tribe? Was he not just asking himself and other members of his party to "Keep on whistling, boys, until this vote on the plebiscite is taken; we must keep up our courage?" Every time the Prime Minister's name was mentioned we heard loud applause from the boys who are on their way to the political graveyard, a lot of these one-trippers who have so much to say and make for so much disunity in this country. They rise in their places and simply make for more disunity.

I close with something which came to my desk the other day. I hesitate to use it, but at the same time it does enunciate some ideas that are not going to help our position at the present time:

> They have a rendezvous with death,
> On desert plain or tropic hill,
> Where lethal bullets whistle shrill,
> And hell's black legions, winging high,
> Darken the April sky.
> For they have pledged and will be true;
> They will not fail their rendezvous.
> But we, when April brings its rain,
> Must argue whether we will keep
> Our faith with all the brave who sleep.
> Our cross—to break or to renew
> Another's pledge; our rendezvous
> With indecision and disgrace;
> Our shrine—the shabby polling place.

An hon. MEMBER: Shabby.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): It is, I am sorry to say, and it is more so on this plebiscite.

When I read that I also read this, from the world's greatest statesman, who received a vote of confidence recently of 490 to 1. How grand and glorious it would be if at this time we could do likewise in this chamber! He said:

> I avow my confidence was never stronger than at this moment that we shall bring this conflict to an end in a manner agreeable to the interests of our country and the future of the world.

That is Mr. Churchill. I commend that sentiment and feel likewise.

I add now a statement made by another great statesman, and it applies right this minute to one and all of us:

> There are tremendous things which need to be done and done now, with vigour, thoroughness and dispatch. We need more men for the overseas forces; we need a reallocation of men who are idling or who are wasting or half-wasting their time—the farm—the fighting forces.
> We are two years late in organizing this nation for the stern, grim compulsions of war. Political expediency has held us in its grip. Hadn't we better prepare to strengthen those men overseas? Hadn't we better get them reinforcements?
> In this hour when the whole world is writhing in flames, in this hour when the guns are roaring nearer and nearer to our shores, and when the enemy tightens his grip on civilization, we are not going to waste our time counting noses. Right now we want a sharp, swift drive for results.

That is from the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen.

Mr. GOLDING: The hon. member has intimated that I have received some letter from a Stratford paper. I want the hon. member to lay that letter on the table of this house. And I want to know what connivance is going on here.

On motion of Mr. Ross (Calgary East) the debate was adjourned.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I wish to make a brief statement. For the information of the business community I ordinarily would give it to the press, but as the house is sitting it is more appropriate that I give it here.

It is the intention of the government to introduce during the present session a minor amendment to the section of the Excess Profits Tax Act which defines the "standard period". The proposed amendment relates to new businesses which commenced operations after January 1, 1939, and will preclude them from taking the record of actual earnings in their first fiscal period as their standard profit. Such companies will have to apply to the board of referees for a determination of their standard profit.

Under the law as it now stands, taxpayers who commenced business after December 31, 1937, have the option either of taking their actual profits as their standard or of applying to the board of referees. In some cases this may give very unfair advantages to those taxpayers who commenced business after January 1, 1939. For example, if a company commenced business in the latter part of 1939, after war broke out, and, due to the war situation, made exceptionally large profits in its first fiscal period, these earnings under the present law would constitute the base from which excess profits would be measured. The proposed amendment will disallow this and make it necessary for such a company to apply to the board of referees for a determination of its standard profit.

On behalf of my colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) I wish also to say that the commissioner of income tax has clarified the position of sole proprietorships and partnerships in respect of the minimum standard profit of $5,000. He will interpret the wording providing for this minimum as allowing the minimum to apply after rather than before the deduction of reasonable salary.

[Mr. J. H. Harris.]

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 6.07 p.m.

Monday, February 9, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

SINGAPORE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER NEWS OF DEVELOPMENTS IN THE FAR EAST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is in a position or would care to give the house and the country any late information with respect to Singapore.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have no information that I believe will add anything to what has appeared thus far in the press.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT AS TO LEGISLATIVE PROGRAMME FOR THE SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A day or so ago my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked if I would give to the house a statement with respect to some of the measures that will be introduced at the present session. The legislative programme for the present session, like that of other sessions of parliament since the commencement of the war, will be confined in the main, and as largely as possible, to matters pertaining to Canada's war effort or arising immediately out of the war. As in previous sessions the most important measure will be the war appropriation bill. Legislation respecting the much discussed plebiscite will be introduced immediately upon the termination of the debate on the address. Legislation also will be introduced respecting the production and marketing of wheat; respecting land settlement for ex-service men, and related amendments to the Soldier Settlement Act; and respecting the ratification of certain trade treaties with Latin-American countries.

Among financial measures, bills will be introduced regarding new borrowing authority and the refunding of maturing issues; bills to amend the War Exchange Conservation Act, the Canadian National Railway financing and guarantee bill; a bill to ratify an agreement between the C.N.R. and the Temiscouata railway.

There will be amendments to the Civil Service Superannuation Act, the Companies Act and the Patent Act, and possible amendments to the naval service, militia and Royal Canadian Air Force acts. It is proposed to have the question of redistribution studied by a committee of parliament. There was a committee that took up the matter a session or two ago, and it is the intention of the government to have a committee look into the matter anew this session.

I have not cited the bills that already appear on the order paper, but in addition to those it is anticipated that there may be other bills of a more or less routine character. It must be understood that circumstances at the moment unforseen may, in the course of the session, occasion the introduction of other measures. I do not wish to bind the government exclusively to any programme; there may be other bills if the necessity should arise.

REQUEST FOR OPPORTUNITY TO DISCUSS PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if the government will give consideration to permitting the ordinary course of procedure to be followed with respect to the motions of private members. It will be recalled that in previous sessions of this parliament the government took the initiative in taking away from private members their undoubted right to discuss matters which they desire to place on the order paper. I had no great objection to that in the first session or two, but I think that right ought to be restored at the earliest possible moment, and I would ask that the government give consideration to that point of view.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The reasons which governed in this matter in the beginning, if they were valid at all at that time, seem to me to be even stronger at the present time. Those reasons, as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition will recall, were that in a war as serious as the present, the attention of parliament could not be given too exclusively to matters pertaining to the war and, what might be regarded as the other side of the same shield, that there should be as little as possible to distract or to prevent the attention of parliament being concentrated upon the war effort. If the motions of private members are to be considered it means that ministers and others must prepare themselves in regard to a number of questions that at the present time are more or less academic, and in these days the burden on the ministry is heavy enough in connection with the matters relating exclusively to the war to which it must give attention.

I do not wish to say that the government will not be prepared to consider what my hon. friend has suggested, but I am giving to him at once the view that has prevailed up to the present. I think the arguments are quite as strong to-day as they were at the time the decision of the government was taken. And if I recollect aright, the decision was taken by agreement with at least most of the members of the house.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Will what the Prime Minister has said about private members' motions apply also to private bills, public orders and divorce bills? Private members are the connecting link between the government of the day and the electorate, and when they cease to function, all parliamentary government is at an end.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I said had reference to the procedure which we followed in previous sessions. I may say in a word that the government intends to follow a similar procedure this session unless there are very strong requests to the contrary.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER WITH RESPECT TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Some days ago I promised the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) that I would make a statement to the house on the policy of the government in relation to the Japanese problem in British Columbia.

The situation created by the presence in British Columbia of a population of nearly 24,000 men, women and children of Japanese race has for a number of reasons received the closest attention of the government over the past four years. The situation increased in complexity when Japan, on September 27, 1940, associated herself with Germany and Italy in the tri-partite pact. Recognizing the more critical situation created when Japan joined the axis, the government immediately thereafter appointed, on October 1, 1940, a special committee to investigate and report upon the problem of Japanese in British Columbia from the standpoint of national security. The report and recommendations of the committee were tabled and published in December, 1940. The most important recommendation was that there should be a re-registration of the Japanese population of British Columbia and that a small standing committee should be set up to keep the government constantly informed as to the oriental situation in that province. These recommendations were acted on at once and in determining its policy the government has had the benefit of the advice of this standing committee on which various viewpoints were represented.

In the months which followed, re-registration was carried out by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police under the supervision of the standing committee. This registration included the photographing and finger-printing of all persons of Japanese origin. The committee received the utmost cooperation from Japanese nationals as well as from Canadians of Japanese racial origin. When a state of war was proclaimed as existing between Japan and Canada, the registration was all but complete. Precautionary measures, which have proved adequate, were put into effect forthwith.

The steps taken were similar to those taken in the case of German and Italian residents of Canada. Individuals, whatever their nationality, who there was reason for believing might act in a manner prejudicial to the public safety or the safety of the state, were promptly interned. Steps were also immediately taken to immobilize for the duration of the war all fishing boats operated by men of Japanese race.

Legitimate apprehensions in British Columbia were concerned with three things: the aid which might be given to enemy submarines and enemy raiders if they should be supplied with fuel or furnished with information; the possibility of acts of sabotage; and the possibility of anti-Japanese riots in which military force might have to be used to restore order.

To determine the policy to be followed a meeting was called in Ottawa on January 8, in which the members of the standing committee participated. This meeting was under the chairmanship of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) and at it the Hon. George Pearson represented the government of British Columbia.

The recommendations of the conference of January 8 and 9 were carefully considered by the government. On January 14 I announced the government's policy. I might summarize the policy as follows:

Persons of Japanese race, who are Canadians either by birth or by naturalization, and Japanese nationals resident in Canada will be justly treated. Their persons and property will receive the full protection of the law. No action will be taken which would give any excuse for the ill-treatment of Canadians under the control of Japan.

Nor will action be permitted which might give Japan an excuse to inflame Asiatic hostility against the white race. Canadian policies will march in step with those of Britain and the United States.

As specific measures, all persons of Japanese race will be removed from fishing boats and other vessels for the duration of the war. For the same period the sale of gasoline and explosives to persons of Japanese race will be controlled by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Japanese nationals have been forbidden to possess or use short-wave receiving sets, radio transmitters and cameras. Their present surveillance by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—similar to that successfully exercised over German and Italian nationals —will be continued.

For Canadians of Japanese race who are anxious to serve Canada, a civilian corps is being formed to be used on projects that will contribute to the national war effort.

Enemy aliens, whether nationals of Japan or of Germany or of Italy, will be required to leave the protected area on the coast of British Columbia. Permits to remain may be granted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. For the time being, permits will normally be granted to women and children and to men who are unfit. Those required to leave may be placed in normal employment, if it can be found for them, outside the protected area. They will, of course, be under the usual police surveillance over enemy aliens.

A commission has been set up to arrange for the sale, lease, requisition or charter of fishing vessels with a view to ensuring the sustained productivity of the fishing industry in British Columbia, and fairness to Canadians of Japanese race who own or have an interest in such vessels.

The defence area from which enemy aliens must withdraw has been defined by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and the Minister of Justice. The placing or employment of enemy aliens is being arranged by the Department of Labour through the unemployment insurance commission. The civilian corps is also being organized by the Department of Labour. A committee of the cabinet, consisting of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Agriculture, has been entrusted with a general supervision of the programme. This committee will recommend to the government from time to time such further action as may be necessary.

In all the arrangements being made in connection with the Japanese problem, special consideration is being given to Japanese Canadians who are veterans of the last war.

The situation on the Pacific coast has now been clarified. The government's policy has been determined and is being carried out by the responsible agencies. Under the circumstances it has been decided that we need no longer place on the members of the standing committee the burden and responsibility of advising the government in regard to this problem. I have written to the members of the committee and thanked them for the assistance they have rendered during the past year.

One of the results of the existence of a state of war between Canada and Japan has been the abrogation of the immigration agreement which was concluded in 1928. Thus as a result of Japan's own action, there are no longer any agreements or understandings, express or implied, in regard to the admission of Japanese to Canada.

It will be recognized that Canadian citizens of Japanese race have been placed in a very difficult position. They are being asked to bear with patience inevitable hardships and losses. A situation of this kind can only be effectively met by an equal measure of tolerance and understanding on the part of the people of Canada generally. In the national interest it is of the utmost importance that the problem should be approached in this spirit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many Japanese nationals have been interned?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot give my hon. friend the figure at the moment, but I shall get it for him.

Mr. GREEN: Has an order actually been issued to the effect that Japanese shall not be allowed to have radio receiving sets and transmitters and cameras, or is that to be done in the future?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has been issued, I understand.

Mr. GREEN: It is in effect now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

CANADIAN ARMY

ISSUE OF SERVICE BADGES TO MEN WHO ARE DISCHARGED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). The press reports the distribution of badges to men who have been rejected for military service as physically unfit. May I ask the minister what has been done about badges for men who have served in the armed forces and have been discharged through disability? If badges are to be issued, does not the minister think that these discharged men should be given preference in the matter?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Yes. I would reply to my hon. friend that what is known as a service badge is being issued. I am very much surprised that it is not out before this. As a matter of fact both badges have been authorized for some time, and it is just a matter of getting manufacturing facilities and obtaining deliveries. Badges are being issued for service as well.

WELLAND BY-ELECTION

PRESS REPORT AS TO RADIO SPEECH OF HARRY J. CARMICHAEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). The Toronto Daily Star of February 7 contains a verbatim report of a speech delivered by Harry J. Carmichael, an employee of the Department of Munitions and Supply, and the director-general of munitions production. This speech was delivered over the radio in St. Catharines, in support of the candidature of the Minister of Labour.

Was the government or the Department of Munitions and Supply or the Minister of Munitions and Supply advised by this employee of his intention to deliver such a speech?

Was permission asked for, and given?

Does the government approve of the principle of government employees making speeches during election campaigns, whether for or against the government?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, the premises on which the hon. member bases his questions are not correct. Mr. Carmichael is not an employee of the Department of Munitions and Supply. He is a private citizen who occupies a post in that department. He not only receives no remuneration, but he pays his own travelling expenses; and so far as I know he has never taken one cent from the treasury of Canada. In order to qualify himself for his present position, he resigned from one of the most important posts in Canada, relinquishing all salary and emoluments connected therewith. I know of no man in Canada who has worked harder in the war munitions programme than has Mr. Harry Carmichael. He did say to me, before he delivered the speech, that he wished to do so. He felt that the representations he had to make to the electors of Welland were so important to his own war work that the speech was justified. He wished to know if I objected and I asked him under whose auspices he intended to speak. He said he intended to pay for his own time on the radio and was speaking to his own friends in his home district. Under the circumstances I could see no objection to his doing so. I will say, of course, that had he been on the government payroll his action would have been improper, but in the special circumstances of Mr. Carmichael's case I saw no impropriety whatever.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I have not seen the speech of Mr. Carmichael, and with respect to his position in the Canadian manufacturing world I agree with everything the minister has said. The minister seems to draw a distinction between a man in a government post who draws a salary and a man who does not draw a salary. To me that means nothing. This gentleman, and I understand he is a very high class gentleman, addressed the electors of Welland during the by-election campaign while occupying a post in the government service. I think that is open to condemnation, and the minister should not have allowed him to do it.

Mr. HOWE: Since my hon. friend has made a comment about my statement, may I make a comment about his? Will he explain the position of Mr. Alan Cockeram, who spoke in the York South election?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that Mr. Alan Cockeram spoke as a private citizen with the full knowledge—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not faze me a bit. All these catcalls do not bother me at all; I have listened to them for twenty years. Mr. Cockeram spoke to his own people with the express permission of his commanding officer and the officers of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. HOWE: Is that not true of Mr. Carmichael?

Mr. HOMUTH: He is not an employee of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Cockeram is not an employee of the government.

Mr. HOWE: No? He draws a salary.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GOLDING

MILITARY SERVICE—REFERENCE IN DEBATE TO COMMUNICATION FROM STRATFORD Beacon-Herald

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth): Mr. Speaker, rising to a question of privilege, I should like to refer to an incident which occurred in the house when the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) was speaking on Friday afternoon. On page 394 of Hansard, referring to myself, he is quoted as having said:

> I think my hon. friend who recited one or two days ago correspondence and editorials which have come to his desk, might recite to this house the day letter he received from the editor of the Stratford Beacon-Herald: he would know that the feeling of which I have spoken is rampant throughout his own district as well as in Toronto.

When the hon. gentleman made this statement, I was positive that he used only the word "letter," and evidently the reporter was of the same opinion; for in the original copy the simple word "letter" appeared. However, a correction has been written in changing it to "day letter". One would naturally infer from the hon. gentleman's statement that I had received a personal letter from the editor of this paper pointing out to me the general feeling in our district. Believing, as I did, that my hon. friend intended to convey that impression, I made the following statement, which appears also on page 394 of Hansard:

> I did not receive any letter at all.

However, in reading this correction in the original copy I am sure now that my hon. friend had reference only to a telegram which I received from Mr. C. Dingman, editor of the Beacon-Herald, on the afternoon of January 23, and which I find was a day letter. Had the hon. gentleman mentioned a telegram there would have been no misunderstanding. However, in view of this general misunderstanding and in fairness to the editor of the Beacon-Herald, I should like to read to the house the wire I received and my reply. This is what I was challenged to do. The wire I received is as follows:

> Would appreciate for publication statement from you dealing with following questions: Are you in favour of submitting proposed plebiscite, or do you feel parliament ought to decide issue of extention of conscription? What attitude will you take in the house? Are you in favour of compulsory selective service without restrictions? Please wire us collect any time to-day about three hundred words hinging on these questions.

My answer to that wire was quite brief, and is as follows:

You will probably have noticed that after the caucus yesterday the Prime Minister stated that it was the most satisfactory caucus he had ever attended. I think nothing need be added to his statement to indicate where the members stand on this question.

It will be recalled that I stated my position when I spoke on this question in the house, which I considered was the proper place in which to make any statement. I should like to say that as editor of the Beacon-Herald, Mr. Dingman was quite within his rights in asking me where I stood on these important questions, and I might add also that my good friend Mr. Dingman, as editor of a daily paper, is entirely within his rights in approving or disapproving any stand which I may take on any public question. I hope this statement will clear up any doubt in the minds of hon. gentlemen regarding what actually happened and what sort of telegram I did receive.

Mr. CHURCH: You never can answer a newspaper; it always has the last word.

LEGATIONS

APPOINTMENT OF MINISTERS TO CANADA FROM NORWAY, POLAND AND YUGOSLAVIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps I might say a word with respect to legations to be opened shortly in Ottawa. I notice in the press of this morning reference to Norway opening a legation in the city. I might say that there have been requests from Norway and from Poland and Yugoslavia to have legations established in Ottawa. Requests have been received from other countries, but I mention these three in particular. Careful consideration has been given to the requests, and the government has decided to accept them. We are pleased to have in the capital of Canada diplomatic representatives of these countries which have been playing such heroic parts in the present great world struggle.

The first legation to be opened will be that of Norway. The Norwegian minister will be Mr. Daniel Steen who has been consul general of Norway in Canada for many years. The first Polish minister will be Mr. Victor Podoski, who came to this country as consul general of Poland at the outbreak of the war. Both these gentlemen, now raised to the rank of minister plenipotentiary in the service of their respective countries, are held in high regard and esteem by the Canadian government and all those who have had the pleasure of meeting them. I may add that the first minister of Yugoslavia to Canada will be Doctor Isidor Cankar, who has had a distinguished career in the diplomatic service of his country and is at present Yugoslav minister to the Argentine republic.

Perhaps I should mention also that Greece has indicated a desire to have a minister resident at Ottawa and that request is being considered at the present time. With respect to the reciprocal appointments of ministers to other countries, it is understood that the matter of reciprocation will stand over until the end of the war.

BRUCE COAL COMPANY

QUESTION AS TO INVESTIGATION BY ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, as a private Liberal member of this hon. house I desire to bring the attention of the government to the following clipping from the morning Ottawa Citizen of January 22, 1942, page 14:

Royal Canadian Mounted Police Investigates Local Coal Company.

Acting on a search warrant obtained last night, officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police criminal investigation branch to-day seized all books and files of the Bruce Coal Company, with offices in the Hardy Arcade, Sparks street, and Bayswater avenue.

A Royal Canadian Mounted Police officer informed the Citizen to-day that an investigation of the company has been under way for a month and it was decided to seize the company's records to-day.

The same source said the probe would continue for perhaps a week or two longer. The reason for the investigation was not disclosed.

Again, sir, as a private Liberal member of this hon. house, on account of the continuous silence of the outside leader and the inside acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) with respect to this matter, and in order to save the country the sum of $1,500 daily, may I ask the government if a thorough investigation will not be made to ascertain the truth of the widespread talk in town that even since this item appeared in the press the Bruce Coal company has been selling the same coal three times at a rate of one hundred tons daily on government contracts: (1) for the Hull internment camp; (2) for Uplands airport, and (3) for the Arnprior airport.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest from the length of my hon. friend's question and what I heard of it that it is a matter which concerns several departments, and I would have to ask him to wait until there is an opportunity of conferring with other ministers before giving him an answer.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, February 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. GEORGE H. ROSS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, many very interesting arguments have been advanced in this debate. One of the most strongly pressed and in my opinion one of the most futile is the charge that it would be humiliating to take a plebiscite at this time. The speech from the throne was no sooner delivered than one of the newspapers came out with the statement that a plebiscite would be most humiliating. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) took up the cry in this house. It has also been raised with frenzied vigor by a number of speakers in this house and outside, and by a section of the press.

Why would it be humiliating to consult the people at this time? None of the speakers has told us. The press has not told us. I have asked a number of my friends that question, and not a man can tell me any reason why it would be humiliating to consult the people. Who would feel humiliated? I have never been humiliated by being consulted. I am sure the electors of my riding will not feel humiliated by being consulted. I do not believe any good Canadian will feel humiliated by being consulted.

The leader of the opposition has frequently referred to Australia as an example that Canada might very well follow. But I would remind him that during the last great war Australia on two different occasions consulted the people on the question of conscription, apparently without being humiliated. The suggestion that intelligent people will feel humiliated by being consulted is too absurd to pursue further.

The last speaker in this debate, the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), protested vigorously against some of the references that have been made to some of the people of Toronto. He spoke of "dry tinder" being ignited by the "flame of passion". I wish to point out to the hon. member that no one suggests that all the people of Toronto are igniting dry tinder by a flame of passion directed against the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). There are very many fine citizens in Toronto. It is only a clique of hysterical Toronto people and a section of the press that would sabotage the government in order to form a so-called national government to further the selfish interests of a few Toronto financiers. I realize that this is a serious statement to make of any group of citizens, but the ruthless emotional and false attacks being made on the Prime Minister force one to this conclusion. If they can only get rid of the Prime Minister they will have gone far in carrying out their nefarious purpose. What other reason have they for directing these vicious attacks against the Prime Minister? Surely every other member of the cabinet is equally responsible.

The speech made by the Prime Minister in this debate was clear and convincing in support of the plebiscite which is to be submitted to the people. He is probably the best informed man in Canada. He is now serving his fourth term as Prime Minister. As Secretary of State for External Affairs and as chairman of the war committee of the cabinet, he is probably better informed and knows how our war effort can best be put forward better than any other member of the cabinet. He is the man who selected and brought into his cabinet the able ministers conducting our war effort. It is under his leadership that the ministers have cooperated to put forth such a fully balanced total war effort.

Mr. Churchill, speaking in this chamber on December 30, 1941, used these words:

> Canada is a potent magnet drawing together those in the new world and in the old, whose fortunes are now united in a deadly struggle for life and honour against the common foe.

Everybody knows of the splendid work done by our Prime Minister in bringing about the extremely friendly relations that exist between the United States and Canada and between the United States and the other British nations "now united in a deadly struggle for life and honour against the common foe." The Prime Minister is the personification of Canada's magnetism that brought about these good relations.

Our war effort has been magnificent. The New York Times recently said of it:

> Canada's all-out war effort has been no mean accomplishment . . . the achievement has been one of the little appreciated miracles of the war.

These capable men who are making such a remarkably good job of conducting our war effort have asked for a plebiscite. I shall gladly act on their judgment and vote for the motion before the house. I hope and believe that when the vote is taken the people of Calgary East will vote for the plebiscite, and that the people of Canada will vote for it, and thus release the government from past commitments, and give them a free hand in conducting the war.

Last Friday the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) referred to some measures that have already been taken to deal with post-war problems. I wish to take advantage of this occasion to urge upon the government to provide a greater measure of social security and social insurance as a further measure to meet post-war problems. Existing legislation in Canada and in the provinces is wholly inadequate to relieve the misfortunes that come when earnings are cut off by want of work, old age, blindness, sickness or death, and when children are left with no one to care for them. It is good public policy to aid the worker in planning a defence against these hazards. He and his family should not be allowed to become public charges. In the words of the preamble to the labour section of the Versailles treaty:

> Universal peace . . . can be established only if it is based on social justice.

Let me quote further from the preamble. What I am about to quote was true of the industrial nations of the world at the time it was written in 1919; it is in a measure true of Canada to-day. The preamble says:

> Conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled; and an improvement of those conditions is urgently required; as, for example, by the regulation of the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week, the regulation of the labour supply, the prevention of unemployment, the provisions of an adequate living wage, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons and women, provision for old age and injury, protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own, recognition of the principle of freedom of association, the organization of vocational and technical education and other measures.

We should have a plan of social insurance in Canada that would afford a measure of protection not only to the worker but to his wife and dependent children as well. We have already the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940; many of the provinces have workmen's compensation acts. But these are not enough. Under workmen's compensation acts compensation is payable for "personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of employment." There are a great many cases of distress against which protection is not given by these acts. There should be insurance to protect the wage-earner in the case of industrial accidents to which these acts do not extend. There should be insurance to protect the worker in the case of illness and old age. There should be insurance to protect his wife and family in the case of his premature death. We should have social insurance in Canada to cover all such cases.

Many now employed are wondering what will happen after the war is over. When that time arrives and our men in the forces and in munition plants are demobilized we shall be met with a serious unemployment problem. A considered scheme of social insurance would solve a substantial portion of it.

1. It would lessen direct relief, which tends to destroy the morale of persons seeking it.

2. It would have a stabilizing influence in sustaining buying power after the war when expenditures are cut down.

3. It would cushion the shock which will be caused by the drop from present full-time employment to the lack of employment after the war.

4. It would give the worker and his family greater peace of mind so that they will make better citizens and do better work.

In the words of the report of the Mather commission:

> Social insurance would remove the spectre of fear which now haunts the wage-earners; it would make him a more contented and better citizen.

If responsible government is to be a success in Canada we must have a united, happy and contented people. Nothing militates against unity, happiness and contentment more than fear.

In introducing social insurance a fund would have to be established out of which to pay those protected by the statute. The contributors should be the employer, the employee and the state.

As to the employer, the additional cost would not discriminate in favour of one employer against another in the same line of business, because all employers would have to contribute. It would be an additional cost that would be added to the cost of the article produced. The additional cost would not make it difficult for a producer in Canada to compete with producers in other parts of the world, because contributory social insurance already exists in the other principal industrial countries.

As to the worker, the cost to the worker with a small income would be considerable. The income of most workers is very small out of which to pay rent, to clothe and feed a family, to pay doctor's bills, and to build up a reserve to carry the worker through sickness and old age. But workers out of their meagre earnings would gladly contribute with their employer and the state to build up an insurance fund. Few with very small incomes build up a reserve where no contributions are coming in from the outside.

As to the state, the additional cost to the public treasury would not be great, as we are already making heavy payments because of insecurity. During the last depression governments in Canada spent more than a billion dollars on unemployment relief alone. In addition to this, large payments had to be made for old age pensions, mothers' allowances, hospitalization, medical and other relief. Social insurance would lessen the burden on provincial and municipal governments. For that reason they should readily agree to share the cost.

It takes many years to build up a contributory social insurance system to the stage where it will carry itself. A system usually takes under its protection workers over eighteen years of age. If the plan is to carry itself from the start, either the older workers would have to pay excessively high premiums, or the younger workers would have to pay a very large share of the pensions of the older workers. To avoid any such hardships Great Britain and Australia subsidized the contributory plan. Canada should also subsidize it.

We should not wait until after the war to introduce social insurance; we should start it right now. There is now more employment than at any time in our history. Wages are now at the highest peak ever reached in Canada. The present time is ideal.

We have been told by the Minister of Finance that under our constitution only a province can carry out a social insurance plan. If the constitution is in the way, let us have it amended. Let us treat it as an instrument to serve and not to shackle reform.

A scheme of social insurance is not enough. It should be supplemented by a system of public assistance to take care of those persons who do not readily fit into a contributory insurance system.

Social insurance would not protect all needy widows and orphans. It would not protect deserted wives; it could not very well protect farm labour and those domestic servants whose employment is seasonal, and others whose income is low and intermittent. These people would not fit into an insurance scheme. Furthermore, their income is so small and sporadic that it is impossible to expect them to provide adequately for themselves in case of serious illness, prolonged unemployment, accident, old age or premature death.

It has been well said that a nation marches forward on the feet of its children. This being the case, the government as well as parents should be concerned in giving children a good start. Governments have to some extent accepted this responsibility. We have public schools. Mothers' allowances are provided for in eight of the provinces. But the health and welfare of children, when death or some disaster has left a family without a breadwinner, is not receiving the support of the state that it should.

Last November the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) told the house "only about fifty-six per cent of the men called up for military training were placed in category A, the only category that is accepted for training at the present time by the Department of National Defence." I believe there would have been far fewer rejections had the children of the nation been better fed and had they been given more and better medical treatment.

The present Old Age Pensions Act makes it possible for old and needy people to go on living in their homes with their own families. This is as it should be. But the age limit is seventy; that is too high. It is particularly too high in the case of ex-service men. By reason of the hardships and sufferings which they endured while on active service, their expectation of life has been shortened. They and their widows are entitled to special consideration. Women too are entitled to special consideration for the reason that their salaries are smaller than the salaries of men and their opportunity for saving is much less. The age limit should be reduced.

When the old age pension act was passed the maximum pension was fixed at $20 per month, which was deemed to be the smallest amount that an old person could live on. That is very little out of which to pay for rent, clothing, food and medical care. A dollar a day asked for by old age pensioners, would be reasonable. They should at least get a cost of living bonus. I urge the government not to wait until the war is over but to get in touch with the provinces and grant relief now.

The state should also do more for those who are in need by reason of having lost their sight. The United States federal law sets no age limit for aid to the blind. Canada fixes the age limit at forty. I cannot understand why we should have this age limit in Canada. A person who is blind is as helpless at twenty-five or thirty as at forty, and is just as much entitled to a pension.

The Canadian people have always believed that all persons who cannot earn a living for themselves, whether because of lack of employment or of illness, age or feebleness, should be supported by the state. Everyone of us has a stake in this responsibility; we must not shirk it. I urge the government to take the matter up with the provinces without delay and work out some scheme whereby all needy persons in Canada will be provided for either through social insurance or public assistance.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I would like to speak on the plebiscite and the Japanese, two subjects which are very deeply unpopular in the district I come from, and I think I might say in a more general way, in the province of British Columbia. I have not time to deal with both to-day, and therefore I shall have to leave the Japanese situation until the main motion comes up. That will give me an opportunity also to study the information laid on the table by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I must therefore confine my remarks to the two amendments.

I deplore two things in connection with this plebiscite—first, its introduction now, and the form of words which will be used when the plebiscite is taken. We have been debating this question for twelve days, and I think we have done the country and the war effort more harm than we shall make good in twelve months. I cannot see any benefit that can accrue. Secondly I deprecate the desperately partisan character of the tone of the debates. We have to go back to 1917 before we can get anything comparable to it in bitterness and unfairness, especially among those who have been defending the plebiscite in the last twelve days.

I will give one or two illustrations. One hon. member alluded to his opponents as employing subterfuge, deception and hypocrisy. Later he said they were ready to besmirch the ballot box and take away the rights of the common people to express themselves; and he talked about ridiculing democratic government. Later on in his speech he said he was going to appeal to the members of this house, and it was going to be an appeal for unity, for understanding, for cool heads and clear thinking.

I hardly think the language I have quoted above is a very likely means of inducing people to keep cool heads and to think clearly. I could give other instances—this one was by a cabinet minister. He referred to "spite-infused and hate-inspired enemies." He was not talking about military enemies; he was talking about political enemies. Then there was the suggestion that Mr. Hepburn, who after all is the elected premier of a province, would rather see Mr. King defeated than Hitler. I think that is a very unfair and scurrilous attack on a public man. Such an attitude and remarks like these add little to our dignity and to the defence of the plebiscite, and certainly they do nothing towards helping the war or our reputation among the nations.

Before dealing with the plebiscite itself I want to make two comments. One is on the question of want of confidence. As the debate goes on more and more pressure will be put on that phase. A minister of the crown the other day described these two amendments as being want of confidence motions, and as time goes on pressure will be put on and we shall be told that if the main motion does not carry it will mean the defeat of the government and a general election. Well, no member wants that, and I am certain the country does not want it either. This threat about want of confidence is of course always trotted out by every government of the day, no matter who they are, to try to get their followers lined up behind them. They always say that a vote for amendments means a want of confidence. It means nothing of the kind unless the house chooses to say so. There is nothing in the constitution or in the rules that demands it unless it is embodied in the motion in words to this effect—that "the house has no confidence" in the government of the day. I have seen this done twice, once here and once in the local house, and on both occasions the government of the day had a slim and unreliable majority.

They could not change the constitution; they did not need to, but they announced they were going to take advantage of it, and said they would not regard the defeat of any measure as a vote of want of confidence unless there was a resolution containing those words, "that this house has no confidence in the government." That is well known; and in this case, with the huge majority of the government, it is absolutely unnecessary to ask anyone to vote for this plebiscite other than on its merits.

There is another matter about which I want to speak. The other day we listened to what I suppose we might call a brilliant fighting speech by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser). The vociferous applause which he received, both while speaking and at the close of his remarks, would indicate not only his own personal popularity but also how acceptable to the members of his party were the sentiments to which he gave expression. The applause afforded him by the cabinet ministers indicated that he was qualified to be their spokesman, or at least that he was uttering sentiments with which they were fully in accord. Let us see just what he said; I am not going to give my opinion, or anything else, but his own words, at page 334 of Hansard:

> There may be features about the plebiscite that are not as we would all like, but I have studied it. I went home and for three days did nothing but turn it over in my mind, and I came to this honest conclusion.

I shall deal with that conclusion in a few minutes. The hon. member is a big business man. During the course of his remarks he seemed rather annoyed at some people who were members of some committee and who were interested in many companies, but he himself, according to the guide, is president of half a dozen companies. There is no shame to it, but he is a big business man, a man of outstanding ability and long experience. Will anyone deny that? He has been elected to this house three times and defeated once, which in experience is equal to two elections. He knows what it is all about; he can think on his feet; he can regulate his thought and analyse a situation accurately. He says that for three days—and presumably three nights, though he does not mention them—he studied this question. He even has a biblical precedent for his action, because three days and three nights was the exact period that Jonah spent in the belly of the whale, re-orientating his own future. Now we have a picture of this very able man pacing up and down, wearing out the carpet in his study during ceaseless days and restless nights, before he could come to any conclusion. I am sure he will not deny—and I can quote his words—that his loyalty and devotion to his leader had much to do with the decision at which he arrived, but it was seventy-two hours before the scale was tipped. And what tipped it? Was it his judgment on the basis of the facts? No. Was it his loyalty? Yes. Let me quote his words, at page 334 of Hansard, as to his conclusions after studying the problem for this length of time:

> I was convinced that . . . I should appeal to my fellow Canadians to stand behind the man who for five times has been elected by the ballots of the people of Canada to lead this country.

That is, the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Then, in closing, the hon. member said:

> For God's sake get behind Canada. Don't sell her short. Get behind the Prime Minister, and let us put this thing over.

Those last words, "let us put this thing over" are the only words in his whole speech in which he might be held to express definite approval of the plebiscite. You see, his whole appeal, and what tipped the scale, was his conviction that he should be loyal to his leader. That is a very admirable and beautiful sentiment, which does him credit; but it is not a very overwhelming argument as to the merits of the plebiscite. And I suggest it is reasonable for us to assume that it was the loyalty of which he speaks so much that governed him in arriving at a decision, rather than the merits of the plebiscite, as to which he says so little.

On the strength of that, having built up that picture on that premise, I ask the house and the country this question, which I might ask the hon. gentleman himself. With all his experience, his knowledge and ability, it took him that period of time, wrestling with himself in the still, dark watches of the night, before coming to his decision. That being so, how long does he expect it will take the ordinary man in the street to come to a decision on a matter of such vital importance, when that ordinary man does not have the hon. member's advantages; when he does not have even such knowledge of war conditions as we have, and certainly no such knowledge as the government undoubtedly possesses? Remember, the man in the street nowadays has not that intense party loyalty that he had formerly, and that consideration would not be as important a factor in his case as it was in the case of the hon. member for Northumberland. So if we concede these points, and I do not believe they can be denied, I believe it cancels the entire weight of the hon. member's eloquent speech. I admit that his speech was eloquent, but it was not necessarily convincing. I submit that it was a powerful demonstration that we should hesitate to repudiate our responsibilities as members of parliament and throw responsibility for the decision—and throw the blame also—on people much less informed than we are, who sent us here to make these decisions.

Some years ago a matter arose in my own district, which I thought I would refer to a committee composed of Liberals and Conservatives, in order to get their decision. It was not a matter of patronage but more the question of a decision. Very shortly thereafter I received a note from the secretary of the committee saying that they were leaving the matter to me. When I went home I discovered that one of the members of the committee had taken the stand, in which the others backed him up, that I was shirking my responsibility. They said, "Neill is trying to pass the buck to us. Tell him it is his business." I made my decision and, since I heard nothing more about it, I guess they approved of it. They said they sent me here to decide these matters, and I should decide them. That was only a small affair, but the principle holds true also in connection with more important things.

There is another important development which has occurred during this debate and which has caused me grief and pain. I always thought it was a characteristic of Liberals to be true and loyal to their party, their principles and their policies. We have heard that echoed from a thousand platforms. Imagine my grief when I discovered that instead of being true to its ideals and all the rest of it the Liberal party was walking out with another young lady! I could hardly believe it, but it is obvious; you can see it even in this house. There is a thin red line—not very thin, either—running between the government benches and the seats occupied by my hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The other day the hon. member for Northumberland was throwing bouquets at them. I need not take time to read what he said, but they were very obvious bouquets, to the effect that in the last few weeks—he was careful to add that—he had occasion to agree with very many of the fundamental truths which have been uttered by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). And there have been other instances. I see in the newspapers that a cabinet minister has agreed with the principles of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and so on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NEILL: Well, the members of that group are entitled to cheer. But the lady has been coy; she has not been so willing. At the very moment these wistful advances were being made by the hon. member for Northumberland the same hon. gentleman whom he was eulogizing had and still has on the order paper a motion which the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) says is a motion of want of confidence; and less than an hour later another C.C.F. member referred to the government as a "servile and anti-labour government." The government does not generally throw bouquets at people who move votes of want of confidence. They generally throw bricks; or if there is a bouquet you will find a brick wrapped in it. But this is different. The liaison is still continuing; they are still walking out, and and they have even walked as far as Toronto. According to the press a very prominent member of this house, a reputable man whom I highly esteem, has been speaking over the radio, and there is no doubt of what he did. He was speaking in support of Mr. J. W. Noseworthy, the C.C.F. candidate in the federal by-election in York South. Well, Mr. Speaker, when we have members of the cabinet and reputable men such as I have mentioned doing these things, there must be something in it. Is it possible they would rather back the C.C.F. than see Mr. Meighen elected? I think the Liberal public throughout Canada ought to be advised of this unhallowed alliance that is going on. They ought at least to be warned to prepare for this political foundling which will be put on their doorsteps before long.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are getting ready to have a morganatic marriage.

Mr. NEILL: No, I am afraid it is going to be worse than that. They should be warned, because they will have to do something when the baby is put on their doorstep. Perhaps after the election steps will be taken to regularize their relations. I certainly hope so, but I frankly confess that the prospect is not lichtsome, to use a Scotch expression.

I am no prophet, and I always bet on the wrong man in an election—consequently I never bet. But I do express the hope that the Minister of Justice will be returned to-day. He is a capable man, untouched by political background, which seems to be regarded as a taint nowadays. I hope he may be returned, because he is a man capable of filling the position of the man whose memory I shall always revere.

I hope the Minister of Labour will get in, because I believe he is an honest man. I know he is an able man, and I believe he will do as much as any one man can do for labour, among a bunch of seventeen or eighteen members in the cabinet, no matter what cabinet is in office.

I also hope—and I listen for the applause of my friends over there—that the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen will get in.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. NEILL: I thank you. I know that his ability will be of great benefit and advantage in the house in these critical times.

And now to come to the plebiscite. There is a good deal of misunderstanding about this thing. The ordinary man in the street is not versed in legal terms. He is not accustomed to untangle political phrases which can be construed to mean one thing to-day and another to-morrow. What he will say is this: "Oh, I see they are going to take a plebiscite on conscription." That is the way he will think about it, and that will be the greatest misunderstanding there could be, because it isn't anything of the kind.

If it is to be put forward by government agents, it is a deliberate attempt to falsify the issue. The question which will be asked in the plebiscite is this:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

Just look at that. The man on the street is to be asked if he is in favour of releasing the government from commitments. Does it say anything there about conscription? Not a word. Do these men on the street know what commitments mean—commitments about something which took place years ago?

Here is the way I suggest the question should have been put:

> Are you in favour of the government introducing total conscription if and when the government find it necessary?

Would that not put it up to everybody? We would not need to go round telling people how they should vote. They could understand that. Does the government expect the ordinary working man and woman to understand that proposed question, if we cannot agree here on what it means? Half of the house says it means one thing, and the other half says it means another thing—and quite a few of us think it does not mean anything. But apparently the government expects the man on the street to diagnose it, and to give a competent and sensible answer, something which we ourselves do not appear to be able or willing to do.

The language used in the plebiscite question is something like a car on a switchback railway; you can go in any direction you like, up or down. But it does not get you very far, does it? After all, you do not get anywhere by travelling on it. This plebiscite question is just a means of getting up and down, marking time and doing nothing.

But it has one advantage. It can be used either way. To the man favouring conscription it can be quoted like this: "Oh, here we are clearing the way for conscription; what else could it mean?"—and he and his friends are satisfied. To the other man who does not want conscription, and who is complaining that the plebiscite would mean that, the answer is,—"Where do you get that idea? Just look at the wording of it: the word 'conscription' is not mentioned. It is just a gesture; trust to us not to force it on you". That argument is being used in Quebec to-day, and in other places as well—and in language even stronger than I have put it.

The plebiscite, as worded, is simply a piece of political strategy, guaranteeing nothing and imposing no obligation, and leaving it open to take another $2,000,000 plebiscite six months or twelve months from now on the real issue of conscription or no conscription.

My position is somewhat different from that of many others. When the election was held, not being tied to the utterances of any political party leader, possibly with longer vision—although I doubt it—but certainly with more congenital caution than most, I did not commit myself as rigidly as some others. I quoted the two leaders, and I said, "I do not consider conscription is an issue; I do not think conscription is needed at the present time, and I am going down there to vote against it, but" —and here is where the difference came in—"if the situation ever gets so bad that it is needed, and if in my best judgment that is the position, I will vote for it; but I will come home first and tell you I am going to do it." I decided that last June, and I went home. At public meetings, in the press and on every occasion I possibly could I told them that I thought the time had come and, to tell the truth, I thought I was committing political suicide. However I did that, and I was surprised at the reaction. At only one of the meetings, and out of all the resolutions which were passed, only one little man voted against it. He said he was a pacifist, God help him. He called himself a pacifist; I wonder if that word will get him by if he meets a Jap with a bomb in one hand and a bayonet in the other. I hope it does.

Let me explain the meaning of conscription as I explained it then and as I understand it now. I explained it in a speech on November 10 when I described it as a measure warranting the compulsory service of men and women in every form of war work, and the control of industry and money. With the exception of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), I believe I was the first to take such a stand, in the house, and I have suffered some discrimination since then—discrimination of such a petty character that it provoked nothing but amused contempt on my part. But of that more anon, possibly.

My suggestion then—and this is what I want now—was for total conscription of that character. How can I attain it? My suggestion was and still is that it should be done by means of a union government. Get the best men in the country together to share the responsibility, so that no one party could be crucified by taking alone the necessary steps. Or, if necessary, I would agree to conscription which would leave out sections where the feeling was anti-conscriptionist. That was done in Ireland twice, during the great war and in this war. No trouble resulted, no ill feeling, and no discrimination. Possibly it would be a good idea here.

At any rate I am against a plebiscite in this form. I was much impressed the other day by the speech of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks). He did not flaunt the fact that he was in uniform. He was very sensible. He did not talk bitterly against those who differed from him, and he made a very sensible speech. He said the plebiscite was an unnecessary and unfair waste of time and money and an evasion of our responsibilities. And it is not merely the waste of time and money taking the plebiscite, I am afraid, because there will be also marking time while we are waiting for the plebiscite to be passed, and we will have to wait after for it to take effect. All this time we are going to stand idly by saying, like Lady Macbeth, "Letting 'I dare not' wait upon 'I would'," for goodness knows how long a period.

Who knows best the needs of the country, and its relation to the war? Certainly the government. Times without number people have said to me, "We send those fellows there to govern; why in — " — why in — " — why on earth don't they govern?" If we leave it to the people, by way of a plebiscite, then in all common decency we must fully inform them —and that would take far too long. And we also must tell them things that only the government knows—and that would be giving information of value to the enemy.

Mr. HOMUTH: It would get on the German radio.

Mr. NEILL: If absolution is needed for a government pledge, then parliament is the place to give it. We are qualified and we are ready. I am sure we are ready. The Prime Minister wishes to know the wishes of the people. There are 230 members of parliament outside the cabinet who should know the wishes of their constitutencies. I will tell the Prime Minister what the wishes of my constituency are, and will stake my seat on its general accuracy: The people of Comox-Alberni want action, in great big capital letters —ACTION! They want action, and they want it now. And they want another thing, and that is leadership. Then they will accept universal service, if it is necessary—universal service of each man and woman, where he or she can best serve. Half the speakers who have spoken in this debate have attempted to prove that we do not need conscription, therefore why have a plebiscite? The other half have said that we do need conscription, so why not bring it in instead of taking a plebiscite?

Another objection I see to this, and I believe it is a bad one, is the effect it will have upon other nations, upon friendly, neutral and enemy nations. They are not familiar with, nor do they understand, our system. They will think that it means doubt, hesitation, cold feet perhaps. It will depress our friends, it will sober neutral nations, while our enemies will be tickled pink. I am sure it will ring through the chancelleries of Europe that Canada stopped in the middle of the war to take a plebiscite as to whether or not she would continue. That is the way it will be interpreted. You do not suppose Germany is going to let us do the interpreting; she is going to do it. This will be twisted in meaning and it will be repeated to all and sundry. Neutral countries will say that Canada stopped to do this in the middle of the war. The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) is already on record as having said that the enemy already are quoting speeches made in this house. The other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) combated that stand and said that it was not having that effect upon neutral or friendly nations. He quoted from a large newspaper in the United States and from one in Great Britain. He quoted the New York Times as being satisfied with our explanation. There is nothing about their being satisfied with the plebiscite. What they say is:

> On this matter it would be impertinent for outsiders to give an opinion.

And then they say:

> The patriotism of Canadians has been demonstrated by their efforts in this war.

Of course they had to say something like that. They were not dealing with the total acceptance of the plebiscite. The minister also quoted the London Telegraph and Morning Post, but there is no mention of the plebiscite from beginning to end of that editorial. They say that there has been nothing more splendid than the record of Canada. We have not heard what they said when they went home and attended their cabinet meetings. I think it was on the next day that an hon. member from somewhere along here—I know his name but I cannot remember his constituency;—he is a noble looking man, looks as though he is fit to be appointed a senator —oh, yes; the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) quoted the Buffalo Courier-Express. This is what this large United States paper had to say:

> The natural question which arises on this side of the border is that if we can do it overnight why does Canada hesitate?

I do not think we can take much comfort from that point of view. The "it" refers to conscription. Members of parliament have quoted Churchill. He said that our effort was magnificent, but he could not very well say anything else. Here is the answer: the greater the effort, and it is a great effort, the greater will be the reaction. The argument that will be used in Germany will be that Canada's effort has been magnificent, therefore there must have been something very wrong, something desperately wrong, disloyalty or breakdown or something of the kind, to make Canada stop in the middle of the war to hold a plebiscite. It can be worked both ways, and be sure that that is the way the Germans will interpret it.

When I was a little chap and happened to be tardy and attempted to make an excuse I was sometimes told that if the dog had not stopped to look for a flea, he might have caught the hare. Then there is that classical quotation that some of us will remember:

For want of a nail, the shoe was lost;
For want of a shoe, the horse was lost;
For want of a horse, the rider was lost;
For want of a rider, the battle was lost;
For want of a battle, the empire was lost,
And all for the want of a horseshoe nail.

History is full of instances in which a comparatively small number of men have turned a battle, or a comparatively short period of time, a few days or even a few hours or minutes, has changed the outcome. The Duke of Wellington always said in his after years about the battle of Waterloo that if the French could have brought up a couple of hundred fresh men, he would have lost the battle. The same thing was true in the Crimea and in the Boer war. In one of the battles of Ypres, I forget which one, the Germans were pushing through with the use of gas and they had nothing between them and Calais but a few broken men. Some one in the back lines rushed up a few cooks and orderlies and they were spaced out so far apart that they could hardly see each other. It looked like such an obvious trap that the Germans hesitated to come forward and they lost their chance and allowed our reinforcements to be brought up. It is thus that a few days or minutes makes such a difference.

The other day the Minister of Finance said that the magnitude of Canada's effort may well tip the scale. That is not my language; that is the language of the Minister of Finance. Yes, but the lack of magnitude may tip it the other way. It would be a bitter, black page in Canada's history if it were to be recorded that Canada paused, turned aside to hunt fleas—political fleas—the fleas of political advantage, the fleas of longer power, the fleas of what might be said about us in the next election three years from now. In a crisis, so little sways the destiny of a nation or an empire.

I have heard man after man proclaim confidence in and affection and almost passionate loyalty for the Prime Minister. I believe in the sincerity of these hon. members. But I ask this question: would not that same loyalty, that same trust, that same confidence rally around three times greater in the support of the Prime Minister if he came out and said that the war emergency overshadowed everything else, and that he had decided, either by means of a union government or on his own initiative, to adopt universal service despite the promises made years ago? There will be a risk, but it would be a glorious risk. Is any great achievement ever attained without taking a risk? He would get support both in this house and throughout the country that would make him the greatest man in Canadian history for a hundred years to come. He would be known as the man who saved time and money when both were of vital importance. He would be known as the man who by the timely increase of Canadian help shortened the war and saved thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands of lives. He would be known perhaps as the man who had saved the British empire, perchance civilization itself. What an ideal goal at which to aim! What a magnificent height to scale! The good wishes and blessings of everyone in this house and of all in Canada would follow him if he turned his face with gallant courage to such a noble task.

I want to reiterate that the people want action and leadership. I am told that I am an old man and therefore my viewpoint is that of age and decrepitude. But that is not necessarily so. You may see an old Ford with a good engine still able to give good service. An infirm body may still have a young mind. Experience is sometimes worth something. I certainly can claim to know the feelings of my people and my country. Speaking as a Canadian—and I dare anyone to dispute my claim to be a Canadian, because while I was not born in this country, I have spent fifty-one years here and have grown up with it, taking part in all its activities—speaking for a Canada that is still young, I must say that she is passing from an old era into a new.

In this debate I have heard appeals made along old party lines, attempts made to stir up old party policies, loyalties and so on. I want to tell the house and the government that the people of Canada are no longer moved by the old party appeals, catch-words and shibboleths, of twenty, thirty or fifty years ago. They are no more interested in what was said in 1917 than they are in what was said in 1817. We have turned our backs on the dead, dying past and now face toward the east, where new policies are rising, God-given, Christlike policies, that will give us action and leadership, that will ensure the undivided effort of every man and woman in Canada toward the successful prosecution of the war; policies and leadership that will lead us through victory to peace, and beyond peace to such a reorganization of society as will guarantee for all time, that all, not just a few, shall live in peace and happiness throughout all their days.

Mr. W. H. MOORE (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) need not fear his views as a result of age, for I find myself largely in agreement with him. What I have to say bears mainly upon the practice of government as it eventually affects the form of government. Some members may think I go back ages to determine how we should govern ourselves in the twentieth century, but it is only for a moment. When our structures topple and some of them come crashing down it seems to me that we ought to examine the footing, and it is very apparent from the wording of the plebiscite, which the member for Comox-Alberni read several times, that a structural change has come over our practice of government, and we would indeed be derelict in our duty as representatives of the people were we to refrain from trying to assess the significance of that change.

At first sight there is high merit in a plebiscite, in a reference to the polls. Is it not within the essence of democracy, almost the forthright expression of the people? In these days in our part of the world we all profess democracy. Do we not say we are at war for the express purpose of throwing off autocracy? Say, we are prepared to give life, property, all we have, to defend the freedoms that lie within democratic institutions?

Then, on second thought, we ask ourselves: what is democracy? The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) touched upon the subject, but it seemed to me that he did not go far enough to sift the gold from the sand. If the question were really put to a poll of the members I have an idea that the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), whose distinguished ancestor wrote such a marvellous history of ancient Greece, would tell us something about the factions of Athens, and my French-Canadian friends, versed as they are, steeped almost, in the classics, would tell us something of the work of Polybius, that great man who wrote of autocracy and democracy as the sunrise—the sunshine—and sunset. Well, no matter the source; it was always the same. History has written in parallel lines the downfall of self-government and the factions of the polls. We all know that in course of time our ancestors, French and British alike, hardened their determination that there would never again be a sunset on their freedom. It is not necessary for me here to describe the means which they took to preserve freedom and self-government. We know that there were two main features: first of all, the distribution of power among the constituencies, and secondly, provision made for calm debate. It is not necessary for me to remind the members of this chamber what those provisions are. We know them; the member for Comox-Alberni has referred to them.

What is that structural change that has come over us? It may be, and I believe it is, that we are so close to government that we do not realize from the very wording of that plebiscite that there is change. Who is the government that is to be released from its commitments? We do not see it. However, we can see with the clarity of perspective the change that has come over the structure of the government in Europe. We know that democracy is only flickering in the vestiges of Europe. It is disconcerting to find Mussolini making a claim in his work, "La Dottrina del Fascismo," that the purest form of democracy lies in the expression of the will of the people, through the will of a few, or even the one. We reject that claim; at least I do.

Let us look closely at the fascist structure, then by it try to classify our own practice among the political systems. The Italian Minister of Justice, Alfredo Rocco, in explaining the law of January 31, 1926, which settled—and I will have you, Mr. Speaker, mark these words—the relationship between the executive and the legislature, said:

> A dominant position is accorded to the executive; the government is the representative of the whole of the power of the state and exercises a general function. The other two powers discharge a special function and occupy a secondary position. The judicial and legislative powers are the result of the state having different functions. The executive power possesses and is the organ of all functions of state.

In other words the legislative and judicial powers are limited and specific. The executive power, on the contrary, exercises unlimited and general functions. Now the law of January 31, 1926, concerning the right of the executive to enact measures of a legislative character, reads as follows—the section is short but I would have you notice it because naturally my next step is to compare it with the practice of legislation in Canada. I quote:

> Measures having the force of law—
> Or orders in council.
> —may be promulgated by royal decrees, after consultation with the cabinet, (1) when the government is so authorized by law, within the scope of such delegated authority; (2) in extraordinary cases when emergency and absolute necessity so demand. The question of emergency or necessity is subject to no other control than that of parliament. In cases under (2) the decree shall be submitted to parliament for confirmation as a law at one of the first three sessions following its promulgation.

Now before turning directly to comparison with Canada I would have you know the opinion of Kranenburg, who is professor of public law at Leiden university, as to the Italian system. He says:

It need not be demonstrated that political control by a parliament constituted in the way described is of no practical importance; nor is it necessary to point out that the confirmation of a decree—

Or order in council.

—as law by the self-same parliament, at one of its next three sessions, is a bare formality.

Indeed Rocco says in his book, "The Transformation of the State," that parliament is in fact to be reduced to a mere registry for decrees.

How are these orders in council made in Italy? By boards of government; boards that have to deal with the determination of prices —and you must remember we all live in a price world—by boards that have to do with wages; in other words by boards that undertake the distribution of the national income.

When I turn to the Canadian system I want it thoroughly understood that I recognize the impact of crises upon the form of government. In fact it is with the events in mind of 1917, 1918, 1922, 1933 and 1940, bringing revolution in the form of government in Russia, Germany, Italy and France, that I stress the vital importance of taking stock of the structure of government at this time. Moreover, the assumption of power to legislate by order in council in certain matters has always been conceded to the executive body. But structural change came in Italy, as it has come to Canada, and is coming everywhere, with the quantity and the quality of the measures.

With these qualifications I take up P.C. 8253. I am not to be accused of exaggerating the bearing of that matter upon the structure of Canada's government; for speaking directly to the nation over the radio on October 18, 1941, the Prime Minister referred to the subject matter of that order in council in the following words:

I am, therefore, going to speak to you to-night about an action which the government proposes to take in connection with conditions within Canada. I believe that what is proposed will vitally affect our war effort, because it will affect every man, woman and child within Canada.

The action which I am about to explain represents an experiment hitherto untried on this continent, and perhaps having regard to its breadth and variety, hitherto untried by the will and consent of any free people anywhere.

As I listened I confess I found it hard to believe what my ears told me I had heard. The thing seemed incredible. I thought back to declarations made in this House against the arbitrary assumption of power by another administration in the days when nearly every tenth family lived by grace of the public treasury. I thought back to all the definitions I had ever read of a free people. And I confess I did not find that the Prime Minister's words fitted them. As my distinguished namesake, Mr. Tom Moore, who I believe is president of the Trades and Labour Congress, said in a public statement:

Both in its terms and in the manner of its introduction, the new order is the longest step yet taken by any democracy toward the establishment of a totalitarian state.

Action, you say. Action. Wait a minute. Mr. Tom Moore goes on to say:

Is there such urgency that a matter of this kind should be dealt with by order in council when parliament is to meet in two weeks' time?

I find myself in agreement with the statement made by the president of the Trades and Labour Congress. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is there anything on earth that would justify a revolution in the economic structure of the country without parliamentary action, if we still have parliamentary government?

May I also say that there are members in both houses of parliament who could have made valuable contributions to the objective of the measure; members who have given particular attention to the vexed, shall I say, illusive, matter of inflation. We could at least have pointed out the futility of nailing down the ceiling while the doors were wide open; for the turnover in employment is now three or four times the normal rate. And some of us might have added that a government, subject to organized economic pressure and the size of its deputations, with its eyes on the polls, can never distribute equitably the national income.

I shall pass by the declaration of war against Japan, made—I do not want to exaggerate—with almost the easy nonchalance of a man cracking another egg for breakfast; I shall pass that by with this observation. It is not sufficient to say that parliament, had it met, would have made a swift and unanimous declaration of war against Japan—not sufficient because by parliamentary action the people would then have become informed of the social consequences of war on another front, a matter that seems to be vaguely contained in the proposal for a plebiscite before the house. And so in our attempt to discover the identity of the country's government we come to the matter of broken pledges.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said—he said it at Vancouver and repeated it in the course of this debate:

> The present unhappy state of the world is in large part the result of broken pledges. Nazi Germany has erected bad faith and broken pledges into a principle of action. Bad faith and broken pledges in disregard of the popular will are the forces against which Canada is fighting to-day.

In a measure I agree. But I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that these pledges, all of them, were given in disregard of parliamentary government. I would go on to add this: I thought we were carrying on war to render it impossible for the one or the few to give pledges in matters of major importance without having first obtained the considered sanction of the representatives of the constituencies through the established procedure of parliamentary government.

No one likes broken pledges. Are we in this house to give a pledge that cannot be kept? For who will say, in the midst of war, that there can be by plebiscite, to use the words of the Prime Minister, "a full and honest expression of the views of the people"? Military secrets that are not to be given to this house are not to be broadcast to the public; and how can there be a full and honest expression of opinion without a knowledge of need? It would seem that some explaining has to be done.

Why is there more urgent need for men in 1942 than in 1940? True, we have taken on another seventy million enemies; but the Japanese were already handicapped with some 450,000,000 unsubdued Chinese; and besides, in 1942, we have 190,000,000 stout Russians and 135,000,000 inventive Americans on our side.

How many men should be sent where? I do not know, and I doubt if anybody can tell us save the Minister of National Defence; and we should not forget, as some seem to do, that the issue before us is not conscription. We have conscription now. The issue is solely as to the need of men serving outside the country—a strange issue; for we know in our hearts that eleven and a half million people cannot by their own resources hold on to one-sixteenth part of the world's surface in a world with great powers grown greedy for conquest. If this country is invaded we must have outside assistance, and we ought not to expect other countries to give us what we are unwilling to give them.

I do not altogether blame the people for not viewing the situation in that light. The blame rests upon those of us in this house who profess to lead public opinion and who ought to have foreseen and long ago prepared against the forces that threaten us. In taking the plebiscite, will there be no resort to the highly developed technique of modern propaganda which from soap to social systems sways the views of the people? Already west and east we can observe the machine being geared and greased for the occasion.

In truth, Mr. Speaker, if it was the part of wisdom to establish parliament, wise to lay down rules as to procedure, that the will of the people should be expressed by reason, then it is unwise to send the matter contained in this particular plebiscite at this time to be disposed of by mass emotion. The plebiscite is packed with explosive materials. Already the tramp of civilian feet has been heard on our city streets. Already family is being set against family. "My boy is overseas; why should yours rest at home?" Members can hear that question no matter what constituency they represent. Class is being turned against class. Already people are talking about relative class exemptions from military service, by this administration or another one.

Recalling the racial and national composition of this country, I will not say it is wicked to submit this matter to a plebiscite; but to those hon. members who in this debate have advocated taking a plebiscite as a means of preserving unity I commend the considered opinion of Ernest Barker—a great English Liberal, and a professor at Cambridge—as to the social consequences of mass decisions. He says:

> Emotion is always waiting for its opportunity. A community which is not on the watch may easily slip down with a run into the abandonment of mere group-sentiment. It may do so all the more easily because the art of advertisement and mass-suggestion, nowadays so highly developed, can readily play entrancing tunes to stir the emotions. When this is done and done successfully the high democratic art of rational discussion is abnegated and induced unanimity of emotion takes its place. The basis of emotion may be class, as it is in Russia. It may be race, as it is in Germany. It may be nation—the nation as a higher personality, superior to all its members, the very anima dell'anima—as it is in Italy.

Here is the conclusion of Barker, a great English Liberal:

> Whatever it be, it necessarily entails, at any rate for the time being, a breakdown of democracy.

As hon. gentlemen know, Barker does not stand alone in his opinion. I might continue on with citations all to the same end.

If in the practice of government we are to disregard the well-determined lines laid down by science, then let us burn the textbooks and declare the bankruptcy of the social sciences. In the meantime let us cease talking about mass controversy as a means of unity. There are pledges and pledges. There was a pledge given by the government, as represented by ministers and the senate and commons; a pledge to our enemies; a pledge to our allies, to the world at large. I express it in the words of the Prime Minister:

> The policy of the government is, and from the outset has been, the achievement of a total national effort for total war.

Shall we keep that pledge, keep it to the letter? Total national effort! How are we to keep that pledge, if the result of the plebiscite taken in all the mad passions of war should be a negative one? You may consult the dictionaries for definitions as you will, but labels mean little in this matter. What may be a plebiscite for the ministers will be a referendum for the members. Personally I could not and I would not vote against the expressed will of the people I represent.

Let me put the matter another way. When parliament declared war against Germany we flaunted the country's unanimity in the face of Berlin and boasted of it to London. How will a substantial vote, say of hundreds of thousands, against relief from total war, be regarded in the outside world? Recalling the collapse of Russia in 1917, and of Germany in 1918, will that vote be interpreted, as was suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), as a sign that Canada has grown war weary? I protest the thought. Burdened we are, but Canada will carry on.

References have been made to the mandates of the general election of 1940. Is it not true that we, the members, came here each with a particular mandate? Personally I thought I came with a mandate to support the practice of making laws in an open chamber, with the suggestions, the criticisms and even, if needs be, the opposition of the other members of all parties. I opposed a national government party because I believed it meant the introduction of the one party system of government that characterizes the new political order of Europe, only to find myself deprived of the right to present the views of my constituents in the making of laws that affect their living. I hope, Mr. Speaker, hon. members to your right and to your left alike will forgive me when I confess that I feel as though I had escaped the regime of a one-party system only to fall into the deep blue sea of order-in-councildom.

[Mr. Moore.]

In the first days of the war we found ourselves facing the paradox of giving up democracy to preserve democracy. Over a period of years the totalitarian powers had mobilized their man-power and heaped up great stores of munitions, not secretly but boastfully, for an attack on the democracies; and all the while the democracies refused to prepare for defence. When the blow fell, the British parliament put the blame on its Prime Minister and replaced him. We of this house shouldered the blame with the Prime Minister, as we should have done.

Action, not words, we said, is the inescapable rule of war time. Wars are not won by debates, at least not in an era of tanks and aeroplanes. Democracy implies government in the face of opposition, while war calls for unity of action. But if action be the rule of war, I repeat the question of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni: Why do we wait months to determine the distribution of the troops by a plebiscite, while Australians are being killed off for lack of reinforcements?

Once aroused, the spirit of inquiry goes on to wonder how far the actions of the cabinet have justified the scope we have given them; for it is not to be forgotten that while we delegate power, we are ourselves the trustees of that power and responsible to the people for its application. The ministers, of course, were much too busy with executive duties to shape the country's legislative requirements and so, in due course, appointed legislative boards to carry on the duties which we were elected to perform. Legislative boards! Let us pass over the method of appointment; it is on the model of the fascist order. Let us pass over the proceedings of those boards; so far as I know, they have no published Hansard. Some day the people will become keenly interested in the country's political set-up. It is an extraordinary one. I venture to say that in proportion to population Canada is paying more people for making laws than any other country in the world. The cost is tremendous, the confusion appalling. Away from the provinces, there are two deliberative bodies at Ottawa. One is in continuous session, preparing orders in council; the other, ourselves, when in session, reduced by the executive to a sounding board for speeches, engaged in the "bare formality" of ratification.

Having established a bureaucracy after the manner of the new order in Europe, and having continued to maintain at least the expense of a representative assembly, perhaps it was to be expected that in course of time we would take up with the third form of government, a direct reference to the people. The political structure of this country ought to be subjected to careful review, not by another commission but by this parliament. Within the time at my disposal I may mention only several matters which in my opinion seem to condemn the new order in Canada. The ministry, by order in council assuming responsibility for distributing prices and wages—in effect, distributing national income—has made no announcement as to the principle of distribution. The law of supply and demand has been repealed by orders in council, but what has been put in its place? What happened is not quite evident, but this much is certain: the economic structure has been put partly into reverse. Instead of penalizing people for combining in restraint of trade, penalties are provided against competitive services. Laissez-faire was the first casualty of the war, I may be told, but that was not altogether so in this country; for, while some people are tucked under the wings of authority, most people are left to scratch for themselves.

The people I represent, however, are particularly concerned over the principle of distributing rewards and sacrifices between the workers in factory and field, as well as the pay of those enrolled in the active service of the armed forces. And again I ask: on what principle are rewards and sacrifices distributed under the new order in Canada? Specifically, why are those who serve in the front line paid less—so very much less—than those who serve in the rear lines. "Economy!" I may be told. Does economy begin with those who offer the sacrifice of their lives? "The menace of inflation!" I am told. But do not the very measures of those who legislate in our stead, lead to inflation? To divert thousands of people from producing "consumers' goods" to regulating the production of "consumers' goods" is an inflationary measure. Having outbid the farms for work in the home services of the government, they borrow, and tax, to maintain artificial prices and dispense subsidies to certain producers—subsidies that increase in number and size as the sessions go by. Surely, those measures are highly inflationary. Paying more for less is inflation.

As I draw toward a conclusion, I would not have you believe, Mr. Speaker, that because I have not recited the good deeds of the ministry, I am unmindful of them; I have not referred to them because I chose to speak on the maxim our British and French ancestors laid down years ago that the form of government is as important as its achievements. The war must be won; but we must not lose its objective—the preservation of democracy. For what would it profit a country to gain the whole world and lose its own soul.

It is this plebiscite that brings up the matter of achievement and puts us on guard that all may not be well with our war effort. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in an admirable presentation the other day quoted words of unstinted praise for this country's war contribution from the English press. Those quotations are reported in Hansard at page 311.

If those words are deserved, then the people are not to be blamed for their bewilderment as to why they are to be thrown into the turmoil of general election by plebiscite.

Looking back, I ask if the British of the Isles, while they faced overwhelming odds, in 1940, were really content when our ministers declared that only Canadians who volunteered were available for the defence of Britain. And, now, the Minister of Justice, by another pledge, makes an even more startling declaration as to our relations within the British commonwealth of nations, as reported on February 5, in the Ottawa Journal:

> The sole goal of our effort will be for the defence of the country. Because of a mutual defence agreement with the United States, however, it may be necessary to send men out of the country.

One might have smiled at the naive suggestion that we discharge our duty in the world's battle for freedom, by conscripting men to help 135,000,000 Americans defend the United States, were it not for the express implication that we are unwilling to do as much for the nations within the British commonwealth. By my seat in this house, I refuse to accept that declaration as the policy of this country.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) to the government's most close scrutiny.

Mr. HOMUTH: And to their propaganda bureau.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is most unfortunate at this time that the speech from the throne was not worded so that it could have been endorsed by every hon. member, signifying to the country that once and for all the entire house was in favour of an all-out, total war effort, instead of again indulging, as it has been, in a rotten, political mix-up. I cannot conceive of anything which would give Hitler greater joy than to know that this country is split in two, and that while a part of the country has a desire for a total, all-out war effort, another part has not.

We are speaking about a total war effort. Almost every hon. member who has spoken has said that he is in favour of a total war effort. After almost three years of war we find hon. members rising in their places and stating that they want total war. I wonder where they all were in 1939. I never saw them voting for a total war effort, but I did see them voting against a total war effort. A resolution was put by my party, and without exception they all voted against it. There was only one party, the one to which I belong, which voted for a total war effort; and because we took that stand we lost seven of our members.

We are now about to take a plebiscite. It is indeed unfortunate, as was pointed out by the last speaker, that in order to have a total war effort this government should have placed itself in a position where it now has to go back to the country to ask permission to break some of the pledges it made in 1940. I quite well recall that Liberals, and Conservatives too, were quite unanimous with respect to opposing an all-out effort. In my opinion there is no difference between Liberals and Conservatives, and I do not know that I would rather see Conservatives than Liberals in office. I say that because their policies are just the same, and that is shown by the amendment. The action of the Conservatives as well as that of the Liberals in 1939 must be kept in mind. Only the other day I heard the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) state that he was in favour of the conscription of finance, material wealth and man-power. Yet I saw him stand in his place in 1939 and vote against the conscription of finance. Surely he should make his position clear before he can expect other people in this country—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He was not in the house.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, he was in the house, and so were you; and you voted against it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was not a member of the house and neither was our acting leader in 1939.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What is your stand now? I will bet you, Mr. Speaker —and I am not a gambling man—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What are the odds to-day?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): —that if the question came up for a vote in this house of conscripting finance and industry before man-power, my hon. friends of the Conservative party would vote solidly with the Liberals against it.

Mr. BRADETTE: Not much cheering there.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They voted against conscription of finance on September 12, 1939, as recorded on page 165 of Hansard. I shall not read it, but it is there for inspection.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): A lot of water has flowed over the dam since then.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You bet, and it is some dam too. I should like to refer to the plebiscite a little more in detail. I do not think there has ever been a greater disgrace put upon the people of Canada than this. I should like to read what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said with regard to this on January 26, 1942, as reported on page 51 of Hansard:

> The question which the government proposes to submit to the people is the simple and straightforward question:
> It is simple, but it is not straightforward.
> "Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service."
> It will be seen that in seeking freedom for itself to act on all matters pertaining to war in accordance with its judgment, the government is taking a course which will remove all legitimate excuse for controversy, and the course best calculated to maintain the unity of the country in this time of war.

I contend that they are taking the best course to split this country open. The Prime Minister said that this was a simple and straightforward question, but how are the people going to vote upon it? No matter how they vote, we have no information as to what action the government will take. Even though they vote "yes," the Prime Minister has gone out of his way to assure them that there will be no change in policy with regard to the sending of men overseas. He said:

> . . . the government is taking a course which will remove all legitimate excuse for controversy.

The controversy referred to is, in my opinion, political controversy. I think it will be found that the government will proceed exactly along the lines which it is following to-day and which it followed when the war first started. This is one of the meanest political tricks ever perpetrated upon the people of Canada. There are two conceptions to this plebiscite, and I think this has been done intentionally. One is for the people of Quebec and the other is for the people of the remaining eight provinces. I am going to endeavour to prove my point.

I have never been able to find that the Prime Minister has said that there would be conscription for overseas. In fact, that is not the issue as far as he is concerned. I do not think the word "overseas" has been used by him, certainly not in his speech which I have gone through most carefully. I should like to draw attention to what was said by the late Minister of Justice on September 9, 1939. I am referring to his speech because in my opinion he was the leader of the government at that time and the Prime Minister was taking his advice. Mr. Lapointe is reported on page 68 of Hansard as follows:

The whole province of Quebec—and I speak with all the responsibility and all the solemnity I can give to my words—will never agree to accept compulsory service or conscription outside Canada.

That is most definite.

I will go farther than that: when I say the whole province of Quebec I mean that I personally agree with them. I am authorized by my colleagues in the cabinet from the province of Quebec—the veteran leader of the Senate, my good friend and colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin)—

Where is the Minister of Public Works now? It would be interesting for the house to know his stand on this question.

—my friend and fellow townsman and colleague, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power)—

Where does the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) stand on this question of conscription for overseas service? It would be interesting to have his opinion in this regard.

—to say that we will never agree to conscription and will never be members or supporters of a government that will try to enforce it. Is that clear enough?

I do not know whether that was for the Prime Minister's benefit or not, but he sat in his seat and he did not contradict the late Minister of Justice. The late minister went on to say:

May I add that if my hon. friends and myself from Quebec were forced to leave the government I question whether anyone would be able to take our place. If my hon. friends in the far corner of the house opposite;—

He was referring to us.

—if the Ottawa Citizen, which just now is waging a campaign for conscription, think they are serving Canada by splitting it at the very outset of the war, then I say they are gravely and seriously wrong.

And again:

And those in Quebec who say that we will have conscription, in spite of what some of us are saying, are doing the work of disunity, the work of the foe, the work of the enemy.

He concluded:

I believe the majority in my province trust me; I have never deceived them, and I will not deceive them now.

I do not think there can be any misunderstanding about the question. There was the Minister of Justice at that time; there was the Minister of Public Works at that time who is still in the cabinet, and there was the then Minister of Pensions and National Health, now the Minister of National Defence for Air, who were quoted, and the Prime Minister sat in his seat and never contradicted the statement. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that that is still their opinion and that this plebiscite is a pure deception. They have no intention of doing anything different. Let me prove that. On January 26, 1942, as reported on page 46 of Hansard, the Prime Minister had the following to say about the premier of Quebec, and I quote this to connect him directly with the Prime Minister's stand now:

Hon. members are also aware that if, at the time when Canada's participation in the war was challenged in an election in the province of Quebec by a government professing a different political faith, a like assurance with respect to service overseas had not been given in the name of the present government by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), and other Liberal leaders and members of this House of Commons from the province of Quebec, the verdict of the people of that province might have been wholly different.

He refers to the statement that Mr. Lapointe made in 1939.

He then goes on:

At that time, the people of the province of Quebec turned out of office the government that had sought to thwart Canada's war effort, and placed in office under the leadership of Hon. Mr. Godbout, a government which was prepared to cooperate with the federal administration in furthering the national effort.

The Prime Minister there definitely associated himself with the premier of Quebec. What does the premier of Quebec have to say about this matter? I quote from the Ottawa Journal of January 28, 1942:

Premier Godbout told a public meeting tonight that Prime Minister King "has always been against conscription for overseas service. I think that conscription for overseas service actually would be a crime," he added.

Mr. Godbout spoke in French at the annual meeting of the St. Denis-Dorion Liberal Association.

When Mr. Godbout said that Prime Minister King was against conscription for overseas service, someone in the rear of the hall shouted "yes, but he had already sent men overseas."

Discussing the proposed plebiscite, Mr. Godbout said that Prime Minister King could put the question this way: "Are you for conscription," or "Are you against conscription?"

I should like to know what that was if it was not a deliberate attempt to deceive the people. I think Mr. Godbout is right in what he says. I think also the late Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe was right in what he said. I am not disputing that. The report goes on:

If the majority answered in the affirmative, Mr. King would have to enforce conscription, or else resign. If he resigns, another government, headed by Mr. Meighen (Conservative leader Arthur Meighen) will take his place and will immediately enforce conscription. But Mr. King knows that England doesn't need men, so he will not ask the question that way.

Therefore it was designed for the purpose. The report continues:

Mr. Godbout said he approved of the "defence of our country in our own land, but there are certain territories which must be defended to protect our own land". He mentioned Labrador, and islands off the coast of British Columbia as places to be defended to protect Canada.

The only difference it will make if the people vote "yes" on the plebiscite will be that the government will be permitted to send men outside Canada to Newfoundland, Labrador and some of the islands near the Pacific coast. That is the extent to which there will be a difference.

Let us turn now to the present Minister of Justice, Mr. St. Laurent, who is a minister of the cabinet, the Prime Minister's own choice, and a man in whom the Prime Minister has said on different occasions that he has complete confidence. On February 3, 1942, the Ottawa Citizen reproduces a Canadian Press dispatch from Quebec dated February 2, as follows:

Justice Minister St. Laurent said in a radio address to-night that Conservative party supporters in Toronto know "that at the moment and probably for a long time to come conscription for overseas service would harm our war effort.

"What is the attitude of the King government in the face of this double-barrelled menace? You know it, you know its past; know that it is Canadian first and Canadian before all. Have confidence in him (Mr. King), help him to complete his cabinet. When this cabinet will be completed he will ask you if you consent to relieve him of the promises he made when you elected his supporters.

"It is evident," he continued, "that the plebiscite does not give 100 per cent satisfaction either to those who fear that Mr. King will not do enough or to those who fear that he will do too much. But I believe that the government's decision to appeal to the people as to its promises is in conformity with the spirit of our democratic institutions and with the best Liberal traditions."

There the present Minister of Justice admits that the wording of the plebiscite has a dual purpose, one to satisfy the English-speaking part of Canada who may claim that the government is not doing enough in the war, and the other to satisfy those who claim that the government is doing too much—and that, as the minister points out, is in conformity with the best Liberal traditions. Well, Mr. Speaker, knowing them as I do, I can second that last part.

I want to read another extract for the benefit of the Minister of National Defence for Air. This is taken from the Ottawa Journal of February 6, 1942:

One answer is what is happening in Quebec East, where one of Mr. Ilsley's most distinguished colleagues, Mr. St. Laurent, is a candidate. On Tuesday night in that riding Mr. Oscar Drouin, a minister of the Godbout cabinet and campaign manager for Mr. St. Laurent, said: "When the time of the plebiscite comes, I pledge myself to ask my electors to reply in the negative."

There is the campaign manager for the present Minister of Justice pledging himself to ask his electors to vote against the plebiscite, and yet a minister of the government running in a Quebec constituency wants his electors to support the plebiscite. So definitely there must be a split in the cabinet. One can come to no other conclusion. The report goes on to say that "on the platform with Mr. Drouin was the Hon. C. G. Power, Minister for Air." Where is he now? What is his stand on this question? There you have the government's attitude in Quebec. What is the government's attitude in the other eight provinces?

All the debate in this house has hinged round the question of conscription of manpower for overseas. The press almost daily is giving the impression throughout the country that there will be conscription for overseas. I was at a picture show the other evening—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It was on a Wednesday evening; the house was not sitting. What did I see there? There was a picture shown which had been produced by the national film board, and paid for by the government. It was a moving picture of the Prime Minister and the cabinet, and the title was that the cabinet was busy preparing ballots on conscription. That is the government's stand today. Let us see now what the Prime Minister said not long ago. As reported at page 44 of Hansard of January 26, the Prime Minister said this:

The government is not announcing a new policy. What we propose to do is to extend what, in fact, we have been doing right along, that is, to apply the principle progressively. In other words, we intend to continue to extend the application of national selective service to meet new needs as they arrive.

On November 12, last, I made it very plain to parliament that, with respect to the mobilization of man-power, the government's policy was one of national selective service; and, also, that an extension of the application of compulsory selective service—conscription, if you will—was a part of that policy. Let me repeat my exact words.

I want it to be distinctly understood that so far as the principle of compulsory selective national service is concerned for Canada, in Canada, I stand for that principle. I have never taken any other stand. It is the position that I have held all along. It has been applied in connection with military training, and applied in a number of other directions I might mention. How much further it will be applied the house will learn as the government takes its decisions on that matter.

I do not think there is any doubt as to why this plebiscite is being taken. It is again to lull the people into a sense of false security. There is an agitation now for a greater war effort, but rather than increase our war effort the government would sell the country out in order to save its political party. It is quite evident—there is no assumption about it—that there is a decided split within the cabinet on this question; and if the cabinet themselves are not united and the house itself is not, how in the world are the people going to be united?

I do not think there is any question that there is no shortage of men; the government so assure us. The Prime Minister has said that there are plenty for the navy, plenty for the air force, and plenty for the army up to date. The Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) said that it was quite satisfactory; the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said just a few days ago that on one day alone 500 enlisted; so they are satisfied, surely. Yet the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said the other day that he was not satisfied, and the Minister of Pensions and National Health is not satisfied. Nevertheless we are going to spend two and a half to three million dollars in order to settle a political quarrel between the Liberal and Conservative parties. And we are going to continue the same policy as before. Who would have the audacity to go out from this parliament and ask the people to contribute to the war loan, ask the children in the schools to give up their nickels and dimes to buy war savings stamps, when this government can so carelessly spend two and a half to three million dollars to settle a political question? It is unfortunate indeed that the government have placed themselves in such an embarrassing position; that is, it is unfortunate for the government. It might be a good thing for Hitler, but it is very tough on Canada.

We advocated in 1939 that the first thing that should be done was the conscription of finance so that money would be available for all the needs of our war effort and for the agricultural effort of the country. We advocated the conscription of industry and of natural resources before the conscription of man-power. I still believe that is the soundest stand that could have been taken then, and I think it is high time it was taken now. One of the things we are short of, as has been shown time and time again, is our equipment for the fighting forces. We saw what happened in Norway because of lack of sufficient material; we saw what happened in France, Holland, Belgium, Greece, Crete, Singapore, Hong Kong and Libya. How much more is it going to take to wake this government up? I do not think anything will wake them up short of a bomb dropped on this building.

I was interested the other day in the discussion of British Columbia defences. This might be interesting to the Minister of Pensions and National Health because he is going to be over there some day, maybe. This is from a letter received on January 26, 1942:

Dear Sir:

There is much talk about conscription now. I'd like to bring to your notice how the 17th Battalion on searchlight duty at Victoria are equipped right now. They have two Bren gun carriers minus the guns and an old rifle each, some with the sights gone and forty-two rounds of ammunition each. Pity the Jap plane that encounters these fellows.

What a tragedy! I do not know whether the statement is true or not, but the Minister of Pensions and National Health probably knows. I know that when a parliamentary committee went to a certain camp, one of the largest in the country, for many thousands of men there was one Bren gun. It is time the people knew these things. Yet we have a book like the one I have in my hand. Here is the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) named right on the first page. "A nation transformed." I should say it is. It is signed "C. D. Howe, Minister of Munitions and Supply." "Canada supplies the tools of war," and anyone who looks at this would not question our war effort. Look at the shells piled up, and the ships and shipbuilding plants. All over the country we are producing war supplies and aeroplanes. Here are mines and factories. It must have cost a nice penny to put out this book; one would just think there was a tremendous flow of materials for our war effort. What does Douglas Bell company say about our war effort?

This is from the Ottawa Citizen of February 3 last, reporting a speech by Mr. Hepburn in connection with the Welland by-election:

To switch public attention from the plebiscite issue the federal government had instituted sugar rationing "notwithstanding the fact that there was no shortage and no one was hoarding", Mr. Hepburn said. This was another case of "fooling the public" just as the federal government had done in speaking of Canadian-made planes and Canadian-made tanks.

He charged that Ralph Bell, director of aircraft production, had stated for the purpose of helping Labour Minister Mitchell's campaign—

This is something for the Minister of Munitions and Supply to listen to:

—that three hundred aeroplane engines a month would soon be turned out at the Chrysler plant in Windsor, Ont. Mr. Hepburn said he had checked on this with John Mansfield, president of the company, who had told him that "if everything goes well it will be eighteen months before we can make one engine and even then parts will have to be imported."

Then in the same paper they speak of the Ottawa Car and Aircraft company that had to close down or at least lay off five hundred men. Over a year ago I brought to the attention of the government this very company, and I do not think the government ever made any investigation regarding the labour conditions there that I pointed out. We had a chance to visit the company, and they were doing good work but the president then told me they were working on aeroplanes for which they had no contract with the government. When I asked him how he knew he would get a contract he said: "We don't know, we just have hopes. We cannot wait on the government, they are too slow." I should like to know what the Minister of Munitions and Supply is doing about these five hundred men laid off. To talk about all-out production is ridiculous. Here we sit around and fiddle away and our factories are only working part time. I was talking to Mr. Quain, president of the Ottawa Car and Aircraft company, again the day before yesterday on the telephone. He said that his company is not the only one in this situation, that there are dozens all over the country just like it.

Not long ago I went to see the rolling mills at Calgary; it closed at five o'clock each afternoon. In June last when I was talking to the Minister of Munitions and Supply about this rolling mill and telling him we wanted to get it open, the minister said they did not need that type of steel.

