that time it was suggested we allow an interval of time to discuss this amendment which deals with the legislation now before us. It was proposed that during that time those who wished to remove this matter entirely from the code could speak on the subject. In this way we would be dealing with any consequential amendments. There seemed to be a disposition on the part of members to follow that course in dealing with that issue.

Apart from the legal arguments, I should like Your Honour to consider seriously the fact that many hon. members feel this is a logical alternative, and that we should deal with this matter in this way because the opportunity to do so is not provided in any other amendment. Perhaps Your Honour might suggest a method of re-wording amendment No. 18 so it would be acceptable. I have in mind something similar to the suggestion that this matter be removed entirely from the Criminal Code.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly in support of this amendment. By the very nature of the change in our rules we find that the majority of members have not had an opportunity to deal with the subject in this fashion. Now that the clause by clause study by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has taken place, the only opportunity for hon. members to discuss this matter and clearly express their opinions would be during the consideration of an amendment such as the one proposed. Therefore I support the argument that we deal with this matter under this proposed amendment in order that all members can express themselves.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, when we were dealing with amendments concerning gross indecency a problem arose in respect of procedure. Your Honour decided that if a proposed amendment went beyond the scope of the particular clause to which it purported to relate, it was out of order. I do not wish to repeat the citations I put to Your Honour at that time as they have been judicially noted and accepted by you. I do want to broaden that argument to show that in my opinion an amendment at the report stage is out of order not only if it goes beyond the scope of the clause to which it relates but also if it goes beyond the scope of the bill itself and in fact introduces a new clause in the bill.

At that time I referred Your Honour to citations from Beauchesne and the historic source of those citations, which I assumed to be from May, seventeenth edition page 549, where it states under the heading, "Inadmissible amendments".

> An amendment is out of order if it is irrelevant to the subject matter or beyond the scope of the bill, or if it is irrelevant to the subject matter or beyond the scope of the clause under consideration.

At page 558 of the same edition of May it is stated that a new clause is out of order for many of the same reasons applicable to an amendment, and will not be entertained if it goes beyond the scope of the bill.

I believe it is evident in the cases we are now discussing that the purpose of the bill to amend the Criminal Code does not consist of an entire revision and consolidation of the Criminal Code, but deals rather with certain parts of the bill being brought up to date in accordance with government policy. That part of an amendment which attempts to introduce a new clause by repealing an existing section in the Code, not just an existing clause in the bill, goes beyond the scope of the policy dictated in the bill and is out of order. If the amendment proposes a new clause by way of deleting an existing section of the Criminal Code, it goes beyond the scope of the bill.

Let me turn now to the four amendments under consideration. Amendment No. 17 attempts to repeal sections 209, 237, 238 and 150 of the Criminal Code. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) has admitted that sections 238 and 150 are in no way mentioned in the bill. All the bill purports to do in respect of section 209 is to clarify it by the addition of some clarifying words, namely the words "at the time of birth". In this way we are attempting to make perfectly clear the point of time to which a deliberate act within section 209 relates.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Section 237, which is the section relating to abortion, is found in the Criminal Code. Clause 18 of the bill merely says:

Section 237 of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following subsections:
"(4) Subsections (1) and (2) do not apply to"—

Then it refers to a very specific situation, where you have a qualified medical practitioner, supported by a committee of doctors, in an accredited or approved hospital, and the therapeutic abortion is carried out where the life or health of the mother is in danger. Within those restricted circumstances, subsections 1 and 2 of existing section 237 of the Criminal Code do not apply.

This is a deliberate policy amendment dealing with a specifically defined situation. It withdraws the application of two subsections of section 237 from that specific situation. What the hon. member attempts to do in amendment No. 17 is to eliminate that section completely. I suggest that is a policy decision on her part which goes well beyond the policy contained in the amendment and is therefore beyond the scope of the bill. I suggest it is as much beyond the scope of the bill as if the hon. lady had introduced a new clause.

In amendment 18 the hon. lady says that she wants section 237 of the act repealed. She does not refer to the bill; she goes back to the original Criminal Code. She is, in effect, introducing a new policy decision; she is introducing a new clause in the bill. The hon. member is not interested in attacking the bill by repealing one of its clauses; she wants to repeal the whole section of the original act. I suggest, therefore, that her amendment goes beyond the scope of the bill and introduces her own policy quotient into the original section, to which the bill relates in only a very restrictive way.

Turning to amendment No. 20, what the amendment does, in effect, is to repeal section 237, subsection 1, of the Criminal Code. It does not relate to clause 18, which has to do with a specific amendment to section 237 of the Criminal Code. The amendment of the hon. member goes well beyond that and eliminates a subsection of the original code. In other words, what the amendment purports to do is to exempt any female person from aborting herself; it would eliminate that section from the code. It would also eliminate the section relating to modality, the administration of a drug or other noxious thing, the use of an instrument, and manipulation of any kind. So the amendment goes well beyond the scope of clause 18 and goes back to the code. It is, in effect, a separate policy decision and repeals a subsection of the code to which the amendment contained in clause 18 in no way relates.

The same objection applies to amendment No. 32. The effect of this amendment is to repeal section 237(3)(a) of the Criminal Code. The amendment does not relate to clause 18 by way of a clarification, amendment, rejection or deletion; it goes back to the code itself and introduces a separate policy decision beyond the scope of the policy contained in the bill. It thereby goes beyond the scope of the bill.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, do you want to make a decision on the other amendments before I deal with No. 20?

Mr. Speaker: Obviously the Chair would have to make a decision on amendment No. 20 also, because in my view it would appear to be in the same category as the amendments to which hon. members have already referred.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate that the amendment has to be within the scope of the bill. I ask Your Honour to look at clause 18, which provides as follows:

Section 237 of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following subsections:—

Then clause 18 sets up a new law so far as abortion is concerned; it adds subsections to the code. My first submission is that clause 18 changes the law and practice of today; therefore the bill does amend section 237. A small change was made to my amendment, but I make nothing of that because I think the wording used by the officers of the law branch is better than the wording I used. However, the procedure is the same. What I could have done, rather than asking that section 237 be repealed, is add the word "unlawfully". I think the amendment is in order because it is within the scope of the bill and is part of the purpose of the bill.

Let us consider the law as it stands at the present time. Two sections of the Criminal Code are very important and must be read together in order that they not be ambiguous. I refer the house to page 348, volume No. 10 of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Professor Mewett was explaining to the committee what the law is now and what it will be when these amendments take effect. I asked the professor this question:

May I ask you to pause there, so that this is on record? You are dealing with the Canadian section 209. I think it should be read in at this time. Then I will ask you the next question which is dealing right with the point you are on, if I might, Mr. Chairman.

"209. (1) Every one who causes the death of a child that has not become a human being, in such a manner that, if the child were a human being, he would be guilty of murder, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

(2) This section does not apply to a person who, by means that, in good faith, he considers necessary to preserve the life of the mother of a child that has not become a human being, causes the death of the child."

Section 209 of the code makes it illegal to cause the death of a child that has not become a human being; it is an offence to do this. Subsection 2 of section 209 provides that the section does not apply to a person who, in good faith—this, basically, has always been a doctor—causes a miscarriage in order to preserve the life of the mother. The House of Lords ruled that this section, properly interpreted, means not only the life of the mother but her health, that is, if she would otherwise become an emotional or physical wreck. I continued my question to the professor in these words:

And I take it from conversations I had with you this morning, that you feel that the Bourne case principle that interprets the preservation of the life has been applied in Ontario, and I believe it has been applied elsewhere in Canada. It does not mean to save her from violent death, but it means to preserve her life, in a case where she might otherwise be left impaired physically or emotionally. Then of course the doctor in good faith who performs such a therapeutic abortion would fall into the saving and exception clause of section 209. What you are really saying is, with the strength of section 209 and considering proposed section 237, if the word "unlawfully" were put in you would be obtaining the same result basically of what the bill is trying to do at the present time.

I emphasize those words. If the word "unlawfully" were included we would obtain the same result, basically, as that sought by clause 18 of the bill. Actually, from a legal point of view you are not in fact really changing the statute law of Canada very much. To this the professor answered that this was his view. So my first point is that by taking out the words "in the act of birth" from section 209 and adding the word "unlawfully" in section 237, according to the professor of criminal law from the University of Toronto you are doing the same thing as does the wording of the bill.

Someone might ask, why bring it in at all? I will tell you why, sir. This amendment will make one small change to clause 18 of the bill. Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. members over there could hold their meeting outside because I am trying to explain a very technical matter.

I was going to explain the reason for this change. Under clause 18 of the bill a committee of doctors must be set up and the operation can only be performed in an accredited hospital if the doctors say that an abortion is necessary in their view to preserve the life and health of the mother. That is the only difference between my amendment and clause 18, leaving section 209 as it is in the code except for the words "in the act of birth" and amending section 237 to make it clear that there is no onus on the doctor and he cannot be penalized. This same change was suggested by the former minister of justice, Mr. Garson, when the code was changed in 1953, so that the only change I suggest is that a committee of doctors or an accredited hospital not be made a requirement in the bill.

Let me explain briefly why I wish to make the change and why it was recommended by the professor. In remote parts of Canada far away from urban centres it is difficult or impossible to get a committee of doctors or to reach an accredited hospital. So this bill would be discriminating, by procedure only and not by law, against people who live in these areas. For instance, Tisdale or Melfort is 160 miles from Saskatoon where there are enough doctors and accredited hospitals. This is an example only. So, as I said, by amending section 209 by taking out the words "in the act of birth", and by inserting the word "unlawfully" in section 237, we will be achieving the same thing as is achieved in the bill as presented by the minister. That is what was said by the professor from Toronto, and I submit he is correct. May I say, with the greatest respect, that the decision was arrived at with the aid of advisers, and this is a very technical point in the law.

As defence counsel I have pleaded many cases dealing with abortion. I think I understand the law and I understand what the professor is saying. My main argument in favour of this amendment is that if we delete clause 18 from the bill, as proposed in amendment No. 20, we must also make the proposed deletion in clause 15, as set out in amendment No. 13, because if either of them were left in the bill without the other the law would be bad.

I ask why the words "in the act of birth" were inserted in section 209. Under clause 18 of the bill, in the normal course of events a committee of doctors would have to be called and an accredited hospital used, but when a woman is on the delivery table it is too late to call a committee of doctors to make a decision to preserve her life or health. A doctor must make his decision immediately and perform the operation without consulting the committee. Under the law as it is proposed in the bill, the doctor would have to make his decision without the advice of a committee and without an accredited hospital to save the life and preserve the health of the mother; otherwise, as my good friend says, the mother may bleed to death. The doctor would have to make a decision at that moment and would not be able to call a committee.

Section 209 (2) reads as follows:

This section does not apply to a person who, by means that, in good faith, he considers necessary to preserve the life of the mother of a child, causes the death of such child.

Crankshaw's Criminal Code at page 333 says the following:

The words "preserving the life of the mother" are to be construed in a reasonable sense. They are not limited to the case of saving the mother from violent death; they include the case where continuance of the pregnancy would make her a physical or mental wreck.

In other words, it is illegal today to perform certain abortions under certain circumstances except, as stated in section 209, when a doctor decides in good faith to do this operation for two reasons: (a) to preserve the life of the mother or (b), to preserve her health so that she does not become a physical or mental wreck.

Taking out the words "in the act of birth" will permit a doctor to perform such an abortion under these circumstances regardless of whether or not the mother is in labour pains. If she comes to see the doctor in his office and, after he has examined her, he comes to the conclusion that she will either likely lose her life or that her health will be endangered, he can, in good faith, send her to a hospital and perform the operation. This is what my amendment seeks to achieve when I propose the addition of the word "unlawfully" in section 237. Clause 18 of the bill reads:

Section 237 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsections:—

[Mr. Woolliams.]

In my amendment I propose to repeal subsection (1), and to add the word "unlawfully" to section 237, so that it would not be unlawful for a doctor to perform an abortion in good faith to preserve the life and health of the mother, provided it is done in good faith, and the onus is on the Crown to prove that this is not so. The doctor does not have to wait for the act of birth.

I hope that this amendment will be accepted by the house because if it is not there would be serious consequences. I should like to quote from the Criminal Law Quarterly where the following is stated at page 385 by Professor Mewett:

Under s. 209 of the code (with the proposed amendment)—

Meaning the bill itself.

—causing the death of a child that has not become a human being in the act of birth is not illegal if the person causing the death considers it necessary in good faith to preserve the life of the mother. The Bourne principle clearly applies, allowing the medical practitioner to exercise his own judgment in the act of birth. If, however, the pregnancy is to be terminated prior to the act of birth, apparently totally different, incredibly complex and dubiously constitutional provisions apply.

Procuring a miscarriage (or, to be precise, using any means with that intent) will be lawful if a therapeutic abortion committee, by a majority, certifies that in its opinion the continuation of the pregnancy would be likely to endanger the mother's life or health. Apparently the miscarriage is lawful with or without the consent of the mother, though sub-s.(8) states "Nothing in subsection (4) shall be construed as making unnecessary the obtaining of any . . . consent that . . . may be required otherwise than under this Act . . ." I assume that that means, if it means anything at all, which I doubt, that the doctor is guilty of assault but not of procuring a miscarriage. This hardly scratches the surface of the abortion problem, and probably makes no difference to the present situation (apart from complicating it) in which most doctors will already perform therapeutic abortions, on the understanding that the Bourne principle applies not only to s.209 but also to s.237.

The Bourne principle stretches it not only to the preservation of life but to the preservation of the mother's health. With respect to the provision concerning abortion in the act of birth, he did not like the bill. He said: Take section 209, and take out the words "in the act of birth", which give the doctor the right to do what this bill prescribes, and put the word "unlawful" in section 237 to make sure a doctor cannot do it illegally. Then, he says, you arrive at the intention of the bill.

I agree I am speaking at some length on this subject but it is an extremely technical

one. This is a difficult point to get across because it is so involved. One has to study it as a lawyer, but the procedure is basically that of the bill itself. The amendment seeks to do away with the rigmarole of the committee and the hospital but the procedure is really identical. That is the way I have drafted it. I have changed two sections which must be read together but I am not changing the substance of the bill; I am merely changing the procedure for the protection of the public generally.

One advantage of my proposal is that the bill will no longer discriminate against Canadians who do not live in urban centres. The purpose is the same and the protection, basically, is the same. But the provision will be fairer in places where there are not enough doctors or enough committees or enough hospitals for the people who live in those areas. That is the only difference.

I say, with great respect to you, Mr. Speaker, and to your advisers, that this is not something one can understand in a few minutes or half an hour. The professor says that this amendment does not change the law but merely changes the procedure. Surely, then, the amendment to this clause as we have drawn it is acceptable. I submit it is correct in law. The sections concerned are both changed by the new bill. I am changing them a little differently. Now that I have explained it, I hope Your Honour will allow the amendment to stand. If it does not, and if the amendment to section 209 carries, the situation would be very bad indeed. It would be a travesty of justice. We should not have law like that in Canada.

If you disallow amendment 20, Mr. Speaker, you must then say that amendment 13 is out. I hope you will not make your ruling today. I want you to think well about this. If I were arguing this point before the Supreme Court of Canada I could not be more sincere. It is difficult to understand just how involved the procedure is. To quote the professor again, the amendment does not change the law as drafted in the bill. It does away with the necessity for the committee and the hospital and would prevent ruthless doctors waiting until a woman started to have labour pains and then killing a live infant or foetus. That, to me, would be murder in the hospitals. I do not believe the doctors of this nation would ever want to get into that position; I have great respect for the profession. But let us not leave the law in such a state that it could happen.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): With the greatest respect, I feel the hon. member went well beyond the procedural argument to introduce matters of substance also. We discussed Professor Mewett's opinion in the committee, and we introduced contrary legal opinion. I am of the view, given to me by the law officers of the Crown and by the profession generally, that there is not too much validity in Professor Mewett's argument.

In any event, what the hon. member has done is to suggest that because Your Honour has allowed amendment 13 dealing with section 209 you should allow his amendment 20 which, he says, fits in with it. If you look at the code you will see that sections 209 and 237, those to which the amendments relate, deal with entirely different factual circumstances. Section 237 deals with miscarriage or abortion, the killing of the foetus before the natural moment of birth. Section 209 relates to any killing at the time of birth. These are two different factual situations, two different offences under the code. For the hon. member to try to link the admissibility of amendment 20 to that of amendment 13 is an argument which does not hold water either procedurally or in substance.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their enlightening comments and I shall try to make a ruling which I hope will be acceptable to all.

So far as amendment 17 is concerned, no real case has been made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway or by the hon. member for York South. I believe they agree that this proposed amendment, identified as No. 17, does go beyond the scope of the bill.

I am afraid amendment No. 18 falls in the same category. I think I should say, in a general way, that this ruling is applicable also to the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North. I was most impressed by his argumentation. I think I might have been moved by it more if I were a member of the Supreme Court of Canada rather than Speaker of the House of Commons. He put forward a complex and able legal argument. My feeling, however, is that the Chair should not be placed in a position where the Speaker has to rule on legal points. The tradition and background of the position of the Chair is that the Speaker should rule only on procedural matters. This has been established on many occasions when arguments are made in the house by learned counsel who happen to have gone astray and have become Members of Parliament. They present to the Chair constitutional arguments—whether legislative proposals, for example, should be accepted or put to the house, on the grounds that they may not be constitutional or legally acceptable. In our parliament, the Chair has always taken the position that it cannot make ruling on such a basis—that this has to be done by the lawyers and the courts, and that the Chair should not take on its shoulders responsibility for ruling on legal arguments. This is why much of the argument put forth by the hon. member for Calgary North and by the Minister of Justice goes beyond the scope of my responsibility in looking at this amendment.

Amendment No. 18, in my view, attempts to introduce a new legislative proposal by way of an amendment. It clearly goes beyond what we have before us. The legislation introduced by the government is limited in scope; it is not the whole of the Criminal Code that is before the house, only certain sections and subsections of the code, and clearly an amendment proposed at this time cannot go beyond the bill which is before us. We cannot reach behind this bill to amend in some way the basic legislation, in this case, the Criminal Code.

If we look at section 237, with its three subsections, we find that they are not, as I understand it, before the house at the present time except in a very indirect way and I cannot see how, by an amendment, the hon. member can attempt to alter or amend them. This is why with much regret I have to reach that decision in connection with Nos. 17 and 18.

The hon. member for Calgary North has made it very difficult for the Chair to confirm the opinions expressed when I first brought my doubts as to amendment 20 to the attention of the house. I can assure the hon. member for Calgary North that I have been giving the most serious consideration to all these amendments for many days now. I have spent many hours looking at them from a procedural standpoint. It is not easy for the Chair to refuse an amendment such as this which of course is based on the most laudable motives. It is obvious the hon. member for Calgary North is attempting to achieve a highly laudable purpose by this amendment. However, it seems from a procedural standpoint this cannot be done by way of the suggested amendment.

Whether because this amendment is not accepted No. 13 falls I cannot say, because this is not a procedural point. All the Chair can do is look at amendment 13 as it stands by itself and say that from a procedural standpoint this amendment seems to be in order, that it has to go before the house unless the hon. member wants to withdraw the amendment or amend it in some other way. I would not think that because another amendment would be affected from a substantive point of view the Chair could refuse to apply the procedural rules which in this case apply to amendment 20 in the same way as they apply to amendments 17, 18 and 32.

The last one, of course, is amendment 32. I have the impression, if I remember the arguments which have been advanced by hon. members, that not much has been said about this one.

[Translation]

It would seem that the proposed amendment goes beyond the scope of the bill now before the house, and that it attempts to repeal subsection (3)(a) of section 237 of the Criminal Code.

By attempting to repeal part of that section of the Criminal Code, the amendment constitutes, in fact, a new legislative proposal and, on that basis, has nothing to do with Bill C-150.

Hon. members will recognize that this argument also applies to amendments Nos. 17, 18 and 20. For that reason, I feel that I cannot accept the proposed amendment.

[English]

I apologize to hon. members if I appear to be a little harsh in making these rulings. I wish all these amendments could have been accepted and put to the house. It would have been much easier for the Chair to rule in this way. At the same time I believe it is my responsibility to look at these amendments as closely as I can, consistent with my responsibility to the house, and to make a ruling in accordance with my conscience. Therefore I have to make the ruling that these particular amendments cannot be accepted.

We go on to the following point which is a consideration of amendment No. 19. My suggestion was that it be deferred until amendment No. 37 has been disposed of. I trust there will be no objection to this on the part of hon. members.

My subsequent proposal to hon. members was that amendments 21, 22, 23, 31, 39, 40 and 41 were in effect the same question and the proposal was that No. 21 be selected for discussion in accordance with section 10 of Standing Order 75, without suggesting in any way that the other amendments are not in order. They are all in order. For the purpose of an orderly discussion, this one would be selected and the disposition by the house of amendment No. 21 would apply to the other amendments to which I have just referred. Is this agreed?

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have listened to Your Honour's decision, which I know has been made very conscientiously, and I certainly accept it. I just wish to make this one point. I think it is necessary for me, according to my conscience, to withdraw amendment 13. In amendment 13 I am deleting words. In amendment 20 I am merely adding the word "unlawful".

I abide graciously by Your Honour's decision. If Your Honour rules amendment 20 out of order, according to my conscience I could not let amendment 13 remain before the house. If I did so, a doctor would not be able to bring about a miscarriage in order to preserve the life and health of a woman who was in the delivery room. Those two sections must be read together. If amendment 13 were to carry, it would place the doctor in a horrible position. At that stage a doctor cannot call on a committee. Inasmuch as Your Honour has ruled amendment 20 out of order I ask that I be permitted to withdraw amendment 13. If one falls they must both fall, or we would have the kind of law no one could accept.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether we might dispose of the point raised by the hon. member for Calgary North. His point is well taken. He knows what the intention is behind amendment 13 better than any other member. If it is his wish in the circumstances to withdraw his amendment, I am sure the house would agree to this. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Winch: A point of order, Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair for the adjournment. Many of us are being asked a question which we cannot answer, and I can only ask Your Honour about it on a point of order. Would Your Honour be kind enough to explain what the situation will be this afternoon? Does the house adjourn automatically at five o'clock, or what happens?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On the point raised by the hon. member, the house does not adjourn automatically at five o'clock. The debate continues automatically at five o'clock. I wonder whether the house would not be disposed to try to settle all these procedural questions because otherwise we would have to continue them at two o'clock. I wonder how long it would delay the debate which it has been agreed will commence at two o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: I think we have got over the most difficult hurdles, amendments 17, 18, 20 and 32 which were the subject of long debate. I think the others might be disposed of quickly.

Mr. Baldwin: In that regard, Mr. Speaker, has the request by the hon. member for Calgary North to secure unanimous approval been accepted?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, that has been accepted. It has been so ordered.

Mr. Baldwin: I felt he need have no fear because of the attitude of the government. He need have no fear the amendment would ever be carried in any event. A question arises, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the amendments that Your Honour in my opinion properly combined. Can we then take it for the purpose of the discussion and the debate which will take place commencing Monday—I would hope in an orderly way—that with regard to the first group Your Honour combined commencing with No. 21 speakers should have every right to direct their attention to and participate in the debate on No. 21, and when the house has come to a decision on that amendment we would then be governed by Your Honour's decision, which I assume is made pursuant to Standing Order 75, and there would be no further debate on the subsequent combined clauses?

Unfortunately a number of members are unable to be here this morning to listen to these arguments. Their other duties may prohibit them from hearing the decision made today. So that there may be an orderly disposition, I ask Your Honour for direction on that point. Also, would it be possible to put in Routine Proceedings the numbers of the amendments which will be dealt with so that we will have this information before us when we start on Monday?

Mr. Speaker: On the last point referred to by the hon. member, this was considered and we propose to put out a separate notice paper which hon. members should have ready on their desks for reference. It will indicate exactly what has happened to the amendments. So it will be much easier at the beginning of next week for hon. members to know which amendments have been accepted, which amendments will be discussed and what will be the disposition of them from a procedural standpoint. I wish to confirm the statement of the hon. member for Peace River that amendments Nos. 21, 22, 23, 31, 39, 40 and 41, in accordance with section 10 of Standing Order 75, are marshalled and combined, so that a vote on the first one will dispose of all those other amendments. We could now go to No. 26.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with the amendments you have just mentioned. They all deal with the obligations of hospitals as institutions and with the obligations of medical practitioners, staff and other personnel who may be involved with abortions. No individual amendment deals with all three categories. I wish to refer particularly to the amendment that you are proposing to place before the house for discussion, which deals with the question of hospitals as institutions, and with the situation of medical practitioners. It seems to me that there is no objection to proceeding with that amendment as a basis for debate so long as an amendment may be moved that would deal with the position of hospital staff and other personnel.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, this will have to be considered when the hon. member suggests these changes to the house. It may be possible to move subamendments provided that they are in order.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have only one question to put, to clarify something. I should like to know how we will go about the votes next week, should there be any?

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Speaker: We will come back to that in a moment.

I studied that difficulty, and as soon as we have decided, in the light of the procedure, whether the proposed amendments are in order or not, I shall suggest how they could be put to the vote.

[English]

I now refer to amendments Nos. 26 and 36, which are identical. May I suggest that the question be put on amendment No. 26. The disposition of amendment No. 26 would also apply to amendment No. 36.

[Translation]

With regard to amendment No. 28, the house accepted the change in wording a moment ago; it poses no problem and it can be dealt with normally by the house in due course.

[English]

It is suggested that consideration of amendment No. 38 should precede consideration of amendment No. 37, as previously suggested, and that consideration of amendment No. 19 should follow consideration of amendment No. 37.

[Translation]

A moment ago, the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) brought up the matter of the votes.

[English]

This matter has been studied and I should like to suggest to the house the following. Since amendments No. 21, 22, 23, 31, 39, 40 and 41 are essentially similar, and since amendment No. 21 has been selected for discussion, it is suggested that the division on those amendments should take place after consideration of proposed amendment No. 21.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Also, there would be a division on amendment No. 15. So we would have two divisions at that point, the division on amendment No. 21, which would cover the amendments I have referred to, and the division on amendment No. 15.

The second divisions would take place in connection with amendments No. 24, 26, 27, and 28. These all relate to the same parts of clause 18. It is suggested that the divisions on these amendments should take place after consideration of amendment No. 28. This would give us four divisions. There would be four divisions on amendments No. 24, 26, 27 and 28, which would take place at the same time.

Third, as amendments Nos. 29 and 30 are similar it is suggested that divisions take place on those amendments after consideration of amendment No. 30. At this point the Clerk Assistant would be called upon to serve for two divisions.

Lastly, with regard to amendments Nos. 33, 34, 35, 38, 37 and 19, which also relate to Clause 18 of Bill C-150, perhaps the division on those amendments might take place after the consideration of amendment No. 19. In this instance there would be six divisions.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed? I should be pleased to hear the views of hon. members on these proposals.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, you referred to six divisions. Do you mean that the bells will be rung on six separate occasions?

Mr. Speaker: I am suggesting that there will be one voting exercise. There will be, of course, six different votes. The bells may be rung six times or once only, depending on the desire of the house at that moment. But there would be, of course, six individual divisions, marshalled together and held at the same time. Hon. members will have a fair idea, through their party advisers, when these divisions will be held. But these six different amendments relating to Clause 18 of Bill C-150 would be disposed of at the same time.

