Appetite and Health Restored by Hood's Sarsaparilla.

Mr. Chas. Steele, St. Catherine's, Ont.

"C. I. Hood & Co., Lowell, Mass."
"For a number of years I have been troubled with a general tired feeling, shortness of breath, pain in the back, and constipation. I could get only little rest at night on account of the pain and had no appetite whatever. I was that tired in my limbs that I gave out before half the day was gone. I tried a great number of medicines but did not get any permanent relief from any of them."

Hood's Sarsaparilla Cures

hood's Sarsaparilla is a purifier of the blood, and a restorer of the system. It is a powerful medicine, which made me feel better at once. I have continued its use, having taken three bottles, and I feel like a new man. I have a good appetite, feel as strong as ever I did, and enjoy perfect rest at night. I have much pleasure in recommending Hood's Sarsaparilla to all who are afflicted with any of the above named ailments. Write to CHAS. STEELE, with Eric Frothingham Co., St. Catherine's, Ontario.

Take care of your eyes, or you will perhaps be unable to take care of yourself.

If the eyes become impaired, not to say deprived of sight altogether, the unfortunate sufferer of such a calamity will find himself helplessly crippled for the struggle of life. Believe your eyes in every possible way and use spectacles as soon as you perceive that any benefit may be derived from their aid. We have the largest stock of glasses for every eye and anything we haven't got, or cannot procure, isn't to be had anywhere. We also keep the great German Eye Water.

A Sainly Priest Murdered in Paris.

(Paris Correspondence of the Philadelphia Catholic Times).

The week ending May 18 witnessed one of those crimes which have the effect of arresting the shocked attention of a nation. The Abbe de Broglie, and prince of the famous house of that name, a man of letters and a saint, was brutally assassinated by a woman whom he had loaded with benefits, and whose confessor he had been for a considerable period. Without a single exception the Paris press, good and bad, united in paying a tribute of respect and veneration to the saintly priest's memory. The dramatic features of this case prompt me to give them in detail. The murderer belongs to a class of women which is on the increase, and reveals the fact that the Catholic clergy have frequently to endure a martyrdom in their pastoral office not less painful and meritorious than death itself.

Maxence Amelot was a single woman, aged 49, living in a small flat on the fourth floor, 5, Rue Notre Dame des Champs, Paris. Up to the age of 33 she worked as a milliner, by which time she had sufficiently prospered to retire from business on a little income of about 1,500 francs. She was then free to follow her bent, which consisted in passing her days in the churches and practicing devotions. With all her piety, however, she was remarkable for singularity of conduct. For several years she went constantly to confession to the Abbe de Broglie, but about three years ago by his advice, she chose another director. It was then that she began to display eccentricity, and she became a devotee with a grievance. She asserted that she was being persecuted, that she was being surrounded by enemies, that people turned their backs on her, and she attributed all this to the clergy, and particularly to the Abbe de Broglie, whom she roundly accused of having broken the seal of confession. In her folly she actually wrote to the Prefect of Police on the subject. In the meanwhile, although she had chosen another confessor, Amelot gave the Abbe de Broglie no peace. She "shadowed" him in every direction, forced herself into his presence and pestered him with long letters. The good man bore all this with extraordinary patience and gentleness, but his tormentor showed him no mercy. Finally she began to threaten and his friends counseled him to take steps to put an end to what was a public scandal and danger, but the abbe, in dispensing his charities, had been so accustomed to threats that he laughed at these forebodings. Two months ago the woman more and more excited, bought a "bull-dog" revolver, saying to her acquaintances she could "now defy the clergy, and if they continued to persecute her she would kill them."