Mr. HOWE: As a matter of personal privilege I wish to say I made no such statement.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I can refer to it in Hansard, but I do not have it with me. The Minister of Munitions and Supply said twice in answer to a question, "We do not need that steel for my department."

Mr. HOWE: I said I made no such statement, and the hon. member is repeating it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I accept the statement for the time being.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I will ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that statement.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I will withdraw the statement on the condition that I can refer to the words in Hansard to-morrow. I think I have the right to read it to-morrow.

That is our all-out war effort. Just to show how much the government knows about our all-out war effort, I asked a question of the former Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty). I asked the question because I wanted to find out what our total war effort amounted to. I put three questions on the order paper, the first being:

1. How many factories in Canada, producing war supplies, are working 24 hours per day, 365 days in the year?

That would be a one hundred per cent war effort, as the Prime Minister said out west. Listen to what the acting Minister of Labour said, as reported at page 200 of Hansard of February 2, 1942:

Except in connection with certain industrial disputes the hours of labour in industrial employment are a matter of provincial jurisdiction and no comprehensive statistics exist to answer the above questions.

In other words, they do not know how many factories are working full time. What a sad plight after nearly three years of war! The second question was:

2. How many factories in Canada producing such supplies are working 24 hours a day, 6 days a week, throughout the year?

That is only part time. This is the answer that was given:

Under the recently established national and regional war labour boards, however, the dominion and provincial governments are cooperating in the handling of most matters relating to employment conditions.

Can you imagine such an answer to a direct question?

The third question was:

3. How many factories in Canada producing war supplies are working less than 6 days a week, 24 hours per day?

Listen to the reply:

In this connection there is being established a joint system of inspection and reporting which is designed to produce the data requested.

This reveals absolute ignorance of the working conditions of industry in the country. Where are we going to end up? If there is not another Hong Kong, it will not be the government's fault.

I remember in 1938 when I was speaking in this house about oil production in Alberta and trying to get the government at that time to develop the oil fields; and again in 1939 when war first broke out I pointed out to them that it was not beyond the stretch of imagination that the German forces would be down into Iraq and Iran, in the Persian oil fields, taking Britain's supply of oil, and I said that one of the greatest needs was to increase production of oil in Alberta and construct a pipeline across to the Pacific coast. But I was laughed at as frightening the people of Canada. I was regarded as an alarmist. But what is being done to-day? That very thing may happen, though we hope not. But if it does, can we meet our obligations? What is being done by the government now to increase oil production?

A man came into my room during the last session and told me that in Regina there was a refinery which had a system whereby they could extract oil from the tar sands of Athabaska, but he said that they needed a little financial assistance and he was here seeking help from the government. At the time he spoke to me, however, he had not been able to make any headway with the government. The company itself had spent over $15,000 in developing this method of extracting oil. I asked him whether it could extract gasoline and compete with other commercial companies, and he said, "yes; the by-product alone will enable us to do that." But what is the government doing about it? What is being done about working conditions in Kirkland Lake? Those men have complied with every possible request from the government. The only ones who have defied the government are the owners, and the government are deliberately starving the men into submission to the financial interests and doing nothing. Yet they talk about unity. They are even breaking the labour organizations in the country, splitting the country as wide open as races; and they have the audacity to say that they are advocating unity. What a sad plight!

We are surely taking care of profits. The people of the country know quite well that large profits are being made, and yet we are asking soldiers to fight for $1.30 a day. We are asking the farmers to produce at a loss, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr Gardiner) is saying to them: "You fellows should not expect to make money in war time; you will have to lose a million or two at the beginning of the war and at the end." But here are the banks—what profits are they making? Let me give some figures from a house return filed in 1940. Column 1 of a table I have here shows net profits after published provisions for dominion and provincial taxes shown in column 2 but before appropriations for bank premises, pension funds, etc., shown in column 3; and the percentage of net profits to capital paid up is given as follows for the banks mentioned:

Bank	Percentage of net profits
Montreal	9·54
Nova Scotia	16·18
Toronto	24·08
Provincial	7·28
Commerce	10·02
Royal	10·08
Dominion	13·70
Canadienne Nationale	10·68
Imperial	15·18
Barclays	0·38

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Just before the house rose, there was some difference between the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and myself in regard to the question of steel. I want to settle that question right now. On June 11, 1941, at page 3812 of Hansard, I find these words:

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The minister speaks of it as being a business proposition and no concern of his department; but if this country needs steel, it is this government's business.

Mr. Howe: We do not need that particular steel.

And later I said:

I think the point is well put by the minister, and I am not going to say any more about it because I understand now that we do not need the steel.

Mr. Howe: I said, we do not need that steel.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I understand now that the minister means that we do not need this scrap iron which it is the purpose of the salvage campaign to gather because we do not need the steel which would be produced from that scrap iron.

Mr. Howe: I said nothing of the kind. I said that we did not need that steel.

Then later I said:

There is not a thing that I will not do to help win this war, but I certainly am not going out to ask our people to give this scrap iron if it is not necessary. If we do not need that steel, then I am through as far as that part is concerned.

I think that definitely settles the question which we were discussing before recess.

I was also referring to bank returns, and I should like to mention a few more of the profits being made by industry, in order to see if some of these difficulties cannot be cleared up. I have in my hand a page from The Monetary Times of November 22, 1941, where I find this report:

Report of the International Nickel Company of Canada, Limited, and subsidiaries for the nine months ended September 30, 1941, shows a net profit in terms of United States currency of $25,695,938 after all charges, depreciation, provision for income and franchise taxes, etc. When the preferred dividend requirements were met, this net was equivalent to $1.66 a share on the 14,584,025 no par shares of common stock outstanding. This compared with a net profit of $26,425,104, equal to $1.71 a common share in the corresponding period a year ago, and $26,584,806, or $1.72 a share, in the same nine months of 1939.

Then here is the report on another company:

Present indications are that earnings of Stedman Bros., Limited, will be sufficient to absorb the higher rate of taxation and that net profits for 1941 will be as good as 1940, when net, after all charges, totalled $274,664, equal, after preferred dividends, to $2.85 a share on the common. Sales in the ten months ended October 31, were well ahead of the similar period of 1940 and profits, before provision for taxes, were proportionally higher than the increase in volume.

And another:

Canadian Bakeries, Limited, Calgary, Alberta, reported a net profit of $34,160 for the year ended August 31, 1941. This compared with $20,824 in the preceding year. Net was equal to $3.74 a share on the 5 per cent preference stock compared with $2.26 a share for the preceding fiscal year.

This shows that some companies are still making quite good profits. I believe one of our greatest difficulties, and one that should be faced immediately, is the question of production. I was quite amused to hear the reply given the other day by the Minister of Finance to a question asked by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) in regard to sugar. The minister said, as reported at page 109 of Hansard:

If the hon. member is asking that consideration be given to that question, I can assure him that consideration will be given to it. I may say, however, that the sugar administrator advised the beet sugar industry some time ago that they should do everything possible to bring production of beets up to the maximum capacity of their factories. If this were possible in the case of the two factories in Alberta, it would mean that beet sugar production would exceed the total requirements of the three prairie provinces.

My point is this: The minister says the administrator advised the beet sugar industry some time ago to see if it could not bring up production to capacity. I do not think that is the mobilization of industry; I do not think that is the conscription of industry. Why does the responsible minister not go to the industry and say, "Here, we are not asking you to bring production up to capacity; we are telling you to do so." The government should see that industry is carried on in a proper way. If the people know that industry is working to capacity; if they know that industry is completely mobilized, as it certainly is not now, I am quite positive that you will find a much greater degree of unity. It is no use going round to these industries and appealing to their patriotism; that will not work. The Minister of Munitions and Supply tried that. Let me read what he said on September 12, 1939, as reported at page 179 of Hansard:

The provision of five per cent was put in the last act after a good deal of consideration as a minimum return for the service rendered, but it was one which men of considerable experience believed to be unworkable. I can say to my hon. friend that from that day to this the defence purchasing board has done its very best to place contracts on that basis and has used every pressure that could be brought to bear in the form of patriotism, and so on, but to date it has not succeeded in placing a single contract on that basis.

Notice that; he appealed to their patriotism, but he was not able to get a single contract on that basis.

To carry that provision into another bill would be out of the question at this time. That part of the act we can consider as having proven to be unworkable.

I believe that is definite proof that industry is not going to do as the government wishes unless pressure is brought to bear. The minister told us he even appealed to patriotism. This is a time of war; apparently the government is not going to appeal to the patriotism of the ordinary man to get him into the army; he is going to be forced in. Why not do the same thing with industry? I think it very unfortunate that in this, the third year of war, this country should be divided within itself. There is great discontent among the working classes, who feel that they are not being given fair treatment. It is the common people who have to bear the burden. They not only have to pay for the war but have to go and fight it as well. The workers, the farmers and the common people are the ones who have to produce the food and make the tools, and now they are being asked to pay for the war as well. As long as we have discontent and disunity we shall never progress as we should. We have a law which provides that anyone found guilty of sabotage resulting either directly or indirectly in loss of life shall be subject to the death penalty. I believe that those responsible for retarding our war effort, no matter who they may be, should be brought before a court of justice and, if found guilty, given the full penalty provided by law.

I want to conclude with the words of Mr. Bevin, speaking in the British house, which words on this occasion I take as my own. He said:

> Let bitterness and discontent get into the hearts of my army of workers and then, by God, we have lost the war.

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, we are now approaching the crisis of this, the greatest war in history. All that we hold dear is at stake. Mr. Churchill has said that though the British empire survive for a thousand years, history would regard this as our greatest hour. We all have a responsibility. The people have their responsibility, and members of parliament have a greater responsibility. As a member of parliament I am prepared to assume my responsibility and discharge it according to what I believe to be the interests of Canada, the British people and our allies.

I believe our first duty is to our enlisted men, the men in the fighting services; to give them support; so to organize the resources and man-power of this country that they will have the greatest possible cooperation. This does not mean that every person called up to give service to his country must go into the fighting forces. It means that every person should be called to that station where he can give the best service. In the town of Amherst, for instance, we have working in the liquor store three men who should be working at their trades, one as a machinist, another as an expert moulder, and the third as a sheet metal worker. If they are called upon to do war work, I believe they would be willing to discharge their full duty. My idea of selective service is the calling up of each man to do the work he is best fitted to do.

I believe the county of Cumberland will compare favourably with any other constituency in Canada as to percentage of enlisted men. Some of our districts have as high as 10 per cent of their population in the armed services. Conscription, therefore, would not affect those districts very much, although it might rearrange the man-power, and put some men at more useful war work.

I feel I have a special duty to the returned men and, so far as I am able, I shall carry out their wishes and requests. I owe a special duty to patriotic bodies, groups of women and war workers, and individuals in the community who have appealed to me to take a stand with respect to the conscription plebiscite. I have resolutions from Red Cross organizations, church workers and municipal bodies asking that I make known their wishes to parliament, and that I be guided by what they consider to be in the interests of the country at this time. I am prepared to do that. They are behind the veterans' organizations in Canada calling for a complete, full war effort. So far as I know, there is not an elector in Cumberland who is not prepared to do his full duty in carrying on the war. So far as I know, there is not an elector who does not wish the government to govern the country at this time, and mobilize all our resources and man-power so that we may put forth our greatest effort.

No government ever had more whole-hearted support in carrying on the war than this government has had from the opposition. The complaint with respect to the government is that it has not gone faster and done more. I was nominated in the constituency of Cumberland against my wishes and my interests. I was elected opposed to a partisan administration in a time of war. I promised to support any government in measures to win the war. I do not want office. I do not want the responsibility, myself, in the matter of administration. I wish only to do my duty to the men in the fighting services, the people of Canada and our allies.

The people of Cumberland take great pride in and have the utmost good-will toward the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) in the tremendous task which is his. We want him to work in the Churchill way; let him give direction; let him see that all our resources are harnessed and that each man and woman is placed in his or her proper station. Let him see that the armed services are given all the support they require, that the greatest production is attained from both factories and field, and that everything possible is done to win the war. The government knows the facts; it should lead the way. It should give guidance to the people. It should give direction as to what measures should be adopted in carrying on the war, without a plebiscite.

The people of Cumberland expect me to act for them; they do not want me to shirk responsibility. They do not want the mothers, wives and sisters to have the responsibility of saying what shall be done with respect to conscription. They do not want delay; they do not want expense. They fear disunity, and they fear, too, that bitterness will be created by the plebiscite. They want parliament and the government to act. I have doubts whether more than twenty-five per cent of the electors will go to the polls to vote. There is grave doubt as to the result. What will our enemies say if the decision is not emphatic? What will our allies do? What do they think now?

There is the question of the present war loan. I have had a personal appeal from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). He has appealed to me as a member of the House of Commons to do what I can to make the victory loan a success, and I am prepared to do that.

We have in Cumberland a committee which operated during the last loan, and will continue to operate. They gave their services without commissions. This committee had the confidence of the people of Cumberland. There is no question of plebiscite, so far as their efforts are concerned; there is no question of party allegiance. They are all working for the country, all trying to do their duty, with no political consideration.

Whether we like it or not, we are in the greatest war of all time; with one task to perform, and that is to get on with the war. I am opposed to a plebiscite because it gives comfort to our enemies and humiliates our partners and allies. I oppose it because it shifts the responsibility from those who were elected to carry it. It does not show strength of leadership; it dampens the spirit of our people and disheartens our fighting forces. Never in their history did the British people take a plebiscite in the face of the enemy, or decide war policies in terms of votes while the battle was raging. Yet, there never were enemies as ruthless as those we are now facing.

During the last election conscription was not an issue in Cumberland, but I cannot say that the government did not make political capital out of it. They endeavoured to offer people an easy, popular war. It is true, too, that the leaders of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia made political capital out of it by saying that while both leaders, the present Prime Minister and Doctor Manion, were on record as being opposed to conscription at the last election, yet Doctor Manion had been in favour of it during the last war and had written a book justifying his action. They left it to the electors to decide whom they could trust to protect them from conscription after the election.

There is no question as to the seriousness of the war, and there is no question that the Prime Minister appreciates that seriousness. During the November sitting he told us "that the war had grown in intensity and extent", "that every conceivable means by which freedom can be crushed is to-day being employed by nazi Germany", "that world domination was Germany's aim", "that it has taken the past two years for most countries to come to see the all-encompassing aspect of the conflict and that the cause is indeed the highest which it has ever been given to man to defend". Since then, Japan has struck and has been on the offensive for two months. We have had Hong Kong and Singapore and the retirement in north Africa. We are threatened on our eastern and western coasts. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) have warned the house of the menace to our western shores. The danger is as great, if not greater on the Atlantic coast. Our shipping, our oil works, our steel works, our mines and our war industries are in danger, and yet we are told that the electors must give direction, that this is not the responsibility of the government.

My constituents expect parliament and the government to take the proper action. We have conscription now for home defence, and we have that without a mandate. The electors were not consulted, so why should they be consulted now? In the past, little respect has been shown for the voters. Responsible government has meant the type of government practised by British people down through the years. An article appearing in the Ottawa Journal puts the situation very well:

> In the proposition for a plebiscite which the speech from the throne announces on parliament hill, there is a diabolical ingenuity on Prime Minister King's part. For whatever the result may be, it will free his skirts from obligations and give him a new lease on political life. Consider the proposition:

Then follows a quotation from the speech from the throne:

> "My ministers accordingly, will seek, from the people, by means of a plebiscite, release from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service."

> Now, you who read this, which way are you going to vote?

> If you vote yes, to free Mr. King from all previous commitments, you vote to give Mr. King continued power with a free hand.

> If you vote no, to hold him to his previous commitments, you vote against conscription. Because, Mr. King's essential previous commitment was that he would never introduce conscription.

> So, if you vote yes, you leave Mr. King free in power; if you vote no—not to release him from his pledge—you endorse his stand against conscription.

> And if you happen to be a conscriptionist, and vote to release Mr. King from his pledge against conscription, you don't even get anything out of that. Because, Mr. King, makes no promise to introduce conscription even if the plebiscite gives him a free hand.

That is the situation which is being placed before the electors with the holding of this plebiscite. We also have the statement by Mr. Godbout, premier of Quebec, by the Minister of Justice, Mr. St. Laurent, that there will be no conscription. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), and others who have spoken in favour of the plebiscite, indicate that conscription will be put into effect. As yet we have not had a statement from the Minister of National Defence. I feel that the members of parliament and the people of this country should have a definite statement from the minister, and that at once.

I should like to say something with respect to the work of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). He has had many commendations, and I wish to add mine. He has done his utmost to harness the industries of this country, but there are many in this house and throughout the country who look upon that as a party accomplishment rather than the work of all the people. The taxpayers are not given very much credit. They are the ones who provide the money when parliament votes huge sums. During the fiscal year 1939-40, a total of $127,000,000 was expended to carry on the war; in the following year, 1940-41, the expenditures amounted to $778,000,000; in 1941-42 a total of $1,450,000,000 was voted, but we have not yet had a report as to how much of that will be expended by the end of the year. The Prime Minister announced in his speech during this session that in 1942-43 a total of $3,000,000,000 would have to be provided. All that is needed is to name a sum up in the billions and parliament votes it without question. The easiest thing to get in this parliament is a vote of one, two, three or five billion dollars provided it is required for carrying on the war. That is, as far as the members of parliament are concerned, and I think they are supported by the people of Canada. In addition to these large sums, there are the expenditures made by this government on behalf of the British government and also in connection with the lease-lend bill of the United States.

All this does not mean that there are not grave misgivings all over Canada as to whether all this money is being wisely expended. Many people are convinced that there is extravagance and waste, but it is popular to spend money, and this is not questioned to any great extent when it is done for the purposes of war. The public are told that they are protected in connection with these expenditures by a parliamentary committee on war expenditures. I have been a member of that committee, and I do not want the members of parliament or the people of this country to get the impression that any committee can safeguard them with regard to these enormous expenditures. We are not looking for scandal; we are not looking for waste, but the responsibility is upon this committee to give as great protection as possible with respect to these expenditures. The committee can touch only the fringe of these expenditures. While the responsibility is placed upon us to safeguard the public interest, it is impossible for us to do that, no matter how hard we try or how great our effort.

Mr. SPEAKER: There should be less conversation in the chamber. It is very disturbing to the hon. member who is addressing the house and I ask hon. members to refrain.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Apparently the election returns are on the minds of all hon. members rather than what I am trying to say. Capital expenditures in the way of assistance to industry as reported by the Minister of Munitions and Supply on February 5 amounted to $268,499,894. Details were given, and the information was made public through parliament. Among these expenditures was one of $18,450,128, comprising different items for the John Inglis works, where the Bren gun and other automatic guns are being manufactured. Great credit is taken by the Minister of Pensions and National Health for the work done at the John Inglis plant. Canada adopted the Bren gun, and with an expenditure of $18,450,128 of public funds, as of February 25, we should expect substantial results. It is one of the main armament plants of the country. Since February 25, I presume that additional millions may have been provided, and from an industry that is subsidized to that extent we are entitled to get results. It should not be looked upon as a political accomplishment. It is an accomplishment of the taxpayers of this country. They are the ones who provide the money, and we are gratified if good results have been secured from expenditures of this kind.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply made a further report on November 4, that appropriations for capital assistance to industry aggregated, on that date, $550,000,000, or more than double the expenditure reported the previous February 25. I asked for particulars of that expenditure, but up to the present time we have not obtaned them. We have the responsibility at least of knowing where this money has been spent. We have not that information up to the present time.

In the constituency of Cumberland which I represent we have a number of war industries and they have done excellent work. There is a general complaint in the maritime provinces that they have not had their share of the war expenditure, and I am sure that that complaint is warranted by an examination of the figures. In the town of Amherst we have a large industry, operated by Canadian Car and Foundry company, engaged in the production of aeroplanes. They were late in getting to work, but the results there compare favourably with those of any other like industry in Canada. I want to give credit to the Minister of Munitions and Supply and to Mr. Ralph Bell, director of aeroplane construction, for the splendid work accomplished in aircraft construction. A great deal of the credit in Amherst is due to the men and women employees. It is the expectation that this industry will be further expanded and that it will do still better work in the building of aeroplanes.

There is an air field at Amherst. The land was purchased by the town, and it shared with the government in the cost of the landing field, so that the aeroplanes might be tested. I think it is due the town and the workmen engaged in aircraft production in Amherst that this field be made a standard air field. It is not fair that the taxpayers or the industry should bear the cost, inasmuch as air fields are provided all over Canada out of government funds. I know of no other community that has been called upon to assume such responsibility.

There are other war industries in the town of Amherst which have done splendid work. I take pride in the production from the coal mines in the county of Cumberland. They have increased their production since the beginning of the war, and their output compares favourably with that of coal mines in any other community in Canada. Their production has increased notwithstanding that about ten per cent of the population have put on the uniform. I am also proud of the coal-miners of the county of Cumberland in that there have been no major labour disturbances and no slow-down strikes there. They have done their duty in providing this necessary war material required to operate our industries and our railways. I believe the labour unions in Cumberland county would separate from their parent organization rather than be a party to a slow-down strike.

There are other matters not so directly connected with the war but of great interest to Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces. There is the matter of old age pensions. It is hard for the aged people who are the recipients of the pension to understand why in Nova Scotia the average amount of the old age pension is only $14.90 a month, in New Brunswick, $14.71, and in Prince Edward Island, $11.26, while in Ontario it is $18.55, and in British Columbia, $19.12. British Columbia is not satisfied with this, the largest old age pension paid in Canada, for the provincial government out of its own revenues increases that monthly payment by $5 a month. I believe it is due to the old age pensioner in the maritime provinces, where the cost of living has increased, that there should be a substantial increase.

There are some misgivings in the maritime provinces with respect to the government's shipbuilding programme. There has been some activity in those provinces, but on a very small scale in comparison with other parts of Canada. It is hard for our people to understand why there should be a shipbuilding programme of $500,000,000 in British Columbia, while there is an expenditure of only a few million dollars in the maritime provinces.

The maritime board of trade has made representations with respect to matters affecting the maritime provinces. At their recent meeting in Moncton, a resolution was passed asking that the Prince Edward Island car ferry the S.S. Charlottetown that was lost, be replaced as quickly as possible. The people of Springhill, supported by the people of the maritime provinces, feel that the car ferry should be coal-burning rather than oil-burning. There was regret that the present boat was transformed from a coal-burner to an oil-burner.

They passed a resolution asking for a wider distribution of war orders. They asked that transportation facilities across the strait of Canso be improved in the interest of the coal and steel industry of Nova Scotia. I believe that railway carried the heaviest traffic of any railway of its class in this country.

There were other resolutions passed by the maritime boards of trade requiring the attention of the government and the departments at Ottawa. Many people in the maritime provinces want to know why sugar and a hundred and one other articles should be controlled, while there is no control on the importation and distribution of intoxicating liquors. These are representations made by church bodies and others, and they are entitled to consideration by the government.

There is also a feeling in the maritime provinces that they have not had full consideration in the setting up of war industries. There has been more bonusing of industry in this country than was ever dreamed of, amounting to $550,000,000 by November last. Industries that are necessary and vital to Canada's war effort were built up by the national policy in days long gone by. Many of our war industries should be encouraged that would have a peace-time value and importance; those industries should be located in the outlying parts of Canada, in order that there might be better distribution of industry. I do not believe that the government have taken full advantage of the opportunity to have war industry and peace time industry equitably distributed.

We all believe that we are going to win this war; but until each one is summoned to his or her station, the tendency is to let the other fellow do it. Morale is suffering, and there is lack of confidence. Many think this is a political war. I was sorry the other day to hear the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding), the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario (Mr. Fraser), the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), and even the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) make an attack on citizens of this country who believe that the greatest possible effort is not being put forward for the winning of the war. It is hard to understand why there should now be a plebiscite in order to make the government do their duty at this time. I am opposed to the plebiscite. I believe it is the duty of the government to act in this time of war.

I hope some day to see on parliament hill two more statues. I should like to see one to Winston Churchill, the man who has given leadership before the war and during the war, in whom the people of the democratic world have such confidence. I should also like to see a statue to one of our greatest, if not the greatest Canadian, Sir Charles Tupper. It is long overdue.

We are told there should be unity in this country, but there are many indications that such is not the case. I was very much disturbed recently by reading a statement of the Minister of Justice who is running in Quebec East:

> I know that the word "conscription" brings you back to 1917. Do not put us in a position where a Meighen movement will come in and will impose it (conscription) on us with bayonets and machine guns.

I do not know how we are going to have unity in this country when one minister will make a statement of that kind in one part of the country, while the government is calling for unity and the greatest possible effort in other parts of Canada. I know that the people of this country are back of this or any government in the greatest possible effort to bring this war to a successful termination, and statements such as that by one who is seeking a seat in this parliament do not make for unity.

There never was a government that had such support from the opposition as the present government has had. We support them in all measures that are necessary for carrying on the war. We do not want responsibility; we do not want office—I speak for myself and I think for my associates—but we do want to do our duty and help the government and those who have this responsibility. We want action, united action, and we want this country to put forth every effort in winning the war. We all have a duty, and, speaking for myself and for my associates, we are ready to discharge that responsibility. The times in which we live are very serious, too serious to play politics or take any action that would tend to weaken our war effort. It is my belief that Nova Scotia is prepared to discharge its full duty in carrying on the war, but what the people of my province want is leadership. They want the government to govern the country, and they do not believe a plebiscite is necessary at this time.

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, may I extend my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I commend them for the excellence and the comprehensive nature of their speeches.

I should like to bring before the house some matters that have already been discussed here and which I have no doubt will be referred to again. I have noticed some repetition in speeches that have already been made, so I am not alone in repeating things that have been said before. Let me add, however, that I am under no obligation to the four hundred or the two hundred, and that I have not submitted my remarks to be blue-pencilled by any member of the government or of the opposition. What I say is my own.

To me there are two main objectives before the country at the present time: first, the winning of the war, and second, the extension of the cause of democracy. I consider, as almost everyone else does, that the winning of the war is the chief of all our aims at this time, and I believe that the carrying of the plebiscite by a sweeping majority will contribute materially to our war effort. At the moment, however, I wish to address myself to the second object I have mentioned, namely, the advancement of the cause of democracy; because, in my opinion, although this may be an inopportune time to bring in measures for the advancement of democracy, nevertheless there may be no better time even after the war. Indeed, these may be the best years that we shall have in which to introduce such measures as I intend to discuss for a moment or two.

Let me refer to a question mentioned frequently before in this house, that of old age pensions. I submit that the amount paid is too small; a sum of twenty dollars a month is inadequate to meet the everyday, inescapable, ordinary expenses of the pensioner. Of course, he is allowed to earn or receive up to one dollar a day, but how can he earn it? It is physically impossible. A senator may earn it; a practising doctor or lawyer may earn it; perhaps you and I may earn it at the age of seventy. But as far as those who apply for the old age pension are concerned, they cannot. They are too old. The age limit is too high. The pensioner was already too old to earn five years before the time he actually applied for pension; that is to say, at the age of 65. Many pensioners were out of work before reaching that age and had a long stretch of hard years ahead of them before becoming eligible. I could tell you stories of pensioners, decent, worthy, upright citizens, who have had to struggle along; but I do not want to appeal to your emotions, but rather appeal to reason. Hon. members can see for themselves in their own constituencies people in receipt of small old age pensions who need some additional help.

Democracy should do two things: It should extend a helping hand to those who are not able to help themselves, and it should also put forth the hand of compulsion to prevent from becoming pensioners those who later on, thirty or forty years hence, might find themselves in such circumstances. This could be done by asking such persons now, during the years of their earning capacity, to contribute to a scheme for their use later on.

I have studied the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on November 14 on this topic—an excellent speech. He appeals to the logic of the situation. In fact, when he was in Edmonton last year and addressed an audience on the question of taxation, there were many favourable comments afterwards and some people said that his address on taxation made one almost enjoy the paying of taxes. The minister gave reasons for not increasing pensions. At page 4427 of Hansard he is reported to have said:

> It will be noted that in several provinces there is considerable leeway for increasing the average amount of pension paid if the province so desires.

That is a good argument. He goes on to speak of the cost-of-living index at the time the act was passed in 1927, which was higher then than it is now. That also is a good argument, though not infallible. The amount paid even then was too low. The things on which the pensioner has to spend money—food and clothing, rent and so on—are all somewhat higher than the average cost-of-living index at the present time, and therefore pensioners are in greater need of assistance now.

In my opinion the administration of this act might be a little more liberal. Sometimes I think the pensioner is not given the benefit of the doubt. Sometimes the conditions imposed, the certificates and forms, partake rather too much of the letter of the law rather than the spirit; so that although checks are necessary, I should like to see more leeway given when the pensioner's view clashes with that of the administrators.

The minister sets out the difference in cost of living between different provinces and indicates the many difficulties there are in the way of raising the old age pension—dual control, dual contribution, on the part of the province 25 per cent, and of the dominion 75 per cent, and the fact that the province administers the act. These difficulties are very real. He also sets forth the reason that there may be need for constitutional amendments in order to make any change in the pension law as it stands at the present time.

I am not alone in advocating changes in the pension law. We have had many speeches touching upon this question. Changes are being asked for not only by pensioners but by others as well; there are thousands who would be glad to see some scheme advanced. I suggest that there should be a short-term policy and a long-term policy in this regard. In the short-term policy I would at least grant a cost-of-living bonus to pensioners. In this connection I would quote a sentence from the minister's speech as reported at page 4429 of Hansard:

> If any of the provinces desire to do so—
> That is, to increase the pension.
> —the government is prepared to amend the regulations and, if necessary, the act, to ensure that such supplementary payments by a province do not entail a reduction in the pension payable under the act.

I am glad to see that British Columbia has taken note of this and increased its pension; and at the present time Alberta is considering the question.

Then there is the long-term policy. In that regard I should like to see some consideration given to the point the minister discusses, the question of a pension on a contributory basis. He says—and I think this is right—that the matter will never be settled satisfactorily until such a scheme is worked out. I would urge the setting up of a committee to look into the matter to find out if it can be linked up with the Unemployment Insurance Act, if that is possible, in order to provide for contributions to be made during the earning years so that there will be a sum of money which, by right, will be the pensioner's when he reaches the age at which a pension is necessary. There would be need for an amendment to the constitution. The minister said it would be necessary. All right. If so, the constitution was made for man, not man for the constitution, and I think by cooperation, based on good will, between the provinces, such amendment might be adopted.

To me, Mr. Speaker, social security does not depend solely upon the granting of pensions to supplement deficiencies in the earning power of the individual. It depends also upon the right of the individual to earn his own living and upon the conservation and development of the natural resources of the country. That is one direction in which the government could help. In that category I place the question of the bituminous tar sands of Alberta. We need oil at the present time. It may be that oil will help decide the war. In the Athabaska tar sands we have a tremendous reservoir of oil. The Canadian Mining and Metallurgy Bulletin of February, 1941, sets forth some of the estimates of the amount of oil in those deposits. The dominion expert, who has occupied that position since 1913, says 100 billion barrels of oil could be extracted from the tar sands of Fort McMurray. The United States expert places the figure at 250 billion barrels, while the potential production of the entire world, apart from this deposit, is given as only 35 billion barrels. Therefore at the lower estimate we have something like three times the potential production of the rest of the world. I realize that provincial control also enters into this question, but it seems to me that the federal government might do something toward the development of that resource. The oil is there and a process has been developed for the extraction. Perhaps I may be permitted to read a paragraph from a bulletin published by the bureau of mines of the Department of Mines and Resources in March, 1941:

> Between 1927 and 1930, a total of two thousand tons was shipped for laboratory investigations, and a further three thousand tons was used in the construction of demonstration pavements and road surfaces. During 1931 to 1938, International Bitumen Company processed small amounts of bituminous sand at its plant at Bitumont, Alberta, producing asphalt for paving and roofing and 37,500 gallons of fuel oil. . . .
> During 1940, Abasand Oils, Limited, continued the building of its separation plant and refinery on Horse river near McMurray and the development of a system of quarrying the bituminous sand. The separation plant is designed to treat 400 tons of sand, and the refinery to treat 600 barrels of charging stock per twenty-four hours.

Unfortunately that plant was destroyed, in part, by fire in November, 1941, but the reports state that gasoline, diesel fuel and other refined products have been commercially produced. There, then, is the oil; there is the possible need for military purposes; there is the process that has been developed, and I think we could make something of that at this time of crisis.

Again, there is the question of roads. Hon. members from British Columbia have stated that their great province might be isolated if bombs should be dropped at strategic points, such as bridges or tunnels. There are two railroads into British Columbia, and the Big Bend highway, which is not and cannot be kept open the year round. There is another route which might be developed, that through Yellowhead pass—the Tete Jaune—down along the North Thompson river from Jasper to Vancouver. Some parts of that road have already been constructed. The gravel highway between Blue River and Kamloops, for instance, would have to be made into an all-weather road. There are stretches from Jasper to Blue River that could be joined up by a new road; I believe they amount to about one hundred miles, in three different sections. This is one way in which we could improve our connections between the prairie provinces and British Columbia. Hon. members from that province have pointed out that in British Columbia there are numbers of unwanted Japanese who might provide labour for a project such as this. I should like to stress, however, that our own Canadians who are unemployed, who have not been absorbed into industry in the west, who are perhaps too old or physically unfit for the army but who might do work of this kind, should be given treatment at least equal to if not better than that given any alien in connection with any such scheme. There is need for another route into British Columbia; there is the labour and there is the equipment, for I believe that much of the machinery used in the construction of the air bases on the way to Alaska might be made available for this project. I commend this suggestion to the house. It may be that officials of the government are considering it already, because I have noticed that some of the things we discuss here already are under consideration by the government.

In connection with the question of roads I should like also to mention the suggestion that it might be of military significance to build a road from the United States boundary to Alaska. There are several possible routes. If such a road were built, it might be necessary to use it quickly. I am not unmindful, of course, that this road would pass through the city of Edmonton. That would be a great advantage to those who travel the road, who also would be brought within reach of Jasper park, one of the most beautiful playgrounds on this continent. Therefore the construction of such a road might have significance, not only now, in connection with military purposes, but in peace time for tourist traffic through the west.

Another matter I should like to mention is the health of the country, than which there is nothing more important both in peace and in war. I think the setting up of a committee on nutrition, in the Department of Pensions and National Health, was a good move, because it will help build up the health of the people. I believe even amid the clamour of war we might consider some health insurance scheme. I believe also we might build up national supplies of food, which would be available to a hungry Europe or Asia when the sea lanes are open once more. Even now, before it becomes necessary, we might also consider creating some reservoir of drugs and medicines, because, if the experience after this war is like that after the last one, there may be need of more drugs and medicines for civilian and military use than may be available. The conditions that prevail at present in Europe are the very conditions that make epidemics likely to occur.

Again, to my mind the man in the ranks in our services should be better paid. I recall that in the statement given by the Minister of Finance on November 14 last, figures were presented to show that the Canadian private is as well paid as any other soldier in the world; yet he receives less in many cases than the industrial worker whose contribution is so all-important now. Would it not be possible to give the privates in our armed forces savings certificates which would be theirs at the end of the war; theirs, because they had earned them by military service; theirs, for their own reestablishment when the war is over? That would ease the situation for many a man and woman if, like the industrial worker, the soldier earned savings certificates, to be repaid when similar loans are repaid in Canada.

I think it would also help toward stability, toward transition from war-time to peace-time economy. Those are just some of the measures about which I have been thinking which would tend to do that which was set out in the Atlantic charter by Roosevelt and Churchill. Give to every man "the right to live out his life, in freedom from want and fear."

These aims are important, but they can be dreams only, if the war is not won. We must be victorious, and to my mind the carrying of the plebiscite is a step forward in that direction. It would free the government from promises made or implied at a time when we felt that if Canada produced the tools for war, then she was making a very great contribution—as indeed she was. She has made a magnificent contribution in that regard.

If we look again at the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, we shall find what contribution Canada has made along the lines of munitions and supply. It gives me a great deal of pleasure in that connection to quote from the Magazine Digest of December, 1941, excerpts from a short article commenting on "King of Canada," and setting forth what the Prime Minister has done in the building of Canada, both in peace and in war. I find this:

> Historians, I believe, will have a very special page for King. They will recall how in 1922, by refusing to be stampeded by Lloyd George he caused the British government to think twice, and thus saved the world from a futile war against Turkey.

"Refusing to be stampeded." Then, there is this:

> Long before Kipling's "If" was written, King began associating with all kinds of men and still remained true to himself.

"True to himself," interpreted in the light of doing what he thought was best under the circumstances. And lest there might be some narrow interpretation of that expression "to himself," let me say that it follows those lines of Shakespeare:

> This above all; to thine own self be true,
> And it must follow, as the night the day
> Thou canst not then be false to any man.

There is also this sentence:

> Certain Canadian newspapers accuse him of lacking colour, of failing to inspire his country to an all-out war effort. Yet this colourless country gentleman—

My apologies to him.

> —working always through and with his cabinet, has inspired Canada to the greatest war effort, proportionate to population and wealth, of any English-speaking nation, excepting only Britain.

To come back to the plebiscite, I would say that its purpose is that of freeing from promises implied or definitely stated under a democratic system. It will do that by an appeal to the voice of the people. It was hoped that this might be done in calmness. It was hoped that it would be done while the nation was not yet as closely entangled in war as it might be later—if war comes to our own doorstep. It was hoped that it would be done before emotion ran riot, before alarms which are now in the near distance, were right on our own doorstep.

Canada could dramatically—I repeat the word "dramatically"—put itself on record as being behind whatever sacrifice or duty may be imposed upon us by this war. With his own hand and making his own cross, the individual may stand behind the country's war effort. To me it is not a desertion of our lads overseas; to me it is stating that we are right there behind them, and that no matter what comes and no matter what duty or sacrifice is required, we individually, by the crosses we make with our own hands, place ourselves back of them. To many a person it will be an individual pledge to some soldier, sailor or airman. Let me point out that there are just as many on this side of the house as on the other side who have sons, brothers or other relatives overseas. There are just as many proportionately on this side as on that who served in the last great war. There are just as many who are intimately and personally concerned with the outcome as it will affect the whole country—our Canada.

The critics may say that the taking of the plebiscite will delay the war effort. Yet the raising of troops, the training of men, the building of ships and the making of munitions are going forward right now, just as has been the case in the past. Those troops trained for home service may serve overseas, if it becomes necessary through the passage of events in the next few months. They may be volunteer forces or they may not. Many of our volunteers who are over there now were not coerced, as has been suggested. They have gone of their own free will to fight for the cause, because they know what they are fighting for. They have gone to keep from our shores the war they do not want to fight on these shores.

And let me remind those who may be anti-conscriptionists, if that question arises, that the Germans have fought on foreign soil in many wars over a hundred years. They have fought and lost or won their wars on foreign soil. To those who may be anti-conscriptionist, I ask this question: If other nations took that view, namely the view that their men were valuable only on their own shores, where would Great Britain's navy be right now? It would be in its own home waters, and not over here helping to protect our shores. We must keep these things in mind, if we wish to keep the balance true, and particularly if the anti-conscriptionist issue arises.

But the carrying of the plebiscite does not mean necessarily that the question of conscription will follow, and I do not think it should. The purpose of the plebiscite is that of freeing the government's hands to do whatever is necessary for the winning of the war. But the question of conscription should and must be settled by those to whom conditions are known and who have access to all possible information. In my opinion we should proceed only on that basis, so far as conscription is concerned.

We may fail in our war effort. The League of Nations failed to keep peace, and in my view, the greatest reason for that failure was lack of cooperation among the nations. Hitler's armies have swept through Europe. In my opinion the chief reason was the lack of cooperation among nations. Why should Canada's war effort lag? To my mind it would lag only through a lack of cooperation among the people of Canada—yes, a lack of cooperation.

Czechoslovakia fell not only because of Munich. It broke because three and a half million people living in Sudetenland ceased to cooperate, and because the nationalist cry was raised in their midst. Czechoslovakia broke because Slovakia, another province, ceased to cooperate. Is there a parallel in Canada? I hate to suggest it, and I apologize to loyal Canadians of whatever extraction they may be because the comparison is not an exact one. Yet one of the reasons for Czechoslovakia's downfall was a lack of cooperation within its own borders and the raising of a nationalist cry which laid it open to the treachery of the enemy without.

Let us be a united nation; let us go forward together to the winning of the war. Our greatest contribution may not be made by the men and women in the armed forces, in the fields, in the mines, in the forests, in our industries or on the farms; it may not be won chiefly by our foodstuffs, our munitions, our ships, our war effort; it will be won by the morale of our people, and to that morale every man, woman and child in Canada contributes. That contribution may be a plus quantity or a minus quantity, but every individual contributes to the sum total in Canada of the will for victory.

Perhaps ninety per cent of us will do nothing spectacular to win the war; we shall go about doing our same old jobs, perhaps more thoroughly and cheerfully; perhaps we shall take on some volunteer work that we ourselves find; perhaps we shall take part in the salvage campaign or help with the Red Cross; we practise some economy, we do not buy some extra we had planned to buy; we pay our taxes, subscribe to war loans and buy war savings stamps and certificates. All this may not be spectacular, but it is a real part in our war effort. It is forever true that the backbone of a country is the people who "obey the law, do the dull tasks to make the nation strong."

Let us remember that Mr. Churchill has told us to keep our eye on the ball. Our goal is to win the war and thus advance the cause of democracy. We must reach out toward that goal which Churchill has called "the march of the common man toward his true and just inheritance."

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) have received many compliments and congratulations upon the speeches which they delivered to this house in response to the speech from the throne. To those compliments and congratulations I think they are justly entitled. When we heard who was going to lead this debate we expected that they would set a high standard for the rest of us to follow. I should like also to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon speeches which I believe set an all-time high for quality. But they are not the only ones. The leaders of the other two groups should be congratulated. It was rather interesting to listen to those speeches, to read them again, and to note that, after all, there was not much difference in the thing that is essential to us at the present time, that is, the winning of the war.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) suggests that there should be conscription of wealth. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) claims that there is conscription of wealth and that we shall probably realize this more after he announces his budget within a few weeks. Hon. members on the other side think it is not only conscription, but to some extent confiscation of wealth. Whatever it may be, the ordinary taxpayer is not accustomed to thinking of it as we do in this house. He knows that he is having difficulty in paying what taxes are levied against him. But he is doing it without complaint, which is a good indication that the people of Canada are in earnest and are willing to support this war to the utmost. Before I go any further I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman), who has just resumed her seat, upon what I consider to be a most excellent speech. I understand that this is her first speech in the House of Commons, and I recall that in my first speech I advocated a somewhat similar policy, that we should have an all-out inclusive, contributory superannuation fund in Canada so that our old people might be relieved of fear and have something set by for themselves in their old age.

[Mrs. Casselman.]

I should like to refer briefly to the election of 1940. At that time I asked the people of Victoria to give me their support that I might represent them in this parliament supporting the present government. In doing that, I said repeatedly, and my statement was sincere, that the present Prime Minister and the other members of his government were as capable, sincere and trustworthy as any group of men in Canada who were then available to lead the government in a vigorous war effort. If an election were to be held to-day, I could say the same thing with equal sincerity. In fact I believe I could more easily prove my statement, because since that time we have had some additions to the cabinet which I think has strengthened it greatly.

In this regard I have in mind the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) who left the province of Nova Scotia to lend a hand to Canada at this time. We heard nothing but compliments of the naval service and the fine contribution that has been made by it. I cannot help but think of how experience has brought out the worth of some of the other members, such as the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), previously Minister of Finance. I think of the present Minister of Finance and of what he has done. The people of Canada are pleased with his success, and I am sure that his speech in the house on February 4 has greatly encouraged the people of Canada and has added to his own growing prestige.

I am saying this for two purposes. One purpose is to emphasize my personal belief in these men; the other is to increase, if I possibly can, their prestige and the confidence which the people of this country have in their leaders. Confidence in our leaders is one of the things that we absolutely need, and anyone who tries to dissipate that is doing an injustice to Canada. Not only have these men created confidence in themselves, they have produced results. I am sure that as Canadians we are all proud of what Canada has contributed to this war—contributed in the way of naval development, contributed to the army and contributed to the air force. I should not have forgotten the hon. Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), because the completion of the air-training scheme for which he is responsible will go down in Canada's history and remain for all time a bright jewel in Canada's crown of dignity. To anyone who is lacking in appreciation of Canada's war effort I would recommend a journey from one end of the country to the other and a visit to our naval docks and naval yards, our shipbuilding plants and our munition industries, and I am sure they would come home delighted with what they saw and encouraged and proud to be Canadians.

This is not the time to eulogize too much our own government or pat them on the back. It is rather a time when we should take perhaps the opposite point of view and do a little criticizing. It is not good enough for us to review what we have done and say: "We have done well and therefore let us be content." Rather is it a time for us to say: "No, have we done our best, have we put everything we have into this struggle, everything in the way of man-power, machinery and resources? Have we extracted the last ounce and given the last penny to help win this war?" Nothing but our utmost should satisfy us at this time, and therefore, Mr. Speaker, I thank God for the critics, provided that their criticism is honest and based on facts, or even on their own opinions, even if that opinion may not be so good. I do not care for criticism that is based on prejudice or on politics. I hope that although some of what I have to say will be critical of what has happened, it will be taken in the spirit in which it is given, and I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have not been trying to build up a straw-man for the purpose of knocking him down again.

I should like to say a word or two in connection with the Japanese situation in British Columbia. Here, again, my first words will be words of commendation of the government. Within a few hours of the Japanese treachery at Pearl Harbour, which has so disjointed our outlook at the present time, this government gave instructions to that portion of the Canadian navy on the Pacific coast to round up and bring into the Fraser river all Japanese boats and their personnel. That operation was conducted in true Canadian navy style. I believe that no offence was given to any of those brought in, but they were brought in. They went past my own door in long lines as they were convoyed from different parts of the island and along the coastline, and it was not an easy task. The Canadian navy had to go into every inlet, every village, every settlement, along a shoreline of over 2,000 miles. It is over one thousand miles around the island on which I live. Yet that task was accomplished, and accomplished without any indignities to the Japanese who were brought in.

But here my compliments, so far as the Japanese situation is concerned, must, I am sorry to say, end. We still leave them free to move around in British Columbia just about where they will. I think our own defence should be the first consideration. The men who were gathered in were afterwards allowed to go back to the islands, and along the shoreline, and do whatever they wished to do, and so far as I know, many of them are still in those places. I wonder whether the government or anyone else can give us any assurance that these Japanese have not already cached munitions and arms of various kinds in different places along that long coastline. If that has not been done, it is just our good fortune, because there was nothing done to hinder them. There were some thousands of fishing boats which were capable of going three or four or five hundred miles out to sea, there was nothing to prevent a Japanese merchant boat from delivering to them arms to be cached along our coastline; and to-day, for all we know, at this very minute, they may be directing their friends to these caches for arms to be used against us.

I listened to what the Prime Minister had to say in the house this afternoon. I am sorry I could not grasp all of it, although I tried hard to follow him. One thing I understood him to say was that the Japanese nationals would be taken care of. I suppose he means that those Japanese who have been naturalized within the last three or four or five years, or ten years if you will, are no longer considered Japanese because they have signed a paper. Well, we have the Pearl Harbour incident to show that the signing of a naturalization paper does not mean a great deal to them. I also understood from the Prime Minister that the government was going to intern only those Japanese who are between the ages of eighteen and forty-five. While I am over forty-five myself, I think I could create quite a lot of trouble yet, and when I was under eighteen I think I could get into quite a lot of devilment too. Therefore I would not care to trust them, and I do not think we have any right to do so. I know that in my city there are a good many people who have lived anywhere from fifteen to fifty years in Japan. They have educated their children in England or in Canada, and although they have lived in Japan all those years, they still count themselves Canadians or British. Can we expect more of a Japanese than we do of our own people? Blood is thicker than water. These people must be taken care of; we ask that it be done with the least inconvenience and that they be provided with proper shelter and proper care. We do not wish one of them molested, or treated in any way that we would not want our own people to be treated, but we want them taken care of. I would not want to be the one responsible for sorting out the loyal Japanese from the disloyal. Perhaps some of our professors have a special kind of X-ray with which they could distinguish the good from the bad, but it is not in the possession of the common man.

Now a word or two on the plebiscite. I think it was a bad promise. But the promise was given by all parties in this house. The Prime Minister, when he gave that promise, gave it in the hearing of us all, and by our silence we gave our consent and shared in the promise, I think, however, most of us, particularly we old men, should have known better than to give such a promise. No one can tell what is going to happen in war time, and certainly that is true as far as this war is concerned. Nevertheless that promise was made. Much as I dislike the thought of a plebiscite, partly because of the expense and partly because of the delay—the hon. member for Edmonton East said our work is continuing, but if it has not caused any loss of time outside this house it has at least delayed us here, because most of this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne has been centred round that one point—yet I think it is the least of several evils, and perhaps we can turn what is at present a liability into an asset to this country if as good Canadians we get out and try to put this over eighty or ninety per cent at least. But our good friends from Quebec might surprise some of the people who are doing a great deal of talking about conscription.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of a total war effort, and I believe it is the common desire of all the people of Canada that this total war effort shall be continued until we have won the last battle and also win the peace. I think the resolution of the Canadian Legion calling for total war is not calling for conscription in the narrow sense; it is calling for a reallocation of the man-power of Canada, a reallocation of the activities of industry in Canada. It is calling for the efforts of our women as well as our men and for the maximum effort of finance as well as man-power. The Canadian Legion recognize, as you and I do, that an idle dollar is very little use, any more than an idle man. Therefore they ask for an all-out effort of man-power, woman-power, power of our industries, power of our farms, our mines and our timber, a total war effort. It seems to me rather strange that we have an oil controller, a food controller, a canned fruit controller, and I understand that the other day a controller of men's working gloves was appointed, but we have not anyone yet definitely set apart to reallocate and control man-power and the industrial power of Canada. I would recommend that some such step be taken.

When I think of total war I think back to the farm a few miles up the line here where I was born; I think of the effort it took to convert that land from stubborn bush into a fertile farm. Then I multiply that effort by the hundreds of thousands of farms throughout Canada, particularly eastern Canada. I think also of the institutions that have grown up in Canada, of our churches, schools, universities, the great railroads that span this continent from sea to sea; that represents the work of our fathers and grandfathers and is the corner-stone of Canada. It is upon that corner-stone that we had expected to raise in peace and industry a nation that would be the pride of the world. But we have been thwarted in that endeavour. Perhaps we men from the west are a little impatient. We have not got our roots down in the soil of Canada to the same extent as men in eastern Canada; we have not been accustomed to living year after year and generation after generation in one house.

We have not had to carry in ox-carts and wagons the stones to build our churches, schools and homes. Almost in a few years we found the place grown up, and I am wondering whether we are probably not a little too anxious to rush the older and more settled places in some of the things we would have them do. But if the people in eastern Canada have their roots more solidly embedded in the country; if there is a sentimental tie that is binding them to Canada, greater than in the case of the people in the west, is it not equally clear that they would rather fight the enemy on somebody else's soil than see that enemy desecrate all that their grandfathers and fathers had worked for in Canada? I think they would rather be in the position of burning their enemy's homes than having the enemy burn theirs, and I am satisfied that, when the time comes, the province of Quebec, as it has done on every occasion, will come forward and do the right thing in the interests of Canada. They will do it again. I plead for consideration. Let us not be too hasty in what we are thinking about.

May I make a statement or two about our war defences on the Pacific coast. I should not like to leave for a moment the impression in this house or in the country that I am in any way opposed to the policy which the government has adopted since the beginning of the war, of reorganizing the defence of Great Britain, our first and most urgent defence need. Nor has that position changed greatly, although at the present time we are a victim of the pincer movement on a world scale that has never been known or thought of before.

Hitler, the leader of the three, set the style by conquering countries one by one and fooling the others as he went along. He started in Norway and went straight through to the Black sea, as Churchill said in 1938 that he would. We have a similar position to-day on the Pacific coast. We have the Japanese, the counterpart of Hitler; starting in Malaya, working their way to Singapore, into the Philippines, into the Indies and to Australia and New Zealand; and how do we know that Canada is not the next? Of what use are we to ourselves or to anybody else if we allow the Japanese to go on indefinitely conquering and getting control of the Pacific? We have a little time to spare. I urge the minister and the government to make use of that time to the utmost of their ability and to see that the west coast of British Columbia is supplied with everything with which it is possible to supply it—with guns and tanks, and not with a company of men, but with divisions of men.

The minister said he would have them ready to move. I should like to see them move at least west of the Great Divide where we know we can get them when we want them. I am not implying that we have no defences on the coast. I know well enough that we have, and I know that the defences on the coast have been greatly increased in the last two months. But when the city of London is not immune from bombs and destruction, with all the defences it has, or when we may go to Berlin and bomb that city at will, surely we cannot say that we have sufficient safeguards to take care of our vital spots.

I do not think for a moment that the Japanese are particularly interested in the bombing or destruction of our cities in British Columbia; that would not be worth their while. It is too risky, and it would cost them too much in effort to drop bombs simply for the purpose of destroying a house. The Japanese know that dropping bombs in civilian places will not hurt the morale of the Canadian people, for that has been too well tested in Great Britain, and there would be no greater effect on us in British Columbia. But there are some vital spots. For instance, he would not mind dropping a bomb and destroying the only remaining dry dock of Great Britain on the Pacific coast, the one at Esquimalt. He would be glad to destroy the only means of communication we have between Australia and New Zealand. He would be only too pleased, as the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling) said the other day, to bomb the largest munitions factory in Canada. He would not hesitate to dislocate the rest of Canada from British Columbia if the opportunity came his way—and he will try to make that opportunity. I therefore ask that we be given not only consideration, but men and materials.

I was pleased to notice in the paper the other day that the minister intends making greater use of the reserve forces. I think this move is well taken, but it is a little late. The reserve forces to-day are composed of men who are not in the military category, or if they are in the military category, they are looking after industry or business of some kind and it is more essential to Canada that their services should be given in that direction. But they are willing to spend their nights and holidays in training and equipping themselves for the protection of the people on the coast. I think they should be given a warm welcome and every encouragement and given equipment. They should be given instructions how to train and should be told what is expected of them.

When the Hun was at the very gates of Leningrad, Stalin called on the people of that city to come out en masse and defend the place. We people on the Pacific coast are willing to come out en masse to defend our places, but what good would we be? We would only be in the way of the regular soldiers. I ask the minister, therefore, to give this matter his earnest and, I am sure, immediate consideration.

I have spoken longer than I intended but I wish to finish by a recapitulation or short summary of the points I have tried to bring out in my address. The first thing that is required in Canada is the preservation of unity. This cannot be left to the government alone. They can help, but unity can be maintained in this country only by individual effort, by our trying to understand and to appreciate the other fellow's position, no matter which coast he is on, no matter what his religion or his race may be. One of the things that would help bring about unity in Canada, particularly during the war, would be a complete moratorium on party politics.

I ask for a reallocation of man-power in this country, putting to work those who are idle, training the inefficient so that they may be of value. Just here I should like to mention one point. We have in Canada a group of unwanted men. They are not the Japanese; they are the men fifty years of age and up. There are thousands of them, if not in the east, certainly in the west, who are conscientiously searching for some way to help in this war effort. But they are not being encouraged. To-day there is a definite competition for men between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, competition not limited to the three services but also between industry and the services. These are the men most useful to us, but in my opinion that competition should cease right away, and we should try to make use of all the man and woman power of Canada.

Then I would ask that the factories be treated on the same basis as the men; that they be asked to do what is needed. They do not need to be told. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman opposite who said a short time ago that industry must be driven to do what we want it to do. There is not an industry that I know of that is not only too anxious to turn over its plant and do what the government wishes it to do.

Then I suggest that the government stop talking about our natural resources, and make use of them. For years I have been telling this government that in British Columbia we have mountains of iron ore that is not being used even yet; and it is still there. Quite recently one industry was set up in the east because it was said there was no power to run it in British Columbia. This plant, I believe, is designed to produce a hundred tons of magnesium a day. Just imagine; no power in British Columbia! Why, if there is anything of which we have plenty, it is power, but no one seems ready to get to work and develop it.

Then I would stop asking our people to do things. We asked them to save gasoline, and it was a flop. We are asking them to save sugar, and that is in a fair way to be another flop. If you want anything done you must tell the people what you want. Over the week-end I went to Winnipeg. Sitting opposite me in the dining car was a gentleman who I thought would know better; but when the sugar bowl was passed and the waiter asked how many lumps he wished he said, "Five." As a member of parliament I almost felt that he was trying to insult me by that action. I went into the observation car, where I overheard two ladies telling each other how they could get all the sugar they wanted because they divided their business between two grocers and could get their five pounds a week from each. As long as we have people like that, it is a great discouragement to those who are glad to help voluntarily.

In conclusion, I suggest that the government tell the people of their plans. Do not be afraid to give us the bad news as well as the good news, when it comes. We have courage; we have intelligence; we are loyal, and we will help you to a man. After the war is over, we may tell you what we think of you, but in this crisis we will all give all we have.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, two months ago, the dominion parliament was bereaved by death of one of its greatest debaters, the Liberal party, of the man who embodied the "sound judgment" of the cabinet; the French-Canadian race, of the most noble and worthy leader it has probably ever had, and the country, of one of her greatest statesmen. Accordingly, the whole nation, without any consideration of race, creed or party, paid reverent homage to that statesman and patriot, bitterly mourning his demise.

Never in the history of Canada was such a unanimous tribute paid to a public man called by death while in the service of his country. All the provinces, even the most remote, were represented at the funeral of the great departed. The leaders of all parties paid tribute to his memory. All the newspapers in the country dealt at length with his qualities as a statesman and even as a private citizen. From many European countries came messages of condolence to the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). The pope himself sent his representative to his bedside to bestow his blessing upon him. Cardinal Villeneuve, leader of the Catholic church in Canada, conducted his funeral service and delivered an oration which he entitled "A christian has departed."

Why was there such unanimity before those mortal remains? Why? The reason is that Lapointe was "an honest man." Lapointe never betrayed his race. Lapointe never broke his word. Lapointe never altered his principles.

During forty years spent in political life, Lapointe ever held to the principle of voluntary enlistment, a principle which he learned from Laurier, founder of the real Canadian Liberal doctrine. Lapointe denounced for twenty-five years the conscription enforced in 1917. In 1939, Lapointe asked the province of Quebec, at the time of the provincial elections, for a token of confidence in his war policy. Again in 1940 Lapointe stood for the same principle at the time of the federal election, namely, voluntary enlistment. Were he alive to-day, Lapointe would still be in favour of voluntary enlistment. And I am satisfied that there would be no reference to a plebiscite in the speech from the throne, because Lapointe would have convinced the government of the danger to national unity which such a measure entailed. His sound judgment would have led him to foresee what is happening to-day throughout the country.

Never before in the history of this country have the importance, the great worth and the authority of a political leader been so promptly appreciated after his death. Can it be that scarcely two months after he has gone there should be no one in Ottawa to retain any respect for the principles or the memory of Lapointe? It seems I can still hear his powerful voice stating:

I will resign from the cabinet and denounce those who would impose conscription for overseas upon my fellow-citizens.

They who advocate conscription for overseas are opposed to national unity.

The sons of Canada will never be compelled to serve outside the borders of Canada, so long as I am a member of the government.

We have there some of the statements made by Mr. Lapointe when he set forth the principle of the "voluntary system". That is what the Liberal leaders in Ottawa, and particularly all members in this house, specially those from Quebec, must not forget. Those are the principles on which Lapointe had sixty-four Quebec members elected to the federal house. Those principles were not advocated through hypocrisy and for electoral purposes only. On the contrary, what Lapointe sought above all was "national unity", the welfare of the country.

Lapointe was and has always been sincere, and we who followed him also were, still are and will remain so.

It is on the principle of the "voluntary system" that the present government in Ottawa secured its own election as well as that of Mr. Godbout in Quebec. The present leader of the Quebec government stated in 1939 that he would stand against his own party if it ever tried to impose conscription for overseas service.

Those are Mr. Lapointe's Liberal principles for which we fought and for which we are still resolved to fight.

Mr. Speaker, I have in the past made tremendous sacrifices for the preservation of principles which I had advocated. To-day I object most emphatically and most decidedly to the statement contained in the speech from the throne and in which we are asked to set aside the promise, the convictions and the sacred principles of Lapointe.

Mr. Speaker, the walls of this house still echo with this great patriot's protests against that infamous measure, conscription, which split the country in 1917.

I shall never forget Mr. Lapointe's protests against that measure and, for that reason, I shall vote against conscription. I shall even cast my vote against the plebiscite which imperialists have thrust upon the cabinet, because it constitutes the first step towards conscription.

I shall respect the memory of Lapointe. Lapointe died on duty. Lapointe died after struggling, particularly for two and a half years, against the financial organization which seeks to impose conscription for service overseas. The whole of Canada, for which Lapointe laid down his life, asks us to revere his memory. Those who die for their country deserve that on their graves people come and pray, and revere their memory.

In his speech of January 26, 1942, Prime Minister the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King informed the house that the question to be submitted to the people when the plebiscite is held, will be as follows:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

By this, the government means: "Will you release us from the pledge we took on March 26, 1940, at the time of the last general election, to refrain from forcibly sending on military service outside the country men who are now or who may later be conscripted for service within Canada?"

Farther on, in this same speech of January 26, 1942, the right hon. the Prime Minister said, and these are his own words:

In the presentation of the plebiscite to the electorate the desire of the administration to possess complete freedom of action will, of course, receive the vigorous and whole-hearted support of all members of the government and of the Canadian people.

I understand the government would have us answer yes; they expressed a strong desire to that effect and they will marshal all their propaganda services to get the people to release them of their promises about conscription for service overseas, promises made to the people just two years ago during a general election and when the war was already started.

Since the government ask the people to release them of their obligations, it is obvious that they intend to use the permission so given and that we shall soon have conscription for service overseas. Moreover, there can be no misunderstanding about it, because in the speech from the throne, the government, through His Excellency the Governor General, have this to say:

The government is of the opinion that, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should in this connection and irrespective of any previous commitments, possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise.

My ministers accordingly will seek, from the people, by means of a plebiscite, release from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

The speech from the throne does not contain the words "conscription for service overseas", but that is what they have in mind. The government do not say directly that the present administration will adopt such a measure, but the clever wording of the document should deceive no one. This plebiscite is in reality on conscription for service overseas, a measure which the government now believe necessary; otherwise, they would not seek to be released of their promises against conscription.

Besides, here is what says on the subject, in its editorial page, the organ of the Liberal Party in western Canada, the Winnipeg Free Press on the 27th of January, 1942:

> But, though Mr. King thus limited himself yesterday, the limitation is formal and the commitment to conscription must be regarded as complete. We predict with assurance that the plebiscite will be followed by the introduction of a bill which will incorporate conscription for military service overseas. The bill will be supported by the government and it will pass. This prophecy is made because any other interpretation of Mr. King's speech is meaningless and because neither his government nor any other that could be formed in Canada could survive if this were not done.

I agree entirely with Hon. Adélard Godbout, premier of the province of Quebec, when he said at the annual convention of the Liberal Association of St. Denis-Dorion, on the 26th of January last, as reproduced in Le Canada of Tuesday, January 27, 1942:

> I believe that conscription for service overseas would be a crime at the present time. I know that the situation of Australia will guide the wisdom of the man who governs us and might put some sense in the heads of those who have none.

I do not doubt the sincerity of the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King and he wishes no doubt to gain time, in order to put off as much as possible the date, fatal for national unity, when it will become necessary to have conscription for service overseas, but I know too that the shameless blackmail of the group headed by the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen—whose political life has come to an end with the election returns of Ontario—will not stop, and that under the pressure of those members of the cabinet who care the least for Canada, he will have to give in, at the greatest expense of what he and Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe had tried so hard to create, national unity.

For, if we were to release the government from its commitments of the last general election, who knows what might happen in three or four months!

At the present time I consider that it would be a momentous error to send men to foreign lands now that we must actively prepare for the defence of our own country. It is rumoured, just now, that we are considering sending men to England or to Alaska, a United States possession. Gentlemen, please let us not forget that the United States have a population of 130 million and Britain 50 million people, while we have but 11 million inhabitants from which to raise an army to defend a territory as large as the whole of Europe. Let us not make the same mistake as Australia which, after supplying men for Libya, Greece, Singapore and many other theatres of war, has not nearly enough left for the defence of its own shores which may be incessantly subjected to attack by Japan. Australia is now sending an S.O.S. to Britain and Canada, and the United Kingdom, in spite of its 50 million population is turning again to us for supplying the necessary forces.

It is time for us to forsake imperialistic ideals; let us collect our wits and, amidst this general panic, think first of our own country which is presently being submerged under sentiments that are anything but Canadian.

Moreover, let me submit to the attention of the house the utterances of the right hon. the Prime Minister, on January 26, 1942, and the argument he had, over the plebiscite, with the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), who, as everyone knows, is among the most enthusiastic imperialists in the whole house. I quote:

> It will be seen that in seeking freedom for itself to act on all matters pertaining to war in accordance with its judgment, the government is taking a course which will remove all legitimate excuse for controversy, and the course best calculated to maintain the unity of the country in this time of war.
> Mr. Homuth: Then what will they do?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: That will depend in part upon what my hon. friend and those who are round him will do.
> Mr. Homuth: Do not worry about us.

So, the Prime Minister makes his future decisions dependent upon those of the Tory party, since we all know that the hon. member for Waterloo South is one of the most prominent members of that party.

I cannot see why our policy should be dictated by a party which has passed into oblivion—as shown by the results of to-day's elections—and which is now no more than a historical relic. The Conservative party does not represent public opinion and the few people who still cling to it feel ashamed to say so. On that subject, may I be permitted to quote an editorial from Le Soleil, a Liberal newspaper from Quebec, dated January 23, 1942, and which reads as follows:

> An illusion to be dropped and a danger to be avoided.

So the Canadian government had not foreseen everything when they made their promises to the people, before the war and since then, and when some ministers were saying that conscription for overseas service was not advisable. Now the Prime Minister asks the electors to be released from a rash promise so as to replace the Liberal formula of the war effort by the formula of total war which he borrows from the Tories, and he does not tell us how he is going to apply it.

Mr. Mackenzie King admits that the war policy which he has followed so far is no longer sufficient in the present critical turn of the world conflict, and he would like his government to be released from all past commitments which could interfere with his future actions. The date of the plebiscite is not yet announced but its object is very apparent in the speech from the throne.

Consequently, with a view to warding off the criticism and intrigues of the Tory party, the government are placing the electorate in a position to assume direct responsibility for shaping the future government policy.

And it goes on:

Le Soleil, a Liberal paper from Quebec, does not wish to conceal its surprise at the stand taken by the King government. But when it is about to lose a cherished illusion, it will refrain from aggravating, through useless agitation, an already tense situation. The only comment it wishes to make to-day is that such a policy does not seem consistent with parliamentary tradition. Under the circumstances would Sir Wilfrid Laurier have taken the course followed by Mr. King?

In enforcing conscription for service outside this country an endeavour will be made to invoke the stand taken by the Americans. Their participation in the war will of course be decisive, but in order to do what we have accomplished as regards military participation, they will have to raise an army of seven million and a half men and send one million and a half men overseas.

Besides, through the Mobilization Act and voluntary enlistments we have been able to raise 500,000 men in Canada. Having regard to population, England should have an army of two million and a half men, had young Englishmen enlisted in the same proportion as young Canadians. I for one feel that the danger which now threatens our own soil forbids us to weaken our own defence unduly; it even makes it imperative for us to strengthen it. Now, the best way of achieving this, in view of our small population and the extent of the territory to be protected, is to keep our soldiers right here for the defence of the country.

Are not our leaders in duty bound to ensure the protection of our coasts, in order to forestall any threatened landing, and are not those coasts extensive enough to require as many men as we can mobilize without jeopardizing the gigantic building and training programme already under way?

We shall be attacked because we have declared war and I am convinced that parliament would not have declared war if the King-Lapointe compromise had not been accepted by the people of this country and if the people had known then that the intention was to enforce conscription for service outside Canada.

Having voted against the declaration of war, I am in a position to speak of this quite freely. I knew then what would logically follow as a consequence of the policy adopted by the House of Commons. There were those, at the time, who said I was a visionary, but I now find justification for my stand in the following words spoken on January 26, 1942, by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada. I quote:

> Every hon. member of this house knows that, except for the assurance that, in the event of a European war, there would be no conscription for service overseas, this parliament would never have decided, in the immediate and unanimous manner in which it did, to stand at the side of Britain in the resistance of aggression, and the defence of freedom.
> Hon. members are also aware that if, at the time when Canada's participation in the war was challenged in an election in the province of Quebec by a government professing a different political faith, a like assurance with respect to service overseas had not been given, in the name of the present government by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), and other Liberal leaders and members of this House of Commons from the province of Quebec, the verdict of the people of that province might have been wholly different.

Once again I would warn my fellow-citizens of the consequences of a plebiscite through which the government asks to be released of its undertaking to oppose conscription for overseas service. I am convinced that we shall have conscription for service outside Canada. If this does not come about under the present Prime Minister, it will be under another, but the people in my constituency and in my province are strongly opposed to any conscription for overseas service, not through any fear of going abroad, but simply from love of country and a determination to ensure its intelligent defence.

Besides, there could be no ambiguity about that, because, answering a question asked in the House of Commons by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), on January 27, 1942, the Prime Minister stated the following, which will be found in Hansard, at page 60:

> When my hon. friend goes on to ask me what I am going to do with respect to any expression of view which may be made by the people in connection with any reference which will be made to them, may I say to him that in seeking to get relief from past commitments I am not going to begin by making new and fresh commitments. In seeking freedom on the part of the ministry I am not going to start in by seeking to tie my own hands.

That is the answer to that part of the question.

My hon. friend asked a further question, whether there was any understanding between myself and Mr. Godbout, express or implied, as to the position which I would take as a result of any plebiscite that would be presented to the people. May I say to him that there is no understanding, express or implied, with Mr. Godbout or with any other person on earth, with respect to the attitude that I propose to take after the people have expressed their views with regard to giving the government a free hand.

May I add that such attitude as I shall take at the time will be taken in the light of all the circumstances as I may know them as a member of the government, and of all conditions as I know them in regard to this country and, as far as I am able to know something about them, conditions in other countries as well.

Consequently, there can be no doubt that if the plebiscite carries, the government will be absolutely free to enact conscription.

In view of my past attitude on this question and of my promises to my constituents, I consider it my duty to vote against the speech from the throne.

Moreover, I am in duty bound, contrary to the Prime Minister's wishes, to urge upon my constituents not to release the government from their commitments.

I sincerely and earnestly hope that the people will refuse to release the government from their pledges, and I am sure my views in this regard will be shared by my constituents and by the whole province of Quebec. If others turn a deaf ear to that fire-brand who seems to be putting conscription even above victory, there is every likelihood that the government's request will be turned down. Such refusal will settle the issue once and for all and, at the same time, will teach a lesson to those imperialists bent on blackmailing the government on that question and who are forcing them to ruin us by donations—a billion at a time—out of all proportion to our means.

Mr. King, being of sound judgment, could try to balance our participation on a rational basis, and none of his possible immediate successors would give us better satisfaction on this point.

If, God forbid, the plebiscite is carried, as the government hopes, and an act establishing conscription for service overseas is passed by a liberal or a union government, I want to tell him right now that the province of Quebec will never accept such a solution, and that it will take advantage of the first opportunity offered at the polls to express its contempt.

There is another matter that I believe my duty to bring before the house; I refer to representatives of big corporations who serve the country as dollar-a-year men. Occupying key positions, or at least posts of observation, it is for them possible to advise their companies as to future contracts and government's projects. As a result, war industry is a profitable proposition.

Besides, proof of it lies in the comparative balance-sheets, for the first nine months of 1941, of the large companies that control industrial production at the present time.

I want to protest emphatically against that policy which gives all contracts to the large industries, at the expense of the small industries. That is particularly true of us, from the district of Quebec, who do not have large industries.

The Truman committee, of the United States senate, which held an inquiry on the subject in the United States, has just handed its report to the council of United States ministers, and already Mr. Roosevelt has taken drastic steps to correct that situation considered disastrous for the small industries. Why not imitate the United States government, for our problem is the same, and it is advisable for us, possibly more than for the United States, to adopt the remedy suggested by the Truman report?

Moreover, I wish to express in this house my disapproval of the one billion dollar gift to England, as well as of the seven hundred million dollar loan, bearing no interest, which, I have every reason to believe, will never be reimbursed.

My compatriots, already bled white by existing taxes, will have to pay for these gifts which no excess of generosity can justify. There are limits to the running of a country, thinly populated, that has been thrown into a conflict by circumstances which I have condemned when war was declared and which I do not wish to discuss again to-day. This imperialistic folly, this shameless blackmail coming from the least Canadian section of the country, to whose will the government always seems ready to yield, will inevitably incite us to break away from the empire after the war, and will throw us into a financial condition which will burden us for generations to come.

I must also, on the floor of this house, as I have done in previous years, protest energetically against the small measure of consideration given to French Canadians in war services and organizations. It seems that the deeper we get into this war, the fewer French Canadians are appointed. Such appointments are becoming so unusual that it has become very hard to locate their recipients; yet, we make up a third of the population and we are incessantly reminded that national unity must be safeguarded. It seems to me, that the best way to promote national unity is by giving fairer treatment, in this country, to the descendants of the first settlers.

The unfair treatment of French Canadians, at the present time, in all fields of endeavour, will convince them more and more that the present conflict is not a Canadian war, but truly a war waged for the exclusive benefit of the British empire.

As a consequence, it would not be at all surprising, after the war, for the Canadian population to seek total independence or annexation to the United States.

We are profoundly attached to our soil, our traditions and our language. No government charged with the administration of this country, may overlook the fact that one-third of its population, although French-speaking, contribute its fair share of tax payments and personal sacrifice for the prosecution of the war.

For this reason, the French Canadian is entitled to his share in the administration, and, being first and emphatically a Canadian, when requested to increase his war effort, it is necessary that he be convinced by deeds that he is serving Canada and Canada only.

No fitter conclusion to my speech could I find but to quote the words of Leslie Roberts, in the Saturday Night of January 17, 1942:

> Why does French Canada still hate the idea of conscription for service overseas, despite the assault by Japan and the threat to our own western coast?
> The answer is that Quebeckers are Canada-minded but not empire-minded. Like other Canadians, they have heard a lot about serving Britain and the empire and very little about serving Canada.
> Says Mr. Roberts: . . . if anybody wants French Canada to accept the idea of fighting anywhere in the world, other than voluntarily, the idea of Canadian survival necessity must first be driven home, not empire survival, not British necessity, not even the survival of democracy.

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like in a humble way to offer a few remarks in this debate. I shall not speak from the French-Canadian or the Anglo-Saxon point of view because I happen to be an immigrant to this country. I am one of those two million people whom Canada has invited to her shores from other parts of the world. I am pleased to have had that invitation from the two great races in Canada, French and English, and I am trying to be worthy of the privileges extended to me by being a good Canadian.

I feel it is my duty to address the members of the house briefly at this time because I am the representative of a part of Canada the importance of which in the present war effort is absolutely essential. My constituency of Skeena, and particularly its principal city of Prince Rupert, are in the forefront of war activities. It would be unwise to go into details, but the foregoing statement is nevertheless a statement of fact.

None of us at this time should in any way make statements or give out information that might be a comfort to our enemies and an embarrassment to ourselves. I am satisfied that the national defence authorities have done everything possible to provide for the defence of that vital empire link which I represent. My only desire in this respect is to state publicly what I know and feel. The northwest coast of British Columbia and its great seaport of Prince Rupert are of such vast importance that every possible effort should be made to bring its defences to the point where it may continue, in spite of whatever enemy action may come, to serve as part of the life-line between the source of supply in our war and our troops afloat, on land, or in the air who must unfailingly receive from us the supplies and the munitions necessary not only to prevent them from being placed at a disadvantage but to assure them of superiority in this respect. Hand in hand with active defence must go the efforts of the civilian population itself to make sure of a degree of protection in the case of enemy attack.

Canada, since its formation, has taken part in all the wars of the empire. Previously our share, and our proper share, which was undertaken gladly, was to send abroad to a theatre of war far from our own shores our representatives to assist in the preservation of the British empire and of those ideals of fairness and justice for which it stands.

This war has forced upon us a realization that we can no longer ignore our complete duty. The war has been brought home not only to the armed forces of the world but to its civilian population. No man can guarantee that the dread effects of war will not be brought home to our Canadian cities and most surely to those on our coastlines; and those ports which form a part of our supply line will for the same reason be the obvious objective of enemy attack.

I want to dwell for a few moments on the subject of air raid precautions, one of the most essential services and one in which Great Britain has distinguished herself. Throughout the areas of Canada subject to the risk of enemy attack, a civilian organization has been formed, on a purely voluntary basis, to guarantee that our armed forces will be supported by an organized and trained civilian population. These efforts are generally referred to as "air raid precautions." Throughout the riding which I represent, and particularly in the city of Prince Rupert, to which I have referred, patriotic citizens have created voluntary organizations to deal with this matter. In Prince Rupert men and women are freely giving of their time and submitting themselves to training in order to form part of an organized body to meet the dangers that may come their way.

We have all followed what has been happening in the last few days; we realize that Hitler and the axis powers have been trying to destroy our communications by sinking our ships; and if we lose Singapore, which God forbid, the axis powers may next go after the big shipping ports on the British and United States coasts. I have in mind Esquimalt, Prince Rupert and other great sea ports.

I cannot speak too highly of the degree of public service demonstrated by the air raid precautions organization in the city of Prince Rupert. Private citizens and public servants have given freely of their time. They have held practices testing their ability, and I am sure that in the event of enemy action the citizens of the coastal communities will prove as capable as the population of any British city.

Perhaps to a greater degree than is true of any other portion of Canada my constituency is confronted with an alien problem. For many years fishing has been a chief industry of British Columbia and the city of Prince Rupert and my constituency constitute the capital of that industry. The fishing industry of British Columbia has been very largely in the hands of Japanese. It may not be a matter of common knowledge that the largest centre for distribution of what is perhaps the finest edible fish in the world, the halibut, is Prince Rupert. Of the twenty-nine million pounds produced in Canada, British Columbia produces fourteen million and, of that, eleven million pounds come from our district.

So large a place does the halibut fishing occupy in Prince Rupert that a small boy there saying his prayers one night in front of his mother said, "Our Father which are in Heaven, Halibut be Thy Name." That is how vital the halibut fishing industry is to Prince Rupert. If that industry is going to be taken away and left to the oriental who is now our enemy, I wish the government to understand what it means in the development of that part of the country.

There is a concentration of Japanese fishermen in the coastal waters which touch my constituency. Whatever may be said of the possible menace of the large Japanese population there—their numbers are from 20,000 to 30,000—it can be said with truth that it is amongst those of this race who are engaged in the fishing industry that our greatest potential danger lies. It may be that the smaller number of aliens of this race who are engaged in farming do not present a serious problem, but Japanese fishermen do present a problem, and I urge upon this government with all the emphasis I can give this statement that these alien enemies should justly and fairly be removed from the coastal areas where they are capable of doing such great harm. This matter has been brought up by several hon. members from British Columbia, and I urge that all Japanese of military age should be removed from that area.

Long ago I referred to the necessity of highway communication between Prince Rupert and the interior of British Columbia, which means with the rest of Canada. While this has long been desirable from the commercial point of view, because of the war situation it now becomes an absolute necessity. In making this statement at this time I am sure I shall not be considered as talking only for the benefit of the constituency which I have the honour to represent; it is a strategic necessity for the defence of Canada. This government which has done so much in so many ways knows that anything of this kind is of great concern, and will realize without further elaboration on my part the seriousness of the situation and take immediate and effective steps in this matter which is of such importance for the defence of our country. I cannot state too strongly that this is an enterprise which should be undertaken at once.

Personally I think it is unnecessary for me to state my stand regarding this war, because I offered my services, and my son and my son-in-law have done likewise. Not only have

I offered my services, but the money which I have made through the privileges afforded me, an immigrant, I offered at the beginning of the war, free of charge. Therefore I speak for all Canadians, whether we call ourselves French-Canadians or whatever our racial origin may be, those whom you invited to come to Canada and make it a cosmopolitan country. The finest expression of genuine patriotism that has been given in this house in my long experience of its activities was expressed on Friday by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), our minister from British Columbia. I appeal to hon. members and to all Canadians: If you were sincere in the invitation which you gave to people of other lands, including myself, some forty years ago, and which no doubt you are going to give again, in this crisis through which we are now passing, let us all forget whether we are east or west, whether our birthplace was this or that, and all be Canadians.

A word in conclusion. I am not going to refer to what has happened in the elections to-day, but I do wish to say that my namesake, the hon. leader of the opposition has fulfilled his duties with great credit to himself, and it is apparent that there is no one who could do better. Since the electors have shown that the Mackenzie King government still has the support of the people of Canada, let us accept that and all work together to make Canada greater yet.

On motion of Mr. Ward the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Tuesday, February 10, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

INTERNMENTS

READING OF PETITION OF CERTAIN PERSONS INTERNED IN HULL, QUE.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask if the petition laid on the table by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) has been examined and found in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: It has been laid on the table and found in order.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then I suggest, now that it is in order, that the petition be read, and I so move.

Motion agreed to.

(The Clerk Assistant read the petition as follows):

Petition to members of the House of Commons of Canada in parliament assembled, at Ottawa Ontario.

Ladies and Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

We the undersigned Canadians in exercising the immemorial privilege of British subjects to petition the House of Commons in parliament assembled are confident that you will honour this ancient right and practice by hearing sympathetically our representations upon a matter affecting the welfare and safety of our nation, and the liberties of its citizens.

We humbly beg to draw to your attention the following facts and considerations:

1. That the undersigned Canadian anti-fascists have been arbitrarily confined, many for as long as twenty months, first in internment camps, together with fascist prisoners of war and, since August 20, 1941, in a concentration camp in Hull jail, at Hull, Quebec, though we have been opposing fascism ever since its evil birth.

2. That we have repeatedly sought to impress persons in authority with our loyalty to Canada and its democratic institutions, our unreserved support of Canada's war effort against the common enemy of our country, and of all free people, Hitlerite Germany and her allies; our abhorrence of and opposition to any and all subversive activities within our country, and our desire for release from detention in order that we may contribute our time and energies to the advancement of these purposes. To this end we have individually sworn affidavits and have dispatched petitions to the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe on June 27, July 1, July 14, July 31, August 7, August 9, August 15, August 22, September 3, and September 4, 1941; and to the Hon. Louis St. Laurent on December 18, 1941; and to the Prime Minister the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King on September 10, October 1, and November 28, 1941.

3. That on November 28, 1941, we dispatched a letter to the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King offering our services in the armed forces, industry or other war work, wherever we may be deemed most useful, followed by individual letters to members of the government stating each person's qualifications and making suggestions regarding his future services.

4. That at this hour of greatest strain and peril to our country it is absolutely imperative that all the Canadian people, irrespective of class, party, religion or race be banded together in unity for the supreme effort and sacrifice in the just war waged by Canada, Britain, the U.S.S.R., the United States of America and their allies for victory over fascist enemies; that in this struggle for victory lies the security of Canada, and the identity of interests of the whole nation; that united effort for maximum military operation and war production stands above all other considerations.

5. That the continued arrest, persecution and detention of anti-fascist Canadians in concentration camps is justified neither on the grounds of national security, nor of safety of the state, but appears to be a form of persecution based on class and political prejudice, and moreover tends to create doubt, controversy and disunity to the detriment of our country's war effort.

6. That our release from detention and the restoration of our civil rights as Canadians to participate in the armed forces and other war services will serve to strengthen public confidence that undemocratic practices are not being allowed to gain ground in our land, and that our government's war effort is truly directed toward the realization and implementation of the eight-point programme enunciated jointly by Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt, and which has become the foundation of the twenty-six united nations agreement, to which our own government has declared its adherence, thus spurring forward the enthusiasm and self-sacrifice of our people in the war effort for decisive victory over the enemy in the shortest period of time.

7. That our release from detention will not only restore us to personal freedom and to our families, and enable us to contribute our abilities, labour and lives to the benefit of our country's war effort, but especially will it enable us, many of whom have considerable public influence, particularly among the workers, to assist in mobilizing the people for the greatest exertions, both in uninterrupted war production and in the armed forces, to assure and hasten the victorious conclusion of the war.

8. That we repeat our solemn pledges contained in our sworn affidavits and our petitions that upon our release all our efforts will be directed loyally, unsparingly and unswervingly to achievement of the fullest national unity for the maximum contribution in all fields of the war effort.

We are resolutely and sincerely opposed to any actions which would be injurious to the unity of Canada, the security of the state and the maximum war effort.

And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

Therefore we humbly pray of the House of Commons, as the elected representatives of the Canadian people, in whose hands rests the sovereignty of government and the direction of national policy, you institute such measures that will restore us our liberties in the interests of the welfare of our country and its war effort in this hour of supreme test and peril.

WHEAT

REPORTED SALE TO UNITED STATES BUYERS FOR LATER DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), as reported at page 128 of Hansard, quoted the following from a Winnipeg paper:

> Canadian wheat is being purchased by United States buyers for shipment south of the line after the opening of navigation; that warehouse receipts are being taken by the United States buyers, and that, according to reliable authorities, the wheat is being hedged in the Chicago market.

He then proceeded to ask three questions. At that time I promised to look into the matter and bring down a reply as soon as possible. I should like to reply to these questions now.

Question 1: From whom are these United States buyers securing these warehouse receipts, since it is cash wheat?

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Answer: The warehouse receipts are supplied by the seller of the grain to the buyer and are the owner's title to the grain. When grain is unloaded at any terminal elevator a warehouse receipt must be issued to the owner, and only on presentation of this receipt is he entitled to gain possession of the grain that it represents.

Question 2: Why is it being hedged in Chicago?

Answer: If this grain is being hedged in Chicago, presumably it is because the owner wishes to have it hedged there. This is purely a matter for the personal judgment of the owner and it is a fairly common practice for Canadian grain to be hedged in Chicago.