Is it agreed that consideration of the report stage of Bill C-150 be adjourned?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That takes us up to amendment No. 41 inclusive, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that these matters all cover the subject of abortion. If and when we dispose of this subject we may go to other subjects and to other amendments to the omnibus bill.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

HOUSING

RESIGNATION OF MINISTER AND FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO PROVIDE ADEQUATE ACCOMMODATION—MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Pursuant to Standing Order 26 the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, seconded by the hon. member for York South, moves that the house do now adjourn.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the announcement yesterday by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) that he is resigning from the cabinet brings to a head the worsening situation with respect to housing in this country. Ever since the end of world war II the steady movement of population to the urban centres has aggravated the housing situation to the point where massive government action is imperative.

Successive governments have followed policies of stalling and procrastination with the result that the situation has grown increasingly desperate. In 1966 the Hon. J. R, Nicholson, then Minister of Labour, was given the task of dealing with housing and staged a series of housing conferences across the country, culminating in a national housing conference in Ottawa a year ago last January. All the data that was collected, all the work that was done, resulted in no announcement of any government policy. Instead, last summer the government appointed another group, a task force on housing headed by the Minister of Transport, to review the matter again.

In recent months that task force tabled a report. We in this party criticized that report. We felt that it failed to come to grips with the realities of the situation. But there were some significant recommendations in it, and the Minister of Transport is not to be blamed when he feels humiliated that his colleagues immediately proceeded to veto the only recommendation that really had a great deal of merit. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) immediately made it clear that the government had no intention of removing the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials.

Housing

Last week the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made it clear that he had no intention of setting up a separate ministry of housing and urban affairs. If reports can be believed, the proposal for financial assistance to municipalities to enable them to establish land banks has also been turned down by the cabinet. Certainly we will know better when the legislation is brought down whether or not this recommendation is going to be accepted.

All of this has brought us to the place where the minister responsible for housing has submitted his resignation to the Prime Minister, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this resignation deals with something much more fundamental than housing. It deals with the whole question of the lack of government initiative in dealing with the most pressing national problems confronting the country.

I read from the report in yesterday's Ottawa Journal containing statements made by the Minister of Transport at his press conference yesterday morning:

> The country, he related, "expected me to do something about these things, housing, urban affairs, pollution. But in the Prime Minister's conception of federalism, these are provincial responsibilities. The Prime Minister's constitutional theories sound fine in the classroom—the trouble is they just won't work.
> People expect the federal government to provide full employment—without this insidious inflation—to take action on clean air and clean water. These are the bread and butter issues. But these are the issues the Prime Minister says must be left to the provinces while he sorts out the constitutional priorities."

May I also refer to the minister's letter of resignation dated April 24 in which he says in part:

> Having spent much of my adult life in the parliament and government of our country, I need hardly tell you how difficult a decision this has been for me. As we have discussed, however, I find myself increasingly disturbed with the directions and policies being followed by the government. I feel there is a lack of initiative in using federal powers to deal with issues such as housing, pollution, inflation and urban development which are so vital to the needs of ordinary people in our modern, industrialized society.
> Given these circumstances and after the most thoughtful consideration on my part, I feel I have no alternative but to resign from the cabinet.

I submit that the Minister of Transport has put his finger on the basic reason for the government's lack of initiative, namely, the fact that the Prime Minister's conception of our federal system, as the Minister of Transport said yesterday, is to have ten strong provincial governments headed by a weak federal government.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Last year in the course of the federal election the Prime Minister fooled a lot of people by talking of one Canada and national unity. What he failed to tell them was that his concept of national unity consisted of a 19th century interpretation of the constitution of Canada. He held that the only important change required in the British North America Act was to guarantee language rights, and that a reallocation of federal and provincial responsibilities was relatively unimportant and unnecessary. Mr. Speaker, we reject that viewpoint. We believe the constitution is not sacrosanct. We believe the constitution was made for man, not man for the constitution. After all, what is a constitution? A constitution is the legal framework within which a nation lives, moves and has its being. It is not the law of Moses handed down from Mount Sinai. A constitution must be a living organism that grows to meet expanding social needs and adjusts to meet changing conditions and changing circumstances.

I contend that the Prime Minister's concept of the constitution will bring about in this country stagnation, regional discord and national disunity. I submit it is unworkable for three reasons. First of all, it fails to recognize that the provinces and municipalities do not have the sources of revenue necessary to discharge the responsibilities assigned them under the British North America Act. Education, health, welfare and resource development were relatively unimportant areas in 1867, but in 1969 they are beyond the capacity of the provincial and municipal governments under their present taxing powers.

Second, I would point out that the present division of powers can only result in wider regional disparities. Affluent provinces will be able to enjoy fairly reasonable standards of services while the people of the poorer provinces, even when taxed to the hilt, will be required to content themselves with a lower standard of living.

Liberal governments in the past have paid lip service to the basic premise of the Rowell-Sirois report which said that all Canadians, irrespective of where they live, should be able to enjoy minimum standards of education, health and welfare. It is the failure to deal with this problem which is the real threat to national unity. Nothing will do more to tear this country apart than to have some parts of Canada feel, as they do now, that they are the Cinderellas of Confederation, that they are ignored and overlooked.

Third, I would point out that the status quo concept of the constitution fails to take cognizance of the fact that new problems have arisen which were never envisaged by the framers of the British North America Act. Urban renewal, housing, urban transportation, pollution, manpower training, higher education and the need to cope with inflation cannot be resolved on the basis of the 1867 division of powers and responsibilities as between the three levels of government.

Mr. Baldwin: Don't forget the present Prime Minister.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): It is not good enough for the Prime Minister to hide behind the constitution and say that these problems are the responsibility of the provincial authorities. The federal government alone has access to all the taxing fields. The federal government alone has control of the monetary and fiscal policies of the country. The federal government alone can redress the imbalance which exists between the various regions of Canada.

The Prime Minister is seeking to put Canada into a constitutional strait-jacket. He poses as the man of the future. He speaks eloquently of breaking with the past and meeting the challenge of the future. Meanwhile he is tying around the necks of the Canadian people the albatross of an outmoded concept of Canada's constitution. I suggest that the Prime Minister's rigidity in his conception of the constitution can do irreparable damage to this country, and the resignation of the Minister of Transport yesterday indicates that at least one of his colleagues has become aware of that fact.

We in this party believe the constitution must be used to serve the needs of the Canadian people in a modern technological age. There is much that can be done by the federal government, even under the constitution as it now stands, if the government is prepared to provide imaginative leadership. The federal government can make grants and loans available to the provinces and through them to the municipalities either on a conditional or unconditional basis. Instead, the present government has been withdrawing from cost-sharing arrangements and has been leaving the provinces to their own resources. Tax abatements help the wealthier provinces but have little value for those provinces with a negligible tax base. The federal government could establish joint federal-provincial programs to deal with housing, pollution and urban renewal. It can supply the necessary funds and expertise while leaving to the provinces the on the spot administration and supervision.

We believe that in the long run the federal government should press for a constitutional formula which will provide for a delegation of legislative powers to enable the provinces to delegate whatever authority is necessary to the government of Canada to meet some of our most pressing problems. It could also include a formula to provide for concurrent powers as has been done in many other federal systems.

During the election campaign last year the New Democratic party advocated such an approach. We recognized, however, that the province of Quebec in its desire to safeguard its language and culture might be reluctant to agree to certain transfers of authority. Therefore we took the position that those provinces which did not wish to delegate certain powers should not be permitted to prevent the federal government and the other provinces from dealing effectively with some of these more pressing problems.

It was for this reason we suggested that Quebec be allowed particular status as was done in the case of the Canada Pension Plan where nine provinces and the government of Canada proceeded with a very desirable piece of social legislation and arranged for Quebec to have a plan which would be portable and reciprocal. Has this hurt Confederation? Not at all. It has certainly demonstrated that flexibility within a living constitution can meet the needs of the people. That, primarily, is what a constitution is for. If Quebec desires to do so there is no reason that she could not operate her own programs in some of these fields and receive an equivalent financial contribution from Ottawa.

The Prime Minister has accused us of favouring two Canadas. I want to point out that we are seeking to establish one Canada with a constitution sufficiently flexible to enable this country to cope effectively with problems whose solutions we dare not longer neglect. I want to say to the Prime Minister that yesterday's resignation is the first sign of growing disenchantment and disillusionment with his interpretation of Canada's constitution. I want to say that the public will no longer condone weaseling and waffling and that the public knows there are problems facing this country which must be dealt with effectively. The public will not be satisfied with being told that the government is hiding behind the constitution.

Just the other day the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Muncipalities presented a brief to the Prime Minister and his government. In point No. 7 they said this, and I think it is significant:

> Federal authorities can, of course, shrug their shoulders, point to Head 92 (Section 8) of the B.N.A. Act and remind the federation that municipal institutions are the creatures of provincial governments . . . (a more accurate term is that recently used by a distinguished Canadian urban planner, who described municipalities as the "orphans" of provincial governments) . . . but this kind of constitutional argument is not meaningful: in the first place, the problems of the municipalities are provincial problems, and vice-versa; secondly, with over 50 per cent of Canada's population accounted for by 18 urban areas, the federal government cannot take the view that the spectrum of urban frustration suffered by these Canadians has no constitutional relevance to federal jurisdictions.

Unless the government is prepared to recognize that such problems of housing, urban renewal, pollution, manpower training and inflation are being placed at its doorstep by the people of Canada, until it recognizes that the people of Canada will not allow it to take refuge in constitutional interpretation, I believe that this country will continue to wallow in what the Minister of Transport referred to as a lack of initiative.

The Prime Minister has had his first warning. This resignation is symptomatic of a malaise in our society, of a discontent with the government's failure to take the initiative and the government's failure to act. If the government continues to neglect these responsibilities which it quite properly has, then I submit there will be a growing disparity between different areas and that there will be growing disunity in Canada.

The Prime Minister has a great opportunity, if he avails himself of this warning and if he grasps the nettle and tackles these problems, using the constitution as it is, and asks for the co-operation of the provinces for a delegation of power and provision for concurrent jurisdiction to deal with any problems which cannot be dealt with under present jurisdiction. If he accepts this opportunity he will have the support of the people of Canada and he will have taken a first step on the road to enable Canada to reach that great destiny of which it is capable.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the proposition we are now considering asks for the adjournment of the house——and solving the housing crisis now prevailing in Canada.

> —for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration—

I was hoping that the mover of this motion would take the floor about the housing crisis, Mr. Speaker. He did not say a word about it, except in very general terms, right at the start, that is—

[English]

"the worsening of the housing situation in this country,"

[Translation]

But no statistics or figures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: The leader of the New Democratic party has taken advantage of this to talk about the constitution while we believed we were here to discuss housing.

We are listening to comments on the constitution. Indeed, I shall be glad to talk about it myself, if I am allowed the time to do so. I would just like to tell the leader of the New Democratic party that he does not fare any better in constitutional matters than in housing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: We are very glad to take part in this debate. I mainly want to put statistics before the house and the country to stop all that talk about the housing crisis and its seriousness, in the light of the other priorities.

[English]

An hon. Member: Do you expect anybody to believe that?

Mr. Trudeau: I certainly cannot believe that and I could not deduce that from what the leader of the N.D.P. said, because there was not one word which indicated what was the crisis in housing. His whole speech was about the constitution of Canada. I welcome such a debate and we will have one whenever the ministers on this side and the leaders of the opposition agree on a date. We have had one constitutional debate and we could have others.

We thought we were going to hear about housing today. I know why the leader of the N.D.P. did not talk about that. He could not substantiate his assertions that there is a housing crisis.

Let me begin with a brief quotation from the first paragraph of the report of the federal task force in housing and urban development which was tabled in this house on January 29, 1969. That paragraph in part states: "Canadians can rightfully claim to be among the best housed people in the world." This does not mean we think there should not be improvement. This does not mean we are not improving the situation. This does mean that it would be a mistake to say, as the leader of the N.D.P. said, that housing is the most pressing national problem facing this country. Let me ask members of the opposition whether, if they were to establish a list of priorities of an urgent nature in this country, they could honestly say that housing was the top priority? Does it come ahead of education, ahead of financial progress and development and ahead of equalization of opportunity for all Canadians? Does it come ahead of correcting regional disparity? Apparently it does.

Housing is a crisis area. Let us consider some of the facts as they are known to the country but apparently not known to members of the N.D.P. The Economic Council of Canada made some projections on housing units required in Canada. This is what the council said. It is clear that at the current rate of construction, with 197,000 units having been started in 1968 and 210,000 forecast for this year, the council's target will be met for the 1965-70 period.

The Financial Post of tomorrow's date has a lead article on the first page headed "Housing Off To A Strong Start". The article begins as follows:

Houses are being built at a frantic pace in Canada this spring despite a tight, expensive mortgage market.

If the growth of the first three months is kept up, it will take the housebuilding industry to the limit of its capacity in 1969.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau:

Housing starts for the first three months are up 47 per cent from the same period, in 1968.

This situation did not come about of its own accord. In 1966 and 1967 there was a shortfall in housing in this country. In order to improve the situation, this government last year and this year has done many things which have produced this greatly improving trend. In order to improve the flow of mortgage funds and to stimulate home-building in Canada, a number of legislative and policy actions were taken by the government in the housing field in the past two years. Among such steps I mention the automatic adjustment, after September, 1967, of the National Housing Act rate relative to the general interest structure, the Bank Act changes in 1967 which resulted in the re-entry of the banks into mortgage lending on a substantial scale, the increasing of the ratio for home ownership loans on new housing in March, 1968, and the raising of the maximum loan for apartment units for $12,000 to $18,000 in the previous month. In addition, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was authorized last October to reallocate to direct home ownership loans $170 million and to make 6,000 loans to merchant builders.

A direct consequence of these government measures was a large expansion in the mortgage funds provided by the institutional lenders. This expansion may be somewhat surprising in that it occurred against a background of steadily rising interest rates throughout most of the year, due in part to world-wide financial and monetary problems, in part to a resurgence of inflationary expectations which necessitated greater restraint on the part of the monetary authorities, and also because of strong competing demands for capital market funds. Despite such adverse conditions, the private institutional lenders increased their mortgage approvals by 27.2 per cent, from $2.1 billion in 1967 to $2.7 billion last year. In this total, the increased concentration on National Housing Act lending by the financial institutions showed the effectiveness of the new formula in stimulating National Housing Act lending; for all the approved lenders the increase was from $356 million, or 16.8 per cent of total lending in 1967, to $832 million or 30.8 per cent of total lending in 1968.

Government policies have increased the flow of mortgage money and this has meant a very substantial improvement in residential construction. Thus house-building reached a new peak in 1968, when nearly 197,000 dwellings were started, an increase of 20 per cent over the 164,000 starts in 1967. Housing starts exceeded completions, and the inventory of 127,000 dwellings under construction at the year end was 24,000 higher than at the end of 1967. Residential construction last year represented an investment of $2.8 billion, 18 per cent more than in 1967. In addition, National Housing Act loans were provided to finance construction of some 14,000 new hostel beds for elderly persons and students, compared with 6,000 beds two years earlier. While all types of dwellings contributed to the increase in starts in 1968, apartments and row houses, with a 36.5 per cent growth, accounted for most of last year's performance.

All regions and most metropolitan areas shared in the residential construction boom in 1968, the Atlantic provinces together showing the largest relative gain of 31.7 per cent. This was followed by the prairies, with an increase of 27.1 per cent, while Quebec had an increase of 23.2 per cent. A somewhat smaller but still significant increase occurred in Ontario where a year to year gain of 18 per cent was recorded. This year the exceptional performance in housing has continued and new starts in urban areas increased at a record annual rate of 227,000 units in the first quarter of 1969, up from the previous high of 196,000 units in the fourth quarter of 1968.

For all areas these rates imply that the good results of 1968 will be substantially exceeded this year, and it is evident that 1969 will again be a record year for residential construction in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: Except for the people who need houses.

Mr. Trudeau: On the question of long-run national requirements, the report of the task force on housing and urban development suggested the need for a housing program of one million new housing units over the next five years, or 200,000 units a year. It is clear on the basis of performance to date that the current rate of construction is well ahead of meeting this target. With the implementation of many of the key proposals of the task force, an even greater part of our resources will undoubtedly be channelled into providing shelter for Canadians in all parts of the country.

It is important that a substantial proportion of those resources be invested in housing for low income families. The government is actively concerned in stimulating this kind of construction. Although different people can reasonably come to different conclusions about how much should be done and how long it should take to do it, it is nevertheless quite evident that the priority given by the federal government to its housing policy is now, as in the past, showing good results. So much for the present facts about housing in Canada. It is these facts which I ask the opposition and the country to test against their expressions of crisis.

An hon. Member: Why have a task force?

Mr. Nesbitt: Then why did Paul Hellyer resign?

Mr. Trudeau: Presumably, according to the leader of the New Democratic party, because of the constitution, not because of the housing crisis.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Let me talk a little about the current policies of the government, because the implication of the motion before the house is that the government is not dealing expeditiously with new housing proposals.

An hon. Member: Why don't you read your letters?

Mr. Trudeau: The present housing record, as I have indicated, is a good one, but it is good because of policy decisions the government has taken in the past. We are equally determined to press ahead as rapidly as possible with new policy decisions to ensure that the future housing record is even better. Hon. members will recognize that it is not appropriate for me to speak in any detail of the process of cabinet consideration of housing policies—

An hon. Member: Or possible.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, you will see them. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recognize that it is not appropriate for me to speak in any detail of the process of cabinet consideration of housing policies, but in broad terms the issues which must be examined in the light of the report of the task force can easily be deduced. Hon. members will see if there have been any decisions.

Extensive consideration has been given to these issues since the receipt of the task force report. Federal housing policy inevitably touches upon many areas of government policy. It involves financial policy because of the level of interest rates and the provision of mortgage money, and because housing is one of the federal government's largest spending programs and is consequently one of its highest priorities. It includes social policy because federal money helps to finance public housing for the poor, and for the clearing of slums. It involves research policy because federal money and expertise are being used to study the problems of urban development and low-cost housing.

Because the task force proposed many innovations, its report had to be examined thoroughly and thoughtfully by many ministers, who needed to know the implications of these initiatives for their own areas of responsibility. For example, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) had to know how much these measures would cost. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) had to consider how the proposals on public housing would affect his welfare programs. I am describing, of course, the normal procedures of cabinet government: a minister puts his proposals to his colleagues and hears their views and comments. This is the only way to achieve sound and comprehensive policies which take into account differing points of view, regional considerations and the implications of particular proposals for other government policies and initiatives. It does take time, but I think it is time well spent.

Since receiving the task force report we have covered a lot of ground. The examination of the substance of the proposed amendments to the National Housing Act was virtually completed by the beginning of this month and since then the actual drafting of the amendments has been completed by the Department of Justice. The government will introduce these amendments into the house in the very near future. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I believe that these amendments will be ready for placing on the order paper at the beginning of next week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: The amendments which will be offered at that time will, of course, deal with those matters which are essentially under federal jurisdiction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Among the amendments will be:

Provisions to increase the flow of mortgage funds from private lenders;

Provisions to permit loan value ratios and limits to be established from time to time by the Governor in Council;

Provisions to extend the maximum amortization from 35 to 40 years;

Provisions to extend to existing housing generally the same terms as apply to new construction, except that the maximum loan on existing housing would be $18,000;

Provisions to amend the national housing loan regulations to establish the maximum loans for home ownership or rental at $25,000 and, for loans on existing housing at $18,000;

Provisions to approve a form of mortgage with a five year roll-over, but with monthly payments calculated on an amortization of at least 25 years;

Provisions to reduce the rate of mortgage insurance fees by 50 per cent.

There will also be measures to increase the activity of limited dividend housing companies and non-profit housing companies in meeting the needs of low income families and elderly citizens. It is proposed to amend the present provisions of the act, (a) to increase the loan levels on projects constructed by such organizations from the present 90 per cent of value to 95 per cent of value and, (b), to permit limited dividend companies to construct projects in hostel or dormitory form as well as the self-contained accommodation to which the present provisions of the act restrict them.

Legislation on other important housing questions requires further consultation with the provinces. This introduces another aspect of housing policy which is every bit as important as the details of the amendments to the National Housing Act, that is, the way in which the federal government deals with the provinces and municipalities in housing matters. Housing policy is a subject which does not divide neatly into three compartments corresponding to the various levels of government. Progressive, imaginative and sound housing policy and urban development require the co-operation and energetic enthusiasm of all three levels of government. It is absolutely essential that the federal government, before it launches into programs which could have important implications for matters within provincial jurisdiction, should consider these implications and consult closely with the provinces.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I am sorry to interrupt the Prime Minister, but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I request that the Prime Minister carry on? There is plenty of time for everyone and we would be glad to have the Prime Minister speak as long as he wishes.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Trudeau: I thank hon. members for the permission they have given me to carry on. I will stop at any point you say, Mr. Speaker. I think I may need another five minutes to get to the end of the facts and figures which I wish to give to the house.

As hon. members will have appreciated, the task force report contained a number of recommendations, at least 16, which have a bearing on the responsibilities of the provinces or municipalities. Some of these recommendations were entirely outside the responsibilities of the federal government, but certain others affected the responsibilities of both the federal and provincial governments. It is this latter category which has had to be considered in working out a new federal policy.

There is the very important and basic question, for example, of whether the federal government should lend money for housing, for land banking or other purposes directly to the municipalities, or whether this should be done through the provincial governments. Because municipalities are within provincial jurisdiction, many provincial governments feel strongly that their priorities might be upset if the federal government dealt directly with the municipalities. Let me say for the record that this does not only apply to only one province. A high proportion of the provinces made such objections. I do not know whether the constitutional theories of the New Democratic party would give this kind of special status to only half the provinces and not to the others. It may be that that party is not prepared to grant special status to those provinces which never have had and will never elect a member of the New Democratic party, but this may be true of an increasing number of provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: How about electing people who voted for the New Democratic party once?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: If, on the other hand, money is lent to provincial governments, is it not desirable and necessary to ensure that reasonable conditions are established for the use of that money, and that the ultimate beneficiary has some idea of the source of the money? And can these reasonable conditions be established without reasonable consultation?

On these and other related matters the government has already held important discussions with the provinces. Further discussions will be needed on other aspects of housing policy which affect substantially the priorities and objectives of provincial and municipal governments. We must do all we can to work together at all levels of government to achieve the basic goal which is and must be the provision of reasonable housing for every Canadian.

I have described the way in which we are dealing with a practical problem in a field where responsibility is shared among the different levels of government and which therefore requires close and continuing co-operation among them. This is our approach to federalism.

There is, I know, another point of view concerning Canadian federalism which is genuinely and sincerely felt by some Canadians. It goes something like this. There are times when problems which are largely within provincial jurisdiction, such as housing and urban development, become so serious and so widespread that they seem to be, or do indeed become, national problems. This may be because of neglect on the part of the provinces of their responsibilities, it may be because technological change has made something which once was local in character a truly nation-wide question, or it may be that something which is and ought to be within provincial jurisdiction can only be solved by joint federal-provincial action. Whatever the cause, this view of federalism runs, once a problem has become nation-wide in scope, once it has become a national problem, parliament ought to be able to act, to legislate, to spend, to lend, to start shared-cost programs, regardless of what the constitution says about provincial jurisdiction and regardless of the reaction of provincial governments. Why? Because parliament is the only body which represents the nation as a whole and is therefore the only body which can deal with problems on a national basis.

I can understand this point of view, although I do not share it I can understand it, and I can sympathize with the desire of the people who share it to get on with the problems as they see them without regard to the constitution. But what this really amounts to is the view that parliament ought to be able to transfer matters from provincial jurisdiction into federal jurisdiction whenever parliament, in its judgment, decides that a problem within provincial jurisdiction has become national in scope. And it means that parliament ought to be able to make this transfer of jurisdiction on its own initiative and by its single-handed action. If one wanted to be harsh one would say that this view amounts to saying that parliament ought to be able to amend the constitution unilaterally, without reference to the provinces whose jurisdiction is being changed.

The trouble with this view is that it is not really federalism. In many ways it is much more consistent with the operation of a unitary state. And a unitary state simply will not work in Canada. Theoretically—and I suggest that this is the view which is theoretical, not mine—a unitary state enables a country to deal with problems more quickly, more directly, more simply, as they arise. But if it means breaking up the country, what kind of efficiency is that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Surely we have learned that society and government must play the game according to the rules of the game. If we do not, then everyone will make up his own rules as he goes along. Some of them may be better rules, but if we have two sets of rules, or eleven sets of rules, we will have first suspicion, then friction, then disruption of the social order, and finally anarchy.

An hon. Member: Revolution.

Mr. Trudeau: You are always afraid of revolution. We hear a lot of talk from the other side—

An hon. Member: You alarm me.

Mr. Trudeau: I can see that you play by many sets of rules.

Federalism has its advantages but it also has its costs, as does everything in life. The cost to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is having such members as that in his party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bigg: We were looking for you in 1942.

Mr. Trudeau: Federalism gives us a country, it gives us a rich and diverse society, it gives us a degree of freedom which is to be found in pluralistic communities. But it does mean two orders of government; it means working together in solving some problems, and sometimes it means we have to change the constitution to keep it up to date and give to the federal government and to the provincial governments the new roles which are called for in this society.

I am afraid I shall not have time to go into the details of this debate, some of which were mentioned by the leader of the New Democratic party. All I can say is that the constitutional conferences which began in February of last year are going on as rapidly as the provincial governments and the federal government can make them go on. If the leader of the New Democratic party accuses me of hiding behind the constitution, let me remind him and this house that his was the party which for some years goaded the government side into dealing quickly and urgently with the constitution. At that time he felt this was the most urgent problem. Today it may be some other crisis. They go from crisis to crisis over there.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: I need only a few more minutes in which to finish, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to abuse the indulgence of the house.

This view of federalism does not imply a lack of federal leadership. Federalism means strong provincial governments and a strong federal government each in their respective fields.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: It does not mean a federal government which asks the permission of provincial premiers every time it wants to act, nor which capitulates in the face of provincial demands, whether fiscal or otherwise. It means broad enough constitutional jurisdiction for parliament to enable the government of Canada to act in the interests of the country. On the other hand, this view of federalism does not mean subordinating provincial governments to the will of the government of Canada, whenever, or even if, it would seem to be more efficient to do so. Nor does this view of federalism mean some fuzzy two-nation theory under which two unitary states Canada and Quebec, would somehow heal the wounds of separation and reconcile both old and new-found differences in an effort to create the appearance of a single association.

The demands of leadership in Canada are made more difficult because we live in a federal state. Leadership is required both in solving the nation's current problems and in making sure that the constitution and the machinery of federal-provincial relations are in good working order. Unless we pursue both objectives we shall not be able to deal with housing, pollution and so many other matters which affect the daily lives of all Canadians.