The Abbe de Broglie was a professor of the Catholic University in the Rue Vaugrand. Every morning about 7 he said his Mass in the adjoining chapel of the Carmes. Last Friday morning voices were heard in the sacristy. The Abbe de Broglie was in and was hotly demanding a "retraction" from the Abbe de Broglie who was still in his vestments after saying Mass. To calm her and avoid scandal he promised to call on her at 11 the following morning. The die was cast. True to his word, at the appointed hour the cleric ascended the steep stairs and was received by Amelot at the door, which she quietly bolted as he passed in. They then passed along a narrow passage until they came to a sitting-room, where the abbe was invited to take a chair. It was a low easy-chair or fauteuil. The woman sat on an ordinary chair close at his right hand. She began the old story, upbraided him for calumniating her, and demanded a written retraction and apology. She also showed her revolver and threatened to shoot him if he refused to comply. "You must be mad to give way to such thoughts," said the priest. At once she started up and fired, hitting him on the left cheek. The abbe tried to lay hold of the weapon but received another shot through the right hand. He then made for the door, which he was unable to open owing to its having been bolted. Amelot followed him and fired three shots in succession, the last ball inflicting a mortal wound in the back of the neck. The poor abbe de Broglie fell to the ground in a pool of blood, death being instantaneous. This scene is depicted from the accounts of the murderers and the police examination of the apartment. The right arm of the fauteuil on which the victim had sat, was saturated with blood. There were signs of a struggle in the room, and a trail of blood runs all along the passage. The priest's hat was found at the back of the easy-chair. The look of the door was bedabbled with bloody finger prints, from the vain efforts of the murdered man to escape.

After committing the hideous crime Mademoiselle Amelot coolly washed her face and changed her dress and hair, which were covered with crimson stains. Seeing that the blood was flowing under the door of the apartment, she mopped it up with towels and left them there. She then went to Pere Bullois, a Mariist Father, professor of the Catholic University. To him she disclosed what had happened, but in a tone so quiet and natural that he refused to believe her, until he noticed what appeared to be spots of blood upon her ears and her boots. Stricken with a horrible fear, he struck the holy oils and returned with Amelot to her residence. The news, alas! was too true. On opening the door he perceived the unfortunate abbe stretched on the floor at full length and bathed in a perfect sea of blood. He gave absolute attention sub conditione, and then, pale and trembling, he hurried off to M. Chobert, secretary of the university, and directed him to inform the police. Pere Bullois himself went for Dr. Tison, who could only testify to the deceased. M. Chobert, after giving information to the authorities, drove to the Rue Solferino, to the house of the Duke de Broglie, the abbe's brother. The Duke was just rising from table to go to the French Academy, of which he is a member, in company with the Count d'Haussonville, the accomplished leader of the Royalist party and nephew of the dead man. In reply to a question of M. Chobert relative to the health of the Abbe de Broglie, the Duke replied that his brother was very well indeed and had dined with him the night before. This quite upset M. Chobert, and not daring to break the sad news himself, he took Count d'Haussonville by the arm, begging him to inform the family of what had happened.

So far the neighborhood knew nothing of the tragedy in their midst, but the news spread like wildfire on the arrival of the Commissioner de Police and the relatives of the deceased. The effect was almost one of general consternation. Great crowds gathered in the Rue Notre Dame des Champs, waiting for hours until the remains were transported to the rooms of the Abbe de Broglie at 11 Rue Paul Louis Courier. Amelot was placed under arrest, but maintained the same calm attitude, supremely satisfied with what she had done.

The funeral ceremony took place on Wednesday morning in the magnificent Gothic Church of St. Clotilde. The catafalque was very simple. There were no flowers. Over the pall were the sacerdotal vestments of the deceased priest and his cross of the Legion of Honor. By the request of his family, the immense building was thronged with sympathizers. There was a very large attendance of clergy, among whom I noticed Pere Didon, the famous Dominican preacher. The list of mourners included H. R. E., the Duke des Chartres, the Duke de Bisaccia, the Duke de Luynes, the Duke de Montmorency, the Duke de Blacas, the Duke de la Force, the Duke de Broglie and the family, M. de Mackau, nearly all the French academicians, including M. Francois Coppee, M. Jules Claretie, M. Gaston Bossier, M. Henri Housseye and the Vicomte Melchior de Vogue, the Russian Ambassador the Italian Ambassador and the Ministers of Denmark and Belgium. The Mass was celebrated by Mgr. d'Elust and the Bishop of La Rochelle gave the absolution. In the afternoon the remains were conveyed to Broglie (Eure) and placed in the family vault.