Question 3: What part did the Canadian wheat board play in these trades, and is there any possibility of this wheat coming into competition with the export of other Canadian wheat to the United Kingdom?

Answer: The Canadian wheat board has no direct knowledge of these transactions as their wheat is sold to buyers on the Winnipeg grain exchange. Because the very restricted import quota for Canadian wheat allowed to enter the United States for domestic consumption is full, this wheat will presumably stay in bond in the United States, and therefore remains a part of the visible supply of Canadian wheat and can move into export channels in exactly the same way as other wheat stored by exporters in the United States or Canada.

REPORTED INITIAL PRICE OF NINETY CENTS PER BUSHEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct a question to either the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has either of them any knowledge of the broadcast over United States news stations last night to the effect that following the Prime Minister's statement in this house yesterday the Canadian government had decided to set the initial price of wheat at ninety cents per bushel? Why was it announced there rather than in Canada?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have no information on the subject.

PACIFIC COUNCIL

REPRESENTATION OF CANADA ON COUNCIL TO CONCERT COMMON DEFENCE IN SOUTH PACIFIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question relating to a dispatch in to-day's paper from London, England, to the effect that the Pacific council meets to-day in London. It refers also to a statement by Mr. Curtin, the Prime Minister of Australia. The Exchange Telegraph reports Mr. Curtin as having said:

That exclusion of Canada is due to the feeling that Canada's position in the Pacific is less urgent than that of the others.

The countries now represented are Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and the Netherlands. I should like to ask the Prime Minister why Canada is not a member of this Pacific council? I am one of those who for several years past have contended that our people should know the facts about this Pacific question. They should not have to get them from dispatches from Australia and other places. As I say, Canada is as much interested in this matter as Australia, New Zealand and other dominions and allies, yet we gave nothing to the Singapore base, or to an empire shipping conference in 1937, or to the adoption of the Jellicoe report. The public of Canada want to know the real facts. If the Prime Minister cannot give the information to-day—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: Why is not Canada represented at this Pacific conference? Why did not Canada give a grant to the Singapore base? The country should know the real facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I know of no reason why this information should not be given. I am quite in order because the same question was asked in the British house. I should like to have the facts. I am entitled to the facts. If the Prime Minister cannot give the information to-day, perhaps he will give it to the house to-morrow.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that the question which he has just asked is one that relates to an arrangement that was reached at Washington between the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States at the time Mr. Churchill was visiting Washington. The arrangement is in part the outcome of further conferences that have taken place between them and between some of the countries mentioned. The question is an important one. It is one to which I would wish to give a very careful answer, as there are special reasons which govern the matter being in the position in which it is. I shall seek to give my hon. friend a reply at another sitting of the house.

BY-ELECTIONS

DATE OF INTRODUCTION OF NEWLY-ELECTED MEMBERS—LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question which is probably related to the one just asked by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church): Can the Prime Minister say when the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will take their places in the house?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It might be a matter of interest to the house to know just how long it takes to have ministers who are duly elected take their seats. As a matter of fact before coming into the house I had asked my secretary to find out from the chief electoral officer how soon returns to the house could be made and how soon the ministers could take their seats in the house. I received the following memorandum:

The chief electoral officer informs me that returning officers are allowed to fix a date for the final addition of the votes, and that the act provides for the holding of the ballots until six days after this final addition. In York South the final addition is on the eleventh; in Quebec East and St. Mary, the twelfth, and in Welland, because of the scattered nature of the riding, difficult road conditions, et cetera, the sixteenth. This means that the new members could not be presented in the house before February 18 for York South, February 19 for Quebec East and St. Mary, and February 23 for Welland.

My hon. friend will see that the act in some particulars is most fearfully and wonderfully made.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Thank you, Mr. Prime Minister. I am sorry for the delay.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Now that the other party has gone with the wind out of York South, what is going to be the official designation of the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson)? Will it be leader or acting leader? I want to know because I shall have a lot to say in the future about that.

AGRICULTURAL POLICY

GRAIN MARKETING—INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT FOR 1942

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce when the agricultural policy and the grain marketing policy for 1942 will be announced.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): It will be impossible to have a discussion of the legislation which will have to be presented until we have completed this debate, and I do not know just when that will be.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO WHEN 1941 FORMS WILL BE READY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue a question. On February 3 I asked the Minister of Finance when the income tax forms for 1941 would be ready and whether they would have to wait until the tax agreements with the provinces were signed. The minister stated he would bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue.

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): I had no knowledge that the question had been asked. There has been some delay in preparing income tax forms for some of the provinces, because we had to wait until consultations could be held with the provinces as to whether we would print on the forms the details necessary for the collection of the provincial income tax. Having obtained the consent of the provinces to leave these details off the forms, the forms are now being printed. If they have not been distributed already, I know that they will be available in a few days.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

AIR RAID PRECAUTIONS—SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health a question which relates to the defence of Canada regulations. In view of the changed war, does the minister propose to set up a new committee of this house to deal with these regulations? The regulations passed at the last session provided for federal enforcement, but I understand that these regulations have now been transferred to the provinces and provincial premiers. I appreciate the fact that the people in charge of air raid precautions are doing good work and are splendid citizens, but home defence should not be for them alone, and that work alone will not make our cities and towns secure. The black-outs should not be for more than twenty minutes and should be reasonable. I would ask if the minister could let us know to-morrow what is being done.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, the question of the committee to deal with the defence of Canada regulations is a matter of government policy, on the recommendation of the Minister of Justice, not on mine. May I also inform my hon. friend that the only delegation of authority under the present regulations, so far as I am aware, is under section 35, in which there is a specific delegation of authority in regard to black-outs from the Minister of Pensions and National Health to the provincial attorneys-general of five Canadian provinces. I shall be very glad indeed to table at any time the instrument of delegation if my hon. friend requests it and to give any further information if he will place his question on the order paper.

Mr. CHURCH: Do not the regulations say that invasion must be imminent before central Canada is blacked out?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The regulations speak for themselves. I do not have them under my hand at the moment, but there has been a delegation of authority in regard to black-outs only, on the advice of the Department of Justice.

Mr. CHURCH: For home defence in cities we still have left the police, the boy scouts and girl guides to start with. No city in central Canada has any defence if attacked.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask the minister if the black-out regulations date from yesterday?

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that what is uppermost in the minds of most if not all of the members of this house this afternoon is the results of the elections of yesterday. I want to say, because I am going to say something on the question of the plebiscite, that I regard the results as an approval by the people of at least three constituencies, and I think one can almost say of four, and not in one province only but in the two largest provinces of this dominion, of the wisdom of the course of action which was announced in the speech from the throne and which was so effectively and so ably presented by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his speech in this debate.

May I also be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to suggest that these results are a resounding rebuke, and probably the most resounding rebuke which can be given to intemperate and unbridled invective in political campaigns. It teaches us all that these are times when bitterness and personal animosity have no place in the discussion of public questions either in the press or on the platform. I do want to congratulate the Prime Minister. His principle of trusting the people and his faith in their good sense and their ability to distinguish between the sober and serious issues which face this country and the hysterical condemnation of those who have singled him out for virulent attack have been fully demonstrated.

To have just at this time two ministers, one from the province of Quebec and the other from the province of Ontario, both returned on the same day, in spite of the efforts of certain extremists in both provinces to divide this country, is a striking response to the appeal which has been made for unity and tolerance and understanding. The government in the return of these two men, each outstanding in his own field, has been immeasurably encouraged and strengthened, I know that the house generally will join in regret at the illness of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and join most heartily in sincere good wishes for his early recovery.

May I take just a moment, Mr. Speaker, and I know my hon. friends will pardon me if I do not take longer, to join in all the congratulations which have been extended to the member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) who moved and seconded the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne. To say that their accomplishment had the degree of excellence which we expected of them is to say that both made presentations which both in manner and in matter were admirable and in every way worthy of the traditions of this house. I met them both with their colleagues when they were in England. They had two missions: one to take Canada to the United Kingdom, and the other to bring the United Kingdom to Canada. I know a little of how well they accomplished their task on the other side, and I am sure that the messages they have brought us here indicated that they were equally well qualified and competent for the task of bringing to us the results of their observations of the traditions and spirit of the people of Great Britain.

A good deal has been said in this debate with regard to my department. I shall leave these comments and criticisms to be dealt with at another time. I want to-day to discuss directly the matters mentioned in the speech from the throne. After all, these are the matters which are primarily the subject of this debate rather than matters of administration and operation.

Speaking generally my criticism is that in this debate the discussion seems to have centred not around what we shall do to help win the war but how we shall do it, a discussion not of policy but of a particular method or form of procedure; and that is typical of what has been going on in the country for the past six months or more. There really seems to be in some quarters a deliberate attempt to obscure the real measure of Canada's war activity. The idea has been sold and rather subtly sold, to use the expression of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), that Canada is not doing much. And why? Because there is no conscription for overseas service. Nothing else seems to matter. The morale of the Canadian people is being undermined by this insistent and persistent deprecation.

Here is what has happened in this debate. The Prime Minister outlined comprehensively what Canada had done and what she proposes to do. But what course has the debate taken? I know there have been exceptions but I think I am right when I say that, fairly generally, very little attention has been paid to the government's proposals for further activity in the navy, army and air force, the proposals regarding increasing the vast volume of munitions, the proposals for the mobilization of manpower, the proposal to provide one billion dollars' worth of munitions and supplies to Great Britain, the proposal to spend three billion dollars for war this year. I submit that when we are assessing the extent of what we are doing, measures like these are worth noticing. The measure of the contribution which Canada has made up to this date—I say Canada; I am not saying the government—such measures and the concrete measures which are proposed for the future are really tangible things by which we ought to be able to judge and to assess the extent of what we are doing.

The principle of total war has been laid down, and to that we all agree, but the yardstick which has been used to measure the extent and the full-outness, to coin a word, of Canada's contribution has been conscription for overseas service. That causes confusion. That obscures the view that this country should get of the measure of our war effort. I want this afternoon, as a measure of what we are actually doing, to indicate one or two principles whereby our activities can be judged.

No person can doubt that Canada is committed to total war. We are committed to it not only for the survival of freedom generally but for our own survival and for the survival of this nation, and for the security of our own homes and families. To wage total war is the stated policy of the government and I believe, indeed I am sure, that it is the determined purpose of the Canadian people.

But what do we mean by total war? I think it means the most effective use against the enemy of the country's total resources in materials and people. The different countries have different resources. Total war requires a country to plan its pattern for war according to its resources, and more than that, according to the needs and abilities of other countries with which it is allied. One country, for example, might have great resources in terms of people, and for that country total war would mean concentrating effort in raising men and relying upon allied countries for supplies of food and weapons. Another country might have excess resources of food and materials. Its pattern for total war might mean extra effort in production, and a proportionately less effort in raising armed forces. But I do not want you to think, Mr. Speaker, for a single moment that in my view such a country can sit back comfortably and feel it is doing its duty efficiently by tilling the soil and producing munitions and allowing the other fellow to do all the fighting.

Again, a country at war without allies would follow a different pattern from that which would be followed if it were one of a group.

Now, Canada is a member of a team of united nations, and our pattern for total war has to be shaped by the relation of the extent of her resources in materials and people compared to the needs of the whole team.

These things, Mr. Speaker, are very academic, but perhaps they need to be said, and they certainly need to be understood if we are to realize what total war means for Canada.

Here is the pattern of total war which this dominion, directed by its government and by parliament, is following. It has been shaped by the considerations I have mentioned: first, the nature and extent of Canada's resources in materials and people; second, Canada's needs and abilities in relation to the needs and abilities of other nations with whom we are bound in united purpose to wage this war to the end, or go under.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Canada's pattern of total war has three main parts. I do not pretend to name them in order of importance. I do not think they have any order of importance. Each one is essential. The three are complementary parts of the whole, and that is how they ought to be regarded.

One of the three parts is the production of food; another is the production of materials and weapons of war; and another is the raising of armed forces to combat on sea and on land and in the air. Supporting all these activities is the great civilian effort of the people of this dominion which expresses itself chiefly in the twin essentials of services and morale, and in which no Canadian is too old, too poor, or too humble to have a place and a duty.

So that, put in briefest form, our pattern of total war is a pattern consisting of food, weapons and armed forces. You cannot take one and leave the others in a country like Canada; and the duty of the government is to recognize that each of these three parts—food, weapons and armed forces—is essential to total war by Canada, and to try and determine the proportion which each part ought to bear.

Now let us look at the 1942 programme, which, as I have indicated, has not had too much discussion, to see the place which each one of these parts I have mentioned holds.

First, about food. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his speech to the house on January 26, gave statistics on Canada's food production. I will not repeat them. But I want to remind the house of the great increases in essential items which his figures showed. Canada's programme in food production for 1942 is to provide to the limit of our production and to the limit of our productive resources the foods essential to our own people and to Britain. But here, just as in other fields, we must try to utilize as far as possible workers ineligible for military service, in order to release as many as possible of those who are eligible. We still need and expect young men from the farms for our fighting forces. No better fighting men can be found. Many of them have gone into war industry as well, and I freely admit there may be fault in that we have not yet taken full measures to replace those who have come from the farms, by making more certain that workers are provided to keep these farms in operation; and a very important part of the selective service plan which the Prime Minister announced will be to deal with that particular situation, because the indications are that more rather than less workers will be needed in this tremendously vital activity.

Then there is the production of weapons, of ships, tanks, planes, guns, shells, and hundreds of items of equipment which are needed by the united nations. Here is a statement of the weapons programme, if my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) will permit me, for 1942, just in terms of men and women.

At the close of 1941 there were about 600,000 workers, of whom about 75,000 were women, engaged directly and indirectly in producing and distributing the weapons and supplies of war. Our production is vastly different from that of the last war. Then, it was principally shells and rifles. To-day Canada's munitions production is almost as diversified as the number of items in the arsenal of war. My colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply told us not long ago that Canadian weapons are already in use by the united nations in practically every field of war in the world. I am told that by the end of the year an additional 100,000 workers will have been employed, and that means a total of about 700,000 men and women engaged directly and indirectly in this essential part of total war, in Canada.

Here again, as in the case of the farms, the selective service plan must function to ensure that as far as possible the workers in these industries are those who are ineligible for the armed forces.

That programme for 1942, which means vastly increased quantities, with some 700,000 workers engaged directly and indirectly, will see Canada approaching its visible limit of material and management.

Those are the first two parts of Canada's war pattern—food and weapons. What that programme means may be emphasized when we remember that Canada is undertaking an outright contribution during the fiscal year of food and weapons amounting to one billion dollars for the use of the people and the forces of Great Britain, who are helping to fight what is Canada's war as well as their own.

Let me come now to the third part of our pattern of total war, and that is the armed forces. Canada has armed forces for combat on the sea, on the land, and in the air. Many people seem to forget that. They still think of military activities only in terms of the army. That was very true in the last war, when Canada had four divisions overseas in the Canadian corps; but to-day that idea is wholly erroneous. To-day Canada's effort in arms is represented by numbers and organizations in the navy, the army and the air force which would certainly impress our friends and, I think, ought to impress Canadians just as certainly. In the navy, Canada's plan has been to raise a navy limited only by the number of ships we could obtain. To put it another way, the plan has been to man every ship which could be built or secured.

In the air, from the start we have concentrated on the air training plan and on air strength as probably the greatest immediate combative contribution this country could make. It has proved to be an activity by which Canada, in geography and resources, and by the character of its young men, has been able to make an incalculable contribution.

Now about the army. The objective has been and is to raise and equip, to reinforce and to maintain, highly motorized and mechanized forces, hard-hitting and complete. In this way we take advantage of our resources and materials, as well as of the qualities of initiative and fighting skill which Canadians in battle have always shown. We also have the obligations for defence in Canada, which are more prominently before us than ever before. Under the army programme for 1942, the Canadian army overseas will be, in proportion, probably the most highly mechanized and mobile army in the world. It is obvious, of course, that a country of eleven and a half million people could not raise mass armies comparable to the forces of other nations, and particularly it could not attempt to do so when the army is just one part of the general pattern of food and weapons, air strength and navy.

Those are the general principles which underlie the extent and strength of Canada's armed forces.

Let us look at the 1942 programme—and by that I mean the fiscal year ending in March 1943. I wish to summarize that programme now with particular reference to the man-power involved, but I will not go into details because I think the figures on man-power will be sufficient for our purposes.

In the navy to date over 27,000 men have enlisted and it has a strength of over 350 ships. This programme for 1942 requires a further 13,000 men.

In the army to date over 295,000 men have been enlisted and its actual strength is over 255,000 men.

While I am speaking of the Canadian army, I am sure that the house and the country will want to join in expressing the pleasure which we all feel at the arrival in Canada of Lieutenant-General McNaughton. He is a man in whom this country has unbounded confidence. He has given the best of his superb talents to the building up of a fighting formation in the United Kingdom of which we all ought to be proud. We are fortunate indeed to have him at the head of the Canadian army overseas. We do not realize fully how much he has achieved in maintaining the morale and the fighting spirit of Canadians who have been such a long time inactive but constantly alert. It is a hard test both for commanders and for troops, and Canadians under General McNaughton have stood that test magnificently. I know that the country will learn with immense satisfaction that he has made a complete recovery from his illness and will be ready in a short time to resume his high and responsible position.

When I speak of the Canadian corps which is overseas, hon. members will recall that it consists of three infantry divisions, one armoured division, one army tank brigade, a forestry corps and ancillary and specialized units with thousands of reinforcements in reinforcement units.

Perhaps I should refer to reinforcements for a moment. A statement was made in that regard and I should like to make this clear. The number of reinforcements dispatched to the United Kingdom is actually in excess of the schedule recommended by the corps commander, who has expressed himself as entirely satisfied with the reinforcements.

The 1942 programme is to organize, equip and maintain an army of two corps overseas. That programme requires the enlistment of a further 90,000 to 100,000 men during the present fiscal year. That figure is, in the opinion of general staff, the maximum number of new men who can be effectively trained during that period for service overseas. That will put an exceedingly heavy strain upon the instructional staffs and equipment, because, in addition to these new men for overseas, we must train the overseas units still in this country and also about forty to fifty thousand men for service in Canada; and already arrangements are being made to bring back a large number of instructors from the other side for that purpose.

Under the 1942 programme which the Prime Minister announced, we shall have overseas a Canadian army of two corps composed of three infantry divisions, two armoured divisions, two army tank brigades, and there will be additional ancillary corps and line of communication troops. There will be reinforcements and reserves for all these formations and units. As a result of that programme about one-half of the Canadian army overseas will be armoured; and as I have indicated that is a proportion of armoured strength probably greater than that of any other army in the world.

That 1942 programme is the recommendation of general staff. When I was in England in consultation with the Secretary of State for War, he told me that the most effective and useful additional contribution which Canada could make as far as the army was concerned was another armoured division, and this programme provides for that. In the words of General McNaughton, this Canadian army will be a well-balanced, highly effective fighting force, coordinated from the front line back to the rear echelons—a weapon forged and sharpened to play a great part when the time to strike comes.

The cost of the army programme in the fiscal year is estimated at practically one billion dollars. The 1942 all-out programme for the air force calls for between 70,000 and 80,000 men.

Mr. STIRLING: Before the minister leaves the programme for the armed forces overseas, would he care to put a number to that? How many will be required to fill that?

Mr. RALSTON: From 90,000 to 100,000 new men. That is up to March 31, 1943. I will sum that up now. The 1942 all-out programme for the air force calls, as I say, for between 70,000 and 80,000 men. And remember this: From the beginning of the war to the end of 1942 over 422,000 men enlisted voluntarily for general service. To sum up the 1942 programme for the three armed services, it involves as nearly as can be estimated the raising of between 173,000 and 193,000 men for general service, and to carry it out would bring the total Canadian enlistments in all three services up to between 595,000 and 615,000 men. I have here a table showing how this is made up, and I will put it on Hansard:

	Enlistments to date	Programme for 1942	Prospective total enlistments up to March 31, 1943
Air force	100,000	70,000– 80,000	170,000–180,000
Navy	27,000	13,000– 13,000	40,000– 40,000
Army	295,000	90,000–100,000	385,000–395,000
Totals	422,000	173,000–193,000	595,000–615,000

I do not want the house to get a wrong idea. The total enlistments at the end of the 1942 programme do not mean that we shall have then armed forces of that size. There have been and will be unfortunately wastage and casualties, and our actual strength will be diminished accordingly. As a matter of fact, of the 90,000 to 100,000 men to be raised this year for the army, probably 25,000 will be for new units and the remainder for reinforcements and reserves. Then there is the defence on the home front here in Canada, a most important part of our effort for total war. I assure the house that these needs are having the closest and most unrelenting attention not only of members from the Pacific coast but also at least on the part of some of us at National Defence headquarters.

Speaking generally, our Canadian defences, so far as the army is concerned, comprise coast defence garrisons at strategic points on both coasts, local reserves for those garrisons on each coast, and general reserves which are available for both coasts. At the present time there is in Canada the fourth division which in due course will be converted into an armoured division. There are also the brigade groups of the sixth division located at strategic points. A number of unbrigaded battalions are on coast defence duties on both coasts and there are coast defence artillery garrisons. Special dispositions have been made where that seemed to be required.

It should be remembered that apart from the 4th division and the brigade groups of the sixth division, we have in Canada over 90,000 active service personnel in training centres and elsewhere, and an emergency organization of a proportion of that personnel is being set up as well. We have also fully in mind the mobilizing of further units for Canadian defence, especially in view of the ultimate dispatch of the fourth division overseas. In addition to these mobilized formations and active service personnel we have reserve units, and we have worked out a special reorganization and regrouping of them across Canada, organizing them in brigade groups under full-time staffs and with special provision for training.

We realize that the matter of anti-aircraft defence is of the utmost importance. Hon. members will understand that this is a joint concern of the three services, but it concerns particularly the air and the army—the army for anti-aircraft guns, and the air for aeroplanes. We realize that the matter of anti-aircraft defence is of the utmost importance, but I am sure that this country realizes, I think the citizens of the Pacific coast do, that no matter how complete our anti-aircraft defences are made we can never prevent the enemy from attempting sporadic raids. What we must do is to utilize the equipment we have and can get from time to time to make such an attempt as costly to the enemy as we can. We are trying to do that. To-day on the Pacific coast there is certain special equipment which does not exist to the same degree anywhere else in the dominion—not all we want, but more than might have been expected under the conditions, and there is more to follow. I can say generally that having regard to the anticipated forms of attack the provisions for Canadian defence have been made up to the limit of our equipment and resources, and we are increasing our defensive strength just as fast as equipment becomes available.

Mr. GREEN: If I may ask a question, does the minister not think it would be well to have a secret session of the house at which the question of the defence of the Pacific coast, or both coasts, could be gone into much more fully than is possible at a regular session?

Mr. RALSTON: The Prime Minister indicated the other day that consideration would be given to the matter of a secret session, and I would assume that the Pacific coast defences would be a subject quite proper for discussion at such session. I may say I should be glad to give to my hon. friend or any hon. members from the Pacific coast generally information in regard to the Pacific coast. I have an idea from reading the newspapers that quite a bit is known out there already.

Mr. GREEN: Of course we cannot get satisfaction in that way; I might personally, but it is a matter for the Canadian parliament to decide, and in order to decide properly they must know the facts. I suggest that it is of vital importance to this nation at this time that there should be a secret session at which this question should be discussed.

Mr. RALSTON: In regard to a secret session, as I have indicated, I think the Prime Minister stated some time ago that he thought arrangements could be made to hold such a session, and I anticipate that the subject to which my hon. friend refers would be one of those discussed there.

I have mentioned the programme of food, weapons and armed forces. As part of the programme for total war there is much to be done in the way of directing the citizens of Canada towards the task where they can serve best. This is going on in a hundred different ways, but it is to be supplemented by much more comprehensive measures, as the Prime Minister indicated in his speech, from which I shall quote one paragraph:

> The government now proposes to apply the compulsory powers of national selective services to other aspects of the war effort as well as to military service. These powers will be applied selectively and progressively to those activities where it is considered by the government that their application will contribute to the goal of a total effort . . .

I shall not attempt to go into details regarding these proposals, as my colleague the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) will be doing that, I anticipate; but I want to emphasize that the further mobilization of man-power and woman-power is one of the biggest jobs we have in our activities for total war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister leaves that—and I want to say that I am impressed and reassured by the nature of the statement which he is making—is it anticipated that the government intends to say to a man: "You shall work here and not there"? The Prime Minister has not made that clear. I do not think you can say to a man: "You must work here and not there." You might not get results. That is what our labour friends will tell you about that.

Mr. RALSTON: That is a matter which has had a great deal of examination and consideration in England as well, and I am sure it will be dealt with when the measures are brought down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not sure that you can make a man work.

An hon. MEMBER: Not for less wages.

Mr. RALSTON: There is the old saying that you cannot make an opera singer sing.

Lastly, in this pattern for total war there is that measure in dollars. Our direct expenditures for war this year will be three billion dollars.

I have given Canada's pattern for total war in its comprehensive scope of food, weapons, armed forces, and mobilization of man-power and money. I think I can fairly ask the house and the country to measure that programme as it stands by the programme itself as a whole. Will anyone in this house say that programme is not worthy? Will anyone say that it will not tax our resources in this very year? Will anyone say that the commitment is not enough?

I have tried to portray very briefly and sketchily the development of Canada's programme for total war, not as enforced by the brutal methods of a Gestapo, but through the wholehearted cooperation of a free people under the direction of a democratic government.

I want to deal now with the plebiscite. There are some who, as I intimated at the beginning, will insist on measuring our whole war activity by the one question, whether we are to have conscription for overseas service. But that is not the question. Here is the question, and mixing it up with conscription only adds to the disquiet and confusion. The government tells the people of this dominion that this is the time of greatest crisis in the world's history. The government says that it should be in a position to act in any emergency, and it considers that it ought not to be fettered by past commitments. What the government ask is simply that it be put in a position to be free to act as the circumstances may require in the uncertainties and perils of the days ahead.

There does not seem to be anything morally wrong with that. It seems to be a straightforward course of procedure. But the real trouble is, that it is proposed by the Prime Minister, and to some people that stamps it as sinister. This was the issue that was raised in some of the elections yesterday, and particularly in some of the speeches in York South. The insinuation has been repudiated by the people themselves with an emphasis which no one can mistake.

I do not think this house ever heard a more frank discussion than the Prime Minister's explanation of why the pledge had been given. Among other things he pointed out, with the utmost candour, that the unanimity and speed with which parliament decided to go into the war and stand at the side of Britain could not have been achieved if that pledge had not been given. It was not a pledge on any minor matter. It was a pledge on a subject on which probably feelings are deeper and emotions run higher than on any other one subject in this country.

Members of the house know perfectly well that what the Prime Minister said was true. That was complete frankness, and the Prime Minister was equally frank when he outlined the reasons for considering that release from that assurance should be given in this time of peril. He described at length the critical position of our allies the world over and the new threats which had arisen. He concluded with these words:

> In a world situation so involved, with enemies on every front, with no one able to say what the outcome of battle in other parts of the world may bring of immediate and increased danger to our own land, the government feels strongly that it should be perfectly free to recommend to parliament whatever course of action it deems essential to the security of our own country and to the preservation of freedom in our own and other lands. . . .

And he proposed to put this question to the people of Canada:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

There is nothing sinister about that. It is a straightforward laying bare of the situation. And it is in dead earnest.

I want to deal with just three points which have been made by those who criticize the government for proposing this plebiscite—although my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has dealt with them so effectively and so conclusively that I almost hesitate to take the time of the house to speak of them again.

First may I refer to the objection that the plebiscite is unnecessary because the government already has a mandate from the people to wage total war.

I admit at once that the government was returned to power with a mandate to prosecute the war in the most effective way possible. But there was a restriction attached to that mandate. That is what is overlooked. The limitation arose from the fact that the government, in asking for support, had pledged itself through the Prime Minister that compulsory service for overseas would not be adopted. The national government party, through its leader, Hon. Doctor Manion, gave exactly the same pledge. That simply means—and the government was elected on that pledge—that the government's mandate was not unlimited; and, note this Mr. Speaker, that the position would have been exactly the same if Doctor Manion and his party had been returned to power. The mandate was to prosecute the war as effectively as possible, but subject to this limitation, that the raising of men for overseas should be restricted to voluntary enlistment.

Somebody has said a bad pledge is better broken. But this was not a bad pledge. Surely the leader of the national government party, after consultation with his lieutenants, would not give a bad pledge. It was a pledge on a subject which had torn this country wide open in 1917. As I said a moment ago, it was a pledge on no minor matter. It was a pledge which had great effect, as the Prime Minister has said, in connection with this country's coming into the war with such unanimity.

So binding was the pledge regarded that when the government brought down the National Resources Mobilization Act, by which it was given the most complete power over the person and property of every individual in this dominion, it recognized the limitation imposed by that pledge, and inserted right in the act the condition that this power over persons and property was not to extend to the sending of men compulsorily for military service outside of Canada. The present leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was in the house at the time; he took no exception to that limitation. His only suggestion was that the act might be extended to service in Labrador. And he and his party supported that measure with that restriction in it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did I not say I was prepared to accept that as a half-way measure?

Mr. RALSTON: I am quite satisfied my hon. friend used no such language.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am quite satisfied I did. And I take credit for forcing the government to bring in the act—absolutely.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend should not draw a red herring across the trail. He should look at the record, and he will find that his colleague, the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), suggested that the act be extended to Labrador, Iceland and Newfoundland, and that he himself suggested that it be extended to Labrador. I do not think he will find anywhere in his speech any suggestion that that was a half-way measure, or any suggestion that he was in any way opposed to that restriction being inserted as it is in the act to-day—with that exception. He and his party supported that measure without division and without adverse comment, too.

So much for the point that the government has a complete mandate to carry on the war. It has that mandate on every point except one, and that was regarded as so important—and I repeat it—as to be the subject of specific pledges of both major parties.

Then it is said that the government, in holding a plebiscite, is shirking responsibility and is trying to pass on to the people the burden of making a decision which the government should make itself. That objection is, in my humble opinion, absolutely groundless. Whatever objections there may be to the plebiscite, it is clear that shirking of responsibility is not one of them. If the government had asked the people to decide for or against conscription, that might have been claimed to be shirking governmental responsibility and placing the responsibility of decision on the people. If the government had stated its future policy in advance of the plebiscite, then the people might have said that the government was putting on the people the burden of deciding on a policy regarding which the government must be in a better position to judge.

But the question in this plebiscite does not ask the people of Canada to decide for or against conscription—nothing of the kind. What it does do is to ask the people to put squarely on its shoulders—the shoulders of the government itself—the responsibility for deciding, subject to parliament, how men shall be raised for military service. That surely is not shirking responsibility or passing the buck or ducking the issue. The government is not asking the people to decide policy; on the contrary it is asking the people to let it decide policy. That is the very opposite of evading responsibility. What the government does is to state straightforwardly to the people of Canada that in this, the gravest crisis in the history of the world, it must have a free hand, regardless of past commitments. The plebiscite will decide whether the government's forthright statement of the dangers and its request for authority are to be heeded.

The other point—

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister's time has expired. He can proceed only with unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. RALSTON: I thank hon. members for the courtesy extended to me.

The other point is that the plebiscite means delay in carrying out the country's war effort, and this criticism is a prime example of the distortion which emanates from some quarters. It has been made to appear that Canada's whole war programme depends on the plebiscite; that in effect all effort will be suspended for two or three months until the plebiscite result is known, and that not until then can Britain and our other allies know whether Canada continues to stand with them. This, Mr. Speaker, in my humble judgment is absolutely fallacious. The plebiscite concerns only one part of our war programme. It does not concern the factories; it does not concern the navy or the air force. It concerns only the army, to the extent of overseas service.

I have stated that the 1942 army programme involves the raising of 90,000 to 100,000 men during the next fourteen months, for general service. That programme is already under way. It has not been hindered in any way. During the last four months over 32,000 men enlisted for the army, and I am advised and believe—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that the active army?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, the active army. I believe that if the intake of men for general service keeps within reasonable distance of that general level we shall be able to carry out the 1942 army programme for overseas, including the reserves regarded as adequate by both British and Canadian authorities in England.

In January we had the biggest enlistment we have had since the campaign in the summer. Some 11,700 men enlisted in the month. In addition to that, the calling up of men for training goes on, whether there is a plebiscite or not. No time is lost in that respect. Our training centres are full and will be kept full. The time which the plebiscite would take will have no effect whatever on that training. As a matter of fact we are having to add to our training facilities to take care of the increased enlistment and of the additional men we are calling up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. So that if indications mean anything the programme will go forward, plebiscite or no plebiscite, and there is not the slightest evidence that the time taken for the plebiscite will hinder or hurt our army programme.

So much has been said, sir, about compulsory service that I want to say a word about voluntary enlistments. I want to see voluntary enlistments kept up. I believe it is better for our volunteer army if the men coming to reinforce it are also volunteers. I believe the public of Canada generally wants to see enlistments kept up. In the midst of all this confusion and argument and bitterness, I am bold enough to make an appeal again to the house and to the people of Canada to make it their business as well as mine to keep enlistments up. It is a national effort, just the same as the raising of war loans. There everybody pitches in and tells people of the need, and helps to persuade them to subscribe. Surely it is even more important to help convince the men of Canada of the needs of the army. Canada's army is a force to be reckoned with. It is an efficient fighting machine, well organized, well officered and well manned. Canada's army holds a key position to preserve the security of this dominion. What we are proposing will add very much to its striking power. And we ought, Mr. Speaker, to be very much more proud of it than we seem to be. I want to ask everyone to recognize the gentlemen in battle dress. Along with the men of the navy and the air force, they are our first citizens. We should all be proud indeed of the response which has already been made by the young men of the country. It has been helped, I know, by the citizens' committees all over the dominion. They are composed, just as this house is composed, of those who believe in conscription and of those who do not, but they have sunk their differences to help Canada. I am more than grateful to them for what they have done in connection with recruiting and for the support which they have given to the officers of the department, both at headquarters and in the districts.

Here is the record. I have said already that 422,000 young men of Canada have voluntarily enlisted in the armed forces since the war began up to the end of 1941. Enlistments for the year 1941 alone were:

Air force	69,475

That gives a total for 1941 of 182,366 men who enlisted voluntarily in our armed forces.

An hon. MEMBER: In active service.

Mr. RALSTON: In active service. In January the total enlistments were:

Navy	800
Army	11,713
Total	18,285

You can hardly say, Mr. Speaker, that the voluntary system has failed. Let us not forget that these enlistments have come not under the patriotic fervour which casualties produces, but at a time when because of comparative inactivity it was naturally harder to convince our people that the army needed men. We at national defence headquarters are going right on, and I ask most sincerely for the active interest of the members of this house and of the citizens generally to back up our efforts.

I have faith in the success of the voluntary method if we all do our part. With the background and traditions which this country possesses, and which it would be folly to ignore, I prefer the voluntary method if it works, and I shall do all I can to make it work. At the same time, we cannot know what is ahead and I feel impelled to say—here I can speak only for myself—that if the voluntary system does not meet the needs of the fateful days before us, then I shall feel it my duty as part of my responsibility to advocate the adoption of the other method.

I want to ask: what is the alternative to the plebiscite which those who complain about it would suggest? What is the alternative to this plebiscite? I think it is suggested plainly that it is to put conscription into effect immediately, regardless of pledges and regardless of the way in which the voluntary system is functioning. My conviction is that an attempt summarily to put compulsory service for overseas into force, especially when enlistments are good, would obviously, apart from any pledge, have caused a deep and almost irrevocable breach in a country which up to the present has stood almost unbelievably united. And to do it in the face of the fact that the government was expressly pledged not to do it without consultation would only have deepened and widened that breach. I have seen the necessity for freedom of action, and I have seen the difficulties too. I have hoped that by asking the country for a release of the pledge in this time of crisis we would avoid disruption which would be sure to follow the breaking of the pledged word. I agreed to this plebiscite in that spirit. I believed that it was worth the time and effort and money which the plebiscite involved, to hold this nation together, not only for the future, but also for the present when Canada needs the combined strength and will and purpose of all her citizens.

This reference to the people is neither shocking nor sinister; it is a part of democracy. This request by the government to be relieved of restrictions will impress on Canadians everywhere the fact that Canada must be prepared to face effectively whatever comes. It will bring home to them the fact that this war is not just the war of Britain and the United States, of Russia and China and the united nations. It is Canada's war and the war of every man and woman in the dominion. Wherever they may be, our troops will be fighting for the safety of Canadian homes and for the security of our free institutions. By this I mean, freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, which we have enjoyed so long that we seem to have taken them for granted.

I hoped devoutly that this method of approaching the matter would result in a united acceptance by Canadians of the possibilities which the war may involve; and in spite of the tumult and the shouting, I am not going to give up that hope yet. The winning of the war to avoid slavery must be the supreme consideration to all of us. The farther away from our shores we can keep the war, the less our peril will be. Our common danger requires us to work together for the safety of this dominion. We have too much to lose to pull apart now. Any honourable measure which will help to keep us together is worth trying if there is time, and I believe there is time for this. That is why I have agreed to it. That is why I support it.

We boast of being a nation. I believe that an affirmative answer to the question which will be put is necessary, not only to give the government the freedom of action which any government of a country at war in times like these must have, but also to meet the test of nationhood which we Canadians will face in these coming weeks.

Nationhood requires unity, and unity in Canada requires tolerance and confidence between the different races of which we are composed. The government, whether all citizens like it or not, is the only medium through which unity at this time can be expressed. It can be expressed in an affirmative answer to this plebiscite.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What if it is not?

Mr. RALSTON: Here is where we all can meet on common ground to put on the government the full responsibility for effectively prosecuting the war.

In the uncertain days which lie ahead, in this time of the gravest crisis in the world's history, I earnestly hope that my fellow Canadians, whatever their mother tongue, will curb extreme views on any side; will place on the shoulders of the government the responsibility which it is ready to take; will see the need to unite to meet a common danger, and will meet this test of nationhood and strengthen the common cause of our survival together as a free people.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all congratulate the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) upon his discourse this afternoon. He is one of the able ministers for whom I have great respect. I do not agree with all the views expressed by him this afternoon concerning this plebiscite. Speaking in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had this to say, as reported on page 32 of Hansard:

> Whether the government, all circumstances considered, has applied the principle of national selective service as rapidly and as extensively as it should have been applied, is also a fair subject for debate.

In my humble opinion a statement from a responsible minister on the policy of the government in connection with man-power for agriculture, industry and the armed forces in Canada is long overdue. I have received many letters, resolutions and petitions from my constituency, from people of different political affiliations, asking me to urge this government to take immediate action on the matter of national selective service and an all-out war effort. I have sat in this house and listened to some seventy-six speeches in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Some forty-six members of all groups have expressed themselves against the taking of this plebiscite, while some thirty have spoken for it. I realize that these numbers may not indicate the results of the votes which will be taken on the amendments, because many hon. members who will not speak will vote as the party whip dictates.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) upon the stand that he took in this debate. He certainly had the courage of his convictions. I should also like to compliment the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore). There were many other members who spoke as they did and, in my opinion, placed the welfare of the country ahead of party considerations.

To me the taking of the plebiscite seems a most unwarranted evasion of government responsibility. This is very well borne out by an editorial appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press of November 25, 1941, headed "Election? Referendum?" I need not point out to the members that the Free Press is consistently a supporter of the King government, and I think I might almost say that they worship the Prime Minister ahead of almost anything else in this country. The editorial states:

> While few developments could be imagined which would compel an appeal to the Canadian people on issues arising from the war, there is nothing in present circumstances which make this either desirable or proper.
> If the government, which must accept full responsibility for military policy, is agreed upon the course that ought to be followed and can command the support of parliament, there is no need either for an election or referendum.
> This argument, we contend, holds good irrespective of the nature of the policy which the government may pursue. It rests upon the firm unchallengeable foundation that the parliament of Canada cannot be bound by anything which seeks to limit its power when the exercise of this power in a particular form is necessary for the effective protection of the country's highest interests and perhaps of its very existence.
> It is said that the people gave the members a mandate not to apply conscription. The accuracy of this statement can be questioned. The question was not in issue at the election of 1940 and consequently there was no registering of opinion for or against. But if it had been an issue and if a definite majority had rendered a decision one way or another on the basis of conditions as they existed at the moment of the election, the soundness of our contention would not be affected a whit.
> For this reason: Parliament is a sovereign body charged with the gravest responsibilities and vested with unlimited power to meet these responsibilities. If parliament, to meet emergent responsibilities as the result of new conditions, changes its policies, its action falls within the ambit of its duties and is therefore justified.

The contrary view derives from the theory that parliament operates with delegated powers and must keep within the limits of instructions given its members or engagements voluntarily offered by these members. Under this theory a member may be nothing higher than a jumping-jack operated by springs in the control of a local committee. This conception, pushed to its logical conclusion, destroys both the dignity and the power of parliament. The classic statement of the doctrine of the unrestricted sovereignty of parliament is that made by Burke to the electors of Bristol upon his election to parliament, November 3, 1774. His colleague, elected at the same time, having avowed himself subordinate to "instructions" from the electors—a question which had been discussed during the election contest—Burke took occasion to express his dissent and to assert the contrary view. His position was that a member of parliament was bound neither by the mandate of an election contest or by instructions transmitted to him by his constituents if in his judgment different counsels should determine policy.

Further on the editorial states:

If, therefore, the government and parliament are in agreement that a particular policy is necessary to the safety of the state, not only is an election not necessary but a resort to it could not but be injurious to the public interest.

An election could only be justified if a deadlock should develop in parliament making definite action of any kind impossible. An election would then become a desperate but inescapable expedient. The probability that any such state of affairs will develop at Ottawa is so remote that it is hardly worth considering.

The editorial goes on to assert the authority of parliament.

The Prime Minister, with his long list of broken pledges, probably more than those of any other prime minister of Canada, was going to reform the senate; he was going to close up the Bennett camps and provide employment for all the young men of this country. We all know what the young men in those camps did when they were closed. They had to ride the rods all across the dominion looking for employment.

During the last election campaign I personally listened to several radio broadcasts by the Prime Minister, and at no time did I hear him distinguish between conscription for overseas service and conscription. Throughout the whole campaign he said that, if he were returned to power, men would not be conscripted during this war. But since then we have had conscription for service in Canada. When young men were drafted for the thirty-day training period it was stated that they must be taught a sense of national obligation. I submit that where there is a lack of recognition in this respect it is solely the result of the policies of the Prime Minister over the past twenty-five years. In this connection may I quote a speech which he delivered in this house on foreign policy on March 30, 1939, as reported at page 2426 of Hansard:

One strategic fact is clear: the days of great expeditionary forces of infantry crossing the oceans are not likely to recur. Two years ago, I expressed in this house the view that it was extremely doubtful if any of the British dominions would ever send another expeditionary force to Europe.

One political fact is equally clear: in a war to save the liberty of others, and thus our own, we should not sacrifice our own liberty or our own unity. Planning and coordination would be essential, but the necessary coordination could be made, and if this government were in power it would be made, without sacrificing those vital ends and conditions of our existence. Profits could and would be rigidly controlled, and profiteering suppressed. But men's lives and men's wills cannot be put on the same basis as goods and profits. The present government believes that conscription of men for overseas service would not be a necessary or an effective step. Let me say that so long as this government may be in power, no such measure will be enacted.

The Prime Minister and certain of his lieutenants have preached this doctrine especially to the province of Quebec. Within the past few days we have had enunciations by Premier Godbout of Quebec, by the federal Minister of Justice, Mr. St. Laurent, who was elected yesterday, and by others, to the effect that the Prime Minister will never have conscription in this country. Again the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lizotte) stated in this house on February 5 last, as reported at page 367 of Hansard:

Personally, since the last war and consequently for the past twenty-five years, I have been opposed to any form of compulsory service for overseas. This way of thinking has been inculcated in me by the leaders of my party, who have persuaded me that Canada should be my first and foremost consideration. Laurier, King and Lapointe have always refused to entertain the idea of conscription for overseas service.

The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) is reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of December 20, 1941, as having spoken the night before in Winnipeg and opposed conscription. The report is headed "Crerar Opposes Conscription," and a subhead says "Does not believe it is" the best contribution Canada could make to win the war. The report goes on to say:

He expressed his disagreement with the request of the Canadian Legion for forty divisions in the army.

The Canadian Legion did not ask for this. The minister is reported to have been present with other members of the cabinet when the Canadian Legion presented their brief to the government last October. Therefore, why should he make that statement and misrepresent the Canadian Legion?

The Winnipeg Tribune, reporting the same speech, says:

Attempts have been made to show that proponents of an all-out war programme for Canada want to conscript vast numbers of soldiers at the expense of Canada's industrial effort. This is nonsense. Hon. T. A. Crerar was raising a straw man of his own making when he directed his arguments concerning conscription against this.

In particular, the Canadian Legion does not propose mobilization of Canadian man-power simply to increase the armed forces. It demands, rather, that mobilization of man-power should be undertaken immediately in order that our resources of man-power may be used for our needs, whether in the field of agriculture or industry or in the fighting services.

An editorial appeared in the Swan River Star, a paper which has supported on several occasions the election of Hon. T. A. Crerar in his riding of Churchill. It is rather lengthy, but it points out that if this government have not the conviction and resolution which are necessary, it is their plain duty to make way for men who have; that the responsibility is upon the government, and that a plebiscite at this time is ridiculous. In view of this statement, is the minister now going to campaign in Manitoba for conscription, or where does he stand on this issue?

The Hon. J. T. Thorson, who is Minister of National War Services and, I think, might at times be termed minister of political propaganda for this government, is reported in the Montreal Gazette of December 2, 1941, as having spoken against conscription and stated that it might decrease our war effort. On February 3 last, as reported in Hansard, page 264, Mr. Thorson said that our enlistments were "quite satisfactory." But according to the Winnipeg Free Press of February 4, military district No. 10 reports a sharp decline in recruiting in the past week, and that the previous Monday registered the lowest figures of any Monday since August, 1941.

Will the Minister of National War Services now campaign for conscription in Manitoba, or where does he stand in this matter?

Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, and one time Minister of National War Services, in a reconsecration week broadcast, on September 12, 1941, said:

We can muster a million men for our armed forces, and still have seven million people over sixteen years of age left in Canada. These seven million, properly organized and determined to stand behind the armed forces, can operate all our farms, our factories and places of business in a manner which will give us the production required.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

May I add that on the basis of Canada's armed forces in the last great war we should have, according to population to-day, in the present war approximately one million men in the armed forces.

Hon. J. L. Ralston, Minister of National Defence, speaking in this chamber on November 5, 1941, as reported in Hansard on page 4415, stated that there was a definite falling off of enlistments:

. . . in the last four months . . . we have asked for 37,000 odd, and something over 24,000 have actually enlisted.

On January 30, during this session, as reported at page 183 of Hansard, the minister again implies that there is now a great need of man-power in the country. His remarks occurred during a speech by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker).

Why, Mr. Speaker, are all these diverse views expressed by four different ministers of Canada's war cabinet at this particular time?

When Mr. Churchill recently introduced his man-power bill in the British House of Commons extending compulsion to men up to fifty-one years of age, and to women, for the auxiliary forces, he said:

The crisis of equipment is largely over and an ever-broadening flow is now assured. The crisis of man-power and woman-power is at hand and will dominate the year 1942. This crisis comes upon us for the following reasons:

The great supply plants have largely been constructed; they are finished: they must be staffed.

We must maintain the powerful mobile armies we have created with so much pains, both for home defence and foreign expeditions.

Mr. Roosevelt says that the United States needs men. This, in contrast to the argument to which we listened from the previous speaker. Speaking in Boston in October, 1940, he said:

And while I am talking to you, fathers and mothers, I give you one more assurance—I have said this before but I shall say it again and again. Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign war.

Let me now quote from the Winnipeg Free Press a statement by President Roosevelt in the course of his speech to congress of January 6:

"We shall carry the attack."

We cannot wage this war in a defensive spirit. As our power and our resources are fully mobilized, we shall carry the attack against the enemy—we shall hit him and hit him again wherever and whenever we can reach him.

We must keep him far from our shores, for we intend to bring this battle to him on his own home grounds.

American armed forces must be used at any place in the world where it seems advisable to engage the forces of the enemy. In some cases these operations will be defensive, in order to protect key positions. In other cases, these operations will be offensive, in order to strike at the common enemy, with a view to his complete encirclement and eventual total defeat.

American armed forces will be on all the oceans—helping to guard the essential communications which are vital to the united nations.

American land and air and sea forces will take stations in the British isles—which constitute an essential fortress in this world struggle.

Those forces, Mr. Speaker, have now taken their place in the British isles. In this connection, imagine the enemy invading New York or Seattle with an eye to coming to Canada: in our present position we could not send our forces across the line to assist the United States. To me this, at the present period in the war, is a most ridiculous state of affairs.

On November 10 last I spoke in this chamber, as reported in Hansard, page 4210 requesting the government immediately to put into effect national selective service for agriculture, industry and the fighting forces. I asked for that, in view of the progress of the war up to that particular time. I also asked that such service should be applicable to any theatre of war. Yet members of parliament are still asked to shirk their duty on this great issue, and at the same time the uninformed public of this country are to be requested to vote on a meaningless plebiscite. In this connection I ran across a letter in the Ottawa Journal of January 30, which is a striking indication of what the government may expect from the people of this country if the plebiscite is taken. It reads as follows:

I saw a picture in your paper the other day of Hon. Mr. Dunning congratulating his son on getting his wings. His pride in his boy struck me, because I have sons too. I can share his pride—and his anxiety.

But I don't know whether, when the decisive moment comes, I shall have the heart to vote thousands of fine young Canadian boys into this war when I think of the slaughter in Russia—the end of everything in this life for millions.

Or whether I shall remember Dunning and Churchill and vote so that I shall not be afraid to look them in the eye.

The Journal comments:

The damnable thing about this plebiscite on compulsory service is that thousands of mothers and fathers will be asked to make a similarly pathetic choice, to make it without guidance from the men who have been elected as leaders of the people in a terrific world mess, to make it without clear knowledge of the appalling facts.

Evading the decision, many will doubtless refrain from voting at all—and by that very lack of action indirectly instruct Mr. Mackenzie King under no circumstances to put compulsory service into effect.

I admit, sir, that I am greatly concerned at what may happen at that time. It may be difficult to get out a large percentage of the voters. It must be remembered that at election time, in spite of the tremendous amount of money which is expended and the great efforts which are put forth by the various parties, little over fifty per cent of the voters can be got out. How in the world are we going to obtain an all-out intelligent expression of opinion, by people who are uninformed, at a time like that? I feel very keenly that we as members of parliament are shirking our duty in this respect. We have yet in this country a party government prosecuting the war, a government returned under what is, in my opinion, an antiquated electoral system whereby fifty-three per cent of the electors who voted returned over 180 members out of 245.

The Prime Minister himself was elected in his riding by a minority of the votes cast. Patronage is still rampant at this stage of the war, no matter what some members may say in that regard. Only yesterday, February 9, an appointment was made in my constituency by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) on the recommendation of the defeated government candidate in that constituency. I am of the opinion that we should have a parliamentary investigation into the Department of Munitions and Supply. Very serious charges were made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) almost a year ago concerning the Winnipeg cordite plant, but an investigation has been refused. Just the other day it was announced by the Minister of Munitions and Supply that the policy in future would be that further contracts would not be announced to the public, and the manner in which huge sums of money will be spent will be unknown to the people—a most unsatisfactory state of affairs.

The Truman report submitted to the congress of the United States on January 15 is a most interesting parallel to what might be brought to light in this country. Hundreds of millions of dollars of government money is given in the way of capital assistance to industry, ninety per cent of it in Ontario and Quebec, and this has greatly intensified economic difficulties throughout the rest of Canada. In my opinion, industry should be spread throughout Canada, especially when the taxpayers of the country are putting up the money to assist these industries.

Let me say a word about agriculture. As we are all aware, last week about 440 Saskatchewan farmers spent a couple of days in this capital city. They came here armed with great petitions asking for a parity price for wheat. I need not remind hon. members that, along with all other members on this side of the house, I have consistently, ever since the outbreak of the war, advocated a parity price for all agricultural products. Certainly with a profit guaranteed industry and with the present status of wages guaranteed organized labour, on the basis of equity, agriculturists are entitled to a parity price. I am also satisfied that something must be done about agricultural help for farms in many sections of the country. There are many deplorable cases at the present time. The present haphazard way of calling men for the draft is unsound and uneconomical from the nation's point of view, and in many instances it causes a real hardship for many older people on the farms at this time. There must also be developed a plan for agriculture in this country —something which to-day is lacking.

I trust that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will in the very near future announce a policy and a price for the 1942 wheat crop so that the farmers can begin planning their 1942 operations. The Minister of Agriculture stated this afternoon that there were certain difficulties in the way while the debate was going on on the speech from the throne. I would point out that a vast amount of business has been done in the last two or three years by order in council, and I am not so sure that, under this policy enunciated, a good deal of business will not be done by order in council while the house is sitting, as was done a year ago this spring. There is therefore nothing to prevent an announcement of the proposed policy for these people in order that they may begin planning for the coming year, and when we could debate it at a later stage.

Mr. GARDINER: I have already announced, in view of the criticisms of last year, it is the intention this year to bring the whole policy down by way of legislation.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am pleased to have that answer from the minister. We have certainly made some headway.

Mr. PERLEY: When?

Mr. GARDINER: It was announced a month ago.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): There is one other item I wish to refer to. I was impressed by the speech delivered last evening by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman). I was interested in her argument with regard to the plight of old age pensioners in Canada. I was greatly disappointed when last fall the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) laid out his plans for the cost of living bonus for certain other people in the country, that something was not done for these pensioners. It is unfair to expect these old people to live decently on $20 a month at this time. They are entitled to a dollar a day. I think they should be given better consideration. Many of these people were pioneers and have done a great deal to help to develop the country. In old age they find themselves bereft of the savings which they may have laid by for the evening of life, and in my opinion the state should give them some consideration. I hope the government will see their way to do more for these people during this session.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Every member who has risen in his place to take part in this debate has done so, I am sure, with a great sense of responsibility; for the course of events which will shape the destiny of the whole world may come within the next few months. The future of the people of Canada depends to so large a degree upon the realization which Canadians have of the danger to Canada itself, and it depends upon the way we go as Canadians to meet the danger.

War at the present time is world war. It started with the flickering lights of a small beer parlour putsch, but the conflagration which is now spreading the whole world over has assumed gigantic proportions, greater than those of any war at any other time in the world's history. To-day it is not a war of nation against nation; it is a war of the peoples of the world against a new imperialism, an imperialism whose heart, or core, or nucleus, so to speak, is centred in Germany. In German imperialism, then, within this heart, this nucleus, lies the plan for world domination over all peoples and all races.

Democracy, that overworked word, which apparently means many things to many people, is threatened from every point of view. However you look at it, whatever it means to you, it is threatened by this new imperialism. In times of great danger the thoughts of people instinctively turn to methods of escape. In a forest fire the animals do not stop to fight among themselves; you will find the panther and the deer running side by side, the coyote and the rabbit doing the same. To-day, in this world fire which threatens the nations, there is no time for any groups, or people with different ideas, to stop and quarrel among themselves about what should be done. We are different from animals; we do not flee from this world conflagration; we turn to fight it. But to-day it means that people holding different ideals must, for the time being, forget their own particular aims and interests, and turn and unitedly fight the fire which threatens them. There is a realization by all groups and classes, all religions and all creeds in Canada to-day, that our existence as a nation is threatened. I believe also that there is a growing unity in this nation, becoming stronger as the weeks and months pass, and a determination to make this a national effort in a measure that it has never yet been.

There is no time now for recriminations over the past. There is no time for us to quarrel or discuss among ourselves who is responsible for the present state of affairs. There is no time for us to argue as to whose fault it is that German imperialism to-day has the strength and power which it has. The job of every man or woman is to get into his or her place to fight it. Mr. Churchill himself has expressed that idea very neatly—he is perhaps the world's greatest phrase-maker. He said not very long ago:

> There is no time for the present to quarrel with the past, lest there may be no future.

I have said that I believe unity to-day is growing in Canada, and the results we heard last night of the by-elections tend to prove that to-day there is realization by the Canadian people of need for greater unity in this country. Our differences of racial origin or creed or politics are small compared with the national danger. To-day we must think as a nation and not as members of any one small group to which in the past we may particularly have adhered.

It is true that on the issue of conscription there are differences of long standing; deep-seated differences. But there is such need for understanding now that Canada's position is different from what it has ever been in past wars. If I had my way I should like to banish that word "conscription" from our vocabulary, because of its past associations. It is a word which has been used for petty political purposes, and thereby a stigma is attached to it in the eyes of some of our people. Instead of using that word, why not speak of democratic mobilization? Conscription, after all, is a democratic means whereby men can be rallied and put together in a fighting cause.

Might I use a very homely illustration? Some years ago a farmer asked me if I knew anything about hogs. I did not know a great deal, but I said, "Well, maybe a little." He said, "Could you tell me why it is that in winter time when the little hogs are let loose to run around the fields they go and burrow into the sides of the straw stack?" as they do sometimes in western Canada. I thought that was quite simple, and I answered glibly enough, "To keep themselves warm." The old farmer smiled a little and said, "I am afraid you do not know much about little hogs. Each little hog burrows into the side of the straw stack to keep himself warm. One little hog going in alone would not keep himself warm, but if fifteen little hogs get into the straw stack each burrowing into it for the purpose of keeping himself warm, the heat which is generated from them all keeps them warm."

It is a long way from little hogs to nations, but I would say to-day, Why is America fighting? She is fighting to defend herself. Why is China fighting? To defend herself. Australia? To defend herself. The people of the U.S.S.R.? To defend themselves. The people of the British isles? To defend themselves. The people of Canada? To defend themselves. And the twenty-six United Nations, who to-day have joined in this pact, are all motivated by the same desire, to protect themselves as nations from the menace which threatens the world. Alone any one nation to-day would be powerless before the onslaught of German imperialism. We have seen the small nations of the world try to stand alone. But if we, along with the other twenty-five nations of the world, put everything we have into the fight, the power which is generated by all of us will be sufficient to rid the world forever from the menace of imperialism.

Optimism is a good thing, but false optimism does not help a nation to get on its feet and make its best effort. Not long ago Mr. Churchill, when he spoke in the chamber of the house of representatives in the United States, warned them. He said that the power of the enemy is immense, that Hitler still has control of the greatest accumulation of weapons, equipment and supplies that has ever been gathered under one command. The German production of aluminum and magnesium, two metals essential for both aircraft construction and incendiary bombs, was greater than the combined production of Britain, the United States and Canada right up to the end of 1941. It might be interesting to quote the figures which have recently been presented by the United States bureau of mines, giving an estimate of the amounts of various minerals which are controlled by Germany through her control of Europe at the end of 1941. Germany controls 47 per cent of the world's total coal output, 44 per cent of pig-iron, 46 per cent of iron ore, 27·5 per cent of manganese ore, 10 per cent of chromite, 11 per cent of tungsten, 2·5 per cent of nickel, 7 per cent of copper, 33 per cent of zinc, 25 per cent of lead, 19 per cent of antimony, 50 per cent of bauxite, 47·5 per cent of aluminum, 66 per cent of magnesium, 42 per cent of mercury and 7 per cent of molybdenite. These are the figures for Europe only, besides which Japan has big ore industries and huge stocks of strategic materials. She has recently seized territory rich in oil, tin, tungsten and other materials.

When I think of this question which at the present time is so paramount in the minds of Canadians as to whether or not we shall have democratic mobilization or, in other words, conscription, I feel that the French-speaking people of our nation, because of past associations, would have a right to question it, if they have not realized the difference in the world situation to-day. I would have agreed with them during the last war and other wars that it would be better not to have conscription. But to-day the French-speaking people of Canada must realize that they are not being asked to go and defend Australia, they are not being asked to give their sons to die for China, they are not being asked to have their sons conscripted to go to foreign soil to die for the sake of communism; or—something which perhaps to them is just as abhorrent—British imperialism. The French-speaking people of Canada are to-day asked to realize the grave necessity which may arise. Although to-day the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) filled us with hope that perhaps the present voluntary system will carry us some time further, yet the French-Canadian people must realize that there may come a time when their sons may have to agree to a form of conscription, democratic enlistment, for the defence of Canada, even if they have to go outside the shores of this country to defend Canada. The loyalty of the French-Canadian people is second to none in Canada. They have a history of which we are all proud, whether we speak their tongue or not. In the years which have passed, their contribution to Canada has been marvellous and magnificent. They would be betraying their splendid past if they did not realize to-day that the necessity may come for their sons to go beyond our shores to defend the soil of the Canada they love so much.

I believe some French-speaking members in the house, including the hon. members who sit to my left, have agreed that they, and others of their nationality, would be pleased to have their sons defend the shores of Canada. But are we going to wait until the shipyards, factories and railways of British Columbia are smashed and completely gone? Are we going to wait until the ancient and beautiful city of Quebec is a smouldering mass of ruins? What then could a little nation of eleven million people hope to do to defend the soil of Canada? It may be necessary for these French-Canadian sons, the same as Anglo-Saxon, Ukrainian and all other sons of Canada to go outside our shores. We may have to conscript them. But let them realize that, if this becomes necessary, it is done to protect the soil of Canada which contains their past and which alone holds the key to their future.

I believe that if the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), recently elected, during his election campaign had spoken a little more definitely to the people of French Canada, and had told them that in future it may be necessary to go outside our shores, he would have done a greater service to Canada. Following his election campaign, I noted that he made very little mention of the fact that we may have to adopt that kind of conscription. Had he been just a little more truthful with the French-speaking people I believe they would have appreciated the changed situation, and would have gained a greater knowledge of the necessity for their uniting with other Canadians.

Hon. members know perfectly well that I am no defender of government policy. I never have been—not since I have been a member of the house. As I have seen it, government policy has been disastrous for many of those whom I represent. Yet I realize that the plebiscite represents an attempt on the part of the government to preserve the unity of Canada and to give the French-speaking people an opportunity to realize the difference between conditions to-day and those of the past. It has tried through the plebiscite to bring about a recognition of this changed situation. Because of that, I support the idea of the plebiscite. I support it because I feel it is in the greatest interest of all Canadians that we should have the government free, should necessity arise, democratically to take the young men of Canada and, if necessary, place them outside the shores of our country for the defence of our homeland.

The sooner the plebiscite can be taken, the greater safety we shall be able to attain. I would certainly hope that during the Easter recess members of the house would go out among French-Canadian people and try to make the issue clear to them. I would urge them to do that, so that we may have a one hundred per cent affirmative reply to the question of the plebiscite, a reply united from one side of Canada to the other.

Reference was made to-day by the Minister of National Defence to General McNaughton's visit to Canada. I cannot imagine anything which could be of greater value to General McNaughton than to be able to return to England and say to the Canadian boys over there, "Canada is solidly, one hundred per cent behind you and has expressed by its reply to the plebiscite its readiness to relieve the government of past commitments and to go along with the government, if needs be, in what must be done in the future. Canada is ready to stand beside you." If General McNaughton were able to take back that message, he would certainly have something that Canadian boys in England would be glad to hear.

Perhaps because I am a woman I look at things from a practical viewpoint, but I have some thoughts I should like to place before hon. members. These days we hear a great deal about unity. Hon. members rise in their places and talk about unity. Many appeals are being made to our people for unity. Any father or mother must know that example is better than precept. There is no use in telling your son not to smoke cigarettes if you are smoking a pipe; it is no use for a mother to tell her daughter that she must not drink and smoke if the mother drinks and smokes herself. I say that we, as representatives, should set an example for the people of Canada. Here we have an opportunity greater than we have ever had to show our people that their representatives in the House of Commons are united.

Last night hon. members sitting on the benches of the official opposition received a definite understanding as to whether or not the people were agreeable to the acceptance of their proposals. Would it not be a worthy gesture on the part of the official opposition to take a leaf out of Wendell Willkie's book, a man who was an American first and a Republican second. Could you not be Canadians first and Conservatives second? In deference to the ideal of unity and for the sake of setting an example to the people of Canada, could you not at this time withdraw your amendment? Could you not do that? It would be a great thing not only for you but for the whole of Canada, were you able to do it.

There is also a subamendment, with which I consider that ninety per cent of the people in the country are in agreement. I agree with it, and I believe many hon. members on the government benches, at least to some extent, agree with the proposals contained therein. We know that to carry on this vast war effort we must enlist the material wealth of the nation. We have to take it, if it is necessary to do so. I am going to make another proposal, and I trust it may not be misunderstood by those of my friends in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group. The people of Canada know that the subamendment has been moved; they know its contents. If hon. members in the C.C.F. group would make a similar gesture and drop their sub-amendment, not with the idea of giving up for one second the principles embodied therein but for the sake of unity, they would be acting for the benefit of the whole nation. I would say to my hon. friends in that group and to those in the Social Credit group, that we who sit in this block will continue to fight to see that wealth is used as it should be used, for the benefit of all. We can do that specifically every time a bill involving the wealth of the nation is brought before the house. Would it not be a worthwhile gesture, so that this first motion of the session might be passed unanimously on all sides, if both the amendment and the subamendment for the time being might be withdrawn? It would be an example.

The most important point in the speech from the throne was the need for increased production, so that the people of Britain and the Soviet Union may have all the material required when the spring offensive is made, as we all expect it will be made, as soon as the weather is sufficiently mild.

To-day there is a realization that in connection with production it is the brains of the ordinary men and women who work in our factories, our mines and our mills; it is their initiative and their cooperation which alone can speed up production and bring it to the peak of one hundred per cent perfection. No one knows better than the men who are on the job what should be done. I have been receiving communications and resolutions from various trade union bodies. It is apparent that in their own particular factories they are undertaking to devise ways and means whereby a greater output can be accomplished. If only the labour forces of this country could be granted a little more of the partnership idea with industry in production, I feel convinced that production would go up by leaps and bounds.

To-day labour is asking for partnership with industry in production, not because labour is demanding merely on its own behalf a share of what the pickings might be, far from it, but because the men and women who form our labour forces realized long ago the danger of fascism. They started to fight it long before this government ever took up the case of democracy against fascism. These men and women who work are anxious to have partnership with industry in production. They are asking that they be given this because it is by that means alone that production can really be brought to its maximum.

I know that in many instances industry is afraid to give certain rights and privileges to labour because it might interfere with its profits, with its way of looking after industry.

But surely the time has come when the leaders of industry in Canada must realize that in war time nothing is run as usual. Life does not go on as usual; business does not go on as usual. They must make adjustments the same as the working people.

In Kirkland Lake a decision was recently arrived at by the miners that they would go back to the mines. For weeks these miners have been obeying to the very letter the laws of this country, but they have been demanding that they have union recognition. The government has taken the stand of being neither for one side nor for the other; in reality that is nothing but a policy of appeasement to the gold-mine owners. Other workers in steel and other industries realized the importance of the fight going on in Kirkland Lake, and they threatened further strikes in sympathy with the miners there. Rather than see industry throughout Canada dislocated, the miners of Kirkland Lake decided to go back to the mines. They have set an example; they have created a precedent; they have negated their own particular wishes and desires and rights because they valued first our national war effort. That is an example, not only to labour itself but to industry. It should be realized that our national needs come before the needs of any one particular group.

If labour could be given a greater share in planning production and in helping to make it efficient, things would go better. Instead, we have these dollar-a-year men who are able to direct the production of this country. The senate defence committee at Washington, after an investigation lasting one year, reported that the dollar-a-year men in that country were still working in the interests of their employers. Evidence from the trade unions in Canada would indicate that the same thing is happening here. Instead of having these dollar-a-year men in key positions with the interests of their employers constantly before their minds rather than the interests of the nation at large, if we could set up a new ministry of production to coordinate production in all the various branches of industry we might have production which was really in the best interests of Canada's war effort instead of a production controlled by any one group. So much for the labour forces.

What of the farmer? It does not seem that the delegation which came to Ottawa has received a great deal of attention. I know, however, that all hon. members were aware that it came here. I noticed in the Ottawa Citizen of January 31 a small item in Mr. Bishop's column. I know Mr. Bishop usually writes a good résumé of what goes on in the house, but I could not help taking exception to one sentence which he had at the end of a small paragraph dealing with this delegation. He said:

> The wheat farmer has the idea that other farmers, not to mention war industry, are doing well and they want to get in on it.

There never was a greater lie spoken about the western wheat farmer than that. As a group they have carried on magnificently in the face of the greatest hardships. They have never counted the cost or the loss to themselves but have gone on contributing in such ways as they could because they believed it was their duty to do so. In coming here to ask for parity prices, they did so, not because of any desire to get in on the pickings but because they realized that unless they could get parity prices for their products, they would not be in position to give as much to this war effort as they wanted to.

The production of food is coming more to the fore. Quite often I receive a little leaflet from the United States entitled, "Facts for Farmers", and published monthly by the Farm Research in New York. In this particular copy there is an article which outlines the tremendous increase in food production which is planned by the United States. I quote:

> The administrator of the surplus marketing administration, Roy F. Hendrickson, recently declared in Georgia:
> "The reasons for this increased production—of nearly everything outside cotton, wheat and tobacco—are growing. British needs are increasing; Russian needs are coming significantly into the picture. Domestic requirements are expanding. On top of all this, the place of reserves, of stockpiles ready for areas now conquered, when they can cast off Hitler's stranglehold, are being seen more clearly—a staggering total."
> The SMA administrator cautioned against complacency and added:
> "Many persons have come to assume that, these goals will be attained. Instead, a very real possibility exists that we will fall short of many of them—even though food production and marketings next crop year will be the largest in our history.
> As the need for farmstuffs increases, the shift from the former policy of reduction to the policy of all-out production will become more marked. In England bonus plans have been adopted to encourage greater farm production. Though the President recommended such a policy six months ago and congress appropriated one and a quarter billion dollars for this purpose, only a few programmes of this sort have yet been formulated."

When this government begins to realize the contribution which the farmers of our country can make toward victory, then we shall be taking another step forward in this great effort of ours.

It is said, and I suppose it is true, that the allies are making broadcasts to the people of the conquered nations of Europe. Suppose you were one of these people, maybe a person living in France, Belgium or one of the Scandinavian countries, or in the city of Vienna, and that you loathed the hated axis forces and their domination over your country. Maybe you were a factory worker and had work within your hands day by day which you knew was important. Suppose over the short-wave you heard the voice of the allies speaking to you, and that voice said, "People of the conquered countries, do what you can to sabotage the war effort of Germany. If you are a factory worker, see what you can do to impede and restrict the factory production. If you will do this, if you will help to overthrow the axis powers, the allies will help you afterwards to establish freedom and democracy." Oh, I know that would be a fine thing. I remember the days when I was pretty hungry, yet all the time I never lost my idealism for freedom and democracy. No. But suppose you were hungry and one of the conquered peoples of Europe, and that over the short-wave you heard the voice of the allies calling to you and saying, "People of the conquered countries, do what you can to impede and restrict and halt the war effort of the nazis. Do what you can to sabotage their plans. Help the allies to win, and as soon as the allies have won, before we even take our armies away from your country, we will load our boats down to the water line with food for you. We will send you good wheat to make white bread, and we will send you red meat and eggs and bacon and sugar and all the other foods that you need." You know, Mr. Speaker, the instinct of self-preservation is the strongest instinct that lives in man or woman, and they will do much to eat and to give food to their starving children. If we can build up surpluses of food within this nation and have them ready to give to these people when they are ready to help overthrow the regime which now occupies their country, we would have a weapon in our hands and, think of it, the most marvellous weapon any country could have or any people could have, a weapon which would bring life instead of death.

We need the planned production of food. I know that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has a good head on him. I would not deny it; he must have, to be able to fool the farmers all these years and get away with it. But, on the basis that two heads are better than one, I would say to him that the time has come when we should have a gathering of all the farm bodies in Canada. Let them plan. Let them know what the requirements of Britain are going to be. Let us correlate our plans for food production with the plans of the United States. Let us see that in this western hemisphere we build up huge stocks of food which will be a weapon for victory in our hands and help us to bring the peace we so much desire.

But, we are told, there is no money for that. I say, Mr. Speaker, that there must be money for these things. They are essential, just as essential as are the munitions which the armed forces need. Not only are they necessary for the people of the conquered countries, but we need increased food production for our own people. If we are to keep healthy and strong our industrial army, we must see that we have no rationing but plenty of everything that is needed for them.

Not only in the production of food should something be done. Plans should also be made to see if the farmers of this country could perhaps go into some other branches of farming which might be necessary at this time. I do not know to what degree the United States has gone ahead with the production of synthetic rubber, but I believe that already some of the states are going ahead with it. To what degree could our Canadian farmers grow dandelions or sow-thistles? Many of them have plenty of these weeds already, and, if synthetic rubber can be made from these weeds, would it not be well to give our farmers a chance to develop that production?

Then there are the soya bean and various other crops to which our farmers could turn in a time of crisis like this, besides going ahead with their ordinary routine. Every day it becomes more evident that Australia may be cut off from us. I know that silk stockings are very nice to wear and to look at, but we can do without them. In this country, however, we cannot do without woollen clothes. There, again, is something our farmers could turn to—increase their flocks of sheep. These are only a few things because, in a speech of a general nature such as this, I have not the time to go into details. But were we to have a conference of all the farm bodies in Canada, I believe that a comprehensive plan could be worked out which would give our farmers the feeling of really belonging to the war effort, and which would place in our hands a weapon for victory.

There is the question of labour. That question comes up whenever one thinks of agriculture. Perhaps there is a solution of that problem. I know already that high school and university students are again going to help in the fruit-picking areas. I would suggest that in certain areas the boys in the army might also go out and help. After all is said and done, I have heard that in many areas the boys are fed up with being restricted to their routine bit of drill and so on, and at certain times of the year they certainly could and would enjoy helping in some farm operations.

There is the question of women. I have been reading recently quite a little about the women's land army in Britain during the last war and in this war. I am convinced that women could help to fill the demand for farm labour. I have been very much disappointed myself to find that my services cannot be accepted with the armed forces. It is too bad, but I happen to have three children, and because I have three children I cannot go into one of the women's services. Personally, I think that is one of the most idiotic regulations ever made by men. There are numbers of women whose children could be cared for very well and whose services could be used in our war effort. But I would suggest that, since that avenue is closed to me, it might be possible for me to devote some of my time and energy to organizing and mobilizing a women's general service corps. There are a thousand and one things that women could be doing right here and now to release young men for the armed forces and for other work. Take the staffs of the various large hotels in the cities, for instance; street-car conductors, drivers of delivery vans, milk trucks, grocery and vegetable vans. The women are doing this work in Britain, and they could do it here just as well. Women could also be sent to various farm areas to help milk the cows, make cheese, drive tractors and combines, and help with other farm work. Mobilize these women. Give them a strong, sensible, useful sort of uniform and let them do the job that they are anxious and willing to do.

I called up a little while ago and found out that applications to enter the Canadian Women's Army Corps number around 19,000, and yet we have only about 3,200 in uniform. There are hundreds and hundreds of other women who could be mobilized into a general service corps and who would be ready to work so that men could be released for other services. Many a young married woman could, shall we say, drive a delivery van in the morning in the city and go out for a certain number of hours. Maybe she has children, but they could be taken care of. Some of the older women, perhaps some of the wives of the pensionless ex-service men, could be given a job and the children could be kept in a pleasant place for a few hours and minded while their mothers went out to work. If we are going to have total war, let us have it. Do not dally with it any longer. The women of the nation are ready. Let us give them something to work at, and if my services can be used in the mobilization of such a women's service corps I shall be only too pleased.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt, but the hon. member's time is up. She can proceed only with the unanimous consent of the house. I take it that unanimous consent is given.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

There is one other thing which is of great importance and cannot be neglected, and that is the health of our people. I have spoken of this before, but again it is necessary and must be mentioned. I have no idea as to what standing committees are to be set up, but I shall feel that this government has seriously neglected one particular branch of war service if it does not appoint a standing committee on health. There never was a time when such a committee was more necessary. We learn from the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) himself that on any one day in Canada alone fifty thousand industrial workers are not in their places in the machine shops, the factories and elsewhere, because of sickness; and, according to him, the number of man working days lost through industrial accidents and sickness in 1941 came to the startling total of over seventeen million. We could set up factory clinics, we could have more health services, but only if a committee is formed and we have a government ready to get this thing started. It is such a waste of time, of man-power, of energy, to have our people lying sick at home when, but for the lack of a little medical care, or maybe a little better food, they could be at their benches or their desks, in the mines or at the shops, contributing what they have to give.

There were several figures I wished to quote with regard to national health, but as time is passing I shall have to reserve them until another occasion. One point which, however, I cannot omit is the necessity of the government not only setting up clinics but seeing that a health committee of this house is started to definitely find ways and means of giving our people medical attention and suitable food, for food is a very necessary part of maintaining health. I think we should see to it also, before this session closes, that minimum wage laws are passed applicable to the whole length and breadth of this country. Such legislation would particularly benefit the underpaid workers in the province of Quebec, lifting them to the general level of the rest of Canada, improving their health and their morale, and perhaps helping to cement that feeling of unity which to-day is just a little strained.

Just one further remark on the subject of unity. We still have discrimination against some of the minority peoples. There is much I should like to say on this matter, but time will not permit. We have in this country a group of Ukrainians who are sympathetic to their Ukrainian brethren who to-day are fighting one of the finest battles the world has ever known. Yet this group within our country has had eighty-six of its halls confiscated and some of them have been sold to another group of Ukrainians who have been misled for years by leaders sympathetic to Hitler and German imperialism. It does not seem logical or even possible that such things can still be. If the Ukrainian Labour Farm Temple association had back its eighty-six halls, it could carry on great activity in support of the whole war effort. Already these people have contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars to war charities. Give them their halls and the opportunity to carry on entertainments and other activities and they will render a contribution which we shall be very glad to receive. It is ghastly to think that these people are denied the ordinary privileges and rights of citizens when they are sympathetic to an ally whom we recognize to-day, that they are still under the ban in this country and are called disloyal and unpatriotic, and are not allowed even to have their own property. It is almost unbelievable.

I wish to refer to another matter related to rallying and keeping people in this country united in the national effort. This morning I visited the spokesman of the men who are interned in the Hull gaol. I read the other day a reference to a very interesting item in the New York Times. It is short, and I should like hon. members to listen attentively while I read this report:

> The New York Times correspondent in Singapore reports that communist party leaders, "just released from prison," attended a public mobilization meeting there, and that the party will have ten of the sixty members on the mobilization council. Newsweek reveals that up to the outbreak of war in the far east, the party was illegal, "and every week members were caught and sentenced to six months' hard labour." Now, Newsweek says, "without any legal rectification, the communists are welcomed as loyal supporters of the British cause," and manifestos for an all-out war are published by them in the local papers.
> It can be suggested that the readiness of the Singapore authorities to welcome the co-operation of the communists is a measure of the gravity of the Malayan situation. If this is so, it may also be suggested that the Canadian government's refusal to welcome the communists' assistance indicates the Ottawa authorities' unwillingness to do everything that can be done to mobilize this country for victory.

The Canadian Seamen's union is trying to enlist six thousand young seamen to go into the merchant marine—a dangerous and difficult job, for which a young man needs to be well versed in the ways of the sea. The union is not having all the success it would like in obtaining these six thousand men, and I will tell you why—because the president of the union is interned in the Hull gaol. If he were free, I should like to guarantee to hon. members that this man Sullivan could recruit six thousand men for the merchant marine. If this is an all-out war effort, you cannot afford to neglect the help of any single man or woman who is ready to do something to enlist the sympathies of the people.

In the camp at Hull there are some young French-speaking Canadians who would be willing to go out and rally their own people; but there they are, making trinkets, doing little odd jobs to keep themselves amused, while this country has to keep them in idleness and support their wives and children. It is almost unbelievable that to-day the government persists in a policy of that kind.

I have overstepped my time considerably, but I cannot help stressing, in conclusion, that if the government wants to keep up the morale of the Canadian people it must enlist all the people and give them their chance to work in this war effort. It must satisfy the men in the armed forces that their fathers and mothers, their wives and children are being taken care of. I should like at this time to support the plea which was made the other evening by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman) on behalf of old age pensioners. It is the government's duty to satisfy our Canadian soldiers that the cause for which they fight means that their wives and children will live in a better world. So much can be done to improve morale if the help and sympathy of all kinds of Canadian people, irrespective of creed or politics, is secured. This government can unite Canada, as no government has ever been able to do, for the greatest effort which she can make. I say to them, if you will let the people have an opportunity to fight this war and win it, not only will the people of Canada fight and win the war, but they will build a land wherein every man shall live in security, with freedom, and in perpetual peace.

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, there is little need for me to take up the time of this house in congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. That has already been done very capably. This house has been treated to oratory, both English and French, in almost the grand manner, and it is something in this modern world when so many people are articulate. I can only record my appreciation of the way in which the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) conducted themselves.

Before, however, I turn to the serious matters confronting this house, perhaps I might be permitted to spend a moment in paying tribute to a great Canadian. It has already been the melancholy task of certain hon. members to recall the memory of the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. I take liberty of associating myself with their sentiments, and to them I would add the thought that when the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe was in this house, members were in the presence of greatness. It was a greatness based upon courage and faith; for, as Cicero says, a man of courage is also full of faith. Our late colleague was such a man. His courage was ever equal to the problem before him. Let us emulate that courage. Let us each possess such a brave heart; for victories are won, not by shining armour, but by brave hearts.

Turning to the business that has been occupying this house now for many days, the discussion of the speech from the throne, I would throw out this observation with regard to a fact that seems to have escaped perhaps some hon. members. We have been regaled by many, many speeches, the contents of which, if hon. members will recall, have been mostly about conscription. I am wondering whether many of these speeches had not been prepared some time in advance, with the notion of springing them on the house and stirring up a hurricane round that word conscription; then when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) brought down his plan for a plebiscite, these hon. gentlemen had been caught slightly short, and rather than prepare new speeches they decided to continue on their predetermined way. That they are not without selfish motives is beside the issue; that they are obscuring the trend of this debate is hardly to be denied. But, then, clarity of our public issues does not mean the same to all men. I suggest to the house that the reiterated arguments about compulsion for overseas service cover, as the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said this afternoon, only a small part, and a very small part of the problem of our maximum national support of our war effort. Indeed, it is not too much to say that such arguments cover but a relatively unimportant part of the whole problem.

The object of the hon. members who have been so vociferously eloquent in their arguments is quite clear. They want to thrust their way through, and in the confusion that might arise some of them might gain places on the treasury benches. It is a time-worn argument and a time-worn device, but by grace of the wise leadership of the Prime Minister and the government of Canada, it has been frustrated in such a thoroughgoing manner that the hon. gentlemen, I am sure, must to-day be quite furious, because yesterday the people of Quebec and Ontario spoke. They have spoken in no uncertain manner.

It is a just punishment to those who would put obstacles in the way of our total war effort; for that is exactly what this hullabaloo about conscription for overseas service is doing. By pushing such arguments into the forefront of discussion in this house, and thus into the forefront of newspaper columns and the forefront of discussion in the humble homes all across this great Dominion of Canada, the entire thinking of the country is being shunted on to a side-track and away from the main issue; and that is exactly what hon. gentlemen wish to have done. They want to gain by the discord—the Meighens, the Hepburns, the Drews, and that long list that one could put upon the pages of Hansard.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us put this matter in its proper perspective, and that will be done by calling the attention of hon. members to various documents. In the first place, may I refer to a speech made before the Canadian club in London, Ontario, recently by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton), one of the new members of this house. He drew attention to that benighted word "conscription." He said:

> The word conscription has come to be identified with compulsory overseas service, and the discussion of conscription in this sense tends to concentrate attention on that feature of our war effort to the exclusion of everything else. I suggest that the word should not even be used. It has become a symbol, or rather two symbols; and symbols are potent emotional forces. Among some Canadians conscription has become the symbol of total war effort; for other Canadians with just as deep a love of their country the word has long been the symbol of racial domination. These symbols get in the way and prevent the matter from being treated on the facts and not on the emotions. The word should be avoided because it is emotionally charged and focuses attention on only one aspect of the war effort and puts it out of proportion to everything else.

I suggest that this is a most accurate understanding of the problem. Selective service is a modern expression for conscription, and an hon. member who spoke here gave another expression this afternoon. I think that it is the duty of every public speaker to use this expression. It is more than a duty, because it would be more accurate to speak of selective service. It selects. It puts those most fit for specific jobs into those jobs, and according to Canada's National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940 that selection is designed to apply to more than military service. Conscription instead of selective service! What a bedevilment on the part of those whom we credit with enough intelligence to think more clearly, to speak more lucidly, and to act more wisely. Have we been too charitable to those people who would go out through the country, and to those newspapers throughout the country? Have the Prime Minister and the government been too charitable to those people, the Hepburns, the Meighens and the Drews? Conscription! Where is the word in the three paragraphs of the speech from the throne referring to the plebiscite? Since that is the pivot around which everything in this discussion in the house is revolving, it would not be out of the way first to recall to this house what these paragraphs are:

> My advisers believe that the magnitude and balanced nature of Canada's war effort is being obscured and impaired by controversy concerning commitments with respect to the methods of raising men for military service which were made prior to the spread of the war to all parts of the world.
> The government is of the opinion that, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should in this connection and irrespective of any previous commitments, possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise.
> My ministers accordingly will seek, from the people, by means of a plebiscite, release from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

The issue is just as simple and straightforward as the wording in these paragraphs indicates. Could anything be more clear? The Prime Minister and the government and many members of this house have publicly declared that it would be a mistaken policy, unjust and short-sighted, to impose compulsory military service for overseas. A given set of circumstances obtained then. They were circumstances, when these commitments that the Prime Minister—and not only the Prime Minister but other political parties—made, that rendered such commitments not only advisable in the national interest at that particular time, but as the Minister of National Defence said this afternoon, advisable in the interest of national unity. They were also advisable due to the nature of the war and the situation as it existed at that time. But these circumstances have now altered; and the government, as is honourable and proper and natural, wishes to know whether the electorate which put it in power is willing to release it from those pledges made at that time. There is nothing more in the plebiscite than that, no matter what sort of murk some hon. members may try to throw over the issue.

