SHIRLEY ROSS:

A Story of Woman's Faithfulnes

CHAPTER XLIII.

It was later on the same day, and the shades of night were gathering over. Erindale. The oottages were all closed, and only little glimmers of light were shining through the cracks of the shuttered windows in those where theirmates had not yet retired to rest. The Oliphant arms was closed, although the light streamed ruddily from the fanlight over the door, still lighting up the little bit of streat upon which it fell, and falling upon the bowed, shrinking figure of a wolnan who was making her way down the street as fast as her trembling limbs and the slippery state of the roads allowed her. If any of the villagers had met her they would have recognized her immediately; but the uneven, irregular street was empty and deserted, and there was none to see the school-mistress as she shirried along.

The clook in the church tower had just struck 11 as she had left the cottage adjoining the school-house, sending Jip back, when he followed her, to the threshold of the door, and bidding him "Watch," and, when the dog had obeyed, she had locked him into the house and hurried down the hill, pale and trembling and nervous, starting at every sound, and pressing her clasped hands to her heart, as if to still its throbbings.

But her agitation was not entirely to be shrobbings.

But her agitation was not entirely to be attributed to nervous fear of the dark night. Had her face been visible, any one might have seen upon it a great fear which was not due to physical alarm.

"Am I doing right? Am I doing right?" she muttered as she pressed on. "Oh, Heaven help me —Heaven help me! I do not know where to turn or what to do. Am I prudent in taking this step? And yet—and yet I cannot let him die—I cannot see him suffer so cruelly without obtaining what assistance I can. Oh, Jack, if you were not Guy's friend."

The tears were gathering thickly in her eyes; but she dashed them away impatiently as she went on, quickening her steps for a few minutes, then from very weakness obliged to slacken them again. And so, stopping at intervals to recover breath and regain sufficient strength for another start, she made her way to a pretty white house at the other end of the village, and there she paused, looking up wistfully at the windows whence no light issued.

The white house faced the road, being But her agitation was not entirely to be wistfully at the windows whence no light issued.

The white house faced the road, being divided from it only by a small strip of garden, and the hall door was in the centre; but there was a side door, from which a narrow stream of light issued, and toward this Shirley walked rapidly. But when she had reached it, and had even litted her hand to the bell, she hesitated, shrinking back and moving away again; then she advanced and pulled the bell, giving it a swift sudden pull which rang a peal that aroused all the echoes of the quiet house. Almost immediately the door was opened by a sharp-looking boy of fifteen or sixteen.

teen.
"My word, but you did ring!" he was beginning saucily, when he recognized the applicant and adopted a more respectful tone. "I beg pardon, ma'am; I did not see you at first. Do you want the Doctor, Mrs. Grant?"

Mrs. Grant?

Shirley was leaning against the wall by this time, panting and breathless; but she forced the white lips to answer in the affirmation.

mative.
"Yes," she said. "Is he in !"
"No, Mrs. Grant." the boy answered, civilly. "He is out at a dinner-party at the Rectory; but I expect him back every moment. Will you wait to see him, Mrs. Grant? Or shall I run around and fetch him?"

"I will wait," she answered; and the boy ushered her into a little waiting room, which looked cold and comfortless, with the fire dying out in the grate.

The lad turned up the gas into a sudden flare, which made Shirley cover her eyes for a moment; then he pulled forward a chair and placed it for her.

"I will tell the Doctor you are here, ma'am," he said, "the very minute he comes in."

"Thank you." Shirley said, was site.

ma'an," he said, "the very minute ne comes in."

"Thank you," Shirley said, wearily, as she sunk down upon the chair he had placed; and then, when the boy had left and she was alone, she crossed her arms upon the table and let her head sink upon them in an utter and intense weariness of mind and body. But the weakness was only momentary; almost immediately she raised her head, and, rising, she began to pace up and down the little waiting room, pushing back her hair from her brow with a troubled, bewildered, almost despairing expression.

pusning back her has iron her brow with a troubled, bewildered, almost despairing expression.

"Have I done right? Oh, merciful Father, have I done right?" she muttered, as the little feet hurried to and fro swiftly and unsteadily. "Dare I trust him? Dare I trust any one? And yet the responsibility is sodreadful that I cannot bear it alone. Oh, Heaven help us all—Heaven help us all—she with the prayed inco-herently.

When she heard the doctor's step coming up the gravel path she started, and, sitting down, tried to wait his entrance with something-like composure; but it was a very pitifully eager face which met the mew comer's glance as he entered the waiting-room; and the eagerness died out of Shirley's eyes and a terrible disappointment stole into them as she saw that it was not Dr. Lloyd, but his assistant, Mr. Litton, who stood before her.