Every federal government and every federal prime minister in Canada's history has been called upon to provide that kind of leadership. That is the kind of leadership which this government intends to give the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, despite the good will, even the sympathy, that I feel, I have to say that it is becoming almost impossible to take the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of this country seriously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: He rises in this house on an occasion such as this and pretends there is a need on the part of the opposition parties to document the existence of the housing crisis although the occasion of this debate is the resignation of the minister in charge of housing, the deputy prime minister of the country, the man in the best position to know the extent of the crisis and the weakness of the government's proposals to deal with it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Do members opposite expect us to regard the deputy prime minister of the country as a man of so little intelligence as we are led to believe by virtue of the attitude the Prime Minister adopted here this afternoon? As to the discussion of the constitution, the constitution comes into the matter because of the effect the government's attitude toward it has upon its poor housing performance, and the view of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) who has resigned.

I find it increasingly difficult to take the Prime Minister seriously. He talks about unitary government. Talk about red herrings! Who has proposed unitary government in this country, Mr. Speaker? The Prime Minister sets up a man of straw to knock down. He goes out west on one trip and slaps down the wheat growers, and to prove he is prepared to give equal treatment to all he makes another trip and insults the oil industry. When he thinks the time has come to regain the yards lost out there, he does what any red-blooded leader would do—he attacks the premier of Quebec. After all, it worked pretty well in the election of last June.

Yesterday he lost his seatmate and colleague, the Minister of Transport. That minister attacked the Prime Minister's concept of federalism and its bearing on the ability of the government to meet the many problems of the country. The minister resigned, so the Prime Minister went out into the corridors and attacked the opposition. If the Prime Minister had a wife and if he quarrelled with her he would go out and kick the cat. Ministers have resigned before, although I doubt that a resignation on principle has ever come so soon after a Prime Minister has been elected to power. The Minister of Transport says in effect that the government is not dealing with the bread and butter issues; it lacks initiatives in housing, pollution, inflation and urban development. What is left, Mr. Speaker? Agriculture? External Affairs? Defence policy? The Post Office Department? Are they doing anything right, Mr. Speaker? Are they doing anything at all? In fairness, they are working overtime to establish a study group to advise them as to what they should do about inflation.

The Minister of Transport indicated at his press conference that the Prime Minister has trouble in "comprehending fully the real problems of people in their day-to-day living". What greater charges of unsuitability could be brought against a Prime Minister in a participatory democracy? The report of the task force on housing was presented to this house on January 29. The recommendations were hardly earth-shattering. They did not involve quite as much as we were led to expect, but with the exception of two or three recommendations we endorsed the report of the task force as it held out some hope for material progress.

We said then, as we recommended during the election campaign, that a task force on housing should have had provincial involvement. Leaving this aside, there are recommendations in the report of the task force that the federal government can implement.

Many of them involve provincial consultation, but there are those that could be implemented directly.

The future of this country in terms of the quality of our life, Mr. Speaker, will be determined largely in the urban centres where 75 per cent of our people live. We have been reminded forcefully by the Economic Council of Canada of the appalling extent of urban poverty, yet we have in this house today a Prime Minister of Canada making what must surely be one of the most complacent speeches to the people of Canada regarding housing that it has ever been the misfortune of a Prime Minister to make. We know of housing conditions and the housing shortage. From time to time, the Prime Minister himself has acknowledged the danger of protest unsatisfied that builds into violence.

If the Prime Minister and the government cannot be convinced that these problems affect the heart and soul of the nation, that they are problems requiring federal action, then there is unfortunately very strong reason for pessimism.

During the election campaign last spring, the Prime Minister promised to establish in co-operation with provincial governments a program of national priorities for our cities. He promised to establish urban research centres in selected urban universities. He also promised to introduce a co-ordinated program to advance the techniques of urban mass transport. The time has long passed to honour those pledges. Certainly, it is time to bring in the legislation based on the report of the task force where it relates to the federal jurisdiction. Furthermore, this government should consult with the provinces as quickly as possible to see the extent to which, through co-operation, the other recommendations can be implemented and to what extent federal help may be required.

There has been no action on housing and urban problems because for the Prime Minister, according to the Minister of Transport, the constitution has become the great hang-up, the straitjacket, the impediment to progress. Yesterday, in his letter to the Minister of Transport accepting the latter's resignation, the Prime Minister said, and I quote:

> The platform on which our government was elected was clearly and emphatically a one nation platform, and it has not changed.

There he goes again, Mr. Speaker. It is that fellow Faribault who is not building the houses!

The Prime Minister might have been able to get away with that kind of political garbage during the election campaign, but it is a sorry way to try to meet the problems of governing this country. Now, we know how this "one nation platform" works in practice. We know because the Minister of Transport has given us the inside information.

The Minister of Transport confirmed what was apparent as long ago as February 14, when the Prime Minister said in this house, speaking of urban renewal, housing and urban transport:

> Until the constitution is brought into the 20th century in some of these respects, governments are to a large degree powerless to solve the problems either by acting alone or in co-operation with other levels of government.

I want you to contrast these two statements, Mr. Speaker. I want to call attention to the extent to which this statement constitutes a rationalization for doing nothing, that is to suggest under our existing constitution the governments of Canada are largely powerless to deal with problems such as housing, urban renewal and urban transport. If the federal and provincial governments over the years had taken that position, there would never have been any progress in this country. I repeat what the Prime Minister said a month or so ago:

> Until the constitution is brought into the 20th century in some of these respects, governments are to a large degree powerless to solve the problems either by acting alone or in co-operation with other levels of government.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister said in the corridor, "most of the fundamental issues in this country could be settled under the present constitution through co-operation between the federal government and the provinces." How can a Prime Minister who makes contradictory statements like these be taken seriously? A month or so ago the Prime Minister said it was virtually impossible to solve these problems under the existing constitution. Yesterday, he said most of the fundamental issues could be settled under the present constitution through co-operation. If the Prime Minister believed what he said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, and if the Minister of Transport believed that the Prime Minister believed it, he would not have submitted his resignation. The Minister of Transport resigned because, as he put it, the Prime Minister has a theory of federalism, "of ten virtually autonomous provinces held together by strings of a fairly weak government with its responsibilities largely confined to tariffs and customs and the things that are enumerated under section 91".

So much for the one nation platform, Mr. Speaker, of which the Prime Minister spoke so much and which, as the Minister of Transport said, is not what the Canadian people had been led to believe it would be. The British North America Act will be with us for some time yet. Ways have been found for over 100 years to attack problems under the present constitution through federal-provincial co-operation. It is time for the Prime Minister to come back to earth. The country cannot stand still. Problems will not wait for the constitution to be reviewed or revised.

• (3:10 p.m.)

The constitution of this country has always created difficulties. But it has never been an impossible stumbling block and it is not one now if the Prime Minister will seek to co-operate with the provinces. There is more at stake here than the willingness of the government to act on housing, urgent and important though housing is. What is at issue here is the willingness of the government to act at all to meet urgent and emerging problems such as those referred to by the Minister of Transport which include problems of pollution and inflation.

Let us be perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Transport is saying, in effect, that the reason we have not had an adequate housing policy in Canada—and he resigned because of this—is that the concept of confederation the Prime Minister has imposed on the cabinet does not allow the federal government to deal effectively with the modern problems facing this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: Presumably, that concept of the federal system is too rigid and too narrow to allow Ottawa to act effectively to solve problems of pollution, inflation or other similar problems. We had known that there had not been action, but we were told that action would come. Now, the man who sat in the house as the principal lieutenant of the Prime Minister, and who was the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada, suggest that the inaction of the government is not due to delay but, instead, to design. He has suggested that the government has no intention of acting.

The Minister's resignation raises serious doubts about the plans of the government for the country. We have been told that long range plans are being launched and developed in the Privy Council office and that we are hovering at the very edge of an exciting time of action. We might almost call it phase two, Mr. Speaker. The myth has been spread that there is a united and modern government plotting a new course for Canada. If that myth has not been exploded it has at least been badly shell shocked.

I want to end by saying that the minister who has resigned has a record of service in government. He had the courage and the ability to translate ideas and concepts into reality. While hon. members on this side of the house sometimes, indeed frequently, disagreed fundamentally with his concepts, nevertheless there was never any lack of admiration for his energy and for the ability he applied to the programs he was attempting to implement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: He served honourably and faithfully in the governments of three prime ministers. He entered public life as a young man, and he is a young man still. Whether he is in politics or out of politics, I sincerely hope that our country will continue to benefit from his dedication and service. His resignation at this time brings discredit to this government, which is the poorer for it.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we listened carefully to the remarks of the leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas), of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

This sub-amendment moved by the New Democratic party is to the effect that, and I shall have to quote it in English because I was only given the English version of the motion:

[English]

—for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the resignation of the Minister of Transport because of the failure of the government to agree to take action to increase the housing supply in Canada,—

[Translation]

As was so well said by the Prime Minister, the leader of the New Democratic party talked about a lot of things, except housing. The Prime Minister blamed the leader of the New Democratic party for not quoting figures. I intend to provide the Prime Minister with figures which speak for themselves and which do not come from us but from conclusion resulting from serious studies of the housing crisis.

The Prime Minister told us earlier that he was not aware of any housing crisis in Canada while the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) resigned because of the housing crisis which the Prime Minister refused to cope with and which the members of the cabinet did not want to be concerned about.

These statements are therefore contradictory. If the Prime Minister is convinced of what he says then I invite him to come along with me.

I shall take him to places all across Canada where there is at the moment a housing crisis.

The Prime Minister may very well say that we have built 200,000 houses, 197,000 houses, and so on, but the fact remains that in Canada we have 5,500,000 housing units while we have 5,700,000 families. This means that at the moment, we are short 200,000 housing units. Furthermore, there are 500,000 dwellings which are nothing more than sheds in which families, human beings, have to live.

We could tour the whole country, we could visit various parts of Montreal where we would see people who literally live in sheds that we would not consider suitable for dogs. Children are almost devoured by rats and the Prime Minister rises in the house to tell us very seriously that there is no housing crisis in Canada. When the Prime Minister makes such a statement, he acts like a joker. I could say something else, but I will leave it at that.

Mr. Speaker, there are 500,000 defective homes. For 10 years, there has been talk of replacing slums by decent homes for men, women and children. Families of 10 or 12 people have to live in three rooms. And that not in Egypt, China or in the constituency of Mont Royal, but in the cities of Montreal and Hull.

As a matter of fact, let us talk about the city of Hull, Mr. Speaker. One has only to look at the other side of the Ottawa river to see what people put up with over there. The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) left the house when he heard about his city.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister just said there is no housing crisis in Canada.

A thorough study on housing was made by the Canadian Conference on housing, which went through the report submitted by the Federal Task Force on Housing. Now, on January 30, the following was published by the Canadian Conference, and I quote:

• (3:20 p.m.)

[English]

The federal task force on housing report offers nothing concrete for the housing needs of the more than one million Canadian families with incomes below $5,500—

That was well established by the Canadian Conference on Housing.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has probably not seen that report.

I go on with the quotation:

[English]

—the first concern of government must be the people of low income whose housing needs are greatest.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister has taken no notice of this report.

If he has only read the report of the architects of the town of Mount Royal, in Montreal, he must have noticed that these people do not earn $5,500 a year. Consequently, he could not learn that there was a housing problem. Yet, this problem does certainly exist whether he admits it or not.

Now, what were the recommendations of this commission? I have here a statement made after all these studies by Mr. Albert Gagnon, a former president of the Association of housing contractors of the district of Montreal. What did that man who knows about construction and housing say? He said, among other things, that an increase of 1 per cent in the interest rate on a small $15,000 house during a period of 25 years would increase the payments by $9 a month, that is an increase of $108 a year.

Then, the construction of a family dwelling is practically impossible for the time being, because the worker who earns $5,000 cannot buy his own house.

Mr. Speaker, with due respect to the constitution of the Prime Minister and the competence of the governments, what did Mr. Gagnon recommend? Here it is:

Immediate decrease of the interest rate for the loans granted by the C.M.H.C. to people whose income is $10,000 or less a year;

Decrease of the interest rate. I read further:

Removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on the building materials that are used for housing;

A capital gains tax on profits from the sale of land in order to discourage speculation;

Repayment period of mortgage to be extended from 25 to 40 years;

I do not quite agree with Mr. Gagnon on the last point. I continue quoting:

Income tax legislation to be amended to allow small owners to deduct municipal and school taxes from their taxable income.

It is logical. If $5,000 worth of materials are needed to build a house, the federal government receives $550 which increases the cost of construction. Then the Quebec government levies an 8 per cent tax on the increased cost. We have reached the point where taxes are taxed, and then we have the nerve to ask why there is a housing crisis. There is no end to the taxes we have to pay.

The Prime Minister knows full well that to build a house costing $5,000 in material, the buyer would have to spend $994 to pay the 11 per cent federal tax and the 8 per cent provincial tax.

Mr. Gagnon also made recommendations to the provincial government. But I shall leave it to the premier of Quebec, Mr. Bertrand, to deal with the taxes in that province. Let us take care of those for which Ottawa is responsible.

Mr. Speaker, Controller Allan Lamport, a former mayor of Toronto, a fairly competent man, I believe, said this on January 9th, and I quote:

[English]

Transport Minister Paul Hellyer's study group on housing is the "biggest whitewash I've ever seen" Toronto Controller Allan Lamport said yesterday.

[Translation]

Mr. Lamport added, and I quote:

[English]

The banks were given special treatment—

[Translation]

There is opposition to granting special treatment to the workers, to paying them such salaries as would enable them to own something, but—

[English]

The banks were given special treatment with the ceiling lifted from 6 per cent to unlimited, but the mortgage rate soon will be 9 or 10 per cent.

[Translation]

That was in January. It is now 10 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, that is what Mr. Lamport had to say about interest rates that keep people from building a house. This increase in interest rate was allowed under the pretext that it would check inflation, when in fact it spurs it on directly.

When you reduce the purchasing power of the Canadian citizen, it is clear that you contribute to inflation. That is exactly what the government is doing, for instance, by allowing chartered banks to increase their interest rates to excessively high levels, thereby keeping the ordinary Canadian citizen from owning something and feeling at home in his own country, Canada.

Mr. Speaker, here is a testimony from the C.N.T.U. The minister who, at one time, was president of the C.N.T.U. in the province of Quebec, should remember the days when he was the defender of the working class, the defender of the small wage earner, the defender of the humble Canadian people. Here is what the C.N.T.U. has to say in an article entitled: "One word to qualify the Hellyer report on housing", and I quote:

Were your government to enforce its recommendations, it would only serve to strengthen the foundations of this unjust society of ours: no suggestion likely to solve the housing problems of the low and even medium income range of citizens, encouragement given to lifelong indebtedness (a suggestion tending to extend the repayment period)—

As the Prime Minister just told us, we will now give 40 years, instead of 35, to repay loans.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Let us imagine a 45 year-old Canadian, a worker from the Canadair plants in Montreal, Brantford, Toronto or Regina. He buys himself a nice little house—under the plan suggested not so long ago by the Prime Minister—incidentally, we should see it in the White Paper, next week—intending to pay it over a period of 40 years. When he finally owns a house, in his own country, he will be 85 years old.

The Prime Minister tells us that his government treats the Canadian workers generously. His government, as well as the previous one, has always treated foreign countries more generously than Canadians who have built Canada at the sweat of their brows and who are still able to do so.

This does not mean that we object to helping others but it is high time, I believe, that we should think of our own people here, of those who are still willing to work in order to develop Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the C.N.T.U. brief added and I quote:

—praise for the efficiency of private enterprise in a sector where social needs are overwhelming and where private enterprise has failed—

May I point out to the C.N.T.U. that private enterprise has not failed; it is the government that has failed miserably, to build, housing for the Canadian people.

Private entreprise exists, but the Prime Minister does not wonder whether there are nails, wood, contractors, carpenters, architects and engineers ready to build dwellings in Canada. No. He wonders if we have any money.

Mr. Trudeau: No, but there is a constitutional authority!

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the views stated a while ago by the Leader of the Opposition: when the people's interests are at stake, should we always stumble over constitutional terms? If we have all the requisites for construction, should we remain inactive, because the constitution has not yet been amended?

For the last fifteen years, we have heard about the constitution and we have seen men of good will fight blindly.

During the last electoral campaign, the Leader of the Opposition came to Quebec to talk about the "two-nation concept", thus creating discord among Canadians.

The leader of the New Democratic party also came to Quebec to declare "You poor Frenchmen, you need a special status".

Mr. Speaker, I am a Canadian from the province of Quebec. I speak French. It is my mother tongue. I want it to be respected all across Canada. I say that Quebec is like all the other Canadian provinces, even though our needs are different.

I was in Calgary last week—one week after the Prime Minister was thrown a few tomatoes. I visited Alberta and British Columbia, two neighbouring provinces where existing problems are not similar. In fact, every province has its own particular problems and one certainly cannot say that Saskatchewan and Alberta are faced with the same problems. Wheat sales are indeed a common problem, but as far as political ideologies are concerned, it is an entirely different matter.

My hon. friend from the New Democratic party was prime minister of the socialist province of Saskatchewan for 17 years. There were federal-provincial conferences at that time when the Right Hon. Mackenzie King was prime minister of Canada. Some took place during prime minister St. Laurent's time.

What did the former premier of Saskatchewan achieve in regard to federal-provincial conferences or federal-provincial problems?

He has done almost nothing. And yet, he was premier of Saskatchewan for 17 years. His province was different from Manitoba. Manitoba is not like Ontario. Ontario is different from Quebec. All provinces are different.

In Newfoundland, the problems are different from those in New Brunswick, where farmers have to deal with the marketing of their potatoes.

As the Prime Minister says, we must establish in Canada a constitution which will respect the identity peculiar to each of those provinces.

The Canadian constitution must be improved in such a way that an economic context could be developed in which each province could have its own way. In doing so, the identity of each province would be respected, for we do not need two nations, special status, this or that.

We sincerely believe that the huge country we live in can serve the whole nation. That is why, Mr. Speaker, the Ralliement Créditiste suggests that the Prime Minister make the funds of the Bank of Canada available to the provinces and let them assume their responsibilities in the field of housing.

This would not go against the constitution, and the Prime Minister does not have to change it in any way for that purpose. Nothing prevents the government from putting a branch of the Bank of Canada at the disposed of the provinces, so as to enable them to build more houses for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member, as his time has expired. Unless he gets unanimous consent from the house, he cannot proceed with his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues for allowing me to go on with my remarks. I do not want to abuse of their generosity, but in concluding my remarks, I want to call the Prime Minister's attention to the recommendations made some time ago in Belgium by a well known economist, Mr.

Gaston Bardet, dean of studies at the Higher International Institute of Applied Town Planning, in Brussels.

Here is what Mr. Bardet had to say:

As a result of outside financing by the banks, which issue advanced scrip money, operations and production soar at a rate exceeding the real purchasing power, which is now ignored. As a result, there is a productive hysteria, with the alternatives of unemployment or war, for the destruction of the goods that glut the market.

Therefore, there exist for financing two entirely different solutions: one through savings and the other, through projections, the self-regulation of which should come from supply, from existing surplusses, in the first case, from demand, from essential needs in the second case.

Bank financing is altogether appropriate for construction and capital equipment, beneficial to the entire country. For, in that case, no overproduction is to be feared.

It is really demand which determines the issue; it is the need for housing, roads, bridges, hospitals, schools which now become the regulator of advanced scrip money, so dangerous in its anticipations, the machinery of which must now be set forth. How are we to build annually the 200,000 houses that people are clamouring for?

Their problem is the same as ours. They also need 200,000 houses. The quotation goes on:

Let us resort to the machinery used by the bankers themselves—

He indeed refers to the bankers themselves and not to the floor sweepers or those who empty the spittoons. Let us ask them.

What does a bank do when it wants to erect a building? Does it borrow from another bank? Certainly not.

It credits an amount to a current account in its own name, on which, needless to say, it pays no interest. It purchases the land, pays the builders with cheques that are guaranteed... by the building itself. It thens collects rents and, after some thirty years, the money paid in balances the initial amount credited.

• (3:40 p.m.)

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Côté), who is talking with his neighbour, does not understand anything about these matters. It would perhaps be wiser for him to listen, because his electors understand the problem and this might be dangerous for him in the next election.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): That no longer exists in my district because Social Credit is dead.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I shall go on with my quotation:

The operation is cancelled, but the bank keeps the building which it now owns without having spent a single cent. Except, as you will probably say, for the cost of entering the amounts paid out or received on one sheet of the ledger under Debit and Credit.

Thus, the bank, because of the modern form of credit using scrip money, based on the belief in its eventual solvency, was able to create sham money and convert it into bricks, the most tangible thing, with the cheques issued losing their currency at the end of thirty years when the magic operation is over.

To create and then destroy sham money which had a legal value during a short period, such is in fact the extraordinary privilege of the bank system, brought into the open by the parliamentary surveys of the British government... and of the Canadian government—

Mr. Speaker, this is exactly the situation in which we find ourselves.

If we let the banks operate for their own benefit, as I have just said, why would the government not introduce some legislation that would provide for interest-free loans or for loans bearing an interest just covering the operating costs. The Canadian worker could then build a house and find the money to pay for it. He would not have to pay, for instance, as is now the case, $84,000 per unit. If somebody buys a $24,000 house, he can say he has paid for it, not $24,000, but rather $84,000; as a matter of fact, a $20,000 30-year mortgage at 9⅜ per cent costs $60,000 in interest, which brings the total cost of the house to $84,000.

We do approve credit in our system. Let us go on since this is what the Prime Minister suggests—paying a 9⅜ per cent interest, not only for 30 years, but for 40 years, which means that an ordinary house would cost, not $20,000 or $24,000, but over $100,000.

Mr. Speaker, it is a crying shame to see that in Canada such an administration is being tolerated because people are afraid to protest against a monetary system which fleeces everybody.

But we of the Ralliement Créditiste shall go on fighting until the little man gets his house, the Canadian family has suitable dwellings, until the monetary system really serves the Canadian people, rather than the Canadian people being at the service of the monetary system, as is the case under the present administration.

[English]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to say, if I may in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that I have not seen him so animated since he became Prime Minister as he was today. Apparently, the crisis created by the resignation of the Minister of Transport (Mr.

Hellyer) hit him a great deal harder than he appeared to suggest. I was very pleased to see him so animated. I listened to him with more attention, even though I did not agree with him to any greater extent.

The first point I want to make is that all of us in this house other than the Prime Minister, and I hope he is alone in his party in this respect, knew that there was a housing crisis; not because we created it but because every description of the housing situation in Canada today from the Economic Council of Canada to the task force report in January emphasized this housing crisis. The Prime Minister was the only person who did not know about it.

Because the Prime Minister did not know about this situation he did with statistics what is often done with them. However, he was no more revealing in his use of these statistics than some of the rest of us who do this kind of thing. During the course of his speech he emphasized quite rightly that 1966 and 1967 were years during which there was a real shortfall in housing. I do not have his text before me, but I am confident that is what he said. He then proceeded to compare the results of 1968 with those two years during which there had been a shortfall. That is the kind of statistical legerdemain I suppose all of us in politics practice, but it really does not enlighten or illuminate the situation.

The fact is that if there was an improvement in 1968 in housing starts, as there was, it was only because the performance in 1966 and 1967 was so dismal. If you start with a very low rate then, of course, your rate of increase is very high no matter what the performance. What is much more important and what I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, is indicative of the lack of concern of this government and of this Prime Minister is that his comparison of the number of housing starts had no conscience at all as to the kind of housing being started, about the price of homes being built, about rents being paid for apartments, about the cost of building houses or about the simple fact that a large proportion of those houses started in 1968 and 1969 were available to only 5 per cent of the population. That is sheer lack of social conscience, and I make no apology for putting it this way, on the part of the Prime Minister who rose in this chamber to say he was not aware of a housing crisis and then quoted figures which in no way touched upon the real problems and the real needs of 95 per cent of the Canadian people.

What are some of the facts about the situation, Mr. Speaker? If the Prime Minister were a little more humble and a little more concerned about the welfare of the people, he would have admitted these facts. He then might have argued that he was trying to do his best. To refuse to admit them is to me disgustingly shameful on the part of a leader of a country such as Canada.

The facts are that the Economic Council of Canada said we should have a minimum of 200,000 housing units; that in 1965, we had 165,000, 35,000 short; that in 1966 we had 134,000, 66,000 short; that in 1967 we had 164,000, another 36,000 short and that in 1968 we came near the 200,000 mark. Even in those four years from 1965, there was a shortfall of roughly 150,000 units. Those are the facts we have to face.

What are the other facts? As the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) pointed out, there are 500,000 substandard housing units in Canada. He pointed out that there are homes, and I do not like being maudlin about these things, in which children sleep in beds which are not fit for animals. They are being bitten by rats during the night. Stories of this kind of thing appear in newspapers all across the country. There are homes in this country which accommodate 8, 10, 15 people which are not fit for animals and should not accommodate, in any event, more than two people. There are homes in this country in large numbers—tens of thousands, if not hundreds of thousands—which do not have modern plumbing, which do not have electricity, and some of which do not have many of the other amenities of modern living.

There are 400,000 families in Canada today sharing accommodation, and in the cases where this happens the accommodation is not adequate for one family. There are 100,000 families across Canada on the waiting lists for public housing. In the metropolitan Toronto area alone, there is a waiting list of over 16,000. These are the facts. I repeat to the right hon. Prime Minister, he can make a defence if he likes, but he has no right to mislead himself and the Canadian people about the sorry state of the housing situation in Canada today.

What are some of the other relevant facts? It is a fact that the cost of housing in Canada since 1964 has increased annually at a rate of about 10 per cent. It is a fact that land prices have gone up from 200 per cent to 500 per cent in a short number of years. It is a fact that rents have skyrocketed and there is not a family in any apartment dwelling in my constituency, with the exception of those very fancy families in fancy apartments, which does not feel the increase in rates eating into the available funds for food, clothing and the bringing up of children. These are the facts.

The fact is that in respect of public housing in Canada there are only 40,000 units, about ⅔ of 1 per cent of total housing starts in Canada. Those are the facts the Prime Minister and the government have to face. Those are the facts the Prime Minister did not mention. Instead of that, he cited figures which are literally irrelevant to the situation in respect of a large part of the Canadian people, although they may be relevant to the total situation.

The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation issued its report for 1968 and at page XIV we find a statement I should like to draw to the attention of this house with the hope that the Prime Minister will read it, if he has not already had it drawn to his attention. This report says, at the page I have mentioned:

However, the likelihood is that a program as high even as 250,000 units per year would not create a sufficient stock within five years to bring an end to over-crowding, doubling up, and the continued use of deficient dwellings.

Even 250,000 units per year would not really touch the housing crisis of this country. The price of homes and the high level of rents is a problem that remains even if the total housing stock is increased. It is with this knowledge of the crisis, the knowledge of these relevant facts, relevant to the lives of Canada's people, of Canada's old, Canada's young and Canada's new families, that my leader dealt with the constitutional problem. No matter how many words the Prime Minister may use here or elsewhere, he has encased himself in a constitutional strait-jacket. Since he is the leader of the country he has, therefore, encased the country in a constitutional strait-jacket. Like every rigidity of this sort which is imposed upon a dynamic and flowing situation within a country or a society, it is inconsistent; it just is not so. Whatever the Prime Minister has said is contradicted by something else that has happened.