If there be any argument about this plebiscite, it is certainly not an argument about "conscription"—I put the word in quotation marks. Rather, it is an argument as to the wisdom, justice and probity of holding the plebiscite, and I suggest that there can be no doubt in the mind of any reasonable man of such wisdom, justice and probity. It is wise, it is just, it is honourable. If the government and hon. members who have associated themselves with these commitments are to be released from them because the circumstances have changed, then the only thing and the only people that can release them is the electorate of this dominion. That is the best, quickest, simplest and most effective way of finding out the wishes of the people. We should not be befuddled by newspapers which sometimes we think represent public opinion, such as the Toronto Globe and Mail, or the little Ottawa journals which change their minds from day to day and have no stated policy in their editorial columns.

May I draw attention to certain editorial comments on this plebiscite from various Canadian newspapers, both Liberal and Conservative, from all across this country. Their editors should be congratulated upon their fairness and insight.

The Hamilton Spectator says:

> Mr. King's course should appeal to all even-tempered persons as a reasonable one. . . . After all there is no safer tribunal in a democracy than the people themselves.

The London Free Press says:

> Under all the circumstances . . . the decision which has been reached is both understandable and dependable. If we are to have a plebiscite this is the best form it could take.

The Lethbridge Herald says:

> The government appears to have taken the democratic course.

The Toronto Star says:

In proposing a plebiscite Mr. King is no doubt taking the course which he thinks will result in maintaining national unity to the greatest possible degree.

The Regina Leader-Post says:

It cannot be denied that broad political considerations are involved which many may be inclined to overlook. Sound government is a science with Mr. King as well as a shield. His remarkable sagacity has stood the nation in good stead before. His action in this instance may very well turn out to have been the wisest course.

The Winnipeg Free Press says:

We are confident the plebiscite can command the measure of support for the proposition of giving unlimited power to the government—power so decisive it will settle this question finally without an aftermath of bitterness, provided those who favour the result consolidate their efforts and activities to bring it about.

Note the qualifications of the Winnipeg Free Press editorial:

. . . provided those who favour the result consolidate their efforts and activities to bring it about.

There is also another qualification. That qualification may be found in the editorials of other Canadian newspapers. The Saint John Telegraph-Journal says:

Let us hope the plebiscite will be carried out with a complete lack of bitter argument and debate . . . The gravity of the situation demands extraordinary measures.

The Peterborough Examiner says:

Let the plebiscite come, if it has to, and let us get over with troubled weather and press on with our titanic job. Too much time and energy spent in wrangling over the issue will be be an unpardonable waste.

The Halifax Chronicle says:

The Canadian people will give a clear, decisive, unequivocal answer. Let us get the plebiscite out of the way, behind us, and forgotten, at the earliest possible moment.

I commend the admonitions of these editors to hon. members and also to sundry gentlemen who have already lost or are in process of losing their perspective on this important matter, and who use such terms as "un-British", "autocratic", "cowardly", and all the rest of the epithets that have been hurled against it.

I think this sums up what is most apropos concerning the forthcoming plebiscite. It is clear that many agree that the step is wise, just, honourable; it is also courageous. As the Toronto Star said editorially the other day:

The curious charge is made against Mr. King that he shows a "lack of courage" in holding a plebiscite. Courage to what? To break his pledged word, evidently; to break it without securing a release from the electorate to whom his pledge was given! That would be a poor kind of courage which any man might be proud to lack.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Fleming.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—HON. MR. HANSON

LIMITATION UNDER MOBILIZATION ACT WITH RESPECT TO SERVICE OVERSEAS

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. This afternoon when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) was making his speech relative to the limitation imposed by the National Resources Mobilization Act with respect to service overseas, he made this statement:

The present leader of the opposition was in the house at the time; he took no exception to that limitation. His only suggestion was that the act might be extended to service in Labrador. And he and his party supported that measure with that restriction in it.

I interrupted to say:

Did I not say I was prepared to accept that as a halfway measure?

I am reading from the transcript of this afternoon's proceedings. It continues:

Mr. Ralston: I am quite satisfied my hon. friend used no such language.

I interrupted him again. Then farther on the minister said:

He should look at the record—

Referring to myself.

—and he will find that his colleague, the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) suggested that the act be extended to Labrador, Iceland and Newfoundland, and that he himself suggested that it be extended to Labrador. I do not think he will find anywhere in his speech any suggestion that that was a half-way measure, or any suggestion that he was in any way opposed to that restriction being inserted as it is in the act to-day—with that exception. He and his party supported that measure without division and without adverse comment, too.

I now desire to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, and the attention of the house to the first column on page 857 of Hansard for June 18, 1940. On that occasion I was speaking after the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had spoken announcing the introduction of the National Resources Mobilization Act. I was referring to what had occurred on the Monday previous, when my colleague and I had called on him. This is what I said on that occasion:

Specifically I recommended three things. . . .

And then I went on:

Second, that this government propose now to take authority to mobilize all the man-power and all the material resources of this nation for the aid of the mother country and for the defence of Canada.

Afterwards, when the bill was in committee, I stated, as reported at pages 913 and 914 of Hansard for June 19, 1940—and I am giving only brief excerpts:

I should like to emphasize the fact that the bill is purely and simply enabling legislation, and while it falls short of what many people in this dominion think is necessary and have been demanding, yet on balance and on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread at all, we on this side of the house are prepared to accept the principle of the bill and to accept the measure for what it is worth.

And again, on the second column of page 917:

I tell the Prime Minister it has not been easy to support the principle of this bill, having regard to the volume of representations I had received beforehand in favour of something more far-reaching, and the protests I have been receiving this morning that we should still have something greater. But as I said before, for the defence of Canada if for nothing else I am willing to support the principle of this bill; because half a loaf is better than no bread.

The reference to Labrador is contained at page 917 of Hansard, after the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) had been speaking. I backed up his suggestion to include the provision of the bill for service in Labrador. I might say that the minister's research department has let him down.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to inform the Minister of National Defence of the observations of my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have already told him about it.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to his Excellency the Governor General in reply to His speech at the opening of the session, and the amendement thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendent to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. FLEMING: Before the house rose at six o'clock I had quoted editorial opinion across Canada in connection with the plebiscite to be held in the near future. It is obvious that the hon. gentlemen who object to the plebiscite have been slightly out of touch with the affairs of the nation. Results of the little general election held yesterday I am sure prove that fact conclusively. That is a regrettable fact, and also an ironic one. It is our privilege, as a free people, to elect a free parliament and a free government. It is also our privilege to criticize those whom we have chosen to govern us. To make criticism orderly, we have his majesty's loyal opposition. But opposition is something entirely different from obstruction and the use of intemperate language. According to the true Canadian ideal, opposition means help to the government by way of constructive criticism.

I would call to the attention of hon. members passages from a little book recently published, "So You Want a War Job," by Charles Clay, which came to my attention the other day. From pages 81 and 82 I read the following:

Loose, perverted, malicious criticism of Canada's war effort can be just as subversive in its effects as statements intended to cause disaffection or statements intended to prejudice recruiting, both of which carry stiff penalties. Such criticism attacks public confidence, undermines morale, produces friction.

The point is to avoid the stupidity of destructive criticism; it invariably degenerates into fault-finding or cynicism, the first productive of general furore and the second productive of individual dismay. It is folly to seek relief from war-economy injuries by wild comment that lacks basis in fact.

Uninformed disparagement is as bad as deliberately destructive criticism; it usually takes the blossoms from the tree along with the caterpillars. As Disraeli once said, "It is much easier to be critical than to be correct."

Those paragraphs will bear the attention of the hon. members in question. Instead of informing themselves of Canada's war effort, they are criticizing, I believe from inadequate information. Not only that, they are allowing their lack of understanding to eclipse the main issues. A recent issue of a weekly newspaper, The Prairie Messenger, published at Muenster, Saskatchewan, in my constituency, carried the following editorial in its issue of January 29:

It is extremely important in expressing opinions on the plebiscite to keep to the point.

The editorial concluded:

Throughout all discussions on the plebiscite we must, of course, be on the alert against anti-plebiscite campaigners who hint that Canada has not been doing its part in the war effort with the other parts of the empire. The best answer to any such hint is Prime Minister Churchill's comment on our war effort. He used the word "magnificent". Under the leadership of Mr. King Canada has proved her loyalty to the empire, standing second to none. The coming plebiscite is in the mind of the present government the wisest way not only to a continuation but also an intensification of that war effort.

This is a very important question to be kept in mind at this critical time. Just at this point may I bring to the attention of hon. members another phase of criticism, namely, that against certain people in our country who are not of Anglo-Saxon racial origin. I recall that upon returning to my constituency after the close of the session last summer, I found that nothing had been done by way of organization in connection with recruiting. There were many loud-mouthed super-patriots who are found all over the countryside, and who were howling for conscription. I discussed the matter with some of these gentlemen, and they said, "None of these people would enlist around here; none of those who are of German racial origin would enlist." Finally I took the matter up with General Foster, the officer commanding that military district, and discussed the problem with him. He sent us a group of five or six military men, and we set up a recruiting centre in charge of Sergeant H. K. Warren, a member of the legislative assembly for Saskatchewan, and one who has differed from me on political issues for a long time. We worked together all summer to organize the district. I must offer the greatest praise to Sergeant Warren and this band of men for the assistance they gave. They did not go around saying, "oh, the voluntary system is no good; what we should have is conscription." Instead of that, they went out and discussed the matter with the people throughout the district. The last report I have is that seventy-eight per cent of those who enlisted voluntarily in the army—I am not speaking of the air force or the navy—were of German racial origin. The voluntary system will work, but it will not work if you go out and tell the people it will not. I hold in my hand a letter which I received from a young Canadian of German racial origin. On December 20 he wrote as follows:

Dear Dr. Fleming:

Kindly dropping a few words which I wanted to see you sometimes. I was in December past twenty years on twenty-first, of age. I would please you to write to the national of registration to Regina they should give me a call for the 8th of January. If I would get my call then I sure would go on active service. I wanted to go to Humboldt and join up but my old folks wouldn't let me go. They say if I get my call to Regina than I could join up. I am six feet high, 170 pounds, pretty good in my health. Please help me to get my call for the other month. I surely would like to be in the uniform.

That letter is typical of the youth from that particular district. It shows how this particular group of people are thinking at the present moment. They have absolute confidence in the administration. I should like to read another short passage from page 93 of Mr. Clay's book:

As a matter of cold fact, European-Canadians constitute over twenty per cent of our population. The overwhelming majority are Canadian in consciousness and sentiment. They have enlisted in the C.A.S.F. in goodly numbers, they support our national war effort in many other ways. And most of us do not deserve much credit for their fine performance. As Mr. N. S. Campbell pointed out:

We Anglo-Saxons have failed deplorably in our duty to our newcomers. Aside from opening our schools to their children we have left them severely alone. They have had to acquire for themselves, by the system of trial and error, a knowledge of democratic institutions and of the machinery by which democracy is made to work. The surprising thing is that democracy has won their loyalty in spite of our indifference.

As I stated before, these people have complete and implicit faith in the pledge that was given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). What would they think if that pledge were broken before the electorate of this country had a chance to say whether he should be released from his pledges? I think it is only fitting that I should make a few references to the man who has led us so far in our total war effort against nazism and whose energy and vision have contributed so much to our ultimate victory. Fortunate it is for the British empire that we have a Churchill to lead us in our dark hour of peril. Fortunate it is for the United States that they have a Roosevelt. Fortunate it is for us in Canada that we have a William Lyon Mackenzie King. History has produced great leaders in the past, but none greater than these three. It is upon the shoulders of Churchill, Roosevelt and King that the gigantic task rests of once more making this world constructive and progressive.

Canada's Prime Minister is not only one of the greatest friends that Canada has ever known, but also one of the greatest friends of true peace. He is one of the greatest friends the empire has ever known. It was largely because of him that the friendly relationship which now exists between Canada and the United States was brought into being. I remember as a boy when I grew up here in old Ontario there was considerable enmity between Canada and the United States. You heard it in the schools and on the street. The cry was, "No truck or trade with the Yankees." That was heard on the highways and by-ways of those days of long ago. What position would we be in at the present time if that same cry was being heard, or if we followed what this Toronto clique is always preaching?

The leader of our nation in this time of war has been wise unto sobriety. He has undertaken and already partly executed a gigantic task. As a result, Canada is going forward, not only toward a military victory over all her enemies but also to a new and better social order after the war. A grateful Canada to-day salutes a great government headed by a great Canadian—William Lyon Mackenzie King. He is the leader of this House of Commons, but he is far more than that. He is a devoted patriot, devoted to his country's cause.

I should like to say a few words about Canada's total war effort, and about the lack of truth there is in the charge that Canada is not sufficiently engaged in a total war. Those who say that are inadequately informed. Many steps have been taken to place Canada on a total war basis, and other steps are being taken every day to see that our economic and social machinery is geared up. That is a most important point. It would be folly to race our organization at the start and then have it break down at the crucial moment. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) went into the total war effort in considerable detail this afternoon. His remarks are on the record, so I shall not go further into that at the present time.

There has been considerable criticism of the government's plan for the post-victory period. The amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and his followers reveals a woeful lack of information about what is going on right under their noses. Here is something they have not seen yet. What do these hon. gentlemen think the restrictions placed upon consumer goods of all kinds mean? They certainly mean more than a present diversion of materials, equipment and man-hours from non-essential, home-front manufacturing to essential, fighting-front manufacturing. They mean that an artificial shortage is being created in literally scores of important consumer goods so that after the victory the men who have been working in war factories will not be out of employment. From the making of machine guns they will turn to the making of typewriters, from the making of bomb-sights to the making of radios, from the making of flares to the making of frigidaires. I could go on down a long list of articles.

All along the line this government has taken steps to create war machinery that has peace-time uses. It is post-victory preparation of the most practical kind. Hon. members who are so much concerned over the post-victory economic life of this dominion could make better use of their energies by supporting some of the measures brought in by this government, rather than by shouting so loudly against them.

Since time is rapidly passing, I would recall to the house that in speaking on the budget the first time I had the honour to speak in this historic chamber, not many years ago, I stated in reference to my distinguished leader, as reported at 2682 of Hansard of 1936:

> The Prime Minister's is a leadership that is indigenous to the soil from which have sprung the cardinal principles of Liberalism. It is a leadership provocative of initiative in thought and action among his followers, a leadership which welcomes independent views on the many problems which are pressing for practical solution. It is a leadership which recognizes the political principle enunciated by Edmund Burke over a century ago, a leadership which would call out, from the more circumscribed affairs of constituency interest, the best in both thought and judgment that the representative is capable of giving in the broader field of national affairs. It is a leadership that goes further in encouraging us to study not only national problems, but international issues. It is a leadership that expects us to bring to our discussions and our deliberations the most advanced views on every question pertaining to the nation's welfare.

Those words, Mr. Speaker, are as true to-day as they were when they were uttered a good many years ago before the present world crisis. His leadership stands to-day before the bar of public opinion. Five times he has been elected Prime Minister by the people of Canada. He is not afraid to face an issue, and that is the reason why he is appealing to the people on this plebiscite to release him from the pledges that he made at the last general election.

What could be fairer; what could be more democratic? And yet we have heard such violent language as "cowardly," "dastardly," "un-British" and unpatriotic" which have been hurled even across the floor of this house and throughout the country. It might be well for those who are attacking the right hon. leader of the government to remember the words of our imperial leader when he spoke a very short while ago of those who would wish to destroy the Prime Minister. Mr. Churchill commends Canada's leadership as he said, "in every field of our common endeavour." Our right hon. leader has not played the wretched game of party politics, and we might well use the language that Mr. Churchill used in addressing our Prime Minister, after dealing in the British parliament with a group of obstructionists who were out to destroy him. He said on that occasion:

> At this time, when the utmost efforts of every nation are required for victory you have again made plain to the world that all the resources and energies of Canada are to be counted upon in support of the fight for freedom.

We should indeed be proud that we have such leadership. He has kept this country united from one end to the other. He has not broken faith with any of our people; and, being proud of his leadership, we should not place upon him the terrific task of having to fight political battles in this house, in newspaper columns, and throughout the country, at the same time that he is giving his all to Canada's great war effort.

In conclusion, I should like to use the words which the Prime Minister himself used many years ago when referring to the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier at a time when the political vultures of that day were out to destroy him. He said:

> His strength may be lessening with the touch of time but his honour stands as unshaken as an oak amid a winter's blast. He is a man
> Who never sold the truth to serve the hour,
> Nor palter'd with Eternal God for power;
> Who let the turbid stream of rumour flow
> Thro' either babbling world of high and low:
> Whose life was work, whose language rife
> With rugged maxims hewn from life.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I desire to congratulate the mover (Mr. Fournier, Hull) and the seconder (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City) upon the excellent manner in which they ushered into this session the time-honoured motion that an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General. On previous occasions since the war began it has been the custom at this time to review the activities of some of the departments which have been involved in war work, and among those was usually included the Department of Agriculture, which has to do with the activities of farmers in different parts of the Dominion of Canada in their efforts to produce food which is required in connection with the war. On this occasion it is not my intention to review the efforts of farmers throughout Canada to perform the task which has been assigned to them, and which is theirs because of the industry in which they are engaged, because the remarks that I have to make to-night I hope to conclude within the forty minutes which are allotted to me, and on some future occasion, when the opportunity presents itself to speak at greater length, I hope to review agricultural activities.

I have listened carefully when in my place and have reviewed the Hansard report of the periods when I have been out of the house during the session, and I have been pleased to note that less time has been taken in criticizing the administration of agriculture in the debate on the address this session than in any previous session, and more particularly the sessions since the war began. I suppose that if I were to attempt to outline to the house the reasons for that lack of criticism on this occasion, my remarks would not be accepted as the real reason for the lack of criticism. But I have in my hand a copy of an editorial which was printed in the Ottawa Farm Journal, which has been in most issues since the war began, more or less critical of the policies of the Department of Agriculture. In their editorial of February 6, 1942, the first three paragraphs read as follows:

> In contrast to the picture of gloom and dissatisfaction pictured by the prairie wheat growers who invaded Ottawa in numbers early this week was the general air of optimism and well-being which pervaded the meetings of pure-bred men at Toronto—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Must be York South.

Mr. GARDINER: The phrase is not mine but appears in the editorial. It goes on:

> —many of which are reported at some length in this issue. There was no gloom around the Toronto meeting, rather an air of comparative prosperity and satisfaction.
> Even the western men who attended the Toronto live stock meetings were cheerful and gave glowing reports. The cattle and hog men from the very prairie areas where wheat men are depressed, had little of a critical nature to offer.
> At all the meetings it was most noticeable that prices were hardly mentioned. There was considerable talk of labour shortages, but apparently the general view was that little could be done about this matter except to urge that at least key men on the farms not be conscripted or called up for army service.

The only comment that I wish to make on that editorial is that it outlines more concisely than I could do, and more acceptably perhaps to hon. members opposite than if I were to present them myself, the reasons for the lack of criticism at the present time in relation to agriculture. Prices of farm commodities, more particularly of those other than grain, are on a level to-day which is apparently accepted by the greater number of the farmers throughout the length and breadth of Canada as being more or less reasonable. In view of the fact that there appears to be general satisfaction with prices of live stock and live stock products, I am going to content myself at this time with thanking the farmers of Canada for having more than provided for every war programme placed before them since the war began. I do not believe there is another single industry in the Dominion of Canada that has, on every occasion that a request has been made of them to produce the commodities required, more than measured up to the request made; and every year since the war began, the request made of the farmers of Canada has been a request which has been passed on to this government by the government of Britain, based on the necessities of food in Great Britain.

I should, however, like to say a word on behalf of the wheat growers of western Canada. There is reason, of course, for the different point of view of the farmers who met in Ottawa last week, and the group of live stock men who met in Toronto. No one in this government, no one in this house, will dispute that those reasons exist. I find, however, that there is a growing feeling in western Canada that the Ontario and Quebec industrial and financial interests are against the farmers of western Canada obtaining more for their wheat; and it is only fair to say that at no time have I heard any eastern industrialist or representative of eastern financial houses oppose western wheat growers receiving more for their wheat. I think it is necessary to state that in order that we may not at this time develop antagonisms as between different parts of Canada that would not assist us in our war effort. The fact is that eastern industrialists and financial interests know that the only way in which they can be paid what may be due to them from the west is, if farmers receive higher returns from the crops which they harvest.

There is, in the policy announced in the speech from the throne, every reason for western wheat farmers to expect to have their position improved, and from the same source as the position of every other branch of industry and agriculture has already been improved since the war began. Legislation having that objective in mind, as I said this afternoon, will be introduced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and myself as soon as it is possible in this session to do so, and it is the intention that that particular legislation in so far as agriculture is concerned, and, I believe also, in so far as the Department of Trade and Commerce is concerned, shall be referred to a committee on agriculture in order that it may be discussed fully by the members of this house.

I wanted to say that with regard to agriculture before proceeding to discuss some other matters in which this house has been interesting itself during recent weeks. We have before us at the present time, not only the motion to which I referred a few moments ago, but an amendment and a sub-amendment —the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), and the subamendment moved by the house leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group (Mr. Coldwell). The amendment as moved by the leader of the opposition appears at page 30 of Hansard of January 26, 1942, and is in these terms:

That the following words be added to the address:

"This house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers, instead of giving to the country the leadership so essential at a time properly described in the speech from the throne as the greatest crisis in the world's history, on the contrary, have sought to evade their responsibility by holding a plebiscite, which, in the view of this house, is the negation of responsible government.

And this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have not seen fit to recommend to parliament without delay additional measures designed to

(a) completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war;

(b) supply the imperative needs of agriculture, industry, and the fighting forces of the nation; and

(c) prepare for the post-war period."

On page 55 of Hansard of the same date is the subamendment moved by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group:

That all the words after the words "this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"have used the sweeping powers conferred by the National Resources Mobilization Act mainly for the conscription of men for home defence and in the opinion of this house no total effort adequate to meet the present needs of the war, domestic problems and the preparation for post-war conditions is possible without total mobilization of wealth, industry and finance, as well as human resources.

"Therefore this house respectfully requests that the forthcoming plebiscite should seek the support of the people of Canada for the complete and effective conscription of war industries, accumulated wealth and financial institutions, at the same time and on the same basis of sacrifice as the suggested extension of the conscription of man-power."

Along with the second or subamendment should be read, I think, the policy of the group whose leader placed that sub-amendment on Hansard a few days ago—the policy as laid down by the same leader in 1939 and reported in Hansard of September 9 of that year. With regard to the matter which is referred to here, this statement is made:

Canada should be prepared to defend her own shores, but her assistance overseas should be limited to economic aid and must not include conscription of man-power or the sending of any expeditionary force.

Then, section 3 of the platform as laid down, and placed upon Hansard, states:

> No military participation overseas: Any attempt to send a force abroad would rob us of the man-power necessary for the defence of our shores and for home production, would gravely endanger national unity, would threaten our civil liberties and democratic institutions, and would ultimately lead to conscription.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in order fully to understand what the subamendment which was placed upon Hansard the other day means, one must have this alongside of it, read it along with it, and probably ask oneself the question, is it the intention of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, through their leader, in moving this particular subamendment, to ask the government to submit to the people of Canada a different question from that which is being submitted under the plebiscite, that they should be relieved, by the submission of that different question, from an obligation they placed themselves under in 1939? Or is it their intention to have us still leave this as the policy of the party as enunciated by the party itself and placed upon Hansard as the policy which was to guide the party throughout the war in which we are now engaged?

In proceeding, I think we should call attention to two or three of the phrases which have been used by those who have placed these two motions on Hansard.

The leader of the opposition, in replying, made the spearhead of his attacks upon the government an amendment in which he condemned the government for having attempted to evade its responsibility by holding a plebiscite which, he claimed, is the negation of responsible government. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, while not directly condemning the plebiscite, proposed that in that plebiscite advice should be secured on the question of total conscription. We thus have the two leaders, one stating that to secure the opinion of the people is the negation of responsible government, the other stating that the government should consult the people in a plebiscite upon a matter which might conceivably become a question to be considered and decided by the government at a later date.

Now that four by-elections have been held and decided since the address was moved, and the elected and defeated candidates have made their post-election statements, I think it will be obvious that the real reason for moving the amendment and the sub-amendment was to place before the people of two constituencies appeals which those placing them before the constituents thought would have the effect of returning their candidates to this house. I think that will be agreed to even by those who moved them.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, we shall go on and see what the effect is. I do not think one would be justified in contending that either policy was favoured in any one of the four by-elections. It might appear at first glance that the policy enunciated in the subamendment of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was endorsed in York South.

Mr. MacNICOL: No.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend says "no," and I am inclined to agree with him. But it could be just as strongly argued that it was condemned in Welland where their candidate ran at the bottom of the poll, the same appeal being made in both constituencies.

Mr. Meighen attributes his defeat to the cooperation of the Ottawa Liberals and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I think it would be more correct to state that the Conservative leader and the leader of the government of Ontario, unintentionally it is true, conspired to elect Mr. Noseworthy. I have never heard that it is good political strategy for a candidate who is handed the support of a political party in a constituency to base his whole campaign on belittling the efforts of that party and its leader; nor has it ever been considered good political strategy to take into his bosom one who has no other reason for opposing the government of the day than that of personal enmity towards its leader. If Mr. Meighen had adopted the attitude, as was said this afternoon, of Willkie towards the government of the day, he would be at the present time the proud leader of a great political party in the House of Commons.

What has been the obvious campaign of those who chose Mr. Meighen to lead the onslaught? It began immediately following the last federal election and has been kept up ever since by a group centred in Toronto who are bent upon gaining control of the government in this war, as they did in the last, and by similar methods. Their first objective was to convince the people of Canada that conscription of man-power immediately for overseas is a necessity. While stating that publicly, it will be noted that in the amendment moved in this house the other day the word "conscription" is not used. The house leader has not even used the words "compulsory selective service." He uses the much milder term "selective basis" as applied to man- and woman-power. In the open, however, the attempt was made to convince the public that conscription of man-power for overseas service is necessary immediately.

The next effort was to convince the public —and this is why, Mr. Speaker, I find it necessary to speak on behalf of myself and on behalf of those who sent me to this house— the additional position, I say, was taken, in making representations, that two-thirds of the members of the government are in favour of immediate conscription, but are only held back by the leader of the party, supported by the French-speaking members of the cabinet and a few other personal friends.

For some considerable time I thought that the propagandist of the opposition to this government, who writes articles in that great periodical which is printed in the city of Toronto, known as Maclean's magazine, and who at the same time writes editorials in some newspapers in the dominion, would do me the honour of not mentioning me at all. But in the second last issue of that periodical he included my name among those who, he presumes, were ready to take certain action if the leader of the Liberal party and Prime Minister of this dominion did not do certain things.

If they had established these two facts, it was hoped that it could be made to appear that the only obstacle in the way of immediate conscription was the promise made by the Prime Minister personally, under the influence of members of the government, as was stated, from Quebec, in the election of 1939 in that province and in the general election of 1940, that there would be no conscription of man-power for overseas. It was stated in season and out of season that the only way in which we could get immediate conscription in this country, which it was maintained had been proved as a necessity in order to win the war, was that we should get rid of the Prime Minister of Canada and set up another government under some other leadership.

If this plan could have succeeded, it was hoped that the present Prime Minister of Canada could have been forced from his position and a so-called national government, with no past commitments, and therefore no obligations to anyone, established in its place. The Prime Minister, as he has done on previous occasions, accepted the challenge of those who are his opponents. He said: "All right; we will ask the people of Canada whether they are prepared to free this government from any pledges given and permit it to act as a totally free, responsible government in dealing with war matters."

The cry immediately went up from outside and from the other side of this house: "Wasting time; procrastination". Members of the government with sons overseas, it was said in editorials written in the newspapers, should rise up in their might and smite those who would delay at a time when the whole future of humanity rests upon the question of conscription in Canada of man-power for overseas.

Well, some of the ministers have given answer to that statement. My colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), speaking this afternoon and on previous occasions, has said that there is no immediate need for conscription of man-power for overseas. He has said that our voluntary enlistment of men up to date has provided us with the number of men that are required for all the services up to the present time, and that there are reserves ready to take the place of any who, for any reason, may be put out of that service. He stated to us that there is no immediate cause for bringing in conscription in the dominion in order to get man-power. My colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), speaking the other day in the Welland by-election, and thus placing the issue squarely before the people before the vote was taken, said that there is no immediate need for conscripting man-power for supply as far as giving service to our people overseas is concerned. In other words, man-power was being obtained for the plants that are manufacturing the necessities of war, including the machines and munitions of war; and in so far as he knew, there was, as well, no reason for conscripting man-power to serve in the fighting forces overseas. I, as Minister of Agriculture, have stated that the only real difficulty having to do with help upon the farm is one which could not be improved by conscription but which, as a matter of fact, has been accentuated by the degree of conscription we already have.

I have been astounded in this house during this debate, listening to man after man, particularly in the official opposition, proclaiming that immediate conscription of men for the armies overseas is necessary; and then before they have taken their seats, stating that men on the farms should not be taken off the farms under the conditions of conscription that we already have. I am inclined to agree with the statement that the difficulty we are having in connection with labour on the farms of Canada to-day is threefold. There is the difficulty that exists about the industrial cities of eastern Canada, where men, because of better wages, have gone off the farms into the cities. There is the problem related to the fact that on 70,000 farms old men and women over sixty years of age are on their farms alone, most of them alone because their sons went over in the last war and did not come back. These old people are without help.

This war in turn, under the conscription which we already have, is taking the young man who is as much a key man for agriculture as any key man in industry, namely the young man who is the natural inheritor of the farm, who does not think in terms of wages, whom wages will not draw to a factory. When such men are taken away, there is a real difficulty involved in connection with labour upon the farms of this country.

I am prepared to state that if the only thing desired is more men for overseas, more men can be secured now or at any time in the immediate future under the voluntary system properly applied than could be secured under the policies advocated in either the amendment or the sub-amendment.

We have had four by-elections, in which these views were presented before the four constituencies, and the vote was taken yesterday. In my opinion a number of things were settled in those elections in so far as the voters in these constituencies are concerned. When one considers the past history of the four constituencies, I think it is correct to state that on the same issues every other constituency in Canada would vote in much the same way.

The constituency of Quebec East is located at the historic gateway to central Canada. It has been represented in this house by two of Canada's outstanding statesmen, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. As a result of the poll yesterday it is now represented by another outstanding French-Canadian who is destined to write his name beside these other outstanding Canadians in the history of our country.

The constituency of St. Mary has been traditionally Liberal since 1896. It is located in the great commercial and financial metropolis of Canada. The constituency of Welland has a varied political history, sharing its allegiance between the two main parties since confederation. The constituency of York South has been consistently Conservative since confederation. It is located on the outskirts of the most imperialistic and Conservative-minded city in the whole Dominion of Canada.

Two of these constituencies are almost entirely French-Canadian; the other two have few French-Canadians in them. One of them is among the most cosmopolitan constituencies of Canada, and in that regard is typical of many of the constituencies in western Canada. Yet all four of these constituencies made decisions on a number of questions which were presented to them, not only by this government but by opposition candidates and others, including no less a person than the premier of Ontario who spoke on the side of Mr. Meighen and Mr. Drew.

The first thing they agreed upon is that conscription is not immediately necessary to a total war effort in Canada. I cannot conceive of any constituency in Canada at the present time casting a vote which the voters believed not to be in the interest of a total war effort by Canada. These constituencies, all four of them, with their varied interests and varied history, voted first that they agreed that conscription was not immediately necessary to a total war effort by Canada.

The second thing they agreed on is that a so-called national government is not necessary to the successful prosecution of the war. If any of my hon. friends are not prepared to accept that statement, then the alternative is that the present government is the nearest approach to a national government which Canada can have at the present time.

The third thing they agreed upon is that the pledged word of any public man, or for that matter any great political party, should be sacred and be withdrawn only when consent is given by those to whom it was pledged.

Two of the constituencies, namely York South and Welland, declared themselves on another question, which was not submitted to the two constituencies in Quebec. They declared in unmistakable terms that the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier was right when he said: "It does not do to cherish resentment in public life." I do not think anything could have been more clearly declared to the people of Canada than the truth of that statement.

I wish to discuss at somewhat greater length the second and third of these expressions of opinion. When Mr. Meighen was chosen leader of the Conservative party he stated that he was prepared to lead a crusade for conscription, which could be consummated only by a national government, in which he was prepared to serve. Mr. Hepburn and Mr. Drew declared their willingness to accept both his policy and his methods. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, federally, and provincially in British Columbia, and, I think, elsewhere throughout Canada, have declared in season and out that they would have no part in a so-called national or union government. The people of the strongest Conservative constituency in Canada, by an unprecedentedly heavy vote, have declared that they would rather do without

Mr. Meighen, Mr. Hepburn and Mr. Drew than submit to either their policies or their methods.

This government is the nearest approach to a national government which is possible in Canada to-day. It is led by the one man who can unite behind him and has united behind him the greatest number of people from coast to coast. The election of 1940 proved that; the Gallup poll of last week proved it; the elections of yesterday proved it, and the vote in this house on these amendments and on the main motion will prove that he can muster the strongest vote in this house of any man either inside or outside it.

That being the case, it is hard to understand what our friends in the opposition mean when they speak of responsible government. Responsible government is a government headed by the man who can command the majority in the House of Commons. And he is at the head of that group because that group can command the largest vote in the country. I would ask this question: If my friends in the opposition either inside or outside this house are in favour of an all-out war effort, why do not these sniping politicians and "gold-diggers," as my hon. friend called them the other day, and their sabotaging propagandists, as my hon. friend over here called some others, listen to the voice of Canada and adopt the Willkie attitude, "he is my Prime Minister", until the constitution gives them an opportunity to show that a change is necessary?

If our friends opposite had been adopting that attitude throughout this war, in the two and a half years that have elapsed, their leader would not have been defeated by a majority of upwards of five thousand. The Prime Minister has stated that the by-elections have shown that the Canadian people do not propose to allow bad faith and the broken pledge to be erected into a principle of action in this country. It is because the Prime Minister and his government will not break their pledged word that the plebiscite is necessary. It is because the people of Canada know that the Prime Minister and his government will not lightly discard the pledged word of their party given under its two greatest leaders, Laurier and the present Prime Minister, that they will vote "yes" on the plebiscite when it is placed before them. They will place the responsibility squarely upon the government of Canada, led by the present Prime Minister, to prosecute this war to a successful conclusion, in so far as twelve million people can contribute toward that solution.

This government has only one desire, and that is to lead Canada forward in a united, balanced, three-fold effort, as was described to the house this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), to assist in driving nazism and fascism from the world forever. If that desire is to be consummated, it can be done only by keeping as many as should be employed producing munitions and machines of war, by keeping as many as should be employed in producing food, but by refusing to allow either one or both under a selective or any other system to interfere with the placing of an effective fighting force in the air, on the sea and on the land, wherever required.

Mr. Speaker, to enlarge upon that slightly, may I say this: the Dominion of Canada, with its unlimited lands, could put every available young man in Canada to work producing food, and every bit of that food would be required some place before the end of this war. Just suppose that every last young man of military age taken from the twelve million population of this country with its unlimited natural resources in the form of minerals, in the form of timber, in the form of oil, in the form of power, could be put to work producing machines and munitions of war. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is the policy of the C.C.F., as enunciated in September, 1939. We did not need to declare war to do that. Great Britain would have taken all the munitions that could be produced in this country; she would have had to. Great Britain could take all the arms we could make. Great Britain would have taken all the tanks, all the planes and all the food we could produce, if we had not declared war at all. When we declared war we only declared our intention to do one thing, and that one thing was to fight shoulder to shoulder with Britain and her allies until this war is won. And, Mr. Speaker, numbers in the army, numbers in the air force and numbers in the navy should compare favourably with the numbers from other countries, in proportion to the population.

I should like for a moment to deal with the British attitude and action in connection with conscription. British action in the last war in relation to Ireland, and their action again in this war in relation to northern Ireland, and south African action in the last and in this war, as well as Canadian experience in the last war and since, are indications that it is dangerous to come to a general academic conclusion about a matter such as conscription, and attempt to apply it to any country, without considering all the facts.

What are we trying to do in Canada? Are we trying to get as many men as possible to the front, or are we trying to satisfy our views on a theory? When we ask for leadership are we asking someone to try to stem the tide of unreasoned propaganda, or are we asking someone to climb on horseback, as King Richard did at the time of the peasants' revolt, and shout, "I am your leader; follow me,"—and then lead them somewhere they did not intend to go?

I shall never say that under no circumstance will I support conscription, but I will say that until such time as I am convinced that we can get in Canada a more effective force under conscription than under voluntary enlistment for overseas service I am against conscription. So far as I am concerned a vote of "yes" on the plebiscite will leave me free to make my decision, as a member of this government, with all the facts before me, when the time comes to make that decision.

I am not called upon at this moment, neither is anyone else in the house, nor anybody else in Canada, to make a decision on conscription at a time when the best authority in Canada states that at the moment it is not necessary.

Mr. Meighen need not check the events of the last few months, or the last few weeks, or the last few days, to find the cause of his many defeats in Canadian politics, including this last, held in one of the most imperialistic constituencies in Canada.

The British race is a proud one, and many of the people of that race live in that constituency. Their greatest pride is in their pledged word. If anyone does not understand that, then he should negotiate an agreement respecting farm produce with the British government. If he did so, what would he find? He would find that even if the agreement is to their disadvantage, they will carry it out to the letter, to the bitter end, and try to make a better one the next time.

Two great nations were born in America out of the struggles of the seven years' war. One was Canada and the other the United States. The constitution of the United States was written in an effort to prevent any central government, even their own, from ever again imposing its will upon an unwilling state. Bryce, when writing his history of the American commonwealth, stated that toward the end of the last century a great church body in that country was searching for a short sentence in which to call down God's blessing on every person in the country. They chose, "God bless this nation". The next day the matter was reconsidered by the same men, and rewritten in the words "God bless these United States." In those two sentences there is all the difference between what is known in Europe as a united nation governed, if you like, by a democratic, central government, and a federated state such as the United States and Canada. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that no country so great in extent as Canada or the United States can be governed in a democratic way for any considerable period of time under any system other than a federated form of government. That has been the history of that kind of thing in the world, and it is the condition existing to-day.

If we did not have a federated form of government we would never have had less than four or five dominions, instead of one, in what is Canada. Some of those who are questioning our right to impose things upon them to-day would have been serving, not under a central government here, but under a central British government which has established the principle that they will not coerce the people of any land which has come under the union jack, without first persuading those people to accept the condition, themselves.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. GARDINER: I have a few more words to say.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carry on.

Mr. GARDINER: The same idea has been written by the British parliament into every change in our constitution in Canada. It runs through the decision of the privy council.

According to the census of 1931, forty-eight per cent of the population of Canada is not of British descent. The figures of the new census are not out. Practically all of them are Canadians by either birth or naturalization. Those who are Canadians by birth know no other allegiance; those who are Canadians by naturalization have taken the oath of allegiance to our king and country, and their king and country have signed on the naturalization papers a solemn pledge. The individual pledges himself to be loyal, to stand by this country, to serve in our armies if necessary; the king and country pledge to him the right of the ballot, the right of citizenship, and the right to all the freedom to which any British-born subject is entitled.

I am not going back into old history, but the remark I am going to make will bring up old history. When it becomes necessary to release the individual from that pledge or break our own toward him in order to enforce any law, that law should not be passed in a British country. The British government has followed the practice since the days of Pitt and Burke through the time of Peel, Gladstone, Disraeli, Asquith and Churchill, of winning support through persuasion, not by coercion. Any system which has to substitute coercion for persuasion in Canada is doomed to failure. Conscription will get results in a democracy only when it is a regulation of the will of the people. Quebec, under our federated democratic system, is a democracy which can never, in conformity with British custom, practise and the pledged word of Britain's statesmen, be coerced in connection with matters of this kind.

Our whole constitution is the proof of this. We have developed it from the days of the most totalitarian form of government the world has ever known, royal government as practised under Louis XIV. Step by step, with the consent of the people of Quebec, from the old days when the British government had absolute control, this constitution has been developed until now we have representative, responsible government. That is the course which any British house that is guided by British principles will follow in connection with this or any other great public matter.

The great performance of Quebec under the leadership of the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, through registration, through production of food, through production of munitions, supplies, equipment and ships, through providing men for the defence of Canada and sending them to Britain—as General McNaughton said the other day, some of the finest units in the Canadian army have come from Quebec—has placed her in a position where her representatives in this house do not need to plead her cause. I remember when the registration was first mentioned, people said that we could not take a registration in Canada. We did take a registration, and the only province in the dominion where we had to place policemen at the booths in order to regulate traffic made up of people who wanted to get in their signatures was in the province of Quebec. In some districts in which the propriety was most questioned they signed to the last man. As I say, the members from Quebec do not need to plead her cause. Welland has so stated. York South has so stated.

Every English Liberal member in this house pledges himself to the British Liberal principle of persuasion, even to persuading the people to accept conscription. The effort of every man who believes in conscription should not be one of coercion, it should be an effort to persuade. I am sure that if this country is ever face to face with a condition where its interests or institutions are threatened to a point where greater man-power from Canada can save them by fighting any place in the world, and conscription is the only method by which they can be secured, it will be possible to convince the people of this country that it is necessary.

Right across Canada are scattered those of nationalities other than British. In my own province of Saskatchewan only 45·8 per cent are of British descent and only 5·4 per cent are of French-Canadian descent. This leaves 48·8 per cent of the population of non-English and non-French descent. These people have a record in food production, in both this and the last war, in the production of munitions and arms and in the providing of men for the fighting services, of which they have reason to be proud. You cannot make unwilling conscripts fly planes. You cannot make unwilling conscripts fight tanks. You cannot put a whole band of conscripts on corvettes. This is a job for soldiers inspired by a conviction which compels them to fight.

After the Franco-Prussian war the Germans compelled the French to abandon their practices of conscription established by Napoleon. After that decision they then built up an army stronger than the conscript army of Germany. After the last great war the allies compelled the Prussians to abandon the conscription they had practised from the time of Napoleon. The nazis substituted for conscription an idea for which to fight. They developed it into a fanatical desire on the part of the whole youth of their country to inflict their views upon the world. They took the United States plane, truck and submarine and the British tank and manned them with fighting fanatics for a cause. They were inspired as were the Mohammedans of old. The Japanese were not permitted in the last war to display their will to fight. The greatest glory in the existence of a Jap is to be killed in battle and join his fathers in the great beyond.

There is nothing in the theory of government based upon coercion and force which would inspire a British subject to willing battle. But his religious beliefs and his love of freedom know no bounds as a means of inspiration. We must fill our planes, our tanks, our ships, with men inspired with a love of freedom. We must send them forth to war, not with a grudge in their hearts but with a song upon their lips. The task of creating that attitude is the task of this parliament, our churches, our schools and our press. God help Canada if the future prosecution of this war is to be interfered with by the back-room scribblings of paid writers, rather than by the freely expressed opinions of the representatives of the people in church and state and press. We, the members of this house, have a duty to perform. Every hon. member can perform this duty by selling the idea that our men are fighting for a cause that is worthy of the supreme sacrifice.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, almost two years have elapsed since March 26, 1940, when the people of this country, in giving a mandate of five years to this parliament, clearly expressed their opposition to conscription for overseas service. At the very beginning of the new parliament, however, the obstinate advocates of this troublesome measure opened fire in this house. As to-day, they were supported by a gathering of so-called patriots whose purpose is to divide this country and perpetrate their unavowable purposes and release themselves and their friends from a part of the duties imposed upon them by the state of war. They need a smoke-screen to hide their movements, their manoeuvres, their intrigues, and to accomplish their work. As in 1917, their work is conscription. They know that a good part of the population, the larger part of the Canadian people, is against this measure; but knowing the almighty power of gold, backed by a strong press organization, they carry on with a sardonic smile, anxious to attain to that national disunity on which they live. We had conscription in 1917. It was voted on at the election, and all the men who had been called for service under that coercive and hateful law were exempted because the election was coming, but a few months after the election had been held the draftees were called back. The Union government was in power, and behind the smoke-screen of conscription scandals had a wonderful time. But to gain that conscription law they had to divide the country, and they had to have a scapegoat.

In Australia they tried to impose conscription, but in that country they could not find a scapegoat, and twice the people of English descent gave a negative answer to the conscription referendum. They are trying it again this time, and they are so blinded by their appetite for gold profits that they have not even bothered to face the question of their country being directly attacked by Japan. There, too, they have their helpers, their tools, with which they hope to succeed. But Australian patriots in every class of society protest and have no intention of sending their soldiers elsewhere when they are so much needed at home. If they had a right to protest there, we, too, have a right to protest here and to ask that our soldiers be kept at home. The defence of this country comes first. To those who place our first line of defence in Europe we are motivated to say that if the unprotected countries of the commonwealth fall one after another, England will not be provided with the food and munitions she needs.

Because Quebec is against conscription, some of these birds of passage, some of them after a lifetime of political and financial success, go back home to England or to evade taxes live in sunny isles; because the people of Quebec have lived in this land since the first trip of Jacques Cartier and have had patience to overcome all obstacles and have kept this country united to Britain in 1775 and 1813, because French-Canadians believe in Canada before and above everything else, because they ask for their share in the economic and social life of the country which they have opened and helped to build up, because Quebec raised her voice and played her part in the last war, and much more in this one, and wants to do it voluntarily, some of these narrow-minded colonials—imperialists, if it serves their purpose—Americans if it meets their contentions—Canadians if the patriotic bell has to sound louder, although they never think as real Canadians, admitting that gold has no colour, no odour, no race, no nationality, direct their insinuating speeches or press articles, on the scapegoat whom they had chosen in 1917 and whom they are still trying to immolate on the altar of their fanaticism.

The "two hundred" as they have been called, ask for total war and unity of sacrifice. Why do they not ask for equality of sacrifice? Why do they not ask themselves for the real conscription of money? That at least would show a little sincerity. But no, they ask for the conscription of men for overseas service, to send men abroad, far away. It will fatten the big contracts for armament and equipment. There will always be a way to replace the men. By immigration probably. But have they enough money to pay for the life of one Canadian soldier? Have they enough guts, those who are of military age, to leave their pleasures, their money and their pretentious homes and enlist for overseas service? I believe they are well protected by age, and I would not be surprised if among them one could find a few conscientious objectors whose faith forbids them to fight against human beings but permits them to send others to war. They are safer behind the counters and better situated to grab the savings of their clients.

France had her "two hundreds". In 1935 they were lending money to Hitler, and giving as a pretext that it was the best way to kill communism. Their political friends were receiving German and Italian funds for political propaganda. Anything was good that helped them accomplish their unpatriotic schemes. There it was not Quebec; it was communism. These "two hundreds" in France had complete control of the Bank of France.

In our country our "two hundred" had their friends too. They control banks, insurance companies, mining corporations, steel works, construction companies, large departmental stores, naval construction, office specialties, et cetera. They have connections in every circle of our economic life. They have friends in the provincial and federal administrations. For a disguise they patronize charitable organizations. They are everywhere. They are the octopus with numerous and strong tentacles, sucking the very life-blood of the country—at least what is left of it.

Have they frightened the government—this government with the largest majority ever given by the people since confederation? Have they succeeded in making this parliament believe that the people of this country have changed their minds on the conscription issue? I do not recall any special occasion on which the people have expressed a change of opinion on this question. Of course, a strongly organized press campaign has been going on for months, and even a member of the British parliament has been touring Canada to try to convince our people that conscription was the really crowning glory of the total national war effort. But the Prime Minister of England, when he was called upon to express his opinion, said, "I usually mind my own business."

Prominent members of this parliament keep saying, especially during by-election time, that they do not need men over there, that conscription will not be necessary here for overseas service. Personally I think that it would not be necessary if everyone gave a really helping hand to voluntary enlistment. I am not the only one witnessing all kinds of impediments arising from the fact that some people in Canada want this system to fail in order to draw this parliament into a conscription policy against the very will and opinion of this country. I shall have further opportunity to explain more clearly what I have in mind. If we do not need conscription, why ask the people to release the government and, I will say, parliament from its commitments concerning conscription? To have liberty of action?

We have witnessed since 1937 a series of events gradually progressing year by year. Some Liberal members rose in opposition to the increased subsidies for national defence; not because they did not care for home defence, but because they were anticipating that this new move of the government was the start of an empire defence plan; they were told then that this was not the case. I, myself, quoted Sir Wilfrid Laurier speaking on the Guthrie amendment to bill No. 21 introduced during the 1912-1913 session by Sir Robert Borden, the then prime minister. At page 7232 of Hansard, Sir Wilfrid Laurier is reported as having said:

> I now come to a consideration of the fact, made manifest by one of the last speeches of Mr. Churchill, that the admiralty favours contribution and not autonomous organization. This is not a new thing: the British admiralty has always preferred a system of imperial contribution to the idea of autonomous organization. At the imperial conference in 1902, Lord Selborne, the predecessor of Mr. Churchill, made a proposal that we should have imperial contributions.

The Canadian press of February 5, 1937, has reported the words of Sir Samuel Hoare speaking at a lunch given by the chamber of commerce of Bradford. He, too, was stating that any programme of defence should be an empire-wide one. It is clear that the lords of the admiralty have not changed their mind.

This group of members asked for the exact location of Canada's boundaries. A bill sponsored by Mr. MacNeill suggested an amendment to the Militia Act: the bill had a first-class funeral.

I heard in this house some members of the same group saying that our geographical situation placed us in a safe position, should the axis powers direct an attack on Canada; we were told that it was cowardice to count on others to defend our country.

During by-elections in 1937 and 1938, the people were told that there would not be any participation in external wars. I remember very well that one participant had learned his lesson over there; the other would advise his compatriots not to enlist for overseas. When the participation came, it was to be a moderate one, very moderate; it was accepted by the people and by the dissident members in a provincial election because of the assurance given that there would not be any conscription for overseas. Part of the verdict of that provincial election was in favour of providing England and her allies with men and munitions; the larger part of this verdict was an expression of disapproval of the Union National government.

Then the barometer of our war effort made a jump. The "two hundred" had not yet gathered around their loaded tables for their "ever notorious dinner" having as a result a dangerous elevation of colonial blood pressure, but they were already on the job.

The people of this country have accepted and we have voted almost unanimously the mobilization act for Canada. All Canadians are ready to do anything for the country, to defend its soil, their property, their families, their privileges, their freedom of speech—even within the party lines—their freedom of religion, against any invader. As a matter of fact, those farmers' sons whose exemption we have so much trouble in obtaining in some districts, come and tell us that they are ready, when able to leave the farm, to undergo their military service during the winter. Why not give them a definite exemption? It would save a lot of trouble and avoid a certain uneasiness. Many of our industrial workers have left their jobs to enlist; some of them are the only support of a family of ten children.

In some districts where I have been last summer, all the young men of military age—from eighteen and up—are gone for active service. When the notices from the registrar come in, they are sent back with the answer, "already in active service." The farmers cannot find anyone to help them. The other day I read in western papers that there will be a scarcity of men for the next crop. In Arvida, a construction company cannot find the men needed to go on with the operations. Our lumbering industries are also short of men. Where shall we find men if conscription for overseas is voted by this parliament? Certainly not in the United States, because it is not patriotic to count on others to defend our country.

If total war effort means that we have to give others everything we have in man-power, munitions, food stuffs and money, have we not reached that point?

It was announced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that Canada was giving one billion dollars to England and lending $700,000,000 without interest for the duration of the war. Is there any other nation of the British commonwealth going as far as we are? We cannot hide from the people of this country the fact that England, only a few days after our gift and loan were announced, was lending £50,000,000 to China. Of course we understand that China and Russia are helping the democracies to save freedom in the world. But we have also to think of our own Canadian democracy; we have to foresee the danger of exhausting the economic structure of the country as well as the necessary recuperative power of our people. There will, of course, be a period of prosperity which is produced by reconstruction after the war. Money will be abundant; the war industries will not be closing their doors immediately because they will have to provide a reserve of munitions for the small frictions that they will have to organize and feed during the twenty-five years before the next big war. But there will come a period when the market, perfectly controlled and smothering under the murderous grip of the "two hundreds" and their friends, will fall down in order that these Caesars may get their shares back at the lowest possible price. Another crash will send the people down on their knees begging for the dole or place them on the waiting bread-lines.

If the Canadian body has not any strength left, it will be an easy prey. If we have not prepared a plan to meet the reasonable claim of those who have been enduring the miseries of war, of those who have sweated, of the cripples of the families of our soldiers lost and dead somewhere in Europe or in the orient—if we do not organize our economic life to make them love the country for which they have left everything, they will be right in saying that we promise too much and do not give enough.

This is the history of the twenty years we have lived between the first and second world wars. It might be worse this time because our effort is unlimited.

The defence of our country should be our first and most important goal. The remainder of our men available are urgently needed for the protection of both our eastern and western coasts. We have mobilization for our country; it is what we need most. The people of this country would not be asked to release the government from its commitments on conscription for overseas unless there were a possibility that we were going to have it.

The Tory party would have preferred that the Liberals should have this parliament vote conscription sponsored by the government. Then the two parties would have been on an equal footing before the people of Canada. They will never forget that they have been repeatedly defeated in general elections on the conscription issue. That is the only place where they want equality of sacrifice.

I have been a member of both provincial and federal parliaments for fifteen years. I have been supporting the Liberal policy as strongly as my convictions permitted me to do so for over twenty years. I have always asked the people of my county, of my province, to vote in favour of those opposed to any external war participation or to conscription for overseas. I believed, and I still believe, we were right and that this country is entitled to its own decision and direction. I believe, even when I witness the colonial way in which some people are acting in this war, that Canada still can be a nation.

I cannot go back to my people and ask them to release me from my word of honour, because I think it would be retreating. Even if I admit that, under an unreasonable and fanatical pressure, this government has taken the only democratic way, it should, supported by the verdict of the people on the 26th of March, 1940, resist and not let them tear to pieces the magnificent effort Canada has made up till now in this war.

And I will tell the "two hundred" and their friends that if they go on with their scheme and their sabotage of the national economy of this country, with their appeal to fanaticism and their stingy operations, they will throw Canada into the arms of the United States sooner than they think. Canadian opinion, if not already there, is rapidly moving towards the United States of America. Canada is a county of America.

Some people in this country have endeavoured to make the French-Canadian hate England. Our genealogy starts from France and we have been here for centuries; but our mother, real and forever beloved country, is Canada. Canada we want definitely to become a nation.

Much has been said about Quebec. Some have even said that we were ignorant of certain facts, and thus lacking in judgment about certain aspects of Canadian policy as it should be. We are used to that; we pity those who feed themselves with "Down Quebec". Let me read to you a letter of a correspondent of the Montreal Daily Star:

One Who is Weary of Mud Slingers

Sir:—It is high time that someone, and especially an English-speaking Canadian took his fellow-countrymen to task. However, I fully believe that this biased, bigoted, and ignorant criticism of our province of Quebec, usually originates from a small minority of our neighbouring province of Ontario, especially from Toronto, and also from people residing in the province of Quebec, but who were not born in this province. In other words the slams and mud-slinging come from people who detest Quebec for its French-speaking people, or for the bulk of its Roman Catholic population.

For Ontario critics and their ilk I would like to add my protest to that of your correspondent "Jeanne Quebec" (an English Canadian), and inform these know-it-alls, and consistent "flag-wavers" that if it had not been for the support the empire received from French Canada at the time of the American revolution, Canada to-day would not be a part of the commonwealth. Furthermore do not forget that the Maisonneuve regiment was the first to complete its ranks when the war started. Is this regiment an English-speaking one?

There has been too much mud-slinging from these people who do not like Quebec. We have heard from that very broad-minded society, the Orange Order in Ontario. They protested against the celebration of the mass on parliament hill. They protested about the bilingual notices sent out by the dominion government.

I have listened to these critics of our province until I get sick and tired, and wonder how we expect to have a united Canada when, what we believe should be well informed men, deride this province right and left. As a Montrealer, born and educated, I say if they do not like Quebec, let them get out, go somewhere else; we didn't ask them to come here in the first place, and in the name of justice, let them just remember that the people of Quebec, particularly the French-speaking people, are just as good as they are, maybe even better. Furthermore that this is Canada, and because a Canadian may be of some other origin than English he is every bit as good. The flag-wavers should remember that there is no super-race; that is what we are fighting this war to prove.

Do I know what I'm writing about? Yes. One of my friends at this moment together with many of his own are fighting with the British navy overseas, and strange as it may seem they are French Canadians.

Am I French? No, Irish descent, but a Canadian first, last and always. Can the critics of Quebec admit they are Canadian first, last and always? A toast to you Jeanne Quebec. More power to your pen.

Frank J. Meagher.

This is a letter of a man belonging to a minority in Quebec. He knows the fair treatment we give to minorities in our province. They have their share, their freedom of action, and we get along with every one of them. Were he of English descent, he would say the same thing.

This is the example Quebec gives. We have unity in Quebec because we have equality of concessions. We shall have it in Canada if we have equality of concessions. Otherwise I am afraid it will never be permanent.

Mr. W. F. RICKARD (Durham): It is rather a coincidence that two farmers, particularly from the government side, should speak in this house on the one evening. Farmers, of course, are not gifted as speech-makers like men of some other callings.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) gave us a short survey of the agricultural situation in Canada, and I hope for a few minutes to speak of conditions as I know them in Ontario and more especially perhaps in the riding which I have the honour to represent. Before doing that, however, I wish to discuss two or three other matters in regard to our war effort.

Living as I do some fifty miles from the city of Toronto where this committee for total war had its birth, and where the Globe and Mail has quite a large circulation—although I must say not nearly as large as it once was, which condition I believe is characteristic not only of our part of the country but of all the province of Ontario—in speaking of the Globe and Mail I endorse everything the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. McLean) said the other evening. To my mind the Globe and Mail not only has tried to discredit the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government of Canada, but has, to say the least, done no good to Canada's war effort.

We have in the constituency of Durham four weekly newspapers and one daily, all of which carry full-page or half-page advertisements advocating a total war effort, and urging the voters to write their member asking for total war. I have received thirty-six clippings from newspapers, representing about fifty names, and ten letters from individuals and organizations, some in support of an all-out war effort, some absolutely opposed to conscription, others telling me to use my own judgment and do what I think right. I was glad to get these communications because I always like to hear from the people of my constituency on any subject in which they are interested. I believe the people who wrote me were sincere, and I am always glad to get their opinions.

Before I came to Ottawa I was asked by the press to state my position. I declined to do so until I had had an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the facts as far as it was possible to get them, and thinking, of course, that parliament is the proper place in which to express my opinions on such an important subject.

Before continuing what I have to say, I want to add my word of congratulation to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both hon. members did admirably; I only wish I had at my command the eloquence to do as well. I also want to congratulate the Prime Minister upon his wonderfully clear explanation of Canada's war effort. That speech will go down in history as one of the greatest he ever made. More than that, when his career is written the Prime Minister will be classed as one of the greatest statesmen in the world. I only wish every Canadian might have an opportunity of reading that speech. Canada is indeed fortunate that we have a man like our Prime Minister at the head of its government to-day. Notwithstanding all the criticisms that have been hurled at him from all sides, not only inside the house but from outside, by men who want to vent their personal feelings even in war time, notwithstanding all these things, the Prime Minister believes that his word is as good as his bond. I am glad to follow a man of that kind.

The Conservative party, as has been said many times, under the leadership of Doctor Manion definitely opposed conscription in the last election. Hon. members can read the speeches he made in this house, in Brockville, in Quebec, in many western cities and in every part of Canada. He opposed conscription throughout, because of the effect it had in 1917. I was going to say also that the present leader of the Conservative party, Mr. Meighen—but I must now leave out the word "present"—opposed conscription for overseas service without the consent of the people or without the people being consulted. He did this in his Hamilton speech, in his Winnipeg speech, but now, of course, we hear nothing but conscription for overseas service.

Conscription has been made a political football, as if it were the only issue in connection with our war effort. The Prime Minister made certain pledges and promises to the people, and he intends to keep them. Personally I made no promises for or against conscription, but I feel, as every hon. member must, no matter to what party he belongs, that having accepted the policy of his leader, we are practically all in the same boat, we cannot take a different course to-day. The fact that men in high positions and entrusted with the government of certain countries broke their word, regarded their promises as mere scraps of paper is one of the reasons why we are at war to-day. Someone may say, we are at war, we have no time to take a plebiscite. But our war effort will go on just the same.

Then it is said that the Prime Minister is evading responsibility. To my mind, as has been said before, he is asking for responsibility, not evading it. If the time ever comes that in my opinion we need conscription of men for overseas service, then I shall be for it. But I want conscription of everything else as well, man-power, woman-power, industry, labour, wealth and all natural resources, to win this war. I am not interested in politics; I am not interested in any personal gain that may come to me; my sole ambition is, as is that of every hon. member and every one in Canada for that matter, to win this war. That is the paramount concern in our minds to-day.

It is my intention to do everything I can to put this plebiscite across. I am going to ask the people of my riding to vote for the plebiscite, and I am sure they will. I hope hon. members to my left will do likewise. I was very glad to hear the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) the other night say that if this plebiscite is put to the people, he is going to vote for it. That is the true spirit. Here I might remark that the hon. member for Danforth may be the next leader of the Conservative party.

I saw an editorial in the Toronto Daily Star of January 30, 1942, headed "Ignore the Plebiscite." It reads:

Certain conscriptionists hostile to Mr. King and the government—they include an evening contemporary—are advising those of similar views to ignore the plebiscite instead of helping to secure a favourable verdict on it. They must surely not have realized what a favourable verdict will involve.

A favourable verdict will release Mr. King from his pledge not to impose conscription for overseas service. But what does that mean, if not this—that a favourable verdict will remove one of the arguments against the imposition of conscription, namely that conscription is prevented by a government pledge. The issue will then have to be debated in parliament on its merits only. Surely that is what conscriptionists wish. Yet our contemporary advises people to ignore the plebiscite which would, if carried, bring this about.

If the plebiscite carries, Mr. King will have to debate conscription on its merits alone. Our contemporary thinks its merits are overwhelming. How then could it better achieve its well known ambition to put Mr. King on the spot than to put him on this spot, where he will be on what it considers the very weak side of an argument, without any pledge to obscure the issue?

In justice to other newspapers which are opposed to Mr. King on the conscription issue, it must be said that while most of them criticize the holding of a plebiscite, the great majority say that the patriotic thing to do is to carry the plebiscite now that it is to be held. That, of course, is true. Canada should free the government's hands, and thus free the discussion from everything not pertaining to the merits or demerits of conscription as a Canadian policy.

It is not my intention to discuss the war effort at great length. This has been done by many hon. members much better than I could possibly expect to do it. But as I see it, Canada's war effort is divided three ways—the army, munitions of war, and food. Men are required for the army, the navy and the air force—and the army is only one part of the whole war programme. The question seems to be: How shall we raise a part of that part of the war effort? Munitions to-day are reaching a point where it will tax the capacity of this country in money, men for industry and food from the farms. In the air force, of course, the sky is the limit as far as enlistments are concerned. The same is true of the navy. In both these forces we have at present several thousand men on the waiting list. But in the army, as far as overseas service is concerned, there must be a limit, if we are going to provide munitions of war in industry, and production from the farms.

This war is different from the last one, in that we have an air force. We had no such thing in the last war. We had no tanks or tank trailers, or any of dozens of other forms of the mechanized equipment we have in this war.

A survey of man-power under the voluntary system to December 31, 1941, shows that we have enlisted in all branches nearly 425,000 men. In 1941 alone we had over 180,000 in all branches. And from October to January, a period of four months, 32,000 enlisted in the army. In January alone 11,000 enlisted in that branch of the service, and it is expected that this month 15,000 men will enlist. In addition to this, we have 550,000 men and about 75,000 women in industry and munitions.

As was said this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), we shall soon reach 700,000. While the population of Canada is somewhat larger than it was in the last war, yet the number of men of military age who are physically fit is not so much greater. In the last war we had four divisions of armed forces overseas, and in this war we have 425,000 men in the forces, and three or four times as many men in munitions, as at the time of the last war. At the present time we have overseas about 130,000 men, and enlistments for overseas are about 120,000 to 125,000. The Minister of National Defence has definitely stated that he is opposed to calling up men faster than they can be trained. With this I entirely agree. There is no use in taking men if we have no munitions to fight with. It does not matter how brave a man may be, if he has not the proper equipment he is not of much use. Our capacity for training is about 11,000 a month, and we shall have this month about 15,000. These figures are for the army alone. Besides this, we have many battalions on the Pacific and elsewhere in Canada for our own defence.

At this point I want to pay tribute to the armed forces—the boys in the army, the navy and the air force, both officers and men. I pay tribute to industry and to labour, and not the least, to farmers, and to all others who are in any way making this splendid war effort possible; for without the cooperation of everyone of these it would not have been possible.

For a few minutes I should like to discuss agriculture. Given an average crop, and provided they get help, the farmers of Canada should be in a fairly satisfactory position this year. There will be good markets for nearly all they produce, and most likely very fair prices will be offered. The price ceiling which has been enforced has been placed on almost all the farmer has to buy, but it has not been enforced to so great an extent with respect to all he has to sell. Of course in the west, if crops are poor the farmers will have at least a guaranteed minimum return, or some form of government assistance. Wheat and wheat farming constitute, of course, the biggest and the most contentious problem. Despite that, we shall have less wheat to carry over than we have had in previous years.

No farmer can expect to compete with industry and its high wages, when no surplus of labour is offered. Men have left the farm at an alarming rate, and the farmer cannot pay the wages to entice them back. We cannot blame the men for this, because naturally a man or a woman will go where he or she can get the best return for his or her labour. With Great Britain calling for increased supplies of food, as the Prime Minister told us in his speech, the farm labour situation is serious, and is going to be more serious. Something will have to be done about it if we are to produce the maximum of food to feed our allies and ourselves.

I happen to live in an area close to General Motors and the Pickering explosives plant where hundreds of farmers' sons and hired men have gone to work at wages far above those the farmers can afford to pay. I am told there are about 6,000 people working at that plant, and half of them are women. This has crippled agriculture in our district. I believe the same condition is true in many other parts of Ontario.

We are told, of course, that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada and, as I said before, Great Britain needs all we can produce of bacon, cheese, milk, eggs and many other commodities. If we are to produce those things there will have to be some sort of selective service for the farmers. If this is not possible, then I would suggest that the farmer be given some kind of bonus. I do not like the word "bonus" and I do not like bonuses, because I do not agree with that principle. But the farmers must be given some sort of financial assistance so as to compete with wages paid in industry. This must be done at once so that the farmer can plan his production, because that cannot possibly be done at a moment's notice.

Recently a survey was made in my county, and I believe a similar survey has been made generally throughout Ontario. While nothing definite has as yet been published with respect to it, I believe it has been done with the sole purpose of finding out the position of the farmers in that province, and particularly, perhaps, with regard to farm labour. I venture to say that in my county from one-quarter to one-third of the farmers will be asking for an increase by way of help.

I would suggest one other thing with respect to agriculture, and that is that the committee on agriculture be allowed to meet. We are told that there must be something specific or definite to be considered before the committee can be called together. Surely in these times there are enough problems confronting our farmers to warrant this committee functioning. I think there are enough hon. members interested in agriculture to work up some programme that will be of assistance to the government in formulating a policy. I hope the chairman of the agriculture committee will bear these suggestions in mind.

I should like to refer briefly to the four months' training as it affects farmers' sons. Many of these boys have taken their four months' training expecting to be released in order to be able to help on the farm. But this has been found to be almost impossible. I must say that the local board in our district, No. 3 in Kingston, has been most considerate. A great many young men have been given a postponement of a few months, but that is most unsatisfactory. I should like to see some system worked out whereby these boys could be given total exemption as long as they stay on the farm. I believe they can do just as much for Canada's war effort by producing food as they can by serving in any other branch. Instead of setting up boards in districts like Kingston and Toronto, I think it would be much better if smaller boards were set up in the counties or townships. The members of these boards would have a better chance of becoming acquainted with the situation existing in their particular section of the country.

I believe in selective service if it can be worked out, but it presents a great problem. It is no use putting a man who knows nothing about farming on a farm. I have had some experience in that connection, particularly with apple pickers. Men have been sent out from the cities who knew nothing about this work, and we would have been better off without them. There must be something done in this regard. I leave these few thoughts with the government in the hope that they will receive consideration.

In closing let me say: Let us forget our petty differences; let us forget our party politics and all work together to help win this war. In the words of Churchill:

> Come then—let us to the task to the battle and the toil.
> Each to our part, each to our station, fill the armies, rule the air, pour out the munitions, strangle the U-boats, sweep the mines, plough the land, build the ships, guard the streets, succour the wounded, uplift the downcast and honour the brave.
> Let us go forward together . . . in all parts of the empire, in all parts of this island. There is not a week, nor a day, nor an hour to be lost.

Mr. W. R. McDONALD (Pontiac) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as representative of a constituency the population of which is in majority French-Canadian and knowing how interested they are in the present debate, I feel bound to briefly state in French my position in connection with the plebiscite mentioned in the speech from the throne.

Like many other members of the House of Commons, during the electoral campaign, not only have I supported the platform of my leader, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), on conscription, but I have also formally pledged myself to vote against any form of compulsion for overseas service.

The Prime Minister, in the speech delivered in this house and published in the press, has stated the reasons for which his government would submit the following question to the Canadian population by means of a plebiscite:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligations arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

By this democratic measure, the Prime Minister keeps his promises to the Canadian people, setting aside, at the same time, the advice proffered by the opposition and the group of so-called patriots at a recent meeting held in Toronto. Resting my faith in him and in the ministers from my province, I intend to support this proposition. I refuse to betray the confidence of my electors by voting for the amendment of the opposition, which would eventually lead to conscription. I remember with sorrow this evil measure and the methods of its enforcement in our province during the last war. I shall state my special reasons in the English portion of my speech.

(Text) Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can be accused of being a frequent offender in taking up the time of this house. My reason for doing so to-night is the fact that the questions at issue in this debate, particularly those relating to the plebiscite, are of the greatest importance to the people of Canada and are none the less interesting to my constituents.

Before proceeding to make known my attitude regarding the plebiscite, I should like to refer to the National Resources Mobilization Act, which, in my humble opinion, should be amended. I refer particularly to that section under which farmers and farmers' sons may have their call to service postponed by making application to the registrar of the district from which they receive their notice. Several hon. members who have preceded me in this debate, particularly the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), have revealed the hardships imposed upon those who are entitled to postponement of their services when they are making application because of the fact that the committee charged with the duty of studying their case and rendering judgment is located at too great a distance from the applicant's home to give him an opportunity of appearing in person or of being represented by someone in order that his case may be submitted in the proper light. I am in complete accord with the hon. member when he submits that a change in this procedure is necessary. I believe there should be set up in each county a tribunal or committee of some kind to deal with this.

I would go so far as to suggest an amendment to the act whereby those persons who fall into the category of those entitled to postponement of service would be granted an exemption. No great amount of argument is necessary to prove that the presence of a farmer or a farmer's son is necessary upon the farm, not only for three or six months, but for the entire year, if the farm is to be worked to its full productive capacity and the farming community throughout Canada enabled to answer the call of the government for an all-out production during this war period.

As is the case no doubt with many other members of this house, I have received numerous letters from farmers in my constituency asking me to use my influence to have their sons exempted. Of course, mine was the stereotyped reply:

> I beg to inform you that I can exercise no influence on your behalf, much as I appreciate your position and am desirous to assist you to attain that to which you or your son should be entitled—not postponement only—but exemption from service.

I have before me several letters along this line from which I shall quote briefly. One is from a farmer who relates to me that his eldest son enlisted voluntarily in the service last fall, and to that he takes no objection. In fact the father says, "I am proud of him." But now his other son, the only help he has on the farm, is being called for service under the mobilization act, and the father says, "I am of the opinion in all justice that he should be exempted from service." Another letter is from a young farmer up in the northern part of my county, a young married man who is established on a farm of one hundred acres. He mentions that he has horses, cattle and sheep, and that twenty-five acres of his hundred acres is ready for sowing next spring, but a call for service will mean that his farm will remain uncultivated next year.

I also received to-day a largely signed petition to the same effect from a group of farmers in my county. I shall present the petition to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to-morrow because it is addressed to him. I respectfully suggest to the government that serious consideration be given to this proposed amendment. I am well aware that there might be abuses in regard to these exemptions, but I am strongly of opinion that there can be found throughout the country men sufficiently imbued with a sense of responsibility and patriotic enough to act upon these tribunals, if established, in each county, who will perform their duties in a conscientious manner.

Let me return to the question of the plebiscite mentioned in the speech from the throne and already discussed at some length in this chamber. Like many other members of this house, during the election campaign of 1940 I accepted the candidature of the Liberal party under the leadership of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and in that capacity I accepted in its entirety the programme submitted by him to the people of Canada. Included therein was a clause providing for the enlistment of Canada's army under a voluntary system and a direct promise that conscription would not be introduced. My election is a direct consequence of my acceptance of the candidature of the party and its programme during the campaign and I consider myself in honour bound to give my loyal support to my leader and my party, even if I were not further bound by a personal pledge to my constituents who voted against conscription. That pledge, conscientiously given at the time and with a full knowledge and experience of the baneful effects of conscription in the last war, I intend to honour, notwithstanding certain intimations here and in the press of the country that one should consider himself automatically absolved from these commitments, having in mind the serious war situation prevailing to-day. But, Mr. Speaker, it has been my honour and privilege to represent the provincial county of Pontiac in the legislature of Quebec for sixteen years and the greater county of Pontiac in the federal house for seven years, making in all a total representation of twenty-three years. I am bound to say, sir, knowing positively that I have retained the confidence of my electorate over that period of time chiefly by respecting the mandates which they gave me, never violating my pledged word to them and never fearing to face squarely any issue which confronted me, that it is now too late for me to change my attitude and adopt a course which I would condemn in another and which in myself I could not conscientiously condone. Therefore on this occasion I shall stand or fall by my leader and my party, and in doing so I am not only following the dictates of my conscience but retaining my self-respect.

Conscription recalls memories to me, memories of the introduction of the Military Service Act and of the manner in which it was adopted in this chamber by use of the closure, memories of the War-time Elections Act, characterized by Sir Wilfrid Laurier as a blot upon every instinct of justice, and memories in particular of the shameful election campaign of 1917, in which it was the main issue.

Certain members on the other side of the house criticize the members from the province of Quebec for having made use of this issue and continuing to do so during our election campaigns even to the present day. To that accusation I plead guilty. I, as a humble member from the province of Quebec, shall continue this course without any apology to anyone for my conduct so long as there remain in the ranks of the Conservative party both inside and outside this house the men who planned and carried out that slanderous campaign against my native province. The memories of that campaign linger; in fact, they are seared in my mind. I can quite appreciate the attitude of certain Conservatives who honestly seek an end to this kind of controversy, but let me suggest to them in all sincerity, if they are sincere in this attitude, to use their influence in their own party to see that these political, racial and religious bigots of 1917 and their imitators of to-day are ostracized once and for all.

Might I also suggest to them to use their influence to quash the movement started during the last session, and daily gaining momentum again to make the province of Quebec the butt of an unjust and unfair criticism, trying once again to inflame public sentiment against our people. Let them not delude themselves with the idea that we are not aware of this movement, sometimes openly carried on in the press in Ontario and at other times by ingratiating speeches in this house—sometimes often whispered from mouth to mouth that these blankety-blank Frenchmen in the province of Quebec must be made to enlist and do their duty. They have no evidence to support their statement that the French-Canadians in the province of Quebec are not enlisting in as large numbers as those of any other nationality; but they must use this insinuation against them. I might state here—and I am pleased to state it—that I know a messenger of this house, whom I am proud to name—his name is Guertin—the father of eight sons, five of them of military age, and all five overseas.

Such an ingratiating speech as I referred to a while ago was made by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) on June 13, 1941, and reported in Hansard, at pages 3947 and 3948, from which I quote:

I received a clipping the other day from the Winnipeg Tribune of May 28 containing a letter in favour of conscription. I shall not read the letter, but I should like to refer to the editor's footnote which is as follows:

"Recruiting figures show that the number of active service force volunteers, per thousand of population, is higher for French-Canadians than for English-speaking Canadians."

The Winnipeg Tribune was paying that tribute to the French-Canadians. But the hon. member for Parkdale goes on to say in his ingratiating manner:

No one would be more pleased than I if that were true—

The doubt is sown there.

—but so far as I am aware no reply has been given by the minister to the questions which have been asked in connection with recruiting in the various provinces, unless it was in his speech of May 12 last. . . .

He would be pleased, Mr. Speaker, if that were true! He wants evidence of it, and he will await the reply of the minister before he will make up his mind. In Hansard of the same date, as reported at page 3948, he stated:

I should now like to quote from a French-Canadian newspaper to show the changed attitude in that province—

Speaking of Quebec.

—in respect of Canada's participation in war outside of Canada.

In respect to that, I have this to say. Quebec entered fully and completely into the war in 1939. She has made no change, and she is as completely into the war to-day as any other province of Canada. That is my answer to the hon. member for Parkdale in this ingratiating and insinuating speech of his.

Quite in contrast to that speech—and I commend the hon. member upon it—is the speech the same day of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I am sorry that the hon. member is not at the moment in the chamber; I wish to compliment him upon it. He said, as reported at page 3954 of Hansard:

I have no French blood in my veins, but I believe that those who do come from that part of Canada are as anxious and as willing to serve as those from any other part of this dominion and to assert the contrary is to do a great disservice to Canada and its unity of purpose.

I thank the hon. member for Lake Centre for that expression of opinion.

The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) also devoted a considerable part of his speech to the province of Quebec, taking issue with the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), the mover of the address. I fully concur in the views of the hon. member for Hull, and I congratulate him most heartily upon the subject matter of his address in both languages, also upon the manner of its delivery.

This propaganda campaign, because it is nothing else, prompted Mrs. Black, wife of the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Black), who herself graced this chamber with her presence in the last parliament, to publish a letter of protest in the Ottawa Journal, from which I quote:

With extreme regret, as well as great annoyance, I have noted a growing habit of accusing Quebec of lack of loyalty to Canada and the empire, because of an aversion to compulsory military service.

Probably no member of parliament, with his wife, does of necessity cover more of Canada from the far north to the east than do George Black, M.P. for Yukon, and I. In our many trips across Canada we have observed as much apathy and lack of enthusiasm for active service in the armed forces of Canada in other provinces as in Quebec.

Let us of the other parts of this dominion forget our smug complacency and force ourselves to realize that Quebec is as loyal as the other provinces.

We are component parts of a great empire. Let each one do his, or her, part to unite Canada in support of that empire, forgetting petty racial and religious prejudices. We must work, we must fight for the right to worship one God, to be loyal to one King, and to hold a united empire, that our children's children may enjoy the freedom we hold so dear.

I sincerely thank Mrs. Black, wife of the hon. member for the Yukon, for those words.

This campaign of propaganda also reached the ears of the provincial treasurer of Quebec, Hon. J. A. Mathewson. He had occasion to address a district convention of Kiwanis International in Montreal on September 22, 1941, when, as reported in the Montreal Star, he said:

In his preliminary remarks the provincial treasurer declared his belief that a really serious misunderstanding existed in Canada concerning the attitude of French Canada and French-Catholic Quebec. "There are no more true-hearted Canadians in all this broad dominion than French-Canadians", declared Mr. Mathewson, "and no people who more thoroughly appreciate and understand the value of the British empire so deeply as French-Canadians."

The speaker expressed the opinion that Quebec has fallen into the unfortunate position of being the whipping boy of the dominion—

Note the expression, Mr. Speaker, "the whipping boy"; and that is true.

—those things that are not desired by other provinces any more than by this province are not carried out because of the fear it would not please Quebec and Quebec would not like this or that.

"That is a mask, and an insincere pretext," declared Mr. Mathewson. "If the other provinces come out and say what they would like to be done, we are prepared to sit down and reason with them as to the contribution we can make to the common cause. We may have fanatics in this province, but we have no monopoly of that odious animal, he is found in every province in no less vigorous form than he is found here."

Commenting on that speech of the provincial treasurer, the Montreal Star of September 23, said in part as follows. After referring to the fact that Mr. Mathewson had said, "There are no more true-hearted Canadians in all this broad dominion than French-Canadians, and no people more thoroughly appreciate and understand the value of the British empire so deeply as French-Canadians," the Star goes on to say:

Critics of the province should understand these things. Mr. Mathewson says that Quebec has fallen into the unfortunate position of being a "whipping boy" of the dominion, and while the statement is perhaps too broad a generalization, there exists the tendency to blame Quebec for any gaps in Canadian unity when, as a matter of fact, there are many people outside this province who would not close the gaps if they could, preferring their emotional prejudices and private interests to unity based on common understanding and an identity of social and economic interest.

Much is made, as Mr. Mathewson inferred, of political fears that this or that cannot be done in Canada because it might not please Quebec. A great deal of arrant nonsense is talked around this idea. Such a consideration might influence the petty politician, but we are growing up politically, and if Quebec's possible reactions are factors in determining a course of action, in common with every other province, that is as it should be, for this province is a unit in our federal system and has an equal right to be heard with all the other units.

So much for the propaganda campaign.

Let me consider this conscription issue from another angle, that of national unity. In its issue of January 16 the Ottawa Journal published editorially, under the heading, "Speaking of National Unity", an article a copy of which I have, in which the idea of the disruption of national unity was pooh-poohed if conscription should be adopted in this country. The article states in part:

This country is united in this war. All its provinces are united. That being admitted everywhere, and proclaimed ardently everywhere, what is the basis of this talk that adoption of a particular method of waging war would disrupt national unity? To hear certain people talking almost in bated breath about conscription and national unity, one might almost imagine that conscription would bring rebellion.

What section, what part of Canada is thus bring stigmatized with potential treason? Is it Quebec?

In answer to that question, "What section, what part of Canada is thus being stigmatized with potential treason—is it Quebec?", if the inference is that it is Quebec, it is most unfair. Quebec has always been loyal. It is loyal to-day and will continue to be loyal. If the time ever comes, which God forbid, when Quebec should decide that her future does not lie within the confines of the confederation pact, she will proceed in a constitutional manner to attain her end. Quebec is loyal.

Let me digress for a moment to read an excerpt from an address given by Mr. Louis St. Laurent, who was elected yesterday as Minister of Justice, replacing our late lamented friend, the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe. Speaking before the Canadian Life Insurance Officers' Association in Toronto, as reported in the Montreal Star of May 30, 1941, he said:

"Let me take you back to a little settlement over 130 years ago, to be exact to August 30, 1807," he said.

"It is Sunday morning in the parish of La Baie St. Paul, a settlement on the north shore of the St. Lawrence about 60 miles below Quebec. A proclamation calling volunteers to take up arms to defend their country against a threatened invasion from the United States has been posted on the church door. The people are all agog over the ominous news of war. They troop into the little church and kneel in prayer and at the appointed moment, the parish priest, Father Louis Lelievre, mounts the pulpit. For this occasion, he has written out what he will say to his flock.

Here are two paragraphs from those notes which a friend of mine recently found among his books and papers which he bequeathed to the library of his alma mater, the old seminary of Quebec:

"Brethren, it is my duty at this time to express my views to you on the terrible scourge (still uncertain I hope) with which we are threatened. We are told by political leaders that war between England and the United States appears to be unavoidable. For my part I trust that with the Lord's grace, appeasement can still be achieved and that the peace we have enjoyed for 48 years may continue. But assuming that the forecast be realized, what else can we do in such a crisis but show ourselves to be faithful and loyal subjects and give our gracious sovereign, King George, shining proof of our attachment to his crown and of our devotion to his interests which are our own and of our readiness to shed our blood for the defence of our homeland. In a word, be ready my brethren, to show by your deeds, your zeal and your courage to support a government which has treated you so generously. In so doing you will make yourselves worthy of the countless advantages you have enjoyed and especially of that liberty which has ever been yours since we have been so fortunate as to live under British government.

That was the voice of a humble priest in the province of Quebec in 1807, about forty years odd after the conquest. Yet there are men in Canada to-day who will say that there is disloyalty among the French-Canadians. We Anglo-Saxons in Canada are of yesterday. The French-Canadian has been rooted in the soil for a period of almost 400 years; and yet he is not supposed to be loyal to that country wherein he has lived for 400 years. It is ridiculous.

Returning to the point of national unity, I wonder whether the organizers of the election campaign of 1917, and those newspapers which gave publicity to the literature of that time, realize how close they came to bringing about disruption. I would ask them in all sincerity if the publication and circulation of those pamphlets, excerpts from which I am about to quote, tended to bring about unity. I have before me Union government election pamphlets of 1917, and I will give one or two quotations just to show what they used against us at that time, what false accusations they made against us, what false charges they made, and how they slandered the name of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Here is one item:

> Make no mistake. If Laurier wins Canada will send no more reinforcements to the front, which practically means quitting the war and placing the country in the same class as Russia.

And number two:

> French-Canadians who have shirked their duty in this war will be the dominating force in the government of the country. Are the English-speaking people prepared to stand for that?

That is from literature of the campaign of 1917 by the Union government which some distinguished patriots whom we have in Toronto to-day would like to carry on.

There is another one, and this is the "most unkindest cut of all." This is furthest away from the truth of anything that could be published. Listen to it; you are from the province of Quebec, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and it will be news to you:

> Laurier gladly takes Bourassa to his bosom.

Then there are extracts from French-Canadian newspapers. But that title in particular caught my eye, "Laurier gladly takes Bourassa to his bosom." Laurier did not take Bourassa to his bosom. The Conservative party took Bourassa to its bosom in 1911. I stated in my speech in March last year, that we had fought on two occasions, in a provincial election and a dominion election against sixty-five nationalists in Quebec—and an election was fought against one of them yesterday in that province. How did they attain the influence they exercised in Quebec, particularly in 1911? By the very fact that Sir Robert Borden and his government made a pact with Bourassa to finance his candidates in Quebec and paid for subscriptions to his newspaper Le Devoir to spread his propaganda throughout this country.