"Mrs. Grant" he exclaimed, in some surprise. "I hope you have not been waiting long? You ought to have sent Saunders for me. Do you want my services yourself, or have you been doing one of mrs. crant: he scanned, in some surprise. "I hope you have not been watting long? You ought to have sent Saunders for me. Do you want my services yourself, or have you been doing one of your kind actions and sitting up with some poor patient of ours?" He was a slender, handsome man of seven or eight-and-twenty, with a pleasant kindly face and keen blue eyes which looked at Shirley rather attentively as she stood opposite to him with wide desolate eyes and thas intense disappointment on her face. He had put out his hand to her on entering, and mechanically she had put her shaking, trembling fingers into it; and they lay there still, firmly clasped in his gloved hand.

Mr. Litton had been dining at the Rectory, and over his evening clothes he wore a heavy ulster, in which he looked flushed and happy and handsome. Some of the Erindalites thought that there was "something" between Dr. Lloyd's handsome assistant and the Rector's pretty daughter. Whether it was the case or not, it was certain that he was very frequently at the Rectory; and there was a pleased, well astisfied smile in his blue eyes which showed that he had not met with a cool reception there this evening.

"What can I do for you?" he said, gently, seeing Shirley fallered,
"You look was there was a pleased, well astisfied smile in his blue eyes which showed that he had not met with a cool reception there this evening.

"You so be out. Did you come alone?"
"You you so be out. Did you come alone?"
"You you so be out. Did you come alone?"
"Yas, 'Shirley fallered.
"Was there no one who could have are you such a long walk? You look quite exhausted."
"And the need was urgent?"

"No one."
"And the need was urgent?"
"Yea."
"Poor child!" he said, pityingly. "I do not shink many can need my professional services more than you do yourself at this

"Mr. Litton, can I trust you?" she asked, a great carnestness in her voice and on her face.

"I hope so," he said, smiling a little. "My dear Mrs. Grant," he added, with a gravity which sat well on his handsome face, "in the profession to which I have the honor to belong we become the recipients of many secrets, and a doctor is obliged to be as trustworthy as a confessor himself. If what you have to tell me is something which you have to dil me is something which you have to dil you fears. You may safely trust me, for your secret will never pass my lips."

"It is not my secret only," she said, loking up at him with wistful, troubled, pleading eyes. "Oh, if I dared tell you—if I dared tell you!"

"No—oh, no!"

"No—oh, no!"

"Then why do you hesitate? I am not as old as Dr. Lloyd, certainly; but I can keep a secret as well as if my hair were gray."

Shirley rose in her uncertainty, clasping and unclasping her hands in her excessive agitation.

"Mr. Litton, forgive me," she said, brokenly, after a pause. "I am in very great distress and perplexity, and I do not know what to do. I hardly dare trust any one."

"Would you like me to give you my

"Would you like me to give you my word of honor that I will say nothing of anything you tell me?" he asked, gently, pitying the intense distress from which she was so evidently suffering.

"Will you?" she said, eagerly, turning to him with outstretched hands.

"Yes—willingly, if it will alleviate your distress."

"Yes—willingly, if it will alleviate your a distress."
"Oh, thank you—thank you!" she cried.
"Will you promise me to ask no questions to but such as are absolutely necessary, to tell in one in all the world where I shall take in you to night, and what you see there?"

"I promise."
"I promise."
"It is a matter of life, and death," she asid, brokenly. "Oh, if I could only be sure of what I ought to do! It seems as if there were no alternative, as if I must trust you; and yet—will you; and yet—will you; and yet—will you; and yet—some ompassion; he could not feel offended at the will be an in the wait to confidence in him; every other feeling merged in pity for her distress.

He looked surprised for a moment, then said hastily—
"Cartainly; I am at your service."
He opened the door for her, and, with a desperate effort, she regained sufficient composure to precede him out of the room, across the little passage, and into the garden across the little passage, and into the garden.

"Don't sit up for me, Saunders," Mr. Litton said, careleasly. "I have my latch-key, and in all probability I shall Lot be required to night."

"Very well, sir," said Saunders, who shat the door noisily after Mr. Litton, as he followed Mrs. Grant down the path, joining her at the gate.

She was calmer now; the draughthe had given her was taking effect, and the face she turned toward him had lost its agonized expression of fear.