From the list of distinguished personages given above, it is evident that the Abbe de Broglie was no ordinary individual. In fact, he was a well-known character in Paris life, and few there were here who were not familiar with the refined and handsome face of the old prince-priest. The Abbe Paul de Broglie was born in Paris, January 20th, 1833, and began life as a naval officer. After twelve years' service he retired with the rank of lieutenant. From his earliest years he was fond of prayer and retirement. On receiving his liberty he devoted himself to years of charitable work in the streets of Paris. Although possessed of a large fortune, his aims were far beyond his means, and he was always poor. He was a ordained priest somewhat late in life, his self-sacrifice during that period of French history was remarkable, and he barely escaped with his life. The revolutionaries could not bear the thought of any one bearing the distinguished name of De Broglie occupying their hands. One unfortunate priest, Abbe Planchat, was actually shot by the Communists, being mistaken for De Broglie. The heroic conduct of the subject of this sketch merited for him the cross of the Legion of Honor. Since 1876 the abbe has been a professor at the Catholic University and a close personal friend of Mgr. d'Elust, the rector. His piety, charity and learning soon made him a great figure in Catholic circles, and it became to be understood that the Abbe de Broglie was the dispenser of the charities of the aristocratic Catholic families of Paris. For years past, and all the Catholics in America, has a value which no other of the relics ever brought here possessed in that the remains are complete. Other relics, which lie under the altars of Catholic churches, are but parts of the bodies of martyred saints. Here in a house of worship that is yet of humble proportions, lie the bones that 1,708 years formed a man and were animated with life. Another value attached to what the Catholics of this country will, when they become aware of its presence, regard as an acquisition of the greatest importance is, of a material character. It is accoutred with the jewels and silks that were placed upon and about it when it reached the Bavarian monastery.

These articles are dimmed by age, and their worth intrinsically, can only be estimated. But it must be thousands of dollars. Of pearls alone there are declared to be 800, and in addition there are amethysts, rubies, emerald, aqua marina and quantities of gold and silver thread.

The purpose of the presence in this country of so remarkable a relic is that which it served in Bavaria. There it was venerated by thousands who, firm in their faith in the efficacy of close association with it, sought relief from mental and physical affliction, or, confident of its power of intercession as a consequence of martyrdom, prayed for an increase of the favor of God. Such satisfactory evidence exists of the absolute identity of these remains, which accompanied them and which had been pronounced incontestable by many European Catholics in authority—that it is small wonder that confidence of benefit should have been in Europe, and will undoubtedly be here, inspired among many. The documents brought over by Father Gerard are merely official, but details regarding the veneration for St. Peregrinus in Europe are expected by the Benedictine Fathers to arrive shortly, in which there should be much of interest. In obtaining for their church the body of this martyr the Benedictine Fathers consider themselves especially fortunate, and they are properly grateful to Father Gerard Spellman, to whose efforts its possession by them is in the main due.

A Martyr's Bones.

There is now in New York city the body of a martyred saint—complete in holy vestments—with jeweled crown and many relics of his martyrdom, complete even to the little bottle of his own lifeblood, which flowed from his wounds as the Roman pagans put him to death. This sacred relic is the one of the most important, the most valuable and the most highly prized of all the treasures of the Church in America. St. Peregrinus—for that was his name—was put to death in A. D. 137. The Roman Emperor Commodus decreed that the man make a public denial of his religious faith and make sacrifices to the Roman gods or die. Though but a youth of seventeen years he unflinchingly entered the arena of the Coliseum, submitted without a murmur to the tortures of leaden scourges, to the horrors of the rack, the iron hooks, the thumb-screws, and at last the frightful agony of burning torches thrust into his bleeding flesh. Three of his friends, Eusebius, Pontianus and Vincentius, were put to death with him because they refused to worship the Roman idols. The remains of St. Peregrinus were removed at night from the scene of tortures by his friend and precursor, St. Rufinus, and buried in the Catacombs between the Appian and the Triumphal Ways. They remained there until 1731, when Kilian Kneuer, Abbot of the Monastery of the Benedictine Fathers at Neustadt-on-the-Main, in Bavaria, while on a visit to Rome, observed them, nothing that they were in an excellent state of preservation—as they are yet. He secured the consent of the Church authorities, and, armed with proofs of the genuineness of the relic of the days of martyrdom, transferred it to the monastery of which he was in charge.