My belief, Mr. Speaker, is that that propaganda was not the most loyal ever propagated. Then turn round and say that Laurier took Bourassa to his bosom after they took him to their bosom, and we have had from that time to the present the reflection of these men in the province of Quebec, due to this loyal Conservative party. They cast aside everything they stood for, including their patriotism in 1911, to gain a victory over Laurier. They won twenty-seven seats out of sixty-five in Quebec by that, and to-day they would like to charge the Liberals of Quebec with having taken these men to our bosom. They are reaping what they sowed, but they cannot cast a reflection on us.

The resultant effect of this campaign of insult and slander directed particularly against the French-Canadians in Quebec was the introduction of the following resolution in the legislature during the session of 1918:

> That this house is of opinion that the province of Quebec would be disposed to accept the breaking of the confederation pact of 1867 if, in the other provinces, it is believed that she is an obstacle to the union, progress and development of Canada.

That motion was proposed by Mr. J. N. Francoeur. The premier at that time was Sir Lomer Gouin, and through his influence the motion was withdrawn. But I say this to-day, having in mind this propaganda directed against us, if it continues, are we certain that there will always be men like Sir Lomer Gouin at the head of public affairs in Quebec? Can we reasonably expect these French-Canadians to continue to lend a deaf ear to these reflections on their loyalty, these gratuitous insults directed at them by a blind, fanatical group? My advice to them is, Beware, Watch, Look, Listen.

I am not going to undertake the defence of the war effort of Quebec since 1939; that was very ably done to-night by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and I personally thank him. This province has done her duty thus far and is determined to continue to do so, and in return she asks only that she be treated with the respect and consideration which are rightly her due.

In the by-elections of yesterday the people in no uncertain manner gave their answer to those who, by their speeches and writings, would destroy the unity of this country. They have definitely consigned to the limbo of forgotten men the Meighens, the Hepburns, the Drews and others of their ilk, whence we hope they will never be resurrected.

In discussing this issue of conscription to-night, my mind reverts to my last conversation with the late Minister of Justice, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, in his office on the morning of November 3 last, the date of resumption of the last session. The conversation having turned on conscription, he expressed his unalterable opposition to it, chiefly upon the ground that it would disrupt national unity. His last words to me were: "I will oppose this measure with all my strength, even to my last breath." Alas, Mr. Speaker, he made his last appearance in this chamber that afternoon. To the memory of this earnest advocate and fearless champion of Canadian unity, loyal follower and worthy successor of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I pay my humble tribute of respect. To his wife and family I extend my sincere sympathy, while o'er his grave I reverently breathe a fervent Requiescat in pace.

On motion of Mr. Crète the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.56 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

WAGE CEILING

ORDER IN COUNCIL AMENDING ORIGINAL ORDER AS TO PROMOTIONS, NEW APPOINTMENTS AND BONUSES

On the order for motions:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table order in council dated February 6, 1942, relating to a ceiling on salaries and to make a brief statement in explanation. I am tabling for comparison a copy of the original order.

This amending order is intended to clarify the application of the original order and to alter some details of its provisions in regard particularly to promotions, new appointments, and the payment of bonuses. I should like to draw attention to the fact that in clarifying the definition of salaried official, this amending order definitely places some employees under the wages and cost of living bonus order, thereby entitling them to the cost of living bonus from their employers.

All persons receiving salaries or wages of less than $175 a month are excluded from the class of salaried official and made subject to the wages and cost of living bonus order. All those receiving $250 or more a month are considered to be salaried officials unless their duties or responsibilities show clearly that they are not above the rank of foreman or comparable rank, in which case they are subject to the wages order. The national war labour board, or its regional boards, are made responsible for determining the status of any employee or any class of employees in case of doubt or dispute. The national board has already issued a number of general interpretative rulings on this matter and will be issuing others in due course.

Another change is intended to remove the source of what is regarded as discrimination within many organizations where highly paid workmen or foremen are entitled to a cost of living bonus under the wages order while junior salaried officials earning no more, or even less, are prevented from receiving such a bonus by the provisions of the salaries order. The amending order permits an employer to pay a cost of living bonus to salaried officials earning no more than other employees of the same employer who are entitled to such bonus under the wages order. This special permission is not allowed to apply to officials receiving more than $4,200 per year, and the general limit of $3,000 on those permitted to receive the bonus remains applicable where the special circumstances are not present.

Other provisions of the amending order extend the control to salaries of those hired after the original order went into effect. An employer is not permitted to pay to a newly-appointed salaried official a rate of salary higher than the rate previously paid to another official performing substantially the same services, or if there is no such guide, the employer shall not pay a rate of salary higher than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the rates paid to salaried officials for similar services in like business. This provision is intended, among other things, to check the practice of employers trying to entice employees from one another by the promise of higher salaries.

To avert any danger of an employer paying a higher initial rate of salary than he otherwise would to a newly-hired or newly-promoted official because that rate must not be subsequently increased under the terms of the order, the amending order provides that an employer may, in accord with his established practice, and by arrangement, pay first a probationary or temporary rate of salary, to be followed by a higher rate, in cases of new appointments or promotions taking place after the order went into effect.

There are a considerable number of minor changes in wording, and definitions. A specific limitation is put on directors' fees instead of relying upon the general restrictions on salaries being applied. The intent of the original order is made clear by explicitly stating that the amount of any cost of living bonus being paid when the order went into effect shall be considered as part of the rate of salary at that time. The definition of employers subject to the order is altered to exclude all public hospitals, and all religious, charitable and educational institutions not carried on for gain. Notification is required of promotions within three months of the first payment of the increased salary, where it is not already required in advance. I will not attempt to go into further detail, as copies of the order are available to all those interested.

Perhaps I should add that in the administration of this order by the income tax division, it is possible to obtain a close check on what is happening to all salaries by an inspection both of employee's and employer's tax returns. There is one other minor change which it may be necessary to make for administrative reasons, in addition to these amendments, and this may involve another brief order shortly.

PRIVILEGE—MR. RALSTON

LIMITATION UNDER MOBILIZATION ACT WITH RESPECT TO SERVICE OVERSEAS

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Last night while I was not in the house the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) raised a question of privilege with respect to a passage between himself and myself when I was speaking yesterday afternoon. My hon. friend mentioned the matter to me in the corridor, and I do not accuse him of any intention to cause embarrassment by raising it while I was not in the house. I really did not understand from him that he was going to raise it in the house; I thought he was going to mention it to me. In the short time at my disposal I have endeavoured to have gone over by my "research department," as he calls it, the matter of the speeches which were made and the effect of what was said at the time. I should like to refer to the language a little more extensively than he has. When speaking yesterday I referred to the passing of the National Resources Mobilization Act and the limitation which was contained in section 3 which restricts compulsory service under the act to service in Canada. I said, as reported on page 453 of Hansard:

The present leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was in the house at the time; he took no exception to that limitation. His only suggestion was that the act might be extended to service in Labrador. And he and his party supported that measure with that restriction in it.

The leader of the opposition then said:

Did I not say I was prepared to accept that as a half-way measure?

I took it that he was referring to the limitation to service in Canada. I then said:

I am quite satisfied my hon. friend used no such language.

My hon. friend then referred to my research department having let me down. Apparently he then started his research department going over the debate. I must say that if my department let me down, his department has worked overtime because he has gone back to the speech which he made, not while the bill was under discussion or in committee, but before it was even introduced, a speech which was made after the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had announced the general terms of the measure. Last night he quoted a passage saying that he had made a proposal to the government that the government should take authority to mobilize all the man-power and all the material resources of this nation for the aid of the mother country and for the defence of Canada. I say again, that speech was made considerably before the bill was introduced, before even the resolution was introduced, and I do not think he would find that phrase again repeated when the bill was under discusssion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When in committee.

Mr. RALSTON: But he has referred to two passages in which he did, I freely admit, refer to half a loaf being better than no bread. That is on pages 913 and 914 of Hansard of June 19, 1940. And he quoted these two passages last night (see page 471 of Hansard of yesterday) to show what he had said when the bill was in committee. There he says:

I should like to emphasize the fact that the bill is purely and simply enabling legislation, and while it falls short of what many people in this dominion think is necessary and have been demanding, yet on balance and on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread at all, we on this side of the house are prepared to accept the principle of the bill and to accept the measure for what it is worth.

Then in the second column of page 917 of Hansard of 1940 he says about the same thing. I quote his remarks on page 917 (see page 471 of Hansard of yesterday):

I tell the Prime Minister it has not been easy to support the principle of this bill, having regard to the volume of representations I had received beforehand in favour of something more far-reaching, and the protests I have been receiving this morning that we should still have something greater. But as I said before, for the defence of Canada if for nothing else I am willing to support the principle of this bill; because half a loaf is better than no bread.

My hon. friend, I freely admit, did use that expression; I had forgotten that; in fact, it had not been called to my attention for, I think, the fairly obvious reason that I was discussing what was said with regard to section 3 of the bill which has to do with the matter of restriction of compulsory service. These two passages which my hon. friend quoted last night were spoken on section 2 of the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, no, on the whole bill.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. It was while section 2 of the bill was being discussed in committee. I referred my hon. friend to the pages of Hansard, and he will find that is the fact. I have had my research department go back through my hon. friend's speech to find out what he was referring to when he said that half a loaf was better than no bread. Was he referring to the matter of restriction of compulsory service in Canada, or what was he referring to? I am not going to trouble the house to read all the passages, but I say this to my hon. friend, and he can look it up for himself. The four objections he was taking to the bill were: first, that the emergency declaration—he did not make this objection very clearly—which he had asked for from the Prime Minister was, he thought, not sufficient if simply put in the preamble to the bill. Second, he protested or complained that it was only enabling legislation and that therefore the government could do nothing or something just as they saw fit. Third, he went extensively into the procedure as to the Military Service Act of 1917, and hon. gentlemen will find when they read his long speech, made before the bill was introduced at all, that he was suggesting that there should be inserted in the mobilization bill all the provisions which were in the Military Service Act of 1917, or similar provisions with regard to exemptions and so on. His fourth objection —and he brought this out particularly—was that there was not sufficient indication of how the government was to act with regard to the mobilization of wealth. That was very much on his mind, and he dealt with it extensively in his speech.

These were the four things I found which he might have referred to as half a loaf. But what I did not find is that he ever thought or suggested that it was half a loaf simply because compulsory service was confined to Canada. Let me read a passage from that same speech from which my hon. friend first quoted last night—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, is this a matter of privilege?

Mr. POULIOT: You are greatly disturbed and perturbed since Monday night.

Mr. RALSTON: Here is what my hon. friend said—and I remind the house that the Prime Minister had in his statement prior to the bill said that recruitment for overseas service would be maintained on a voluntary basis.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, surely this is carrying a question of privilege beyond all reasonable limits. We may disagree about the interpretation of what I said, but the point to which I referred last night was the minister's denial that I had ever said that I accepted the principle of the bill on the theory that half a loaf was better than no bread. It looks now as though it was simply a question of interpretation of my remarks, and I am sure there is no question of privilege in that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The minister is entitled to speak on that.

Mr. RALSTON: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I point out to my hon. friend that he interrupted me when I had referred to the restriction of the bill and said:

> Did I not say I was prepared to accept that as a halfway measure?

Meaning, I took it, the restriction in the bill, and I am pointing out that if that was the interpretation, I was justified in what I said. He did not say that that restriction of the bill made it a halfway measure.

Mr. SPEAKER: With regard to the point of order raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), the hon. minister is entitled, of course, to reply, on a question of privilege, to what was said last night, but he is not entitled to bring in new matter. He must confine himself solely to rebuttal of what was said. I have not noticed that any new matter has been introduced by the minister in rebuttal, but I must urge upon him that he must confine himself strictly to rebuttal.

Mr. RALSTON: I am certainly not bringing in any new matter, Mr. Speaker. I am dealing with the question whether my hon. friend objected to the restriction in the bill and whether, when he said that he referred to it as a halfway measure, he was referring to the restriction in the bill. I am proposing on that point to quote what my hon. friend said in the house in the same speech to which he has referred as indicating that he was not objecting to that restriction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is simply a matter of interpretation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; it was a question of privilege.

Mr. RALSTON: I was going on to say that at page 859 of Hansard of June 18, 1940, after the Prime Minister had announced that recruiting for overseas would be maintained, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition said:

> The Prime Minister has announced that a bill will be introduced to-day to empower the government to mobilize all the resources of the nation, human and material, for the defence of Canada. That is good; everybody will applaud it. Material aid to the mother country will come from it; that result cannot help following. The trend of events in Canada and in the struggle will indicate how much farther the government should go.
> I am pleased to note that recruitment for overseas service will be continued. I hope the enforcement of national service in Canada will in no degree retard our contribution for overseas service. If the war is to cease on continental Europe I can quite understand that we shall not require to send as much manpower overseas. But there will still be great need for material things being sent over—there will be the need for food, clothing, and shelter for the aid and comfort of our people. There will be the need for munitions, and then more munitions, and then more munitions, from Canada.

I say that that indicates clearly that my hon. friend did not object to section 3 of the bill, which was the point I was endeavouring to make.

May I conclude with this. My point was that my hon. friend did not object to that restriction, and the best evidence of that is his own remarks at pages 967 and 968 of Hansard of 1940, where you will find exactly what I said he said, namely, that the only suggestion he made was that compulsory service be extended to Labrador. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, to have taken the time of the house for so long. I thought that some hon. members might want to read and enjoy these passages as Sunday reading or in their leisure time, and so I am giving the house the references to enable them to do so. They are all that my "research department" are able to find: Hansard, 1940, pages 853 to 855; 857 to 861; 913 to 932; 939 to 967; 967 to 976.

Mr. CASSELMAN: What is the situation at Singapore to-day?

THE WAR IN THE FAR EAST

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER NEWS OF DEVELOPMENTS AT SINGAPORE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): We have been disputing—the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and myself—over a matter of interpretation and not of very much consequence. Now would the Prime Minister be good enough to tell us what is the latest news from Singapore?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have to make the same reply as I made to my hon. friend a day or two ago. Such word as the government has received with respect to Singapore differs in no essential particular from what has appeared in the press.

Mr. CASSELMAN: The situation is very serious.

AID TO THE EMPIRE AND ALLIED FORCES IN THE PACIFIC AND EASTERN ASIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I would like to ask the government if one of its members, before the close of the present debate, will clarify various statements already given regarding the trouble in the Pacific and the far east, so that the country can understand what we are doing and are ready to do for our empire and allies in those areas where the danger is.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I really am prepared to answer some aspects of the question of my hon. friend, but I thought it desirable before making a reply to communicate further with London, as perhaps he would be better pleased to have the reply from that source. I hope to have it soon.

Mr. CHURCH: Our belated air bases on the Pacific are of very little real value without adequate sea power back of them.

TAXATION CONFERENCE

AVAILABILITY OF REPORT—CANADIANS AT SINGAPORE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, is it the intention of the government to make the report of the last interprovincial conference available to all members of parliament; and if so, will it be an unrevised copy?

I have two other questions to ask as a private Liberal member of this hon. house: (1) Did any member of the government inform the provincial representatives attending this conference that there were Canadian soldiers, sailors or airmen at Singapore as well as at Hong Kong? (2) If so, (a) how many of each branch of the army; (b) who are their commanding officers; (c) does the government get in touch with those men now?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend's questions are too long to answer on the orders of the day, but they will be noted as a question.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): For fear there may be a misapprehension in the mind of the hon. member for Témiscouata, may I add a short statement. He asked whether or not at a conference with provincial representatives some member of the government had advised that Canadian troops were at Singapore. I do not know anything about what took place at the conference. But I want to say for the information of the hon. member and of the house that there are no Canadian troops at Singapore. There may be, of course, and there are, Canadian individuals in the air force and the navy and, probably, in the British forces, but there are no Canadian forces.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION

QUESTION AS TO RESUMPTION OF WORK BY OTTAWA CAR AND AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): In view of the great need of aircraft, as exemplified by the statement which came over the radio yesterday that the defenders of Singapore were using obsolete aeroplanes, what action does the government propose to take to see to it that the five hundred employees of Ottawa Car and Aircraft Limited who were laid off are again put back to the work of producing aircraft?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I may say that Ottawa Car and Aircraft Limited were never prime contractors for aircraft. They make parts, and largely for other contractors. They are not prime contractors of the government except in a very small way. There has been some reorganization there, and I sincerely hope that the work can be restored shortly.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

EFFECT OF INCREASED ALLOWANCE BY BRITISH COLUMBIA GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I should like to ask the acting Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) a question based on the report which appeared in the press a few days ago announcing that old age pensions have been advanced by the British Columbia government from $20 to $25 a month. Is it the intention of this government to see to it, if the matter is within their power, that old age pensions are advanced in all the provinces to assist in meeting the increased cost of living?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I believe the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) has directed his question to the wrong department. The Department of Labour has nothing to do with the administration or the payment of old age pensions. My hon. friend will remember that both are functions of the Department of Finance.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can answer the question. The action taken by the British Columbia government is for the account of the province of British Columbia alone. The dominion government makes no contribution to the additional $5 a month. The position of this government was made clear in a statement which I made to this house in November. If the hon. member will look at it he will see to what extent this government is prepared to go with regard to old age pensions.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Has the Canadian government by order in council amended the old age pension regulations so that the increased pension being paid by the government of British Columbia will not involve a corresponding reduction on the part of the federal government?

Mr. ILSLEY: Steps have been taken towards that end, but I do not know what stage they have reached. I believe we have communicated with all the provinces with regard to such an amendment of the regulations, and I do not know that replies have been received from all the provinces. I will find out what the present position is, and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. QUELCH: Can the minister say what is the immediate situation in British Columbia? Will there be an increase, or will no increase be effected until action has been taken by the federal government?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot say what is the situation in this respect at the moment.

MERCHANT SHIPPING

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF CANADIAN PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. The statement is attributed to him that this year Canada will produce a tonnage of merchant shipping equal to that produced in the United Kingdom. If this is so, it is a magnificent effort. Can the minister give the details to this house, or if not, will he furnish particulars to hon. members in whose ridings shipyards are located?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The statement I made was that the programme of production in Canada of merchant ships during 1942 is practically as large as the programme for Great Britain. These two statements, perhaps, are parallel; at least both are statements of intention, and I think the accomplishment will follow the intention. I am not particularly interested in giving statements to hon. members representing particular ridings, but I should be very glad to supply full details of our merchant shipping construction programme to all hon. members at a convenient time.

YUKON AIRPORTS

QUESTION AS TO DEFENCE MEASURES IN STRATEGIC AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): On Friday last I asked what steps, if any, are being taken for the defence of the airports in the Yukon. The Minister of National Defence said he would consult with the Minister of National Defence for Air. I wonder if he can give an answer now.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): My hon. friend knows, as I spoke to him personally, that the matter is at present under discussion between the Minister of National Defence for Air and myself and the chiefs of staff.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. ALPHIDA CRETE (St. Maurice-Laflèche) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I regret my inability to associate myself with the members of the Conservative opposition in the cruel loss they have just sustained.

Throughout the present debate I have followed with an attention and a patience worthy of a better cause the speeches of the Tory group which constitutes the official opposition in this house. These hon. gentlemen can scarcely be taxed with originality. They all dwell in the same house—the Hotel Empire—utter the same words and use the same gestures, the only slight difference being in the tone of voice. Their very limited vocabulary partakes rather of finance than of the academy. They have only got to the letter C of the dictionary, and even then by skipping A and B. The word "conscription" is their only question and their only answer. Outside of this word, which they appear to be able to articulate correctly, there is total paralysis of the tongue and of the brain. They are somewhat like those monks who when meeting each other say "you will die" or like whippoorwills uttering the same continuous cry throughout the night.

When these gentlemen want conscription nothing must stand in the way, not even a plebiscite. They are deaf to all arguments. Whenever someone utters the word "conscription," these portly gentlemen jump up from their sleep. They show anxiety or joyfulness, according as conscription is hidden by a cloud or becomes more visible. One would think they had already begun to reckon their war profits.

Two questions may quite properly be asked: Firstly, who is demanding the enactment of this supremely detestable measure? Secondly, against whom is their attempt aimed? It might also be asked what benefit would thereby accrue to our war effort and what serious harm might not thereby be caused to this effort, as well as to national unity.

Let us get to the bottom of things and realize that behind the veil of words there is concealed no more no less than the matter of conscription for overseas service. Now, who is demanding this sort of conscription and who is seeking to impose it upon the country, if not a small group of Canadian financiers and of super-imperialists from Toronto? Even though concealed behind the folds of the flag, their purpose is still quite clear. What they want is to get into power. For what purpose? The record will show. As in 1917 when they did get into power they will build up huge fortunes by shameful speculation in war contracts and in commodities essential to the existence of the Canadian people. These financiers of to-day, like their fellows of 1917 whose memory is still execrated, control powerful means of propaganda—newspapers, magazines and radio stations. The Wall Streets of Toronto and Montreal are their instruments. For these people who see in war only a means to get rich, all methods are good. They seek to set aside the people's representatives who refuse to submit. Already in many quarters intimidation has been used.

In the light of the still vivid teachings of the last war, ended less than a quarter of a century ago, what must we think of the present campaign in favour of conscription for military service overseas?

To-day as in 1917 conscription for overseas service seems to be a campaign directed against the province of Quebec, that is, against those who have committed no other crime than to love Canada before and above all else. What good would such a brand of conscription do to Canada beyond swelling, as I said just now, the fortunes of a few Tory speculators and stripping our lines of defence to add a few thousand men to a potential of 25 million soldiers from the United States, Russia, China and all the British and allied countries?

If the speculators who want to seize power were to succeed in their antinational design, it may be considered as a certainty that they would start tampering with our tax system not only to protect their own interests but also to fasten upon the lower brackets of rate payers and the common people a heavier share of the economic load of our splendid war effort.

What would be the drawbacks of such coercive legislation?

Speaking on behalf of the Saint-Maurice district, which I represent here, and of the whole province of Quebec, I may emphasize that the voluntary system, both as regards the air force and our motorized and other units, has given on many occasions in that area more recruits than some districts near Toronto. The response of my compatriots to conscription for service in Canada has been surpassed in no other area of Canada.

Moreover, reference to statistics will show that our districts have greatly oversubscribed the quota that had been allotted to them in the last loan. Members and mayors, and in short all leaders in our province have identified themselves with the voluntary enlistment movement; and with the campaign for the Victory Loan, the Red Cross, and the Queen's Fund for the London bombing victims. Salvage committees are being established in every centre of our province. Of their own free will, and enthusiastically, the workmen in our factories devote part of their weekly salary to the purchase of war savings certificates. A considerable number of people—and I am one of them—have pledged their bank credit to the limit for months to come in order to borrow—at a loss as great as three per cent—money to place in the victory loan. We have put away over fifty per cent of our motor cars in order to save gasoline, which might be needed for our war effort. I do not know of one person among our people who does not already feel the impact of these troublous times and who does not make heavy sacrifices with a view to helping our soldiers.

We can say with a clear conscience and without boasting that no group of people in this country has a right to give us lessons in patriotism. The pilgrims of imperialism in Canada should understand that our deep and unshakeable love for the land of our fathers represents the highest form of patriotism. Those same champions of imperialism should realize that the province of Quebec has hitherto patiently borne the continued attacks launched against it in this house and among certain Toronto groups where, from generation to generation, fanaticism has been carefully nurtured. We feel that such repeated injuries to our pride are a poor way of acknowledging the spirit of loyalty displayed by French Canadians in the past as well as in the present crisis. It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that the Quebec people have an untiring patience since they still tolerate among them a bumptious upstart, a profiteer in the last war, who has taken it upon himself since the beginning of this war, to issue orders to our people in his Montreal Gazette, and to presume to regiment them.

Let it be understood once for all that the patience of the province of Quebec is not eternal. If unity and the preservation of the Canadian confederation are only possible provided we always make concessions and put up with every kind of insult and provocation, I fear very much that a measure like conscription for overseas service will mean the definite severance of the ties that have hitherto kept our country united.

It has been said time and again that the Quebec French Canadians would accept all sacrifices that are necessary for the defence of British institutions. That is right, and such is my own view. But on condition—and I wish to emphasize this point—that Canada be a British institution, for the defence of Canada.

"The French Canadians will give even unto their last sons." True, but let us be quite clear about this. Speaking on behalf of my compatriots, I may state that the love of their country is too deep-rooted in their hearts to allow them to endanger their own defence by sending their fellow-citizens abroad to take part in the defence of African or Asiatic possession or to else support the vanguard of General Chiang-Kai-Shek's armies.

I may add that a handful of saboteurs of Canadian unity could possibly succeed in enforcing conscription for overseas service, that a few domineering soldiers from Toronto could, as they did in 1917 and 1918, wander through Quebec, terrorizing our brave and peaceful mothers, setting up puppet courts to sell exemptions to the highest bidders; but I solemnly declare that Canada and the whole empire does not contain enough Tories to reduce to slavery and thraldom a people as enamoured as they are of the small country which they were the first to settle and where they intend to sleep their last sleep. If, coming into our province, you use coercion and compulsion, if you disorganize our agriculture and industries of such a great importance to the war effort; if you force our young men in their prime, our sons, to serve and die on foreign lands, you will, in that same gesture, paralyze our splendid war effort. Then, national unity will have become but an empty memory, a thing of the past which, in all probability, can never be revived.

If you should wish the abolition of the present status of Canada, if you should wish the dislocation of confederation, conscription would be an appropriate measure to accomplish this fatal and hateful task.

However, Mr. Speaker, I could not conclude my remarks without expressing the confidence I place in the common sense of the majority of members of this house, in the fairness of my fellow-citizens of British origin, for I am convinced that a measure requiring such a degree of compulsion could never command the support of the majority of our population.

I conclude by stating that I remain irreducibly opposed to any kind of conscription for overseas service and that I shall not request my constituents to release me from past commitments in this connection.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Naturally, Mr. Speaker, I find it somewhat difficult to follow a speaker such as the last, because I am under the same disability as perhaps the great majority of us of not understanding the French language. Therefore I have lost the benefit of his remarks. Many hon. members have the advantage of us there, something that I think nearly all English-speaking members regret.

This afternoon I shall be as brief as possible, and as direct as possible. I think this debate has run long enough now that brevity is an even greater virtue than ordinarily. It is my desire not to transgress at all in respect of making lengthy remarks. Moreover I consider that this is a time when no person should endeavour to hide, by words, what he is thinking, but should rather try to use words as they should be used, to express exactly and deliberately his views.

I fancy that if I were to give a caption to such remarks as I shall make, the caption would be "In Praise of Restraint." I have, of course, no right to criticize any person, and I do not criticize any person. I merely wish to say that as a Canadian and a member of this house, where I have many pleasant associations, I do deprecate some of the language that has been used in the course of this debate. Such words as "dastardly," "cowardly," "infamous," hurled across the chamber seem to me out of place in any debate in Canada, faced as we are with the most serious crisis that has ever been upon us and the most serious I hope that we shall ever face. It is interesting to note just how far that sort of language can sometimes lead us. I have not read the morning newspaper to-day, but I have been told by another member of the house that there is in the newspaper to-day a reference to a question asked of President Roosevelt, relating apparently to a statement made by the premier of Ontario to the effect that the United States navy was hiding from the Japanese "tissue paper" navy. That just illustrates the heat which has been generated in the last few weeks and how far sometimes people will go under the spur of partisanship. I suppose there could not be anything more reprehensible than a remark of the sort attributed to the premier of Ontario. While I do not feel that I have any right really to criticize any other person, and I do not wish my remarks to be taken in that way, I do wish to say that I deprecate most strongly any extreme language used in debate, at the present time particularly.

Again I think it is a mistake on the part of hon. members supporting the government to sneer at those who would advocate "total war without restriction," as it is called, as being quite willing to break pledges easily, and that sort of thing. As a matter of fact the point about which most of the controversy, in fact practically all the controversy, runs to-day is a point which has been raised by the Canadian Legion. That legion, with some 1,470 branches, has put out what is called a "Call for Total War." And arising out of one phrase in it a controversy has developed. It seems to me wrong to denominate organizations that have supported that call, or the Canadian Legion itself, as mere pressure groups, or individuals influenced by it simply as people who are weakly influenced by pressure groups. I know that in Manitoba a great many organizations supported the legion call, a great many service bodies and other organizations.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the Manitoba legislature.

Mr. MAYBANK: I was coming to that. The organization that comes most readily to my mind is the Rotarians of Winnipeg. Their membership is so varied that to dub them a pressure group is particularly inept. Incidentally the person who sponsored in that organization support of the legion's call was himself a Liberal of long standing. The legislature of Manitoba, headed at the present time by a non-partisan government, can hardly be called just a pressure group. This body supported the legion; and the lead was given to the legislature in large part by an outstanding Liberal, Mr. Rhodes Smith, of the city of Winnipeg. He was supported by Mr. McDiarmid, provincial minister of mines and natural resources and a former Liberal member of this house for Winnipeg South; by Mr. Schultz, provincial minister of education, a Liberal of long standing and by Mr. Garson, provincial treasurer, also a Liberal; and I do not think there was a dissenting voice in that assembly. Then the union of municipalities of the province supported it, together with the organization of school trustees covering the province.

I mention these facts only because I believe that to attempt to fob off such organizations by calling them pressure groups is as foolish as it is wrong. Of course I am well aware that when the Canadian Legion had, without very much trouble, worked up considerable support for its proposals, then for reasons political, financial or otherwise selfish, others came running forward in an endeavour to ride the crest of the wave. Just as vultures will smell out a fight and fly to the spot to get a meal, so, unfortunately, when controversies arise in a country, there are some who will endeavour to attach themselves to one side or the other, having no interest in the particular matter about which the dispute arises, but only hoping for some material benefit to themselves.

This is a sad fact of life, but we shall be mistaken, if we allow ourselves to believe that such people are in the majority or anywhere near it.

Of similar cloth is the extravagant condemnation of this government, of its war work, which is expressed or implied by many speakers. Sober reflection should show people that they are mistaken in that sort of condemnation. I am one of those who believe that it will be necessary to get away from the voluntary principle in carrying on the war; but in honesty you cannot say that up to now—and I emphasize those words, "up to now"—the voluntary system of getting men into the armed forces has been a failure. I do not see how any reasonable person can make that assertion about the situation up to now, with something in the neighbourhood of four hundred thousand persons in the armed forces. And again, it is only one who is purblind or ill-intentioned who can minimize the solid achievements of Canada in the war. Churchill, standing here, called them magnificent. Some think that was a mere rhetorical flourish, but it seems to me that upon a cold examination of what has been done it is more reasonable to conclude that it was not a rhetorical flourish but something that he deeply believed and sincerely meant. Only a short time ago, on November 8 of last year to be exact, The Economist of London, England, appraised Canada's war effort, and the opening paragraph of the statement was as follows:

> To the student of war economics, Canada presents a puzzle. By all the statistical tests, the war effort of the dominion is very large. Perhaps it could hardly be expected that a country more than three thousand miles away from the aggressor could bring its mobilization for war to quite the pitch of intensity that a beleaguered island can achieve, and the comparison with Great Britain is, for that reason, hardly a realistic one. But, by any test, Canada has done more than any other overseas member of the democratic alliance.

I wish to repeat that:

> But, by any test, Canada has done more than any other overseas member of the democratic alliance.

I continue the quotation:

> Her output of munitions of war is wide in range and large in volume. Proportionately, she has something like twice as many men under arms as the United States, and her Minister of Finance has stated that the expenditures of the dominion government, including the assistance given to the United Kingdom, but excluding all provincial and municipal expenditures, will this year amount to nearly 50 per cent of the national income.

The whole article is a cold appraisal of the situation, such as one would expect to find in an economic journal, and it is all in tune with the opening paragraph. I might add that the explanation given of the first sentence, in which the writer remarks that the position of Canada is in the nature of a puzzle, is this: he observes from the statistical record a tremendous amount of work being done: in going through Canada he observes that it has not affected Canadian life to anything like the extent one might have expected: and he comes to the conclusion that we may be understating the total of our national income. That is the reason why I draw particular attention to the opening words.

The only purpose of my remarks this far, Mr. Speaker, is the discouragement of intemperate and inaccurate criticism of policies and works; nothing less and nothing more than that. In other words, surely we can disagree without being disagreeable. I think every person knows that I do not fully favour the present course; yet, as circumstances have developed, I feel it is the only course now open to us. I do not like the plebiscite procedure. I do not like it because of the delay of action that it entails. I do not like it because of its cost. A large sum of money is involved, variously estimated at from half a million to two million dollars. Certainly the expenditure of a sum of money of those dimensions, when we are straining every effort to pay for tanks, Spitfires and shells, is not likely to commend itself to the people, and it does not commend itself to me. It has raised all manner of criticism in the country, with a consequent lowering of the spirit of the country; and the sooner we can get over that the better. I consider, however, that as matters have developed, it is the only course open to us. One has to be practical; one has to make allowance for the views of other people. There is one other difficulty with relation to the plebiscite. It is the somewhat less than clear attitude of the government. That is something I believe will be taken care of by official statements that will subsequently be made in urging an affirmative vote on the ballot.

While there is much about the policy that I do not like, certainly I shall vote for the main resolution before the house at the present time. I could not, under any circumstances, vote for the Conservative amendment. It really has nothing whatever to commend it. It is the usual political amendment. Its prototype can be found, I think, in the opening days of every session of parliament from confederation down to the present time.

I feel that it has been proposed, not for the simple purpose of advocating or condemning a policy, but rather, it has been proposed, because of its quotability on future political platforms. In addition to asking that the government should proceed some other way than by plebiscite, it says that the government has not done anything for agriculture or has not done what it should do, and has not worked out a post-war programme. I could not vote for that amendment, both for the reasons given and because it is an amendment of general no confidence, a condition of mind which is very remote indeed from my condition of mind.

This reminds me to say just a word about the position of the Conservative house leader. In my opinion it does not lie in his mouth to criticize action or lack of action on the part of the government. He must take some responsibility for the situation that exists to-day. It is only in recent times that he or any member of his party became vocal in favour of a change in recruiting methods. During his tour of the country his speeches were models of how to avoid making any pronouncement on anything. In my opinion the best description of his speeches would be that they were woefully wary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I said I was listening, not making pronouncements.

Mr. MAYBANK: Then we are both agreed that the hon. gentleman was not making pronouncements.

As to the second amendment moved by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, I should like to point out that one of the difficulties about this plebiscite policy is that the public seem to be somewhat confused. Everywhere you hear complaints, the burden of which is that the position is not clear. This second amendment proposes that the government should, in addition to asking a release from its pledges, also invite the people to direct parliament to conscript wealth. The effect of this amendment is not to clarify, but to becloud. It is a confounding of confusion. By introducing additional matter into the submission to the people, the tendency is to cut down the chances of an affirmative vote. The government seeks an affirmative vote. I want to see an affirmative vote. I have much sympathy with some parts of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation amendment, some of the preamble I might call it, but since the amendment lessens the likelihood of removing restraint upon action, it seems to me that it should be voted down.

In all the circumstances, my view is that the most important thing before us at the present time is to get the plebiscite under way and make sure by all honest means that the ballots show a large favourable vote. I wish to appeal to all members of the house to cast aside all differences of opinion as to which was the right course to follow up to the present time and to exert their united efforts toward wiping out any vestige of restraint upon governmental action.

Unfortunately there is a class in the community to whom words of appeal are useless. There are some who, to gain their own private ends, will go to any length to hamper the war effort of this country. These are they who would hope by defeating this plebiscite to induce a situation which might conceivably be so confused that they might perchance be called in as doctors to remedy the situation. Of course with moral derelicts of this kind appeals are useless, and no self-respecting person would waste his time or breath in appealing to them. It might, however, not be out of place to issue a warning to them that if this sort of thing is attempted in Canada at the present time, they will not be able to direct their efforts from behind closed doors.

I appeal particularly to members of the Conservative party who have expressed the liveliest dissatisfaction with the government's course. If members of that party think, or if any hon. member thinks the government is hiding behind a subterfuge or using past pledges as an alibi, all he has to do is to effect the knockout of the "subterfuge" in the voting booth. The "alibi" can be destroyed.

I should like to point out to them also that there is a danger of carrying expressions of dissatisfaction too far. They may be creating such a dissatisfaction in the minds of the electorate that the vote in the ridings which they represent will be less in the affirmative than it is desired that it should be. I say to them that they must be careful not to represent to their people that an affirmative vote is a vote of confidence in the government and, as a consequence of this sort of representation, urge the people to vote in the negative.

Let us remember that if this vote does not carry, there will be chaotic conditions in this dominion which have not hitherto existed. Thanks to a generally wise policy, the government has kept this country marching along pretty well united, and a great many telling blows have been delivered against the foe by Canada. As I say, if this vote does not carry we may expect to have a more or less chaotic condition in this country. It behooves all of us, by such advice and counsel as we can give, to see that restraint upon action is removed; in short, that an affirmative answer is recorded upon the ballots in this plebiscite.

It may be tempting to try to seize political advantage, but I do not think the Conservative party will do that at the present time. At any rate, I urge them not to do it. In the main, since 1939, the members of this house have acted reasonably well together in an atmosphere of mutual trust and forbearance. There have been clashes from time to time, but we have got along fairly well together because we have all known that while we might differ sharply as to methods, we all aimed at the same target, defeat of a barbarous foe. We should forget our differences as to what was the right course up to now and make sure that all restraint upon action is removed.

At the commencement of my remarks I said that I hoped to be brief. In closing, I should like to say that apparently there was some mix-up betwen the whips as to who would follow whom upon the Speaker's list to-day. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) understood that he would follow the hon. member who took his seat just before I rose. There was an exchange of notes back and forth, and I went to see the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) telling him that I had understood that I was to be the second speaker. Although the hon. member counted upon speaking then, he promptly and very generously gave way to me. He is a man senior to me in this house and, in a former parliament, graced the chair in which you now sit, Mr. Speaker. I should not care to close my remarks without expressing my thanks to him and to the whips of both parties for their cooperation in working out another of these numerous tangles that, from time to time, occur.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, those of us who have had many years of parliamentary experience will, I think, agree that many speeches from the throne that have been made to the houses of parliament have been more noted for what they do not contain than for what they do contain as indicating what may be the policy of the government at the then session of parliament, but that cannot so correctly be said of the speech from the throne that we are now considering.

After careful consideration of especially that part of the speech which states that the government is of opinion that it should have complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they arise in this gravest crisis of the world's history, and that the government will seek that freedom by submitting the question of its release from former commitments to the people by a plebiscite, I feel that I should add something to what has already been said on that subject.

The words of the speech from the throne make it apparent that the government appreciates, as we all do, the gravity of the crisis we are facing, and I think it is fair to infer from the words of that speech that the government feels that Canada should be doing more and wishes more to be done than we have done and are doing to face that crisis, and so, appreciating the danger of continuing to follow its policy as announced during the general election of March, 1940, and since, wishes to be freed from those commitments.

Let me quote briefly from the speech from the throne:

> The government is of the opinion that, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should in this connection and irrespective of any previous commitments, possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise.

Why should not parliament accept the responsibility of giving to the government the necessary authority to act in this crisis in accordance with its judgment? The members of parliament are the representatives of the people of Canada. Let those representatives, let us as those representatives, speak and act for the people. That is what we are here for.

I am happy to say, to repeat, that during the election campaign of 1940 I did not make any such bid for support. May I quote from what I said in this house on the 2nd day of June last, as reported at page 3398 of Hansard:

> The word "conscription," meaning compulsory military service, is taboo. Why? Every member of this house knows why. It is for political reasons and nothing else. Leaders of both great Canadian political parties in the last election pledged those parties against conscription; but notwithstanding the fact that the leader of the party I have supported took that attitude, I did not hesitate during that campaign to say publicly, as I say now, that in my opinion the only fair and just way to raise an army is by compulsion. Capital owes a debt to the state. It is compelled by law to contribute the sinews of war; it is compelled by taxation. It would be as reasonable to say that only those who volunteer to do so should pay income tax. The payment of income tax, the payment of any tax, is the performance of a duty to the state, the payment of a debt to the state. All fit young men in Canada owe to the state a debt which can be paid only by their entry into the fighting forces. If they join voluntarily, so much the better; all honour to them for it. But if they fail in that duty, if they fail to pay that debt which they owe their country, they like the taxpayer should be made to pay. It is manifestly unfair to carry on recruiting in any other way.

What I said then, nearly a year ago, I repeat and stand by to-day. It is even more appropriate to the conditions of to-day than it was then.

Let us face the situation as it is to-day. The Militia Act of Canada, assented to May 22, 1868, provides by section 61 as follows:

> Her Majesty may call out the militia or any part thereof for actual service, either within or without the dominion, at any time, whenever it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion or insurrection, or danger of any of them; and the militiamen, when so called out for actual service, shall continue to serve for at least one year from the date of their being called out for actual service, if required so to do, or for any longer period which Her Majesty may appoint.

What did the Militia Act define the militia to mean? The definition is as follows:

> The militia shall consist of all the male inhabitants of Canada, of the age of eighteen years and upwards, and under sixty—not exempted or disqualified by law, and being British subjects by birth or naturalization; but Her Majesty may require all the male inhabitants of the dominion—

All the male inhabitants—not just necessarily citizens:

> —capable of bearing arms, to serve in case of a levée en masse.

Under that Militia Act, even foreigners could be called up to serve in our armed forces.

The National Resources Mobilization Act, enacted by this parliament in June, 1940, in effect nullified the provisions of the Militia Act which I have quoted, and by that act of 1940 the government willingly surrendered and limited the powers and authority had by the government of Canada practically ever since confederation. The nullifying and limiting sections of the National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940 are sections 2 and 3, which provide:

> 2. Subject to the provision of section three hereof, the governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, requiring persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of His Majesty in the right of Canada, as may be deemed necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the defence of Canada, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community.

3. The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

Having willingly passed that legislation so limiting itself, the government now refuses to pass legislation freeing itself from those limitations, which it could do, and leaves it for the country to say whether it should or should not be freed.

Will the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston)—I dislike that word "defence"; I prefer "attack" and suggest that the title should properly be Minister for War—tell the house and the country whether or not voluntary enlistment, under the law as it is since the amendment I have quoted has been in force, is providing for the army enough men to enable Canada to take the part she should take in this empire's battle for existence; enough men to man the fighting fronts, which fighting fronts are, and have been since Canada declared war, our fighting fronts; enough men to be trained and equipped to fight this war as war is fought to-day; enough men to be trained and equipped to become a sufficient part of that vast army which the empire will need before this war is won?

If the British commonwealth of nations and our allies are to win this war—and to lose it is unthinkable—our armies must be strong enough to be sent into Europe, into Japan, to defeat the murdering Germans, Italians and Japanese, to defeat them, to crush them, so to deal with them that they must and will keep the peace for all time.

Possibly Canada has already enlisted, trained, equipped and sent over enough men to aid in the successful defence of the British isles, where, as yet, few army casualties have been suffered, but possibly not enough men and engines of war to replace those who will fall, are bound to fall and be destroyed if those islands are invaded by the enemy.

To win, the enemy must invade Britain, just as to win we must invade the countries of our enemies. We cannot win by defence. We must attack to conquer. We should have here in Canada continually enough fully-trained, prepared and equipped fighting men to replace and reinforce those who are now there, as and when such reinforcements are needed.

As I see it, we in Canada need an army of at least 600,000 men, fully trained, fully equipped with all the up-to-date engines of war, so that they may go with the great armies that the commonwealth of nations, Russia, the United States of America and all the allied nations must send to invade and conquer Germany, Italy and Japan and keep them conquered.

Germany in the last hundred years has provoked no less than five wars. Let us arm and prepare this time to achieve a victory that will result in permanent world peace. The people of the world, with the exception of the Germans, Italians and Japanese, want peace, love peace. Let us make that peace possible; let us restore to freedom the nations now enslaved by their brutal conquerors. Let us make the Germans, the Italians and the Japanese keep the peace.

Those of us who were with Canada's fighting forces in the last great war face the sad but indisputable fact that all we fought for, all the sacrifices made, all the lives lost, were made and lost in vain. We fought through to victory, but the good that might have resulted from that victory was literally thrown away.

Instead of making the defeated and conquered enemy keep the peace that had been won at such a cost and such a sacrifice, our government, the governments of our allies, the governments of the democracies, sat placidly by and allowed those armies to rearm, in fact supplied them with funds, with material for armament, with material with which to make and manufacture the munitions and engines of war now actually being used against us; allowed them to deliberately and publicly—not secretly—plan and prepare for this war, more terrible, if that were possible, than the last war, when by taking proper precautions, and without cruelty, without unfairness to those conquered enemies, this war could so easily have been prevented.

But there is no use in threshing old straw. That has all passed and gone, as have most of those responsible for it. We must face the present crisis and carry on again to victory, seeing to it and making sure that when victory does come there will not be a repetition of the fiasco and neglect of duty that has allowed this fearful war to come upon us.

I have done all I can, and will continue to do so, in encouraging men to enlist. In proportion to its population, Yukon has done and is doing its share in enlistments, as it did in the last war. All those of my family who were fit were in Canada's fighting forces in the last war, and all who are fit are in the service now. It was easier for me to say to men, "I am going; come along" than to say now—to have to say now—"Go; I am staying at home."

If the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) says that voluntary enlistment is producing enough fighting men—and I take it from his statement of yesterday to the house that it is—fighting men who, when trained and equipped to fight, will enable Canada to do her full duty in the gigantic battles ahead of us, battles that will have to be fought and won before the enemy can be defeated, then the government does not need release from its commitments in that respect. No plebiscite is needed, and compulsory selective service—call it conscription if you will—is not needed. But if voluntary enlistment is not getting enough men to form and keep reinforced the armies we need and will need, it is the duty of the government to take them—take them as it would take an income tax from an unwilling taxpayer, and with as little compunction. The government owes that duty to the state, just as the men who should be in the army owe that duty to the state, and if they will not voluntarily perform that duty, then they should be taken.

As I see it, the government does not need to devote the time, incur the expense, or provoke the arguments and disputes that have already arisen between loyal and disloyal people, that are bound to arise if the people are to be asked if they will allow the government to do what in its judgment it should do, what it may have to do if it is to lead Canada to victory.

As a Canadian, as a member of this parliament, which parliament was elected to form a government to lead and govern the people of Canada, and speaking for the people who elected me, I release the Prime Minister and his government, as I am confident they would release them, from any preelection commitments, commitments which, if adhered to, will tend to hamper the government, to weaken Canada's part in the war—this war that Canada declared and entered upon over two years ago as a part of the British empire, as a member of the British commonwealth of nations.

Bear with me while I again quote those remarkable words from the speech from the throne, which appear in Hansard of January 22, at page 1:

> The government is of the opinion that, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should in this connection and irrespective of any previous commitments, possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise.

Then I say to the government, not in a spirit of criticism, but with a sincere desire to assist and support it in its task of leading Canada to victory in this fight for freedom, that it should take that complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they arise, that it should accept its responsibility to parliament and let parliament act for the people.

What course did the president of the great republic to the south of us, our ally in this war, say at the end of December, 1940, in a national broadcast? These are his reported words:

> There is no demand for sending an American expeditionary force outside our own borders. There is no intention by any member of your government to send such a force. You can, therefore, nail any talk about sending armies to Europe as deliberate untruth.

Strong words. Conclusive words. After they were uttered that same president secured the unanimous passage through congress of a bill providing for service of United States soldiers wherever they may be needed. President Roosevelt did not ask for a plebiscite to release him from that pledge; and, faced with national peril, as we are, as Canada is, congress did not remind the president of that undertaking. The people of the United States accepted the selective draft system for overseas service as a national necessity, and did it without argument and without question, just as Canada should.

I say to this government: Accept the proposal, follow the lead given by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray), who sits to your right, Mr. Speaker, and is a loyal supporter of the government. Speaking in this house in this debate on January 27 last, the hon. gentleman said, as reported at page 76 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I submit that in this crisis the government would be justified in now—and by "now" I mean immediately—asking parliament to extend the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act in order to eliminate the restrictions concerning service in Canada only, in order that our armed forces both here and overseas, including reserves and reinforcements, may be maintained at the highest possible strength consistent with the maintenance of our food supply and industrial production.

I am confident that if the government submitted that proposal to this house and to this parliament, representing the people of Canada, speaking and acting for the people of Canada, it would be given the freedom which it desires and should have in order to pursue this war to victory. I for one would support it, and I am confident that my constituents would approve my action in that respect.

What more can I say? Never yet have I been accused of timidity; but candidly I tell the government, I tell the house, that I dread the proposed plebiscite. I dread to have this government and this house take that risk, fearing what may be the result. Why do I fear the result? you may ask. My reply is that it is a foregone conclusion that the disloyal people now in Canada, if any there be, the slackers, those opposed to compulsory service, the timid ones, those who are so fearful of the safety of their loved ones that they would even see them fail to do their duty, those who wish to embarrass the government—all these I fear will give a negative answer to the question to be proposed to them in the plebiscite.

What will be the situation if they are in the majority, if the electors refuse to release the government from its election commitments? I dread to think of the unenviable position in which Canada will be placed in the eyes of the world, in the eyes of our allies in this life and death struggle for freedom; and I dread to contemplate the delight of our enemies if as a result of the proposed plebiscite the government is placed in such an impossible position.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle): The mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne are entitled to our sincere congratulations. The elegance, clarity and fluency of their speeches are equalled only by the sincerity of their ideas. The moderation of their views, dictated by noble patriotism, has confirmed us in our opinion that both hon. gentlemen are worthily serving their electors and their country.

To the memory of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe I bring affectionate tribute from the farmers, the working men and the settlers of the county of Labelle. We have all lost a great friend and a powerful protector. Like the drop of water gradually working its mark into the rock, his name has found its way into the hearts of the settlers of Labelle, leaving a deep and indelible impression. The Hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), will henceforth be his successor as leader of the Quebec Liberals. Like the late Mr. Lapointe, he is devoting to the task all the energy of his patriotic Canadian heart. We highly appreciate the heroism of this man, who has given to his country the last remnants of strength and health left to him following his severe illness. He may rely on the loyal and sincere support of the younger members in the great struggle which is forthcoming.

The speech from the throne, in my opinion, should have satisfied the proponents of a total war effort. It announces the most tremendous programme of help to the allies which has ever been submitted to the representatives of the Canadian people. Never in the history of this country have we been called upon for such a heavy contribution to the operations of war. Never have we been so brutally awakened to the reality that Canada is a belligerent nation faced with immediate danger threatening her territorial integrity.

[Mr. G. Black.]

(Translation): The world-wide extension of this conflict bringing face to face two diametrically opposed ideologies has convinced us of the futility of isolationism.

We did not want this war, but the Master of peoples has decided otherwise. A madman, the unconscious instrument of the divine will, has let loose on the terrestrial globe the destructive whirlwind of a Prussian militarism recognizing no law but brutal force and denying the principles of justice and collective morality on which our Christian civilization is based. In this new order militarism, destruction, nihilism and "Mein Kampf" have replaced charity, mercy, justice, material and spiritual progress and the gospel of peace.

Of course, man's shortcomings, the deification of materialism, the thirst for money and a multiform imperialism have been the remote causes of the present conflict. But international egoism inspiring a desire for vengeance on the part of the vanquished of 1918 has accelerated the race towards the present horrible slaughter which is called the struggle of democracy against dictatorship.

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne should have led the members of this hon. house to discuss each and every aspect of our war effort. It is a mistake, in my view, to concentrate on conscription during the present debate, leaving the essential questions aside.

I shall say only a few words on the question of the day—the plebiscite. The leader of the government is to be congratulated on recognizing the pledge he has given to the Canadian people. His action is highly appreciated by those who have retained the elementary notions of honesty in public life. Opinions may differ regarding the advisableness of holding a plebiscite, but the Prime Minister must be given credit for having the courage to keep his word. Did he not declare that he would not propose conscription for overseas service without consulting the people of Canada? On the 12th of November, 1941, he stated in this house:

(Text) So far as I am concerned, without any consultation of the people on that subject, I do not intend to take the responsibility of supporting any policy of conscription for service overseas. (Hansard, page 4321.)

The government of Canada thus found itself bound by a formal pledge of which, because of uncontrollable circumstances, it asks to be relieved. We recognize this sacred pledge. I do not wish to have it broken at the behest of those for whom contracts and pledges are but scraps of paper, at the behest of this band of profiteers who want to get their hands on war contracts, this group of two hundred pirates of high finance, unrestricted masters of great properties, unscrupulous dictators holding in their nimble fingers the strings which lead the Hepburns, the Meighens, the Murdochs; frock-coated speculators who have unloosed upon the country their propaganda in favour of conscription for overseas services, which, unfortunately, has spread even to the confines of the Liberal party. I request the leader of the government to remain firm and not allow himself to be imposed upon by political fifth-columnists from the Tory party and parachutists from outside whose task it is to undermine the foundations of the Liberal party in order to replace it by the blackmailing regime which in 1917 gorged itself with scandalous profits while our brothers were dying in the cold mud of Flanders.

The Prime Minister has nothing to fear. He has behind him the indefectible legion of men of the people who have fought with him for the people. If there are in the Liberal party men who might differ from him on minor matters, I do not think there is a single one who, having eaten from his hand, will refuse to stand between the foe and their old leader.

Together with the Liberals I wish to remain faithful to my pledges. More than ever do I see the futility of ordering our young men to leave Canada when the flames of the Asiatic conflict are almost licking the walls of Vancouver and Seattle. I cannot understand the reasoning of men who, like the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), blame the government for not having sufficiently protected our western coast yet at the same time want to send our soldiers to far-away Europe.

Mr. GREEN: I said we should do both.

Mr. LALONDE: Well, I accept the hon. member's correction, but I understood him in the sense of what I have just stated. I cannot understand the reasoning of men like the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) who, while crying out for increased production of armaments, persist in demanding compulsory military service overseas, knowing as well as anyone that our plants are short of men, that our mines and shipyards are working on short time, and that our most vital industry, agriculture, cannot and must not be deserted by the farmer and his children.

(Translation) Mr. Speaker, a certain number of men called up for military service for the defence of Canada have already undergone their four months training. I am not the only one here who receives requests from young men wishing to return home for serious reasons. I have vainly tried on several occasions to bring their cases before the authorities, but there does not seem to be at present any legally constituted body authorized to receive such requests, to consider them and to make decisions. The soldiers in camp are told to apply to their commanding officer. But, Mr. Speaker, the officer commanding a military camp is not in a position to decide whether a man is needed on the farm. With the greatest good will he cannot carry through the investigation which is absolutely necessary to ensure a fair and just decision. Yet, in my constituency as elsewhere, there are young men who, for one reason or another, particularly in order to perform their military service in wintertime, decided to answer the call but who must return to the farm in the spring. One young man applied for permission to return home because his old father was laid up with paralysis. From office to office, from one commanding officer to another, the matter dragged such a long time that the cattle had to be sold, the crop was lost, and to-day this soldier is still in camp and his father's farm is idle. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to say that this is a general condition, but I particularly draw the government's attention in an official manner to this state of affairs which, I sincerely believe, should be remedied without delay.

(Text) I now come back to this question of a plebiscite. The people are to be consulted. The people will decide whether it is advisable to release the Prime Minister from his pledges. In this regard I am quite ready to defend my position as member for the county of Labelle. I have not changed my view; I am still opposed to compulsory military service overseas. So long as my electors do not change the mandate they gave me to oppose such a measure, I cannot accept it, from whichever side of the house it may come. Is not a consultation of the people by means of a plebiscite the best way of finding out the present opinion of my people? The motives which have impelled the government to take such a step are quite clear: to be relieved of their obligations in order to be free to impose any other method of recruiting considered necessary in the light of existing circumstances. They do not say that conscription will be enacted for overseas service, for the defence of Labrador, of Newfoundland, of Alaska, and of the territory of the two Americas. But the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has said in this house that they will not have recourse to conscription if voluntary enlistment continues at the present rate.

The government could not do better than order a plebiscite, because, according to the definition of the word itself, a plebiscite is the free expression of public opinion on a given subject. As the answer to be given is left to the free determination of every citizen, it follows that in approving the principle of the plebiscite we do not bind ourselves to answer either in the affirmative or in the negative. In asking for an affirmative answer the government does not seek a vote of confidence. Otherwise, Mr. Speaker, I humbly submit that a plebiscite would not be in order, but rather a general election. Therefore in approving the calling of a plebiscite while reserving for the future the expression of our opinion on the proposed method, we are not voting non-confidence in the government. I do not pledge myself to ask my electors, after giving them all necessary explanations, anything more than to register their votes freely and without coercion according to their own consciences. What shall be the result in any constituency time alone will tell. Should the answer be in the negative, as I think and fear it will be, I urge the government not to consider that as a mark of non-confidence. On the contrary, my electors are so anxious to have as prime minister of this country a man like Mackenzie King that they do not want to run the slightest risk of plunging him into that sea of conscription where the Tory party foundered, dragging with it such geniuses as Arthur Meighen and Mitchell Hepburn. To those who oppose conscription the very name of the Prime Minister of Canada is the best guarantee that their standpoint will prevail. This is also my view. We must keep King at the helm of this country; otherwise it would mean anarchy, disorder, national disunion, as well as the sabotaging of our war effort for the benefit of Hitler alone.

Notwithstanding some statements made in the speech from the throne which may seem far-fetched, I cannot by my vote sanction a motion of absolute want of confidence. Should the tragedy of 1911 be reenacted and King be turned down, as Laurier was, an out-and-out conscriptionist would be the next Prime Minister of Canada; conscription for overseas service would be soon in force, and we would again witness the unfortunate scenes that occurred in 1917 and 1918.

(Translation) The opposition to conscription of manpower for overseas service has led some of our English-speaking fellow citizens to question our loyalty to the British crown. Such opposition does not arise from purely emotional feelings. It is rather based on pure reason. Of course, I am willing to admit that we have not the same reasons as our fellow-citizens for rushing to the rescue of the commonwealth, but unbiased observers should not, in the face of historical facts, tax us with disloyalty towards our obligations. We do not have to be prodded to discharge our national duty.

After the conquest, only 65,000 of our people were left in America, without religious or lay leaders to resist the tremendous power of assimilation, but nevertheless we have remained faithful to the king of England.

Until 1774 we had to submit to the affront of the Test and we did not rise in revolt.

Under the constitution of 1791 we were denied the highest positions in the magistrature, in the administration, and in politics. This debasing system only ended in the middle of the following century. For eighty years after the conquest, we had to withstand an offensive launched against the teaching of French, but in our distress we did not enter the cry Non possumus as oppressed people are wont to do. Yet, Mr. Speaker, have we not in spite of that, remained faithful subjects of the British crown? In 1812, did not the French-Canadians rise to hold this country for the British crown? In 1837, in the face of oligarchical exactions, did not a group of patriots throw off a yoke that had become too heavy and shed their blood in order to save the last remnants of the liberties guaranteed to us by peace treaties and other agreements?

In 1867 did we not, disregarding racial and religious prejudice, join hands with the Anglo-Saxon majority in order to establish the Canadian confederation and further by our common efforts, the greatness of our young nation? Have we not, since that time, borne the injustice of Regulation XVII and suffered the effects of the unfair Tory campaigns against the teaching of French in the schools of the Northwest? Have we not under the federative system, struggled unceasingly for the full maintenance of the federal tie in spite of the humiliating situation in which our compatriots have been placed as regards employment in the federal service, through the all too notorious civil service commission? Yet, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding all that, have we not remained faithful and loyal subjects of the British crown?

And when war came in 1914 did we not shed our blood for the maintenance of the imperial tie in spite of the shameful conscription act put forward by Messrs. Meighen and Borden against the Quebec people? And since the present tragedy has cast its gloom upon the whole world have we not given the best evidence of our loyalty in bearing our share of the heavy taxes and of the blood sacrifice that the government have demanded from the Canadian nation? Have we not also accepted the humiliation of seeing very few French-Canadians appointed as heads of the numerous war-time boards, as if we were always and in spite of everything to be relegated to the rear ranks of the fighters for freedom? Yet, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we are less loyal than our Anglo-Saxon fellow citizens or that we refuse to defend the ideals of the free nations of the world. To the forces of assimilation, we have only opposed our unconquerable will to survive; against attempts at conquest we have raised our staunch loyalty to our traditions. We have remained the solid block of a Christian and Latin civilization which has helped, through its modest influence, to consolidate the expansion of Anglo-Saxon capital whose all too patient servants we have been. Before the urgent necessity of ensuring the survival of Canadian unity we have sacrificed some prerogatives and privileges, and, from one concession to another, we have reached the extreme limit. I even wonder whether any other people in the world would have been willing, as we have been, to submit to the upheaval of conquest, to the collective insults of fanaticism and to the onslaughts of British imperialism while still remaining loyal subjects of His Most Excellent Majesty the King of England.

(Text) We are in this war, Mr. Speaker, and we are determined to win it. But we should not be compelled to make the ultimate sacrifice, from which would arise confusion and disorder. Canada has voluntarily consented to enter the fight against Hitler. Voluntarily? Perhaps, but with a comparative freedom; for I realize to-day more than ever the strength of Canada's ties of dependence toward the unavoidable obligations arising from her association with the nations of the commonwealth. The world-wide character of this war makes it impossible, of course, for us to claim that we are fighting solely for just one country, but I am more than ever convinced that this is a Canadian dependence from the point of view of sacrifice.

May this war be the starting point of the economic and constitutional independence of my country, Canada, among the free nations of the world. May our sacrifices consolidate the union of the two great races in a true spirit of national cooperation.

UNITED STATES NAVY

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF PREMIER HEPBURN OF ONTARIO AS REPORTED IN THE PRESS

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short statement at this time which perhaps should have been made before the orders of the day were called. However, the matter out of which this statement arises was not drawn to my attention until shortly before three o'clock and I wished to take some advice on the matter from my staff before dealing with it in the house.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I assume the hon. minister has the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Granted.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The statement upon which I should like to comment is alleged to have been made by the premier of Ontario. The premier of Ontario is reported in several Canadian papers to-day in the following words:

> The premier said that on his return from a visit to Australia in 1937, Americans on the boat had scoffed at his fears of the Japanese navy, had declared it to be "a tissue-paper navy" which American forces would wipe off the seas "within a week" after a war in the Pacific was started.
> "Well, you've seen what that tissue-paper navy has done", Mr. Hepburn said. "Because of Pearl Harbour the main fleet of the United States navy is in hiding, although it's true that it has carried out hit-and-run raids in the last few days."

I understand that some reference to this statement has been made over United States radio stations, and that it has been drawn to the attention of the President of the United States. Lest there should be any misapprehension in the United States, I should like to make the following comment:

1. The statement of the premier of Ontario does not represent my view, nor the view of the department of naval services, nor the view of the government of this country.

2. The dispositions of naval vessels are not like the movements of certain Hollywood actresses. Not always can they be made known to the world. There are usually very excellent reasons why they should not be made known. But the fact that the disposition and movements of ships are not known, is not to be taken as an indication that they are in hiding.

3. Japanese treachery at Pearl Harbour dealt a heavy blow to the United States fleet, but, notwithstanding, it is mighty and powerful. The courage of its personnel has already been proved and will, I know, be further proved whenever the opportunity offers.

4. This country has every reason to be eternally grateful for the moral support and the material aid that has come to us and our cause from the United States. A year and a half ago, and long before that country entered the war, she gave to the Royal Navy forty-three destroyers, and seven destroyers to the Canadian navy. These have proved to be of the greatest value.

Furthermore, at this very moment, ships carrying the United States flag are engaged, along with Canadian ships of war, in protecting convoys that are sailing from the American continent to the United Kingdom. They certainly are not in hiding.

It is no secret to say that vessels of the United States navy are dispersed in two great oceans, the Atlantic and the Pacific. I shall not say where these vessels are, nor in what strength they stand. But I can say this: each of these United States naval forces represents a fleet in being, and therefore each constitutes a threat against any enemy attempt to carry the war into the vicinity of the coast-line of north America. Wherever they are, they are a shield for Canada and for the United States, as well as a powerful attacking force against the enemy.

Our cause is one. For myself, I thank heaven that it is so. I thank heaven that the United States fleet and the United States army and the industrial might of that great country are with us in this war.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. C. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate I wish to present the viewpoint of one of the representatives of 225,000 Acadians who form about one-fifth of the population of the maritime provinces and who are the direct descendants of the 5,000 Acadians who were expatriated and deported by Governor Lawrence in 1755 and scattered over the uninhabited shores of the Atlantic ocean from Boston to the Mexican border. Gradually these expatriates trickled back to their farms in the land of Acadie, as the poet Longfellow calls it. They settled there and lived under great difficulties; for a century they were considered practically as a conquered people. These people to-day bear no resentment or animosity against anyone for the sufferings which they underwent during that crucial period. They are loyal subjects of the British crown and of the Dominion of Canada, just as loyal as any of their fellow citizens in the maritime provinces or anywhere else in Canada. Unlike our fellow Canadians whose traditions and loyalties are linked up with the British empire, we Acadians have no European ties except our mother tongue. France practically abandoned us to our fate two centuries ago.

But with our historic background of persecution, expulsion and suffering, we emphasize our opposition to compulsion for overseas service during any war until we have been shown the supreme need for such a measure. We do assert our desire and our right to choose between compulsion and voluntary enlistment for overseas service. In the last war we did our full share under the voluntary system. It is true that we rebelled against conscription, but we rebelled because of the unfair and unjust way in which it was enforced in our peaceful villages. There was bloodshed in our midst, and we do not want a repetition of these atrocities.

We do recognize that the best way to defeat our enemy is to fight him outside of Canada and to prevent him from reaching our shores. To this end we are prepared to give freely of our lives and to the limit of our man-power and of our meagre means. But we want no more guns and no more bayonets tracking down our youth like wild beasts in our hills and our forests. We have open minds, but the way to convince us is not by making us guzzle conscription by ramming it down our throats.

I present the views of a man whose broad mentality is patterned on that of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and on that of the man whom I have succeeded in this chamber, who was brought up and educated among the Scotch people of Pictou county, Nova Scotia. Like him, next to my religious faith, I place my Canadian citizenship ahead of everything else this side of eternity.

The present debate revolves around two chief topics, conscription for overseas service and the proposed plebiscite. While most of the speakers heard so far, have admitted or applauded the excellence of Canada's war effort as a whole, a certain minority persist in bitter criticisms of the methods employed by the government to raise man-power for overseas. On this particular point the country and this house are divided into two groups, those who favour voluntary enlistment and those who favour conscription for overseas service.

The advocates of the voluntary system—and they are more numerous than certain newspapers and the Gallup poll would indicate—claim that each individual has the sacred right to determine of his own volition whether or not his life should be exposed to the supreme sacrifice in overseas service outside his native land. They refuse to be taken by the scruff of the neck and hurled into foreign fields of battle to forfeit their lives, while the possessors of flat feet and owners of wealth are permitted to go scot-free by certain processes of exemption, as occurred in the last war. They consider themselves justified in saying: "You members of parliament may think it proper to pass legislation regimenting men for overseas service, but it will not be you armchair legislators or members of your families who will endure the hardships, who will do the fighting, who will take the risks and do the dying." Those are words I heard with my own ears not very long ago.

The supporters of voluntary enlistment claim that up to the present time all the requirements of our own forces, army, navy and air force, have been met one hundred per cent. Statements to this effect were made in the house this week by three ministers, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), and very forcefully yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Statements to this effect have been made just within the past few days by the commander in chief of the Canadian forces, by no less a person than General McNaughton, when he stated that the Canadian people have met to the hilt all the requirements so far of man-power in England.

Each year since the beginning of the war a programme of man-power has been outlined for overseas service. This programme has been set by the Department of National Defence in consultation with the highest military authorities both in England and in Canada. The extent of the requirements is established in the light of all existing circumstances at the time of the formulation of the plan, and all requirements thus far decided upon have been met to the hilt.

The programme for 1942 has just been announced by the Minister of National Defence. It involves the raising of a considerable number of men, running from 173,000 to 193,000. This is a large programme, and at the present rate of enlistments there can be no doubt in the mind of any member of this house that we shall again meet all the requirements by voluntary enlistment. At this particular date and without knowledge of what the government further proposes in the way of plans, how can the opposition truthfully say that voluntary enlistment has failed? I need not insist upon the reports which come from the different sections of Canada. I have here reports from New Brunswick published in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal, and here is one headline: "Surge in army recruiting." And here is a report in the Ottawa Citizen, showing that 500 recruits were signed up in the month of January in the city of Ottawa. Similar reports come from all over Canada. The Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) a few days ago stated that in the last seven months our enlistments have averaged 20,000 a month, which makes 140,000 in seven months. Why, then, the clamor that the nation's war effort is going to be delayed if not ruined by the proposed plebiscite? Must recruiting in every part of Canada cease while the plebiscite is on? Are the different military divisions and depots to be closed down and all training suspended during that time? Why make such childish statements to an intelligent public?

It has been frequently and truthfully said in this house that raising an army for overseas service is only one part of an all-out war effort. The methods heretofore adopted for providing men, voluntary enlistment and conscription, are only means to that end. Conscription for that purpose is and will remain of debatable, doubtful value. It may be equitable in certain respects, it may be just in some ways, but it is most provocative and irritating to all elements, and charged with racial dynamite. In fact, I submit, sir, that by the odious way in which it was applied in 1917 by the arch-imperialists of this country, it was transformed into a racial issue. This is a strong statement. Nevertheless it is the bald truth, as I shall proceed to show.

I again reiterate that conscription now is, and always will be, a racial issue in Canada. It was forced into such a place in our thoughts by the unforgivable and unforgettable circumstances with which the Conservative party surrounded the birth of conscription and the way in which it was carried out in the last war, and proposed again in the present war. All of us Canadians must recognize this fact without delay before our national edifice is too far ablaze with passion.

Deep down in his heart every Canadian knows that conscription, more than ever to-day, contains the germs of strife, of division, of violent resistance, and possibly of bloodshed as in the last war. We never shall win this war while we are divided by a racial issue, and just now, with passions burning to white heat in certain sections of the country, we are headed for catastrophe.

Unity cannot be maintained by such fiery statements as those of Premier Hepburn when he charged the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with deliberately trying to set the French against the British through his lieutenant, Mr. Godbout. I do not know the nature of the evil spirits which move the premier of Ontario to speak in such a way and make other firebrand statements against the Prime Minister of the nation. None of his violent utterances are in harmony with the fundamental principles of confederation which brought together two peoples of different tongues, different race and different religion.

Any fair-minded person who has studied the history of Canada since its conquest by the British, and who has a knowledge of the background of strife and struggle which took place between these two racial groups during a century of adjustment, realizes what a tremendous undertaking confederation was, and still is. Why does French Canada feel as it does toward conscription?

All of us need in the worst way to dig into history, to learn the facts, to recall the fundamental principles of bonne entente, and review the problem of the relations of French Canada to the rest of the dominion. May I be permitted merely to enumerate a few points in history which all of us should study with the deepest concern.

First, one which I have already mentioned, and which still lingers in the heart and soul of every Acadian in the maritime provinces, and which is handed down as a tradition from mother to child on her knees—the expulsion of the Acadians in 1755. Has anything ever been done to rehabilitate and to compensate these innocent victims of the racial hate which existed at that time? No further comments are necessary.

Second, the Quebec Act of 1774.

Third, the Constitutional Act of 1791, by which Canada was divided into Upper and Lower Canada.

Fourth, the war of 1812, when French Canada stuck to England and saved this colony for the British.

Fifth, the rebellion of 1837.

Sixth, the union of Upper and Lower Canada in 1841, by which Lord Durham hoped that the French-Canadians could be manipulated into adopting the language and the customs of the English and assimilated by them. These words are related in history verbatim.

Seventh, the Confederation Act of 1867, by which English- and French-speaking Canadians shook hands and agreed to forget their past differences in order to make Canada one of the greatest countries in the world.

Eighth, the War-time Elections Act and the Military Service Act of 1917, of which I shall say more later.

Ninth, the statute of Westminster.

Tenth, the school acts in eight provinces where French-Canadians are a minority group. Contrast these with the treatment accorded the English minority in the province of Quebec.

The defenders of conscription are loud in their vociferations for equality of sacrifice. Equality of sacrifice in my estimation naturally presupposes equality of citizenship. I ask this house, is there equality of citizenship for the three-quarters of a million French-Canadians who live outside Quebec and who are denied the right of separate schools for the education of their children in their mother tongue?

These are a few of the historical facts. Let us now confront them with certain other facts.

First, practically all Canadians who support conscription for overseas are of British descent.

Second, there is a very large number of Canadians, also of British descent, who oppose conscription, some because it is their intimate conviction; others because, although favouring conscription as a means of raising troops for overseas service, they view it as a racial issue which nearly wrecked Canada in the last war.

Third, practically every Canadian of French descent is irrevocably opposed to conscription; he holds these views as sacred to him as his religion and his mother tongue. May I recall that there are over three and a half million French-Canadians in Canada, of whom, as I have already said, three-quarters of a million reside outside Quebec.

I ask my hon. friends to recall these facts and figures in their moments of calm reflection.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1917 recognized the racial implications of conscription and the dangers which it contained. Since that time, Mackenzie King, Lapointe and their followers have all been of the same opinion. In the session of 1939, the then leader of the opposition, Doctor Manion, was shrewd enough to perceive it, and in 1940 during the election campaign he repeated from one end of the country to the other the statements he had made in the house. I concede to him in all fairness that he was expressing this opinion not as a bait for vote-catching, but because deep down in his soul he knew the implications of conscription as a racial issue and a danger for Canada. The trouble with us all is that up to the present time none of us has had the courage frankly to put this view before the public in its true light. We have avoided the issue. We have neglected to place before the public the true perspective, to call a spade a spade, to derive from it the only logical conclusion to which this fact leads, namely that during a world war crisis such as we are facing to-day the English and French elements of our population must come together without delay and arrive at a reasoned understanding on this vital question.

Unfortunately, extremists of both major political parties in this house beclouded the issue when each accused the other of using conscription as a vote-getter in and out of the province of Quebec. I cannot see how the continuance of violent public statements during an election campaign, such as those of the premier of Ontario, which I have already mentioned, are going to help to bridge the gap between the two races. Equally violent utterances in the opposite direction come from the province of Quebec, and will not span the breach. Nor can I see how the presence of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen in this house could have helped in any way to bring about unity of purpose, when all French Canada recalls his share in the framing and execution of the conscription act in the last war. And what an execution that was!

Here may I be permitted to quote words uttered by Hon. H. C. Nixon a few days ago in this connection. Said he:

> I believe it would be a national calamity if Arthur Meighen were returned to public life by South York on Monday.
> I recall how Canada was divided in 1917 and 1918 by the War-time Elections Act and the Military Service Act, and which were applied in such an iniquitous way that millions of people still see red when they think of it, and not in Quebec alone either. For this condition no man living to-day is more responsible than Mr. Meighen.

There are certain amenities, Mr. Speaker, which peoples as well as gentlemen owe one another, and the things just mentioned are not of the proper taste nor are they suitable to men occupying such high responsibility in a dual nation like ours, where susceptibilities are always so keen. Fortunately there always exists a great measure of tolerance and fair-mindedness in this country. I have discussed this thorny question of conscription with many of my numerous friends of British origin. Here are the views of a distinguished gentleman, a non-Catholic clergyman with whom I had the pleasure of travelling on the train when returning from the funeral of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. He told me that personally he considered the conscription of all man-power the most equitable way of raising troops for overseas if it could be harmoniously carried out. With his knowledge of the historical background of Canada's different peoples he could not conceive of the possibility of any such utopia, and he opposes conscription in the interests of Canadian unity because he regards it essentially as a racial issue fraught with extreme danger to the solidarity of the nation. Never before had it entered my mind that conscription could have such an implication and it was the expression of this thought that made it enter my mind, namely, that conscription in Canada at the present time has become a racial issue. In his estimation, to force conscription would split the nation asunder and ruin our otherwise splendid war effort.

In further discussion he expressed other opinions. Here are some of them. Conscription, according to him, would never be thought of as a method of raising troops in south Africa. Why? Because there also it would be a racial issue between the Boers and the British. In Ireland it would be a religious issue between the north and the south. In Australia, where the population is 97 per cent of British origin, Prime Minister Hughes on two different occasions in the last war called a referendum on this question; on both occasions the measure was thrown out, and the feeling against the prime minister at that time for his conscriptionist view was so strong that, as you know, he had to resign his position as prime minister.

At the present date there is no conscription for overseas service in Australia. Are we Canadians any the less British or any the less patriotic than the Australians? In the United States there is no racial cleavage. There, conscription, such as they are imposing it, is purely a matter of policy or expediency. In line with these thoughts, I should like to call the attention of the house to a little book which appeared some time ago entitled "Canadian Peoples," by Mr. B. K. Sandwell, in which he shows the entire historical background of some of the thoughts I have been expressing in this house. The views of this man are those of many broad-minded and informed English-speaking Canadians with whom I have discussed this thorn in the side of our nation.

Conscription as enforced in the last war was recognized as a national blunder and failure as a man-power-producing measure, by the leaders of all political parties, immediately before and during the last election. All Liberal supporters have always proclaimed its failure from the very beginning. The then National Conservative leader, Doctor Manion, as I said, spoke in the house against conscription and, as I have already mentioned, repeated the same speech from coast to coast

The futility of conscription for producing men in numbers is demonstrated by the following figures, some of which were given last week by the Minister of Pensions and National Health. The first class of unmarried men from 20 to 34 years of age, registered in 1917, numbered 404,000. Of these, there were 380,000 exemptions claimed for one reason or another, leaving only a difference of 24,000 men to come under arms. By the end of March, 1918, in Ontario, 118,000 claimed exemption and 104,000 exemptions were approved. In Quebec, 108,000 out of 115,000 called received exemption. By the end of March, 1918, in the whole dominion, 31,000 men had been called up of whom 5,000 had defaulted. At the end of the war, as the Minister of Pensions and National Health pointed out a few days ago, only 83,000 men were enrolled under the act, but there was something which the minister did not say. Of this number 22,000 were released on farm leave or on compassionate leave. In the final analysis, 61,000 men formed the total contribution of conscription to the last war effort.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is this an effort that is worth while, produced by a measure which certain interests are seeking to impose upon Canada to-day? Yet, in spite of this evident failure, in spite of the futility which I have just shown; in spite of the disruption which it caused to national unity; in spite of the hatred which it engendered, the spectre of conscription hovers over this house again to-day as the battlecry of the Conservative party and the ultimate and only means of saving this nation. To cap the climax, the same party calls in as the standard-bearer of conscription the one man in Canada whose very name is anathema to the province of Quebec and wherever there exists in Canada a group of Canadians of French descent—the very man who in 1917 framed the War-time Elections Act and the Military Service Act and saw to their application in the province of Quebec in the odious and provocative manner which all of us recall so well and so sorrowfully.

That wound still bleeds in Quebec. Can members of the Conservative party sincerely believe that their choice of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen last fall as their leader was a tactful one in these difficult times when unity of purpose and harmony and unstinted cooperation of all classes and creeds and races are more important than gold and guns? Do hon. members opposite honestly think that they can heal Quebec's wounds and many other injuries of the last war by selecting as their chief the very man who inflicted those wounds and who is regarded as the personification of intolerance?

I say that the choice of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen at that time was a direct challenge to the province of Quebec—

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. POULIOT: A blunder.

Mr. VENIOT: I submit that this choice at such a time, when spirits were aready heated up, was the greatest political strategic error since confederation, which may lead even yet, although the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen was defeated, to dire consequences for the nation. Shortly after the selection of the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen as leader of his party was announced, one of my Conservative friends said to me, "Bennett wrecked the Conservative party by his autocracy, and now Meighen comes to bury it."

As I view the deliberate, gradually worked up conscription agitation, the main object of it seems to be to pit the province of Quebec against the rest of the nation, as a political move the sinister objective of which is to wreck the Liberal party. Only last Thursday the Ottawa Citizen seemed to gloat already over its victim in an editorial saying:

> Collapse is bound to come on parliament hill. The signs of disintegration are already to be seen. While the ship of state is being attacked from without by the most terrible forces of barbarism, Canada is being scuttled internally by party politics.

The evil spirits which inspire and guide the backers of conscription at the present time seem to say weirdly: "If we can create a clamour sufficiently strong to stampede a certain number of English-speaking Liberals into supporting conscription, and thus split the Liberal fold, potential victory and power is ours. Perish unity, perish the nation, so long as the Liberal party and King are destroyed!"

If this allegation be denied, and no doubt it will be—I do not blame my friends of the opposition for denying it, because it is a terrible indictment—then I would ask my hon. friends to prove their honesty and sincerity, their love of country, their desire for peace and unity, by considering the generous suggestion made in this house on January 29 by one of their own party, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) when he proposed to exclude Quebec from the operation of compulsory selective service. The same thought was expressed on February 9 by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) when he said, as reported on page 408 of Hansard:

> If necessary, I would agree to conscription which would leave out sections where the feeling was anti-conscriptionist. That was done in Ireland twice, during the great war and in this war. No trouble resulted, no ill feeling, and no discrimination. Possibly it would be a good idea here.

As I previously remarked, nearly one-third of the dominion's population is made up of Canadians of French descent, and three-quarters of a million of these reside outside of the province of Quebec. I presume that the magnanimous suggestion of the hon. member for Parkdale would include these latter in the scope of his intentions, for to a man, this part of the population is opposed to conscription for overseas service. On every other single point of any all-out total war effort every French-Canadian in this country is in complete harmony with his fellow citizens, as Premier Godbout proclaimed some time ago, and is prepared to go to the very limits of sacrifice in order to win this war.

On the other hand, as I have already pointed out, the absolute totality of the advocates for conscription are of British origin. Upon these, then, I presume the hon. member for Parkdale would impose conscription for overseas service, preserving the system of voluntary enlistment for all Canadians of French descent. May I congratulate the hon. member for having had such a brilliant thought and making such a magnanimous gesture of friendship. It certainly is one of the finest statements I ever heard in this parliament or outside of it, and he has the unqualified blessing of every mother's heart in French Canada.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, give the French-Canadians more of their own commanding officers whose language they understand, more of their own training centres, where they can be taught the intricacies of military technique in their own mother tongue. Can you see the leader of the opposition training in a military school where French is the only language in use? Give them, I say, their own regiments, their own battalions under the voluntary system, and you will see the old French spirit of valour and chivalry showing this nation and the whole world that French-Canadians are not slackers—as I have heard it said within the very walls of this building. They will show that they can repeat many times over the numbers and the valiant deeds of the crack Royal 22nd French-Canadian regiment. They will show that their love of Canada is equal to, if not greater than, that of any other group of Canadians in this country.

We do not seek to shirk our obligations, but we demand respect for the convictions that we hold as deeply rooted in our souls as our religious faith. Barring this one point of conscription for overseas service, we are ready for any sacrifice. Aye, we welcome it, and there is no limit to our possibilities.

I challenge the opposition to support their fellow member in his suggestion. If this were done I should like to see side by side battalions composed of conscripts and of volunteers from the province of Quebec.

I quote the following passage from the Montreal Standard of January 24:

> The basis of Canadian confederation, the union of two peoples of different tongue is compromise; the art of effecting compromises that will preserve the unity of Canada has become the chief measurement of Canadian statesmanship. Without the spirit of compromise, the historians of the future will likely find the mixed federation of peoples and institutions that are bound together in the Dominion of Canada would dissolve.

This, Mr. Speaker, explains Baldwin and Lafontaine, Macdonald and Cartier, Laurier and Fielding, King and Lapointe. Such compromise establishes the law of fair exchange in mutual friendship, mutual understanding and agreement, without which this country cannot continue to exist, upon which the survival of the nation is based.

Will some wise man tell the country why such dual leadership has ceased to exist in the Conservative party since the last war? Will someone name the French associates of Borden, Bennett, Meighen, comparable to those of their predecessors, and say why there is not one single Conservative of French extraction in the present parliament, and why there was only one in the last? The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) found the atmosphere bitterly cold during the short time he sat on the Conservative benches. Why has French Canada no outstanding representative in the Tory party to-day? Because this party in the last war and since that time ignored the lesson of true statesmanship, given heretofore by the leaders of both major political parties, former leaders whose names will go down in history as the foster-fathers of union and harmony between the two great races of Canada, while Borden, Meighen and Bennett will be relegated to the background because they ignored the important fact that by their own machinations conscription in Canada will always remain a race issue, whatever their views to the contrary now may be.

Personally, I am prepared to support the proposed plebiscite, and to ask my people to back it up one hundred per cent; not that I favour conscription, but because I feel that a middle course can be worked out which will be just and equitable and less disruptive than conscription as it was and is still conceived by the Conservative party; because I have the utmost confidence in my chief and in his government; because I know that their judgment will be exercised with the utmost caution in the light of all existing circumstances—war conditions, economic conditions and racial difficulties—if and when the moment of supreme danger arises for the safety of our country and of our allies.

If conscription ever did become a supreme necessity and I could be persuaded of this necessity I would rather see its enforcement in the hands of the Prime Minister, noted for his moderation and his broadness of views, and the men surrounding him, than in the hands of the men who made conscription such a flop by the odious way it was enforced in Quebec during the last war.

I submit that there can and must be found some middle course between the two extreme views which now split the country on the issue of conscription. Men of moderate views from all parties and from both racial groups must get together somehow and calmly study the situation from its every angle. The handwriting of disaster is all too plainly emblazoned on the ceiling over our heads. A truce must be called on the question. The nation's interest is greater than that of the Liberal, the Conservative or any other party at the present time; for if conscription in its 1917 form is put into effect, even at the hour of supreme danger, even as remotely as a year or two hence, I dare not say what will take place in my county and in other sections of the country, unless other means than those of the past are used to persuade the people.