For example, even today he made a great point, if I understood him correctly, about the question of making funds available for the assembly of land by the municipalities. Says he, do we do it directly with the municipalities or do we do it through the provinces? Heavens above, what is he talking about? The fact is that in section 35 of the National Housing Act we have provision for public housing and in another section we have provision for urban renewal. The plan has to be arrived at in consultation. The federal department has to approve of it or it will not be put into effect. Of course the provincial government enters the picture in channelling the funds and paying its 10 per cent, in most cases, or 25 per cent, whatever it may be, of the balance that has to be paid after the federal funds have been allotted.

I cannot think of a more picayune attitude—I say this as a person who has great respect for the Prime Minister's intellect even though I have not for his concern for the welfare of Canada—than to raise the constitutional problem on this point. Who, in heaven's name, cares whether the funds go through Queen's Park to Toronto or directly to Toronto? I do not. If it makes Mr. Robarts happier, I do not care if it is done that way, as long as the people who want public housing and want to be able to buy land at a relatively decent, honest price, instead of the usurious prices which they have to pay now, are able to do so.

It does not matter how the federal funds get to the party assembling the land. If the Prime Minister, by stating that example, is trying to tell members of this house that this is so great and tremendously difficult a problem that he has been unable to persuade the provinces to agree where the cheque is to go or how the funds are to be funnelled to the municipalities, I simply do not accept that statement; I would have to think that every provincial premier is devoid of any intelligence at all. I do not think they are the most brilliant men in Canada, any more than I am or anyone else is, but, by gad, they are not unintelligent.

I cannot believe that the Prime Minister, making an honest and conscientious effort to solve that picayune problem, would not have succeeded by now. To attempt to tell us that is the problem is to throw sand in our eyes and throw an argument into the conversation that is not there.

The words of the Prime Minister with regard to the constitution, I say to hon. members and to anyone else who is interested, even though today, he used words very carefully to indicate that he was not thinking of less federal-provincial co-operation, made me shudder for the future of our country. He emphasized in several places that it is impossible for the federal government to do anything unless—I am not quoting him, but this is what it meant to me—it has the unanimous consent of all the provinces in Canada. This is what the Prime Minister implied by his words.

If that were true, we would not have unemployment insurance in Canada; we would not have hospital insurance in Canada, there would not be a medicare plan on the statute books of Canada; there would be no Canada Assistance Plan; there would be no old age pensions in Canada. This is the fear we have. This is what we are talking about. We are saying to the Prime Minister that the constitutional strait-jacket in which he has put himself, this attitude that the division of powers in the British North America Act means that you must not step over the line even though you may do it constitutionally—no one is suggesting it be done unconstitutionally—immobilizes the federal government, immobilize this parliament and renders Canada weak.

The kind of federal government for which the Prime Minister stands—I said this a year ago; my party said it a year ago—is a weak central government which merely presides over conferences and meetings. It passes some laws if it gets the unanimous consent of the provinces, but takes little initiative; says "please", "maybe" from time to time, and if the provinces frown, runs away. That is not leadership in this country on the issues that require leadership. In the whole discussion by the Prime Minister of the constitution he is constantly speaking in legalistic terms about the division of powers. I have never heard him talk about the responsibilities of the various legislatures. I, who am a federalist, who believe in Canadian federalism, who believe that Canada cannot possibly be a unitary state, that it is stupid to talk of one, say without any qualification or hesitation that this parliament is nothing if it is not the expression of the needs and the will of all the Canadian people. The federal government is nothing if it does not accept the authority and power to act for all the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: That means precisely, to use the Prime Minister's words, that when a local problem has by the passage of time become a national problem, it becomes the responsibility of the federal parliament and the federal government to act. Since housing, pollution, urban transportation and all the total complex of urban life in Canada are now national problems, it has become the duty and responsibility of this government and this parliament to act on them.

Mr. Winch: For the general good of Canada.

Mr. Lewis: Yes, for the general good of Canada. No one suggests that the federal government take action on housing without consultation with the provinces. No one in this house or outside this house who knows anything about the subject is that stupid. No one suggests that the federal government have a program that is not arrived at after constant consultation with the provinces. I remember suggesting a year ago at a meeting of the New Democratic party where a colleague of mine, Mr. Douglas Fisher, was nominated for the last election, that there ought to be a permanent secretariat, as I called it, or a permanent national urban council, as we have since called it, on which there would be representatives of federal, provincial and municipal governments. In this way there would be constant and continuing co-ordination of plans and programs, not only in the making of them but in their implementation.

No one is suggesting that the provinces should not be consulted. No one is suggesting that the federal government go over the heads of the provinces. What we are saying is that the federal government must take the initiative to start solving national problems. Some of them it must solve because it is the duty of this parliament to act, whether or not all the provinces agree, and some of them it must solve when most of the provinces agree and one or two provinces decide to stay out. That is what we are saying in the New Democratic party.

The Prime Minister's fallacy is that he always speaks about this legalistic division of powers and never about the responsibility of the federal parliament and the federal government. It would be impossible for the Prime Minister to persuade me, or even to persuade a member of the Liberal party, that the Minister of Transport resigned from the government because housing in Canada was doing so well that his efforts were no longer needed in this position. No one can persuade me or anyone else in the house that the resignation of a man from such an important office, of a man who held the office of Acting

Prime Minister, was not caused by frustration and failure to carry out what he felt had to be done in the field in which he was given responsibility. I do not happen to be a great follower of the Minister of Transport, and I do not happen to think very highly of the task force report which he produced. I do not agree with his totally free enterprise approach. I do not admire Mr. Hellyer, as a house builder, being so chummy with that less desirable element in housing. I do not happen to be an admirer of his, but that is irrelevant to the strange situation that the relatively conservative Minister of Transport could no longer accept the conservatism of the present Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Lewis: I thank the hon. members for allowing me to continue. I only have a few more sentences to complete what I wanted to say, and this is the only reason I am taking advantage of the kindness of the house.

My leader dealt with the constitutional problem mainly because this was the reason the Minister of Transport gave for his resignation. Indeed, our motion emphasizes the resignation of the minister. We are not merely debating the question of housing, important though that subject is in this debate, but we are also discussing the government and the inaction of this government. It is a debate about the constitutional immobilisation of this country by the Prime Minister. That is what the debate is about. It is a debate about the lack of initiative and leardership of this government in the entire urban problem. I do not have to remind this house about the importance of this problem. Some 50 per cent of Canadians now live in about 18 municipal urban areas of this country. Over 70 per cent of the Canadian people now live in urban areas, the smaller as well as the larger ones. In about five years, our statisticians tell us, over 80 per cent of our people will be urbanized, and in about 20 years 85 per cent to 90 per cent will be urbanized. These housing problems, these transportation problems and these pollution problems will multiply as the growth of our cities and towns continues. If the government of Canada does not now have the leadership, the courage and the wisdom to start tackling these problems with energy, they will get out of hand and our country will be faced with the kind of violence on the street with which the country to the south of us is faced. This is why we take this problem so seriously. This is why we say there is a housing and urban crisis in Canada, not only because of the number of housing units now needed but because of the growing problem of urbanization in Canada, because of the growing threat to the quality of life of the vast majority of our people. If this problem is not tackled now, it will get out of hand to the point where there will be no evolutionary democratic solution to it.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Don Valley.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to point out that so far two members of the New Democratic party have spoken but only one member of the official opposition has had the chance to speak. I should like to ask for your permission to allow a member of our party to speak at the present time.

The Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate the point which the hon. member raised but there has been one speaker on the government side and, according to my list, four on the opposition side. Therefore, I think it in only fair that I recognize the hon. member for Don Valley.

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that in the discussion of federal responsibility for housing and urban affairs resulting from the resignation of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) the country is losing sight of the fact that the primary responsibility for our cities still rests with the provinces. I hope this situation will change and that the federal government will be able to obtain, with the co-operation of all provinces, some direct access to our cities. This is a priority subject for federal-provincial constitutional discussions.

In the meanwhile, I should like to look at the provincial role in housing to assess the responsibility of the federal government. One major aspect of the housing crisis, the urban crisis if I can put it more broadly, is the status of the tenant. Whatever solution emerges to the housing shortage, there will be a growing number of tenants in Canada.

It is a shocking fact that until recently some municipalities in my riding and elsewhere denied tenants the right to vote in local elections. Not only was their civil status downgraded, but their contractual status with their landlord is a genuine relic of feudal times. With the past shortage of accommodation, they have lacked any real bargaining power. Large security deposits are demanded and often no interest is paid on them. Children and pets are often forbidden. Landlords reserve the right to enter and inspect premises at all times. Tenancies are forfeited for minor infractions. Tenants have no voice in the formulating of rules which apply to the common areas. Most critical, there is no right for the tenant to withhold rent against breaches of covenant by the landlord. Fortunately, tenants' associations are forming. There are some which, to the credit of many landlords, have obtained great co-operation, even to the point where landlords are presenting statements of profit and loss.

But not all landlords are co-operative. The solution to this injustice and frustration in our urban centres is legislation, but not federal legislation. This is a provincial responsibility. You can imagine the frustration of those inhabitants of our big cities who want better and cheaper housing when they see thousands of acres of land lying idle around our cities awaiting development. Some in Canada may be led to believe that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is responsible for this situation. But the fact is that only the provinces have the power to open these lands for urban development. This is not a simple question of money. As it is, there is a very substantial federal contribution to education and to municipal services. The whole provincial share of municipal development can easily be taken from the pockets of the speculators by proper provincial legislation. It is a question of legislation by the provincial governments. Yet, in Ontario, in the township of Pickering for example, which adjoins the city of Toronto and which contains 80,000 acres of land suitable for development, the latest policy of the provincial government expressed through the Ontario municipal board is that only 100 residential building permits per year are to be issued.

Let me pursue this theme to show what, in my view, are the errors in provincial policies which have created this crisis. Local municipalities are run by the people who live in them in their own interests. Under present provincial law the ratepayers bear heavy burdens in connection with services; that is, sewers, water and roads, and in connection with educational costs. A substantial part of such costs are borne in the municipal tax rate. Residential assessment alone can never raise the tax revenue required to pay for the services which a municipality provides for its residents. The solution adopted by the municipalities is to resist residential development—and who can blame them, under the present provincial legislation? But look at the problem from the point of view of the provincial government. The school children who are excluded from a particular municipality because of a ban against new housing, still have to be educated. Somewhere in the adjoining crowded city, each extra student has a desk and a teacher. So, in a broader geographic perspective, no money is saved by keeping children confined within old neighbourhoods.

What is obviously required is that the cost of education be borne above the municipal level and that ratepayers be freed from the education tax. Such a policy would permit municipalities to accept residential development without regard to the education consequences. As to the cost of services, it would be a relatively easy, if unpopular, matter for legislation to be introduced to permit the financing of such projects through assessment of the landowners whose properties would increase in value from the services to be provided. And at least in Ontario, there is no such legislation.

I would like to say a word about land banks, which have been proposed by the task force on housing. In some areas, if land can be bought at agricultural prices, land banks may have some utility. In built-up areas surrounding the big cities, where land is currently being held for development, I suggest that land banks are futile and a drain on the taxpayers. The acquisition by the government of land for development in such areas would only involve the transfer of huge sums of money from the treasury to private pockets without bringing the land purchased any closer to development. Far better to see the tax money spent on schools and services so that the land can be developed more quickly for housing. Unserviced land itself has no cost of production. Those who own land are obliged to sell at the market price, whether it cost them more or less. Yet land represents one of the greatest factors in the high cost of housing. If sensible fiscal arrangements were to be made by the provinces with their municipalities, as I have suggested, I believe that so much land would be opened up that prices of raw land would fall as the demand was met.

I would like to deal with another factor in the high cost of housing, one which is again the responsibility of the municipalities and again the result of outdated and counterproductive fiscal arrangements between the provinces and municipalities. I am referring to the high standards set for new homes. Considering the urgent demand for housing, municipalities should be prepared to permit smaller lots and smaller houses, so that homes can be built which people can afford to buy. At the present time the zoning requirements of municipalities are so high that there is no new housing, as it were, in the Volkswagen category. People who would like to buy a Volkswagen house and can afford one, are offered only Cadillacs which they often do not want and cannot afford.

The municipalities' high standards are partly an aesthetic consideration based on the desire of existing residents to see their communities upgraded at the expense of newcomers; partly it is a measure designed to reduce the amount of new development and to assure high assessment and higher taxes from newcomers. Much leadership in this respect can be provided and, in fact, has been provided by the federal government. More should be forthcoming.

The standards imposed by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for new housing are lower than the standards of any municipality in Toronto as to lot frontage and house size. But leadership can carry the matter only so far. The ultimate and direct solution is legislation, and again, Mr. Speaker, not federal legislation but provincial legislation.

On the subject of high costs of construction, I would like to say a word about the sales tax on construction materials. I believe that this tax should not have been introduced. However, it presently represents an important source of revenue which cannot easily be replaced. I would, therefore, urge the government to consider not the total repeal of the 11 per cent sales tax on construction materials, but at least the repeal of he cost of construction materials used in a house whose selling price, excluding land, is less than, say, $18,000. A similar provision could apply to apartment buildings which could be demonstrated to have been built for those with low incomes.

Mr. Gilbert: Does the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) agree with that?

[Mr. Kaplan.]

Mr. Kaplan: I have put it to him.

Such a reform could be administered by applications for refunds after the construction of the residence on production of evidence of its selling price, or of the rent to be charged in the case of apartments.

The third element in the high cost of housing is the increased and growing cost of money, that is, the interest charge. This is an area in which the federal government has some responsibility through C.M.H.C. and through its general control of the economy. Nobody is happy about the high cost of money today. I would like to look for a moment at the problem of inflation in perspective and then to suggest an approach to a solution not referred to in the task force report on housing.

There are many people who blame the federal government for inflation and who criticize it for its lack of restraint. Let me refer to some figures produced by the International Financial Statistics Service of the World Bank to illustrate how Canada compares with other nations in controlling inflation. Twenty-seven countries are included in the comparison, most of them free economy industrial countries, reflecting the change in the cost of living from 1958 to 1966, that is, over an eight year period. The figures show that over the period mentioned Canada is second only to the United States in controlling its price levels.

In that eight-year period, United States prices increased 14 per cent and Canadian prices increased 16 per cent. In Germany, whose economy is often praised for its stability, prices increased by 22 per cent; in the United Kingdom the increase was 27 per cent; in Sweden a socialist country much admired by some, the increase in prices was 34 per cent and in Japan, land of the modern economic miracle, the increase was 50 per cent. It will be seen that relatively speaking Canada's record has been very good.

In judging our performance, it must be borne in mind that Canada is tied very closely economically to international supplies of capital, of markets and of resources. We are not sufficiently isolated to have an economic policy radically different from those of our neighbours; hon. members will see that inflation is really an international problem which Canada is fighting off relatively well.

If, as I have suggested, inflation is an international phenomenon, this does not mean every effort should not be made to control it to the greatest extent possible. The government is recognizing its responsibility in the matter of inflation and an effort is being made to curb the expansion of the public sector and to keep government expenditures more in line with government revenues. Inflation has an important bearing on the cost of money. As investors lose confidence in the power of the economy to control inflation, they are less and less inclined to make fixed yield investments in mortgages, even at high rates. Investment in equities provides dividend income which more or less constitutes a hedge against inflation. Mortgages, as an investment, are unpopular for another reason. Our tax policies tend to discriminate against interest income. The investor who chooses an equity investment, such as a stock, enjoys two sorts of tax benefit. If the stock increases in value, the profit he earns on its sale is classed as a capital gain and is generally tax-free; the dividends he earns while waiting are subject to a dividend tax credit which also provides tax relief. The investor in a mortgage, on the other hand, not only pays income tax on the full yield at the highest rates, but is unprotected against inflation. It is partly for this reason, namely, to obtain a hedge against inflation, that interest rates have risen as they have.

• (4:20 p.m.)

To save the time of hon. members, I will merely refer to Private Members' Notice of Motion No. 61 which proposes a tax measure to encourage lending. In summary, Mr. Speaker, while there are measures that the federal government can and should adopt in the interests of providing more housing, the actions of the Minister of Transport fail to focus attention where it primarily belongs, that is on the provinces and municipalities.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, the housing crisis which exists in Canada today has been very adequately described to the house by my leader, the leader of the New Democratic Party and his deputy leader. I intend this afternoon to deal with some of the other reasons, in addition to the frustration with the government's refusal to deal adequately with this problem, which caused the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) to hand in his resignation yesterday morning.

I want to take a look at the kind of man he is to see if he is the kind of person who through pique and for picayune reasons would suddenly make a decision of this magnitude for himself and for the country. I also want to examine the other reasons why he found it necessary to take this important step yesterday.

Those of us who have known him in this house for 20 years, look upon him as a very deliberate man, one not given to hasty decisions or making unreasonable moves. In fact, most often he has been criticized for just the reverse. He is not an ordinary member of parliament or an ordinary member of this government. He is a man who has served in three governments under three prime ministers. He has served in this house for 20 years.

The Minister of Transport also serves as Deputy Prime Minister, a post assigned to him by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) because obviously the Prime Minister considered that he was the man most able to direct the affairs of this country while he, the Prime Minister, was absent. We must remember that not only we who know him from the other side of the house consider him a thoughtful, reasonable and reliable man, but also the members of the government and the Prime Minister. I, as well as others, know that to resign from the government is the most difficult decision a man in public life can ever make. It is only taken after a very great deal of consideration and heart-searching and with great reluctance. It is, therefore, obvious that the Deputy Prime Minister in taking this step took it as a thoughtful, deliberate, reasonable man, held in high regard by those with whom he works and those on the other side of the house.

What are the differences between the Deputy Prime Minister and the government which caused him to take this step yesterday morning? We have his own words to explain the reason for this decision. The Deputy Prime Minister, at a press conference yesterday morning, stated that the greatest difference between himself and the government that prompted him to take this most important step was the Prime Minister's attitude toward government itself. He described it, and I quote his words, "as the Prime Minister's classroom brand of federalism which is hobbling progress in the country in four important areas." He mentioned them as being housing, pollution, urban development and control of inflation.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we look back for a few minutes to the election of last June and remember what the Prime Minister promised in these four specific fields. In the field of housing, the country was to have adequate housing at reasonable prices that people with moderate incomes could afford to buy. The Deputy Prime Minister has told us that, in his opinion, his program which was worked out with great care after his trip across the country, at quite some expense to the taxpayers of Canada, examining housing questions in all parts of Canada, has very little chance of ever coming before the house for decision. These are the words of the man in charge of this program, not the words of the opposition. They are the words of the Deputy Prime Minister who is in charge of this housing program.

When the Prime Minister spoke this afternoon, he glibly quoted figures regarding the housing situation today, mentioning only numbers of houses being built. It seems to be of no concern to this Prime Minister what people have to pay for the houses they buy or rent. It is of no importance to him if you have to pay several thousand dollars more this year than last year, and several thousand dollars more the year after. This is of no consequence to the Prime Minister. He is in the very fortunate position of not having to worry about these things and he seems to believe that other people find themselves in that same fortunate position. Your Honour and I both know, as well as other hon. members of this house, that there are very few people in this country who find themselves in that position.

A few weeks ago in Montreal the Prime Minister made an attempt to visit a housing development in order to find out what the people who live in that kind of housing think about the government's program. He received a rather inhospitable welcome. What did he do? Did he stand there, face it out and discuss the question with these people? No. He turned tail and ran. The Prime Minister cannot take criticism. He does not want to hear people saying unkind things to him. This is why he turned on his heels, left and never went back. That is the last contact he has had with people in this country who cannot afford the housing they need. Yet, he glibly says today everything is all right in this country under a Liberal government, there is all the housing that people need. The Prime Minister implied that, like himself, everyone has all the money they need to buy whatever house is offered to them at whatever price the landlord chooses to charge. We can see what has happened to that glib promise.

[Mr. Hees.]

The people of this country were promised there would be some action on the problem of pollution. The people of this country were told they deserve and would get clean air and clean water. Yesterday, at his press conference, the man who knows more about what is or what is not going on in the government stated flatly that the government had no program; that nothing had been started to deal with these matters and that there appeared to him no likelihood that anything would be started to deal with these problems. So much for the Prime Minister's glib promise to the people in the shopping plazas that under this new Liberal government they would now get clean air and clear water.

The Prime Minister promised a new and better life for those who live in the urban communities of this country. Yesterday, the Deputy Prime Minister said once again there is no government program to improve urban life. He stated there is nothing even in the planning stage. Those are his words, not mine. They appeared in the newspapers. Newspapermen attending that conference know exactly what he said. I think the minister is a man of conscience and great sincerity. I have known him in this house for 20 years and, although I have fought with him over many issues, I have always respected him. I may not have agreed with him, but I knew that when he spoke he told the truth as he saw it. He said this government is doing nothing to halt the inflation taking place in this country. Since the Prime Minister took office inflation has increased month by month. When you ask the Minister of Finance what he proposes to do to curb inflation, he answers that everything possible is being done; that we should trust him and wait to see what will happen next month or the month after. Yet, inflation increases all the time.

Yesterday morning the Deputy Prime Minister said that the Prime Minister would sooner debate constitutional issues than tackle the practical problems facing the people of the country. He said that the Prime Minister, who is his seat mate in the house, his senior in the cabinet and his closest confidante would sooner discuss constitutional matters in a scholarly way than come to grips with practical problems facing the people of this country.

At his press conference yesterday morning the Deputy Prime Minister made clear in no uncertain terms an additional reason for resigning from the government. He believes sincerely and has always believed sincerely that the best way of preserving world peace is through collective security. With that we in the opposition, thoroughly agree. He believes the greatest contribution this country can make to peace is as a member of NATO. He believes we ought to fulfil our obligations to our NATO allies and not withdraw from those obligations. The Deputy Prime Minister is convinced that we cannot have world peace through collective security if we withdraw our forces from NATO and set the rest of the world the regrettable example that was first set by France. Such an example may encourage smaller nations wishing to make a lesser contribution to NATO to do so. As a former Minister of National Defence familiar with these problems, the Deputy Prime Minister knows perfectly well that once you start setting an example of withdrawing from the NATO alliance it will not be very long before there is no NATO alliance that is of any value at all. If that were to happen our chances of preserving world peace would diminish in direct proportion to the weakening of the alliance.

The Deputy Prime Minister knows perfectly well that world wars have come about because aggressors have misjudged the will of the western allies to withstand aggression. That is how World War I and II began. He knows perfectly well that our potential adversary, the Soviet Union, has not changed its attitude one bit in the last 25 years. What happened to Hungary and Czechoslovakia shows that to be true. He knows perfectly well that this government's attitude towards NATO weakens our chances of stopping World War III from beginning. That is one of the fundamental reasons why the Deputy Prime Minister has found it necessary to resign from this government.

His decision was the most difficult decision that any man in public life has to make. His decision must have been taken after a great deal of thought and consideration; it must have been taken with great regret on the basis that he could not, in all conscience, continue as a member of a government that refuses to face its responsibilities in dealing with the practical problems of the people of this country.

The minister says that the people of this country cannot wait for the Prime Minister to debate these constitutional issues. These matters must be dealt with now. Because the government of which he was a member refused to deal with these matters he found it necessary to resign. That course of action could well be considered by other members of this government who, as is commonly known, disagree strongly with government policies affecting matters of national importance.

In conclusion, may I say that the views I have expressed this afternoon have not been the views of the opposition alone. I have placed before the house views expressed by the second most senior member in this house, the Deputy Prime Minister of Canada, and I have elaborated on what he said in his declaration of resignation yesterday. I say to the Prime Minister, let us not be content to only debate these questions. I say he ought to come out of the classroom where, as the Deputy Prime Minister suggested, he is spending too much of his time. Let the Prime Minister get on with the job of fulfilling the promises he made to the people of Canada last June, because on the strength of those promises he was elected. Let him get down to business, as the Deputy Prime Minister has told him to do, get on with the job and produce the results that he assured the people of Canada he would produce if he were elected.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, since many of the arguments I intended to raise have already been covered, I shall be brief. There is no difficulty in accepting the premise that there is a housing crisis. The evidence is there for all to see. It speaks for itself. The Minister resigned because, as has been pointed out by other speakers, his complaint is that the government has no policy in the field of housing and does not intend to implement any suggested policy. I think the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) described the housing crisis adequately. The only answer the minister received to his complaints was that housing is a matter for the provinces or the cities and that the constitution precludes this government from taking any positive steps to solve this problem.

One need not be a constitutional expert to appreciate that the constitution of any land should serve its people and not make servants of them. After all, every constitution changes. Although the wording of a constitution may not be amended, the meanings of words change. In some ways constitutions are like growing trees. They can be interpreted differently under different circumstances.

Under former Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent, one of the great constitutional experts of this country, the federal government became involved with the national housing program. But it was the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) which appreciated the problems relating to housing. In one year it made available $700 million to be spent on houses in order that Canadians could live in dignity with their families in decent houses. This crisis has not just developed. It was in existence during the last election. One of the great mistakes made in elections is that governments continue to be elected on slogans like, "The New Deal", "The New Frontier," "60 Days of Decision" and "The Just Society."

• (4:40 p.m.)

An hon. Member: And "Follow John."

Mr. Woolliams: He was good to follow, and talking about slogans I remember another one, "King or chaos". When we got him we got both. I concur in what other hon. members have said that housing is a national responsibility and that the government is not living up to that responsibility. So far as I am concerned, it would take very little effort on the part of any government to negotiate and consult with the provinces and the cities.

Just a few moments ago I received a telegram from the city of Calgary which reads:

Calgary was one of the few cities in Canada to suggest a research program for housing. We were also one of the few cities prepared to invest civic employee pension funds in housing.

All they want is federal direction.

We urgently request that Calgary be considered as the western site for a housing research project. We have the builders, the land, a complete planning department, and a proposal ready once we receive federal support.

So, the city of Calgary says to the government, "We have all the facilities. We have the land and the builders. All we want is direction and a policy from the government."

As indicated in recent newspaper articles cabinet approval to finance Ottawa city scheme with 6⅞ mortgage money has been granted. Housing matters are urgent in Calgary as people are moving in from all over Canada compounding our problem. With uncertainty magnified with departure of Mr. Hellyer we feel immediate federal decision imperative if homes are to be built this year.

That telegram is signed by two men: Alderman Eric Musgrave and Alderman Adrian Berry. I might say that in the election prior to the last one Alderman Berry was the Liberal candidate in the riding won by the former Minister of National Defence from Calgary Centre (Mr. Harkness). Now, he says, like the Minister of Transport, that the government is not measuring up to its responsibility.

I differ with some other speakers in this debate. I say that during the election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised nothing and, believe me, when you examine what has occurred since he became Prime Minister he has delivered that program far faster than my expectations. Now, the only thing he says he will do is introduce legislation that will extend housing mortgage payments from 30 years to 40 years. What will that mean? Let us take the example of a $10,000 mortgage. What will that mean in this present period of inflation?

Here, I read from an article to which I have referred previsously, by Richard H. Steacy in the Toronto Star, who breaks down the payments for a $10,000 mortgage;

A startling feature about the chart is the difference in monthly payments of a 40 year mortgage and a 30 year mortgage, which is a cool ten years. It amounts to $2.94 a month.

That is no solution. What we need is a good housing program. The cities have the land. The provinces can work with the cities. All we need is for the federal government to accept its responsibility and negotiate at the provincial and the city level, through the provinces, and get on with the job. Because the government would not move, the Minister of Transport resigned.