"Are you well wrapped up?" he asked, gently. "I fear not," he added, as he draw her shawl round her and gave her his arm, "I wish I had brought a wrap for you."

"I do not need it," she answered, quickly. "I am quite warm, almost too warm indeed."

"Too warm on this bitter night!" he warm indeed."

"Too warm on this bitter night!" he said, incredulously. "It is not a fit night for a delicate woman like yourself to be Out."

Notwithstanding the intense excitement under which she was laboring Shirley Glynn noticed, and never forgot, her companion's thoughtful care of her

Shirley Glyhn hotoca, and heve to spot, her companion's thoughtful care of her that night. He talked easily and pleasantly, thus avoiding the embarrassment of a silent walk, but without giving her the trouble of answering. He described the dinner-party at the Rectory, meanwhile taking care not to walk too fast for her, but suiting his steps to hers, and making her lean upon him when they came to the hill on which the school house stood. And then, seeing that his light chat distressed her, he ceased, and gave his whole attention to affording her the support she needed far more than she owned even to herself.

At last they reached the school-house, and Shirley's trembling fingers unlocked the door and admitted him into the little passage. When she had closed the door and admitted him into the little passage when she had closed the door and admitted him into the little passage. When she had closed the door and admitted him into the little passage. When she had closed the door and admitted him into the little passage when she had closed the door and admitted him into the little passage. When she had closed the door and admitted him into the little passage. When she had closed the door and admitted him into the little passage when she had closed the door and admitted him into the lamp was burning on the table, and there was a bright fire.

With an abrupt gesture Mrs. Grant pointed to a chair, and bade him sit down for a moment; then throwing of her shawl and bonnet, she went quickly up stairs, leaving Mr. Litton alone. Five minutes passed while he waited for her, and she sound of voices reached him as he satmuffled voices, it seemed to him, broken once or twice by a dreadful cough. Then the came down and beckoned to the dootor. He put his hat on the table and went to the door at which she stood.

"It have trusted you," she said, "and you have promised. Now come with me, and remember the promise you gave me."

"I will remember it," the young man said, gravely, as he followed her up the narrow staircase into the room and the voices had proceeded.

CHAPTE1. XLIV.

"It is avery painful business altogether," is aid Lady Oliphant gravely. "I really do not know what to do for the best."

"I am afraid, my dear, that you have no one but yourself to blame for the annoymance," said Sir Frederic quietly as he look. It is a state of the same and the said Sir Frederic quietly as he look and the same and

"Oh, Fred, I do not believe it! Of course one can understant about Mr. Litton. She is so lonely, poor thing, and he is very nice and pleasant and agreable, and it is quite likely that they have fallen in love with each other; but that Mr. Grant is so depreved—No," continued Lady Oliphant-energetically, "I will not believe it!"

"I shought Litton was engaged to Rocie Venn?" said Sir Frederic dryly.

"He paid her a great deal of a tatention," said his vife. "And puor Resie is very much distressed about this rumor concerning Mrs. Grant. Really it is very painful; and I do not know what to do;

"My dear Maggis, your duty is perfectly plain. You must dismiss Mrs. Grant at once, and find a less attractive and mysterious teacher for your schools. To-day is a whole holiday, and you had better drive up the hill and get rid of a very disagreeable task, unless you would prefer to write to her."

"I think it would be kinder to see her," Lady Oliphant said, with some hesitation. "I suppose it must be done, Fred?"

"There is no alternative, deer. I regret it for your sake and poor Madge's, for the child mis sincerely attached to Mrs. Grant; but it cannot be helped. At any rate, the child mis sincerely attached to Mrs. Grant; but it cannot be helped. At any rate, the child mis sincerely attached to Mrs. Grant; but it cannot be helped. At any rate, the child mis not go to the oottage," he added decisively. "I cannot allow that!"

"No, certainly not. I am glad Gny and Mr. Ross are here, as their society will amuse her and distract her attention."

Sir Frederic's glance followed his wife's, which had fixed itself on a group standing on the terrace, at some little distance from the house, having just ascended the broad atone steps leading from the flower-garden upon which the breakfast-room opened. It was a pretty group, and to the mother's loving eyes it was a significant one; and, while slies amiled, she sighed, softly at the thought it conjured up.

"Wny not?"
"I should not like to be called a fortune-hunter, Gny."

"Who would call you so?"

"Her father and mother—Madge herself perhaps." the young man said, with a little tremot in his voice.

"Her rainer and mether—Madge herself perhaps," she young man said, with a little tremot in his voice.