These are terrific things to say, but no sane man can ignore any longer the rumblings that reach us from the cities as well as from the back settlements in opposition to conscription, since Meighen relaunched it as his supreme war cry on November 13 last. Let me quote, in conclusion, a paragraph by Leslie Roberts in a recent issue of Saturday Night:

> It can be said that war in the Pacific rather than tending to change French Canada's attitude to conscription, has stiffened Quebec's determination to have nothing to do with the idea. There continues to be a complete lack of comprehension in hundreds of thousands, possibly millions of English-Canadians' minds as to the root cause of this opposition. Basically, it must be charged to the poorest piece of political and journalistic salesmanship in our history, coupled with a determination on the part of a few editors and orators to cram conscription down Quebec's throat no matter what happens. You do not change the opinions of a democratic minority that way. You merely stiffen their determination not to be browbeaten, and sooner or later, if the process continues, Donnybrook ensues.

Fortunately there are many English-Canadians of this writer's type, educated Canadians who have studied the fundamentals of racial, ethnical economics, who do not let themselves be carried away by passion, whose reasoned outlook on the present situation will help to preserve unity and harmony among our peoples.

May divine providence enlighten a greater number of such minds, chasten our hearts of the bitterness which has welled up during the past three months, and infuse into our souls the kindly balm of mutual tolerance.

[Mr. Veniot.]

On motion of Mr. Douglas (Weyburn) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Thursday, February 12, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, like those who have preceded me I should like to extend my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne.

It has already been said that we are not winning this war, but that in fact we have just barely missed losing it. However, there is something which disturbs me even more than our failure to win battles abroad and to get more efficient production at home, and that is the confusion and disillusionment which exists in the minds of the Canadian public to-day. It is doubtful if there ever was such factional and sectional strife in Canada as there is right now. Much of the discussion in the press and in this house regarding our war effort has been shaped by our emotions rather than by our reason. We are throwing catchwords and slogans at each other rather than sober facts. It is in a welter of mental confusion like this that nazism triumphs. Whenever a nation has lost its sense of national purpose it is ripe for defeat.

I am more concerned for the future of this country to-day than I was even in the dark days of midsummer of 1940. Only wise and courageous statesmanship can save this country from that psychological disintegration which was the prelude to defeat in France. We must all accept some share of responsibility for this state of affairs. None of us is without guilt in this regard. I think it is possibly true, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) claimed, that several powerful groups have fostered the cry for the conscription of man-power with a view to gaining political advantage and embarrassing the government. Others were motivated by a desire to regiment labour and exploit the farmer under the guise of winning the war. Still others were thinking in terms of the first great war and failed to recognize that this was a mechanized war in which large armies were useless unless adequately equipped with modern weapons.

I say that there may have been small groups in Canada acting from such motives. But that, Mr. Speaker, is not the whole story. That does not explain the widespread dissatisfaction with the government's war effort. The real fact is that the government itself must accept a large share of the blame. This country has been looking for courageous and aggressive leadership. It has not been getting it. We have been having a Chamberlain government in Canada, with neither a Churchill nor a Bevin in sight. The least that the people have a right to expect is that their leaders will lead them. This country's leaders have had to be pushed. It is true that no leader can afford to get too far ahead of public opinion, but public opinion in this country is far ahead of the government and is now waiting impatiently for the government to catch up, and I submit that it will not wait much longer.

Nor should the government make the mistake of being lulled into a sense of security because of the by-elections which it won last Monday. The three by-elections which were won by the government—

Mr. MacNICOL: Four.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I shall deal with the fourth in a moment. The three by-elections which were won by the government were won because the sanity of the people of Canada voted not so much for the government as against the alternatives. In Quebec it was a vote against a group of irresponsible nationalists, and I was pleased as a matter of fact, to see the people of Quebec show their sanity and belief in the destiny of Canada to the extent which they did. In Welland constituency the vote was a vote against reaction and demagoguery, although I want to point out to the government that in that constituency the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation more than doubled its vote.

I come to York South, which has been mentioned by my hon. friend the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). The leader of the Conservative party made the statement to the press that his defeat was due to a partnership between the dominion government and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The Toronto Daily Star gives an analysis of the vote in that constituency, in which it says:

In York township, the working class section of the riding, the election was lost for the Conservatives and won for the C.C.F. Conservatives dropped from 12,067 to 7,669, a decrease nothing in any other part of the riding could offset. The C.C.F. polled 13,467 votes in York township.

The remarkable turnover from Conservative to C.C.F. was evident when the first polling subdivision results were known. They came from No. 9, which in 1940 gave Cockeram 218 and the C.C.F. 42. Yesterday's vote was 112 for Meighen and 141 for Noseworthy. This advantage was held throughout.

In other words, the York South by-election was a demonstration by the common people that they did not propose to have leadership foisted on them from above. But I warn the government that these by-elections do not mean that there is no discontent or dissatisfaction in the Dominion of Canada. They will make a great mistake it they are lulled into a sense of security because of their victories in these by-elections.

I would like to ask the house to examine some of the reasons for this agitated state of the public mind. First, there is a feeling that the government has been less than frank in discussing the production of war material. Always we are told of orders given or money spent, but these do not always mean weapons produced. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) said last fall that he could equip a division every six weeks. Did he mean that literally? That means equipping eight divisions a year. Yet in November last the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said that perhaps one or two tanks from Canada had reached our troops in England.

To illustrate what I mean, let me refer to something which may be small, but it is indicative. The other evening, when the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) was speaking, he said that at the coast men were equipped with United States Springfield rifles which could not be fired. The Minister of National Defence interrupted to say that they could be fired. Does the minister mean that? Surely the Minister of National Defence knows that these Springfield rifles are twenty-five years old and are marked with red paint to prevent any of our men from trying to fire them.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me? My hon. friend is absolutely misinformed. They are marked with that red paint because they are a different calibre to the Mark III rifles. We have Lee-Enfield rifles, many of which are twenty-five years old but are perfectly good.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am coming to that. I will give the minister all the information if he wants it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The United States Springfield rifle, which thousands of these men are carrying, takes a ·300 cartridge, while our ammunition is ·303; and since our men are not supplied with American ·300 ammunition they cannot possibly fire those rifles.

Mr. RALSTON: May I interrupt my hon. friend again. The government has a considerable supply of ·300 ammunition in Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): May I ask the minister if he has ever seen one of those rifles fired?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. HOWE: I can say that I fired one.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The only man whom I ever saw try to fire one of them had a broken jaw when he was finished.

Mr. RALSTON: That may be so, but that might also be true with a Lee-Enfield or a Ross.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that speaking as a German?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am alarmed at the amount of cynicism and the sense of frustration which are present among some of our armed forces. They feel that we are just playing at war. For instance, last summer, when the Prime Minister came to visit Dundurn camp there were a number of reserve units there as well as active units—about 22,000 in all. The Prime Minister will remember that the men of the reserve units wore a heavy winter battle dress although the thermometer was close to 100 degrees in the shade. The reason was not far to seek: the men had no summer parade uniforms. He will remember that they did not carry rifles, because there were rifles for less than half the men. I had 139 men under my care and we were given thirty-six rifles, all American Springfields, and one Lewis machine gun which could not be fired—and that for only half of each day, another company requiring it for the remainder of the day.

Since the entrance of Japan into the war certain newspapers have intimated that the reserve army may assume a defensive role in protecting Canada. How many of the reserve units could be used in the event of an invasion on the Pacific coast? Most of them have no equipment. In the unit to which I am attached most of the men have had a maximum of six hours on the rifle range. They have never fired a Bren machine gun and have never seen, let alone fired, a trench mortar. Is this the army that is to play a defensive role "in the event of invasion"? Does the government wonder that the public are becoming somewhat sceptical of the rosy pictures which are constantly being painted?

The second factor which has undermined public confidence is the ill-fated Hong Kong expedition. I shall not review the facts already placed on the record by the Minister of National Defence, although the house has a right to expect some explanation as to why 138 to 148 men with less than sixteen weeks' training were sent overseas to meet seasoned enemy troops. Over one hundred officers and men from Saskatchewan units were transferred to the Winnipeg Grenadiers. Last year I lived in barracks with some of these men, and I know just how little training some of them had, and when the house committee is set up to investigate the matter I hope to have something to say about it. Five of the officers who went to Hong Kong are men with whom I had lived and worked for weeks. One expects to lose one's comrades in war time, but not through incompetence and negligence, and if there have been blunders we expect the government to see that the persons responsible are properly punished. May I say to the government that the Pearl Harbour incident was investigated, the report filed, and those responsible punished weeks ago and this government has not yet set up any body to carry on an investigation. There is a growing feeling across Canada that the government is merely stalling on this issue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say just a word to my hon. friend with regard to the government "stalling on" the matter? As the house will recollect, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) suggested that there should be a parliamentary inquiry into this question. Being anxious to have hon. members assured that the government intended to proceed with an inquiry immediately, I accepted the proposal which my hon. friend made and assured him that an inquiry would be held. In replying to the leader of the opposition, I used the same language which he used in putting the question to me, that it would be a parliamentary inquiry, without restriction. I confess that I had no sooner made the reply I did than there came to my mind what had taken place with respect to the inquiry into Pearl Harbour, which was made, as my hon. friend knows, by a member of the Supreme Court of the United States with whom others were associated. I felt that the same reasons as to procedure which governed in the case of the inquiry into the Pearl Harbour situation should govern in regard to the inquiry to be made into the situation at Hong Kong; and for that reason it seemed to me that an inquiry by a royal commission, with—if possible—a member of the judiciary at its head, would be a more appropriate way of proceeding.

Having come to that conclusion, I had a conference with the leader of the opposition, also with the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group (Mr. Coldwell), and with the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore). I pointed out to them the different aspects of the situation to be considered in deciding as between an inquiry by a parliamentary committee and an inquiry by royal commission conducted by some member of the judiciary, and they agreed with me that, all circumstances considered, the latter course of procedure would be the preferable one.

I had then to ascertain whether I could secure for a commission of the kind some member of the judiciary who would be, I will not say persona grata to all persons, but so far as the country was concerned the one who in every way would represent the best possible choice that could be made.

I felt that no one, if his services could be obtained, would give the same sense of security, of impartiality and of wisdom, in a matter of the kind, as the chief justice of Canada, the Right Honourable Sir Lyman Duff. I had then to see the chief justice to ascertain whether or not his services could be obtained. Before the chief justice could give me an answer he had himself to review the situation with respect to his court and the arrangements it might be necessary to make for the time required for the inquiry. He finally said to me that in a matter of this kind, where it was the duty of everyone to do whatever he could to help in a crisis such as the world is faced with at the present time, no one should say no to any request that might be made of him by the government, and that he would be prepared to undertake the inquiry.

The chief justice has undertaken to conduct an inquiry under royal commission; in speaking to him, I said that the government would place no restriction whatever upon him with respect to the scope of the inquiry or any phase of it, and that he would be allowed to choose whomever he wished in the way of counsel, for secretarial staff and the like. In other words, I was assuring him that he would have entire freedom as regards the proceedings and the scope of the inquiry and that the government would not seek even to suggest the persons who might be associated with himself. It would be for him to name the personnel he might wish to have associated with him in the inquiry if he should undertake the task.

The chief justice has accepted and the government has before it at this moment my recommendation to the cabinet to have the chief justice appointed. I had hoped to be able to announce that the chief justice would act and that the order had been passed, and to table the reference this afternoon. However, some matters that turned up this morning have occupied my time unexpectedly and made that impossible. I hope to lay on the table of the house to-morrow the order which will have been passed meanwhile, and which will assign to the chief justice the duty of making this investigation.

I trust that will be a complete answer to my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With the indulgence of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), may I add a word to what the Prime Minister has said?

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. I do not think it is fair to interrupt the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By way of explanation I said, "with his indulgence." If that is denied me I will sit down. I am asking the hon. member for Weyburn if he will be good enough to allow me to proceed.

Mr. COLDWELL: He objects.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does he now?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the hon. member be very long?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, just five minutes; I do not intend to make a speech. When I asked for the inquiry I did not believe it was open to me to ask for anything else than a parliamentary inquiry, although I was quite cognizant of the fact that that would not be as satisfactory to the people of Canada, I had it almost on the tip of my tongue to suggest the other as an alternative, though I refrained from doing so. I had not lost sight of the fact for a moment, and when the Prime Minister came to see me, as he has said, I welcomed the suggestion he made, and I think I told him at the time that I thought it was far preferable that the inquiry should be made by a judge of the supreme court rather than by a partisan committee of this house. I acceded to the suggestion and it is a matter of record.

The only point that has arisen since, so far as I can recall, was with respect to the terms of the reference. I made it quite clear to the Prime Minister that I thought that section 13 of the Inquiries Act which was invoked in the Bren gun inquiry and which precluded the commissioner from making certain findings, should be waived in this instance. I wish to say at once that the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) both acquiesced in that suggestion.

The only other question that has remained open was with respect to making the reference sufficiently broad to include the whole question of trained man-power available in Canada. That is not quite settled. On every other score I think I can subscribe to everything the Prime Minister has said, and I believe the public are entitled to this explanation. I believe the public will welcome an investigation of this kind, as I do.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wish to thank the Prime Minister for his statement that this judicial body is to be set-up, though I do suggest that it is three weeks since the house met and seven weeks since Hong Kong fell. That is a considerable period and the people are anxious to know what steps are being taken to deal with those who may have been responsible for this situation.

May I say to the Prime Minister that when this commission is being appointed the terms of reference ought to be as wide as possible. This house and the country have a right to know a great deal more than was told us the other day by the Minister of National Defence. We should know whether the Canadian general staff was consulted regarding the dispatch of men to Hong Kong. We should know why it took ten days to reply to the British government and another ten days before instructions were issued to prepare the men for embarkation. We should know whether the government was informed as to the impossibility of successfully defending the island. We should know whether or not it is true that all heavy artillery was useful only for resisting a seaborne invasion and that only light field artillery was available to resist the Japanese invasion. We should know whether or not it is true that the water supply was on the mainland and that no adequate provision had been made for water storage on the island itself. We should know whether the two counter-attacks staged by the Winnipeg Grenadiers were attempted without the support of mechanized equipment—because if they were, then the terse statement by the minister that the counter-attacks failed, takes on an ominous significance.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

The country has a right to know whether, in the event of a dispatch of more troops to the far east, Canada will be on the Pacific council and whether that council will have executive authority or be merely an advisory body. I suggest to the government that the Canadian people will not take cheerfully the placing of Canadian troops at the disposal of those over whose policies and strategy we have no effective control.

The third factor contributing to public confusion is the appeasement policy which is being followed by the government in international affairs. For years they tried to appease Germany and then Italy. We were told later that it was unwise to prevent scrap iron going to Japan because we might antagonize that nation. All attempts at appeasement failed because the nazi appetite only grows on what it feeds. Now we are trying to appease Vichy France. The Prime Minister says that Churchill wants the Vichy legation kept open. The Prime Minister has the marvellous faculty of finding someone else's skirts behind which to hide; if the United Kingdom wants to retain contact with Vichy it ought to get someone else to do that job. They have Sir Samuel Hoare at Madrid, and there are legations in Portugal and Sweden. We fail to understand why Canada should be singled out to play the host to the emissaries of Vichy. British sailors died in combat with Vichy naval forces. Imperial, Australian and New Zealand troops lost their lives in taking Syria. At the present time Hitler is building a railway across North Africa. It is now proven almost beyond the shadow of doubt that the nazi General Rommel has received substantial reinforcements through French Tunisia. In Egypt the British government had to ask the Egyptian government to close the Vichy legation because the latter had become the clearing house for nazi and Italian spies. Have we any assurance that the situation is any better here in Canada?

When the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon were seized by the free French forces the statements issued by the Canadian Department of External Affairs and the State department of the United States were, to say the least, unfortunate. Reading them one would think the free French forces were our enemies, rather than men risking their lives in the cause for which we are fighting. The time has come for the government to stop halting between two opinions. Those who are not with us are against us; there is no middle ground. We are either with those who betrayed France or with those who are fighting for her liberation. Then let us have an end of this dilly-dallying. If there are Vichy-minded men in the government let them be dismissed and let us set our own house in order. How can we expect our people to be enthusiastic in the cause of freedom if the government itself is half-hearted?

Contrast our attitude towards Vichy with our refusal until a few days ago to open diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. We sustained relations with those who have slain blood of our blood and bone of our bone, and on the other hand continued to ignore a nation which we refer to almost daily as "our gallant ally." The time has come when the people of Canada believe the Prime Minister ought to give the representative of Vichy his hat with orders to go home.

The fourth contributing cause to the public confusion has been the failure of the government to enunciate a comprehensive policy with regard to the use of man-power. With the powers given to the government under the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and the information gathered in the national registration of the same year, the country had a right to expect some far-reaching scheme dealing with the allocation of man-power. Instead we have had a hit-and-miss policy composed of improvisations, based on the method of trial and error. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) calls for more food production to win the war, while at the same time young men have been forced to sell their stock in order to take training or go to work at Banff national park. The other day I drew the attention of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) to the case of a young man who had almost completed his course as an aeroplane construction mechanic. When called for training he registered as a conscientious objector and is now wielding a pick and shovel in Banff. Cases like this can be cited by the dozen.

Some of the engineers engaged in war work tell me that they have had difficulty holding their mechanics and draughtsmen because the latter can join the active army and get promotion due to their technical training, whereas if they are called for compulsory training they will be put in the infantry. There has been no attempt to put the right men in the right place and to insist on their staying there. Not only should we not want a skilled munitions-maker in the army; we should not let him in the army as long as we are short of mechanized equipment.

At the present moment all departments of government are competing against each other for man-power, with disastrous results. Has any survey been made of our man-power? If so, the government ought to tell us just how it proposes to utilize the man-power of this nation. We should know how many men are required to produce sufficient food to feed ourselves and our allies. We should know what is the maximum munitions production possible in Canada, how many skilled men will be required, and to what extent woman-power will be available for that work. Then and then only can we estimate the number of men that can be spared for the fighting services. These in turn must be allocated on the basis of which branch of the fighting service we can best contribute to, and in the light of our need for defence.

The Prime Minister has spoken of a balanced programme, but so far there has been no indication that the government has reduced this balanced programme to a definite scheme, as has been done in the United Kingdom. I agree with the Prime Minister when he said that conscription of man-power is not the solution to all our difficulties; the problem is much more complicated than that. But the clamour for conscription has arisen because the government has so far failed to tackle the problem of allocating man-power in such a way as to guarantee our maximum efficiency in the prosecution of the war.

This brings me to the question of the proposed plebiscite. No one can object to a democratic reference to the people of any public question. But there are many aspects which ought to be considered. I cannot agree with those who say that the holding of this plebiscite will delay Canada's war effort. That argument will not bear realistic examination. Under the National Resources Mobilization Act the government has power to call up and train all the able-bodied men for which it has training facilities and the necessary equipment. Later, if the government is given a mandate to that end, these men would be available for service in any part of the world. It is idle to say that the taking of the plebiscite is holding up Canada's war effort. If the Prime Minister feels that his pledge not to conscript men for overseas service binds him, he has a perfect right to take whatever means he thinks proper to be released from that pledge.

There is however another side to this question, to which the government ought to give some thought. The plebiscite as outlined by the Prime Minister is so vague as to be almost meaningless, and is already being interpreted differently in different parts of Canada. Consequently, instead of the plebiscite settling some of the sectional disputes, it may only postpone them. In the plebiscite the Prime Minister intends to ask the following question:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

What exactly does this question mean? In Quebec it is being interpreted as meaning that even if the plebiscite is answered in the affirmative, immediate conscription of manpower for overseas service is unlikely. This is amply demonstrated by the statement of Premier Godbout, who assured the people of Quebec that Mr. King's attitude was still anti-conscription. On February 2, Mr. St. Laurent, the newly-elected Minister of Justice, said in a radio speech opening his campaign in Quebec East:

> At the moment, and probably for a long time to come, conscription for overseas would harm our war effort.

And again in the same speech:

> The Prime Minister does not renounce the promises, and if you do not consent to relieve him of them, he will keep the word he has given. But these promises of Mr. King permit his adversaries to make many believe that because he does not propose obligatory military service it is not because he judges it dangerous or inopportune, but simply because his hands are tied.

That is how the plebiscite is being interpreted in Quebec by prominent Liberal speakers.

On the other hand, in western Canada Liberal newspapers such as the Winnipeg Free Press and the Regina Leader-Post are saying editorially that if the plebiscite is answered in the affirmative the government will proceed to conscript man-power for overseas service. Does the government see th trouble it is storing up for itself? Why does the plebiscite not call for a straightforward answer to the question: "Are you in favour of conscription of man-power for overseas service; Yes or No"?

All attempts the other day by the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Agriculture to say that this was not a vote on conscription were evading the issue and will fool no one. If I as a citizen release the government from its pledge so as to give it power to bring down conscription if it thinks conscription necessary, then I am saying that I am in favour of conscription if the government believes that conscription is essential to winning the war. That issue cannot be evaded.

I wonder whether the government has thought of the effect this plebiscite will have on the national unity which it professes to be so anxious to maintain. What will happen if one part of Canada votes preponderantly in the affirmative and another part of Canada votes preponderantly in the negative? What will happen to neighbouring communities of different racial origin when one votes for the plebiscite and the other against? For years to come the results of this plebiscite may be used in charges and counter-charges as to the relative patriotism of the different parts of Canada. Has the government thought what will happen if the plebiscite is not answered in the affirmative? Because I want to warn them that hundreds of people have intimated in the last few weeks that unless there is to be conscription of wealth and industry they will not vote "yes" for the plebiscite. If the government's request is refused then their hands are tied more completely than ever, and all the factional disputes that are tearing our country apart at the present moment may be fanned into open flame. Canada never needed courageous and dynamic leadership as she needs it at the present time, and so far the government is failing to give that leadership.

I come now to a discusssion of the amendment to the amendment proposed by the leader of this group, the hon. member for Rosetown Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). The other evening the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said this amendment should be read in the light of the statement made by this group in September, 1939. Surely the minister knows that is not a fair statement. Surely the minister knows there is not a group in this house that has not changed its attitude with reference to the prosecution of this war, as the war has progressed. Surely the minister knows that in March, 1940, his own party fought an election on a moderate war effort. No one to-day on either side of the house will talk about a moderate war effort.

Mr. MARTIN: No one ever did.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): During the last two weeks we have heard one Quebec member after another chiding the government because they were not keeping their promise of a moderate war effort. As a matter of fact this group have repeatedly stated their stand on the war, through the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He pointed out in Septemtem of 1939 that we had no confidence in the government that was controlling the British war effort at that time, either in their international policies or their war policies. That government changed; there came to power in Great Britain a new government, with a powerful labour influence, headed by a man in whom we all had confidence. The C.C.F. stated at that time, and have stated repeatedly since, their stand on the war; and the Minister of Agriculture is not playing the game when he tries to tie up the present amendment with statements made in September, 1939, when conditions were totally different.

In this amendment we urge the government, if they are determined to proceed with the plebiscite, to add a second question in which we would have them ask:

Are you in favour of the conscription of war industries, accumulated wealth and financial institutions, at the same time and on the same basis of sacrifice as the proposed extension of the conscription of man-power?

We make this proposal for three reasons. The first is that we are convinced that a large section of the Canadian people are not prepared to support the conscription of man-power for overseas service unless it is accompanied by the conscription of wealth and vital war industries. The second is that we are convinced that the conscription of man-power in itself will not enable us to win the war. President Roosevelt has said that this war is going to be won or lost in the factories. As has been said so often, this is a mechanized war, in which the production of tanks, planes and modern equipment is an integral part of our war effort. A million men in uniform armed with rifles and machine guns, without the mechanized equipment essential to modern war, would be almost useless. This has become a war not of masses of men but of the productive power of entire nations; and to talk in terms of the conscription of man-power while leaving industry in its present haphazard condition would be to fight the war of 1942 with the mentality of 1914.

The third reason for proposing this sub-amendment is that we believe the government's oft-repeated promise of equality of sacrifice ought to be made a reality rather than a mere euphonious platitude.

In June, 1940, the National Resources Mobilization Act was before this house. It proposed to give the government power to conscript material and human resources. At that time some of us in this corner said we did not doubt that the government would use its power to conscript human resources, but we had neither confidence nor assurance that the government would use its power to conscript wealth or industry. It will be remembered that the Prime Minister was somewhat indignant; he repudiated the idea that he, the Prime Minister of Canada, would place more value on material things than on human life. However, the record speaks for itself. The National Resources Mobilization Act has been on the statute books of Canada for a year and a half. What industries have been conscripted under that act? What wealth has been conscripted? What financial institutions have been taken over? So far the government's legislation has been used for one thing; that is, the securing of man-power for home defence. To two successive budgets this group has moved an amendment calling for interest-free compulsory loans to be levied on the basis of ability to pay. Twice the government has rejected this proposal. It is becoming increasingly apparent that when the government talks about conscription it has in mind the conscription of man-power only, with wealth and industry left in the hands of those who operate them for private and personal gain. If the government wants the whole-hearted cooperation of the great mass of the people of Canada, then it will accept this subamendment. If it is still determined to take a plebiscite it will give the man on the street a chance to express his opinion on this very vital matter. If the government refuses it can have only one meaning; that is, that it is afraid the question would be greeted with an overwhelming vote in the affirmative. I challenge the government to put this vote to the test and see.

I should like to touch very briefly on one or two things I believe ought to be done, in order that we may make a more effective contribution to the winning of this war. The first is that the government, having conscripted wealth and industry, ought to submit a plan for the utilization of our man-power similar to the one which has been outlined in Great Britain, as described in the Economist of December 14, 1941. The government ought to know the maximum number of men that can be spared from industry and agriculture for the fighting services. They should know, in turn, how the men available for the fighting services should be divided between the respective arms. The public should be told frankly that we cannot raise unlimited numbers of men for the army. At present six divisions are contemplated. Allowing two men in reinforcements for every man in an army division, that means we ought to have 50,000 men for each division, which would mean in the neighbourhood of 300,000 men. If we add to this number 150,000 men for the air force, 25,000 men for the navy and say 200,000 men required for the defence of Canada, we are getting close to 750,000 men, which may be the most we can spare from agriculture and industry without seriously affecting our contribution in these two important fields of operation. I do not know. It may be possible to take men out of agriculture and industry and replace them with women, but certainly the government ought to know. Some comprehensive plan ought to be placed before parliament and before the Canadian people if anything like an intelligent and united effort is to be obtained.

Another thing which must be done, in addition, is to provide for those with small fixed incomes who have been adversely affected by the increased cost of living and who have no means by which they can increase their income proportionately. I refer particularly to the old age pensioners and soldiers' dependents, whose cost of living has increased in the neighbourhood of 25 per cent on the basis of the commodities people commonly buy, and whose standards of living have had to be reduced to that extent. It does not help our war effort to have the parents and relatives of our men overseas feeling the pinch of poverty. Case after case has come to my attention of parents whose old age pensions have been stopped because their soldier sons have assigned part of their pay to them. Soldiers' dependents are receiving the same allowance now as they received in 1939 when the cost of living was much lower than it is to-day. Canada's war effort can be strengthened by taking steps to remedy this lamentable situation.

Third, Canada's war effort can be assisted materially if the government will institute a new deal for agriculture. I do not propose at this time to go into the conditions of western agriculture. I did that on November 14 last and there will be opportunities for doing so again during the present session, but I want to say that it is to the everlasting disgrace of this government, and to the Saskatchewan members who support it, that over four hundred farmers had to come all the way from Saskatchewan to place their grievances before the cabinet. There has been some criticism of these people for the money which was spent to bring them here. The criticism should be directed toward the government which made it necessary to spend that money. The Prime Minister told the Saskatchewan delegation that almost all the facts which they had presented to the government had already been presented to council at some time or another. If that is so, then why did not the government do something about it? What have they been waiting for? Do they never take any steps unless they are pushed and shoved by an irate and angry public?

I warn the government that the representations made by the Saskatchewan delegation ought not to be taken lightly. They represent the point of view of a great majority of the people of that province and in fact of practically all of western Canada.

There has been some talk in the press of the possibility of the government bringing down legislation to provide ninety cents per bushel as initial payment and discontinuing the bonus. Let me say to the government, in advance, that the bulk of western farmers will not be satisfied with ninety cents. If discontinuance of the bonus is to mean discontinuance of the Prairie Farm Income bonus, there will be no objection, provided the initial price is $1 per bushel. But that is not true of the prairie farm assistance bonus, or the wheat acreage reduction bonus. These bonuses have nothing to do with the price of wheat. The prairie farm assistance bonus is to compensate a farmer for crop loss, and the wheat acreage reduction bonus is paid to encourage the farmer not to grow wheat. Any increase in price will not remove the need for these two bonuses, and they must be continued.

Before I take my seat let me add this further thought. Those who listened the other evening to Mr. Evans, administrator of the A.A.A. programme in the United States, outlining the new deal that had been given to agriculture in that country during the past eight years, must have felt ashamed at the halting and feeble attempts that have been made in this country to assist agriculture. Mr. Evans told the delegates to the Canadian federation of agriculture convention about the "Food for Freedom" programme which is being put on by the American farmers. He completed his speech with a sentence which ought to be emblazoned on the walls of this chamber. He said "The American farmer is working for democracy because democracy is now working for him."

We talk often about fighting to save democracy. We cannot fight to save democracy; we can only fight for the right to practise democracy, but democracy must save itself. In the final analysis we cannot save democracy by fighting, unless democracy serves the needs of the common people. And unless the government is prepared to make democracy work for the farming and labouring population of the country, we cannot hope to get from them that enthusiasm and wholehearted cooperation without which a total war effort is impossible.

Mr. LUCIEN DUBOIS (Nicolet-Yamaska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish first to congratulate the Right Hon. the Prime Minister on the magnificent personal triumph he has just obtained at the by-elections.

I have followed with close attention the discussion which has been going on ever since the opening of the session. The tone of the speeches of those who are resolved at any price to establish conscription for overseas service has in no way surprised me. However, I view with a rather skeptical smile their claim to be serving national unity when I see them propose a measure so coercitive as to destroy the very foundations of that same national unit.

Conscription for overseas service and Canadian unity! Could there possibly be a greater paradox? Even before the question of conscription is submitted to the house, hon. members opposite seem to be running a marathon in order to see which one of them will shout quickest and loudest the "Aye, aye, ready" of the greatest blunderer Canadian public life has ever known.

I should have preferred leaving the discussion of this question to the proper time, but the opponents of national unity having thrown down the glove, there is no option but to take it up. Since they insist on talking conscription, let us talk conscription.

Conscription for what? Conscription for whom? Conscription for the benefit of what cause? The answers to these questions are to be found in agitation stirred up by the two hundred Toronto fanatics in the hire of the jackals of high finance, of the exploiters of prejudice, of the dealers in tanks and guns. For such is the infamous gang at the back of the committee of 200.

Why should we enact conscription for overseas service when we know that the voluntary system has given quite satisfactory results and that our war effort, as was stated in this house not so very long ago by the most authoritative representative of the nation chiefly interested in Canada's war effort, Right Hon. Mr. Churchill, is truly magnificent?

Does the opposition lay claim to a higher brand of patriotism than that of the Prime Minister of Great Britain? Besides, what does England ask of us? Men or equipment? Hon. members know full well that on many occasions the British government has said: We have a sufficient number of men; what we need is tools and munitions. Let us delve into the statistics regarding our war effort in terms of man-power. Canada has supplied so far:

Seamen, soldiers and airmen overseas, more than 150,000 men.

Seamen, soldiers and airmen voluntarily enlisted for service anywhere, more than 387,000 men.

Active force in Canada, more than 260,000 men.

Royal Canadian Air Force, more than 100,000 men.

Canadian navy, more than 27,000 men.

Reserve force in Canada, more than 155,000 men.

Add to that Canada's production of tools—corvettes, tanks, machine guns, munitions of all kinds, etc. etc.

Judging by the speeches of certain hon. members opposite, their plea in favour of conscription for overseas service constitutes the strongest possible argument against the conscription they demand. Let us face the facts.

Since 1940 there have arisen a number of circumstances compelling us, if we want to be logical, to reason out the matter as follows: Either Canada is or is not likely to be attacked. If it is, common sense requires that we keep our men here to defend their own country and if Canada is not likely to be attacked, what is the sense of all our war effort?

Conscription for whom? If our country is likely to be attacked, what is the sense of the suggestion made in this house by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) that the province of Quebec should be left in isolation? Have the hon. member's white hairs caused him, perchance, to forget the history of his adopted country? Is he not aware that if he has been able to spend happy days in Canada under the mantle of the British flag he owes it to my ancestors and to the ancestors of my French-Canadian fellow-countrymen who saved Canada for the British crown in 1776 and again in 1812? I should like to give him credit for ignorance, but his social position does not allow me to do so. It is disgraceful, Mr. Speaker, and unworthy of a man of his age to make himself the accomplice of the opponents of national unity in their endeavour to whip up the fanaticism of the committee of 200. Such despicable attempts will not scare us. Moreover, the hon. member and his friends have not had much success. Out of the 3,756,632 Canadians constituting the population of Ontario, these so-called patriots have been able to gather only 200 supporters —only 200—and that at the price of a heavy expenditure on the part of high finance.

My hon. leader has no need to worry. We are not afraid of that crowd. We shall in due time bring them to their sense. Should it be necessary to give them a lesson, my fellow-citizens and theirs will do so.

I have too much faith in the broadmindedness of my English-speaking fellow-citizens to believe that they will endorse a movement which aims not only at obtaining control of the government by any means, but also to stir up against each other the two great races which were already beginning to agree.

Conscription for the benefit of what cause? For the benefit of our war effort? This effort would be gravely prejudiced by recourse to compulsion. Have we not heard in this house during the present debate eminent military men state—I emphasize this point because it is also my view—that one volunteer is worth more than ten conscripts? And to borrow the words of my friend the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle):

> Who will believe that 50,000 more conscripts are more likely to bring victory than 120,000 volunteers at present enlisting at the rate of ten or eleven thousand a month?

No, all that is eye-wash. All that is trickery designed to cover the game of those who seek to reap large profits out of the whole business.

I have always been opposed to conscription for overseas service. I still am, and if ever the question comes before the house I will show still more convincingly, if possible, my opposition to anything of the kind.

As to the holding of the plebiscite announced in the speech from the throne, I must say that when I proposed such a measure in 1937—see Votes and Proceedings of February 9—I was far from foreseeing that it would be submitted to us in 1942. How could I vote against such a democratic measure when I proposed it myself five years ago? In conclusion, may I say, Mr. Speaker, that I am happy to associate myself under the circumstances, with the students of Laval university and with all the youth of my country, the group most vitally interested, and to say with them: Mr. King's government having need of us, we must give it our help. But, by the same token, we must help the government respect the pledges they have given to the people, leaving the latter free to express their views. Let us not lose our heads in the tragic hours we are going through. The tempest may rage with frightful severity during the next five or six months. Let us prepare ourselves to meet it with wisdom, firmness and courage, remembering that just as night is always followed by morning, storms are always succeeded by sunshine.

Mr. L.-PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention at first to take part in this debate, but many statements by members from my province make it necessary for me to go on record and explain the position I intend to take on the address and the measure that may be introduced immediately after.

Before proceeding with my remarks it is a pleasure for me to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address, who have so well and so eloquently discharged their duties after having both been Canadian ambassadors of goodwill to Great Britain last fall.

During these last weeks remarks have been made which might have better been left unsaid by extremists of the two schools of thought that exist on conscription. This issue has been forced on the public mind at the present time by high pressure propaganda of a financial-political group whose main enterprise fortunately flopped last Monday. It would have been preferable for the war effort of the country if it had not been used as a political weapon by the Globe-Gazette-Meighen imperialistic group. Playing with matches is a dangerous game. If it had only the effect of burning the fingers of those who hold the match, as was the case with Mr. Meighen, it would not be so bad; it might even teach a good lesson. But matches are more dangerous than that, and the fires of suspicion, fear and doubt can do more to hinder the war effort than a slowdown in the tempo of enlistment.

However, although conscription is not officially before us, everyone has talked on the matter in connection with the plebiscite referred to in the speech from the throne. It was of course to be expected that we would have an outburst of conscription fever, and I really think it has not been as bad as it might have been. The main arguments of most people who advocated conscription for overseas service failed to touch me because it overlooked for the most part Canadian interests and centred mainly on the defence of the empire and of Britain. If ever a good case could be built for conscription, it should be based upon the urgency to do it as a necessity for the defence of Canada, never on the advisability of helping Britain.

If some statements of the ultra-imperialists have annoyed me, I can say the same of some of the extreme statements of so-called nationalists of my province. Fortunately both groups received an appropriate answer last Monday from the intelligent electorate of the two largest provinces of this dominion. By their attitude since that election we can easily see how things would have become in this country had the conscriptionist press been encouraged by even a partial victory. As it is, the people of the two largest provinces have extended arms across the border to shake hands and unite in giving a vote of confidence to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) by electing the ministers he asked them to return and defeating the man who was selected by his enemies to lead a savage assault against him. No matter how the people have voted, this press is at it again. But it is not my intention to bother with them except in one case, that of an article published in the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday, entitled "Racial Policies Cannot Prevail." The Citizen is a paper with an excellent tradition of public service to the federal capital, which made my surprise greater to find in it such an article drawing dangerous and false conclusions from the Quebec East election and the vote given to the Nationalist candidate. Would it not have been a better contribution to national unity to point out the marvellous judgment of the 16,000 Quebec electors who elected Mr. St. Laurent rather than to pretend that the 12,000 electors who supported Bouchard have all sombre designs against their fellow-Canadians? A closer study of the past elections in Quebec East would strongly invalidate the conclusions of the Citizen. In 1935 a modest Conservative lawyer of Quebec polled 10,000 votes against the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. These were straight party votes—Conservative votes, not Nationalist votes. In 1940, just three days before the election, the Conservative candidate—I mean the national government candidate—was withdrawn and Conservative support, in the hope of defeating Mr. Lapointe, was switched unofficially but efficiently to the Nationalist candidate, Paul Bouchard, the same man who was defeated by the present Minister of Justice; and Bouchard polled 12,000 votes against Mr. Lapointe—the same number of votes he polled against Mr. St. Laurent this week. The source of these votes is easily found by this study of previous election results—unavowed Conservative work to divide Canada and undermine confidence in the Prime Minister. Editors would render more service to the country at this time by helping to make known the accomplishments of the government rather than searching for arguments as weak as those contained in that article in order to divide Canadians one against the other.

As the questions of enlistment and mobilization have been widely discussed in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I will avail myself of the occasion to bring four suggestions to the attention of the government.

The first concerns farmers and farmers' sons. I admit readily that it would be hard to uphold that the agricultural class should benefit by special treatment that is not granted to other classes of people who do their share of war work. The primary consideration is the service rendered to the country by the land tiller and the necessity to maintain or raise the production of food in order to help feed Britain, and, above all, to maintain Canada's health and vigour by proper diets, ensured by increased supplies of food. Therefore what appears to be important is to maintain a sufficient number of experienced men to cultivate the farm lands of the country. Although I am a layman in agriculture, I imagine it could be very easy for experts in that domain to determine how many men are needed to farm land of a definite number of acres with a given type of equipment and a certain number of head of cattle and hogs, and so on. It would be quite easy then to state that a farm of thirty acres operated with horse-drawn implements, with fifteen head of cattle, three horses and the usual small poultry yard, needs so many men. The owner, with three boys of military age, whose farm would fall under a category considered to need three men, and who is still able-bodied, would be allowed to keep two sons on the farm and would give the third to the armed services. This classification of farms could be fairly accurately established, and the decisions of boards of the war services department could then be arrived at with a maximum of security against favoritism and law-evasion.

The second point I meant to mention was the allowances granted to married men enlisting for active service overseas. At present allowances are paid to the wife and for the children up to two. It may be that these figures were arrived at upon statistical data in an apparent scholarly way, but I cannot understand why fathers of large families are discriminated against. It surely is a much greater financial burden to raise six children than two, and it appears therefore that the father of six should in all justice receive more than the father of two. The mother of six children left behind, when the wage-earner of the family enlists, has to feed, clothe and educate six children on the same amount that is received by the mother of two. I cannot understand the justice and equity of such a decision. It is felt in the province of Quebec, where families of more than two children are the majority, that this rule is a discrimination that works against enlistment.

Another anomaly in connection with allowances to dependents of enlisted men has been mentioned to me by one of my constituents, and I report it although I have not yet verified the fact. It is said that the mother of an enlisted unmarried man who was supporting her before his enlistment receives substantially less than does the wife of an enlisted man. If this is true I cannot understand the "what-for" of this discrimination against mothers.

Concerning also allowance to mothers, this other case came to my knowledge. In order to receive an allowance upon the enlistment of her unmarried son a mother must prove her son was supporting her before he enlisted.

There are cases when a young man of eighteen to twenty-one enlists before he ever had a chance to find employment after his coming out of school, and where the mother was painfully supporting her family by hard work. Because the son never had the opportunity to support her before his enlistment, I am told no allowance is paid to the mother.

I submit these problems to the minister and trust he will give the matter further consideration.

My fourth suggestion is to the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). Speaking on the address on November 21, 1940, I stated, as reported at page 328 of Hansard:

> . . . that letters to members of the Canadian army should be sent free of charge, and parcels which bring cheer to a man should be sent without costs to the sender. There are many enlisted men whose families have very little personal means. While it may be fairly easy for them to send a piece of cake or some other small gift, when it comes to paying forty or fifty cents postage on a parcel it cuts into their budget quite deeply and they hesitate to send it. The man overseas wonders if his friends have forgotten him. Perhaps it could be arranged to have parcels of a certain size sent free of charge, either through the different units of the army or otherwise. If the government wants to include letters in this scheme, I am all for it. Many of these men have been away from home a long time and they deserve every encouragement they can get from those of us who are in comparative safety in this land across the sea.

I am not aware that anything of the kind has been done. I know that a bill was introduced in the United States Congress to ensure free mail to the American armed forces. I do not know what was the fate of that bill, but I imagine that something could be done here along these lines. I renew my suggestion made a year ago and I think it is just as advisable to-day.

Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, up to now about the plebiscite. I view it as a measure resulting from a desire to keep unity in the country and preserve faith in the given word. I do not think it was necessary, and I think that, had we disregarded the alarm cries of the Tories and the inspired campaign for conscription, we would have rendered a better service to the country. However, if the government consider that a release from their given pledge is going to be more conducive to public confidence in the proper carrying on of the war, the plebiscite is the only proper method for them to use. I do not personally think it necessary, as I said; but how can a man who pretends to fight for democracy and liberty object to a government using the most democratic way to make sure if the people they govern have the same views on certain aspects of the conduct of the war that they had two years ago? I cannot logically vote against such a measure when it is introduced in parliament. As to advice to be given the electorate I have decided to tell my constituents to vote according to their views and their conscience, and I will not attempt to influence them one way or the other.

I did not think it would be necessary, Mr. Speaker, to explain the sentiment of French Canada on conscription for service overseas, but a word from an hon. member appealing to us to abandon what was called our narrow-mindedness on the question indicates there are yet people who do not fully understand our position. I will therefore try briefly to explain it.

French Canada is still and definitely opposed to compulsory service overseas, because French-Canadians are interested only in Canada and nobody has convinced them yet that compulsory service overseas is a necessity for the defence of our land. It looks too much like help to Britain and defence of the empire and too little for the defence of Canada. French-Canadians could be persuaded to accept compulsory service for overseas solely if they knew that it was the only practical way of defending their own country, and it is not an easy task to convince us of that fact. First of all, according to me, expeditionary forces have never been, up to this war, our best and only way of defending our soil, but they have been a way of proving the solidarity of the empire; they have been the product of a patriotic urge of Anglo-Saxons exiled from their homeland but still attached to it.

Our participation in the South African war was of that nature as was, in great part, our participation in the last war. As to the present war, the situation is different: we have to co-operate with all the remaining free nations of the world in the fight to stop barbarism if we are going to survive as a nation. However, in order to do that, we must not endanger our own safety by a wrong conception of our defence problems, and I am of the opinion that there is no necessity of conscription for overseas if a proper mobilization of our human resources is made now for service in Canada, and I will refer to that in a moment.

I was explaining the French-Canadian reaction to conscription. For us there is only one country—Canada—and we do not consider that help to Britain, to maintain British trade and enlarge British benefits, as was the case in our participation in the last war, was worth the cost. French-Canadians were opposed to conscription in the last war because to them it meant only risking their lives for Britain, for the prestige of the British empire trade in the world, and not for the safeguard of their country.

When the National Resources Mobilization Act was presented in 1940 and the principle was established that compulsory service was provided for Canada and not for participation in overseas expeditions, the vote was unanimous and the two faint murmurs of protest heard in this house had no echo in the hearts or minds of Quebec. Why was this? Because French-Canadians never objected to the defence of their country. They have proved it gallantly in the past. Some of them were even willing to help the empire; they proved it in South Africa, they proved it in 1914, and they are proving it during the present war. But as was said once by a French-Canadian leader, their participation was dictated by their mind, not by their heart.

When it comes to waging the imperial wars of Britain, or when it comes to defending Britain, we are bound to have in Canada different opinions and different viewpoints. You who were born in the British isles, as is the case with seventeen members of this house, or you who are sons of people born in the British isles, and there are fifty-three of you in the house, and all those who are more or less connected by blood to Britain, are bound to feel a call to defend your mother country, to wish to risk the ruin of your adopted country, to give everything for your mother country. It is a noble sentiment and it is bound to exist. You would not be normal if you were not stirred by these patriotic sentiments; and, mind you, I admire all those who hear the call to the defence of their mother country. But I claim that Canadians who are not of British blood who volunteer for service overseas deserve even more admiration. They deserve your gratitude and your respect because they are motivated purely by an enlarged sense of duty to Canada and by a reasoned determination to fight abroad for the preservation of the British institutions under which they have been able to develop.

A few minutes of unbiased thought, Mr. Speaker, should make people realize that men whose families have been established on the same land, or at least in the same part of the country, for from two hundred to three hundred years, are bound to have attachment to and love for their land, their country, and for no other country. They are a homogeneous group whose survival as such, and their expansion into a distinct nationality, is a miracle in itself. It has been attained by considerable sacrifice and self-denial on the part of past generations, and I am yet to find a student of ethnology or of human geography who has not marvelled at the sturdy qualities of the French settlers and their descendants who have fought an unfavourable nature, fierce tribes of aborigines, and numerous battles, to be loyal to their flag, be it French or British. They have done all that because this land was their land and being loyal to their flag meant the defence of their country; but you must try to realize that they cannot have the same feelings of the heart for a distant land, which to most of you is the mother country, but to them is only the source of a governmental system which has given them a fair treatment when vanquished and the opportunity to wangle equality with their fellow citizens with great pains and persistence through their efforts and through their loyalty when the country was attacked.

To them, expeditions to the crown colonies will always remain imperial adventures in which their country, Canada, has no patriotic duty nor material interest; and to them expeditions across the seas will remain help to Britain and they will subscribe to it only as it remains voluntary. They would accept conscription for overseas solely if it could be proven to them that it is the only remaining way of defence of our own territory, and this is and will remain a most debatable question. As for myself I am as much opposed to it to-day as I have been in the past.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is something even more important to consider now than the reaction of a large part of the population of the country to conscription, and it is the study of the situation Canada faces now and how best it can cope with it.

In a world ablaze, in a universe in process of revolution, what was the position Canada could take to ensure its survival, the survival of its liberty, of all the institutions it held as sacred and precious? Could it have remained outside of the conflict, as was suggested by the member who boasted the other night that he had voted against the declaration of war? Could it have remained outside the conflict and survive? I think not. The ethnical composition of the country for one thing would have made it impossible, as two-thirds of the population would not have sat quiet and silent while the country of their fathers was in peril. But more than that, our geographical and economic position, in relation to our southern neighbour, would have made it impossible, and our position both economic and political within the commonwealth of British nations would have made it difficult. Granted, as it is by all clear-thinking citizens, that it had to enter the conflict, Canada was facing two roads to participation; entering the war as a free nation providing first of all for its own defence, and secondly organizing ways of meeting the enemy and fighting it before it reached our shores; or entering the war as a British dominion to grant all possible help, in men, munitions and food, to the mother country, as was attempted during the last war.

My opinion is that the only way consistent with our status as defined by the act of Westminster was the first alternative. To all intents and purposes this is what has been done and the government is to be thanked for having taken the right road. But it is important to examine whether all the aspects of our war programme have been consistent with our avowed intention of waging the war for Canada and only for Canada. I think, sir, there is no harm in examining what has been done and what could be done.

I am convinced of one thing: this government has up to now done more to arm the country and gear its production for war than is realized by most of its citizens, and this splendid achievement has been reached with a minimum of inconvenience to the normal life of the country, with a wise system of economic adjustment, and while maintaining a better spirit among all citizens in the country, marred only by the alarming, politically-inspired cries of a few survivors of the Tory tribe and a few bitter, poisoned minds of the pseudo-nationalist clique. The government is to be given credit for this accomplishment and there should be no hesitancy in voting confidence in it on the address.

The nature and direction of our war effort has therefore to be looked into to determine whether or not it is the most consistent with our proclaimed goal—the defence of Canada. The programme outlined by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) puts all the emphasis on the expeditionary forces, and although it provides for a certain protection for the country we must candidly admit that it is not entirely adequate protection should an attack be made as was done at Pearl Harbour, for instance. I admit that at the beginning of the war the most urgent need was our participation in the resistance to the enemy far from our shores, and I approve of what was done in that regard. But is it not time to revise some of our theories in view of what is happening in a rapidly evolving war, which to-morrow may mean the invasion of Australia, because it provided too much for meeting the enemy far from its shores and not enough for meeting the enemy at home?

I may be a poor strategist, Mr. Speaker, but my contention is that the time has come to reconsider our commitments for the expeditionary force and to look more after ourselves. A mere look at a map of the country shows that it is impossible to defend its boundaries with our present population. Taking into account our joint defence agreements with the United States, which leave our forces free for our eastern and western boundaries, we are still facing the defence of hundreds of miles of shore line on the Pacific and the Atlantic, including Newfoundland and not overlooking the valley of the St. Lawrence, the direct route to the heart of industrial Canada.

To foresee the future according to my view would mean stationing at least 100,000 men in the maritimes, 50,000 in Newfoundland, 100,000 in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, in order that they may be easily rushed to the defence of the St. Lawrence valley, and 200,000 would not be too many for the Pacific coast. This means that the most elementary defence of the country would need a minimum of 450,000 troops.

Let us look now at our man-power. With a population of 11,500,000, Canada has about 1,102,000 unmarried men or widowers without children between the ages of 18 and 45, and 1,201,000 married men between those ages. According to the statistics of 1931 some 62 per cent of the total active male population was between these ages, and 58 per cent of the population between these ages was engaged in gainful occupations. Also about 60 per cent of the people needed in industry were between these ages, and 55 per cent of the agricultural class also fell between the ages of 18 and 45.

We can therefore take it that more than 50 per cent of that population is essentially needed for the normal life of the country. We are therefore left with 1,150,000 men, married and unmarried, between the ages of 18 and 45. From this figure ten per cent should be deducted as being the lowest number of men of military age who are at present in jobs vital to national defence, or who are neccessary to the agricultural production, to which would already have been reallotted a large number of men unfit for military service or not of military age.

We are therefore left with a rough total of one million men. At least 25 per cent of this number are medically unfit to serve in the army. Even if a reallotment of civilian employment to citizens unfit or beyond military age could be effected with one hundred per cent success, it is highly improbable that it would leave a total available man-power for the armed services of 750,000 men.

We have already 422,000 enlisted in the three services, and the programme for 1942 outlined by the minister demands another 190,000 for overseas service, a total of 612,000 men when the programme is completed. If we carry this programme on where shall we find the men necessary for the immediate defence of the country?

My view is that our forces should be divided into two distinct categories, the Canadian territorial army and the Canadian expeditionary force. The territorial army could be mobilized through selective service under the National Resources Mobilization Act, which provides all the authority necessary to do it. This army should be trained in sufficient numbers and in the same manner as the active service force is now trained, and enough of the troops scheduled now to go abroad should be kept in Canada and assigned to this army so that the country would at all times have the necessary minimum protection.

The United States army is now spread on all the battlefields of the world, yet I doubt whether they will not keep at home enough troops for their defence. Every country should think of itself, of its own protection first. Britain did it at all times since the start of the war, and she did well. She kept a huge army at home, considering it more important—and rightly so—than to send vast armies to the other points it had to defend in order to maintain the empire intact. My contention is that Canada now should do the same.

As to the Canadian expeditionary army, it already constitutes a magnificent contribution to the fight for freedom, but should be limited in the future to a size consistent with the safety of Canada at home. Its organization should be revised so as to make it possible to reinforce, maintain and equip it while keeping a sufficient protection for the country itself.

Needless to say, the expeditionary army would be recruited, like the navy and the air force, by voluntary enlistment of civilians not yet called to the colours, and by a steady flow of volunteers from the ranks of the territorial army, which would be composed of men drafted under the selective service system. With such a balanced plan, Canada, like other belligerents, would look after its security at home while at the same time doing its share in stemming the tide of the invader on other continents.

My views may not be acceptable to the minister or his advisers, but I thought it my duty to express them to-day, encouraged as I was by the reading of British Hansard. In the British House of Commons every other day supporters of the government press forward their suggestions on the conduct of the war, which seem to be accepted in the best spirit, even if they are not always adopted.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the hon. member a question before he passes from that? Does he not think it would be wise to extend the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act so that the troops serving under that act could at least be sent to say Newfoundland, Labrador and Alaska?

Mr. PICARD: Personally I would have no objection to Newfoundland, Labrador and Alaska. I would approve of that as long as it extended to continental defence. I shall speak in a moment of a meeting I had with my own constituents at which I explained to them the same plan, and I did not hear or find many protests against that, so long as it was limited to continental hemispheric defence, which was more especially concerned with the defence of our own territory.

In conclusion, I wish to state that I shall vote for the address, because I have confidence in the Prime Minister, and I think his government deserves credit for their handling of the war effort. I might differ, as I have outlined previously, on certain methods adopted for home defence and the expeditionary force; nevertheless I consider that the government have done a splendid job and deserve approval.

As to the plebiscite, I shall approve of the measure when brought before the house, as I explained at the beginning of my remarks. And I should like, although as a newcomer in this house, I have no particular authority to do so, to make an appeal to all hon. members from my province to stand by the Prime Minister in this hour of crisis, as have stood by him the electorate of Quebec and Montreal as well as of Toronto and Welland. I am pleased to have been privileged to take part in the Quebec East by-election; it was a satisfaction to speak to crowds of serious-looking people intent on giving an intelligent verdict based on moderation and understanding and not on bigotry and prejudice. Previous to that I had invited eighty leaders from my own constituency to meet me in Quebec; one hundred and twenty came. I explained to them my attitude, told them what I have said here to-day, and I received their approval of it. Anyone would have had the same result.

I appeal to my colleagues from Quebec who might be hesitant to vote for the address. They will make no mistake in supporting the Prime Minister and the government. Let not the splendid lesson in national unity given this week by Ontario and Quebec go unheeded. The results of the four by-elections were the fruit of tolerance. Tolerance, the hope of the world, may yet save Canada. Let us all work to that end, in the same spirit of cooperation for victory.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, permit me first to congratulate my good friends the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), upon their very fine contributions to this debate. The excellence of their addresses was not a surprise to me, because I was privileged to travel with them for a month throughout the mother country, where they presented Canada's position to the people of the motherland in a way creditable indeed. I endorse to the full, in order to save time and not repeat it in detail, what was so well put by the hon. member for Lethbridge with reference to the friendship engendered among all six of us on our English trip, and also his tribute to the devotion and hospitality of our hosts over there and the thoughtfulness of those on this side of the water who made our trip possible.

Much has already been said in this house by my associates in that journey, about the trip itself, so I shall content myself with looking forward to making addresses throughout the country, as I have already done in part, in order that those not so fortunate as we were may better understand the devastation, the sorrow and the destruction which we found; but also, transcending all that, the quiet, grim determination of the British people in all walks of life to see this war through to final victory. We did not confine our visit to the well-to-do people or the white-collar folk. We went down into the holds of ships; we went through the dockyards; we saw the trawler men; we talked with people at work at their machines in the munition factories, to farmers tilling the soil and to our own soldiers and airmen, in order that we might learn at first hand the very innermost life of the British people. From the humblest, battered home right through the picture to Buckingham Palace we as Canadians were received with the utmost cordiality and friendship. At the many places we visited and the many receptions, luncheons and dinners we enjoyed, people who previously had been strangers to us were eager to listen to the story of our Canadian war effort, and in every case seemed reluctant to let us go on our way. Let me conclude this reference by saying to you, Mr. Speaker, that everywhere we went, the British people were happy and contented with Canada and Canada's war effort, and they marvelled that we had been able to do so much.

[Mr. Picard.]

Let me now turn to a consideration of the speech from the throne, and first I desire to utter a friendly word to my friends from the province of Quebec. Personally I have a great regard for the province of Quebec and its people. I number among my warmest and most cherished friends Canadians of French descent both within and without this House of Commons. I have the most abiding faith in their loyalty to the British empire, and there is still fresh in my mind a picture of the devastated homes of old France, of the sufferings, the sacrifices and the magnificent contributions made by that country, now suffering under the cruel heel of a conquering enemy, side by side with us in the last great war. To those of my friends from Quebec who entertain genuine doubts as to the wisdom of the course being pursued by this government, let me point out in the most friendly spirit that we must be free to adopt whatever course the welfare of our country demands, whether it be compulsory service for overseas or whether voluntary enlistment should prove fully to meet the needs. I appeal to them for their support for this plebiscite; for their continuing contribution, as in the past, to the various armed forces of this country, in order to throw back into their teeth the words of those hot-headed, uncharitable people who may by evil or insulting speeches impugn the loyalty of the great French-Canadian race to the British empire.

Never was there a time in history when the people of that great race, by their conduct toward this plebiscite, by their continuing voluntary enlistment, have had such a splendid opportunity to prove once and for all that this country is united and will go through to victory as a powerful national unit, in order that we may take our place at the peace table and make our voice heard in the final declarations that will settle the future happiness of the civilized world. Nor does the disturbance last night in Montreal, referred to in the press to-day, much as it is to be regretted, indicate to me anything more than that a small, misguided group of youths, stirred up by inflammatory doctrine, saw fit for the moment to carry on unseemly demonstrations. Let us not forget that when the Duplessis government of Quebec went to the people, there was much more noise of a disruptive character than occurred last night. At that time the great French-Canadian people had their opportunity to weigh the effort that was made to take them away from their loyalty to Britain; and after that misguided campaign, to use a mild expression, they gave an overwhelming answer to those who desired to take them down a path that could only lead ultimately to the destruction of the unity of this country.

Before I deal with the plebiscite, Mr. Speaker, permit me to make a personal statement as to my conception of my duty in connection with this war. I will take from no man any imputation that I have not always striven to place our country at the side of the motherland and to take the most effective possible measures to defeat our enemies and make victory sure. On March 24, 1938, I begged this House of Commons to double the estimates for the air service in Canada. I urged the house to set up training schools across Canada, at Halifax, Quebec, Montreal, the Royal Military College at Kingston, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary, Regina, Vancouver and Victoria, to turn out 8,000 well trained men, consisting of one thousand pilots who would be capable of operating the highest speed machines, with seven thousand mechanics on the ground to service them. I told the house on that occasion we would have 8,000 men who, in my humble judgment, would be of as great value in war time as 200,000 men would be, enlisted in the other branches of the service, and who would make a greater contribution to empire war service and to empire defence. Not a word of encouragement or approval for such a course did I obtain from any of my hon. friends sitting across from me, or, in fact, from any of the members of the house.

The following session, on May 13, 1939—and note the date—for which year the estimates for the air service had been notably increased, being brought down at $29,000,000, I again urged the house to double that year's appropriation, repeated my plea of the year before, and again urged for its support grounds which I have just detailed to hon. members.

On that occasion, I made a statement relative to the use those 8,000 trained airmen would be. My statement is found at page 4041 of Hansard as follows:

> I have verified this by conversation with one of the greatest airmen of the world, a distinguished Canadian. . . .

I had had the privilege of doing that, before speaking. The statement I verified was that 8,000 trained airmen, 1,000 of whom would be pilots, would be as great a contribution to defence as 200,000 men in the other forces.

Not a word of support on that occasion. Let me be fair to the then Minister of National Defence, the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). On both occasions before speaking I secured his approval for my urging upon the house the adoption of this proposal. If it had been adopted, what untold value such a force might have been at Dunkirk, or at Hong Kong, or to-day at Singapore, or to-morrow in British Columbia.

I do not wish to be misunderstood in recalling my plea of 1938 and 1939 when I got no response from the house. I felt strongly on the subject. I could have followed it up in the country with speeches on public platforms. I did not do so. Therefore I am as much to be indicted as any other hon. member for not having followed up what seemed to me something we should then do, and something which involved the youth of our land going across and fighting in the British channel in defence of the motherland. Therefore there is no question about it, so far as I am concerned, that I approved meeting the enemy anywhere he might be found.

There recently appeared on the horizon a new leader for the great Conservative party. When he appeared on the horizon, when some by-elections were in sight, with the possible exception of that caused by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) who, I am sorry, is not at the moment in his seat—he is a friend of mine, and one for whom I have high regard —there was no pother or stir about the question of conscription or compulsory service for overseas. In the house and in the country we had travelled down the road of preparation. Canada was making a splendid contribution, with not only national unity and cooperation up to that time among various peoples of different racial origin throughout the country, but also real and honest cooperation among the various parties and groups in the house who, in the main, have all directed their efforts toward a united front in the prosecution of the war.

Speaking only for myself—and I want to be the one to say this—I think it is time in the debate to pay tribute to the leader of the official Conservative opposition (Mr. Hanson), and to his group in the house; also to the leaders of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and Social Credit groups, whose friendship I cherish, and have had the privilege of developing in an intimate way in the past few months.

Nor would it be fair for me to close my speech without reference to the Hon. R. J. Manion who, during part of the war period, led his party in the house, who, since, has followed and is still following the splendid example set by Wendell Willkie in the United States, and who under this government is now conducting a most important an onerous war task, as director of the A.R.P. activities throughout Canada. I am told he is doing an extremely good job of it.

I say this, not because we have not had differences, and sometimes a bit of heat across the floor of the chamber—and not only across the floor of the chamber, but some fairly warm blasts and counterblasts passing up and down the side-lines on the other side of the chamber among men who differ from each other on various points. But the point I emphasize right now—and I am glad to do it—is that all groups in the house have cooperated splendidly for the common purpose. What I want to deprecate is that, fanned up by partisan influence, by expletive, high-powered adjectives and denunciation, a little group of high-powered politicians outside the house have picked this time, on the eve of our new victory loan, to try to tear the country wide apart, when there is no need in the world to do so.

A number of people in Canada are in favour of compulsory service for overseas, beginning right now. Many hold to the honest opinion that conditions have changed, that they have become more serious, and that the need for increased man-power has brought us to the place where, in their view, voluntary enlistment has perhaps begun to lag a little, and the other system should be adopted. But do not let us forget that right down to a month ago, when this new politician appeared on the scene and stirred the kettle with inflammatory attacks upon the government—a government by the way which had graciously refused to oppose him in York South—down to that time, I say, practically everybody in Canada had endorsed and approved the system of voluntary enlistment, a system which is now so viciously attacked by those who heretofore voted for and supported it.

My hon. friends of the Conservative party across the floor, with the single exception of the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), of whom I am not sure—and I stand corrected if in any way I am in error—all came into the house and were elected under the banner of the Hon. R. J. Manion in March, 1940, and all adopted Mr. Manion's platform, the man who was their leader, in calling for a so-called national government. They worked for him and he worked for them, and they were elected under that banner.

Let me place on Hansard what their leader on their behalf and for himself pledged the people of Canada on March 4, 1940. Two weeks before polling he issued a press release, only two paragraphs of which I shall place on record:

> Conscription to my mind was a failure in the last war, as it raised only about 10,000 men out of more than 500,000, and it stirred up much misunderstanding in our country. For that reason and because conscription is not necessary in this war, and because as I have said on other occasions, it is the duty of a public man to hold Canada together as a nation, I am absolutely opposed to conscription.

My hon. friends opposite—and if I am not right, let them stand up and say so—adopted the policy of this Conservative leader, as enunciated to the people. They went to their constituencies and made speeches, tacitly relying, at all events, on the platform he was putting forward, and owing their seats in the house to-day to that kind of pledge.

But that is not all. I have a word for my hon. friends of the two other parties. The leader of the Social Credit party, (Mr. Blackmore), a good friend of mine, said this on May 26:

> The Liberal party obtained the mandate of the people in the last election while opposing the conscription of man-power. It is clear therefore that the question of conscription is a dead issue in Canada until another mandate is given by the people at a new election.

My hon. friend always stands by his word.

The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, (Mr. Coldwell)—I am sorry he is not in his seat at the moment,—as reported in the Globe of March 14, reiterated his party's unalterable opposition to conscription, and I think my hon. friends will feel that I am fair when I say that that was their policy in the last election. It is small wonder that we do not hear Doctor Manion's voice supporting his party in this campaign. He believes in the Willkie way of doing things. That is why every place you turn, Mr. Speaker, you get right back to the one man who has stirred up this whole agitation, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, the man who prided himself for years as one of the leaders of a party whose slogan was, "No truck or trade with the Yankees." That was emblazoned on banners above his platform at his political meetings. He is the same man who accepted from former Prime Minister Bennett a seat in that other place and supported Mr. Bennett in his campaign to blast Canada's way into the markets of the United States and of the world. Are the people of Canada to trade our magnificent Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who is the leader of this country to-day, for this "no truck or trade" politician and this "blaster" fellow? Is he the right man to place at the head of this country when we have just concluded a treaty with the United States for the mutual defence of North America, and when we have sitting to-day a joint commission for the greater protection of North America, and have established the most friendly relations between Canada and the United States that have ever existed since confederation? Is he the type of man to lead Canada through a war when only within the last few weeks the United States have said to us, "We will give you equal priorities with us on our steel. We have got our arms around your shoulders. We want your nickel in return for some of the things you want, but we will go hand in hand with you from now on." Could they entirely forget that he affronted them a few short years ago with the most insulting slogan that ever man tried to ride into office on—"no truck or trade with the Yankees"? Over there, "Yankee" is a word that is used only when somebody tries to insult someone. He is the leader you are asked to place in power as against the present Prime Minister, who has devoted at least the last five years of his life most faithfully and earnestly to cultivating, fostering and cementing the most friendly feelings and relations not only between Canada and the United States but also between Great Britain and the United States. This man has lived to see his dream come true, and is he to be rewarded with vilification and abuse because, instead of breaking his word to the people as these outside Tories would have him do, he proposes to ask the people to relieve him from the solemn pledge he gave and which every other member of this House of Commons on both sides of the house gave to their people either by implication or directly?

What is all this bother about? Stripped of its political trappings and torn from its coating of hypocrisy, it all boils down to a denunciation of the government because they want to permit the people of Canada to give them a free hand to enact whatever measures they may deem to be best in the interests of this country.

I was glad to hear my hon. friend the member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), with whom I am not always in accord, state that he believes the proper form of government was, when a pledge had been given, to consult the people on the great issues before forcing something to the contrary down their throats.

Let me quote an authority that I commend to my hon. friends of the French-Canadian race. In 1917 our great and departed leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, after the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, who was then leading the government, had proposed a measure of compulsory service overseas without consulting the people in any way, begged Sir Robert not to ram this measure down the throats of the people of Canada but to consult them in a referendum, and this is the language he used on that occasion, which will be found at page 2403 of Hansard of June 18, 1917:

> What I propose is that we should have a referendum and a consultation of the people upon this question. I have taken the referendum, not that I have been very favourable towards it, but I find that the idea of the referendum has made enormous progress in Canada, and that it has been adopted by the political associations in the western provinces as a method of political action.

My hon. friends from the west will be prepared to bear out the statement of those early days. Sir Wilfrid goes on:

> If we are to have peace, if there is to be unity, we must meet the wishes of the labouring classes, who have asked for this privilege. When the consultation with the people has been had, when the verdict has been pronounced, I pledge my word, my reputation that to the verdict, such as it is, every man will submit, and I claim to speak at least so far as is concerned the province from which I come.

I commend to my French-Canadian fellow members as they pass that great statue standing in our grounds, in this noble enclosure on parliament hill, to remember at least those words of their great leader; and, following them, they cannot go far astray.

Two main points have been advanced against the taking of the plebiscite. First, that it will cost some money, estimated, I think properly, at about one and a half million dollars—out of a total annual expenditure of three billion dollars. Is it worth a million and a half dollars to have a government which has kept its word instead of breaking it? Is it worth a million and a half dollars and sixty or seventy days of time to have a government carry on the business of the country in war time which cannot be pointed at with an accusing finger and told by the people of the country, "Your word is no good. You have breached your trust to me." I am going to watch with interest if and when my hon. friends of the Conservative party rise and bow to a negation of this plebiscite because if they do, and vote against it, who that listened to their pledges of that day can not but come and say, "You are a liar?" And what will their answer be? "Oh, well, but, my dear friend, times have changed." Let my hon. friends take that course if they see fit. They are only—I do not hold this against them—a small item in this House of Commons proportionately. But I do not want the government, the great Liberal party in this house, to have to sit with a blush of shame on their cheeks when any of their constituents who heard them make that pledge come forward and say, "You are a liar." And that is what they can do unless this simple, honourable course of consulting the people is taken.

Does any honest man—I put it that way because this is one of the arguments we have heard used, although I do not think it has been used in this chamber; I have unfortunately not been here all the time—does any honest man say that those reinforcements now under arms in Canada in the active service army who have volunteered to go overseas if we want to send them, the 120,000 of them now in uniform, are not sufficient to replace even the most dire casualties which might occur in our overseas army of 130,000 men? That is sheer political bunk, fed to the people to inflame them. That sort of inflammatory, false argument is whipped up to try to create political prejudice against this government in the minds of those splendid people—fathers, mothers, wives and sisters—who have menfolk in the army overseas. This whole move is largely an effort to defeat our Prime Minister. It is directed to him by some gentlemen who want to get rid of him. I am glad to see that the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) has returned to his seat. Not long ago I paid him a personal tribute which I desire to repeat in his presence; he has not had, perhaps, many friends politically.

We know what the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen thinks and says about the Prime Minister of Canada. We know also the views of a little group of other gentlemen. I am going to put on Hansard the opinions of some men who are not interested in playing politics in Canada. The first one to whom I refer is the Right Hon. Winston Spencer Churchill, who on September 4, 1941, said, in London, with regard to our war effort:

> The war effort of Canada is immense in ships, aircraft, air training, in finance and in food, and constitutes an element in the resistance of the British empire without which that resistance could not be successfully maintained.

Then, speaking to the distinguished gathering which had cheered our leader's outstanding address in the Guildhall a few months before, Mr. Churchill said of our Canadian war Prime Minister:

> To-day you have listened to a memorable and momentous declaration made here amid our ruins of London. You have listened to a speech which, I think, all those who have heard it will feel, explains the long-continued authority which Mr. Mackenzie King has wielded when, during more than fifteen years, he has been Prime Minister of Canada.

Then this further tribute: Mr. Churchill said, with regard to our Prime Minister:

> You have a great knowledge of the flexible organization, a system ever changing and expanding, yet ever growing into a greater harmony, by which the British commonwealth of nations is conducted.
> You have also knowledge of your own people and your association with them is so long and so intimate it has enabled you to realize and express in these hours of trouble a more complete unity of Canada than has ever before been achieved.

If you were jurors on a lawsuit, would you prefer the evidence of Arthur Meighen or the evidence of Winston Churchill?

Mr. LOCKHART: The smashing of windows in Montreal does not look very much like unity.

Mr. SLAGHT: Well, without being unfair to the hon. member, that is the sort of talk which, if it is indulged in on the floor of this house, will tear this country limb from limb. Did my hon. friend hear the Duplessis talk from Quebec for a time, and does he not remember that, with the aid of the leaders of the government of this house, and the sound, sane thinking people of Quebec, Duplessis was snowed under and disgraced by the vote of the overwhelming majority of the people of that province?

Just one more tribute from Mr. Winston Churchill, and this, remember, after he and the great president of the United States had met upon a vessel in the Atlantic ocean. He said:

> Canada, with those relations of friendly, affectionate intimacy with the United States on the one hand and with her unswerving fidelity to the British commonwealth and motherland on the other is the link which joins together these great branches of the human family. In Mr. King we have a Canadian statesman who always has preserved the most intimate relations with the great republic of the United States and whose name and voice are honoured there as they are on this side of the Atlantic.
> I had an opportunity of meeting the president of the United States a few weeks ago and I know from him of the great esteem in which Mr. Mackenzie King is held and how much he has contributed to joining together in close, sympathetic action, the republic of the United States and the Dominion of Canada. Canada is the linchpin of the English-speaking world.

What does General McNaughton say, that man for whom I fancy every hon. member has the greatest and highest esteem and regard? What did he say in his message to the Canadian troops at Christmas time? It has already been put upon Hansard, of February 5, 1942, at page 346, and I shall not read it all, but I shall just quote that passage wherein he says:

> From a very small beginning the Canadian army has now grown to many tens of thousands of men and women. New units and formations and reserves have come to us as quickly as ships could be found to bring them here, and as they have arrived the organization of our military headquarters, reinforcement units, hospitals, schools, repair establishments and many other needed facilities have been pressed forward; . . .
> Throughout this long period of preparation which circumstances have given us, the corps, divisions, armoured formations and other field units have been completed in equipment, and trained together and with squadrons of the Royal Canadian Air Force assigned to army cooperation.

That is the tribute. Is it false or is it true? Who will stand up and gainsay the language of General McNaughton? Yet, by implication, a great many of those who have denounced the war effort of this government are doing just that thing.

Let me appeal to my hon. friends opposite. I suppose it is too much to expect that they would drop their amendment and let this house get on as a unit. Let us have this plebiscite; let us bring in the bill next week or as fast as possible, put it through, and take the plebiscite. I have the greatest faith that every province in this dominion, when that plebiscite is taken, will entrust this government with continued control of the Canadian war effort.

One point which has been advanced against the plebiscite by a great many, including I believe Mr. Drew—I am not sure whether any hon. member has raised it—is, "If you hold a plebiscite, what will they say of us in the United States? Oh, that will be terrible! What will they have to say of us?"

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Let us vote on this question this afternoon.

Mr. SLAGHT: What did the hon. member say?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I said, about your question of withdrawing the amendment, why not call a vote right now, and get along with the business of the house?

Mr. SLAGHT: How would you vote if it were called?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I would vote for the amendment and, if it were defeated, I would go into my riding and ask them all to vote "yes" as fast as possible.

Mr. SLAGHT: I commend the hon. member for that; he is a splendid adherent to the cause. Let my friends who feel that way about the United States console themselves with this. The New York Times is admittedly the greatest friend of Britain so far as daily newspapers across the border are concerned, and it stands almost in a class by itself. This is what that great organ, expressing public opinion in that great republic, has to say. On January 26 the Times said editorially:

> . . . that when opponents of conscription in Canada assert that the forthcoming plebiscite will throw doubt upon the dominion's "exertion of her full power" in the war, "her friends—and we are all her friends—must protest."

That is what our friends in the United States are protesting—the statements made by the opponents of this plebiscite.

There is one matter to which I should like to turn for a moment if I may be allowed to do so. It has nothing to do with the plebiscite, but to me it is important. I refer to the question of our introducing as rapidly as possible a system of parliamentary secretaryships. The house may recall—and this is non-political, I am sure—that in the speech from the throne in 1936 there appeared this clause, that there would be brought in a bill to provide for the creation of parliamentary secretaryships. I had the honour to move the address in reply on that occasion, and I used in Hansard certain language in which I commended the idea. I suppose most young speakers commend the speech from the throne, and I did so on that occasion, giving the reasons therefor. This is what I said on that occasion—I hope hon. members will bear with me because the matter is, in my judgment, ten times more important now than it was at that time—and I commend it to the consideration of the Prime Minister and of the government. I said, as reported at page 31 of Hansard of 1936:

> Then we find a proposal to create parliamentary secretaryships, and this proposal will, I hope, meet with the approval of every hon. member of this house. It is established in the mother of parliaments, and I believe is fully approved by British statesmen regardless of party affiliations. It should create the building up in this house of a body of men who because of the experience gained as under-secretaries will be better able in the future to carry on the responsible duties attaching to cabinet positions. I fancy that the right hon. leader of the opposition and some of those who sit beside him will agree with me that it will afford a measure of relief to the ministers of the day who can very properly turn over some of the exacting details of their offices to under-secretaries, and do so without impairing the efficiency of their work. From every viewpoint I submit to the house that this administrative reform is one that will be found of benefit to Canada.

My recent visit to England has confirmed me tenfold in that view, and I will mention one incident. We were privileged to visit eleven cabinet ministers, including every member of the war cabinet, for half an hour privately in their rooms. I was in Mr. Herbert Morrison's room, and there was with him, a young gentleman, a member of the house, whom he introduced as his parliamentary secretary. Mr. Morrison turned to him at times for verification of certain figures, and this young gentleman was very helpful. I said to Mr. Morrison, "I don't suppose you could carry on without your parliamentary secretary." He answered, "Carry on? I could not possibly. I have three parliamentary secretaries, and with them I find it difficult to dc all the work I have to do." And why not? There is plenty of material in this house. There are eighteen members of this house whom I could mention. Of course, I have not the privilege of picking either cabinet associates or parliamentary secretaries. I am putting this on Hansard merely as a recommendation to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. Let me run over the list as rapidly as possible. There are the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann), the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven), the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards), the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. McKinnon), the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). Those bagpipes would, I am sure, give an extra swirl if we had the hon. member for New Westminster as a parliamentary secretary. Then there is a wealth of material from Quebec—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why stop there?

Mr. SLAGHT: I don't. I could name twenty more just as good as the eighteen. Let me mention some, and I think my hon. friend will agree with me. There are the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand), the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott), the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton), for example; and down in the maritimes there is the member for Pictou (Mr. McCulloch). One could go across the floor of the house and find some splendid men there as wartime material for parliamentary secretaryships—and I am sincere in this.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. SLAGHT: My friend says "no." I remind him that this is war time—there is a war on. What better material could one have than the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green)?

Mr. GREEN: You had better stay on your own side.

Mr. SLAGHT: Do I understand that you decline?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will my hon. friend allow me? He is making a very constructive suggestion—there is no doubt about it—and one that is worthy of great consideration. But during the last war Sir Robert Borden tried that question of under-secretaries, and it was abandoned. I have often wondered why. I do not know.

Mr. SLAGHT: Perhaps he did not have the material I am now suggesting. Then there is the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), for whom I have high respect. There is the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). Where is he now? He is a man with a real knowledge of labour problems; if he threw off the mantle of politics, I believe he would be an able under-secretary to the Minister of Labour, and in that capacity he would make a great contribution to Canada's war effort.

That is my view of the war. I speak for myself alone, but I commend this idea to the government of the day.

One word more if I have time. I wish to say something about British Columbia, and I am sorry that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is not at the moment in his seat. May I refer to British Columbia and the Japanese situation and the fifth column in that province?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exceeded his time, and he may proceed only with unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SLAGHT: I will be brief. The fifth-column question, the matter of internment, is one to which I have devoted myself particularly for the last two years, under the guidance of, in cooperation with, and at the request of the late lamented Minister of Justice, to whose memory I pay great tribute to-day. I know something about this matter. I went to British Columbia at my own expense a year ago to look into the Japanese question, and I say this to the Minister of National Defence: Get those interned Japs across the mountains out of British Columbia without any more delay. You cannot move too fast. Three days from now you may be too late.

An hon. MEMBER: One day.

Mr. SLAGHT: Well, one day, if you like. But let us have it done. Someone says, "But where will you house them?" Well, two or three contractors from Calgary or Edmonton could put up temporary housing for 1,500 or 2,000 men in two or three weeks' time, and they could be taken care of, fed, guarded and protected.

One word more and I close. I am on the indulgence of the house. To what was the downfall of Norway due? The Quislings within. When did she learn of that danger? Not until the hun was over the border into Norway and the traitors cropped up like mushrooms overnight. To what was the downfall of France, Belgium, Holland due? The cream of the British army, 350,000 men, found that Hitler had whipped eight million men in thirty-three days. Why? Because of enemy treachery from within. There is no question about that. Now then, do not let us wait. We have the machinery; we have them picked up in the area proclaimed to be a war area; let us get them out of that province before irreparable damage may be done. I offer that as my view, from one who thinks he knows something about the matter, to my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence.

In our present dilemma, which is indeed grave—and we await news that may be yet more so—my word to this house, and a word which I believe can govern the attitude of any man who wants us to give an all-out effort to win this war, is this—I use the language of Mr. Churchill.

We have great reason for vigilance and concern, but no room for despair.

Mr. CHARLES PARENT (Quebec West and South) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, since the opening of this debate a considerable degree of unrest has been noticeable on all sides. The intemperate language used by some hon. members shows that the war of nerves started by the Toronto committee of 200 has reached us.

Be assured, Mr. Speaker, that in submitting my reasons for voting against the address and the proposed plebiscite I shall be brief and moderate.

The discussion so far has revealed the existence in this house of four distinct schools of thought. This shows how difficult it is to appraise the government's attitude and to make it acceptable to the various groups.

The first school of thought endorses the government's war policy such as it was originally, that is, free, voluntary and moderate, the result of a compromise due to the firm attitude of the Quebec leaders. This school, by its support of the proposed plebiscite, is taking an alarming turn towards what may become to-morrow a coercive, non-voluntary and immoderate war policy.

Many hon. members, I know, are supporting the plebiscite while reserving the right to vote against the conscription bill when it comes before the house. It is my view, Mr. Speaker, that once freed from its pledges the government will not have to bring in a conscription bill, as it already has all the power required to achieve this end. I do not object to the principle of a plebiscite, but I maintain that the government has no right to use such a measure for the purpose of allowing the majority to repudiate sacred pledges given to a minority.

The second school of thought is that of the Tory element. After hearing the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), one can say with Abraham: "It is the hand of Esau, but the voice of Jacob." The Toronto committee of 200 has voiced its demand for a total effort with conscription, but not conscription of wealth, for that would too seriously affect their bank accounts.

It is scarcely necessary to say that I intend to vote against the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition.

The third school of thought is led by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I must admit that the hon. gentleman has shown a praiseworthy consistency, since he preaches in 1942 what he preached in 1939. He advocates a total war effort with conscription of man-power, of industry, of resources and of wealth. I must regretfully say, however, that I do not share his views and that I shall vote against the amendment to the amendment.

The fourth school has no leader, but it has an ideal—a Canadian ideal. We acknowledge that we have certain duties and certain obligations towards England, but within reasonable limits and in proportion to our means. We recognize that our only country is Canada and that it is Canada that we must defend and that we are ready to defend. This school of thought has endorsed without recrimination Canada's war effort which was to be free, voluntary and moderate. It has accepted every compromise for the sake of national unity, but to-day it refuses to go a step farther, for fear of prejudicing this same national unity. Solemn pledges were given to the electors at the 1940 general election. Whatever the cost, we insist on respecting these pledges.

That school of thought is of the opinion that the government can no more release themselves of their undertaking through a plebiscite than could ten endorsers relieve themselves from any obligation to pay a note through voting one and all against their creditor. Let us remember that this compromise was agreed upon by the province of Quebec on the one hand and by all the provinces of Canada on the other. Quebec alone could renounce its vested rights.

If I now take the responsibility of voting against the address and the proposed plebiscite, it is that I am determined to honour my undertaking and because I believe this plebiscite will constitute a dangerous precedent, for, by this measure the government is taking a great step towards conscription for overseas service.

Lapointe possessed great parliamentary experience, a deep understanding of law and a knowledge of the meaning and implications of words. Never did he leave any door open, however, in his statements on conscription. He had been in the house with Laurier in 1917. He had approved Laurier on the referendum. But the experience of 1917 had taught him a lesson. He was acquainted with all democratic methods of consulting the people. Nevertheless, in making his statement on conscription Lapointe always burnt his bridges behind him. He consented every sacrifice, but would not leave the weapon of the plebiscite in the hands of the majority to overcome the minority.

Lapointe never said: "I will never agree to conscription until it has been voted by the people through a plebiscite or referendum". He quite positively and definitely stated: "I shall never accept conscription nor will I remain a member of a government which would enforce it". As the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix) so aptly recalled, Lapointe said: "Never".

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. PARENT: On June 18th, 1940, he stated before the whole country that the province of Quebec opposed compulsory service for overseas, that he would oppose such a measure and that were it suggested by the government he would cease to be a member of such government. Lapointe's undertakings as regards conscription for overseas service constitute his political will. Let us respect it.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. PARENT: It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that Quebec is opposed to conscription for overseas service. That is true. We have a great many reasons for opposing it. In order to understand such an attitude one must be acquainted with Quebec's soul. Its state of mind, its character and its education are the result of three centuries of struggle, resolute labour, steadfastness and faith in its mission.

How truly has the author of "Maria Chapdelaine" said:

> We came here three centuries ago and we have remained. Those who brought us here could return among us without bitterness or sorrow, for while it is true that we have not learned much, we have certainly forgotten nothing. We brought from overseas our prayers and our songs; they have remained ever the same. We have brought within our breasts our countrymen's hearts, valiant and vivacious, as open to pity as to mirth, the most human of all human hearts. Our creed, our language, our virtues and even our failings become sacred, intangible things, and will remain so to the end.

The province of Quebec does not forget that it has nearly 2,700,000 French Canadians as compared with about 650,000 people of all other extractions. Nor does it forget that the average Quebec family has four children against less than two in the other provinces. Owing to that very fact, conscription would mean to Quebec a sacrifice proportionately far greater than to the other provinces.

The province of Quebec does not forget either that taxes fall more heavily upon its families, that in the economic, financial and administrative fields, it has had to overcome formidable handicaps in order to survive, and that conscription would mean the upsetting of its entire economy.