There is not much more I can say in reference to housing. During the election campaign the great excuse of the government was that money was hard to come by. Why doesn't the government use its initiative? The United States has just brought in a new national act under which municipalities can borrow money at reasonable rates of interest. Under that plan, individuals can place their money in the national fund, up to a ceiling of $20,000, and the interest paid to them is tax free. This means that municipalities in the United States can borrow money at 5 per cent.

After this debate has concluded, surely the government should put a minister in charge of implementing some of the recommendations made by the former minister. Surely, it should get on with the job. It does not take words from me to show that there is a crisis. It exists in every city across our land. To solve it would require a little initiative, a little ambition, a little foresightedness and, above all, a little responsibility. Let us not again hear from the Prime Minister that the constitution is blocking housing programs. That is utter nonsense. If there are any factors in reference to housing that fall within the jurisdiction of the provinces they can be met through negotiation. Because it is a national crisis the responsibility rests squarely on the shoulders of the federal government.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the crucial issue in this debate is the whole future scope of federal government in Canada. The question is, are we going to treat the Canadian constitution as a means of preventing federal action in the field of vital national social problems affecting all Canadians?

Housing is vitally important, but it is only one of the national problems of concern in this debate. During the election the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) sought widespread support for himself and his party by appearing to be a strong federalist. He spoke of a strong Canada, and many people thought he means a Canada whose federal government would in fact use strong initiatives to deal with the pressing problems of the Canadian people.

The Prime Minister's election campaign was carefully managed, through vagueness and the exploitation of a certain charisma, to conceal the true views and intentions of the Prime Minister. A certain verbal bellicosity vis-a-vis the Prime Minister of Quebec was used to create an illusion that the Prime Minister was a champion of a strong federal government. It is this false view of the Prime Minister's basic stand that has been shot down in flames by his closest colleague, the Minister of Transport.

The Minister of Transport has made it abundantly clear in his letters and interviews that the Prime Mnister's interpretation of the present constitution is that the federal government should stay out of using federal powers to deal with issues such as housing, pollution, inflation and urban development. I am not making this up. These are the words of the Minister of Transport, formerly the deputy prime minister. It really is a matter of interpretation.

The Prime Minister adopts a view that is quite a responsible view and held currently by a number of people, particularly people within his own province. This view is that the use of its spending power by the federal government to deal with national needs is an intrusion upon provincial rights. I say to the Prime Minister that it is not as clear as all that. There is another constitutional view, and I think a better one, and that is that the federal government under its powers of taxation and spending has the power to be a strong and purposeful government. I think it has the legal right to use those powers to deal with those problems, and I think it should use those powers in co-operation with the provincial and local governments, but with a firm federal initiative in the field.

The Prime Minister, to do him justice, has made it clear, if one studies his writings, his statements and what he said to the students in London at the time of the Commonwealth conference and repeated I think in Calgary, that he accepts an interpretation of the constitution which gives to the provinces the major, if not the sole, power in such fields as housing. Other have mentioned that we take issue with this view, as I think does the Minister of Transport. The Prime Minister's view is that of a cautious and laissez-faire government which cannot act firmly in the interests of Canadians. As I said before, there is a view held by people in some parts of Canada that the federal government should not deal even with the vital social need of people to have shelter. If such a view should be held in one province, perhaps some constitutional or governmental arrangement could be made to give that part of Canada where the view is held the right to opt out of activity in this field at the federal level.

I suggest, however, it is totally unacceptable that the Prime Minister should impose on us his own view, although it is shared by some others, of the constitution that effective action in those parts of the country which believe as we do should be vetoed and prevented by this narrow view of the constitutional position.

I should like to turn directly to the question of housing. I could not but help notice that the Prime Minister placed a relatively low priority on the matter of housing. I say that we in this party, especially those of us who happen to come from urban centres, place a very high priority on the question of housing. Our view is not based on comforting statistics about housing, and rates of starts. Our view is based upon a daily acquaintance with the facts.

I wish to say to the Prime Minister there are many people in this country who are desperately anxious because of this crisis. I want to say to him that all the good effort of which he spoke could only provide—and this is admitted to be so in the task force report—housing for people with incomes of $8,000 a year. The vast majority of Canadians do not have an income at that level. We have urged this government to do something for those people who urgently need housing. This is an area which requires direct government action. We are suffering today from 30 years of free enterprise laissez-faire in respect of this basic problem of our people. I admit that it will not be overcome in a little while, but it will never be overcome until the federal government assumes its full responsibility in this matter.

Every country of the world which has tried to deal with this matter has found it necessary to adopt a method for establishing public housing. We have failed miserably in this field. I take issue with the task force report suggestion that this is not necessary. As my colleague the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) pointed out, in the metropolitan area of Toronto alone there are 16,000 families on the waiting list for public housing. I have set up a small office in my riding and day by day, week by week, people come in who are desperately in need of housing. They are urgently looking for assistance in getting their names placed on the list for public housing. These people include widows, deserted wives, people with families and older people. These people are harassed by escalating rents. We do not need any statistics to prove this situation because we see it day by day in our experiences if we get down and meet the people whom we are supposed to represent.

Certainly, there is no need for the complacency which was contained in the speech the Prime Minister made today. I should like to deal with another aspect of housing which I think all too often is neglected, certainly in an urban area such as I represent. I say that the cities of this country are faced with the likelihood of growing decay unless federal action is taken in respect of the rehabilitation and the care of the existing stock of housing. The whole burden of taxation has a crushing effect in this field. Areas like my own—a very excellent place to live with very many fine people—are threatened with growing decay because of the burden of taxation and the burden of increasing costs which means that the people are not in a position to maintain their own stock of housing. There is urgent need for initiative in this field.

I noticed only a little while ago that a gentleman by the name of George Cook, director of housing standards for the city of Toronto, told a national gathering of urban renewal officials that nothing effective would be done to achieve any improvement in housing standards until the federal government recognized the need to provide special loans and grants. In the Prime Minister's speech today we did not hear a single word about public housing and the urgent need for assistance in maintaining the stock of housing we have at the present time.

I wish to commend the Minister of Transport for his action. It is in accord with a sound principle which too often is neglected; that is the principle that if you differ from the policy of your government it is your duty to resign. I wish others had had the guts to resign when such a situation presented itself. As I have said, this debate is of vital importance to the future of Canadians. The desperate housing crisis should have a top priority in the consideration of the government. Not only does parliament hang on this, but also the whole concept of government in Canada.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, you know I feel like shedding a tear on this momentous occasion because over the months here I had developed a rapport and certain dialogue with the Minister of Transport in charge of housing. I stand here today wondering what I am going to do in the future. I thought we almost had the answers to an urban renewal program. I was eagerly anticipating the guidelines for public housing which C.M.H.C. would accept and now I find my minister is gone. The Prime Minister delivered, in his usual inimitable and flowery way, a speech in which he said how great things are in respect of housing in Canada. At that time I scratched my head, because if things are so great why did the Minister of Transport in charge of housing resign. It is amazing to watch the Prime Minister throw a red herring across to the opposition.

The leader of the New Democratic party stood up this afternoon and with his usual brilliance said: I can see through this whole thing; we are dealing with housing but at the same time there is an issue here we must be concerned about this afternoon, and that is the constitutional aspect. There can be no doubt about that. The Prime Minister today gave a series of excuses which can only be described as flim-flam. The issue is not only government housing policy or the lack of it; it is much more significant. The issue is that, coupled with the resignation of the Minister of Transport and whether or not he is right.

For the benefit of those who are not up to date and have not read today's Ottawa Journal, let me indicate that it suggests the Minister of Transport will continue to fight the kind of federalism the Prime Minister has expounded today. That becomes very important to hon. members sitting on the other side of the house.

An hon. Member: Don't believe that.

Mr. Alexander: We have to believe everything we read in the newspapers nowadays because they are getting closer to home so far as the Liberals are concerned.

If the Prime Minister has adopted a rigid, inflexible, constitutional attitude which prevents the government from giving leadership in housing, pollution and other urban problems including slum clearance it seems to me, with all due respect, that this government should not be sitting here. The Prime Minister does not answer the issue by citing figures as to the number of housing starts. He knows that most of the houses he talked about today are out of the reach of the vast majority of Canadian people. The situation is as simple as that, and that is all there is to it. Once again he has dragged in a red herring. Over 90 per cent of the people have been placed in such a position as a result of inflation that they cannot afford the houses to which the Prime Minister has referred.

The minister's resignation came as a dash of cold water to a government lost in a dreamland of abstract speculation. It pricked the balloon of the just society and the theory of participatory democracy. I should like to know what kind of participation the minister had. When I asked him questions in the house it is no wonder that he, even with his knowledge, could not give the answers. He could not get the answers from his cabinet colleagues. They would not allow him to answer. I now feel sorry for the Minister without Portfolio from Winnipeg (Mr. Richardson).

An hon. Member: He hasn't got any housing problems.

Mr. Alexander: I am told that he is one of the more fortunate ones in this house. The Minister of Transport was concerned about the nuts and bolts problems, in other words, the nitty-gritty problems of living, the bread and butter issues. These problems, which affect the majority of Canadians, are: prosperity eroded by confiscatory taxation and runaway inflation, the neglect of the cities and their progressive deterioration, the refusal to consider the by-products of industrial growth—pollution of air and water. These problems are the nuts and the bolts of the matter and are what the Minister of Transport talked about.

Not only has the government failed to deal with these problems but it has failed to recognize their importance. I think the Canadian people could stand up today without hesitation or reservation and say, not only is this government arrogant but it is callous; with the greatest respect, this government is indifferent to the growing problems of urbanization. The minister adopted the unusual course of personally taking charge of the task force as a dramatic demonstration of the importance of the problem. The government failed to back him up.

I was looking at television the other day and I heard the Prime Minister state that the Minister of Transport was one of his best ministers, a man who knows all about these problems. Yet he is gone. Who else over there knows anything about these problems? I do not know what is going to happen now.

It is stated on page 1 of the task force report:

> In short, if there was not an urban "crisis", there most certainly was a serious urban problem. People were conscious of it as they were conscious that existing efforts by their governments, most of which seemed as much a reaction to circumstances as an attempt to direct them, were inadequate to meet it. The time had come for a hard, new look at housing and urban development in Canada.

Let me now turn to page 9 of the task force report where there is a statement which becomes extremely significant when one remembers that Ontario alone, as stated by the Economic Council of Canada, will have a population of some ten million people by 1970. The task force report states:

> The first and major impression of the task force —and one on which abundant satistical data exists— is that Canada is increasingly and rapidly becoming an urban nation. The statisticians say that seven out of every ten Canadians now live in urban areas and that more than eight out of ten will do so by 1980, most of them in 29 major urban centres across the country. If the statistics are impressive in themselves, even more so is the physical effect which this massive migration, equal in scope to the first settlement and development of Canada, has had and is having on the national landscape.

In other words, we are on the verge of a crisis greater than any we have experienced so far. This is significant when we realize that the Minister of Transport has indicated to his cabinet colleagues that he has some of the answers. He took it upon himself to go across the nation, under the direction of the government, to find out what are the problems. He has now provided some of the answers. But what was his response? I cannot answer that. The minister is the only one who knows the answer.

No Prime Minister, after a short period of one year in office, has received such a resounding vote of non-confidence as that delivered by the former Minister of Transport in his press conference, and he did a magnificent job. The indictment that the government has shunned the hard problems of inflation, lack of housing, high taxes, urban rot, pollution and a host of others, is unanswerable. It was a picture of a government engaged in creating handmade, headline-catching issues while sheering away from the things which affect the greatest number of Canadians in the most serious way.

It was a member of the N.D.P. who indicated, in so many words—and I have said this before and will continue to say it—that if we look across the border to the United States we will find that if we continue to ignore the grievances which result from neglect of many problems including the lack of housing, then because of urban expansion we will be in trouble. It is amazing to me that this government continues to hang on to expressions like constitutional reform—certainly that is important—and homosexuality. I suppose that is important as well. The government must remember that there are nitty-gritty issues that must also be answered. All the Prime Minister can say is that the government is doing its best, but look at all the money we are spending. Nothing could better illustrate the truth of the former minister's charges than that reply.

One of the former ministers most telling statements, and one with which most people will agree, was that there was more concealed than there was revealed in the present NATO policy. This was reported by Peter Stursberg on television last night. I wonder what is being concealed in respect of the minister's resignation. When we consider that this is a statement made by a former defence minister, the architect of unification, the virtual creator of the mobile brigade now serving in Europe, it is a very serious situation indeed. Defence policy is a vital and continuing issue and it will continue to be so. Since the recent statements of the Prime Minister constituted a virtual repudiation of the policies of which the former minister was a convinced advocate, his concern is understandable.

It may be said of the present member for Toronto Trinity, as it was said of Charles I, that nothing so became his ministerial career as the leaving of it. We are told by some who attended his press conference and had the privilege of hearing his last words, as it were, that his department was dignified, even condescending, as he proceeded to pull the rug out from under the Prime Minister and his former colleagues. In other words, to put it in the language of the street, with which I am quite familiar, he shafted the government. There was much more in his resignation than a simple difference over housing; let that be understood. That is what this motion is all about. This matter is being dealt with today because of his resigning, and I cannot understand why the Prime Minister should say we cannot talk about constitutional matters.

I think the Minister of Transport in his resignation wanted not only the government and the house but the whole country to know that things ain't so hot on the other side of the chamber. It is as simple as that. Certainly the Minister of Transport was disturbed about the government's failure to end the housing crisis in this country. In that respect the minister is not alone; we stand behind him. But he placed that failure on a ground that had not heretofore been placed before the Canadian people, the ground of constitutional difference. I should like to quote what the minister said, because it's beautiful, as they say:

I cannot personally accept a theory of federalism which, however attractive in principle, cannot meet the needs of the Canadian people.

The constitution is supposed to meet the needs of our people. According to the Prime Minister, the way it stands now he cannot, by any means, with the co-operation of the provinces and going down to the municipalities, solve the many pressing problems in this regard because, as he says, the constitution prevents him from so doing. The minister underlined that between himself and the Prime Minister there is a great gulf on the constitutional question, the very structure of the federal system. This is why I will not accept the Prime Minister's red herring when he says: You are not talking about housing; you are talking about the constitution. We have to talk about it today because the Minister of Transport says we have to talk about it. The Minister of Transport does not sit on this side of the house; he sits over there and is one who knows what the problem is.

Almost on the eve of a federal-provincial constitutional conference the Minister of Transport, in charge of housing, the No. 2 man in the cabinet, says that he has no confidence in the Prime Minister's constitutional position. According to the minister, it is a position which prevents the Prime Minister and his government from taking action on housing, pollution, urban development and a number of equally important and urgent issues. Poor Hamilton and its hopes for urban renewal! Poor Vancouver and Toronto! What other cities are involved?

Mr. McGrath: St. John's.

Mr. Alexander: St. John's, and Calgary. I could go on naming the cities involved in this problem; there are some 300 of them. These are issues partly or totally within provincial jurisdiction. If it is a fact that the Prime Minister, in the inner sanctum of cabinet, has taken the stand that the government is prevented from dealing with these matters, this is something the people of Canada are entitled to know. Will this continue to be his stand? Is this to be the attitude of the Prime Minister, when we are told that about 80 per cent of our people will be living in urban areas? These are the people who need help, leadership and direction in respect of these problems. Will it always be the stand of the Prime Minister that because of the constitution these people cannot be helped by the federal government? If so, let the Prime Minister tell them, because the people want to know today.

This is something that parliament is entitled to know. We must have answers today, if possible, but next week for sure. We know there has been little action to end the housing log-jam. We know that next to nothing has been done in the field of urban rehabilitation and public housing. We know that not enough houses are being built, and those that are being built are out of the reach of low income families. We know that speculation is rife and has taken over the field of land assembly; it is one of the major factors of inflation.

The minister had some of the answers to these problems but they were ignored. The Prime Minister has taken the stand that pollution, housing, urban renewal and similar matters are beyond his purview. How can he justify a hands-off attitude at this time? How, in heaven's name, can he take such a stand?

An hon. Member: He says there is no problem.

Mr. Alexander: That is what he said, there are no problems. I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). He said the Prime Minister made no promises, and he has kept his promise. I say that he made no promises and has done less, but it comes out to the same thing. I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is very important that we have a feeling of responsibility in this debate.

I am concerned about unity. I listen to the Prime Minister when he places great stress upon the official languages bill and says it will unite the country. I disagree; I think unifying factors are a full belly and a good house. They are much more important than being able to speak two or three languages; there can be no mistake about that.

I close with these few remarks, Mr. Speaker. When we talk about unity we are talking about making Canada a country in which Canadians will be happy and content to live. There can be no doubt that the constitutional question is important in this regard. But there is also no doubt in the world that a government which does nothing about urban problems will create new sources of disunity. When I think of the four million people that the Economic Council of Canada says are on the bottom of the economic ladder—I have said this on many occasions—I know they are a voice to be reckoned with. Therefore I tell the government to take heed. Canadians are already angry and unhappy about the failure of the federal government to act on housing. If they come to believe, as the deputy prime minister of Canada has come to believe, that the government has virtually no intention to act at all on urban problems, the government will be in trouble in our cities.

I say to the government: You cannot ignore the problems of the cities and, particularly, you cannot ignore the problems of the millions of low income Canadians who need help to find housing, jobs, contentment, peace and happiness, for which they are looking to the government for leadership and direction.

• (5:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, it is for me a pleasure to make some remarks on the problem of housing. That matter closely affects us and every one, in my opinion, should make a point to find solutions to it.

That problem may be overcome. It is essentially financial and may be solved rather easily for, in our beautiful Canada, there are building materials, engineers and land available to build houses. Unemployed people only want to get work. Houses could be built and, at the present time, the means for doing so are not adequate.

Any individual, any human being, any head of a family wants to have his own home. The first concern of the human being is a decent home and, as the one who spoke before me said, something to eat. That is what every Canadian wants, and Canada could provide that to the people, because it has the means to do it.

Canada has everything necessary to build houses. We build homes with the money our financiers are willing to make available to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and other agencies that lend it at exorbitant rates, and this is harmful to human development. Many people, because of the rate of 10 per cent, do not even consider building a house. Those who can efford it—this has been told over and over again, statistics have been given in this regard—are those who earn an income of at least $10,000 per year. A great number of people in Canada do not earn $5,000, or even $3,000 at the present time. Therefore, they cannot afford to build a house.

As to the governments, they do not see any other solution than building sky-scrapers, multiple dwelling houses, which will be rented at the moderate rate, according to them, of $150 or $200 per month.

But a labourer who does not earn $3,000 or $5,000 a year is unable to pay this kind of rent. Yet, it is suggested they are moderately priced dwellings. They are built because it is the only way available to the lenders to make 10 per cent profit.

The housing crisis is due to the harmful way this system operates and the minister who resigned became aware of it. As former Minister of National Defence, he did not have any difficulty in financing his department. He had his own budget and the money was always available for the purchase of guns and tanks, airplanes and so on.

However, he was given the responsibility for the Department of Transport which includes housing.

The minister, with all his good intentions, toured Canada. He then realized what were the people's needs. He found that people were terribly destitute. He requested that a report be prepared. He came to the house with that report in his hands. He asked the government to reduce the 11 per cent tax on building materials. He even asked that it be abolished. He demanded that the interest rates be reduced.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) took the floor and said: We are unable to reduce both the tax and the interest rates. Such items must help the capitalists above all.

Capitalists must make excessive profits and then all kinds of expedients are resorted to in order to exempt them from taxes. They are visibly getting more numerous. In fact, the present system is ideal for high finance to make billions at the people's expense.

At the present time, 95 per cent of the houses already built are subject to the capitalists' interest rates. Very few are free from excessive mortgages and it still intended to take advantage of the human being.

Mr. Speaker, the helplessness of the government which faithfully obeys finance makes its action inadequate in the housing field. It is not by constantly enriching the wealthy, by enlarging the gap between the poor and the rich and preventing the people from being properly lodged—even if there are some dwellings—that the human being may recover his strength. We know that this is where the family blossoms out and where are moulded heads of families who can work who will become the builders of the country. But if we have no houses to lodge them, we will not even have builders for the country but only a group of slaves or downcast Canadians.

The present policy of the government is to lend money at 10 per cent interest and to extend the repayment period. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation presently allows 30 years to repay a house and the intention is to extend the period to 40 years.

I believe it was the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste who earlier gave the example of a $20,000 house that costs $84,000 at the end of the 30 years, at 9⅜ per cent. This interest rate equals more than 10 per cent with the administration and contract costs.

This does not make sense and I ask hon. members, both Liberals and Conservatives, to look at the right side of things. I urge them to have a little humanity and to put pressure on the Prime Minister and his cabinet to get a reduction of the excessive interest rates which exploit people to the limit, since there is nothing more noble, dear and comforting for a family than to own their home.

However, since most citizens cannot have their own home, we see people that are revolted, discouraged, ready for anything, willing to tear everything apart, to blow everything up, because they are disillusioned with society, because they think they are a useless burden, in a word because they are depressed and feel rejected by society.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote from a letter to the editor of Le Droit published in the December 4, 1968 issue:

> Mr. Trudeau, all your time is spent promoting productivity, profits, business opportunities, interests and the capital surpluses of the wealthy, the learned and the powerful in Canada, either for themselves or for their companies.
> The gap increases between the rich whose income gets higher and higher, and the poor who pay more and more taxes to cover bigger interests on the public debts.

• (5:30 p.m.)

> It is obvious that, in this way, national imbalance goes from bad to worse. That is what must be changed, in order to establish a just society, to ensure a united Canada.
> Mr. Trudeau, have you forgotten or have you never known that companies and individuals capitalized $28 billion, on a production of $68 billion in 1968, after paying their living expenses and all their taxes? Have you forgotten or have you never known that, during the same period, our government had an annual operating deficit, and that many families live from day to day without the necessities of life, damning governments, companies and society?
> Mr. Trudeau have you never thought or never known that it would be easy to make some changes, not in the institutions, not in the structures, not in the systems, not in the banks, not in the companies but in the leadership given by the Prime Minister, by the 29 ministers and by the 264 members of parliament—

If citizens write such articles, it is because they have their eyes open and know who exploits the people and why the people cannot build themselves a house.

Under the present inadequate economic system, 75 per cent of our Canadians have no house and will never be able to have any, because if they build themselves a house they will commit themselves until the next generation to pay for it and that house will still be mortgaged when it is passed on to the next generation.

Mr. Speaker, let me quote a few more facts to show that the profits go to the eight chartered banks of Canada which had assets of $31 billion in 1967 and $35 billion in 1968. Their assets increased by $4 billion or so within one year after they had further capitalized $28 billion which they did not declare, and from which they deducted excessively high depreciations, not to mention capital surpluses which are not taxable.

These figures, Mr. Speaker, are ample proof of the exorbitant profits made by our banking institutions. Are there institutions that have made a net profit of $5 billion and declared it to the tax controller?

I know manufacturers who manage their industry by dint of billions of dollars, since they can no longer make a 2 or 3 per cent profit on their industry. They can continue their operations and achieve a turnover of $20 billion and make a net profit of about $1 or $1.5 million. Likewise, the chartered banks which exploit the people make a $5 billion profit, apart from the $28 billion which they have not declared.

Mr. Speaker, before concluding my remarks, I would like to ask again the government to come to the help of those who have such an urgent need of housing, because we know that everybody wants to own a house. Several families have to move early in May and they are unable to find accommodation. Some people are very concerned about it. They have been thrown out on the street for some reason and they must vacate their flat on May 15 with their possessions.

I ask the government to look around, to show a little compassion for those people who are not asking for charity, for they want to work and build. Unfortunately, they are incapable of doing so because they are refused the means to build a house, a home of their own. They are refused all that, but it will not always be so.

I feel that unless we change our policy, our way of acting, some awful calamity will strike us. We will know the revolutions other countries have witnessed—it is closer than we think—because the number of citizens who have no roof is greater than we would believe.

A large number of absolutely destitute human beings have had enough; someone will have to pay the piper before long.

[English]

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the moment of truth has arrived.

An hon. Member: Has it?

Mr. Gilbert: The Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) has told us that his policies with regard to urban development, housing and the constitution were not acceptable to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who holds a narrow theory of federalism.

This afternoon we heard the Prime Minister berate the leader of my party for failing to go into the facts concerning the housing crisis, and then explain his narrow theory of federalism which in essence means a weak federal government and strong provincial governments. The right hon. gentleman shrugged his shoulders and said in effect: I represent Mount Royal which is a well to do area and we have no housing problem there. It is obvious from his background that the Prime Minister never encountered a housing problem himself. He has never found difficulty in paying a mortgage with an interest rate of 9 or 10 per cent. He has never found difficulty meeting a high rent. He has the Bugaboo lodge philosophy of living well and spending high. He has no conception of what the average man in Canada today is suffering because of the housing crisis.

I am sure the people across Canada will accept the assessment of the Minister of Transport in charge of housing that there is a housing crisis and that the federal government should take the lead in dealing with pollution, housing and urban development. I was shocked to hear the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) say in substance that this was really a provincial matter and that the Minister of Transport has resigned because the Prime Minister has said the federal government has no responsibility for leadership in this important field. I was also shocked that other Liberal members from Metropolitan Toronto did not get up and tell the house that in Ontario there is a waiting list of 16,000 for public housing, or that we have high rents and high interest rates. For the last two years the Toronto newspapers have been exposing this situation to people across the country. Yet we find the Prime Minister, the dilettante of our society, coming forward with a philosophy of stand pat, no leadership, no policy on housing development and little or no action.

It is my intention to persuade the members of this house that there is a housing crisis in Canada. When the Economic Council of Canada said 200,000 homes are now needed to take care of the housing requirement I was prepared to accept that estimate. When I review the federal housing record and find that in 1965 165,000 homes were built, in 1966, 134,000, in 1967, 164,000 and in 1968, 196,000, simple arithmetic tells me there is a tremendous shortfall in housing across Canada today. According to the task force report on housing there are 5,700,000 families and non-family users who need housing units in Canada while there are only 5,500,000 available housing units. Simple arithmetic indicates that there is a shortfall of 200,000 in our housing stock. When I read further that 500,000 homes are in substandard condition, lacking toilet facilities and the ordinary amenities, the need for strong federal leadership is underlined. When I learn there are 400,000 people sharing accommodation and 100,000 waiting on lists across the country for public housing, and when I read that one Canadian in every five pays 70 per cent or more of his income for food, clothing and shelter, as reported by the Economic Council in its fifth annual report, I am more than satisfied that there is a housing crisis in Canada today.

I am deeply shocked that the Prime Minister and members of the government should take their present attitude with regard to such a serious question. The government has done very little over the years to face up to the housing shortage. Something was done by a former minister of labour, the Hon. John R. Nicholson, who arranged a symposium across the country. He did not reveal the results. They were probably too shocking. When the present government was elected, the Minister of Transport assumed the portfolio of housing. He wanted to do something about this matter. He set up a task force on housing to determine the problems and find the solutions.

We in this party have said that the task force report was inadequate and fell far short of dealing with the problem of housing today. The great merit of the task force report on housing is that it underlines the housing crisis in Canada and brings to light important questions on housing for nation-wide debate, such questions as the philosophy of housing, public and private financing of housing, public ownership and development of land, public housing and home ownership, the need for regional forms of government and the multitude of related problems dealing with these areas. This is the merit the housing task force report has shown.