"I am sure they would not. Their only wish would be for the child's happiness; and i think she likes you, Ross."

A gleam of eager delight flashed into Jack's blue eyes.

"If I could think so I would be the happiest man on earth." he said eagerly. "But no—I dare not. Such happiness is not for me, and—"

"And what?" Gry asked gently.

"And what?" Gry asked gently.

"And when they knew, as know they must, that I had been the real cause of Shirley's misery, they would hate and despise me."

"How must they know it, Jack?"

"Because I could marry no girl without telling her that episode of my past life, Stuart." he said gravely and bremulously.

"I call myself an honorable man; and yet poor Shirley gave her happiness and perhaps her life to save me from being branded as a felon."

"No fault, so bitterly repented of and atoned for by years of patient plodding, industry and self denial, could stand against you now, Jack—at least, not with such people as the Oliphants, who are far too iberal minded to hold such a narrow creed as that," said Guy earnestly. "Do you care for her, Jack?" he added, after a pause.

"With my whole heart," Jack answered, as that," said Guy earnestly. "Do you care for her, Jack?" he added, after a pause.

"With my whole heart," Jack answered, almost with a groan. "Guy, I have been undecided whether it was not better to go away and never see her again."

"You are but a timid wooer, Jack. Don't go away. Wait patiently. Since you love her so well, it cannot do you much harm to wait a little longer even if your affection is not returned. Ah, here she is, pretty child—a sight to make an old man young!" soded Guy, smiling as he went forward to meet Madge, while Jack, in almost uncontrollable agitation, moved away in an opposite direction.

"What is the matter with Mr. Rose?" she asked, as she held out her pretty little hand for Guy to button her gloves.

"A very common malady," said Major Staart, smiling, as he bent over the little hand.

"And what is that?"

"Disease of the heart." choed Madge the bright color fading somewhat. "Do you mean that he is ill, Guy?"

"Not exactly," he answered gravely, while poor Madge hurriedly recalled all the stories she had ever heard about people who had disease of the heart—how they had gone about without even knowing the malady by which they were affected, until suddenly they had dropped dead, without a warning or a moment's preparation.

"Guy, what do you mean?" she said with tremulous earnestness; and Guy, 'looking up from the little gloves, saw how pale she had grown.

"Nothing, but he has fallen in love, my poor Madgie," he answered, smilling "Why, you look quite pale and startled!"

"Why, you look quite pale and startled!"

"Why, no wonder! Guy, you are very provoking." he answered, smilling. "May I not button the lanswered, smilling."

the roof of one of the tenements on a recent hot night and counted 27 men lying on rough beds in their underclothes, without any other covering. Away in the distance could be seen the lights of the great bridge glittering like a necklace of diamonds upon the bosom of the fair city. And between the roof and the lights was the naked cros of Christ friging out of the haggard precinct, clear and distinct against the hazy, swooning, summer sky. The half-clad sleepers to seed about, sometimes perilously near the edge of the roof. He saw seven board bunks in one room, and two more stood against the wall like swathed toboggans. Vermin abounded everywhere. There were in some of the rooms miserable loopholes that served as windows, but there were no corresponding vents on the other side of the rooms to create a draught. In another room the walls and floor and ceiling were coated with grease and dist. Bundles of rags and clothing were hesped up in every corner. Lines covered with ill smelling garments were stretched across the apartment. A tambourine and violin hung on one wall. Bottles and pans and bags stuffed with mysterious and ill-smelling articles furnished forth the place with bric-a-brac. A stove winked its red yess in one end of the biggest room and blistered the wall. In a crade beside the stove a poor baby wailed. Its ignorant mother hovered lovingly over the little unfortunate. Eight or ten lodgers were preparing to go to bed. At each side of the main apartment were rude wooden platforms on which they were to sleep. The inner room contained two huge beds, which filled the place almost from wall to wall, leaving in fact less than two feet of space to walk in. And he piaced them on file.

I waited till the piaper came—
I reno it for a while.
In hope to find my verses there;
But still they were ou file.

I waited still another week,
Like one in durance vile,
To find my verses beautiful
Had still remained on file. I waited on the editor;
He met me with a smile:
"Your verses will be news," said he,"
"Though left some months on file.

Fresh news is coming in so fast,
It forms a spacious pile.
Your verses—they will have to wait
A week or two on tile." I've waited now long, weary months, In choking down the bile That rises in my throat because My verses are on file.

He must an ignoramus be
Of true poetic style,
Or else my verses rich and rare
Would not remain on file. FAR MERSVILLE, July 13th.