It would be a mistake to believe that our national life draws its sole inspiration from France. Most French Canadian families can trace back their ancestors over a period of one, two or three centuries, and I do not think there are to-day one hundred French Canadian families with relatives in France. Such a fact makes it clear that Canada is the French Canadians' home land and that Quebec especially represents for them the result of labour accomplished by many generations, that they are determined to live and die there but, above all, they are ready to defend the Canadian soil against anyone who might attempt to conquer it.

I can conceive that such a state of mind is hard to understand for some of our English-speaking fellow citizens who live in Canada but whose minds and hearts are in England. We do not have among our people a Lord Beaverbrook, a Viscount Bennett, a Beverley Baxter or a George W. Weston. Those men after acquiring wealth in Canada have left our shores to spend their declining years in England.

The province of Quebec does not forget either that it enjoys a certain measure of freedom, but it is well enough acquainted with history to know that whatever it enjoys was only obtained after hard struggles and that, besides, it is not the debtor but rather the creditor of Britain.

It is all too frequently forgotten how generous and loyal Quebec was in 1775, 1812 and 1914. Vimy, Courcelette, Ypres, Passchendaele give striking evidence that after the lapse of one hundred years, we have fully preserved the virtues and gallantry of our fathers.

The province of Quebec also remembers the days of 1917 and better propaganda than is now going on will have to be used if our young men are to be brought to believe that Canada's first defence line is in England.

I represent a constituency in the city of Quebec where decent and peaceful citizens were killed during the 1917 troubles, and my electors knew when they gave me their confidence in 1940, that I would honour my pledges and protect their interests.

Mr. Speaker, these are a few of the reasons why Quebec is opposed to conscription for overseas service; many others could be enumerated but there is no point in taking up the time of the house. I have mentioned enough to justify my vote against the address and the plebiscite.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec is opposed to conscription for overseas service, but it is not opposed to the war effort through voluntary enlistment. Religious and civil authorities have been generous in their support of the Canadian war effort, but the Government have enlisted this loyal support by committing themselves not to resort to conscription for overseas service. Let us keep our word.

From certain quarters, we hear that these pledges were made by the leaders and the members under circumstances different from those which presently obtain. In 1939, 1940 and 1941, the Rome-Berlin-Tokio axis was already in existence and our leaders knew full well that Great Britain could not rely on her allies of 1914.

Furthermore, Germany had exhibited the might of its military machine to the world, by cutting to pieces, in a few weeks, the gallant Polish armies. The Canadian leaders were conversant or should have been with the deficiencies of the allied armies and it was easy to gauge the situation in comparing the events of 1917 with those of 1940. However, in spite of all this, while Hitler was marching through Europe, we were told time and again that conscription for overseas service would never be resorted to. We even denounced as evil-minded citizens those who questioned the word of our leaders, the word of honest citizens, by their reminder that other leaders, Borden, in Canada, Chamberlain in England, had to go back on their word against conscription.

For the last thirty years, we have campaigned against conscription for overseas service and the Quebec population had good reason to believe that their attitude in this matter was just as reasonable as that of Australia where there are no French Canadians.

All this goes to prove that Quebec is now influenced by its education, its formation and its sense of duty toward threatened Canada.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, allow me to render homage to the heroes of Hong Kong and especially to the Royal Rifles of Canada, of Quebec City, and offer the tribute of my sincerest admiration and deepest sympathy to their bereaved families. Though unfortunate, this expedition has been glorious. Those sons of Canada have given living testimony to the gallantry and courage of the Canadian soldier. It has been suggested that Hong Kong should be forgotten. For my part, I say, in the words of Gambetta: "Let us always think, but never talk, about it."

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with the remarks I have to make with respect to the subject matter of this debate, may I be permitted to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) who had the honour of moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both in manner of delivery and in thoughts expressed his speech was worthy of the highest praise. It warmed my heart, as I know it did the hearts of all hon. members listening to his words of commendation, inspired by his association with the men and women of Great Britain. I wish also to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) who, like the hon. member for Hull, had an opportunity to visit the old country quite recently and see first hand the effects of the blitz from the centre of our empire, and had the privilege of mingling and talking with those who had suffered so severely, and who are still carrying on so magnificently.

While perhaps some may consider that the present debate has gone far enough, and are impatient to get on with the job of pushing forward the war effort, I believe I owe it to the people of my constituency of Westmorland to say a few words, as their representative in the House of Commons. Westmorland is a large constituency, and has the second largest population among the constituencies of New Brunswick. I am proud of my county because of what it has done in peace time, and prouder still because of what it is doing in the present war. We are a truly Canadian section of the dominion, with a mixture of English, Irish, Scotch and French. Approximately two-thirds of the citizens are English-speaking, and the remaining third are French-speaking. There is no more loyal part of our country than Westmorland, whose chief centre is the city of Moncton, often called the hub of the maritimes. Westmorland is the core of the maritimes, and what more loyal part of the dominion is there than the maritime provinces?

If we may judge loyalty by enlistments, then Moncton, Westmorland county and all the maritimes will certainly not take second place to any other part of Canada. We have had our share of losses, too, on land, on sea and in the air. May I be pardoned for calling attention to the fact that the glorious role played by the Royal Irish Rifles of Quebec at Hong Kong fills us with pride; for on the nominal roll of that great battalion were the names of over 450 men from the maritime provinces, French, English, Irish and Scotch.

I desire now to pay my tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), my honoured leader, for the way in which he has guided the war effort so far. I do not intend to recite the innumerable measures which have been taken by him and the members of his cabinet, but we can judge their wisdom by the results thus far, results which have called for unstinted praise from that grand man, Winston Churchill, and many leading men of the empire, as well as of the great republic to the south of us.

I want to thank my leader for the stand he has taken with respect to the future war effort. I must admit that for several weeks prior to my coming here I was somewhat disturbed as to the action the government might take, in view of the vociferous call for conscription for overseas service in the army, which has come from various sections of the dominion, but more particularly centred in certain interests in Toronto and Montreal. While I realize that the greatest energy is emanating from those interests who are trying to get rid of my leader and get control of the purse-strings of the government, I also realize there are a large number of loyal citizens who conscientiously believe that to carry on our maximum war effort we must put into effect conscription of men for the fighting forces. There are, on the other hand, many people who are opposed to this idea and are not of the opinion that this is necessary at the present time, some who feel that total war effort does not require the forcible calling up of men and placing them in combatant units and sending them overseas. I believe, too, that these people are just as loyal as any Canadians and are conscientious in their beliefs. On both sides of the controversy we have extremists, and I was worried as to what action the government might take. I was greatly relieved when I listened to the speech from the throne and found that members of parliament supporting the government were not going to be forced to break their promises to their constituents, if they wished to support the government and maintain a stable administration in control.

I am supporting the plebiscite. I want the government of the day to be relieved of their past commitments. I want the people of my constituency to tell this government, by their vote, to go ahead and do what they think advisable at any time, when in the light of their knowledge and judgment they decide upon a course they deem necessary in the best interests of the whole of Canada and the empire. I have faith in the loyalty and the judgment of the Canadians in my constituency of Westmorland and in all the other constituencies in the other provinces of Canada. I do not want to face the people of my constituency and have them say I am supporting a government that so flagrantly will ignore pledges. I have faith in Canada; I have faith in our people; I have faith in the love and loyalty of the mothers and fathers, even though some speakers who have preceded me may not. I am certain that true Canadians will sacrifice themselves, their sons and their daughters, if and when they believe those sacrifices are necessary to preserve our country and maintain our freedom and liberty for future Canadians. Personally, I do not believe in conscripting men for fighting units unless it is absolutely impossible to get men by any other means. During the last war we raised and maintained, as an effective fighting force in France, four grand infantry divisions, each one of which was classed as a first-line division and could be relied upon as first-line storm troops. Lloyd George once said:

> The Canadians played a part of such distinction in the Somme battle of 1916 that thenceforward they were marked out as storm troops.

Was that because Canadians are superior beings to those of the motherland? Was it not because these divisions were made up of men who went over there voluntarily and were kept to their purpose by their own eagerness to do their part in destroying those forces that would destroy us? They did not go because they were forced; they went because they elected to do so of their own free will. The troops we have sent across the sea during this war are made up of just that kind of men, and there are many yet ready to go to support them. Do hon. members think it advisable to reinforce those troops from the ranks formed by men pressed into service against their will. I do not wish to belittle those who will not volunteer to fight overseas, but I do not consider that it is to the best interests of the Canadian army to dilute it with men so constituted that they have not the heart and spirit to fight, and who must be driven on by compulsion. Let the farmers go on the land, the machinists work in the shops, and by all means send only those into the combatant units who have the intestinal fortitude to go.

In spite of the flagrant statements made in this house, and outside this house, I do not believe that our voluntary system has fallen down. I am still of the opinion that we can raise, by voluntary means, all the troops we should. From the beginning of this war till the end of 1941 our voluntary enlistments for all branches of the service have been over 422,000, and apparently it is keeping up, for over 182,000 were attested during the calendar year of 1941. The first month of this year, January, has given us, by voluntary enlistment for overseas, over 11,000 men for the army alone, and I am confident that there will be a continuous flow answering Canada's call. These men, together with the "R" recruits that are being called up under the National War Services Act, will tax the resources of our training facilities, and it will keep this country on its toes to supply and equip them, in the light of the tremendous demands for all the guns, tanks, rifles, et cetera, that are so urgently needed by the empire and our allies where they are actually struggling with our vicious enemies.

The government has announced in parliament that the Canadian corps overseas is to be expanded to an army of two corps; one to be a corps of three infantry divisions and two army tank brigades; the other to consist of two armoured divisions. The navy is to take all the ships Canada can produce, and man them just as soon as they can be put into commission. There is to be an increase in the home war establishment of the air force as well. With that extension of the army, there are all the corps and army ancillary troops, which, with the reserves to be sent forward this year, will require around 95,000 men to be enlisted, trained, and equipped up to March, 1943. There is every reason to believe that this can and will be done by voluntary enlistment.

I think Canadians are prepared and eager to enlist, equip and maintain as large a fighting force as we are physically able to do. But there is a limit beyond which Canada cannot go and make our forces effective. Do not let us forget that at the present time we have about 550,000 men and 75,000 women working in our factories on war production, and remember also that during the last war there were less than half that number of men engaged in war production. Let us also keep in mind the very large number of men in the air force, at least 100,000 enlisted men, besides the civilian personnel in the empire training scheme, and upwards of 27,000 in the Royal Canadian Navy, which has done such heroic work in guarding our shores and convoying the ships carrying food and munitions to Great Britain and our allies, who are so much in need of them. All these tremendous efforts of our country require men, but they require machines even more, in this type of war. Those of us who made up the Canadian corps of 1914-18 have still vivid memories of the trenches and the holes in the ground to and through which we foot-slogged it, but our army of to-day moves on wheels or treads, with engines, transmissions, and drives, that need specially trained men to operate and maintain them. I do not think I am very far out of the way in saying that the striking power of one of our divisions to-day is equal to that of two of the divisions of the last great war, and that the modern division requires far more men behind the lines and at home to equip and maintain it in the field.

Mr. Speaker, I have faith in our government, and I have every reason to have that faith when I know the type of men who make up our government. We are fortunate, especially at this time, in having such men, so many of whom know by experience as soldiers what it is to fight a war, and know what it is to hear the thud of a shell and the whine of a bullet too unpleasantly near. No one can doubt their loyalty, and no one should question their determination to make a full and total war effort. I shall support the government in this plebiscite, and I shall support this government should circumstances so develop that they feel it necessary to enact total conscription for the army for action in any part of the world where it is necessary to fight the enemy.

The other night I had the privilege of listening to a lecture in the theatre of the National Museum in Ottawa on the subject of "Canada's Army—Man-Power Plus Machines". The speaker was Lieutenant-Colonel Goforth of the headquarters staff, Department of National Defence. I have confidence in our military leaders and our military staff, even though one of the speakers the other evening said a great deal that might cause the people of this country to doubt their ability. Among other things, Colonel Goforth told his audience that a comprehensive study had been made by our military authorities some time prior to the present war, and it was concluded that the maximum force that could be raised in Canada and maintained in action was six infantry divisions and one cavalry division. At that time, so far as one could gather from the speaker, there was no idea of any British empire air training scheme, nor could there have been at that time any comprehension of the huge proportions to which the production of arms and implements of war in Canada would be expanded, not to mention the growth and expansion of the Royal Canadian Navy.

Have we not already accomplished more than it was ever hoped we could? Can there be any justice in claiming that this government has not gone all-out under the inspiration of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)? Could there be anything more unfair than the accusation or the insinuation that William Lyon Mackenzie King has had any other idea than an all-out war effort? One thing certain is that a maximum war effort can be accomplished only by making it a united effort. Up to the present time no one can say that there has not been evidence of a unity of purpose in this country such as has never before prevailed in Canada. What a sabotaging of the war effort it would be if those who are so eager to upset the government or destroy its leader should for this or any other reason succeed in setting one section of Canada against the other.

There is actually just one point on which the opposition differs from the government, and that is as to the method of securing men for the army overseas. Surely there is only one way to decide what Canada wants. Let us ask the people whose servant we are. Let me ask those who oppose the plebiscite, are we to be hypocrites preaching democracy and practising totalitarianism? We must not be stampeded into Hitler's methods by catch-phrases and extreme statements. Let us get down to calm thinking. The cost of the plebiscite in dollars will not be too high a price to pay for our democratic ideals of government. When we know that our implements of war and equipment are being given to those who so urgently need them right now in battle, and that men are being trained by Canada as rapidly as our facilities will permit, what delay will there be in our war effort by holding a plebiscite? What right have you or I on either side of this house to say that the people should not be given a chance to speak their mind in the only way in which they can effectively do so, and why should opposition members on the other side fear the sound of that voice? Who are we to feel that the people of Canada are not every bit as loyal to Canada as members of this chamber and as eager to go the limit in defeating the enemy at every point we can?

Our duty is clear. Winston Churchill has made it clear to us. He said:

> Each to our part, each to our station. Fill the armies, rule the air, pour out the munitions, strangle the U-boats, sweep the mines, plough the land, build the ships, guard the streets, succour the wounded, uplift the downcast and honour the brave.
> Let us go forward together in all parts of the empire, in all parts of this island. There is not a week, not a day, nor an hour to be lost.

[Mr. Emmerson.]

Do not let us becloud the issue; and if each gets busy and makes it clear to our constituents, I am sure Canadians will tell the world they absolve the government of the day from any commitment that might interfere in a full, all-out conduct of the war effort.

Mr. J. E. S. EMMANUEL D'ANJOU (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, realizing my responsibility as a member for the constituency of Rimouski, at this time, and with all possible frankness, I wish to state my opinion concerning the plebiscite mentioned in the speech from the throne. Having always been a Liberal, I have, for the last thirty years, campaigned for my party, not only in my own constituency, but in a large part of the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and New Brunswick. Follower of Laurier and Lapointe and, I may add, follower of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I have always believed in their political creed for, to me, the word Liberal has always meant freedom of thought and speech on all political matters.

Therefore, on the strength of this very freedom, I shall, in all frankness and without reservation, state my reasons for opposing the plebiscite alluded to in the speech from the throne. In my estimation, the proposed plebiscite may have but one outcome, that is conscription for overseas service purely and simply. It is nothing but a screen through which the hideous outline of conscription is plainly visible. I have always been opposed to conscription for service outside of Canada and to-day, more than ever, I am against this iniquitous system of military enlistment.

Furthermore, no power on earth could cause me to repudiate the solemn pledges that I gave to my faithful constituents on this matter of conscription. I have stated time and again in each parish of my constituency, that I should oppose whoever in this house attempted to enforce compulsory military service for overseas. I even specified that I would not hesitate to vote against my party if it ever took that initiative. I shall therefore keep my word and vote against the address and the plebiscite. I repeat that, to my mind, the plebiscite is the forerunner of conscription, for the government, unless they intend to enact a measure of this nature, would not ask to be relieved of past commitments in this connection. The risk is too great and the most elementary discretion commands that I remain on the alert and watch my step.

However, I must say that I rely entirely on the right hon. Prime Minister. But how am I to know how long he will remain at the head of the government. He does not enjoy immortality any more than we do. And death may come suddenly. We have experienced the truth of this statement, some time ago, on the occasion of the decease of the late Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe.

It is, however, my honest hope, for the greatest good of the country, that the right hon. Prime Minister may long remain at the head of the government. But, I repeat that, for any one of many reasons, he may disappear from the political arena, and I am not prepared, in advance, to trust his successor in the matter of conscription for overseas service.

Our political opponents, Mr. Speaker, have often stated that the province of Quebec stood alone in its opposition to conscription. The verdict rendered on March 26, 1940, however, has shown this statement to be false. Both political parties made known their opposition to conscription and the present government was returned to power by the greatest majority ever obtained at any previous general election in Canada. It can be proven, if need be, that French-Canadians from the province of Quebec and from Rimouski constituency in particular are neither poltroons nor cowards. During the last war, a regiment from Rimouski went overseas and counted among its brave men, Jean Brillant and Joseph Keable. Both received the highest military honour within the gift of Great Britain, the Victoria Cross. A constituency boasting such heroes does not deserve to see its population be referred to as people who refuse to fight and flinch in the accomplishment of duty.

In company with several of my colleagues who have spoken before me, I stand wholeheartedly for the defence of Canada, but of Canada only and on Canadian soil. Since Japan came into the war, our country is in greater danger than ever before. Why not keep our men here, then, in case the country should be attacked? Australia has had her own sorrowful experience. Australia sent many of her best troops to foreign lands. She is calling for help to-day, because she is insufficiently defended and lacks the number of men required to cope with the situation.

In so far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, may I say that when the time comes to answer the plebiscite my answer will be no, and I will advise my electors to give the same reply. I do not wish the government to be released from their undertaking nor do I wish to be released myself. The members of the government were not alone in their pledge against conscription. All hon. members of this house gave the same undertaking. I intend to vote against the subamendment, against the amendment itself and against the main motion.

I do believe, Mr. Speaker, it would be political wisdom on the part of the government were they to change the Mobilization Act so as to exempt farmers' sons and farm hands from its application. I have had occasion quite often in my constituency, which is essentially agricultural, to ask for postponements on behalf of farmers' sons. I might quote, among other instances, two really sad cases. An excellent old man, a farmer, seventy-six years of age and sick, had three sons. Two of them were already undergoing training and he came to me in the hope that I might obtain a postponement for the remaining son. Would you believe it, Mr. Speaker, I was unable to obtain this, and notwithstanding the fact that his other two sons were already in training they took the last one from him. Such a course does not seem reasonable, for wars are not won by soldiers alone, especially by soldiers who have nothing to eat. Soldiers have to be fed if they are to fight. In order to provide them with food, the farms have to be operated.

Here is another case. A widow with a large farm asked me to obtain a postponement for her only son. I have been unable to obtain it. The exemption boards should show more consideration, especially in the case of farmers' sons.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of defending Canada and Canada alone, for I am first of all a Canadian. Mine is the motto of Sir Wilfrid Laurier: Canada first, Canada always, Canada only. May I quote the following words uttered by Lord Tweedsmuir, a former governor general of Canada:

> Canada is a sovereign nation and cannot take her attitude docilely from Britain, or from the United States, or from anybody else. A Canadian's first loyalty is not to the British Commonwealth of Nations, but to Canada and Canada's king, and those who deny this are doing, to my mind, a great disservice to the commonwealth.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker, by stating once again my intention to vote against the address in reply to the speech from the throne, that is, against the plebiscite mentioned therein.

Mr. W. R. AYLESWORTH (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, I rise to add my voice to those who are asking for a better deal for the farmer. We are hoping that the government will see fit to recognize the extreme value of an organized farm effort in relation to our war effort. The farmer has been hit harder by the war than those in any other vocation.

He has been hit from all sides—by the shortage of farm labour, by the low prices of his products, by the high prices of his necessities and now by the price ceiling, which was applied before the prices of his products reached parity with the prices of the goods he must buy. In the old days the farmer, when he had to give his best days to working on the soil, retired to the city or town and left the farm to the young people. They did the hard work after that. Now the young people leave the farm long before the old people are ready to retire. In the city the young people can make a living without much effort, and there is no inducement to them to return to the farm where they can barely make a living, and that only with a good deal of effort. As a result, the old people are left to struggle along, and when they can no longer carry the burden alone they must hire help.

With the beginning of the war the demand from industry for all kinds of workers at good wages resulted in hired men being weaned away from the farm to industry. Unless the farmer can compete with industry in the matter of wages—and very few of them can—a very serious situation will have to be faced. We should have a war plan for the farmer. No one can rise in his place in this house and say that the farmer has been receiving fair prices for his products in the past; that is, prices that are fair in relation to the prices the farmer has to pay for the commodities he has to buy.

Unfortunately, most city people do not know the farmer. They think that all he has to do is to plant seeds, wait for the product to grow and then harvest it and sell it. They do not realize the backaching work that goes into his job, the heartaches from wind, hail, drought and floods, to say nothing of insect pests. Certainly he has had his good years, but even in those times his profits have not been large, and in the bad years his optimism has kept him going. On the whole the farmer has done little complaining to the government about his plight. Perhaps if he had done more complaining, he would not be in the position he is in to-day. The prices he receives at present barely assure him his existence, and there is no relief in sight.

This ties up with the labour problem. If the food production industry gets a parity of prices, it will be able to pay wages comparable with those paid by industry. With the rise in price of most farm products owing to the war, it looked as if the farmer might soon have an adequate return for his efforts and be put in a position where he would be able to compete with industry for help. But then came the price ceiling. The farmer does not object to the government's action in this regard provided a fair balance of prices is maintained. There is injustice to the farmer in freezing the unbalanced economy that exists, and I suggest to the government that the price ceiling should be let off certain products. The farmer should have a fair return for the products he sells.

So little consideration is being given the farmer that it looks as if the government does not realize the importance of keeping the farmer in production, and more production. Canada has been struggling along with a hand-to-mouth policy, and it is evident that if the country is to hold its own in the task of sending food to war-torn Britain and feed its own population, including the army, the navy and air force, some plan must be advised to bring farms into full production.

Some people say, "What if we bring the farms into full production and the war ends?" That would be good. Just think of the enormous market there would be in starving Europe, for food, as well as the huge market that would exist to replenish the herds of live stock in European countries. We have been in this war considerably longer than the United States, and already they have a plan for agriculture, while our plan, if we have any, is piecemeal and has no definite goal. If we do not plan now for agricultural production, there is grave danger of a food shortage in the country.

At the last session of parliament the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) put forward a plan for agricultural production, and a very good plan it was. In fact, it might bear repeating. But has the government taken any note of it? Let me repeat some of his suggestions. First of all, there is the suggestion to appoint a national food board. I know that the wartime prices and trade board and the agricultural supply board are operating, but they are not planning to any extent for future production. They are interested in controlling prevailing production. This board would estimate the production required for 1942, and each year to the end of the war, to feed Canada and meet the requirements of our allies. Canada would be divided into production zones according to the things best produced in the different areas. Give this board power to put into operation any scheme whereby the maximum production for the zone would be reached, and assure adequate supplies of labour, with machinery and fertilizers made available for agricultural purposes. There should be nothing difficult about this.

National registration has shown that there are sufficient men to work the farms if they are placed at this work. We could even recruit a farm army at military pay and place them in the different zones as needed. As for machinery, the government could arrange transportation to any point where needed, or make it part of the equipment of the farm army.

Another suggestion was a women's farm army. The Ontario government is going to and may now be training women to take their places on the farm. Could not the federal government follow their lead and recruit women for farm work? I would earnestly urge upon the government that farmers' sons and farm help working on the farms and producing food be allowed to continue this work.

With regard to parity for farm prices with war production, I mentioned before when I suggested withholding the price ceiling to allow farm products to catch up and gain parity.

The board would provide that the owner of the land would have these objectives and would be adequately reimbursed for his investment and his effort. That is only fair, because all other industries receive a fair return. Give the farmers fair markets and sufficient help and they will keep our farms producing. The board would plan to build up stocks of finished foods like canned pork and beef, canned vegetables, evaporated milk, dried eggs, and so on. I would make only one addition to the plan of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, that is that a special section of the national food board deal with and promote a greatly increased production of cattle and hogs. The demand for bacon from our allies is ever increasing. Someone slipped so badly in their estimate of the requirements of our allies that for a time we were asked not to buy pork, with the result that the price of other meats climbed so high it was cheaper to buy pork. I admit that the situation in this regard has improved, but we could have an even greater production in hogs. For instance, we have a huge surplus of wheat that could be purchased from the western farmer at a fair price and sold to the hog raisers of Ontario. The government could arrange this. With the feed problem solved, the farmer could raise twice as many hogs. We should also increase the number of cattle raised, not only for food but in order to be ready at the end of the war to send many shiploads to Europe for food and for stock.

Cattle demand for the past year has been 115,247 head greater than for 1940. The main reasons for this increase were: curtailment of supplies of pork for home consumption; increased industrial activity resulting in improved consumer purchasing power; and the fact that military camp estimated requirements were 40,211,767 pounds, compared with 18,214,421 pounds in 1940, an increase of 21,997,346 pounds. At an average of 500 pounds to the carcase the increase is equal to 44,000 head of cattle. This makes a total camp consumption of 80,000 cattle. The number of cattle on feed is below that for the past five years. Incidentally I am sure our producers are looking for higher prices, to offset the higher prices paid for feeding cattle, the increased cost of feed and higher wages of farm help.

An improved demand for beef in both Canada and the United States could easily bring about a period when marketings of cattle would fall short of supplying our full requirements of beef. It is important that our producers be encouraged to increase their production, so I ask that the ceiling price on beef be lifted for a time. I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to see that producers of beef, lamb and hogs are allowed to make a reasonable profit.

I would also ask the government to allow the price of cheese to advance. The lifting of the ceiling, allowing the price of cheese made during the winter to advance, was a good thing, but many farmers were not able to produce milk during the winter months and, therefore, could not take advantage of this.

I should like to place before the house the necessity of encouraging an increase in lamb production. We are facing a shortage of wool in this country, and that at a time when woollen mills are coming to Canada from England. Also last year we imported nearly 3,000,000 pounds of lamb. I should like to place on record these figures showing our imports of lamb from Australia and New Zealand from 1934 to 1941:

Year	Imports pounds
1935	83,162
1936	19,079
1937	40,245
1938	402,332
1939	1,565,747
1940	920,870
1941 (11 months)	2,494,796

Up to 1937 the duty was three cents a pound, but from October 1 of that year it was reduced to half a cent.

There was a very healthy demand for lamb in 1941. This demand was doubtless due to increased purchasing power of consumers, and also to curtailment in pork supplies. The above figures show the effect of the reduction in import duties. The ceiling price on lamb has recently been lifted. This is in accord with my view, and I would ask that it be left off in order to encourage production. If we could produce the 3,000,000 pounds of lamb imported last year, it would equal 70,000 lambs, which would produce 500,000 pounds of wool.

The farmers also have to face the restriction of electric power, and I would ask the government to give every consideration through their power controller to applications for electric power in order to help in the production of the necessary foodstuffs.

This country, Mr. Speaker, is facing a grave situation. What happened in France should be a lesson to us. Party politics and shades of political opinion so divided that country and created such dissension that it was impossible to obtain any cooperation or continuity of effort toward the prosecution of a war. At this time when we are facing such an emergency party politics should be forgotten. Anything said at this time should be aimed toward unity rather than tending to create dissension among the Canadian people. What has happened to Australia may happen any day to Canada, and it is important that we do the right thing now. I appreciate the effort the government has already put forth but I would earnestly urge a still greater effort. Russia is calling for more equipment; China is calling for more equipment; General McNaughton asks for more and better equipment; so let us see that every man or woman who can work is put to work, and let us produce to the very limit of our resources. Surely it is time we became alive to the fact that we stand in a very precarious position, from which we can extricate ourselves only by a determined effort on the part of all the people.

Mr. G. T. PURDY (Colchester-Hants): With very much of what the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Aylesworth) has just said I am in hearty agreement. Probably that is no wonder, because we both represent constituencies very much interested in the agricultural life of this country. I congratulate the hon. member upon what he has said.

This debate is now in its third week. Such being the situation I shall not cover all the ground I had intended to, because much of what I expected to say has been well expressed by other hon. members.

The hun is at our gates; the Jap is at our gates, our gates both east and west; Canada's gates both east and west. If there ever was a time in the history of our country when clear thinking without political or personal bias was required from members of parliament, this is the time. Having regard to this, I was sorry to see so many members of the opposition resort to making political speeches for seven-eighths of their time and then in the remaining one-eighth trying to fool the house and the country by striking a patriotic note.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What about the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) this afternoon?

Mr. PURDY: The hon. gentleman made his speech, so please let me make mine. Surely it has been demonstrated again that the Tory party, shorn of power, is like a she bear robbed of her cubs. I am free to admit that certain members of the Liberal party have dealt somewhat with politics in part of their remarks, but I am sure that an unbiased perusal of the record will show that such statements were provoked by opposition speeches. Occupying as I do one of the buffer seats in this parliament, as I also did in the last parliament, with opposition members to the left and opposition members to the front, I can truthfully say that for the most part I have found them splendid fellows. I believe many of them are gradually coming to the Liberal viewpoint. I urge them to continue to seek the light, because I feel that without leaders they will have to wind up as a party. During the few years I have been in parliament I have endeavoured to follow the motto: "If you have nothing to say, say nothing." May I suggest to those groups sitting to the far left that if democracy is to function as intended, they should pay more attention to this motto. I have on my desk the following verse:

> What one approves, another scorns,
> And thus each his nature shows.
> You find the rose bush full of thorns;
> I find the thorn bush full of roses.

I often turn to this for comfort when I hear or read of some move that does not appeal to me.

The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) is a friend of long standing, whom I admire in both a business and personal way. I cannot, however, follow his political thought. On Monday, while speaking of the accomplishments of his constituency in munition manufacturing, it seemed to me that he was not at ease, that he cast his eyes down, and I hope he bowed his head. He must have recalled that but two short years ago he was touring his county far and wide and in effect saying that the statement made by the late Norman Rogers, a fellow-townsman, on behalf of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), that a large aeroplane programme was under way for Amherst was nothing but election talk, and that if Amherst was to have a revival of industry it would be necessary to elect the Manion National government. The Manion government was not elected, and the hon. gentleman sits condemned by his own words and discredited in the eyes of many of his electors by the statements he made at that time.

The constituency I have the honour to represent, Colchester-Hants, has its roots far back in the days of colonization in Nova Scotia, and stretches from Northumberland strait to the bay of Fundy, across the central part of the province. Truro, the shire town of Colchester, was the Cobequid of the Acadians, and Windsor, the shire town of Hants county, the Pisquid. Our people are mostly of British origin, the forefathers of many of them being New England planters or pre-loyalists, who took up the lands from which the Acadians were expelled prior to the American revolution. They were followed by their Loyalist friends and relatives, and the ties with the British isles were strengthened by direct emigration from England, Scotland and Ireland. We have a small percentage of other European stock, and a considerable overflow from the original German or Dutch settlements in Lunenburg county. Our population is roughly one-third urban and two-thirds rural. The chief industries of the towns are textiles, lumber products, wood pulp, dairy products and fertilizers. The principal activities in the country are mixed farming and lumbering. Large quantities of gypsum are produced round the famous Minas basin, where the tides rise as high as sixty feet; and the western end of the constituency is the eastern end of the famous Annapolis valley, so that we produce about one-tenth of the commercial apple crop of the province.

With this background and these surroundings, Mr. Speaker, we have maintained a reasonably well balanced economy and have produced a race of people loyal to the British crown and British traditions, proud to call the union jack our flag. When the call for duty came, our boys and girls were no less willing to enlist than in the past, and are now serving wherever Canadians are found on the far-flung battle front. They are standing firm on British shores, flying over the low countries and in the middle east, and their names appear on the service rolls with the Hong Kong heroes. One company of the forestry corps now serving overseas was largely recruited in our district. We are represented in the prison camps of Germany, and our casualty lists are mounting. Enlistments keep up. To those who do not return I pay my homage. While not regarded as a marine constituency compared with others in the province, our boys have enlisted freely in the Royal Canadian Navy, and their names can be found in large numbers among the unsung heroes of the war, the merchant marine. One of my constituents, Mr. Dick Harvie, of Noel Road, Hants county, has seven sons serving with the forces, volunteers for service anywhere. That is a truly magnificent contribution from any one home.

Let me say here to these men and women of the forces, to many of whom I am tied by the bonds of friendship, and to others by the ties of blood, and to their relations and friends, that as their representative in the parliament of Canada I hope and pray they will feel that in the decisions we have made or are required to make I have not and will not let them down. I voted for the Union government in 1917 because I felt then, as I feel to-day, that selective service is the fair way of raising an army. But, Mr. Speaker, war as practised to-day by our enemies is not fair war, and we must meet them by the most efficient methods at which the best brains of this country can arrive.

In case I may be misunderstood I will say here and now that if it develops that the voluntary method of raising men does not produce sufficient recruits to maintain overseas the maximum force we are capable of sending, having regard to the demands on our man-power for munitions and supplies and adequate home defence, I will support the government in extending the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act to cover man-power for overseas. Churchill, in his famous speech to the empire after Dunkirk, called us to our stations—not necessarily in the firing line, but wherever we were most useful. Since munitions, food and ships are now required rather than man-power, Canada must, on account of her location, be expected to take a larger share of the load in this regard than otherwise would be the case. This is not nearly as spectacular as the million marching feet asked for by some of the opposition, but it is far more effective in an all-out, balanced effort. It was German machines, not man-power, that drove through the low countries, raced up the French lines and drove the British expeditionary force into the sea at Dunkirk. We must equip our army and the armies of our allies with the very latest in fighting equipment before we lessen the flow of these vital articles overseas by drawing men from the production lines. Have we the man-power to keep up the maximum supply of munitions and food and at the same time materially increase our overseas force? I do not know. We look to the government to inform us and to lead us in an all-out war effort, with a complete mobilization of all resources, material and human. I urge that in such an effort our natural resources must be further developed and more advantage taken of the productive capacity of our smaller concerns than has been the case to date.

As yet, Mr. Speaker, I fear that our manpower and productive capacity are a long way from being fully mobilized, and that a great deal of our effort is still devoted to non-essentials. The people of Canada are just now beginning to feel the pinch of regulations which are necessary for the carrying out of the war. This being the situation, they look to the government not only to regulate and advise, but also to set an example. It is therefore difficult to understand how certain departments can continue to use up manpower and materials along certain lines in duplication and non-essential services, while other departments are crying for the people to salvage and save, and our allies are looking to us to produce more munitions.

For instance, our Post Office Department has a considerable programme of expensive advertising. Their service should be their best advertiser. If they are advocating less use of the telegraph, one department of government is in effect working against another. Again, we have recently been favoured with a series of advertisements issued by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. These were very well done, but, I would assume, very expensive. Surely present radio listeners do not have to be told what the corporation is doing, and we are supposed to discourage the purchase of more radios. Could not the materials and man-power used in these activities be placed to better advantage elsewhere?

Again, we have one department of the government sending out forms all across the country, asking from business certain information which has already been furnished to another department, or continuing to send out the inquiries when the party to whom they are addressed has advised that he does not deal in the article or articles inquired about.

I have before me an inquiry which has been widely circulated, asking for the price of bread on certain recent dates, while the price has been pegged throughout Canada since the outbreak of war. Is this efficiency or economy? Is it any wonder that the maritime boards of trade, at a recent meeting, asked that business be released from the work of furnishing so many government returns?

In my constituency are located the Debert military camp, the Debert airport and the Stanley elementary training school. At these various centres in the course of their training, or sailing for overseas, we are privileged to have a large number of the picked manhood of Canada, not only of Canada but of all parts of the British commonwealth, and also of the United States. Our citizens have welcomed these strangers with open arms, and while, having regard to the numbers of men as compared with our population, we have not been able to do all we would wish, yet I consider that most of our temporary military guests will take away with them very warm feelings toward the people of this banner constituency. Surely this contact will, in the years to come, bear fruit, and people from other provinces and other lands will be better able to understand our problems and we theirs.

In passing, it might be well to point out to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) that from reliable sources I am informed that the Stanley school was the only one in eastern Canada able to carry on continual flying operations last spring during the break-up, and suggest that our location is most suitable for further extensions if required.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel I should refer to a matter which has to some extent caused me to lose my faith in mankind. I am told on good authority that in the officers' mess at Debert and at other military camps the story is being circulated that the reason why a large military camp was established at Debert is because the site of it was the old Ralston homestead and was owned by our present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). A return filed on February 9 to an order of this house of February 2 shows that the land occupied at this point was acquired from more than 120 individual owners and that none was owned by the hon. minister. In fact I can obtain no information that either he or his near relatives ever owned property in this district. The hon. minister, who in 1914 and again in 1939 answered the call of his country, is too big a man to pay attention to such lies as the one I have mentioned, apparently circulated in order to discredit the government, but I feel that this statement of the true situation should be posted in every mess of the Canadian army so that he who runs may read. Officers who are gentlemen should know how to deal with the likes of those who start stories such as the one to which I have referred.

Coming now to the plebiscite, I propose to support it, and urge my constituents to vote, "Yes". Why do I do this? I do this because I feel that our ministry should have a free hand, subject only to the control of parliament, in the troublesome days to come.

Do I feel that the government is bound by a pledge of "no conscription for overseas service" given in 1940? My answer is "yes". Furthermore, I consider, having accepted the Liberal platform and having been elected on same, that I am also bound by the pledge. It may be hard for our opponents to get over the idea that election promises are made to be elected on and then to be forgotten, but my leader, the Prime Minister, stands for something higher than that, and I feel that the people of Canada will honour him for the stand he has taken, in spite of the clamour of the old Tories for him to forget promises. Surely, had he done so, he would have to-day been held up to the Canadian people as a man whose promise could not be relied upon, and this by the same people who are now condemning him for holding the plebiscite.

Mr. Speaker, may I take a few moments to refer to my part of the country. I referred previously to a full use of the productive capacity of our smaller plants, of which we have a number capable of doing something to help along the war effort, but so far they have been given very little opportunity. In fact one has had to close entirely owing to the lack of raw materials, and others to curtail. When the Minister of Munitions and Supply announced the bits-and-pieces programme last fall, I felt that it was a splendid move, and I strongly urge that it be developed until every shop and every bit of machinery capable of producing a needed article for our war effort are at work. I have asked on many occasions that small concerns in my constituency as well as our contractors be given consideration on war and defence projects. To date, for the most part, we have had to be content with the crumbs which fall from the rich man's table. Centralization is efficient to a certain point but, if carried beyond that point, creates inefficiency.

I would suggest that the time is now ripe for the government to take industry to where the labour and facilities are available rather than make it necessary for the people from the maritimes to move to central Canada to work, with the consequential housing and transportation problems, to say nothing of post-war situations and the disarrangement of our local economy.

Our contractors are efficient and should have been given an equal chance on local defence works rather than being overlooked until the best contracts in the district were given to central Canadian firms, some without our contractors knowing that the project was open. Even on tenders advertised in the public press, maritime contracts are at times advertised in the central Canada media, while I have yet to see central Canada projects of a similar nature advertised in our local papers.

Equal sacrifice should mean equal opportunity, and I would urge that we be given this oportunity. To my mind this can be brought about only by a better geographical distribution of the various appointments in key positions in the departments charged mainly with our war effort.

In the past the maritime provinces have not been found lacking in producing men of a high calibre, nor are they to-day, and I believe that if the course I have suggested is followed, we shall have made a further step toward a balanced and all-out war effort.

Not so long ago the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), our then premier, was called to Ottawa by the Prime Minister. Our people felt honoured by this action. I recall hearing the present Minister of National Defence for Naval Services say at one time that a happy and contented peasantry was the back-bone of a country.

As stated previously, approximately two-thirds of my constituency is rural, many of these being engaged in mixed farming. May I, therefore, for a moment be permitted to deal with some of their problems. It will be recalled that prior to the price-ceiling policy being announced, the position of our eastern farmers had been receiving attention and that it was decided that, in the face of the low prices they were receiving for their products, some assistance was in order. The federal government agreed to pay one-third of the freight on feed grains, and the local government the same. Then we come to the price-ceiling policy when, to bring farm products somewhere in line with other ceiling prices, the western farmers were given further assistance and the eastern farmers the full freight on feed grain. As stated a moment ago, our farmers had previously been given, based on their need of assistance, two-thirds of the freight, so the assistance they in fact received was but one-third. It therefore seems to me that in order to carry out the intention of the price-ceiling policy our farmers should receive additional assistance to the equivalent of two-thirds freight on western feed grains. This can be arranged by way of a rebate or discount on feed purchased, and I would ask the government to consider this matter.

Some of our farmers and poultrymen were surprised to find that western corn was not included for freight assistance, although it had been included in the original discussions. It was included in the British Columbia agreements. Apparently the Ontario corn growers had to be protected at the expense of the maritimes. The matter was taken up with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and hopes were held out for its inclusion by special arrangement. We are now advised after two months' delay that nothing can be done. I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to remove the duty on water-borne corn brought to the maritimes and suggest that we now have reason to expect this. Our farmers are not organized, nor can they afford to send large delegations to Ottawa as their western cousins have recently done. If they had the money they would, under present conditions, buy war bonds or certificates and not spend it in taking long trips. If they took the trip, who would look after their work? Therefore, as a member from Nova Scotia, interested in the welfare of our farming population, as all our members are, I am speaking on their behalf.

I am not in accord with the system of bonuses built up for western agriculture and, if I understand the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture correctly, about to be extended by new legislation; yet having regard to the price-ceiling policy, I see no other way of equalizing farm income with that of other industries.

If the end of the war is not to see the number of vacant farms in Nova Scotia largely increased, with resulting relief problems, something more must be done for agriculture.

I have shown what we are entitled to under the "some assistance" but not "equalization" price-ceiling policy. A series of abattoirs and cold storage warehouses might be erected in the province at places convenient to the mixed farming population, such as at Antigonish, Pictou, Truro, Windsor and Lunenburg. With such an arrangement our farmers could receive a proper inspection and price for their products locally, instead of shipping them out of the province or equally long distances to provincial points, only at times to have them returned for consumption within a few miles of where they were produced. I shall not further labour this matter, but suggest that it should be carefully considered.

In view of the labour situation on our farms brought about by enlistments, and higher wages being paid in war industries, assistance could be given in certain sections by way of extension of rural mail routes and assistance in extending rural electrification into districts not now eligible under provincial legislation. This latter would, of course, only be possible if the equipment were available.

[Mr. Purdy.]

Both these suggestions, if put into effect, would increase the number of man-hours available for work on the land.

Mr. Speaker, we have a wheat committee of the cabinet. I would suggest the appointment of an eastern agricultural committee also, and I call upon the Prime Minister and the ministers representing the maritime provinces, as well as the Minister of Agriculture, to take the maritime agricultural situation in hand before it is too late and submit any necessary legislation for the maritimes along with that proposed for the assistance of western agriculture. Only in this way can we have a happy and contented peasantry stretching across Canada and our rural population united in this our hour of greatest need.

Mr. PAUL EMILE COTE (Verdun) (Translation): Mr. Speaker,, it is a great honour and a heavy responsibility to rise amidst the elected representatives of the nation to speak on behalf of one of the constituencies of my province, the constituency where I was born and brought up, whose people, kindly witnesses of my first experiences in business life, have given me signal evidence of their confidence in choosing me to present their thoughts, their feelings and their aspirations to parliament and to the government.

Verdun and Lasalle, the two highly cosmopolitan municipalities making up my electoral division, are, with their citizens of various extractions and traditions, languages and religions, veritable miniatures of Canada. Faced by the same problems of life and inspired by a common ideal, my fellow-citizens have built up two great cities which have impressed all the people of Canada and have more than once been cited as examples to all communities seeking progress in union, understanding and tolerance.

The city of Verdun, by far the more populous of the two, proudly stands third in my province and twelfth in all Canada. Among the responsibilities which this honour has imposed upon it, there is one which it has discharged in a particularly glorious fashion. I refer to the part it played in this country's effort during the last war. The Prince of Wales himself, during his trip to Canada in 1919, stated that Verdun was the city of the British empire which had, in proportion to population, placed the largest number of men under arms.

Twenty-five years have passed, and these years may have effected a considerable change in the proportions and the appearance of the constituency which I represent. However, the sense of solidarity and of unity in the presence of great causes, the love of country and of liberty, have in no way diminished, and it is with rightful pride that I can say in this house that Verdun has accepted wholeheartedly and generously its large share of the burden of the present war. Thus it is that every war service, every patriotic organization, of whatever nature, is represented in the constituency of Verdun and receives all the cooperation and the results expected. In addition, according to the statistics available, Verdun is once again in the very first rank of the Dominion's municipalities as regards the proportion of its sons in our three fighting services.

In this community, so highly representative of the various ethnical elements of our country, I have imperceptibly gathered a fairly accurate conception of the patriotic sense of Canada. I find myself to-day in the presence of my fellow-members of this house, all charged, though in different degrees, with the leadership of our beloved country in this most critical period of her history.

Allied of her own free will with the great democracies, Canada has constituted herself the champion of the liberties of our Christian civilization and has bravely opposed the conquering march of the armies of German paganism. The conflict which began by the devastation and enslaving of far-away countries has drawn closer to our shores, and our national life is now seriously threatened.

During the two years and a half which this world-wide conflict has lasted, Canada has not betrayed the cause she undertook to champion. Quite the contrary. With the ardour and patriotism which distinguishes her sons and the incalculable richness of her resources, this Dominion has, for the defence of her territory and of civilization, contributed to the heroes of the democracies which have retained their freedom a magnificent effort which has excited the admiration, nay the astonishment, of the civilized world.

I am a Canadian by birth and by inclination. Never before, however, have I felt such love, such pride for my country as when I had an opportunity to appreciate, at the beginning of the present session, the progress made in the last two and a half years and to visualize what our young nation has accomplished for the defence of our most sacred liberties, for the safeguard of our christian civilization. And the sentiment thus entertained toward my country was equalled only by my admiration for him who, on that date of January 26, rendered an account of the manner in which his administration has carried on the war, and by my pride in sharing the political convictions of the greatest of Canadian statesmen and the most Canadian of our great statesmen.

The Right Hon. Mackenzie King, our Prime Minister, has made a clear, comprehensive and eloquent statement on a well balanced and most efficient war effort. It would be presumption on my part, therefore, being only a novice in public affairs, to attempt under such circumstances to describe our contribution in the present conflict. I would rather leave the people under the charm of that enlightening speech which old parliamentarians claim to have been one of the best ever made in the house by the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

May I be permitted, nevertheless, to bring out into bolder relief how that outstanding speech offers a fundamental explanation for the success of the gigantic task undertaken and a guarantee of its successful and really efficient accomplishment. Addressing myself in all sincerity to my fellow countrymen of every province and of every class of society, to all those who in these hours of trial pride themselves on being Canadians, I would state that we would never have accomplished one-half of what the country has contributed in two years to the successful prosecution of the war had we not had, as a foundation for our economic and military activities, both peace and unity in the land and the possibility of utilizing fully the energies which inevitably develop under such favourable conditions.

Had we been a divided country, in the throes of internal strife, far from withstanding the burden of a military effort which one might be tempted to call out of proportion with our development and population, our country might well have become but another instrument of those infernal machinations so ably devised under Hitlerian diplomacy.

Quite the contrary, in the security of internal peace, Canada has achieved a splendid contribution, particularly during the year about to close.

Our country has been able to produce all the food required for domestic consumption and to meet the needs of an ally having a population five times our own number.

We have succesfully developed our armament production and are in a position to-day to arm and equip by our own means a modern division in a relatively short time.

We have built a navy capable of serving as escort and of protecting convoys going overseas and of giving chase to enemy submarines over the seven seas.

An all-Canadian and powerful air force patrols our coasts, guards over our convoys and patrols enemy skies in search of new targets.

Compulsory military training prepares our young men for the defence of our country on Canadian soil, while voluntary recruiting enlists all who are willing to carry the fight to the enemy wherever he may be encountered.

In short, the economic and military policy of the country has been managed with such wisdom, that the government would hear nothing but a chorus of praise and gratitude, if it were not for the uproar fostered through a certain section of the press by a handful of heirs to the Union cabinet of 1917 and to the disturbances bred by that administration.

Faced with facts, these agitators are forced to admit, occasionally, the efficiency of our war effort, in all fields. Some of the newspapers, the Ottawa Journal and the Financial Post, among others, engaged in that contemptible campaign of disparagement against the government, but in reality against our Prime Minister, have published whole supplements admitting the efficiency of our country's contribution to the allied cause. I shall mention only their issues of January 30th and 31st respectively, where 32- and 15-page supplements are devoted to a review of the accomplishments of our industries and armed forces.

However, it seems that these people are not satisfied with the complete harmony that obtains all through our war effort. They must always recall the causes of the 1917 misunderstanding and, to this end, they have revived the old battle cry: "Canada cannot realize a total war effort without conscription of its youth for military service overseas."

The Prime Minister has answered their clamour with faultless logic supported by the most irrefutable statistics.

I need not quote again the figures that have already been given in this house to show how successful the voluntary system has been. Yet, notwithstanding the fact that in the seven last months voluntary enlistment in the three services of our armed forces has given an average monthly yield of over 20,000 men, whereas in the month that has just ended, 11,000 recruits were obtained for the army only, the same clamour is being raised about the so-called failure of the voluntary system and the necessity of immediate conscription for overseas service.

Fortunately, such is not the view of right-minded and sincere people, nor I think of the great majority of Canadian citizens. The constituency which I have the honour to represent, and where there are people of various races and creeds, strongly supports maintenance of the voluntary system of enlistment for overseas military service. So far as I am concerned, I am all the more willing to express the views of my constituents on that subject as I am and will remain a supporter of the anticonscriptionist doctrine.

[Mr. Côté.]

I shall not repeat the arguments advanced by my colleagues in this house whose views on that matter are similar to mine. I shall only add that conscription has been an utter failure during the last war, that from October, 1917, to November, 1918, a period of thirteen months, it yielded 83,355 men 22,000 of whom were granted temporary postponement for agricultural or other purposes. Consequently, during the above mentioned period, that system only yielded a monthly average of 4,720 men, most of whom could be called soldiers only because they wore a uniform and were subject to military discipline, as compared with the average number of 8,000 men who have enlisted every month since September last, and all of whom are proud soldiers conscious of the part they have to play in the army and determined to uphold the honour of their country. There are over 250,000 such volunteers in our active army, besides over 125,000 men in the air force and over 25,000 in the navy, making up, as at the 1st of January last, a total of well over 400,000 men who have voluntarily enlisted in our armed forces for service anywhere in the world. In order to appreciate better the importance of those figures, we must remember that our munitions and arms factories are now employing over 500,000 men and over 70,000 women, or twice the number of workers that were required by the same class of munitions factories during the last war. Yet, our country has only 11,500,000 inhabitants.

I am against conscription because I am in the first place opposed to any cause of disunion and misunderstanding in this country. Besides, I believe that it will not be necessary in so far as the constituency which I represent is concerned. The voluntary system has hitherto been highly successful and the same success can be maintained through the sincere and enlightened cooperation of all those who are called upon to exert some influence over their fellow citizens and public opinion in general.

Let the newspapers who have hitherto furthered the cause of disunion in this country stop their purely political and personal controversies and launch a campaign for voluntary enlistment, or at the very least, occasionally publish earnest appeals to young Canadians, a thing which they have hitherto carefully refrained from doing.

Let certain military men, probably well intentioned but ill advised, abandon the coercive means they have brought to bear upon the young men under compulsory military training, for the questionable purpose of hastening their enlistment in the active army; the signing up of a recruit through such means has not the character of a free decision and more often as not it hurts the cause, in discouraging a relative or a friend of the recruit, who otherwise would probably be earnestly willing to enlist.

Let the government consider whatever measures may be necessary to give better treatment to privates and non-commissioned officers in the active army, or to increase their dependents' allowances, keeping in mind that the pecuniary remuneration offered to them must meet the competition of the salaries that are attracting them to munitions factories.

Thus, the deficiencies and imperfections of our voluntary system having been remedied, enlistments will reach a higher level and bring into our active army as many if not more young men than during the last months, when conditions were not always quite favourable. At that rate, it would be possible, within a year, to obtain at least 100,000 additional men, without prejudice to the needs of the air force or the navy. I have every reason to believe that conscription for service in the active army would not produce as good results in the same period, and I need not emphasize the dire consequences it would undoubtedly have upon the morale of our people.

Unity within our ranks is a prime condition of success for our arms. By uniting our hearts, our minds and our energies we will succeed, under the guidance of an enlightened and wise government, in putting to really good use all our material resources and man-power, in a way that will ensure victory for the democracies over the forces of evil. Without such unity, whatever those in authority may do, we cannot expect anything but half-measures and quite unsatisfactory results.

Mr. Speaker, let us make the most of what is likely to unite us in this war; let us make use of it fully in the best interests of the great cause which we must defend until victory. As to what is liable to divide the country and, mind you, it is only a very small part of our total war effort, let us examine it calmly, without prejudice or passion. Let us see if, by adopting a one-sided and inflexible solution, we are not jeopardizing the ever growing successes which have crowned our efforts in this domain as well as in all the others.

The Prime Minister and his government have succeeded in preserving peace and harmony in our country since the beginning of the war. Unity has been preserved in the country by a responsible and strong government, in which the nation had placed full confidence. Conditions have arisen which have been considered to necessitate an appeal to the people on the question of compulsory military service. I need not question the motives which governed this decision. I have too much confidence in the Prime Minister and his advisers to doubt, even for a single moment, that this measure was not absolutely necessary to maintain unity and solidarity in the government ranks and preserve the peace of the country, threatened by the unavowed ambitions of the group of agitators whom we all know. A plebiscite will thus be held in a few months. I am convinced that the people will welcome it as a truly democratic measure and answer it conscientiously and in the best interest of the nation.

For my part, I approve the principle of this appeal to the people because of the special circumstances which necessitate it, and I understand that the government will submit, after the conclusion of the present debate, a bill which will permit us to examine and determine the details of this plebiscite.

The main motion before the house asks the members for a vote of confidence in this government.

An adverse vote, on whatever ground, would be a condemnation of the policy generally followed by our leaders and an indication of want of confidence in the authority of the Prime Minister.

I congratulate the government on having maintained as the first principle of their war policy that the might of our country and the efficiency of its cooperation with the allied powers must be based on the unity and common action of all sections of her population, for the one purpose dear to all Canadians, namely, the ultimate victory of our forces.

I note with pleasure the wonderful balance given to our war effort, which has been kept free from passions and injustices which were rampant during the last conflict and which it is sought in certain quarters to revive.

I say to the Prime Minister without hesitation that we admire the mastery with which he is guiding the ship of state through the difficulties of all kinds constantly being raised. I wish to assure him of our unswerving confidence and to say that as representative of the constituency of Verdun, I will vote against both amendments and in favour of the main motion.

Mr. AZELLUS DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I will take just a few minutes of the time of the house to state the reasons why I shall vote for the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Why should I betray the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), when I am convinced that he is the only man who is able, for the present, to administer the country according to the wishes, not only of the electors of the constituency of St. Denis, but of the whole population of Canada? Why should I lack confidence in him when he has protected us since the beginning of the war against disunion, against those who were thirsting for profit and power, against the financiers and the ultra-imperialists? Why should I deny him my support when he thinks the same as we do as regards conscription for overseas service? It would be silly and inconsistent to say: I have so much confidence in King that I am going to vote against him; he has administered the country so well since 1940 that I am going to vote to put somebody else in his place.

Mr. Speaker, it may be interesting to set oneself as the saviour of one's race, as the protector of one's province and constituency, and at the same time to have one's colleagues considered as "followers." But one must beware not to cut off one's nose to spite one's face.

If I vote against the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I will be voting with and for the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), and if a sufficient number of members from the province of Quebec do the same thing, the government may be defeated, and in all probability the leader of the opposition would be called upon to form a government. With the combined help of the Conservatives, the C.C.F., the Social Crediters, and the few Liberal members who do not see eye to eye with us on the subject of conscription for overseas service, that might well happen and immediately afterwards the house would pass a conscription bill with "blitzkrieg" speed. What a nice gift it would be for my electors of St. Denis and for the country were I to vote along with certain people I know.

Mr. Speaker, it is always wise to ponder the consequences of an act before making the decisive move. It is also advisable not to hurt ourselves when we want to help ourselves.

For the present we must show our confidence in the government by approving in bulk the measures announced in the speech from the throne. Then each one will be examined separately by the house, including the plebiscite. That will be the proper occasion to discuss them.

[Mr. Denis.]

Therefore I will consider it a pleasure and a duty to support the government by voting for the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I shall vote against all the amendments moved to date, which if adopted would undoubtedly and unfortunately result in a Conservative government, or a national government, or a government directed by the 200 of Toronto, plus a conscription act for service overseas. If I am wrong, I pray God to enlighten me.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to read one of de la Fontaine's fables which is chock-full of good sense and seems to befit the occasion.

THE BEAR AND THE GARDEN-LOVER

A certain Bear, whose dam had licked him ill,
Dwelt in a lonely forest on a hill.
A new Bellerphon, he shunned his kind,
Till the seclusion, telling on his mind,
Went near to drive him melancholy-mad.
Though speech be good, and silence better still,
And sense consorts not long with solitude.
The other animals tabooed;
His unattractive domicile;
And he, for all his bearishness,
Relished isolation less and less.

Meanwhile, in the same neighborhood,
There lived a Greybeard, who was likewise bored.
He had a taste for gardening, and adored
Both Flora and Pomona, whose employ,
Though always pleasant, yields a fuller joy
If shared with some congenial friend;
For gardens rarely talk—(except in Fable).

At length, dissatisfied to spend
His life in circles purely vegetable,
On day he gave his silent loves the slip
In search of livelier companionship.
The Bear, impelled by a like yearning,
Had left his cheerless eminence,
And by an odd coincidence
They met each other at a turning.
The Man took fright, but what was to be done?
'Twas not the feaintest use to run;
And feeling that on such a case
'Twas well to put one's boldest face,
He managed to dissemble his alarm.
The Bear, whose manner failed in courtly charm,
Muttered a grumpy invitation.
'Nay,' said the other, won't Your Lordship grace
My humble cot, which you can see from here,
And condescend to cheer
Of milk and fruit? no doubt a strange collation
For one of your distinguished race,
But 'tis the best I have.' the Bear agreed.
They were good friends before they reached the door;
And though 'tis better, by the wise man's creed,
To live alone with a bore,
Once there, they got on very well indeed.
The Man could garden undisturbed all day,
For Bruin had barely two words to say.
He went a-hunting to supply their need;
But his great line was shooing flies away

From his friend's forehead as a-drowse he lay.
Once while the Oldster snored in deep repose,
A bluebottle assailed his nose
With such persistence that the Bear
At last was driven to despair.
'I'll swat you, ma'am, for this,' he growled—'here goes!'
Therewith he hurled a brickbat through the air,
Which squashed the fly—but broke the sleep- head.
His aim was better than his reasoning,
And the result of all his pains
Was that his chum lay doornail dead.

MORAL

An idiot's friend's a dangerous thing:
I'd sooner have a foe with brains.

Mr. THOMAS FARQUHAR (Algoma East): I had not intended to take part in this debate, but after listening to some statements made by some hon. members and reading certain articles in the press which to my mind are misleading and far from the facts, I feel I should say a few words to present the situation as I see it.

It is true, as some hon. members have said, that we are indeed passing through a most serious time. There never was a time in the history of the world when we had so much at stake as we have to-day; never a time when it was more important that Canada should be united, never a time when it was so necessary that all democratic countries should be united in order that we may put forward our maximum war effort. I am sure that the people will never forget the dark days of Dunkirk, the fall of France, the narrow escape we had from losing our Canadian army. As Lord Halifax said, what a blessing it was that if France was going to fall, she fell as soon as she did! Had she held out a little longer, our Canadian army would have been so far inland that they would have had no possible chance of escape. What a disaster that would have been!

Then came the long year when Britain had to stand alone; not a country in Europe to look to for help, her own manufacturing industry in danger of being destroyed. Therefore she had to look to Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the United States, none of which were in a position to give her very much help. At the beginning of 1941, Britain had not an army worth calling an army, her air force was no match for the German air force; she was losing the battle of the Atlantic; the enemy were sinking her ships much faster than they could be built. Notwithstanding all this, notwithstanding the tremendous setback we had in the far east and the great sacrifices we shall yet have to make before we get control of the far eastern situation—notwithstanding all this the past year has been a very successful year for Britain and her allies.

Britain won the battle of the air over Britain in the fall of 1940, and this gave her an opportunity to prepare for the expected invasion in the spring of 1941. Britain was all set for the attack, which would have meant tremendous sacrifices of life and property, but she was not called upon to go through that ordeal. Hitler went east to attack Russia, thinking, of course, it would be a short job and then, when he had nothing to fear from Russia, he would return and destroy Britain. But in doing so, as Mr. Churchill said, he made the greatest blunder of his life. The resistance of Greece, Yugoslavia, with the help of Britain, delayed Hitler's plans for six weeks, just long enough to bring winter upon the German armies before they could knock out the Russian army and get possession of the great Russian oilfields last autumn. Russia is putting up a great fight, winning a great victory. She has destroyed much of the German manpower and equipment. She has more trained reserves than Germany, and if she can get the tanks, heavy guns and aeroplanes, she will drive every German out of Russia and defeat Germany on her own soil. The great question is how soon and in what quantities can we get the tanks, heavy guns and aeroplanes across to her. This is the important question to-day.

To hear some hon. members speaking in this house, and to read some of the articles appearing in the press, one would think that there was only one really loyal class in Canada, only one class really interested in the winning of the war, and that this class consisted of the Conservative members of this house and their friends. I should like to tell hon. gentlemen to my left that many Liberals have boys in this war, too. I believe we think just as much of our boys as they do of theirs. I think we are just as much interested in our neighbours' boys as they are. I think we are just as loyal to the principles for which we are fighting as they are, and certainly we have just as much at stake. I like to feel that all men are sincere. I should like to feel that all members of this house are sincere. I should like to feel that the entire press of Canada is sincere. I should like to feel that the Premier of Ontario is sincere; for when we feel that men are sincere we can respect them for their sincerity even though we may disagree with them. But when men have the facts and withhold those facts; when they make statements which they know are not according to the facts, then I must question their sincerity.

What are the facts? First, let me say that as far as the Premier of Ontario is concerned, we all know his problem. It is a long-drawn out desire for revenge, without just cause, upon the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King), a man who is big enough just to ignore him. By his continued insults, the Premier of Ontario has so belittled himself that he has lost the confidence not only of many of his close friends but of the Liberals of the province of Ontario, and he has lost the respect and confidence of all good thinking men and women throughout the Dominion of Canada. I am sure that all members of this house, I care not to what party they belong, if they are sincere, fair and reasonable will agree that the all important question to-day is not more men for overseas, however important that may be. The important question to-day is more equipment for the men whom we have overseas at the present time. So far in this war there has not been a battle lost because of shortage of men. Every battle that has been lost so far in this war has been lost because of a shortage of equipment, a shortage of heavy guns, heavy tanks and aeroplanes. Every member of this house knows this statement to be true.

Russia said recently that she had an unlimited number of men, but that her great problem was to equip them with heavy tanks, heavy guns and aeroplanes. China has made the statement that she, too, has an unlimited number of men whom she cannot equip, and that her army in the field is not even yet equipped. Her cry is for more tanks, more heavy guns and more aeroplanes. India now has a million men in her army. She recently stated that she could put eight million men into the fight if only she could get equipment for them. The United States has 130,000,000 people and could put millions of men into her army, but she cannot get equipment for them quickly enough. Canada has over a hundred thousand men in her air force. Our great problem is to get bombing and fighting planes fast enough for them to fight with. Britain's army is not yet fully equipped, because Britain has been doing what Canada has been doing, sending all the equipment she could to Russia, China, Libya and every battle front where it could be used. I have here a clipping from a Port Arthur newspaper, written by Judge McKay under date of February 2, 1942, right along the line of what I have been saying. It reads:

> Japan has a large navy and merchant marine and a very large number of aircraft carriers, bombers and aircraft and will probably attack British Columbia instead of Australia with a view of destroying industries and plants on the Pacific coast both in the United States and Canada.
> During 1942, and until the United States can get into maximum production, practically every man should be retained in Canada to defend the Pacific coast and produce as many ships, aircraft, tanks and other mechanized war equipment as possible.
> There are apparently over 1,500,000 Polish officers and trained soldiers who were prisoners of war in Russia who are now free and desperately anxious to carry the war into the very heart of Germany as soon as Canada and the United States can furnish them with the necessary clothing, bombers, tanks and necessary equipment. These officers and soldiers have already had experience in this war.
> There are millions of men in China and India and elsewhere who are crying out for more mechanized military equipment.
> For the sake of all that is precious and priceless the agitation for conscription should be dropped, and as far as possible the capacity to produce agricultural products and mechanized war equipment should be doubled.

In the face of these facts will any reasonable man tell me that the all-important question is the conscription of men, to send all we can overseas, when we cannot equip the men whom we already have over there? Our Canadian soldiers are brave, but is that a reason for sending them to the battle front to face the enemy without the proper equipment? Is it fair to ask the Russians, the Chinese or those brave soldiers from India to go into battle without all the necessary war equipment? These countries are calling to Canada, not for men but for tanks, heavy guns, aeroplanes, ships and all kinds of war equipment. We have the manufacturing industry; we have the raw materials; we have the farm lands to grow the foodstuffs. Before this war is ended, there is a distinct possibility that the industries of Britain may be destroyed. Britain may have to look to Canada even more than she looks to-day to supply her with war equipment. There is no question but that there will be a greatly increased demand for foodstuffs, and we shall make a serious mistake if we rob our farmers of experienced farm help. Too many men have been taken from some sections already, and production cannot be kept up if this continues. Our big job, then, at the present time is to equip and feed the millions of trained men who are ready and willing to fight, if they can get the equipment to fight with.

Do not misunderstand me; I am not opposed to conscription if it is necessary. When the time comes when we can equip the men we now have at the battle front, and the voluntary recruiting system to supply a sufficient number of men for reinforcements has failed, I shall be in favour of conscription. And when that day does come, I trust that the conscription of wealth will come also. But I do not think anyone can say that voluntary recruiting has failed, when there are over 400,000 men enlisted for overseas service, and when during the last seven months there was an average of 20,000 a month, including enlistments in all branches of the army. So far as conscription is concerned, the government could do no more than they are now doing, because every training camp in Canada is filled to capacity, and will be for months to come.

So much has been said in the house with regard to the plebiscite that I wish to add only a word. Every hon. member knows both parties gave their promise that conscription would not be brought in for overseas service during this war. That promise was made not before, but some time after war was declared. Whether or not we individually made the promise, the fact that we supported our leaders who did make the promise commits us just as much as though we made the promise ourselves. Had the government gone ahead and brought in conscription for overseas service, without asking to be released from their promise, there would have been nothing left for me to do but to resign my seat. To my mind that is the only course any hon. member could take. How an hon. member could take any other view, I cannot understand.

Some men who know better are trying to make us believe that the government is attempting to evade responsibility by the taking of the plebiscite. That, of course, is not true. The government is asking to be released from the promise made, in order that it may be able to take on the additional responsibility of bringing in conscription, should it become necessary to do so.

There is one thing more I wish to say before resuming my seat. When this war is won, as it will be, and when great sacrifices have been made, do not let us forget what we are fighting for. During the last war some of us who could not go over encouraged the boys by telling them that they were fighting a war to end war; that they would return to a better world, a world in which there would be more equalities of opportunity, a world where men would not have to spend their days living in fear of unemployment; that men with families would not have to live in fear of losing their jobs; that they would not have to live in fear of sickness, or of impoverished old age. Such worry and fear have brought many men and women to early graves.

Yes, during the last war we saw the vision of a better world, and we held that vision up before the boys as they left Canada, and left behind them all they held dear in life. We won the war, but we lost the vision. We settled back in our old ways of living. We passed through a depression, the like of which I trust the people of Canada will never be called upon again to experience.

Of late I have been reading a good deal about Russia; and while I am not a communist and believe in the democratic form of government, still I am convinced we could learn many lessons from the Russian people. I believe the inequality of our system is wrong, and must be changed. The day of special privileges for certain classes in Canada must come to an end. Again we see many of our leaders holding up before us a vision of a better world to live in after this war is over. May we this time make the vision a reality; for land and possessions won, enemies subdued, will count for nothing to the rising generation unless there is a more lasting effect upon the lives and characters of the nation's individuals.

Mr. MAURICE BOURGET (Lévis) (Translation): Since the opening of the present session, Mr. Speaker, we have heard, in this house, hon. members from all parties, representing the various parts of Canada, express their views on the momentous problems which we have to solve at the present time. I would like now to give you a sincere statement of my opinion on the matter. I will endeavour to do it in a frank and honest manner without stirring up sentiment or prejudice.

For my part, Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I had a disagreeable surprise on reading in the speech from the throne that the government intended to ask our population, by means of a plebiscite, to be released from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service. I sincerely thought that this question asked of our population during the electoral campaign of 1940, had been answered for the duration of the present parliament and that, consequently, there was no earthly use in putting it again. It is hard to believe that the government will disregard the mandate entrusted to them and that a great majority of the hon. members have already forgotten their solemn pledge to the electors. I cannot believe it, for the answer was too clear-cut, too unanimous, too eloquent. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I have not forgotten those pledges and that I feel just as honestly bound by them as I did on the evening of March 26, 1940.

I feel that, in a democracy, where the electors of each constituency give to a person the right to represent them and speak on their behalf, they are entitled at least to the sincerity of their representative as their sole guarantee against deception. For anyone to entertain the contrary opinion would be to deny the elementary principles of democracy. Mr. Speaker, I have faith in democracy and its principles and because of this faith, I would be the last to attempt to destroy it.

I wonder whether the members of the official opposition in this house asking with such eagerness that the government break their pledge are really sincere when they parade their readiness to every sacrifice in order to safeguard democracy. One is entitled to doubt their statement when recalling the actions of their party in past circumstances of a similar nature and when considering the kind of supporters their campaigns draw from outside.

I am not a prophesier of evil, but let me say that they might be the first to lament over the results of their present campaign.

The candidates of their party, following in the footsteps of their leaders, took, before the electors of the whole country, the solemn pledge if they were set in power of never enacting conscription for overseas service. Queer pledge indeed, Mr. Speaker, for during the very first session of this parliament we have witnessed in this house an extremely energetic campaign against the government for the purpose of compelling them to set aside their pledge and enact conscription for overseas service.

They did not ask if our country was well prepared to defend itself; they did not ask how many men were needed for the defence of our coasts and the protection of our civilian population in the hinterland. They did not ask how many men our farmers, our war industries and our shipyards would need for maximum production.

No, for certain people, our first duty was not to defend our own country, but to be at the side of Great Britain.

That is not the way I understand my duty as a Canadian citizen, because I consider that each country's foremost responsibility is, first of all, to assure it own security. Unable to persuade the majority in this house, duly elected by the people, to change their views on the subject, our opponents do not accept defeat so easily; they go outside to the press and the high priests of finance for support. A campaign soon follows, in a certain section of the country particularly; these people try cunningly and dishonestly to impose their views, under the cloak of patriotism. All means are fair for them; racial prejudice, religious differences, they stop at nothing, as long as they reach their goal; they do not even stop to think that they are in great danger of defeating their own purpose.

You will admit that it is not by seeking the destruction of the present national unity that our war effort will be increased. The citizens of all parts of the country are heartily desirous of contributing to the full measure of their capacity towards the victory of our allies. I would deem it a crime to seek to destroy this noble enthusiasm by undermining national unity for petty purposes.

It has been stated repeatedly by many persons in this house and outside, even last year, that the military act of 1917, enacted by the government of the day, had in fact disrupted national unity. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, is it logical to believe that what was true in 1941 is no longer true in 1942?

For my part, I sincerely believe that the adoption of conscription for overseas service would certainly destroy what all true Canadians have striven to build up since confederation. Are those who now strive to disrupt that national unity and use every means to bring about the enactment of conscription so blind as not to see that this government has put forth a maximum effort to help our allies? Let us look around us, let us travel in the various provinces, and we will witness with admiration the exuberant activity that prevails in all our industries producing war material to help our allies.

Is not the speech delivered in this house by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), at the beginning of this session, an accurate summary of the wonderful effort we are putting forth?

Early in January I happened to read in one of the great newspapers of the American metropolis about Canada's share in the present war, and, I frankly admit that, as a Canadian, I was not ashamed of the story told to our neighbours.

Why then, Mr. Speaker, should we abandon the policy we have followed up to the present? Is it not the best one? Have the results not clearly shown that it is? The statements made by some people show a total lack of sense of proportion. How can it reasonably be claimed that with a population of eleven million it is possible to: (1) Supply industry with all the labour it actually needs and may need in greater proportion later on. In the province of Quebec alone there is at present a shortage of more than 30,000 bushmen; and everybody knows that our boat-building industry is seeking thousands of experienced workers. (2) To leave to agriculture all the hands essential to its survival.

Already complaints are being heard in the rural centres about the shortage of labour, and many agricultural associations and county councils have sent resolutions to their federal members and to the government asking that farmers' sons be exempted from military service. (3) Supply the country with all the soldiers necessary for its own defence and at the same time send hundreds of thousands of men overseas.

I dare hope, Mr. Speaker, that such a thing shall never occur and that most members of this house agree with me on that point. I respect the opinions of other people. In the present circumstances, everyone should assume his own responsibilities. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I do not fear to assume mine, and I sincerely regret that the government does not continue the policy they have followed since the last election.

The campaign conducted by our opponents here and outside matters little. Personally, I am convinced that the majority of right-minded citizens approve our conduct. Everything was not perfect, I admit, but no one, I think, can logically expect a human organization to be perfect.

That is why I cannot support the policy of the government on the plebiscite. I consider moreover that such a policy is fraught with danger, especially under the present circumstances, when it is so easy to appeal to prejudice and revive old political rancour. In some places, attempts will be made to convince the people that they should vote "yes" under the pretext that the sacrifice will not be equal, and elsewhere a similar vote will be given for the sole purpose of embarrassing the government.

Moreover, should the Tories succeed in bringing the people to accept conscription, will any one believe, Mr. Speaker, that they would not press their campaign for a union government. I find at page 151 of the debates of this session, a statement showing that our opponents are already preparing a campaign along those lines. Let me quote the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce):

> If the Prime Minister is committed on conscription he is equally committed against a national government; consequently, if he is bound to proceed with a plebiscite, he should also ask to be relieved from a commitment against a national government.

May we not believe, under the circumstances, that we are treading on dangerous ground in proposing such a measure? Are we not going to play into the hands of our opponents? I am inclined to believe it, for if we give way on one point of our programme, we may later have to give way on another.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I have told my electors that I would fulfill the promises I made at the last election and under the circumstances I do not see why I should alter my course.

The very essence of liberalism compels the Liberal party to let its members be free to express their views, even within the party, and notwithstanding my respect and admiration for my leaders, I regret very much to have to disagree with them about the plebiscite. Consequently, I shall vote against both amendments as well as against the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. F. P. WHITMAN (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the debate I should like to express my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I was greatly impressed by both the subject matter and the splendid delivery of both addresses.

This debate has seemed to me to be both interesting and educational. As a new member, and one not yet well educated in political strategy or intrigue, I have been impressed by the arguments advanced by the opposition to the government.

In the general election of 1940 I found myself elected as a supporter of this government. My political opponent, the late Mr. W. Allan Walsh, was one of Montreal's most public-spirited men and one of her finest gentlemen. In many ways it was unfortunate that he had to be defeated.

As a follower of this government I expect still to be able to arrive at decisions dictated by my own conscience. Not being a politician or a strong party man, I felt that I could vote conscientiously and honestly. This has been my aim in the past and shall continue to be my aim in the future.

The debate so far has brought out two important points: one, the government is making a real war effort according to plan; two, even greater efforts must be made in the future.

The effort so far made by Canada has been well made. That is nothing to be smugly satisfied with; but, like all sincere efforts, it is gaining in momentum as it goes along. I was particularly impressed by the report of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) when, last November, he delivered his report to this parliament. He described the result then as the result of the planning of the year before, and promised that, as time went on, a further development would take place and industrial evolution would unfold which would astonish us. I remember well when tanks were not even on order by this department, and now we find this complicated piece of war machinery coming along at several per day. The manufacture of guns, aeroplanes, vehicles of war, et cetera, that we have never tried to manufacture before, has astonished the world, and has proved to us that this government has made and is making a very material contribution according to plan and with the cooperation of both labour and capital, towards winning this war.

Agriculture, lumbering, transportation, mining and fishing are other phases of industry which deserve special mention. Our mines are producing minerals and coal which will eventually bring us victory. Our agriculture will in the future be taxed to the utmost but will produce whatever is necessary to feed civilization. Transportation in Canada is doing a splendid job; and right here I should like to pay tribute to those shop workers of our railways who are keeping the equipment in shape. When new equipment is not available, the old is kept in service, and developments take place of which the public never hears. But the wheels roll, freight and humans are transported, and, except for some fault-finding when trains are late we pay little attention to details and difficulties. We expect efficiency, and I think we are getting it pretty well all along the line. Each department seems a cog in the wheel of a successful war effort. If one of those cogs should break down, we would, in a short time, be aware of a serious situation in all departments. If our fishermen caught no fish, or if our lumbering industry were stopped, our entire effort would be slowed down or would become out of step. We have confidence in these phases of our national life, and feel certain they will not fail us. Sometimes little irritations arise that cause inconvenience—a strike here, or a lock-out there—but on the whole the wheels roll on without let-up, and will continue to do so until victory is ours. As long as the cogs of Canadian effort fit, we shall have a wheel that turns efficiently. And this whole Canadian effort, Mr. Speaker, is just another cog in a larger wheel—the wheel of the twenty-six nations now signed to a pact to save Christian civilization as we know it. If we as Canadians fall down in our effort, the whole cause suffers and is slowed up. We must not fail in our duty.

This brings me to the most contentious point yet discussed in this parliament—the plebiscite. I am not going to justify the causes leading to the undertaking of this plebiscite or the promises made that are being discussed. In fact, I will not attempt at this time to discuss the taking of the plebiscite, but I want to make this definite statement. If this plebiscite carries—and I know it will—I shall expect this government this session to adopt whatever powers are necessary so that our war effort will be the most effective possible. Conscription? Yes, if our war effort demands it, then let us pass it. Conscription is not a Liberal or a Conservative issue; it is bigger than any party or any section of our country. I should like to see our man-power and our woman-power detailed to a position of trust for the duration of the war and know they would be compelled to remain there till victory is won. Our farmers should have detailed to them the help needed to farm efficiently. Our industries should also have the man-power or woman-power required. Conscription—or should I call it compulsory national service?—should be a measure to ensure that our war effort is as effective as it can be with due regard to the desires and demands of the other twenty-five signatory nations of the Washington pact.

Is any political party qualified to tell this government when conscription is necessary? Is there a newspaper in this whole country that can intelligently state that to-day is the day to bring in such a measure, or am I, a member of this house, in a position to demand or insist that the government enact such a law to-day? Surely it would be sheer effrontery for any of us, with the limited knowledge we have at our disposal, even to suggest what is the most desirable course at this time. Even our experts, with all the knowledge they have at their disposal, are puzzled as to what might be the correct course. I believe, however, if we trust those experts and have faith in ourselves and our institutions and work to assist to the maximum the effort being made by Canada, that effort will be one which historians will record as worthy of this generation. Never will it be said that we failed in a time of stress to be effective and loyal both to our traditions and to those other twenty-five nations that are now our allies in this fight for survival.

Much is being said to-day about conscription for overseas service. This really is only one phase of our war effort, and it is my considered opinion that when men are required for overseas service they will be obtained. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is not going to take no for an answer when the need is there. Up to the present we have recruited men for our army voluntarily. We have also raised money voluntarily. We have built tanks, guns, aeroplanes voluntarily. We have raised farm products voluntarily. But if any of these or any other phases of our war effort fail, conscription will be enforced so quickly that even the opposition will be surprised; and as Mr. Menzies told us last year when he addressed the Canadian club here, let us at times say to the government, "Well done; we did not know you had it in you."

I have yet to hear one word of praise from the opposition as to any of our accomplishments. This is unfortunate since the people of Canada are aware of some of our successes and are certain to discount largely the statements of those who depreciate or belittle the results so far obtained. If Sir Robert Borden, Sir Sam Hughes, Sir Joseph Flavelle or the other leaders of the last war effort could see what we have done in this war, I think they would be astounded at the expansion of industry and our success in raising an army. And if we could see what the future holds, if we could visualize how many casualties we might have in the next year, how easy it would be to plan our efforts. But this we do not know; therefore our effort must be elastic. Our leaders and our government must take whatever steps are considered necessary as time elapses to coordinate our effort with our twenty-five allies, so that the entire allied effort will be efficient and successful. For this reason no promises should be made as to what will be done in the future, and promises made in the past must not tie the hands of our government to do Canada's share in the future.

When this plebiscite is taken, as my hon. friend the member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) has said, we must all vote "Ja" overwhelmingly; and after the vote is taken, we must not stop there. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) told us, in his excellent address, the government will be free to act and will act in the best interests of the country. Our duty will be to see that such statements are carried into effect, not by threats but by cooperation and by just such debates as are taking place here to-day. In the meantime, trust and confidence in our government is the order. Have confidence in our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who has been Prime Minister so well and so long. Even my hon. friend the member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) went to some length to tell us, on May 28, 1940, what a good peace-time Prime Minister he was. I should like to quote what the hon. member for Parkdale says, as reported in Hansard at page 305, May 28, 1940:

> I have been a friend of the Prime Minister of Canada for many years and have admired his many excellent qualities. He was prepared, as few in this country have ever been, by long years of education and training in statecraft for public life. He is a man of high character, a man of peace.

Let us also have confidence in our Minister of National Defence, who in my estimation is giving all that he has to fill his position. The evolution of our munitions and supply make it easier to have confidence in our minister of that department. The Minister of Finance must also command our confidence and our cooperation. If any one in Canada talks about boycotting the war loan of 1942 because of some fancied wrong or of a political injustice, then I say that person is doing an immoral act and should be punished. This loan must be oversubscribed, and the Minister of Finance must use any means he deems necessary to ensure its success.

I should also like to say a word on the conscription of wealth and industry. To a limited extent we are having conscription of our wealth to-day. Wages and salaries are paying a defence tax; small, I admit, but still a tax.

I was impressed by the suggestion put forward by my hon. friend the member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) when he suggested a compulsory saving plan. That is, if this national defence tax is not producing sufficient revenue, then let us take a larger percentage of the wages. But let a portion of this collection be returned within five or seven years after the war is finished. Possibly a graduated scale of such saving could be adopted, and we could see the smaller incomes taxed a little less and the larger ones a little more. As I remember one speech made in this house, our Minister of Finance was told that his first war loan was a flop even though the amount of money required was received by extending the time of contribution. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that if he considers it necessary, he should do whatever his judgment tells him should be done to conscript accumulated capital or bank balances or money not being used. If our war effort demands it, I know he will not hesitate.

Now as to industry. I was in a plant a short time ago and talked with the superintendent. In the course of our conversation he told me he had been called to the main office that day and instructed to prepare for the production of a complicated piece of war machinery. He replied that he could not produce it conveniently owing to labour involved, space required, et cetera. His directors told him to overcome all obstacles, for if he did not, the government would take over the plant and operate it themselves. This, I think, is all that is necessary at present. Rather than conscription we have cooperation detailed by the government. If a greater degree of cooperation becomes necessary, then I feel certain we shall have it.

I remember a few years ago about a contract for Bren guns. I remember the unrest, suspicion and lack of trust in our public men than were created by statements of a politician and of certain papers. An investigation was held, and I remember the result. Hitler must have smiled to see the slowing up of the production of Bren guns due to that investigation. I met Major-General Lafleche at the station at Montreal West last year and congratulated him upon the splendid results that this contract had produced. I told him he must feel satisfied and almost exultant at this success. His reply was that he knew what the result must be eventually and that the people of Canada would appreciate the situation. Why should we tolerate such tactics? I do not suggest control of the press, but I do believe control should be exercised if a paper stirs up unrest, suspicion and lack of confidence merely for political gain. I think the government could very well appoint a controller to insist that the freedom of the press is guaranteed to papers which print only facts and not propaganda that undermines our war effort.

I am not one of those who expect a depression after the war. I do not believe Canadians will ever tolerate a depression such as we had from 1929 to 1938. If we had kept our young men gainfully employed during those years, they would not have become demoralized. Imagine men twenty-five to thirty-five years of age being gainfully employed for the first time in their lives!

Our economy has been wrong. Possibly out of these new price controls now in force in Canada we may be able to work out a basic price so that farmers, lumbermen, fishermen and other primary producers will be able to enjoy a standard of living which will make their callings attractive. This must be done if democracy is to survive. Depressions such as we have known must not again be tolerated. We expect and must receive from our elected representatives great solutions to great problems. Our present-day war effort shows that nothing is impossible if the will to accomplish is there. We must have faith and confidence in ourselves and produce results in peace time similar to those we are producing now.

[Mr. Whitman.]

One other matter I should like to touch on is that of national government. The term "national" seems to be used incorrectly. All elected governments here in Ottawa are national governments. What I expect my Conservative friends wish to have is a union government. To this I cannot subscribe. The government of Britain since the last war has been mainly a union government, and its accomplishments are well known. Surely no one can point with pride to all the results of the union activities of the British government since 1923. Even the talents of the present Prime Minister of Great Britain were not used, in fact they seemed to be discovered only when an emergency appeared. The government of Britain is still union, but I believe democracy such as we enjoy in Canada can be stronger and more efficient if we have a loyal, intelligent and effective opposition. Because this is my belief, I believe we should not now consider union government. If all parties and representatives who have been elected to this house will cooperate, our system will continue to give satisfaction.