The task force under the guidance of the Minister of Transport was so determined that the housing needs of Canada and the financing arrangements should be left to the private sector that it missed many of the serious aspects of the problem. The task force was less bold in its order of priorities. It was intent with making home ownership more accessible to the middle income groups and failed to face up to the magnitude and urgency of the housing needs of the low income group. This is why there is nothing in the report for one million Canadian families with incomes below $5,500. This is why the task force recommended a halt on public housing projects until a study could be made of the psychological, moral and economic aspects of public housing. They were baffled by the problem of why the housing needs of the low income groups could not be met through the private market, and instead of solving this problem they used public housing as the whipping boy for the failure of the private market.

The criticism that has flowed from this report, more especially from the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities and such organizations as the Canadian Welfare Council, has exposed the main weakness of the report and imposed on the Minister of Transport, in charge of housing, the responsibility for the failure of the report in this urgent area. The minister became sensitive to the problem and made a token attempt by announcing to the house a few days ago an experimental public housing project in Ottawa by building 518 low rental and condominium housing units. This was tantamount to giving a naked man a handkerchief to clothe himself.

The record of this government on public housing is the most shameful of all the countries in the western democracies. Since 1951 the government has built approximately 40,000 public housing units or less than 1 per cent of the total housing stock in Canada. In England the public housing stock is 30 per cent, in Sweden 25 per cent, and even in the United States it ranges between 1 and 2 per cent with a massive public housing building program having been recently undertaken.

In 1968, Mr. Speaker, the amount invested by the federal government in public housing was approximately $116 million, representing 10,000 public housing units. The estimates for 1969 do not show any substantial increase in government spending in this sector. This exposure of government intention indicates its minimal concern for the most serious sector in the housing crisis today.

The minimum target in solving the low income housing problem should be between 20,000 and 30,000 public housing units a year, requiring an investment of approximately $300 million annually. If we accept the task force target of one million dwelling units over the next five years and the requirement of $20 billion for financing purposes and the necessity of $3.5 billion in public funds or an average of $700 million annually, the government must announce a program related to the projected requirements of the different income groups.

The government should set forth the amount of moneys to be allocated to (1), direct loans to the private sector; (2) public land assembly and servicing; (3) limited dividend and non-profit housing projects; (4) public housing and co-operative housing and urban renewal; (5) the purchase of existing properties and income supplements. This information would give an indication of the government's plan with regard to the number of units, the types of units and the financing requirements to achieve these results. The Minister of Transport has not done this. He has not indicated the breakdown of the $700 million minimum requirement and is depending on the private builders to exercise their social conscience in this critical area.

The minister does this in the light of his statement before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs dealing with the housing estimates when, on March 18, he said:

> But although we are building housing as never before in our history, there are serious inadequacies and imbalances in our production. Last year's exceptional level of starts was weighted very heavily in favour of apartments. No one denies the continuing need for rental accommodation in multiple high-rise buildings. But there must be a better balance between rental and ownership, and between high-rise, single family and row housing so that Canadians can have a proper selection and choice according to their needs and tastes.

He stated the problem, Mr. Speaker, and then did nothing to indicate a solution. The task force report indicated that the financing of homes in recent years has been on the basis of 42 per cent institutional financing, 40 per cent by direct cash financing and private financing, and 18 per cent by government financing. The record clearly proves that the financial institutions in recent years have not ensured a steady flow of financing and have directed their money into shopping centres, luxury apartments, office buildings and commercial projects which yield a high return on their investment. They have not indicated any real social responsibility for the housing needs of the middle and lower income groups in Canada. In fact last August, Mr. Speaker, in the face of another poor housing record, the Minister of Transport called to Ottawa representatives of the insurance and banking institutions of Canada and asked for financial help. There was no response. In September the minister had to allocate $170 million of public moneys for direct loans for single family units and condominiums.

In the light of this experience the minister indicates an unearned trust and confidence in the financial institutions by stating, "I have contacted the financial institutions and from initial response, it appears an adequate supply of financing will be available to support an expansion in home-building activity". Greater love has no man for private enterprise than he who places his trust and confidence in institutions with past records such as they have.

In the house the Prime Minister said it was not the intention of the government to set up a separate ministry of housing and urban development. In the standing committee in reply to a question by myself the Minister of Transport stated he did not consider it one of the most important recommendations in the task force report. In the house the Minister of Finance stated that he would not lift the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. In the standing committee he stated that no action would be taken by the government until the government revenues had increased sufficiently over expenditures. On the matter of interest rates, which I categorically say amount to usury and are a major component in the high cost of homes, the minister said he thought it wise to free the N.H.A. fixed interest rate which at present stands at 9⅜ per cent. He said that the proper rate was between 1¾ and 2½ points above the average long-term rate affecting government of Canada bonds. Clearly, on that reasoning he is content to leave mortgage rates at between 8½ and 9 per cent.

I need not remind hon. members that on a mortgage of $18,000 at 8¾ per cent amortized over 25 years the mortgagor will pay almost $50,000. I am shocked at the statement by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to the effect that beginning on April 23 there will be a new mortgage arrangement under which N.H.A. lenders will be able to write mortgages having an initial minimum term of five years, although payments are to be based on an amortization period of at least 25 years. It is thought that this will give greater flexibility to borrowers and lenders. Can you not see the picture, Mr. Speaker? At the end of five years the mortgagor will have to renew his mortgage. He will be in a very weak position in bargaining with financial institutions over new mortgage rates. Borrowers will find that banks, insurance companies and the other lending institutions of this country get together and agree on the rates they will charge on mortgage loans. Not being able to bargain, the borrower will be forced to accept high interest rates imposed by our financial institutions.

Since the minister refused to set out in clear terms the government's program—I am referring to the Minister of Transport, of course—and since he had certain well known ideas concerning institutional financing, sales tax, interest rates and mortgage terms, the only area left for him to deal with was the area of land. I think he will be the first to admit that the cost of land is a major component in the high cost of homes. The idea of making money available to municipalities and provinces so that they may buy large tracts of land to be serviced and, hopefully, bring down the price of homes is laudable. Yet I heard the minister say in the standing committee that he was not interested in implementing a capital gains tax. He suggested that the problem of land costs would be taken care of by the new land banks which were to be established. Hearing him speak made me realize that he knew little about land costs and little about what was going on. Certainly he had no solutions.

Since the minister has no philosophy in the field of housing the logical question to ask is, what would we in the New Democratic party do to solve current problems? Briefly, our philosophy is that every Canadian, as a basic human right, is entitled to adequate housing at a reasonable cost. That is why we demand that the federal government show leadership in the field of housing and urban development. We would set up a separate ministry of housing and urban development. We would determine this country's housing needs, coordinate programs with provinces and cooperate with provinces and municipalities in determining this country's housing needs. Also, we would determine this country's financial requirements in the field of housing and establish priorities for a building program.

Mr. Caouette: At what rates of interest?

Mr. Gilbert: We would set a target of 250,000 homes to be built, 50,000 of them to be public housing units. We would also have the proper mix between public and co-operative housing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, may I thank hon. members for their courtesy. I was speaking of our target of building 250,000 houses to take care of the shortfall in housing and that we would have the proper mix of public and co-operative housing. Our target would be to have 50,000 public housing units. Altogether we would wish 60 per cent of our housing to be private, 25 per cent to be public and 15 per cent to be co-operative. Also, we would ensure a steady flow of mortgage moneys to the housing field, either by persuading financial institutions to lend or, if necessary, by legislation.

We would set up a crown building corporation specializing in public and senior citizens' housing. By having close liaison with provincial housing corporations and municipalities we would ensure that the latest building techniques are used and that the benefits of research programs are fully felt. We would inject massive amounts of public money, up to $1.5 billion, into programs for the acquisition of land banks. Under such a program federal, provincial and municipal governments could acquire serviced land. Under that program we would also finance public housing, co-operative housing, various types of home improvements and urban renewal.

If necessary we would supplement rents and subsidize interest rates until those rates have fallen back to their proper levels. The hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) wondered what interest rates would apply to moneys lent. We would fix interest rates at 6 per cent, and the federal government would pay a subsidy of half of any amount paid on interest rates above 6 per cent. We would retain the 11 per cent sales tax on homes costing more than $25,000. On homes costing less than $25,000 we would use a tax credit in order to help the purchaser with the down payment on his home. We would also introduce a capital gains tax on land, to drive out land speculators. Lastly, we would set up some sort of research department to determine the type of accommodation needed in this country and to examine all social and environmental factors. Of course, we would make sure that the latest building techniques were used.

These proposals, Mr. Speaker, would be but a first step in building a Canada which puts people first and which will ensure a good life for all Canadians. This is the New Democratic party's version of a just society.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, replying to a question of mine of February 5 of this year, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) revealed that the government did not intend to accept the recommendation of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) that the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials should be removed. As the house knows, the report of the task force on housing which the minister headed recommended strongly that the 11 per cent sales tax should be abolished. That recommendation was made after the minister and the task force had visited every province and every major centre of Canada. Having seen existing conditions in the field of housing, the minister felt that the 11 per cent sales tax ought to be abolished, thereby making houses available for many who otherwise would be unable to buy them. I believe the Leader of the N.D.P. pointed out that the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials pushes the price of the average house up by about $500. In addition to the 11 per cent federal sales tax, there is a provincial tax on building materials. In Newfoundland this is 7 per cent. On top of that, there is a mortgage insurance fee administered by C.M.H.C. which again increases the cost of a house by 2 per cent of the amount being borrowed. In the case of a person borrowing $18,000, this means he pays a $360 mortgage insurance fee.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Hon. members may recall that during the late show on February 6, I pointed out that the Minister of Transport had been repudiated by his colleagues in that his recommendation for the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax had been pushed aside. I said the only honourable thing he could do was resign. He has now done the honourable thing. I regret it took him two months to do it but he has faced the facts, and I admire him for it.

The task force report recommended that the 2 per cent mortgage fee be cut in half. I believe this fund was started in 1954 and since that time has grown to $224 million. Out of 800,000 loans made only the small number of 6,000 claims have been made against this fund. Therefore, I urge the government to accept this recommendation to reduce the fee, if not eliminate it altogether.

The report also made considerable reference to public housing. There are certain sociological problems involved in public housing. I am of the opinion that the whole concept of public housing as we know it to date is wrong, in that it brings poor people together and throws them into what I believe will eventually become ghettos. There is quite a lot of public housing in my constituency, and I disagree with the method through which rents are collected and assessed.

Public housing rents for 1969 are based on incomes in 1968. If a person made $2,000 or $3,000 extra in 1968, through overtime or by engaging in extra work, his rent this year is assessed on his increased income of last year. If his normal income were $3,000 but he made $5,000 last year, his rent this year will be based on the $5,000 figure. This deprives public housing tenants of the chance to accumulate enough money to buy or build homes of their own. It destroys their initiative. They know that if they work overtime and earn more money, some 27 per cent of that extra money will go to pay rent.

The Prime Minister's optimistic comments today will do little to impress my constituents. I am thinking of the hundreds of people who tonight must see their children go to bed in substandard houses. They will get little consolation from the Prime Minister's words.

The average per capita income in Newfoundland is $1,173, compared with the maximum average of $1,988. According to computations made in 1967, 34 per cent of Newfoundland families would qualify for mortgages of only $10,000 at then prevailing interest rates. Building costs in Newfoundland in 1967 were $30.54 per square foot, as compared with the Canadian average of $12.54 per square foot. The people in the maritimes, especially in Newfoundland, have the lowest per capita incomes in the country and the highest building costs. In addition, according to a C.M.H.C. booklet that I have in my possession, they have the highest average land costs in Canada. In these circumstances, what chance does the average family man in the Atlantic provinces have of being able to own his own home?

We must admit that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has done a reasonably good job in recent years, but it is catering more to the upper middle classes and the wealthier people. To those who can occupy subsidized rental accommodation, C.M.H.C. is of no use whatever. One must remember that a man who earns anywhere from $4,000 to $6,000 is too well off to qualify for subsidized rentals. In fact, in this regard there is a ceiling on the income which a man can earn. But having got that salary of anywhere from $4,000, $6,000 or $7,000 a year, he cannot qualify for a National Housing Act mortgage. So, there he is caught in the economic squeeze. As I said before, he is too well off to be able to move into and enjoy a subsidized rental house and does not have the required income to qualify for a National Housing Act mortgage. These are the people who should be given every consideration because they and their children are just as entitled to a decent place to live as anybody else who lives in Canada.

I agree with one of the other speakers who said that the government and the Prime Minister are hiding behind the constitution in order to avoid the responsibility they have to the people of Canada, especially in the area of housing and urban renewal. We have extremely high interest rates, we have high building costs and high priced serviced land. If all these things are thrown together, then we do not have a healthy society in which there is a good opportunity for a person to acquire a house.

With regard to the urban renewal recommendations in the task force report, I can speak with some personal knowledge and experience. I have had experience in respect of urban renewal and land assembly. I would again urge the government and the new minister of housing, whoever he might be, to take a very serious look at the amount of red tape that is involved. I know that in St. John's it took something like seven or eight years to obtain approval and have a start made on a land assembly area. While I do not mean to suggest that all the delays are caused by the federal government and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, I do say that the biggest contributing factor to the delays involved is the red tape in Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I believe I can cite another case in my riding where plans have been made for an urban renewal scheme for close to a decade. So far as I can find out the plans for that scheme are still on the drawing board.

I do not think it is right to build up the hopes of the people or give them the impression there will be some grandiose scheme for urban renewal and so on, then keep them dangling for five, seven and sometimes ten years. I urge the government and the new minister to take a very serious look at this red tape and do what they can to have it eliminated. I would also ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the government to show a little kindness and compassion for the less fortunate people by no longer concentrating on the large financial interests. I ask that they think about the need of the newly married Canadians, the people in the middle and low income brackets who, without this help, understanding and compassion, can never hope to own their own homes.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it was certainly an amazing speech we heard today from the Prime Minister. This debate is being held today because the minister in charge of housing, the Deputy Prime Minister, the man who was at least formerly the number two man in the government has resigned. One would have thought—and I am sure the public expected—the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would have taken this first opportunity to explain to the people of Canada and members of parliament why the man in charge of housing resigned. What were the differences between the minister and the Prime Minister? What did the minister want to do that could not be done? Did the minister's plans with regard to improving the housing stock in Canada flounder because the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said there is not sufficient money? Or did they flounder because, as the minister said in his press conference, the Prime Minister's views on the constitution are so rigid that he could not proceed? Surely, the people of Canada were entitled to expect that the Prime Minister would come into the house and explain precisely what happened.

Instead, the Prime Minister came into this house and gave a speech which sounded as if he were reading a shopping list. He gave us a list of the tremendous things which have been done in the field of housing under this government. He ignored completely the Minister of Transport. It was as if the minister did not exist. I could not help but be reminded of the way the late dictator of the Soviet Union used to deal with his colleagues with whom he disagreed. When Stalin disagreed with somebody he became a non-person; history was immediately rewritten as if he never existed. That is what the Prime Minister did today. It was as if Mr. Hellyer had never existed, was never in this parliament and was never a minister or in charge of housing.

I suggest that the Prime Minister ought to have dealt with the issues raised by the Deputy Prime Minister or I suppose now the former deputy prime minister. A number of excellent speeches were made here this afternoon but I submit there was no more damning indictment of this government made here today by members of the opposition than was made yesterday by the minister. I should like to place on the record some of the things the minister said to which I believe the Prime Minister should have replied. I see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), the chief hatchet man of the Liberal government, is here. I hope he will take on the job as he has taken on so many other unpleasant tasks for the government. The fact that the minister is in this house, I suppose is an indication that there is no imminent settlement of the Air Canada strike. Otherwise, he would be getting his picture in the paper. I do not blame him for that.

Let me quote a few of the statements made by the Minister of Transport as reported in the Globe and Mail for Friday April 25. Mr. Hellyer said that the interpretation the Prime Minister placed on federalism was as follows:

> —a theory of ten virtually autonomous provinces held together by the strings of a fairly weak federal government.

He said further:

> I can't personally accept a theory of federalism which, however attractive it is in principle, is not viable from the standpoint of meeting the needs of a highly industrialized society and meeting the real problems created by the technological revolution.

The article continues:

Mr. Hellyer said he does not believe national unity can be achieved unless people's real problems are met. Even in Quebec, he said, people are worried about issues like property taxes and inflation although some, like the students and some civil servants, would put the constitution first.

He began his interview by saying:

I don't think the little people of my riding can wait until the constitution is reconciled before we have a more aggressive housing policy. I just don't think the kids who use the beach where I swim can wait forever to make sure it isn't polluted as it was last summer.

That is what the number two man in the government said yesterday about the government. What did the Prime Minister say in reply? Nothing. In speaking today I could not fail to comment on the complete absence—with the exception of the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan) who having been born with two silver spoons in his mouth would not know what people in the low income brackets need or want—of a speech by any of the tremendous number of Liberal members from the cities of Canada.

Every seat in the metropolitan Toronto area is represented by Liberals. A substantial number of seats in metropolitan Vancouver are represented by Liberals. Half the seats in my city, or in the metropolitan area, are represented by Liberal members. Of course, we do have the Minister without Portfolio who was the number two man under the former Minister of Transport, but one could not expect him to know about the housing needs of the ordinary citizens of Winnipeg because he is not an ordinary citizen. He is one of the fortunate few; one of the wealthiest men, they say, in the province of Manitoba.

Where are all the representatives of the urban people of Canada? They are completely silent. They have not got the guts to say anything about their great leader on whose coattails they wafted into office in the last election. Surely, we can get more from the Prime Minister than criticism of the leader of my party because he moved a motion to discuss the reasons given by the former Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) for his resignation, namely that the Prime Minister's views on the constitution were so rigid that, given those views and his positions, it is impossible to take steps to meet the housing needs of this country.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

We heard a great deal from the Prime Minister about how much more we are doing for housing this year than we have ever done before. What the statistics given by the Prime Minister avoid is information in respect of whom we are doing this extra work. For whom are we building these houses? We are not building fewer but more and more homes for those people in the upper income brackets.

The cost of a modest home in the city of Toronto today is now $30,000 plus, and this is at an interest rate of close to 10 per cent. How many people are there in this country or in the city of Toronto who can afford to pay that price for a house? I know of people who live in the city of Toronto—teachers, school principals, social workers, etc.—who are receiving salaries which, ten years ago or even five years ago, they would have thought would give them a life of relative luxury. These people are taking extra work on weekends because the cost of meeting their mortgage payments does not leave them enough to cover the ordinary costs of food, clothing and educating their children.

That is the situation, yet the Prime Minister comes here and tells us we are doing more than we have ever done before. Of course we are doing more than before, but for whom? We now have a mortgage rate of 9¾ per cent. With the government's policy of adjusting the rates every three months, we can be certain that with the next adjustment the interest rates will be close to, if not more than, 10 per cent. How many people are there in this country who can afford to pay that kind of interest rate?

The Prime Minister stood in the house today and told us that all is well in this country, that the people do not have to worry because the government has this whole matter well in hand. I am not going to put the statistical evidence on the record today because my colleagues, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) have already done so. I do want to put on the record a few of the comments made by people who are experts in the field of housing needs for people in the low income bracket.

Let me refer to the task force report which we in this group do not have to defend, and will not defend. We have a Prime Minister who forces the resignation of the Minister of Transport, who is in charge of housing, because the Prime Minister is not prepared to implement the necessary steps recommended by the task force.

I received a copy of a communication forwarded to the Minister of Transport, the hon. Paul Hellyer, by the Age and Opportunity Centre, Inc. of Winnipeg. This document is dated April 17, 1969. Let me read a couple of these paragraphs to dispel the complacency of the Prime Minister in respect of what the government is doing. The first paragraph reads:

> The most glaring omission in the report of the task force on housing is that it ignores the need by those earning under $5,500/year for housing, which, at present, they can neither afford to rent nor buy. Since more than half of the elderly in Canada fall into this category, this is doubly unfortunate. Provision must, therefore, be made to include legislation which will allow this large segment of our population to live in decent accommodation.

Having turned down the Minister of Transport, what chance is there that the government will agree to that kind of suggestion? The brief then states:

> The report makes no mention and no provision for supplying funds at a reasonable cost for the preservation and rehabilitation of deteriorating housing stock. Many old homeowners find themselves unable to live on reduced incomes, pay higher taxes, and keep their homes in a state of repair.

The brief then states, at page two:

> The National Housing Act should be broadened to make mortgage funds more readily available for the building of apartment or hostel accommodation for the elderly, whether it is being financed by a profit or non-profit corporation ... Since high interest rates directly affect rent structure, everything must be done to keep the interest rates low.

My colleague, the hon. member for Broadview, indicated that our party believes the interest rate should be fixed at six per cent. The Prime Minister said two days ago during an interview with a writer from the Toronto Telegram that there was no money for new programs unless old programs could be liquidated. He is not likely to adopt a policy of subsidized rent.

Let us look at what some of the experts said about the task force recommendations. Michael Wheeler, who is the housing expert for the Canadian Welfare Council, said, as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of January 31, 1969 in reference to task force recommendations:

> The critical flaw in the report is that it would halt those measures that now offer some hope to low income groups without offering anything definite in their place except pious suggestions for further research and study.

Later in the article it is stated:

> The welfare council had called in an earlier policy statement for expansion of Canada's public housing program "as the most direct means of helping those in the worst housing conditions. The council also urged policies to avoid the stigma attached to public housing, including "a general housing allowance" for low income families to rent or buy homes.

There is nothing of that kind in the government's program.

Let me refer to what Leon Kumove, head of Toronto's social and community planning services, said about the task force report:

> It made far too many generalizations about the nature of public housing. Some of it is bad, but some of it is also good. You must change public housing, you cannot eliminate it. The report is superficial.

This is from the Globe and Mail of January 3, 1969. The article then states:

> Humphrey Carver, former chairman of Central Mortgage and Housing Corp.'s advisory group, said not one of the seven task force members had any previous knowledge of public housing or urban renewal.
> "These are two of the most difficult subjects. The task force was battled by the problems it encountered, said it didn't like the whole idea of public housing and recommended it to be virtually stopped. This is an elementary attitude to take and it has done great damage to the whole cause of getting housing for low income families. Because of that report, a lot of people will go without proper housing".

• (6:30 p.m.)

Mr. Carver was right, because we had had a freeze by this government on the approval of public housing projects. A number of speakers from all parties have already mentioned that of the total number of housing units built in this country since the end of world war II, less than 1 per cent have been of the public housing type. Yet the government has seen fit to freeze the approval of any new public housing projects. I have spoken before, as have other hon. members, about public housing. There is a great deal wrong with public housing.

If you come to my city, in the corner of the constituency represented by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), you will see a new public housing project. I do not know who drew the plans. It certainly was not somebody from Winnipeg. They must have been drawn here in the maze of the bureaucracy of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. There are brick fences around that project, and a person going by it cannot help but think he is looking at a prison. Having made that criticism of the project, I want to say that the project itself and the facilities in it are infinitely better than the facilities and houses in which the people were living before they moved into the project.

The Minister of Transport and his task force did not ask the key question which they should have asked when they were travelling the country looking at public housing projects. The question is not, "What is wrong with this project?" but, "Do the accommodations in this housing development compare with the housing accommodations and conditions in which you lived before you came here?" If the task force had asked that very simple and elementary question, I am certain they would have received a 100 per cent response that with all the faults and criticisms one can make of public housing units which are built in this country, the people living in them are infinitely better off than they were when they lived in the slums from which they came.

That is the situation which exists. That is the situation we ought to be moving to correct. It is the situation which the Minister of Transport was examining. I may not agree with some of his proposals for solution, but one cannot gainsay the fact that the minister was interested in the problem. One cannot lose sight of the fact that the minister was committed to improving the environment of people living in slum conditions, those living in the deteriorated cores of the cities of Canada. I am sure the Minister of Transport is enough of a pragmatist that, had he continued in office and seen that the proposals he enunciated in his task force report could not or would not work, he would have come up with better solutions. But the minister has resigned.

I say now as I said when I began my speech, that the people of this country have a right to know why he resigned. The people of this country have a right to know what, if anything, the government proposes to do about housing for the millions of people in the low and middle-income brackets who either cannot obtain adequate housing accommodation or can only do so by cutting back on necessary expenditures for food, clothing, modest recreation and so on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to participate in this debate.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mackasey: I made a mental note many months ago not to let the Socialists prod me into debate, because in the few months since this session began I have found that nothing has changed in their quarter of the house. They lost a leader for a little while. That did not seem to do them any harm, and his return does not seem to have done them much good. But he is still one of my favourite members of the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: How does Durante feel?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Durante will be back. Listening, as I have, for most of the afternoon to speakers from the Socialist group I have found, as I anticipated and have learned through the years to anticipate, their usual subtle method of comparing class with class. They do this in the hope that one day they may pick up enough of those votes to form a respectable part of the House of Commons.

The hon. gentleman who just resumed his seat made, in a disparaging way, a few choice observations about the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Kaplan), whom he said was born with a silver spoon in his mouth. It does happen in Canada that one can be born into this class of society and still show an interest in the democratic process of the House of Commons. This is not true of Socialist countries, because people there are born with no spoons on the table, let alone a silver spoon in their mouth.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Have you ever been to Sweden?

Mr. Mackasey: Yes, I have. Sweden is a great country; you wait six and half years there for a home. That is a great Utopia; everybody is equal and on the same level. They are all poor and everybody waits six months for a home.

An hon. Member: You said six years just now.

Mr. Mackasey: Sweden is not the only Socialist country or régime that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) can tell us about. Since he raised the question of Sweden, he might tell us about the 16 or 17 disastrous years in Saskatchewan, when they had no unemployment because people left the province faster than jobs disappeared. There were no border points, no immigration laws, no customs. If this was Utopia, Socialism at its best, the land of milk and honey, I do not know why the people of British Columbia, Alberta and neighbouring provinces did not all flock into this Socialistic Utopia which the hon. gentleman eventually left with disastrous consequences. He finally became pragmatic and left the province. I shall not refer to his seat, because he changes it so often that in ten years I have not been able to keep track of his latest riding.

If the Minister without Portfolio from the province of Manitoba is one of the more fortunate Canadians who does not have to concern himself about owning a home, who does not have to concern himself with all the day-to-day problems of earning a living, it is all the more to his credit that he has given up a life with a very leisurely pace, sought election, and come to the House of Commons to meet some Socialists. The Minister without Portfolio has shown by his performance here that he cares for his fellow man regardless of his situation in life.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have not seen any of it.

Mr. Mackasey: Someone today alluded to the fact that possibly the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) could not understand anything about poverty since he comes from a wealthy family in the riding of Mount Royal. I am a little disappointed at the hon. member's contribution, because the hon. gentleman who made it does not usually make this type of attack. I have never had to resort to it, and I do not know why he had to do so. I say in all sincerity that it will be a sad day when the House of Commons is limited to members who, for one reason or another, have an income of so high and no higher.

• (6:40 p.m.)