Wrapped in a silken winding sheet and inclosed in a plain casket, the bones of St. Peregrinus were brought to this country on the Steamship Saale which arrived on last Good Friday. They were conveyed after Father Gerard Spellman, O. S. B., who obtained them, had explained to the customs officers that it was against the canon law to break the seal of the sacred relic until it had been authenticated by the proper ecclesiastical authorities to the house of the Benedictine Fathers, which adjoins the Church of St. Anselm, at Tinton avenue and One Hundred and Fifty-second street, New York, a locality which prior to annexation, was known as Woodstock. Already one remarkable cure as a result of contact with the casket has been reported. The relic in the eyes of the devout Benedictine Fathers, who are now its custodians, and of all the Catholics in America, has a value which no other of the relics ever brought here possessed in that the remains are complete. Other relics, which lie under the altars of Catholic churches, are but parts of the bodies of martyred saints. Here in a house of worship that is yet of humble proportions, lie the bones that 1,708 years formed a man and were animated with life. Godless Schools in France.

Look to France for the results of purely secular education! For about twenty years there, the schooling of youth has been entirely divorced from religion, and whatever moral instruction was imparted was dispensed on the basis of a purely non-religious system. Several years ago the beneficial results of the government's interference were pointed out by leading educators, and since then many eminent statesmen have pronounced the departure from the traditional religious training of pupils a great mistake. The subject is once more before the people of France through published interviews in the press, and the opinion voiced by the eminent authorities appealed to are all in one direction; namely, that the immorality which is increasing at such a terrible rate throughout the country is attributable to the expulsion of religious instruction from the education of the nation's children. The best minds agree that to check the loose moral code, and the lack of discipline in character everywhere noticeable to a deplorable extent, religious and moral instruction must once more be given their old places in the curriculum of the child's studies. Among the foremost of the advocates of the abandonment of the present system are M. Berenger, vice president of the Senate; M. Felix Peanet, the general school superintendent, himself a liberal in religious matters, and Professor Ernest Lavisse, the apostle of Idealism, who has flatly declared over and over again that the fundamental reason for the failure of the educational system in France is its non-religious character. Professor Lavisse, statement received a signal endorsement from no less a personage than the recently deceased minister, President Bureau, who, although he had left the Church altogether, wrote to M. Lavisse in these words: "I am firmly convinced that what you say is the truth. By making the only goal of our endeavor the prosperity of man, we forget that the true lover is the world and the safest source of happiness is found in self-sacrifice. As much as I admire the Greek philosophers, especially Socrates yet I am of the opinion that it was Christ who spoke the greatest word when he declared that the supremacy of the earth and of the heavens belongs to those who know how to love and to sacrifice."—Donshoe's Magazine.

Rev. James Kent Stone (Father Fidelis), the Passionist is soon to preach a mission at Kenyon, O., the place where stands the Protestant Episcopal seminary of which he was the president some thirty years ago before he became a Catholic. Dr. Stone's return to the scenes of his former labors in another faith will doubtless recall many memories to him, as well as to those who knew him when he was the head of Kenyon college. The learned and eloquent Passionist appears to be in gr. at demand as a missionary, and he is called to all parts of the country, as eager as pastors to secure his efficient services in behalf of their flocks.

Unveiling a Monument to Sir John A. McDonald.

The unveiling of the monument erected on Dominion square, Montreal, to perpetuate the memory of Sir John A. McDonald, took place on Thursday last amid the greatest pomp and enthusiasm.

The orator of the day was then introduced in the person of Hon. Geo. E. Foster, and the people of Montreal have perhaps never listened to a more powerful or elegant address than that delivered on Thursday last by the Canadian minister of finance.

On Thursday last, the day on which Sir John A. McDonald's monument was unveiled in Montreal, a beautiful wreath of roses rested on the desk formerly used by him in the House of Commons.