To accuse the Prime Minister of Canada of not being aware of the social problems of this country simply because he is a very well educated man, simply because he represents a wealthy riding and simply because he is wealthy himself, indicates a flagrant ignorance of the background of the Prime Minister. There is no man in this house who has devoted more of his time, more of his money, and more of his talents to the poor and to the labour class as well as to the trade unions of this country than he did in the 1950's when he and one or two other people had the courage and the nerve to stand up to Mr. Duplessis, not only for the unions but, as the leader of the New Democratic party knows, in the case against the Jehovah's Witnesses. So I do not think the Prime Minister of this country has to take second place to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) who just sat down.

We thought that this debate would be on housing, and I will say in all sincerity that members of the opposition, who are in general a pretty responsible group, have stuck to the issue of housing. This is a house of debate. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) made what I thought was a very pertinent, honest and useful contribution to the debate as a member from an urban riding. The purpose of the House of Commons is to debate and criticize without resorting to personalities. But unfortunately the New Democratic party has chosen to fight this issue not on the question of housing but on the question of the constitution.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): That is what the Minister of Transport resigned over.

Mr. Mackasey: The Minister of Transport did resign over that, and I might say about him that he is a most honourable man; he is a man of integrity and a man who had the courage to resign on a matter of principle, which has happened all too infrequently in Canadian history.

In speaking about the constitution—and that is the subject on which the New Democratic party has decided to fight—I am at a tremendous disadvantage in one way and at an advantage in another way. I come from a part of the country where people are perhaps more preoccupied with the constitution than the more pragmatic English speaking people in the rest of the country. Perhaps the reason for this is that I have one foot in each culture and I get exasperated with both. I can understand the average Canadian's concern about housing. I used to be parliamentary secretary to the minister who was concerned with housing, and I can remember making a speech here on that issue and referring to the red tape which prevented public housing in my riding. I remember personally starting the agitation for a project because someone asked me why I did not stop talking and do something about it. I did something about it in March of 1967. Here we are in April of 1969 and my city is just now turning over the sod for the building of a home for senior citizens. At that time there was no apparent reason in the world for holding up the project except for the red tape on the part of the federal, provincial and municipal governments.

This is really the crux of the matter in the housing problem of this country and, I suspect, the problem which bothered the Minister of Transport—the inability at the federal level to cut down the red tape and, as someone said, to get down to the nuts and bolts and to help the man in the street. He does not care about the constitution; all he is interested in is a roof over his head.

I share the concern of the Minister of Transport. It is all too easy for members of this house to say, as the New Democratic party members have said today, "Disregard the constitution; the constitution is there to serve the people." I have heard the ringing phrases of the hon. gentlemen. It is all too simple to say that the constitution is there and that it should be there to serve the people. If it does not serve the people because it is out of date 100 years later, it must be amended. I think we should all hang our heads in shame—and this includes all levels of government and all Canadians—that we have not even been able to find a formula to bring the constitution back to this country, or the amending of the constitution back to Canada. This is no more the fault of this government than it was the fault of the government when the opposition was in power and when, with Davie Fulton, they tried to find a formula. But perhaps hon. members opposite have short memories.

When I say I am at an advantage as a Quebecker in understanding constitutional problems, it is because I have lived there for 48 years. My disadvantage is in not being a member of the New Democratic party so that I am unable, no matter how many documents I have here and I have too many of them, to understand the philosophy of the New Democratic party on the constitution. Perhaps someone can tell me what it is, but I have six documents here and in each one there is a different version. I will try to pick out a few.

Just in case people think that the Prime Minister is hung up on the constitution to hide the frustration of the government or as an excuse for what is considered in some circles to be slow progress in the field of housing, let me make it clear that it is not only the federal government that is concerned about the constitution. The provinces are concerned about it. It is not only the province of Quebec that is concerned about it. As a Quebecker I resent the implication that it is only Quebec that is concerned about the constitutional problem. I know that the members from Halifax and others are much more familiar with the report of the task force on housing than I am, but I should like to quote from a Canadian Press release in a Toronto newspaper of February 24, 1969, with regard to a document that was submitted by the province of Ontario, not the province of Quebec although Quebec endorsed it, about the constitution. Part of the article reads as follows:

Position papers released by Ontario and Quebec delegates after the meeting indicated Mr. Hellyer was told the federal government should not expand much into the housing field—a provincial jurisdiction—

That is not the Prime Minister talking; it is not the backbenchers here using excuses; it is not the ministers explaining away inactivity. This is from the government of Ontario—a Tory government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Never trust a Grit.

Mr. Mackasey:

—beyond the present role of providing most of the public funds.

That is the Ontario position, not the Quebec position. The provinces say: "Stay out of our affairs. Provide us with more money and we will do the job". That is what they are saying. I share the opinion and the frustration of the minister who has resigned that the constitution needs change, and I will talk about it in a moment. Let us first get the decks cleared and try to understand who is complaining and who is insisting in 1969 that the constitution be respected in the field of housing. It is not the federal government but the provinces, not necessarily only the province of Quebec. I am quoting from the submission of the province of Ontario to the task force in February of this year. I will read some more of it.

Ontario's paper was brusque in warning Mr. Hellyer against any attempts to establish direct relationships with municipalities.

Who warned Mr. Hellyer not to come into direct contact with municipalities? Was it the federal government? Was it the Prime Minister? Was it the opposition? No, it was the provincial government of Ontario which, quite properly, pointed out that as long as the constitution is written as it is we should respect it. I have sat here and heard people from the opposition ranks say to the federal government, "Stay out of the field of provincial affairs. This is why we have trouble. You are arrogant. You are entering into provincial jurisdictions. These are no longer the days of Mackenzie King. The provinces want to be strong, and they want their rights respected." What do the provinces want us to do about it so long as the constitution is there? One speaker said today that it is not the Bible, it is not something written on Mount Sinai, it is not sacred. Yet it is, because it is the constitution of this country until it is changed.

Mr. McGrath: Where does that leave the have-not provinces?

Mr. Mackasey: I will get to that subject in a minute. Mr. Randall, who probably wrote this article, and if he did not someone in his office did, also said the following:

"Few actions could do more damage to the working out of a more rational federal system in Canada than the inevitable confusion and upsetting of priorities which would occur if our federal system were short-circuited", the paper said.

• (6:50 p.m.)

This is the position of the province of Ontario, not of the province of Quebec. All the provinces except British Columbia sent delegations led by the cabinet minister responsible for housing. To the best of my knowledge not one of them got up and said: Let us see our jurisdiction in the field of housing transferred to the federal government where it should logically be because of the massive sums of money needed and the direct action required to deal with the housing crisis in this country. Even in a unitary state like Sweden, you wait six years for housing. I will not talk about the iron curtain countries where there is a dictatorship. I and others went to Poland and saw what type of accommodation is available for the workers. And there is no red tape or divided jurisdiction there. We should not say that everything in this country is bad. That is one of the great faults we have as Canadians. You can deprecate the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). You can say he is emphasizing the wrong priorities. You can say he is too rigid. How is he rigid? He is rigid because he understands the constitution, and understands the problems. He is saying we want a strong federal government and that the provinces need to be strong, too. Is he too rigid when he says to the provinces: If you want to raise monies, then raise your taxes? Is he too rigid when he tells a province to stay out of the federal field? Is he too rigid when he says we shall build an airport in Sainte Scholastique and not in St. Jean because this is a matter within federal jurisdiction and we refuse to play petty politics? Is he wrong, there?

I have heard opposition speakers say: You have no right to do certain things because you are interfering with provincial jurisdiction; you have not consulted with the provinces. I have heard that word "consult" ad nauseam. Now, the Prime Minister is saying: This is our area of jurisdiction and we want to be masters in it; if a province wants to be master in areas which directly concern it, it may. I remember that in the housing debate last year the former hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi, a good member who knew all about housing, stood in this chamber and suggested that we should establish a ministry of housing. The next day he was castigated in about every editorial in Quebec, including La Presse for daring to suggest that the federal government set up a ministry in what is normally a provincial field.

This is the type of thing we encounter and will continue to face until the constitution is changed. It is all very well for members of the New Democratic party to say "to hell with the constitution." That is what they are saying, in effect. They change their policy like you change your shirt. They have gone all the way from two nations to associate state; there is Cliche's version, Taylor's version, the leader's version and back again and now nobody knows what version they are following. I don't.

It is quite possible that with the latest phase of socialist thinking about the constitution that housing is a federal responsibility on the logical grounds that the situation constitutes a national emergency. It is a national emergency.

Mr. Stanfield: The Prime Minister says it is not.

Mr. Mackasey: Oh, I was doing all right until the hon. gentleman came along. I would love to keep the hatchet buried. An hon. member over there referred to me as a hatchet man; that is what got me on my feet and will keep me on my feet. This is the dilemma in which we find ourselves. There is no excuse for the federal government failing to give a lead in the field of housing. There is no excuse for failing to show initiative, if we have failed to show initiative. I agree that the criticism which has been raised today is valid if we have not placed a high enough priority on housing. The Minister of Transport made this perfectly clear. Legislation will be before the house in a few weeks time, as the Prime Minister mentioned, and if it does not go as far as it should, then that is the time to say so. Let us not castigate the government for doing nothing in the field of housing when it is not true.

An hon. Member: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Mackasey: If you want to say something, wait your turn and stand up.

The Economic Council said that in 1970 we would need 200,000 housing units in this country. The Council under-estimated the number, because we will reach that figure this year. We reached 190,000 last year, two years before the target date. If the problem is particularly acute, as it is in Hamilton, Oakville, Burlington and the Golden Triangle, it is because this area is a heavily industrialized part of the country and inevitably housing difficulties arise in the industrialized section of every nation.

This is true of Sweden as it is of England, that great Utopia of labour. Mr. Speaker, with all the labour discrimination that is going on there, God knows what kind of government they will have—

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): There has not been a Liberal government there for a long time.

Mr. Mackasey: The solution there is not as complicated as it is in Canada where there are ten jurisdictions. The solution put forward by members of the N.D.P. is a simple one, and very pragmatic; I am inclined to be pragmatic myself. It is to ignore the constitution. Full steam ahead, they say, walk into the municipalities, build low-cost public housing; to heck with the constitution and the municipalities, because the man in the street wants something done. That is true. But let us stop and think. The man in the street who elected the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) is the same elector who elects provincial members to office. He is the man who elects councillors, aldermen and reeves to city councils and so on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Mackasey: I shall bring my remarks to a close. I thank hon. members for their courtesy.

Mr. Stanfield: The only reason we raised any objection yesterday about extension of time was that a specific order had been made to enable as many hon. members as possible to participate. Now, we have reached Friday and we have all the weekend ahead of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: I shared the opinion of the hon. gentleman yesterday. There was a time limit and he was quite right in invoking it. I appreciate his courtesy on this occasion. I hope he will be flying home one of these weekends. It seems to me the labour vote is coming to the conclusion that it does not need to concentrate on the socialist party to get recognition in the House of Commons.

As I was saying, the people who elect the federal government are also those who elect the provincial governments and the candidates for municipal office. Before the constitution of Canada can be changed so as to place the responsibility for housing policy and so on within federal jurisdiction, under the proper jurisdiction, it is necessary to sit down in consultation with people who are prepared to do just that. The same applies to a determination of what should be federal and what should be provincial in the field of education. The solutions will come when the people in the provinces understand that they may be attacking the wrong source. They should elect in each province, members who are prepared to attend constitutional conferences, who will agree to revise the constitution and put in the federal field those areas which ought to be federal, and in the provincial field the areas which should remain provincial. But this is not something on which action can be taken unilaterally. Anyone with common sense knows it.

Mr. Lewis: Nobody said it could.

Mr. Mackasey: You implied it. You have suggested everything. Would you like me to run through everything you have suggested in three years? I will start with Mr. Cliche.

Mr. Lewis: You are not intimidating me.

Mr. Mackasey: I am not trying to. I could deal with LaPierre, Cliche, Taylor, Gifford and a few of the others. I could tell you about Dr. Lagure. He almost won an election, he told me one night, because he managed to coral all the separatist votes in Outremont.

Mr. Lewis: Will the minister permit a question? I know how fair, how honourable the hon. gentleman is, and how careful—

Mr. Mackasey: I have used that tactic, too, and I recognize it.

Mr. Lewis: I learnt it from the hon. gentleman. Will he not agree he might be doing a great service to the government, and to this parliament, if he were to refer to the subject of this debate instead of making rather cheap electoral asides?

• (7:00 p.m.)

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I am not guilty of cheap electoral asides as the arrogant member has suggested. I did refer to remarks made by members of the New Democratic party and their cheap tactics used during the last election campaign; not my tactics, theirs. These tactics were reported in the Globe and Mail for May 22, 1968, as follows:

> We have to give to the central government the necessary constitutional authority to do the things that need to be done. We are trying to make do with a horse and buggy in a jet age.

The leader of the New Democratic party said;

> We cannot abrogate our constitutional commitments to Quebec. It may mean that in any area such as education and housing, where Quebec feels that a strong federal power may erode provincial rights, it may be necessary to have two programs—one for English speaking Canada and one for Quebec.

As a Quebecker, I say that is separatism in disguise. It is a special status no matter how you look at it. It is nothing more than a weakening of the federal government. If you want to say to the province of Quebec, you take housing, and the other nine provinces will cede their rights to the federal government respecting housing.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Can I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Mackasey: You have already asked enough questions.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have not asked any. Could I ask the minister if by having two pension plans, which he supported as a member of the Liberal government, he feels that separatism had been introduced in Canada?

Mr. Mackasey: I would have felt a lot better with one pension plan. I voted for it because it was the only way. If you want to extend that principle to every area of the constitution of Quebec, whether you like it or not in 18 months you are going to have two countries. You may want that, I don't.

I have been talking about Quebec, but we must not lose sight of the fact the other provinces are equally jealous of their rights under the constitution. The strongest paper submitted to the task force in the field of housing did not come from the province of Quebec, but from the good Tory government of Ontario.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this debate to point out the ridiculous position taken by the Prime Minister in implying there is no crisis in this country. If there was no indication of a housing crisis, why did he appoint the task force on housing as one of the first acts of his administration? Was it merely an effort to keep his deputy out of his way so he would not be reminded of some of the urgent and practical problems facing the people of this country? Was it to reward some of his important supporters in the last election?

I wish to point out some of the practical problems facing two municipalities in my constituency. The city of Calgary faces the problem of trying to house some 2,000 people which arrive at its gates every month. It has been active in the field of urban renewal and public housing for approximately five years. Both of these projects have been established as a result of action taken by previous federal administrations in recognition of a problem that has been present in this country since the end of the second world war. These programs have not had the best results because of some of the actions of recent federal administrations which have been referred to by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). He just concluded some colourful and interesting remarks, which were not entirely to the point, but he did say that one of the basic problems is that of red tape in the administration. The problems of Calgary are clearcut examples of the red tape which this administration is incapable of cutting through. This is an admission of failure to solve the problems of housing which we face today.

Some policies of this government create housing problems which are not related to the constitutional problems faced by this nation. Housing units are being built in an attempt to solve the problems, but these people cannot afford to live in these units. High rise apartments have high rents. Why are these being built instead of units which will satisfy the needs of the people? The reasons relate to problems under government control, such as taxation and fiscal policies of the government.

For the past three or four years there has been rampant inflation. Tax policies, in conjunction with the inflation, have forced insurance companies to divert their capital from investment in single family dwellings or semi-detached units to high rise apartments. Therefore, the money has not been available where it is really needed. The reason for this diversion is that insurance companies receive an equity in the investment which affords them a much better return on their money. The city of Calgary has embarked on rather ambitious renewal schemes. These have been held up because of a freeze and lack of policy by this government. Because of the lack of these policies, the Sheganappi Village project in Calgary has been held up. If the federal government would make a decision, this project could be completed. It does not require any new programs, merely old programs to be implemented.

I do not wish to take much time, but I ought to point out a problem facing my constituents in Drumheller. That general area has been depressed for some time, largely because coal mining has stopped. Exercising commendable wisdom, the federal government decided to build a medium security penitentiary there. I believe that the building began late in August, 1967. The institution created problems because the employees needed houses. Mind you, we are not complaining about having the institution there because it would have created problems no matter where it was built. The federal government has the duty to solve those problems. Exercising a degree of foresight the federal government seems incapable of, the local authorities at Drumheller initiated an investigation. They wanted to ascertain whether it was possible to introduce some sort of urban renewal program which would make housing available for those employees working at the penitentiary. Although Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had been involved in the program since 1965, the investigation was begun in 1968. Actually, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was involved in every step taken. The City had annexed some land in 1966 and 1967.

There were problems to do with low rental housing which necessitated a visit on the part of officials to the former minister in charge of housing, Hon. J. R. Nicholson. He was surprised to hear of all the impediments set up by the Central Mortgage and Housing office in Calgary.

[Mr. Schumacher.]

Now, four years later, we have reached a stage where there has been an expenditure of $35,000, half of which has been contributed by the federal government. The money has been put out in various studies and preliminary work. However, since the government seems unable to make up its mind, applications to go ahead with the scheme in our area have not been accepted. Only about 900 units are to be built under a rehabilitation scheme. No huge sums of money are involved, but the government will not act. The people of my constituency want the government to wake up and act. They want government members to quit their discussion of academic, constitutional problems and get down to business. There is no point in saying that you cannot get results under the present constitution, because you can.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, without getting into any of the matters raised by previous speakers and without talking about why the minister resigned or why does the government not resign, may I, in an effort to secure the goodwill of the whip and in a special effort to pay a compliment to Mr. John Steel, Executive Director of the first Canadian Urban Transportation Conference held under the sponsorship of the Association of Canadian Mayors and Municipalities, put a few remarks on the record on an aspect that has been touched on obliquely only. There is a dominant form of urbanization in which the lack of firm planning has resulted in gigantic agglomerations of people in a relative tangle of land uses and overworked, inefficient transportation systems, half completed expressway networks, and an urban environment which is at best chaotic and at worst deadly. We are quite likely to have super-slums on a gigantic scale and a crippled economy if we persist in our neglect of regional planning and in our inattention to the urban environment.

Who wants the kind of Canada in which up to 90 per cent of Canadians are crowded into a few overcrowded and overbuilt metropolitan areas while the rest of the country is empty and poor? What is there to prevent this, the way things are now developing? What is there in present government legislation to prevent this from happening? Nothing I suggest, Mr. Speaker.

As the Economic Council of Canada has told us, most of the inhabitants of Canada in 1980 could be living in artificial environments. About 20 million people will live in a few huge cities. Toronto and Montreal will have a combined population of about 7 million, and Vancouver will have a population of between 1 million and 1.5 million. These three cities will have living in them one-third of all Canadians. Then, between 3 million and 6 million people will live in Winnipeg, Ottawa, Edmonton, Calgary, Hamilton and Quebec City. We shall have about 20 cities containing populations of between 100,000 and 500,000 people. They will be cities like St. John's, Newfoundland, Kingston, Oshawa, St. John, New Brunswick, Sarnia, Saskatoon, Sault Ste. Marie—

An hon. Member: Mention Stratford.

Mr. Forrestall: —Stratford, St. Catharines, Halifax, and Trois-Rivières. Altogether, it is estimated that these cities will contain between 3.5 million and 4 million people.

A gigantic linear megalopolis 600 miles long from the Great Lakes down the St. Lawrence Valley would begin to appear. Between 1961 and 1980, about 500,000 acres of land as a minimum for physical building for the 29 cities would be needed, and in total the typical sprawl which we have used is likely to take for these same 29 cities up to 1.8 million acres of land. Given the tendencies for a tidal wave of urban shadow to reach out from these urban centres, a further 1.8 million acres at least could be affected. The urban growth could reach up to 35 miles in unbroken mass from the core areas of the larger cities such as Toronto or Montreal. By the year 2000 or 2020 at the latest, the best of our farmland could have been built over or taken out of food production. But this extensive spread could in many areas have been achieved without adequate environments having been created. We have not at the present time adequately planned ahead for the structures of services, facilities, transportation rights of way, open spaces and residential, commercial and industrial balances to hope for much more than a second best environment in most of our urban areas, unless we change our ways. This will continue unless the federal government gets off its rear and tackles these problems.

• (7:20 p.m.)

The lack is not only in the machinery for planning and in the financial support that is required. There is no adequate administrative territory in most of these urban areas for the growth envisaged. There are no effective pollution control measures. There is no stability to the total environmental picture. I suggest that the lack is one of preparedness, of appreciation of the gravity and the force of urbanization which is bursting upon Canada. The growth we have seen will appear mild by what is to come.

The problem is that unless we very rapidly come to improved planning, grave errors and ineradicable problems will be firmly built into our urban systems. It is possible to create insoluble problems. The challenge today is to make ready a structure for that growth, and the future forms or patterns of urban development are the key to the whole future of our civilized society. Now is the time when we have an opportunity to do something about it.

I would ask the government these questions. Is it inevitable that we simply continue to pile up people in the very limited areas of our country which already have severe urban problems? Can we not do something to ease the pressures?

Even if the bulk of the population is to occur in a few large urban centres, is it not possible to make the new national development policy one of a moving and advancing frontier of urbanization? As an example, if Toronto is to spread to Lake Simcoe can we not organize its actual form into a "string of beads," a "constellation," a series of "linear cities", or to use another phrase current in the lingo of the discussion "hive-off" some of the growth to build a range of new settlements well into the northland and still tied together by rapid communications?

Must we continue to accentuate the traditional corridors of transport? Can we not use the networks of transport to divert pressures from such existing corridors as the St. Lawrence valley, the Ottawa River, the Red River, the Fraser, the Great Lakes shorelines and the Red River valley to parallel routes further inland?

Must we always neglect the urbanization of the old historic routes, the northern lands where there are resources but no people? Can we not design a strategy of urbanization which will gradually set up all over Canada a mesh of new urban centres, even to the creation of 30 or 50 new cities by the year 2000, cities of 50,000 population to 100,000 population each? This would have the tendency to divert from the tragedy that is the urban suffocation in Montreal and Toronto today.

Why can't we get on with the development of a new transcontinental corridor, as suggested by Rohmer in his imaginative "Canada North Development Corridor" proposal—a corridor running 4,000 miles from Newfoundland via Labrador City, Rouyn-Noranda, Lake Winnipeg, Thompson and diverging off from there into three great areas of Canada that have not yet been touched, the first the Mackenzie River out to the Arctic Ocean, the second down the Yukon River to the Dawson area, and the third by way of the Peace River all the way through to Prince Rupert? Why can we not do this as a means of establishing a pattern of smaller related urban centres for the next century of growth?

In the Acres study, which developed Rohmer's theme, it was suggested that Canada consider creating cities of up to half a million population in areas such as Whitehorse, Hay River, Thompson, Flin Flon, the Lakehead, Noranda and Labrador City. While these may as yet be beyond our sights, would not the creation of a series of expanded towns between the existing limits of major urbanization and such frontier areas greatly speed up the process?

In the case of the largest urban centres can we not advantageously explode the new growth into the creation of a related and interacting set of cities each with a special pattern of appropriate functions, with a definite form? There are strong trends towards decentralization, and by working with them and moving imaginatively into large scale regional planning and open space reservations we might well achieve a higher level of economic activity and by God we sure as hell, would achieve a better living standard.

Do we not need a wholesale resrtucturing at all levels of our national governmental units? Can we not devise a form of region which involves a common set of large regions, in which there is a definite strategic plan, and permanently flexible contingency planning with federal and provincial levels in a contractual relationship carrying out these plans; and a set of urban areas with local government to do the urban planning within that regional context?

Should not each region move swiftly to safeguard the space for both the environmental areas and the transportation corridors? We know that land costs have a drastic effect on transportation solutions. If we do not wish to reserve the actual space are we not compelled then in some way to bring the force of our legislative power, counsel and wisdom to the controlling of land costs so that these problems can be met at a later date?

Since our economic capacities will be strained to cope with the massive growth that faces us, do we not need some new policies? Why we do we hide behind the cloak of constitutional arguments? I suggest that some of these policies might include very strong regional planning, with the power to control the intensity of land use in relation to transport capacities; a greater, perhaps even lavish use of green belt regulations to give stable units of urbanization a chance as functioning entities in the regional urban pattern; strong powers of industrial and office and commercial location so that these generators go where new towns and new satellites can be built around them; diversion of growth from areas which are considered relatively stable and "in balance" to "expanding" areas; new powers jointly exercised by the federal-provincial governments or by new regional forms of government to guide growth.

We need road protection and road pricing policies to introduce the concept of profitability into urban planning.

We need computer controlled regional networks where the right of entry and egress can be controlled in accordance with need.

We need a new approach to planning which seeks to create stable environmental units with the longest possible life, but with multiple use development to minimize external traffic generation and internal movements. We need staggered working hours, and even a slower pace of life, and that in much more compatible surroundings than what we are facing.

• (7:30 p.m.)

Can we not totally exclude the through vehicle and the mixed traffic from the centre of our cities, and make them pedestrian havens with servicing by vehicles to controlled points and at controlled hours? Should we forget about the traditional suburb and create instant cities or cities in the suburbs; or should we recognize the "scatteration" concept and instead simply accelerate the sprawl which is now occurring, trusting to the market forces to create a good environment? Does not the challenge confronting us require a much more effective technique of enforcement and development control than we now have? Even if we are to develop the regional strategies needed, do we not need a form of permanent contingency planning to cope with change? Even if we do not wish to concern ourselves unduly about the form and pattern of urbanization, have we any likelihood of avoiding massive slum conditions, severe social pathology in the form of riots or protests against an inhuman environment, poisoned air in the overloaded corridors—higher death and accident rates—of movement, and economic blight because we have let unit costs increase beyond all reason. The sooner we wake up and learn something about the conditions in which the people live, the sooner we will have better cities and a better country to live in.

Must we persist with poisoned air? Must we continue to overload our existing transportation corridors? Must we continue to be bogged down with the economic plight we have because, through our unit cost of land and unit cost of anything, we have let any chance to create a better life slip out of our hands in terms of control.

All over the world logical answers to the problem of taming megalopolis and guiding giant city growth to human well-being are available. Canada lags notably in the application of these methods and we have neglected the basic research. The prognosis for urban Canada is grave. On this point, I believe every member agrees. But the future forms and patters of our urban development need not inevitably be more of the same. Rates of growth on the scales predicted mean we can rebuild the environment as we see fit. We should recognize then an open-ended set of demands for as long as we can foresee will be made upon the space and resources of our urban areas.

In terms of the form and pattern of urban development, we need to think in relation to the needs of 50 or 100 years from now. Even though we have little idea of how life might be lived, what we do in this massive urbanization is forever and will affect the quality of life for most Canadians for many centuries from today. What we do today in this decade will affect planning for the next 200 years if we do not do it right and do not get off our rear ends and start to act. I see my time is up, Mr. Speaker. I would have liked to have been able to go on much longer.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I know the hour is getting late. As various speakers who preceded me have taken part in this debate, I have found bit by bit some of the material which I wanted to present to the house has been used. However, they say repetition is the mother of learning. Perhaps a recap of some of the main items might be of interest. I feel this is an important and very interesting debate. I believe it has given this house an opportunity once more to review and assess its position on one of the major problems facing Canadians today. It has clearly set the picture of the housing crisis in its proper perspective. The resignation yesterday of the Minister of Transport, and the reasons he gave for relinquishing his number two spot in the government of this country, have shaken thoughtful Canadians to the core. The general public expects criticism of government policy from members of the opposition party. However, when one of our key cabinet ministers resigns in protest over weak, ineffective and indecisive government policy, and when he warns all Canadians that we are headed in the wrong direction, that we are weakening our central government, it is certainly time for the general public to turn the searchlight on the policies of the present administration.

It is time for the government members in this house to assess their own position. A disastrous course set by the government today could bring real and increasing trouble to our nation before the term of this parliament expires. The resignation of the Minister of Transport has been a tragic one. It has brought to all Canadians the fact that the present administration does not have a solution to many of the major problems facing our nation. It is high time this government set down a clearcut policy on a number of issues so that all Canadians would know where we are heading.

We have seen indecision and delay in respect of a number of issues. These include housing, urban development, pollution, foreign policy, unemployment, pensions, regional development and many other problems. Let us look briefly at the resignation statement of the minister. He did not give up his post merely because of a lack of policy in the housing field. His statement is a stinging repudiation of this new administration. It is a castigation of present government policies. It is a warning to the Canadian people, and it is a plea to the members of the government to change direction.

In looking over the resignation statement which the minister gave to the press and to the people of Canada yesterday, I note the minister pointed out that he felt the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was pursuing a policy which was resulting in a federation of ten semi-autonomous states held together by a weak federal government. This is not a statement coming from opposition members in the house. This is a statement coming from the number two man in the Liberal party, the number two man in the government of this nation of ours. He said that the Prime Minister's "classroom brand" of federalism was hobbling the country. Most of all, he said, it was holding up housing; it was delaying action on pollution; it was crippling urban development; it was stalling urgent action on many other gut issues. The Minister of Transport said he could not accept this situation.

When we examine in detail the statement which the minister made yesterday, it would seem it is high time that everyone sitting in this house did a little more thinking about the direction in which this government is taking Canada and Canadians. I have been here since September. I have heard a host of promises from ministers of the government. I have heard them tell us what they were going to do about the housing problem facing Canadians.

Let us see what the minister in charge of housing, the key man in the government and the number 1 expert on the housing problems of this nation, had to say yesterday. What he said was, that he could see "little or no chance in the coming "weeks or even months", of any of his housing task force recommendations being accepted by the government." He went on to say, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of April 24:

I say housing is a matter for the federal government. It always has been. It should be now, with Ottawa giving strong leadership.

This afternoon we heard member after member from the Liberal side of this chamber repudiate the statements made by the former minister. We have had an indication since September that strong leadership would come from the present administration. Suddenly, we find that it has not come and apparently there is little intention on the part of the present administration to give effective leadership to the Canadian nation in the field of housing.

The minister went on to discuss another phase other than housing and said:

My constituents, many of them poor people, can't wait.

The kids who tried to swim at a beach in my riding last summer can't wait for somebody to decide who should clean up the pollution.

I say that we, as Canadians, cannot wait any longer for this ineffective, weak, vacillating government to take action in the field of pollution. For too long we have had these important problems in respect of housing, pollution, urban development and unemployment hanging over our heads like millstones.

[Mr. Harding.]

Finally, in desperation one of the key men in the government party had to throw in his resignation because he could not accept this inaction any longer. Hon. members in the Liberal party should give a lot more thought to standing up to the Prime Minister and demanding that changes be made, particularly when we are heading in a direction that is not good for Canadians.

Let me spend a few minutes more discussing one or two statements made yesterday, because they are vitally important to Canada. We in this party have been critical, as we are being critical today—perhaps more so than ever before—of this government. Let me refer to what the former Minister of Transport, who was in charge of housing, had to say as reported in the same article. The article reads:

Now, he has found himself stymied by a Prime Minister who insisted that "constitutionally many of these things are not federal responsibilities."

He was referring to urban problems, problems in respect of housing and pollution.

During the election last June, this government gave every indication to the people of Canada that it was going to deal with these problems. When we arrived in Ottawa we found that the Prime Minister and his cabinet had deliberately misled the Canadian people. They did not tell Canadians during the election campaign last June that they were going to abandon the housing problem and place it on the shoulders of municipal and provincial governments. They did not say last June that they were going to throw housing and pollution problems over to municipal and provincial governments. They never told the people last June that they were not interested in the urban problems facing this nation. They did not tell the people last June that this was the direction in which they intended to proceed. I suggest it is high time every member in this house did a great deal more serious thinking about this resignation and this statement than has been done in the short period since it was made.

The minister made another statement which I think is worth reading into the record. He said:

The Prime Minister's constitutional theories sound fine in the classroom—the trouble is they just won't work.

People expect the federal government to provide full employment—without this insidious inflation—to take action on clear air and clear water. These are the bread and butter issues. But these are the issues the Prime Minister says must be left to the provinces while he sorts out the constitutional priorities.

This is not criticism by a member of the N.D.P. or the Conservative party. This is a criticism coming from the number two Liberal of this country, as of yesterday.

Let me make a very quick review of the housing problem that faces Canada. When we came to Ottawa, the members of this party had a program in respect of housing which we thought would work, and we presented it to the Canadian nation. I have no regret because of the stand we took. Last September when we came to Ottawa for the first session of this particular parliament we were told by this government we were to expect a just society. What a wonderful vision this was. The poor "Joe" in the most humble home began to think that at last we had a Prime Minister and a government which might do something for Canadians. I came here filled with the hope that at long last the government and the Prime Minister were interested in the problems facing all Canadians. What happened?

We had not been here very long before this problem of housing was pushed aside. We then had to appoint a task force to look into housing problems. We have been looking into housing problems in Canada for many years. I am sure every hon. member has a thick file with suggested solutions to this problem.

In order to stall for time, this task force was set up. It travelled across the nation and heard briefs from a number of organizations. We were told the report would be made in December. Then, we were told it would be made in January, or that legislation resulting from the report would be presented. We were told the same thing in February, then in March and then in April. We are now very close to May. There is an indication that at long last some legislation is to be brought before the house.

Mr. Alexander: Don't bet on it.

Mr. Harding: If there is one thing I will bet on so far as legislation is concerned, it is that the minister would not have offered his resignation at this time had the proposed legislation included a majority of the recommendations of the task force.

• (7:50 p.m.)

The task force report was extremely weak. The need for public housing was completely ignored. Then, we find the Minister of Transport handing in his resignation because of lack of action by the cabinet. I ask, Mr. Speaker, who in Canada needs housing? It is not the members of the House of Commons; it is not people in the higher income brackets. The people in Canada who need adequate housing are those in the lower income brackets. What has been done about this problem? What are the suggestions from the government benches? Statistics have been thrown at us today by the Prime Minister and others. With regard to housing starts and houses constructed in Canada over the past two years, the vast majority have been for people in the well-to-do class in terms of income. Today, you have to earn $8,000 or $9,000 a year before you can obtain a loan under the National Housing Act. What about the people in the $2,000 and $3,000 a year income class—what is the government doing for them? Is this part of the just society? Is this the Liberal vision of bringing justice to a group of people who are in dire need? What are the plans of the government?

I have read the report of the task force and listened to speakers from the government side of the house, but nowhere do I find even the suggestion of solutions to the problem. In Canada today one million families live in poverty; this is the estimate of the Economic Council of Canada. One hundred thousand Canadian families in our large cities are waiting for public housing accommodation. We are told that the government cannot do anything about it because it is a municipal and provincial problem. There are recommendations in the task force report, inadequate as they are. One solution is to bring down the cost of housing to a level which people can afford. Then, they will be able to own their own homes; young couples will be able to live in homes of their own and raise their families. But we find that recommendation after recommendation has gone by the board.

Our recommendation, to cut out the 11 per cent federal sales tax, has been stamped upon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). Just yesterday or the day before he indicated, in answering a question in the house, that the tax would not be removed. This is one solution, but the government has not the gumption to act up on it. There is the problem of land assembly, and the curtailment of costs. If you go down the line you can find 20 or 30 items in regard to which the government has done nothing and intends to do nothing. The people of Canada should know what this government is doing to solve the problem. They should know why there has been this stalling by the government. That is why I welcome the opportunity to raise this issue in the house.

Housing

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the house is of great importance. We are dealing with more than the resignation of a minister; the question facing us involves basic questions of government policy. When the minister resigned, he gave a press conference and made charges against the government of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) more serious than any made from this side of the house. He has brought into question the whole area of government policy on major matters affecting many millions of Canadians living in urban centres.

The Minister of Transport has placed before parliament and the people, in the most public way possible, a basic disagreement within the cabinet about the government's constitutional position. He has stated that he cannot accept the narrow and inflexible position taken by the Prime Minister, which has the effect of preventing action in the fields of housing, urban renewal, pollution and all the other matters affecting the populations of our great cities.

The minister has brought to light a basic and serious disagreement on policy. To do this, he resigned. That does not settle the question. It does not free the Prime Minister from the onus of placing before the house his views on these matters and reassuring the people of Canada that he has not, in fact, adopted a position which is not consonant with the great problems which we face in these areas. The problems affecting the urban populations of our vast metropolitan complexes such as Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Calgary, Halifax and Ottawa are the most serious, urgent and vital problems which we have before us today.

An hon. Member: And Cornerbrook.

Mr. Paproski: My hon. friend says, "And Cornerbrook".

Mr. Alexander: And Hamilton.

Mr. Paproski: And Hamilton. Parliament has voted hundreds of millions of dollars. We have witnessed a number of conferences at the federal-provincial level, and many of us have attended conferences designed to come to grips with these problems. It is a fact that when the government invited the provinces to Ottawa on these questions, shortly after the Prime Minister assumed his high office, the provinces went away empty-handed and disappointed. We know now why this was so. The reason was simply that the government refused to recognize the problems.

[Mr. Harding.]

It is obvious that the Prime Minister suffers from some kind of mental block when it comes to urban problems. The minister in charge of housing, transportation and urban problems is a reasonable man. He has held important and responsible portfolios; he was the architect of the unification of the armed forces; he was the chairman of a housing task force with which he allowed himself, as minister, to be actively identified. There is no question about his sincere appreciation of the problems involved in the urban field.

One can sympathize with and understand his feeling of frustration as month after month went by and nothing was done about the extremely serious problems affecting Canadians living in the big cities. In the face of the inertia and steadfast refusal of the Prime Minister to take the problems seriously, the minister, who is an honourable man, resigned. Because of that resignation we see the problem affecting this country today. That problem is indecision at the highest level; indecision about taxes, indecision about housing, indecision about inflation and indecision about pollution.

What of the old people eking out a miserable existence on $120 a month, while this government spends $50 million on a concrete shell in the city of Ottawa, and the Prime Minister disappears to Bugaboo Lodge, as my colleague the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) said? It was the Prime Minister's indecision which finally became a bugaboo for the Minister of Transport. He was the No. 2 man in the cabinet. There was no room in that cabinet for a No. 2 man there was room only for a No. 1 man. The No. 1 man is the Prime Minister, and don't you forget it.

• (8:00 p.m.)

Well, when the No. 1 man cannot make up his mind, what does the No. 2 man do? He resigns.

I, for one, am ready to give the Minister of Transport credit for a courageous act. We have seen the growth of ghettos transforming formerly attractive cities into sad and debilitated areas. We have seen pollution transforming attractive waterways into open sewers. We cannot go on selling out our heritage for a mess of pottage. The minister knew that. Yet, nowhere in that cabinet could he get any sympathy for his point of view.

The Prime Minister says, "We are spending a lot of money". No one will deny that. What are we getting for it? It is not the number of housing starts that we are worried about. As the Prime Minister said today, it is the number of completions in a single year, and it is the soaring cost of those houses once they are completed.

Let us not forget that the 11 per cent tax that this government imposed represents one of the major elements in escalating the price of homes beyond the reach of ordinary Canadians. The more the value is inflated, the bigger the tax gets. A $12,000 home five years ago is a $16,000 home today, and the tax is applied to the $16,000. Naturally, it becomes a bigger and bigger tax as prices go up.

We all know that action must be taken on urban problems. We all know that there must be a minister in the government with whom the provinces can deal, a minister to whom the provinces can turn with their problems, a minister with whom the municipalities can confer. We will have a new minister in charge of housing, I hope. I do not envy him that position because he will have the same problem as did the former minister, namely, the problem of getting this government interested in the "nuts and bolts" questions of keeping this country a good place for Canadians to live.

The Minister of Transport is not the issue here, nor the minister's resignation. The issue here is the Prime Minister and the policies or lack of policies which made that resignation necessary. It is up to the Prime Minister to explain to the house what his polices are. We do not want the wishy-washy cover-up we got yesterday, but a full, frank and complete exposé of the government's program for housing; their program for making land assembly funds available to municipalities; their program to combat pollution and the blight of urban decay. That is the only way in which the Prime Minister can deal with this situation.

Has he or has he not got a program? If he has, what is it? We have waited a whole year now for some sign of action on the part of the government, some realization on their part that there were problems in these areas and that something had to be done. There has not been the slightest indication that the government even recognizes the problems. Naturally, if they do not recognize them, they cannot solve them.

The issue is a simple one. Both the Minister of Transport and the Prime Minister cannot be right. One of them must be wrong. If what the minister said is true and the Prime Minister is taking a hand's off attitude about some of the most serious and urgent problems affecting Canadians in every province, then he should say so and take the issue to the people. If the Prime Minister feels that his constitutional beliefs are such that the government can neither co-operate with the provinces nor show leadership in the fields of housing, pollution, urban transit, and slum renewal—and this is what the provinces themselves have charged—then let the Prime Minister say so in a frank and honest way. Let him take the question to the people so that Canadians can decide whether or not they want leardership in these fields.

Let him take the issue to the people and let us see whether they will believe the Prime Minister's lame, halting, confused explanation, or the clear, concise position taken by the Minister of Transport. This is a matter so important to the future of this nation that only the people can decide.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I regret that it has been necessary for me to miss a good part of the debate today. I realize that a great deal has been said on this subject and that many facts and figures have been adduced. However, I feel that, coming from the west coast, I have something to say on behalf of the people out there for whom a housing crisis does exist, as a matter of fact, for whom a housing crisis has existed for a long time. Many of these people will be terribly upset and disappointed when they listen to or read the words the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke here this afternoon. He said that, in his opinion, there is no housing crisis in Canada at the present time. There is none for the Prime Minister. There is none for most of us here in the house, and there is none for a great many Canadians because the housing crisis is basically a crisis of income and those people who can afford to rent or to buy decent housing accommodation can do so. As for the other people, the two-thirds of Canadians who have incomes of below $7,500, there exists a very great housing crisis, increasing in severity as one goes down the income scale.

It is not a new thing for the Prime Minister to have told us that no housing crisis exists. He said this last fall in the speech from the throne in which there was no mention of one of the major problems facing the Canadian people today, namely housing. Nor has there been any subsequent action which would result in providing homes for the people who need them in this country, people in the moderate and low income groups. There has been no subsequent action of any kind until the task force was hurriedly set up and travelled across Canada.

I am beginning to understand fully why the Minister of Transport decided to head the task force. I know of no other commission or committee of this type which has ever been headed by a minister. In my view it was a very strange thing to do, but I think I know why the minister did it. When a government does not like the recommendations in a commission report, frequently it pigeonholes it. I rather suspect that if an independent commission had gone across this country and the government had not liked the recommendations of that commission, that is what it would have done. So, the Minister of Transport decided not to run that risk and he headed the task force himself. Then, he hoped that the government would like the recommendations of the task force. However, the government was not even prepared to accept the recommendations of this task force headed by a cabinet minister. The resignation of the minister in charge of housing, in my view, marks the complete and total failure of the government to deal in any way with housing in this country.

The thing that most appalled me in the Prime Minister's speech this afternoon was the total lack of consideration which he displayed for people with moderate and low incomes. Even worse than that was the total lack of any knowledge of how people, apart from those in the upper income levels, have to live in Canada. As he spoke I could not help thinking of the time when Marie Antoinette, prior to the French revolution, was told that the people had no bread to eat. She replied, cheerfully and logically, "Let them eat cake". Today, the Prime Minister, when told that these people had no homes in which to live, said, equally cheerfully and gaily in effect, "Let them go to Bugabook, or the West Indies, or some place else. There is no housing crisis in Canada".

As a matter of fact, we are reminded of an incident which took place not many weeks ago when the Prime Minister, in an exercise of participatory democracy, headed down to la Petite Bourgogne, a housing project in Montreal. He was met by a group of tenants who noisely demanded housing, and the Prime Minister had absolutely nothing to say to them. He left, and participatory democracy was left behind. He had no housing policy to give them. He did not even know that for these people there was a housing need. This is what we should be worrying about in Canada. The Prime Minister is worrying about the constitution and using it, as prime ministers have done over the years, as an excuse for doing nothing. This is nothing new on his part. For a long time the constitution has served as a shield for inaction with regard to pressing problems at the federal level. Instead of spending his time worrying about the constitution and using it as an excuse for inaction, the Prime Minister should start worrying about the people of this country, particularly the wellbeing of those who are in the low income brackets and are unable to look after themselves.

Consider the Hellyer Report for a moment. It says bravely that every Canadian should be entitled to clean, warm shelter as a basic human right. Yet the government knows, or should know, that private enterprise cannot possibly meet the housing needs of the great proportion of the two-thirds of Canadian families whose annual income is below $7,500 a year. The government is also aware that its own agency, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has provided in the past largely for the needs of the income group covering the upper 15 per cent in this country, though it is supported by all the taxpayers of Canada. The government knows that more than a million Canadian families have incomes of less than $5,500. It has been told by every housing expert in the country that public housing oriented to the needs of low-income groups is the only way in which people with low incomes can hope to have decent housing.

Despite this, the task force made a recommendation to put public housing in a deep-freeze until its less desirable features could be removed. Even so, the government was not willing to accept the report. Mr. Speaker, I come from Vancouver where there are two big urban renewal projects for which the city has been preparing. The architects and others have been working on them for two years.

Mr. Francis: May I ask the hon. lady a question?

Mrs. MacInnis: I do not want a question right now. Ask me at the end.

Over and over again, the green light has been sought from this government in connection with these projects so that work could go ahead to rehouse people who so badly need modern, decent housing. These efforts have met with no success. Today, again, my hon. friend from Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) asked about them. I, myself, have asked about them on a number of occasions. The City of Vancouver has been sitting on the doorstep waiting anxiously but can get nothing from this government. It is true the Prime Minister says: We are looking at these bread and butter projects. What people need is not looking, but action.

They need a Prime Minister who can see that there are needs of this kind, one who does not have to be reminded by disorder in the streets that we need urban renewal and attention to urban problems. We were told yesterday by the vice-chairman of the Economic Council that if action is not taken to deal with poverty and these urban difficulties, we shall likely get disorder in Canada's streets along the lines of that experienced to the south. Does the Prime Minister look forward to a situation of this kind?

I should like to remind the government of the need of young couples who are starting to raise families, but who lack decent accommodation in which to do so. What is the sense of our spending money on education, on the rehabilitation of young people and in a host of other directions if we allow the very seedbed of Canadian citizenship to remain in such a poor condition? Good citizens cannot possibly be raised in some of the conditions we find in housing today, these fire traps and rat traps about which we have heard in so many speeches.

I should like to make a plea, too, for the elderly people who cannot find a place in which to live. When I was home at Easter many such cases came to my attention. An elderly lady was living in a small basement room; she had been told to leave and had no place to go. A mother was trying to raise two girls in one little room behind a store. She found there was a long waiting list for public housing, and that nothing short of death would create a vacancy. Even then, there were too many people ahead of her. And what about the 40,000 families where there is no father as breadwinner, or the families who are living on relief, or those which are supported only by the mother? These are the people of whom I am thinking, and they are to be found in every Canadian city.

When we get a replacement for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), I think we should get twins. It is no use having a minister of transport in charge of housing. The Canadian people are sick and tired of having housing tied like an appendage to other departments. In the eight years since 1960, housing has been tied to five different departments. It has been shifted from one to another. What is everybody's business is nobody's business. Though the government pays lip service to the principle that housing should receive a high priority, responsibility for housing has been made an appendage of the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Labour, the Department of Public Works—I cannot remember the others for the moment. The Prime Minister could, of course, reserve it for himself. If he does so, he will be giving this responsibility to somebody who says he cannot see evidence of a housing crisis. In that case, it will become a little memory and will go the way of other memories connected with housing in this country.

I urge the Prime Minister and those behind him to see the writing on the wall while there is yet time. We have seen no disorder in our streets yet. We still have citizens who believe that the Prime Minister and the government intend to do something; that all the shiny new machinery that has been set up since the beginning of September will produce results and that all the extra civil servants are there for some purpose. They believe that the regional desks, the extra boards and commissions will be turning out services and facilities which the people need. While they still believe these things, let me urge the government to take action before it is too late. I suggest that the Canadian people will be patient only for a little while longer. When they find they will not get houses, when they find nothing will be done, there will be a change. The Canadian people are going to turn into something very different from the patient, quiet, well behaved citizens they have been. If the government will not solve these problems for the well being of the people and out of concern for the way the majority of the people in this country have to live, let them do it in order to save themselves while there is still time. We in Canada are patient, but there is a limit to our patience.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, in the wee small hours of this morning, Mr. Jean Beliveau said "I am going to put an end to it", and did precisely that. I think there is a general agreement on this side that my contribution will wind up this particular game of overtime.

The history of housing in Canada has many chapters that could be considered studies in frustration. To this state of frustration has been added the tragedy of a man who has put a great deal of enthusiasm into trying to do something about the housing situation in Canada. He has been frustrated and his reward is to depart from a high position in public life.

Since two o'clock this afternoon, we have debated many aspects of the situation. Two of the most important aspects are the government's approach to the constitution and, what has been hardly touched upon, the reorganization of the government departments as well as the related question as to whether they can reach decisions easily. It seems one of the by-products of the approach of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to government has been to make the decision process more cumbersome than it had been previously.

We heard the Prime Minister speak this afternoon. He put forward the best face he could following the resignation of his senior Privy Councillor. When the Prime Minister's speech was finished, Mr. Speaker, the fact still remained that the body was still at the scene and so was the Prime Minister. I suggest that with the Minister of Transport continuing to occupy a seat in the house, the Prime Minister will find himself very much like MacBeth who was haunted by the ghost of one he had slaughtered.

The Prime Minister has not given us an explanation of the differences between himself and the Minister of Transport. No explanation has been given, yet this is the real purpose of the debate. If we cannot get the information inside the House of Commons, we can look at what happened over the past few months. We can look at the statements made by these gentlemen outside the house and get a pretty clear idea of what has happened.

The Prime Minister has mentioned the proposed amendments to the National Housing Act. This was the legacy from the Minister of Transport. I listened carefully to the Prime Minister on this point. He seemed to deal with specific aspects of the housing problem, but not with the heart of the problem. The heart of the housing problem is twofold. The first aspect of the problem is the cost of housing, and the other is housing for people with lower incomes. With neither of these core problems has the government been conspicuously successful in arriving at good solutions.

As the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) noted, housing has been an additional portfolio. What has been done by the various ministers? Mr. Nicholson carried out a series of symposia from coast to coast. The right hon. Mr. Pearson held a dominion-provincial housing conference which was one of the more monumental fiascos in these parts. Following the last election, the Minister of Transport enthusiastically travelled around the country heading up a task force.

The task force has made its report, but what actual changes have occurred in housing policies since the last election? There has been some extra home building as a result of a $170 million windfall. This was simply a diversion from public housing because that money was not spent for public housing, but used for home building.

Secondly, there was the cut in public housing because of sociological and other distressing factors. The Minister of Transport promised he would bring in the criteria for acceptable housing projects. This has not been received yet, and today was supposed to be the last day this would be presented. For historians of this rather interesting occasion, I refer to Hansard of last Thursday in which there are exchanges dealing with this criteria. On Tuesday of this week I asked the Minister of Transport when those criteria would be available. He did not say "by the end of the week", but "fairly soon".

I suspect the failure to win acceptance for this criteria may have been part of the minister's frustration. An announcement was made with regard to a start on two housing projects for lower income people in Ottawa. I think these will be very worth while. I certainly hope they achieve what the minister had in mind. However, it is a very small experimental start on what is really a very severe national problem.

One specific act in the field of housing is the provision for more flexible National Housing Act mortgages with periodic reviews. A person is not faced with the prospect of having to settle for one fixed interest rate over a long range mortgage but can have a short range mortgage which will be negotiable at the end of five years at whatever interest rates prevail at that time. I suggest this really means people are asked to gamble, to guess, or both. If any of us in this chamber five years ago could have guessed what type of mortgage position we would be in today, I think we would be horrified. Five years ago no one would have anticipated mortgage rates of 10 per cent and second mortgage rates of almost double that.

These are four things that have happened in the housing field since the Minister of Transport was appointed to head the task force and made responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. No wonder the story reeks of frustration. There are other factors, of course. The government ignored his task force report and the suggestion going to the core of the problem, the one to do with setting up a department of urban affairs. All those recommendations were met with a blunt no. When the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) asked in this chamber whether the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials was to be removed, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) dismissed the idea in a cavalier manner. He also did that the other day, almost out of contempt for the ideas of the outgoing Minister of Transport.

On looking through the transcript of the press conference one finds that the minister considered most important the idea of making loans to municipalities, with the concurrence of the provinces, of course, so they could buy serviced land. The idea was to buy time with the constitutional purists of the cabinet, but that did him little good. He considered that such a policy was most likely to succeed and was the most practical policy. In the transcript he is reported as saying, in part:

> The reason I feel that is very important is because it is the only way that I know that you can get the cost of housing down quickly. Well, I shouldn't say the only way—the most practical way, the thing that is most likely to succeed in the short run, and consequently I put considerable importance on it because I think the cost of housing could be reduced by say $1,000 to $2,000 per unit for all houses built in Canada in perpetuity, by aggressively pursuing this policy.

There, he was speaking of something that was at the heart of the recommendations contained in the report of the task force. That was all whistled aside because of a constitutional position about which many of us have serious doubts. No wonder the minister could take it no longer and simply backed out.

Years ago, in the 1920's and 1930's, one of the great English judges on the judicial committee of the Privy Council looked at the Canadian constitution and treated it with what lawyers call the living tree approach. That is, the constitution was not the bare bones of something put together in 1867 but was a growing and useful instrument which took into account precedents arising from dominion-provincial developments over the years following the enactment of the British North America Act. I think the living tree philosophy for a constitution is sound. I suggest that the Prime Minister has taken the living tree of our constitution and vigorously pruned many of the new limbs. Has the man never heard of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Mr. Bell: I doubt it.

Mr. McCleave: Why, if the Prime Minister's philosophy had held sway in previous years the National Housing Act would never have become reality. Have not the National Housing Act and Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation become great instruments for the development of Canada?

Again I say that the Prime Minister has taken the living tree of our constitution, knocked off all kinds of branches and turned it, or tried to turn it, into dead wood.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. Pursuant to Section 13 of Standing Order 26 I am satisfied that the debate has been concluded. I, therefore, declare the motion carried.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, is there anything particular for Monday, if the government can look that far ahead?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Business will be as announced yesterday, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. Before adjourning I think we ought to extend our thanks to the staff and to the officers of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): And to many who have contributed as much as those who spoke in the debate.

This house stands adjourned until Monday, at 2 o'clock p.m. I hope you all have a happy weekend.

At 8.40 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