In closing, I wish to state my position clearly. I will vote for and exert my greatest effort to have this plebiscite give the government the authority it requires. This, however, will be only one step towards the ultimate goal. I want to see action taken this session, or as soon as possible after the authority asked for has been obtained, and if it is necessary to act before the results of the plebiscite are known, then I want this government to act first and obtain permission afterwards.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Lotbinière) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Friday, February 13, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

HONG KONG

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE—APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

On the order for motions:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table of the house copy of order in council P.C. 1160, February 12, 1942, passed under the authority of the Inquiries Act, chapter 99, revised statutes of Canada, 1927, appointing the Right Hon. Sir Lyman Poore Duff a commissioner to inquire into and report upon the organization, authorization and dispatch of a Canadian expeditionary force to the crown colony of Hong Kong.

PLEBISCITE ACT

PROVISION FOR TAKING OF VOTE ON ANY QUESTION SUBMITTED BY WAY OF PLEBISCITE

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the taking of the votes of the qualified voters on any question submitted by way of plebiscite and for such purposes to make provision for the printing and publication of a Plebiscite Act and instructions issued thereunder, the preparation of voters' lists and other plebiscite documents, including forms and ballot papers, to provide for the fees, allowances, expenses or other remuneration of certain officials and employees.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is just a pro forma motion, I take it?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

SS. "LADY HAWKINS"

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF LOSS IN ATLANTIC BY TORPEDO ATTACK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on February 4, I forwarded notice of a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin), who asked me to hold it in order that he might consult his colleague the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). I wish to ask that question now. I may say that the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services spoke to me about it yesterday. Will the minister make a statement regarding the torpedoing of the Canadian National steamship Lady Hawkins, and particularly as to whether this ship was convoyed on any part of the journey, and if so, why no assistance was near at hand to safeguard the lives of passengers and crew, which included women, children and highly-qualified engineers and technicians? Will the minister cause a searching investigation of this disaster to be undertaken and a report presented to this parliament?

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Is my hon. friend addressing the question to me?

Mr. COLDWELL: To the Minister of Transport.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I shall discuss it with the minister and see that an answer is brought down as soon as possible.

TAXATION

PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Finance if any further agreements have been reached with the provinces, particularly Ontario, with respect to the vacation of the taxation field?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

PLEBISCITE

RESOLUTION OF TORONTO CITY COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question based on a letter I received to-day from Mr. James W. Somers, O.B.E., city clerk of the city of Toronto, containing a resolution passed by the city council on February 9th, requesting the government to reconsider the question of taking a plebiscite. May I ask the Prime Minister if this resolution has been received, and if so, has it been considered by the government?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think I can assure my hon. friend that the resolution has been received, and I think I may say that it has received such consideration as was expected would be given to it. I can assure my hon. friend that the plebiscite will be proceeded with.

AGRICULTURAL SUPPLIES

ENCOURAGEMENT OF WIDER USE OF CHEMICAL FERTILIZERS BY EASTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. DOUGLAS (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the announcement made some time ago to the effect that the government had under consideration the granting of fertilizer assistance to eastern farmers, has the minister anything further to announce with regard to the proposed assistance?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member informed me of his intention to ask the question, and I have prepared the following reply.

For the purpose of encouraging farmers in the five provinces of eastern Canada to increase the yields of pastures—clover, alfalfa, and grass meadows; field corn; spring wheat, oats, barley, spring mixed grains for grain production; mangels and turnips for feeding live stock, an order in council has just been passed providing for $1,000,000 to be spent by the agricultural supplies board by July 1, 1942, to encourage the wider use of chemical fertilizers for the production of the crops mentioned. Greater production of pastures, hay, ensilage, grain and root crops in eastern Canada is necessary if the demand from Britain for more Canadian dairy products, poultry and live stock products is to be met and at the same time supply the domestic requirements for these products.

Payments to farmers are to be based on 40 cents per unit of nitrogen and 20 cents per unit each of phosphoric acid and potash in a ton of fertilizer. For example on a ton of chemical fertilizer containing two per cent of nitrogen, 12 per cent of phosphoric acid and 6 per cent of potash, the farmer would have $4.40 deducted from the net cash price of the fertilizer by the vendor, who will be reimbursed accordingly. Purchases are to be limited to a minimum of one-quarter of a ton of any one kind or analysis of fertilizer and a total of five tons to any one farmer, and a farmer must buy only for his own use and not for resale.

The policy will be administered by Grant S. Peart, fertilizer administrator, under the agricultural supplies board. By arrangement with the provincial governments supervision of the operation of the policy will be carried out by the provincial fertilizer boards and councils, which have been established for several years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why are potatoes not included in that category? That is the most important thing of all.

Mr. GARDINER: The reason is that this is provision for increasing the production of feed to be fed to live stock in order to increase the supply of meats and dairy products.

Mr. SENN: With further reference to the question of the bonus on fertilizers, is there any price ceiling on fertilizer to prevent the price going up in the meantime and the farmer being robbed of that bonus?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; there is a price ceiling on fertilizer.

Mr. WRIGHT: In view of the statement made by the minister with regard to the assistance to be given in the purchase of fertilizer for the purpose of producing more feed for live stock, why are the western provinces excluded from the grants for fertilizer for the production of more coarse grains for that purpose?

Mr. GARDINER: There are two reasons. The first is that fertilizer is not generally used nor as much needed in the three western provinces as it is in the older provinces of the east, partly because of the nature of the soil itself and partly because of the length of time farming has been carried on in eastern Canada. The other reason is that we did last year encourage the production of coarse grains in the west and this year we are paying a very considerable amount in freight on the shipment of coarse grains from west to east. It is thought preferable to have as much coarse grain as possible produced on the farms where it will be fed.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

PRICES OF CHEESE AND BUTTER—AGREEMENTS WITH GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. LECLERC (Shefford): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) whether the pegged prices of dairy products in 1941 will be continued during the present year?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The only peg there was to the prices of cheese and milk products last year, forming a floor for prices, was the agreement made with Great Britain. New agreements are being negotiated with Great Britain and will come into operation on the 1st of April. The terms of the agreements have not yet been determined. So far as butter is concerned, last year we had a minimum price beginning in May and extending until October. I am not in a position to make a definite statement as to how the matter will be handled this year, but it is under consideration at the moment and an announcement will be made later.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EXCLUSION OF "GAZETTE" AND "GLOBE AND MAIL" FROM SALE IN LOBBY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, may I ask your honour if it is a fact that the Montreal Gazette and the Globe and Mail have been excluded from sale in the lobby of the house? If so, on whose authority, and is there any reason why that should be so?

Mr. SPEAKER: The question which the hon. member asks can hardly be discussed while I am in the chair. There are some matters under consideration now, and I should prefer to have the hon. member see me personally, when I will give him an explanation.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

KIRKLAND LAKE MINERS—QUESTION OF DISCRIMINATION AND PRESERVATION OF SENIORITY RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to ask a question of the acting Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty). About a week ago, I understand, a delegation representing the miners of Kirkland Lake interviewed the minister to see if the government could use their good offices with the mine operators so that when the men went back to work there would be no discrimination and that their seniority rights would be respected. Did the government take this matter up with the operators, and was there any assurance on that point?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Acting Minister of Labour): What the hon. member states about the delegation meeting in Ottawa is correct. At the time the matter, I believe, was taken up with the operators, who were asked to be magnanimous in taking back the men. No formal undertaking was given by the operators as to discrimination or seniority, but the men are returning to work and I have heard no complaint in connection with the matter up to this time.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister says he believes the matter of victimization and discrimination has been taken up. Does he know whether it was taken up or not?

Mr. McLARTY: It might probably be as well if this question were allowed to stand, so that I can confirm what I stated and possibly I may be able to give a little further information. The point is that so far as I am aware, no complaint has been received. I understand that the men are going back to work, but no discrimination has, I believe, so far been shown.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. HUGUES LAPOINTE (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, it is not without emotion that I rise to-day, having in mind the tributes paid to the memory of my father by his friend and leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and by other members of this house. Their words of appreciation for the services rendered by him to his race and to his country have become part of an inheritance most valuable to me, an inheritance composed of examples of his persistent work, of his loyalty to leader and party and of his devotion to public duty. I wish, Mr. Speaker, in the name of my family as well as in my own, to take this occasion to thank you, sir, and to thank the Prime Minister and the other hon. members who spoke, as well as all members of this house, for the sympathy extended to us in our sad bereavement.

When I last attended a session of this parliament prior to my departure for overseas, it did not enter my mind that an occasion would be given to me to participate in a debate of this kind. At that time the introduction of conscription of man-power for service overseas appeared to anyone with an unbiased mind as a totally unnecessary issue, in view of the success with which the voluntary system had been attended throughout the country. Of course there were, even then, small isolated groups in different parts of Canada who were clamouring for a measure of this sort, but, generally speaking, the people of Canada had to admit that enlistment in the Canadian forces had been plentiful, and that the appeal made to the young men of this country had received an adequate answer.

Unfortunately, since that time the small isolated group of conscriptionists to whom I have just referred have acquired adherents and have succeeded in making some people believe that representations and requests, if made loudly enough, constituted public opinion. They have succeeded in convincing some well-meaning but ill-informed citizens that the war effort of Canada as prosecuted by the present government is not satisfactory, and that conscription of man-power alone is the remedy for all the ills from which our effort is suffering.

Since circumstances with which hon. members are acquainted have provided me with an opportunity of being in the house during the present debate, I would feel that I was failing in my duty towards the constituency which I have the honour to represent if I allowed myself to keep silent while this controversy was going on. My contribution at this stage may, I fear, be a mere repetition of some of the views which have already been expressed. As, however, I doubt very much whether an opportunity will again be given to me to be present if ever this question is discussed again, I ask the indulgence of the house, and I will endeavour to be as brief as possible in my remarks.

A few days ago I heard someone state that during the last general election of 1940 he had campaigned in his riding, repeating no less than sixty-four times the pledge made to the people by the leader of the present government and his ministers, and also by the leaders of other groups in this house, that there should or there would be no conscription of man-power for overseas service. I cannot claim to cope with this hon. gentleman's record; I can state, however, that I also pledged myself in the same way in over forty municipalities of the riding which I represent. I made that pledge not only because the leaders of my party had done so, but because I honestly and sincerely believed that the voluntary system was the only adequate and practical method of recruiting men for the services.

I must say that I still hold these views, and am still against conscription of man-power for overseas service. I am against it because I honestly believe that under present circumstances existing in Canada conscription would not increase, but would rather hinder Canada's war effort. I believe it would defeat its own purpose.

As was so eloquently said by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), conscription is not a fundamental; it is not a principle without which the war cannot be prosecuted efficiently; it is merely a method, a means, a device for getting men into the ranks of the different services. Some people may think it is the best method, and they are entitled to such views if they honestly and sincerely entertain them. But they have no right to attack as disloyal, defeatist, complacent or lacking in courage those who, on the other side, believe honestly that it is not the best method and that it could be, under our present national circumstances, disastrous to what has been up to now a united war effort.

May I pause to state immediately that to my mind conscriptionists in this country may be divided into two classes: first, those who honestly and sincerely believe that conscription is the only patriotic procedure in war time; and, second, those who exploit the patriotism of the first group and who use the word "conscription" merely to give voice to their political frustration. I wish to say that the remarks I intend to make, for the next few minutes anyway, are directed towards the second group. It has been said and repeated in many instances that this war should be run in the light of the experience of the last war, and that the many errors and blunders which took place between 1914 and 1919 should not be repeated. Up to now the government has been most careful in its handling of our war effort. In fact, had this government not been so careful; had it permitted the speculation which took place during the last war; had it let the many hoarders and financial sharks who existed during the last war, run amok in this country, I doubt whether the Tory outcry against the government would be as loud as it is, and this well-financed, underhand campaign against the Prime Minister, which has grown in intensity every time big business has been brought to order, might have lost much of its vitality and died a natural death. The clamour for conscription of man-power which has originated from certain quarters might well have been quenched, had more leniency been shown by the different controlling organizations set up by the government.

As I have already said, there are some well-intentioned citizens who sincerely believe conscription to be the only patriotic procedure in war time. But I honestly believe that the conscription issue has been and will again be used by the self-appointed powers of the Tory party to stir up agitation against the government in the hope of precipitating a crisis which might permit them to overthrow it. To put it in another way, it is hoped that the word "conscription" may be a pass-word which will let a certain group through the back door of power after the Canadian people have barred them from the front door. For these people I feel no sympathy whatever. In their view, the end justifies the means, and they will not hesitate to destroy the unity of this country; they will not hesitate to destroy forever the faith which the Canadian people may have in their public men; they will not hesitate to halt the advance of Canada at war, to obtain the control of this government against the will of the people. They demonstrate their patriotism by clamouring for a step which would tear this country to pieces. Ever since the outbreak of this conflict, they have been asking for compulsory service, at a time when there were more volunteers for the army, the navy and the air force than it was possible to train and equip.

In a certain element of the press over which they seem to have an almighty power, they have been damning the voluntary system, which had been endorsed by the Canadian people and to which this parliament is pledged. Instead of cooperating in the voluntary recruiting which was the war policy of the country, these self-styled leaders of the nation have been publishing cock-and-bull stories about the methods of recruiting officers. They want compulsion; they advocate coercion, but they are scandalized at the idea that young men should be asked to enlist voluntarily.

All this has been done, sir, on the pretext of an all-out war effort. An all-out war effort? Yes, but it was an "all-in" war effort during the recruiting campaign last summer, when they were denouncing the voluntary method and throwing ridicule on the men who were doing their duty. One newspaper published that after the demonstration on parliament hill after the last recruiting campaign, only one man came forward and offered to enlist. What an absurdity! What lack of good faith! Who comes forward and subscribes immediately after a speech on the victory loan? It would have been better for the editor of that paper to inquire from the recruiting office of this district whether many young men did not enlist as a result of that meeting and whether this district, which had been lagging in its quota, did not exceed it as a result of the meeting. But no, Mr. Speaker; this type of person and these newspapers refuse to give encouragement to the voluntary system, which nevertheless has succeeded in spite of them. They have preferred to accuse the government of being weak, cowardly, and complacent. Cowardice, weakness and complacency; these are the choice words of the critics; they are also the choice words of all our war demagogues.

Who is complacent in Canada to-day? Who does not feel the pinch of the war? Who has not been submitted to the increased taxation? Who has not felt the many restrictions imposed by the government? I have no complacency for these abusers of the Canadian war effort. I have no complacency for the calumniators of the men who have been entrusted by the nation with the task of directing our war effort. I especially have no complacency for these highly financed agitators who, from the warmth of their aristocratic clubs and from the comfort of their editorial rooms, advocate conscription on the principle of equality of sacrifice.

An all-out war effort? Yes; everybody in Canada is for an all-out war effort. Everybody wants to finish the war; but an all-out war effort means a whole nation united in heart, soul and spirit, all friends and brothers in sacrifice in a great national union, having the same goal and willing to do their utmost to attain it, but not one group of the nation trying to coerce another group and sowing seeds of discord.

We have before us days of hardship and sorrow, when sacrifices of all sorts will have to be endured. We shall have to face the complex problems of after-war. This country needs, and will need even more, the spiritual unity of all its citizens. We must adopt policies which will keep us bound together, because any division now would be national suicide.

I believe that the national circumstances of each country should determine its method of dealing with war, as they should determine the limits of its effort. Our policies must be realistic, adjusted to the facts of our national life. So must the policies of Australia and south Africa; so they are, and so they should continue to be. Many hon. members have given us the example of our sister dominion, Australia. There is no one in this house who will not praise Australia's loyalty to the crown and the important part which her forces have been taking in the defence of the empire. But this splendid effort has not been accomplished through conscription; it has been accomplished through the voluntary system. In fact, hon. members know that during the last war an attempt was made to introduce conscription in Australia, and this measure was defeated by the people in a referendum. This did not stop the Australian people from earning more than their share of honours during the last war. In south Africa it has always been deemed that conscription, due to national circumstances, would defeat its own purpose. Yet south Africans are defending the empire at this very moment, as they did nobly during the last war. It is strange, Mr. Speaker, how some of our public men, in their well-intended attempts to defend British institutions, British liberties and British ideals, fail completely when they try to imitate the good judgment, common sense and political wisdom of some British statesmen. When the advisability of conscription for northern Ireland was discussed in the British House of Commons it was immediately dropped and Mr. Churchill, commenting on this measure, said:

> We have made a number of inquiries in various directions with the result that we have come to the conclusion that at the present time, although there would be no dispute about our rights and merits, it would be more trouble than it is worth to enforce such a policy.

That statement was very highly praised in the British House of Commons, and the Manchester Guardian published the following editorial:

> If we force conscription on the people of Northern Ireland we do so in defiance of the strongly expressed wishes of a third of the population and against the entreaties of Ulster Labour and of those Ulster Unionists who are not tied to the Unionist machine. We have to consider whether it is in accordance with our professed war aims to coerce a large minority and rouse bitter resistance in a neighbouring state. And for what? Sixty thousand men, many of whom will be disaffected, and an estranged Ireland more ripe for Hitler to attack.
> If we destroy the hope of Irish unity, do we not, which is equally serious, bring disharmony into our own ranks? It is necessary to warn the Conservatives in the government that this step will be strongly resented by the Liberal and Labour parties that are now serving under and supporting a Conservative Prime Minister. They will make many sacrifices for the sake of national unity, but they should not be asked to make and they ought not to endure a sacrifice to unreasoning prejudices which stand condemned on every ground of political and strategic common sense.

Mr. Speaker, I had intended at this stage through figures to show how the Military Service Act of 1917 had been a complete failure. Be it sufficient to say that everybody admits the result should have been foreseen even before its enforcement, because no such legislation can meet with success without a thoroughly prepared public opinion.

It has been suggested that conditions have changed, and that public opinion would now be more prepared than in 1917 to accept similar legislation. I beg to differ. Conscription would again cause serious disunity. It would meet serious opposition not only in Quebec but in many other sections of the country.

Again I urge hon. members: let us be realistic and practical. The whole problem, it seems to me, can be summed up in three short questions:

(a) Can conscription for service overseas be enforced without causing disunity in the country, thereby endangering our war effort?

(b) How many men can it produce for the forces, after exemptions and discharges on medical grounds have been granted?

(c) Can the same number or a sufficient number of men be obtained by the voluntary method which, it is admitted, would not destroy Canadian unity?

That is what the whole question amounts to, once it has been shorn of all emotionalism and sentimentalism. As to the answers to these questions enough has already been said in the house to make the answers obvious. I shall not repeat the figures already quoted, but they make clear the case for voluntary enlistment. Conscription was disastrous in 1917. From the point of view of national unity it was a complete failure and proved to be totally inefficient in bringing men into the army. Everything leads us to believe that similar legislation now would bring about a similar situation.

The Prime Minister, in his speech the other day, mentioned the changes to be made in the Canadian corps overseas. I imagine these changes are being made at the suggestion of our military authorities, who realize the need of efficiency in the army.

I believe it is generally admitted that the men drafted for overseas service would be for the army alone. Conscription would not apply to the navy or to the air force. Recruits for these two services are plentiful and furthermore, as I understand it, the very nature of the duties which the men in these services are called upon to perform makes it necessary that they should be volunteers. You cannot make a pilot through compulsion, and you cannot force a man into a submarine and obtain good results.

I submit that what is true of both the air force and the navy is also true of the army. I heard the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) state that, with his experience as a man who went through the ranks and was promoted to the rank of company commander during the last war, he would still prefer to have one volunteer rather than ten conscripts. Other members who have had the experience of the last war have made similar statements. In fact, I doubt whether there is one of the many members of this house who served during the last war, and had occasion to deal with conscripts, who would claim that these men were up to the standard of the volunteers. If this was true of the last war, it is even truer now. With modern methods of warfare, the soldier of the modern army must be a highly trained man, possessed of great initiative and a keen sense of duty. He must be a master at handling the different weapons which are put at his disposal and should be a specialist able to act alone. He is not just a cog in the wheel, but a perfect warrior by himself. For this, a man must have qualities of courage, skill and discipline. In this war quality coupled with high training and proper equipment is far more important than quantity. France had millions of men but fell before the well-trained, high-powered panzer divisions of Hitler. For these reasons I do not believe that through compulsion you will obtain the type of men needed for the modern army.

It has been to the glory of our Canadian forces overseas that they are serving there voluntarily. Every Canadian on British soil or elsewhere, whether he belongs to the air force, the army or the navy, is there because he chose to be there, not because he has been drafted or conscripted, not because an act of parliament has forced him into service, not because he has been sent there against his will or desire, but because he has elected of his own free will to fight Canada's war at the foremost outpost, on the foremost front line. He has acted as a free citizen in a free country, and he is justly proud of his status as a volunteer before the whole world. He is proud of belonging to a unit totally formed of free volunteers, like himself, and this pride in himself, in the formation to which he belongs, contributes to develop his keenness and to make him a better fighting man. It would be a gross mistake to deprive the men in the army of this justified pride. Surely hon. members will not lower the pride of the Canadian army; surely they will not give the army the occasion of having a feeling of inferiority before the other services by forcing them to take into their ranks men who have refused to come forward of their own free will. Surely the hon. members will not give Hitler's hordes occasion to rejoice in saying that Canada which had entered this war under the voluntary system has had to use compulsion to get men into the army.

It has been argued that it is our duty toward the men already serving overseas to impose conscription in order to supply them with necessary reinforcements. Everybody in this country agrees that the men overseas must receive the backing of the nation. But, Mr. Speaker, let us not be swayed by our emotions. If this support can be given voluntarily, as it has been given voluntarily—and there is no reason to believe that it should stop—why should we cease to continue with the present methods?

Since the opinion of the men already overseas is to be considered, it is only reasonable that we should ask ourselves what that opinion is. Canadian troops overseas have two different attitudes of mind as regards the sending of conscripts to join them. A great number of men, and I should say probably the majority, feel that, if they have volunteered for service overseas, the other fellow who has not followed their example should be forced to serve whenever it may be deemed necessary. They resent very strongly his absence from the service. Another group, which is by no means small, has a totally different attitude of mind. These men have no use for conscripts. They feel, and rightly too, that their status as Canadian citizens, who have come freely to fight Canada's war in Britain, is highly enhanced by the fact that they are volunteers. I have no comment to make about either of these views, but I think the house will admit that neither of them is conducive to the right spirit of cooperation which must exist among men in the army. Our army, like our country, must have unity to be an efficient fighting machine, and I am convinced that this unity, this efficiency, cannot exist if you have on your right flank volunteers and on your left flank conscripts who have been sent there against their wishes. I do not believe that the results will be any better if you have them mixed up together.

I have tried to give a few of the reasons why I am against conscription for overseas service. As I said previously, there are to my mind two different groups of conscriptionists in this country. There are those who are patriotic and there are those who exploit the other fellow's patriotism. As regards this last group, no argument can be of any use against them. I think the results of the four by-elections at the beginning of this week constitute the best answer that we could give. As regards the first group, I submit humbly to them the few arguments which I have just expounded to this house. To that I can only add the words that Cromwell used in a letter to the members of the Church of Scotland, "I beseech you; think it possible that you may be wrong."

Translation): Mr. Speaker, having given some of the reasons for my opposition to compulsory recruiting for overseas service, I wish to explain my position as regards the plebiscite announced in the speech from the throne.

Canada entered into this war voluntarily and freely, because it believed that its most vital interests were seriously threatened. The conflict in which our country finds itself engaged has taken such a scope and assumed such proportions that victory cannot be expected save at the cost of the greatest sacrifices. The prosecution of the war requires an unremitting and ever-increasing effort on the part of everyone. For us in Canada such an effort should aim at building up and maintaining an army, an air force and a navy sufficient for the defence of our own territory. It should also aim in no less a degree at the production of foodstuffs, munitions and war material of all kinds which our allies so urgently need, which they cannot produce themselves or which they are unable to buy.

If it be true that the defence of our own territory entails the necessity of sending troops overseas as advance guards, it seems to me that the number of such troops is of somewhat secondary importance, considering the many other fields where our efforts are required. To maintain that Canada cannot make an all-out war effort without resorting to coercive measures for overseas service is to show a lack of sense of proportion. Certainly it is important and necessary to maintain our front-line troops and to make sure that they will get the reinforcements they may eventually need; but if it is permitted to look at the past and the present in order to judge of the future, I am firmly convinced that voluntary enlistment, intelligently encouraged and pursued, will suffice to provide such reinforcements.

We all know the gigantic effort put forth by the people of Canada since the outbreak of the war. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and some of his colleagues have already set forth the magnificent results which this effort has produced and is expected to produce in the future. Well, Mr. Speaker, this achievement was made possible by the unity which has existed among Canadians and by a concentrated effort directed to a common end. This unity, this concentrated effort, have been made possible by the assurance, given to the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that there would be no conscription for overseas service, thereby removing all danger of national disunity. The disquiet stirred up by the noisy agitation of shortsighted politicians who would like to have the government break its plighted word gives reason to believe that recourse to conscription for overseas service would injure Canada's war effort.

Such a measure would destroy the confidence of the Canadian people in their government; it would sow the seeds of distrust and reopen recent wounds. No, Mr. Speaker, in this extremely grave crisis, there should be no disunion among Canadians. We must close our ranks and work together. Our efforts must not be spared and we must take care lest they should prove fruitless. Obviously, the Canadian people are masters of their fate. They alone can relieve the government from its pledges. To-day, in view of the attempts that are made to persuade the government that public opinion has changed to the point of being ready to accept a measure it has hitherto so forcibly rejected, the administration is justified in consulting the people themselves in order to find out whether such is the case. To my mind, that is the best way for the government to ascertain not whether conscription for overseas service must be applied, but solely whether the Canadian people would consent to relieve the government from its pledge not to resort to conscription, in case it should feel that such a measure has become necessary. So far as I am concerned, I praise the government for honouring their pledge and I commend their decision to consult the people rather than listen to those public agitators who would have them disregard the promises that were made to the electorate and in which they themselves were a party. For those reasons, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for concurrence in the address in reply to the speech from the throne, so that the electors of the constituency which I represent may have an opportunity to express their views freely, according to the dictates of their conscience and in the light of facts which I am sure they will be able to appreciate properly.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate we have listened to a number of speakers emphasizing the seriousness of the foreign situation, and we have listened also to a number of Liberal members who have endeavoured to make us believe that the war effort is everything that it should be. I am sure that we will all agree that the statement made by Mr. Herbert Lash, director of the bureau of public information, last November that we are not winning the war, that our not having lost it is due to luck, that unless we mend our ways and mend them soon we are in dreadful danger of losing this war, should be driven home to every individual in this country, and more especially to the members of this government.

As I said, we have listened to a number of speeches by Liberal members praising the government's war effort, but the thing to remember is that we have been suffering reverse after reverse at the hands of the Germans and the Japanese. No matter how good our war effort has been in the past, it must be considerably better in the future. Otherwise time will not be on our side; time will be on the side that makes the best use of it. I think we can all agree that from September, 1939, to the middle of 1940 the enemy were making considerably better use of time than we were, and therefore time was not on our side. Speaking in the house the other day in reference to our war effort, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) stated that our direct expenditures for war this year will be three billion dollars. Then he asked these three questions: "Will anyone in this house say that that programme is not worthy? Will anyone say that it will not tax our resources this very year? Will anyone say that the commitment is not enough?"

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say the only basis on which we can analyse these three questions is this. Are all the people of Canada to-day working? Are our industries to-day working to their full capacity? Are they working twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week, three hundred and sixty-five days a year? Have we reduced non-essential services down to the very minimum? The minister knows very well that the answer to all these three questions must be in the negative. As to the question whether or not our effort to-day is a worthy one, the answer must also be in the negative. It is not a question whether we are spending three billion dollars a year. The question is whether or not that represents the maximum effort which we are capable of making.

I am satisfied that we will never make that maximum effort until we mobilize the total resources of the country—financial, industrial and man-power. It is not necessary for me to deal with it any further, except to say that it must be the total of all resources. We advocated that back in 1939, in September, upon the declaration of war, but unfortunately at that time the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was too busily engaged in playing politics, too busy trying to make political capital out of the war. We knew very well that, with an election pending, our stand was politically speaking a dangerous one, but we also knew, and everyone familiar with foreign affairs knew or should have known, that that was the only sound stand to take at that period. Nevertheless, unfortunately for this country, all parties in the house were more interested in the political situation than they were in the foreign one, and during the election campaign attacked our stand for an all-out war effort and in its place advocated a modified one. The Prime Minister, having lulled the people into a false sense of security, won the election on that basis, and to-day we are still reaping the tragic consequences of that policy. It took Dunkirk, in 1940, to awaken the government from its state of lethargy; and to-day it is taking the tragic reverses that we are suffering in the east to make the government realize the folly of its preelection promises.

And so now we are to have a plebiscite, in order that the government may be released from the promise which it made during the last election. It is strange that in spite of that fact one minister after another rises in his place in this house and says that we do not need conscription. I am receiving letters from many people across the country who are very much puzzled that we are to have a plebiscite in order to release the government from its promises regarding conscription, while at the same time it is telling people that we do not need conscription. Naturally the people are bewildered. The other day the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated in this chamber that he believed in the voluntary system; he was very much opposed to the idea of conscription. He said, "You cannot conscript men and put them on ships." Well, the minister must have a very short memory, because in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries the British used to employ the press-gang in order to get men.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say that. I said, "corvettes".

Mr. QUELCH: Well, corvettes are ships. I will accept the minister's explanation. He may think they are prairie schooners, but they are ships, and I am referring to ships.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would you go back to the press-gang?

Mr. QUELCH: If the minister had not interrupted me I would have gone on to say that I am not advocating the press-gang. But will the minister say that the prestige of the British navy was not as high when they utilized that method as it has ever been since?

Mr. SLAGHT: Certainly not.

Mr. QUELCH: When he says, "We can't use conscription, we can't force people on ships," I am merely pointing out that in the past we forced men to go on ships, and they were the finest sailors the world has ever seen.

Again, is the Minister of Agriculture right when he says that the present system is a voluntary system? I maintain that the present system is one of the most undesirable forms of compulsion you can possibly have; it is not voluntary at all.

When the four months' training plan was brought into operation, I happened to meet a recruiting officer one day, and I asked him this question: "Do you believe we can get enough men for overseas service?" He replied, "Well, under the one-month training plan we could not do it, but now we have those men for four months we shall be able to bring enough pressure to bear upon them to bring them into the active service." Of course, that "pressure" is compulsion. Let me give an example. A mechanized convoy comes to a small village. In the evening a dance is put on, and while the boys and girls are dancing a spotlight is turned upon different couples, and a man from the stage calls out to the girls dancing with these men, "Are you not ashamed to be seen dancing with a man who is not in uniform?" I say that if the government cannot get the men they need on a straight voluntary system, without adopting despicable methods of that kind, it would be far better to have conscription. In the olden days we persuaded men to make statements by putting them in a torture chamber. To-day we are persuading men to go into the army by means of a form of mental torture.

Again, let us remember this—I know some hon. members may object to the statement, but they cannot deny it is perfectly true—that in the early days of the war many men were forced into the army not through a sense of patriotism but because of the economic condition in which they found themselves. Let us keep that well in mind. Where that happens it is not going to help to improve the morale or esprit de corps of the army.

I am not criticizing the government for holding a plebiscite. Definite commitments were made, and when they are made they should be honoured. But it is rather strange that suddenly, at this point, the conscience of the Prime Minister should prick him. It has not done so in the past. The promises which he made in 1935 never worried him, although they were never kept; but to-day all of a sudden he has decided that promises should be kept. While I say that I am not over-critical of the government for taking a plebiscite, on the other hand I am very critical of the government for having placed itself in a position where it requires a plebiscite to extricate it. If the Prime Minister had shown during the last election a little more interest in the welfare of the people and a little less interest in the welfare of the Liberal party, that promise need never have been given.

Most people will agree that to-day our most urgent need is machines and more machines. Military men admit that frankly. We were told last year by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) that we were rapidly approaching peak production due to the fact that we had a shortage of skilled labour.

Again I say that if we had instituted, upon the declaration of war, complete mobilization of the resources of this nation we would not have been faced with that critical situation.

I want now to refer to a statement which was made by a witness before the members of the special committee on pensions. When we sat last year we had Mr. A. W. Crawford, member of the interdepartmental committee on youth training, as a witness, and in his evidence he admitted quite frankly that there were a large number of men trying to get in the training schools for whom they had not the capacity. When he was asked why we could not increase the capacity of these schools in order to train men more rapidly, his answer was that even if they were trained we could not find jobs for them. When he was reminded of the statement made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply that we were reaching maximum production because we had not the skilled labour, he explained that the type of training given to these men does not sufficiently equip them to take their places in skilled industry. Then it was drawn to the attention of Mr. Crawford that in the United States there are a number of advanced training schools which make it possible for men, when they are through with their course, immediately to take their places in industry. Mr. Crawford admitted that we had no schools of that kind in this country, and that they were very costly to install. In view of the fact that we have been told by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Defence that no financial restrictions shall be allowed to impede our war effort, it is hard to understand why schools of that sort have not been put into operation long ago, if the main objection is the cost of installing them.

There is something else that is impeding our war effort, and it is this. A large number of men in Canada to-day are engaged in non-essential industries. Perhaps the most flagrant example is to be found in the gold mining industry. According to the bureau of statistics there are engaged in that industry in Canada at the present time between 32,000 and 33,000 men. These men are largely skilled mechanics and miners, but to-day they are not making any contribution whatsoever to the war effort of the British empire and the United States. They are not helping in one single degree. The point may be made that this gold is used for the purpose of bringing supplies from the United States to Canada; but of how much use is that gold to the United States when they get it? Here we have 32,000 men busily engaged in digging gold out of a hole in the ground and transporting it across the line where it is buried in a hole on the other side. How much is the war effort either of the United States or of the British empire advanced by that process? How much greater would the war effort be, both of the United States and of this country, if these men were engaged in war industries? If the United States desired this gold, we could come to an agreement with them to turn over to them, to hypothecate to the United States the total production of the gold of Canada after the war for so many years. Surely gold is just as safe in the ground on this side of the line as it is in the ground on the other side.

It is unfortunate perhaps that we have in this country at the head of affairs a number of men who still worship at the shrine of gold. Let me quote what Lord Sempill said in the House of Lords on November 18, 1941:

> Ten years ago we regarded it as axiomatic that gold gave value to money, and that money would immediately become worthless if it had not got an adequate gold backing. Yet within the space of these ten years the roles have been reversed, and if anyone is suspected of cherishing a theory now, which has been so comprehensively and thoroughly disproved by fact, he is labelled a "museum piece" or a "gold bug."

Commenting on that statement, I suggest it is unfortunate that we have had in the past and still have a number of these museum pieces on the treasury benches—a number of people with the gold-bug mentality, who are willing to sacrifice the work of thousands of men in the production of gold when these men are needed in our war effort. I would again point out to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that so long as such things are going on in this country it is useless for him to get up and try to persuade us that we have an all-out war effort.

I might refer to the question of agriculture and the chaotic condition of the industry in western Canada as it relates to the grain grower. There are many boys enlisting who are needed on the farms. In my opinion if we had proper mobilization of man-power we would keep these boys on the farms; they would not go into the army. There are men in non-essential industries that should not be working at their present jobs but somewhere else; they should be doing work which is necessary in our war effort. That would be a form of selective service. I know of many boys who were supposed to be able to get a postponement but were not granted it and were called up. Now they are in the service and cannot obtain leave of absence. Their parents are too old to carry on the work themselves and the result is that they have to sell their stock, which is valuable and is needed in the country. They have to sell valuable breeding stock and that is a loss to the country. This stock is being sold to the packing plants.

Another aspect of the war effort which I have not heard mentioned very much up to the present time is the question of morale. I have heard a number of people in Canada criticizing Canadians in different parts of the country for not being enthusiastically behind the war effort—at any rate, not as enthusiastically as they should be. I think we can all agree that, unfortunately, in many parts of Canada there is not a very great amount of enthusiasm behind the war effort to-day. But where these people generally make their mistake is in criticizing the wrong people, instead of placing the blame where it rightfully belongs, on the shoulders of the government. Let me explain what I mean.

In the period from 1935 to 1939 we continually urged upon the government the fact that people throughout the country deserved and should be given a better and a higher standard of living. We emphasized the fact that the people were not able to find work because there was not enough money being put into circulation. We urged time and again that everything possible should be done to make the people throughout Canada happy and contented, because when you have a happy, contented people, they are willing to fight for the maintenance of the conditions that make for that happiness and contentment. We know, however, that during that period the government refused to spend the amount of money necessary to put Canadians to work, and therefore conditions from 1935 to 1939 were very unsatisfactory. We allowed the productive resources of the country to be systematically sabotaged. There were half a million people unemployed, a million people on relief, and many industries running at only a part of their capacity. What a contrast, one may say, between that condition and the conditions in Russia to-day. There you have a united nation fighting for what they believe to be a real democracy. They do not have to depend upon promises with regard to the future. They can look back on the past twenty years and go forward reassured that everything possible will be done to improve the conditions of the masses. If the people in charge of our policies had been paid servants of Germany during the period from 1935 to 1939 they could not very well have put into operation a policy that would have been of greater advantage to the German nation.

What has been the consequence? To what extent has the health of the soldiers and of the people of Canada been undermined? Let me quote from The Soldier magazine of November, on page 10. There is an article headed, "Fat in war, thin in peace." It reads in part:

A prominent Canadian, General Leo Lafleche, tells how thousands of young Canadians are unfit to fight. They cannot pass the army doctors. Medical authorities point to depression years and the hordes of these transients herded from province to province in the ten years before 1929. Enforced bumming and near starvation was rampant in this great new land of peace, promise and plenty. Youth took to rod-riding and it is to their everlasting credit that they behaved themselves. Mr. Bennett built concentration camps for Canada's young manhood. Mr. King said, "Re-elect me and I'll abolish Bennett's camps." It was an election promise kept by Mr. King, but it took another world war to absorb the population of the now empty camps. Nazi forces of evil and destruction loomed up. Another world war. Canada's youthful transients were fattened for the fight.

Fat in war: thin in peace.

I ask, will that type of policy build up the morale of the Canadian people?

Last year I read in a Canadian magazine an account of how a young man had evaded a draft. He was called up before the judge and asked if he had anything to say, and he replied that he did not think Canada was worth fighting for. Then the writer of the article went on to say what a wonderful and wealthy country Canada was—surely a country well worth fighting for. The point that writer entirely missed was that that boy was probably one of those who came out of college in 1930 and for nine or ten years was not able to find a place in the industrial life of this country. Probably his parents were on relief, his brothers and sisters unable to get proper medical attention or nourishment. Could you expect that boy to be enthusiastic about fighting for the continuation of such a condition? I have spoken to men of the armed forces on the train and I find a similar strain running through the conversation of these men. Invariably the comment was this: We have a dirty job to do and we are going to do it, but when the war is over we are going to demand something better than we have had in the past. I believe that if these men do not get a chance of something better in the future than they have had in the past, there will be serious trouble in this country.

I remember when I was in France during the last war listening to a speech by a prime minister of this country. He told us Canada was grateful for what her men were doing, and he promised that nothing would be too good for us; our dependents would be looked after and every man guaranteed a job. Was that promise kept?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. QUELCH: Reference was made to that question by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) the other day. Let me read what he said, as reported at page 4143 of Hansard of November 6, 1941:

Therefore it behooves us, or any government that takes its duties seriously, to see to it that these men do not return from overseas with the same sense of disappointment, disillusionment and discontent as did the men who returned from the last war.

Well, we are now hearing statements by the Prime Minister to the effect that after this war there will be a new heaven and a new earth. I am satisfied that if in the future we continue the same type of policies that we have had in this country in the past, instead of there being a new heaven and a new earth for these men there will be a new hell. If the Prime Minister is really sincere in his talk about a new heaven and a new earth, why does he not take steps now to let the people have a glimpse of this new heaven? I think it was the Prime Minister himself who stated that unless this new order is well on its way before the end of the war we may look for it in vain. Now is the time to try to set up this new order, instead of waiting until the end of the war.

Let me give a few examples of what could be done in order to help regain the confidence of the people of this country. For instance, old age pensions have been mentioned in this debate. The amount of the old age pension could be increased from $20 to $30 a month so that any province wishing to increase their contribution could take advantage of it. Also, the age should be reduced from seventy to sixty-five.

Then we have the question of pensions for widows of disability pensioners. The parliamentary special committee on the Pension Act last year spent a great deal of time considering that question, and in our fourth report we made this recommendation: that after further and more complete exploration of the problems involved, consideration be given to the advisability of extending the provisions of the War Veterans' Act to (a) widows of disability pensioners not now provided for; (b) widows of deceased recipients of war veterans' allowance.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) has stated that no legislation will be introduced this session to take care of these people. But surely we realize that these people are a direct responsibility of the department of pensions. The minister has tried to say that these people should be dealt with under social legislation. But let us remember that when a soldier marries, the amount of his pension is increased; by increasing the amount of the pension we recognize a very direct responsibility for that woman. Again when a soldier marries and later is given a war veterans' allowance, the amount of the allowance is increased from $20 to $40 a month. Thereby we recognize responsibility for that woman. Yet strangely enough, if that man dies we automatically cut off the allowance to the woman.

Another point is regarding the dependents' allowance regulations. In March, 1941, order in council 138/1936 was passed which destroyed one of the principles of the regulations regarding dependents' allowances. A department of government, the soldier settlement board, is allowed to attach or seize a certain portion of the dependents' allowance to pay off a soldier settler's debt. This action has been criticized by various soldier organizations. This order in council should be rescinded.

Another thing I want to refer to is the question of the subamendment. If it were possible to move an amendment to the subamendment I would do so, owing to the fact that it is open to misinterpretation. But under the rules of the house this may not be done; therefore the subamendment will have to be either accepted in its present form or rejected. The subamendment requests that—> the forthcoming plebiscite should seek the support of the people of Canada for the complete and effective conscription of war industries, accumulated wealth and financial institutions, at the same time and on the same basis of sacrifice as the suggested extension of the conscription of man-power.

Various interpretations, or perhaps I should say misinterpretations, have been offered in this house regarding that subamendment. But on page 55 of Hansard of January 26 last the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group explained exactly what the group means by that subamendment. On behalf of this group I will say that we will support the subamendment on the basis of the explanation given by the acting leader of the C.C.F., with the exception of paragraph 1 and paragraph 6 of his explanation, in respect to which we will take the alternatives presented by the C.C.F. group.

Before commenting upon this explanation I have one or two observations to make. First I should like to compliment the C.C.F. upon their present stand. I might point out that it is very similar to the stand we took in September, 1939, and have maintained consistently ever since. On the other hand it is quite a broadening out of the stand they took at that time. To show the consistency of this group as between 1939 and the present day I want to quote what I said on the appropriation bill on behalf of the group as reported on page 99 of Hansard:

> When a country engages in war it becomes engaged in a life and death struggle, and it therefore becomes essential that it organize on as effective a basis as possible. Otherwise unnecessary loss of life and great hardship are bound to result. That is why the group to which I belong has taken a stand in favour of the conscription of finance, industry and man-power. By such means we believe we can avoid the injustices and inequalities which existed during the last war. By such means we believe we may develop the resources of this nation to their full capacities, so that we may be enabled to make a maximum contribution, without increasing the debt of the nation by a single dollar. In other words we advocate a policy of pay-as-you-go. . . .
> We believe in utilizing the Bank of Canada so that we may create the necessary financial credits and currency, combined with definite price regulation so as to obviate any serious rise in prices. We would advocate, further, steeply graded income and profits taxes. We maintain, further, that the only possible justification for borrowing is when our need for goods is greater than our ability to produce them. That condition of course requires external borrowing. We see absolutely no justification for internal borrowing.

An hon. MEMBER: What date was that?

Mr. QUELCH: That was on September 11, 1939, during the discussion of the war appropriation bill.

Now I come to the C.C.F. subamendment, and the explanation of that amendment as given by the leader of that group, appearing at pages 56 and 57 of Hansard for this session:

> 1. The national ownership or, at least, control of all our war industries to produce everything we require to maintain civilian health and morale and to provide our fighting forces with adequate equipment.

We are completely in accord with those last words, referring to control. With regard to the question of national ownership, I would say that wherever the government puts up the money to build an industry, we believe that industry should be owned and operated by the government. On the other hand, where you have industries already set up using only a small portion of their plants for the purpose of manufacturing war supplies, we do not think it would be advisable to have nationalization and in such cases would advocate control.

> 2. An integrated production plan which utilizes every plant and facility in its proper place without regard to the demands of big corporations and trusts.

We agree with that.

> 3. A complete reversal of the present dollar-a-year-men control policy and the substitution of proportionate representatives of organized farmer and labour bodies on all control agencies, so that the pressure of big business could be effectively curbed and democratic direction of the war effort achieved.

We agree to that.

4. Direct national control of all our financial institutions so that without inflation and without unnecessary future burdens of debt, we can finance our national effort.

We are altogether in accord with that. I like the way it is worded, but perhaps I might add a word of explanation. We realize that you cannot tax the total income away from an individual, that you must leave him enough in the first place to maintain a fair standard of living and at the same time put aside a little for a rainy day. This has been emphasized time and again by the Minister of Finance. So we say that to the extent that taxation and the sale of interest-free war savings certificates fail to meet government expenditures, the services of the Bank of Canada should be utilized.

5. There must be, at least, a one hundred per cent excess profits tax and, indeed, on all profits a low maximum rate should be set and the excess taken by the government for our war effort.

We agree to that.

6. The present loan policy should be replaced by one of compulsory, interest free loans imposed on the accumulated wealth of rich individuals and corporations, and based on ability to contribute. Indeed, the fairest method would be to establish a fair maximum income for all and to tax back to the country every dollar above that maximum.

So far as this paragraph is concerned, we are heartily in accord with the portion commencing with the words, "Indeed, the fairest method." Perhaps I might quote from what I said on the appropriation bill of 1939, to show the similarity of our stand then, as it appears at page 99 of Hansard for September 11, 1939:

In time of war it becomes necessary to call upon certain people to make that supreme sacrifice. It is necessary for others to suffer mutilation of the body. Is it asking too much to ask people remaining in Canada, in comparative safety, to be willing to sacrifice the major portions of their incomes? Is that asking too much, at a time when we are asking other people to sacrifice their lives? I say we have every right to demand that those who remain in safety be prepared to sacrifice the major portion of their incomes, that they be permitted to retain only that portion which is necessary for the maintenance of a moderate standard of living.

That is why I say we are heartily in accord with the latter part of this paragraph. No doubt some people will say that our policy to-day shows a considerable change from our policy before the war. Of course it does, because in war time we do not advocate business as usual. We have always held that in peace time the production of the country should be maintained at a level sufficiently high to satisfy the requirements of the Canadian people and to make that production available to the people throughout the country. But in war time, on the other hand, we maintain that the production of the country must be kept at its maximum level in order to make the greatest possible contribution to our war effort. Therefore the people should be satisfied with a moderate standard of living, a standard that will ensure their health and efficiency. And in order that the people shall not have a higher standard of living than that, we have consistently advocated increased taxation during time of war.

Coming back to agriculture, we feel that the government should give every consideration to the just demands of agriculture. We feel it is high time for the government to introduce an agricultural policy based upon the recommendations of the various farm organizations, instead of showing, as they have in the past, a contemptuous disregard for those bodies. When we compare the treatment of the farmers in the United States under the AAA with the treatment which has been accorded the farmers of this country, we must agree that any such comparison is odious so far as this country is concerned.

There will be plenty of time later on to discuss agricultural policies, so I can leave this question, only mentioning that we in this group have urged, as to-day we are urging by resolutions on the order paper, that $1 per bushel should be paid the farmer at point of shipment, on a quota designated by the wheat board, and that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be amended so that it might constitute a sound crop insurance scheme.

By their actions now the government should do everything in their power to convince the people that when victory has been won there will be no danger of a return to the deplorable conditions that existed prior to the declaration of war. Only in this way can we inspire in the people the will to win. Only by such means can we hope to build up the morale of the people, so that they will be glad to endure any and every sacrifice required of them, whether it be in Canada or beyond the seas.

Mr. W. C. MACDONALD (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to join with other speakers who have preceded me in this debate in extending congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

To-day Singapore is in the news. None of us can be unmindful of the critical situation now facing that great British naval base, nor can one fail to feel admiration for the gallant defence that is being maintained by its defenders. I have the honour to be one of the representatives of the city and county of Halifax, and to-day I cannot help recalling that Halifax itself was established long ago as an outpost of Britain's expanding colonial empire. Someone has said that in the history of every nation there are certain decisive moments which determine the destiny of that nation for centuries to come. One of those moments in the history of Canada undoubtedly was the founding of Halifax in 1749, and the establishment there of a British naval base and army garrison. The British government of the day had come to realize that possession of Nova Scotia was essential, if British connections in north America were to be maintained. In Halifax was built up a naval and military base, which was undoubtedly one of the decisive factors in preserving this country for the British crown, not only during the wars with France, but also during the American revolutionary war and the war of 1812. It was realized in those early days, just as it is to-day, that Nova Scotia was one of the new world's strategic areas. One need only glance at the map to appreciate to the full the strategic importance of Nova Scotia in relation to the defence of the northern part of this continent.

Halifax is practically in direct line between the New England states and the British isles, and is itself important in the defence of this dominion, because of its position in relation to the travel lanes of the Atlantic. Many soldiers have gone out from Halifax during past wars, and during the existing one, to take part in the empire's battles.

The record of the city and county of Halifax in the present war is a proud one. On land, on sea and in the air, in all parts of the world, her sons are to be found fighting for their country and for the freedom of mankind. To the great port of Halifax, of which it has been written—

> Into the mist my guardian prows put forth;
> Behind the mist my virgin ramparts lie;
> The Warden of the Honour of the North,
> Sleepless and veiled am I.

—come ships from all quarters of the world. Unhappily in recent weeks some have brought victims of the ruthless nazi submarine war, or of shipwrecks, heroic members of our great Canadian merchant marine, the royal merchant marine, and the merchant marines of our Norwegian and Russian allies, men who have suffered hardships as trying as can be endured by men.

It is not any wonder, therefore, that the people in a constituency of this kind should be deeply concerned with the prosecution of Canada's war effort, and the proposals of the government as contained in the speech from the throne. Hon. members from the west coast have discussed in the house the problems which concern the people of British Columbia, in consequence of Japan's entry into the war and her unprovoked attack on Great Britain and the United States.

I do not know what the situation is on the Pacific coast, but as a representative in the house from the Atlantic coast I am happy to say that early in the war the government recognized the importance of Nova Scotia in our country's defence, commanding as it does the southern approach to the gulf of St. Lawrence. Of great strategic importance in the defence of the northern Atlantic also is the island of Newfoundland, and it was a matter of deep satisfaction to all Nova Scotians and to all Canadians, I am sure when the United States acquired naval bases in Newfoundland.

I know I express the thoughts of my colleague from Halifax, as well as my own, and I am sure I express the thoughts of the people in my province when I say that the people of Nova Scotia have faith in our Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). In his most admirable speech in the house a few nights ago he spoke of our Canadian defence. I am sure he and his associate defence ministers will take all necessary measures for local defence of our Atlantic coast.

Before entering into a discussion of the proposal, contained in the speech from the throne, there are one or two matters affecting my own constituency, but which are of more than local interest, to which I wish to refer. I have already made reference to the importance of the port of Halifax in this war, because of its strategic position, and because of its position in relation to the sea lanes of the north Atlantic. Halifax is the principal Atlantic winter port of this country. It is an all-year-round port. Tremendous sums, running into astronomical figures, are being and will be voted in the house for the prosecution of our war effort. The larger part of these moneys will be devoted to the manufacture of munitions and war supplies. To accomplish the purpose for which they are intended, those munitions and supplies must be transported out of the country. It is inevitable that a great part of these will have to be shipped through the port of Halifax. It is essential that there be no bottle-neck.

I am pleased to say the Canadian National Railways have greatly improved railway facilities between Moncton and Halifax. The railway system has inaugurated a lighterage system in Halifax. Scows have been built and are now engaged in transporting cargoes from the railway to the ships. It is necessary, however, that the railways should improve their facilities for local transportation. Many of those engaged in war work of the most essential kind in the city of Halifax live outside its boundaries. Housing conditions in Halifax are bad, and they will become very much worse unless much better local transportation facilities are provided by the Canadian National Railways.

There is a matter of greater importance affecting the port of Halifax. There is urgent need for the erection of a large graving dock in Halifax harbour. Ships that have been travelling the high seas since the outbreak of war are showing increasing signs of wear and tear. Many of the ships, that should have long since gone into dry dock for overhauling and repair, have been kept afloat owing to the exigencies of warfare. Present facilities in Halifax for the repair of ships are inadequate, and the need for improved facilities will be intensified as the war goes on. I do not think the new floating dry dock under construction and the floating machine repair shop are going to meet the situation. The new dock will not be able to accommodate ships of the greatest size. Facilities for the speedy repair of ships, it seems to me, are of the first importance in the successful prosecution of our war effort. Dry docks should be close to the sea lanes. Ships damaged at sea should not have to run the risk of proceeding to distant dry docks. Convoys must not be held up.

I have always held the view that great as is the striking power of an air force and an army, the decisive influence in the winning of this war will be the naval and shipping strength of our empire and our allies. I have become more convinced than ever as to the soundness of this view since the entrance of Japan into the war. Landings of Japanese troops have been made on stretches of land in the Pacific ocean distant hundreds, yes thousands, of miles apart. They will be wiped out when we have complete naval control of the Pacific ocean. Our Canadian navy is expanding; so is the British navy. Our Canadian merchant shipping fleet is expanding at an amazing rate. The programme of production of merchant ships in Canada for 1942 is practically as large as the programme for Great Britain. The available dry docks throughout the empire may become fewer. Those in the United States will be fully taken up in looking after their own ships. One does not require much imagination to realize that our war effort may be seriously impaired through lack of ship-repairing facilities. Ships great or small that are waiting in port to go to dry docks are not of much use in maintaining the life-line to Britain and Russia, upon which all depends. I mentioned Singapore a few moments ago. How much use are the large docks in Singapore now for the repair of ships? What about dry docks in Malta and in other ports of the empire? Have we any assurance that the nazi bombing of British ports will not soon be resumed? There should be facilities at Halifax for repairing the largest ship afloat. We should not be behind the cities of Australia and other parts of our empire in this respect.

I now come to the proposal for a plebiscite. The question which the government proposes to the people is a simple one:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligations arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

The question may in form be made even more simple, because there is no doubt at all in my mind that the government did commit itself before, during and after the last general elections not to impose conscription for military service overseas.

I need only point out what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) declared on September 8, 1939, as reported on page 36 of Hansard:

> I wish now to repeat the undertaking I gave in parliament on behalf of the government on March 30 last. The present government believe that conscription of men for overseas service will not be a necessary or an effective step. No such measure will be introduced by the present administration.

That pledge was renewed on public platforms on many occasions during the election campaign. I cannot say that in my own constituency there was very much, if anything, said about conscription. Speaking for myself, I do not think I once referred to it. The main issue in Halifax was that of national government.

I must say, however, that I was aware of the fact that the Prime Minister had given a pledge that there would be no conscription for overseas service and that as one of the Liberal candidates standing in support of his administration I was bound by the pledge. The question now arises whether, notwithstanding its pledges, the present administration is justified in imposing conscription for overseas service. I am not myself prepared to subscribe to the proposition that a government that sought the support of the people of this dominion on the faith of its pledge not to impose conscription for overseas service is justified, after success at the polls, in pursuing a directly opposite course. Our form of government is based upon the principle that promises were made to be kept and not broken. Our very way of life is dependent upon the sanctity of promises. In my own lifetime I have seen a decline in the value of the pledges of nations.

I can recall the horror with which the whole world received the news in 1914 that the armed forces of Germany had invaded Belgium in violation of Germany's pledge to preserve the neutrality of that small country. To a greater extent than even during the great war we have seen solemn pledges made by governments treated as scraps of paper. If there is one thing that undermines the confidence of a people in their government, it is the calculated breach of pledges upon which that government had sought and was given power. The very fabric of democracy becomes a sham and a farce if the pledges of those who are elected to govern a country are to be treated as scraps of paper. What possible faith or confidence would the people have in the members of such a government? Those who advocate that our government impose conscription without first getting a release from its commitments are unconsciously playing into the hands of Hitler. What has been the policy of Hitler, both before and since the outbreak of war, but to work to make the people of countries which he wished to destroy lose confidence in their governments? Divide the people, divide and conquer, that has been the policy of Hitler.

There is a further consideration. It is well known that in this country people from all sections do not see eye to eye on the question of conscription for overseas service. We know that the question was one that split the country in two during the great war. Anyone who has any doubts upon that subject need only examine the debates of this house that took place during the years 1917 and 1918. I have no desire to enter into a discussion of the merits or demerits of the action taken by the government in power during the years 1917 and 1918. It is useful to recall, however, some of the events that led up to the imposition of conscription in Canada at that time.

At the outbreak of the last war there was in power in this country a Conservative administration under the leadership of Sir Robert Borden. It came into power in 1911. The administration of Sir Robert Borden was still in power in 1917, no elections having been held in the meantime. The Military Service Act, the conscription act of the last war, was passed in August of that year. During the year recruiting had fallen short of replacing casualties in our divisions overseas, and reinforcements were needed for overseas service but were not forthcoming. The act was passed and it recited the need for such reinforcements. As I said, it was passed in August, 1917, but Sir Robert Borden would not assume the responsibility of calling up men under the provisions of that act until the policy of conscription had been approved by the votes of the people of this dominion. It was not until January, 1918, that any attempt was made to raise men for military service overseas under the Military Service Act.

Is it surprising that our Prime Minister has decided to take the course he proposes to take at this time—a time when voluntary enlistment is satisfactory and a time when there is no call for any substantial number of reinforcements to replace casualties? Should anyone wonder that members of the government of this country would want a release from their commitments before introducing legislation for the conscription of men for overseas service? What are those sections of the dominion that supported the government by overwhelming vote at the general elections two years ago on the faith of the specific pledge that there should be no conscription to think if parliament were to impose conscription before the government secures the release it seeks?

It would be a profitless undertaking to debate now the question of whether those pledges should or should not have been given. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), who preceded me, stated that he saw no objection to the government pursuing the course it proposes to take now. But he did criticize the giving of pledges by the leaders of all parties in 1939 and during the general election in 1940. As I have said, it would accomplish nothing at this time to debate this question. I would say to the hon. member for Acadia that Canada would not have put forth the war effort it did in the autumn of 1939 and during the early part of 1940 if this government had not given the pledges it did. We all know what the situation was at that time in the province of Quebec. The Duplessis government was not defeated until the autumn of 1939. It might be all right to say now that these pledges should not have been given, but we should consider conditions in the light of circumstances that existed at that time. I suggest to those who are bawling now for conscription that they should remember that one formidable obstacle in the way of conscription will be removed should the government get the release it seeks in the forthcoming plebiscite.

Like many other members of this house, I am a veteran of the great war, having seen service in France and Belgium. I am not one of those who believe that there is anything inherently bad or unfair about the policy of conscription. It is a policy consistent with sound democratic views. The great democracies of Great Britain and the United States have seen fit to impose upon their man-power compulsory military service for all parts of the world. I see nothing objectionable in the principle of conscription. I am bound to say that I disagree with some of the suggestions I have heard in this house to the effect that conscripts do not necessarily make as good soldiers as those who volunteer, or that they are necessarily inferior in fighting qualities. The armies of Great Britain and the United States have been raised by compulsory service.

It may be necessary for us to have conscription for overseas service. It will become necessary, if sufficient numbers do not continue to come forward voluntarily to provide necessary reinforcements or to permit us to put forth our most effective war effort. In any event, the hands of the government should be freed from all past commitments respecting the method of raising men for military service. We have entered into a joint defence pact with the United States, and it is not in keeping with the spirit of that pact that we should not have the right to send our armed forces wherever they are needed for the defence of north America. I go further. I agree with some other speakers who have preceded me that we must defend Canada outside the borders of this dominion and in any part of the world. The fate of many European countries has shown the folly of any one nation believing that standing alone it has the means to defend itself. It is even more incredible folly to believe that the nazi war lord would be satisfied with the conquest of Europe and Africa. No conqueror in the flush of victory is ever satisfied. Alexander the Great, who conquered the known world, wept that there were no more worlds to conquer. Our armed forces must be prepared to fight the enemy wherever necessary to defeat him. We were the first of the American nations to take up arms against German aggression, and we shall continue in our efforts until nazism is stamped out forever.

I have suggested that I thought those who are in favour of conscription should work to see that the question submitted to the people in the coming plebiscite is answered affirmatively. It does seem to me, too, that they should do everything possible to hurry the reference to the people and devote their energies to the end that the government may be given, without undue delay, the release which it seeks. In Nova Scotia this would appear to be the attitude generally taken by our people. When the government decided to hold a plebiscite, the two leading newspapers in the maritime provinces, one or both of which had previously been somewhat critical of such a step, took the position that the patriotic thing to do was to accept the fact and see that an affirmative answer was given by an overwhelming majority to the question submitted by the government for decision. I quote from the editorial columns of the Halifax Herald of January 24, 1942:

> Since this government decision has been taken and announced, since a plebiscite in these terms is to be held, the public must recognize the accomplished fact.

And again in the same editorial:

> The immediate and inescapable fact is that a plebiscite has been decided upon in the terms outlined, and the only effective course now open is to see to it that the government gets the answer it seeks and that decisively.

The Halifax Chronicle in its issue of January 23, 1942, had an editorial which in part read as follows:

> Let us get the plebiscite out of the way, behind us and forgotten at the earliest possible moment. Then let us "to the task."
> The present is no time to stand on ceremony on matters of purely political significance.

I commend the attitude taken by both these newspapers to hon. members opposite. Unfortunately a section of the Canadian press has adopted an entirely different stand. Part of the press has attempted to use the government's proposals for a plebiscite as a means to undermine the confidence of the people in their leaders and to belittle the war effort of this country.

The campaign of vituperation and abuse that has been launched against the leader of our Canadian people is not in many ways unlike those that the President of the United States has had to face for some years. The president and our Prime Minister have this in common. They have trusted the common people, and in turn they have been given and have retained the confidence of the common people in their respective countries. Both have been attacked at different times by large sections of the press and by powerful financial interests. Neither, however, has been deflected from the path of duty by these attacks. Even to-day, at a critical stage of the war, the venom poured upon the two leaders is extraordinary. In the United States President Roosevelt is abused in some quarters for sending American troops to Ireland instead of to the Philippines and for allowing American warships to patrol the sea lanes of the Atlantic rather than those of the Pacific. Our own Prime Minister is abused by certain groups in this country for not imposing conscription immediately. One of the worst offenders that has come to my notice is a newspaper published in Toronto that has been mentioned several times in this debate. It never loses an opportunity to belittle the leadership of the Prime Minister and the war effort of his administration. It is not backward either in imputing motives to members of this house who support the government. It got its answer in the Welland and York South elections, and I would not waste the time of the house by referring to it now, but for the fact that for upwards of a year it has been preaching a doctrine that, if accepted by the majority of our people, would break this dominion in pieces. Canada is a federal union. The Toronto Globe and Mail wants a legislative union. It has called upon the premier of Ontario to lead the way to the abolition of our provincial legislatures. In its issue of January 17 last, there appears an editorial dealing with the negotiations now under way between the dominion and the provinces with a view to having the provinces vacate the income and corporation tax fields in exchange for fixed subsidies. In this editorial the provincial legislatures are termed "white elephants" and declared to be wholly unnecessary. I quote the concluding words:

> As we have observed before, the greatest service which Mr. Hepburn may render would be for him to state publicly what everybody knows: that the provincial legislatures and the provincial governments are a fifth wheel to the national coach.

It is not a coincidence that in its issue of January 31 the premier of Ontario is reported as declaring:

> The overriding authority of the War Measures Act and federal invasion of our provincial revenue sources had made a "farce" of the provincial governments, and that he was prepared "if the thing goes any further" to recommend the abolition of provincial administrations.

That the leader of the opposition in the province of Ontario holds similar views is clear. He spoke to members of the Commercial club in Halifax last year and is reported in the Halifax Herald of April 25, 1941, as declaring that, while he was conscious of local rights of provincial legislatures, the preservation of such traditions did not justify the maintenance of ten separate governments in the nation. Colonel Drew said:

> What we need greatly is to look at government from a business viewpoint, paralleling methods that a private business head office and nine branch plants would employ to promote more efficiency.

I wonder what particular good those people think will come out of the preaching of such a doctrine. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that this dominion cannot be run as one would run a large banking, industrial or other private business undertaking having branches throughout the country and with rules such as: "If one branch is not paying, close it out. Let the people move away to some other part of Canada or to the United States. Disregard sectional rights and interests. Those in control are at the head office and they must have the say."

I have always thought that the fathers of confederation intended that in the federal union of the provinces the parliament of Canada should have wide powers commensurate with its responsibilities. I agree with many students of constitutional law who think that the powers given to parliament by the British North America Act have been at times unduly limited by judicial decision, but I am surprised that in this day and age there are to be found people who have so little understanding of the spirit of the pact of confederation and of the temper of the people of this dominion as to preach such utter nonsense as the abolition of our provincial legislatures. I agree with the view expressed by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) during this debate that no country so great in extent as Canada can be governed in a democratic way for any considerable period of time under a system other than a federated form of government, and that if we did not have such a form of govenrment we should have not less than four or five dominions instead of one. The Globe and Mail is the self-styled "national" newspaper of Canada. Anything less likely to preserve this dominion as a nation than the doctrine it has been preaching would be difficult to imagine.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my time is about up. I wish to say in conclusion that I shall ask the electors of Halifax to vote affirmatively in answer to the question that will be submitted to them for decision, and I am confident that they will do so by an overwhelming vote.

We shall have our plebiscite and the government will get the release it seeks. The even wider total war effort with our military forces, contemplated by the speech from the throne, will be made. We shall go on with the war. We are a free people and we shall remain free no matter what the cost. And we shall remain united. Fighting as a free and united nation with other members of the British commonwealth, reinforced and strengthened by our alliance with the great republic of the United States and with our other allies, we shall go on to victory.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): My first word will be one of congratulation to you, Mr. Speaker, upon the magnificent fortitude you have exhibited in sitting in the chair with so much dignity for so many weeks listening to the different orations and observing this house of democracy in action. It has occurred to me in recent days that the thought must have been running through your head, "O Lord, how long"? Nevertheless I am sure that you would expect me to have something to say in a debate of this nature. I feel that it is my duty as representative of my constituency to offer my contribution. I know that my constituents will expect it, and therefore I am going to express my viewpoint as I see it.

Now, the vital question, stripped of all the fancy words and phrases and camouflage, is simply conscription. Do you want conscription in Canada, and for overseas service? So I am using the word conscription, the old-fashioned word which to me is plain English. Our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) tells us, and many others in the house, that a solemn pledge was given, before, during and subsequent to the last election, that this government would never impose conscription for overseas service without submitting the question to the electorate. They regard that as a solemn promise, and I respect it.

Speaking for myself, I want to say that conscription was not an issue in my constituency. I believe I was asked once during the campaign what I thought of conscription, and my answer was that it was not an issue in the campaign but that personally I believed it was the only fair way to conduct a total war. I believe that conscription should mean equality of sacrifice and that each of us must be put in his proper place for the work which he is best fitted to do. I believe there are in Canada men in industry, key men, if you will, who could render far better service here in Canada than they ever could on the battlefield; and speaking of my own occupation or profession, I know there are many good farmers leaving Canada who could serve their country better if they remained on the farm and produced the food that will be required before the war is over.

I too must be careful of my promises. I spoke in this house in 1937—and I wonder how many hon. members had mentioned conscription as far back as that. The occasion was when the defence estimates were going through the house, and I took the opportunity then, in supporting the increase in the defence estimates, to submit to the house a resolution that had been passed by the United Farmers of Manitoba about a month before the house convened. I attended the convention and the resolution was passed unanimously, calling attention to the fact that a war was in the offing and that if this country was going to war it should conscript man-power, wealth and all resources we have in Canada, for the successful prosecution of the war and for victory. I submitted to the house that resolution, which I supported. I wish to quote the words I used on that occasion. I do this for the simple reason that I made a statement in this house and I have not changed my viewpoint. I said, at page 994 of Hansard of February 18, 1937:

> The Canadian people expect that if we must go to war all the resources of the country will be employed in the prosecution of that war. I believe that in the nation's interest we should conscript . . . the resources of the fields, of the forests, and of the mines and all the accumulated wealth.

I had hoped that this question would be settled differently. We do not take conscription so seriously out on the plains in western Canada as they do for instance in the province of Quebec, and I respect their opinions. I felt that if we were to have conscription—I believed it was coming and I think we should have had it immediately after Hong Kong—the Prime Minister should have asked the house, if he wished to be released from his promise. He should have asked the representatives of the people to release him. I for my part am willing to take my medicine and I would have spoken for my constituency of Portage la Prairie. Instead of that we have what we call a political football. I had hoped that the question of conscription would escape the turmoil of party politics. I believed that the Prime Minister, with his knowledge of the situation, and the need for vigorous and aggressive action, would have accepted the responsibility or else allowed the house to decide the issue. Now the initiative has been taken by the politicians, with results, I fear, detrimental to Canada.

The word "appeasement" has been used in this house. Mr. Speaker, it is a horrible word when applied to our dealings with the axis powers; but appeasement for the sake of harmony at home is a beautiful word. Nothing should concern us more than to have unity in this country of ours, and I say that a prime necessity of our war effort is to maintain unity at home. That should not be a difficult task, when all that is best in our national life is threatened from without. Let me testify, in the name of my French-Canadian constituents, that I regard them as among my very best friends, loyal to the core. I have found the French-Canadians in my riding just as kind, just as industrious, just as intelligent and law-abiding as my English-speaking friends. But there is prejudice on both sides, that we all must admit; and it is founded upon suspicion and imaginary grievances exploited to the full by unscrupulous politicians and their backers. It is my opinion that these barriers that have separated the French- and the English-speaking people in Canada could all be removed by tolerance and cooperation founded upon mutual trust. I wonder when we are going to learn that lesson.

Mr. MacNICOL: As soon as we drop politics.

Mr. LEADER: I believe that is true. When our leading public men in all parts of the dominion, when our religious bodies, both Protestant and Catholic, learn this fundamental truth, these leaders of public opinion will earn a nation's respect and gratitude.

Now I want to say something about our Prime Minister. I have often quoted him in this house, and am always glad to pay him a tribute of the respect in which I believe he is held by the people of this dominion. I do not believe there is a man in Canada, perhaps never has been in the public life of this country, who has striven more for unity than our present Prime Minister. In 1936, when I supported the trade treaty which he had made with the United States, I stated that it was more than a commercial treaty, that it was the extending of the hand of fellowship to a neighbour who is our kin. In 1939, when that treaty was renewed and we brought Great Britain into the picture, I said that when the history of our time was written no one would stand higher than our own Prime Minister. I appreciated those trade treaties, and let me say from my own experience that when I deal with my customers I hope to make them my friends; if you make a friend of your customer you are going to have a better deal every time.

During the last election I did not base my campaign very much on the government's policy and what they had done, but I told the people this, that in Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. Lapointe we had two of Canada's greatest statesmen, two men who had done more to bring unity to Canada than any others that I could think of; I am satisfied that that statement is true. In unity there is strength. Great Britain and the United States are working in cooperation—by the way, they have conscription in both countries—and Canada cannot fail them.

It is my opinion that if we must have conscription—and I think it is coming if this war continues—we should have conscription wherever our interests are threatened. Are they not threatened in the motherland, that has nurtured this nation and is guarding its future? Are our interests not threatened in Africa, where a sister nation battles for her freedom; in Australia, where a sister nation battles for the livelihood—yes, the very life—of the white race? Are they not threatened in Hong Kong? Did not 2,000 gallant Canadians go to Hong Kong and offer the sacrifice of their lives, troops from the east and troops from the west, English-speaking and French-speaking? We should never forget Hong Kong, and I believe we are bound to go and avenge the sacrifice that these grand soldiers made for us.

And what about the United States, the most powerful ally of all, whose president declared that if Canada was attacked they would not stand idly by? That promise was made two or three years ago at Ivy Lea. Are we going to fall down in any particular in standing beside the mother country and the United States of America? We should not, and I do not think we shall. What an inspiration it should be to us when we think of that great British statesman Winston Churchill in his challenge to the nazis when he said: "If this country is invaded we shall fight in the air, we shall fight on the ocean, we shall fight on the beaches and in the streets and in the fields, and if we must we will fight from the dominions overseas." Are we worthy of that glorious ancestry? I say, let us unite with the forces of freedom everywhere and let us forget domestic discord. If we lose this war we lose everything.

I have heard it said in this house that this war is a result of broken promises. I presume there is truth in that statement, but I think that the cause of this war is commercial and industrial rivalry, greed for power and search for the almighty dollar. When you have men in high places imbued with that spirit, and when they are running this country or any other country, what can you expect?

I have a clipping here which I found in my desk the other day. It refers to ex-prime minister Baldwin of Great Britain, and I should like to quote it. It is from a speech by Stanley Baldwin on November 12, 1936. The heading is "A Famous Confession." It says:

> My position as leader of a great party was not altogether a comfortable one. I asked myself what chance was there that in the next year or two the country would give a mandate for rearmament? Supposing I had gone to the country and said that Germany was rearming and we must rearm, does anyone think this pacific democracy would have rallied to that at the moment? I cannot think of anything that would have made the loss of the election from my point of view more certain.

Mr. HANSELL: Where did he make that speech?

Mr. LEADER: I am not sure.

Mr. HANSELL: I think it was in the British House of Commons.

Mr. LEADER: Now, without casting any aspersions on ex-prime minister Baldwin—

An hon. MEMBER: Lord Baldwin.

Mr. LEADER: Whatever his title, I want to say he was the head of one of the greatest munition factories in Great Britain at the time, the Baldwin locomotive works—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Baldwin Steel company.

Mr. LEADER: Well, he was engaged at the time in supplying munitions to Germany and any other country that would buy them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What authority has the hon. member for that statement?

Mr. LEADER: This statement right here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot believe it. It is not true.

Mr. LEADER: Therefore can you expect from men in high places, wealthy men, rich men, running a country, that they will give equality to all and special privilege to none? You cannot.

I want to quote something said by Ernest Bevin, a man from the ranks, who knows what it is to toil and who has a feeling in his heart for his fellow workmen. When he was taken into the Churchill cabinet he made this statement:

> Ernest Bevin declares system based on monopoly and big business failed to deliver the goods in hour of trial and that social effort must take place of chaos that followed last war.
> This report is dated from London, June 6, 1940.
> Labour Minister Bevin told a building trades workers' meeting to-day that "in whatever I am doing I am keeping an eye on its possible value when the war is over," and added, "I know that a new country has got to be planned."
> "One thing we are producing—order out of chaos, and chaos it was when we went in," said Mr. Bevin, who before entering the government under Winston Churchill last month was secretary general of the transport and general workers' union.
> "The system based on monopoly and big business failed to deliver the goods in our hour of trial," the labour minister said.
> He added that there would be no boom at the end of the war.
>
> "The only way of absorbing these millions (of fighting men) back into industry and the national life is by way of public works and enterprise," Mr. Bevin said. "Social effort is bound to take the place of the kind of thing that occurred at the end of the last war. There is no alternative.
> "We cannot afford at the end of this struggle —when we have won—to leave men standing in queues at the labour exchanges without direction as to where to go or what to do."

I agree with what Mr. Bevin has said. I want to say here, Mr. Speaker, that I would take the responsibility of advising every soldier who is wearing a uniform that when this war is over he should not surrender that uniform until he is secure in some permanent job, with a chance to build a home and raise his family. That is how I feel about it.

I see my time is slipping by, so that I should like to come to the question of how I am going to vote. I have tried to look at this question from every angle. I have no particular fault to find with the government's war effort. Everything that has been done has been done in close cooperation with Britain and the United States, and in the words of Churchill, "Canada's war effort has been magnificent." However, the job is not completed; the victory is not won. There remains one step to take in order to convince our enemies that we mean business and to assure the closest cooperation with our allies. That final step is total conscription for overseas service, or wherever Canada's interests are threatened.

I said I was not so much concerned about the word "conscription" or the actual fact of conscription, as some people seem to be; but I realize that there is a disunity in this country and that some people, particularly my French speaking friends, do object very strenuously to conscription and its effects. I have urged tolerance, and I wish to practise what I preach. I intend to vote for the address in reply to the speech from the throne, for the government's policy of a plebiscite, if you will. The question being asked is:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

As a final word I want to add that my action will be justified as a gesture of tolerance, in order to preserve unity in our beloved land. The plebiscite is a delaying action, I admit. Perhaps it is the appropriate action at this time. Future events will test its wisdom. At any rate I am giving the government the benefit of the doubt. If the government, or the opposition, or any individual member of this house has served any interests other than the welfare of his country, may God forgive him; the nation dare not, and in my opinion never will.

Mr. A. D. LEGER (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very attentively to the various speeches that have been delivered in this house, in regard to the plebiscite mentioned in the speech from the throne, by hon. members belonging to different political groups. The most surprising thing to me was the attitude taken by those who now call themselves Conservatives, but who during the election campaign chose to call themselves the National party. Their leader, then Doctor Manion, and his colleagues, preached high and low that if they were returned to power they would not enforce conscription. Shortly after the election, however, those of the National party, or Conservatives, who were elected began to attack the government because conscription was not put into force. They had behind them a certain section of the press, controlled by a certain financial group in Ontario, which said that Canada could not have an all-out war effort without conscription; that it was absurd for the government to ask the people of Canada to be released from the promises made during the campaign of 1940. Imagine what they would have done if they had been returned to power! According to them, election promises mean nothing. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is not of that calibre. He regards his promises as sacred, and now is asking the people who elected him to relieve him of those promises. Could there be a better gesture, coming from a leader? He is a man who remains true to his promise; he is a man on whom the electorate depend; he is the man whom the people of Canada need as a leader.

In passing, I believe it my duty to mention that the Prime Minister has shown his leadership in bringing about the good entente that now exists between Great Britain and our great neighbour to the south, the United States, and also in the defence agreement he made with the United States, in case of any attack. These incidents show his great foresight. I am asking myself whether it would not have been better for the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to follow the example of Mr. Wendell Willkie who, after his party was defeated, campaigned the country in support of the president's war effort. To my mind this is the way an opposition leader should act, but what a contrast we have in this parliament!

The census returns tell us that we have a population of only about eleven and a half million people, so in our war effort we must not be compared with nations such as the United States, with a population of 130,000,000 people or more; but if a comparison is made, it must be on a per capita basis. Perhaps I may be permitted to review the war effort of this government and compare it with that of other nations. We have over 110,000 voluntary enlistments in the air force. We have over 27,000 voluntary enlistments in the navy. We have over 260,000 enlisted in the army to serve anywhere, on any front, overseas or elsewhere. I have not included those called up for training for home defence. We must realize that we have well over 500,000 men in the armed forces, to defend Canada on our shores or elsewhere. In order to compare with us, the United States should have over five million men under arms. It is admitted by military authorities everywhere that from twelve to fourteen men are required at home to maintain one man in the front line. At that rate we would require six million men and women to produce in our factories, if we are to provide for our men in uniform. If that were so, we would be left with about five million people. In this group would be included all the children up to the age of sixteen, all invalids and old people past working age, and married women who have to stay at home.

In all fairness to the nation, could we ask the Canadian people to furnish much more? The air force and the navy have a reserve list, and the army is recruiting all it can handle. Can we furnish any more than 150,000 to 200,000 men, if we want to back them up with ammunition, and instruments of war such as aeroplanes, trucks, tanks, guns of all kinds, bombs and so on, all manufactured in Canada? Our industry had to be transformed from a peace-time to a war-time basis, and I say that our war effort compares favourably with that of any allied nation in the world. We are giving out contracts at the rate of $4,000,000 a day. Still we hear the complaint that our war effort is not a total one. Admitting that we have not reached our limit, I say that to get the men it will not be necessary to resort to conscription. Each Canadian knows where his duty lies. He will answer the call. After the war it will be more honourable to say, "All our men fought in the war without having to be conscripted."

Present reports indicate that we have all the recruits that can be handled. That being so, why do we hear this cry for conscription if, indeed, it is not for a certain motive, namely, that of disuniting the two major races in Canada? These people know that French-speaking people in general are, and always have been, and always will be against conscription. Why is that so? It is not because they do not want to share the responsibility; no, it is because they believe it is more honourable to do their part freely. The French in Quebec and the French Acadian in the maritimes have volunteered freely in this war, despite the fact that men with the degree of Bachelor of Arts could obtain ranking no higher than that of private, in some units.

My answer will be that French-speaking Canadians have contributed as much as any others toward Canada's war effort. Let us turn to the facts. We learn that the maritime provinces rank first in enlistments. In the army they have furnished one man in every twenty-eight recruited. New Brunswick has furnished one man in every twenty-six. I am proud to say that the French in New Brunswick have thus far contributed more than their quota. They represent about a third of the population in that province, and have contributed forty to forty-five per cent of total enlistments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the hon. member oblige me by giving me the source of that information?—because I have been trying to get it and have not succeeded. I am not questioning his statement, but I should like to know the basis for it.

Mr. LEGER: It was given to me by an official in the army.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They will not give it to me; I am rather surprised at that.

Mr. LEGER: I am told that Quebec has furnished its share, as well as Ontario. It must be understood that these two provinces have shouldered most of the war effort, the large industries being centred in those two metropolitan provinces. I believe better distribution should be made among the other provinces, and particularly in New Brunswick, where very few contracts have been let. This matter should be attended to by the ministers.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in my native tongue.

(Translation) Mr. Speaker, I have just pointed out to our friends who speak the other official language that the French Canadians, like the French Acadians, are doing their part in our war effort as fully as any other race in Canada. No reference is made to conscription in the speech from the throne. Why then all the excitement? The government ask to be released from their pledges. I feel that we, as the representatives of our constituents, are in duty bound to support that request. I believe that we must do so if we want to keep our country united.

I represent the constituency of Kent, New Brunswick, whose population is very largely —about four-fifths—of French extraction, and they do not want conscription. I am proud to say that my constituency has given its large share of New Brunswick recruits and I hope it will continue to do so. No heed should be paid to the capitalist-controlled press which is endeavouring to cause disunion within the ranks of this government, in order to defeat them and permit the financial interests to assume power. That is their fondest hope; they have no other ambition. Their actions are not prompted by patriotism but by their ambition to control war contracts in order to make money as they did during the last war.

Our leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is asking us for a vote of confidence. We shall give it to him, shall we not? Or had we better place our confidence in Mr. Meighen and his crowd? To the same Mr. Meighen who, during the last war, drafted the conscription act, one of the darkest pages in our history? His views have certainly not changed.

I mentioned Mr. Meighen. I should not have done so, because he is dead. Whom will the Conservatives choose as his successor? Mr. Hanson is filling the post quite creditably. Why should they not keep him?

Mr. King's record shows him to be worthy of our confidence. Whom do we want? Mr. King? If so, let us support him: he will not betray us. If not, let us vote against him and support our friends of the opposition who, should they get into power, will most certainly bring in the same measure as during the war of 1914-1918—conscription.

(Text) I have been trying to show why we, supporting the government party, and every fair-minded hon. member should vote in favour of the speech from the throne. In reference to the plebiscite, let me point out that hon. members on both government and opposition sides of the house have pledged themselves against conscription for overseas service.

I am proud to announce that in my district there is one French family with seven brothers, another with six brothers, and several others with two or three who are now serving overseas. All Canadian people are anxious to see this war won because it is a war of faith, Christianity against paganism. None of us want to go back that far. We have come a long way from Christian concepts, and that is why the world is involved in such a war. We have failed to live true Christian lives. There is no more brotherly love, there is no more true Christianity, there is no more true charity. We must come back to it. There is no equality.

I have listened to western members asking for better prices for their wheat. I believe that their problems are the same as that facing the farmers and fishermen of the maritimes. It is not so much dollar wheat or potatoes at $1 a bushel. What do they care if we have 25 cent wheat? What is important is to ensure to the farmer that no matter where he is, after he has paid the cost of his production, he will have enough left to provide himself and family with the living he deserves. The same thing applies to the fisherman. We have heard many times that these two classes are the backbone of the country. They are in reality, but our governments have not treated them as such.

If the farmer of the west gets a dollar for his wheat, or the fisherman gets more for his fish, then the prices of the necessities they have to buy will go up, and they will remain at the same level. That is where the trouble is. The farmers throughout the length and breadth of this country are discontented, and they are not to be blamed. This is one reason why so many farmers' sons have enlisted. I would strongly suggest that a committee be appointed to study seriously these problems in their true light. Each province has its own problem. Committees should be appointed also to study the reestablishment of our soldiers and excess factory hands after the war. That must be done if we do not want to go back to the bread-lines and relief we had from 1930 to 1935.

Mr. MacINNIS: Why stop at 1935?

Mr. LEGER: We do not want that. If we are not to have it, we must prepare now. I can remember seeing children crying for bread when people in the west were burning their wheat. What terrible distribution! Let us plan for what is ahead of us. Let us all set our minds to winning this war. Let us all help as much as we can with the war loan, the Red Cross, the salvage campaign, and even recruiting. If we all set our minds to do our best, our war effort will be complete.

On motion of Mr. Graham the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 5.58 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—HON. MR. HANSON

CENSORSHIP OF MAIL ADDRESSED TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I rise to a question of privilege, affecting not only myself but every member of this house. On January 21 the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) raised a similar question. No answer, so far as I know, has been forthcoming from the government and I desire to demonstrate that the practice of which he complained is still continuing and to register my firmest and most emphatic protest against it.

I hold in my hand an air mail envelope postmarked "Wolfville, N.S."—which is in the constituency of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley)—"February 12, 1942." The end of this envelope has a label pasted over it, upon which appear the following words: "Examined by DB/C 106." This label obscures any initials which may have appeared on the envelope, but the following appears very clearly, "Hanson, Esq., M.P., Leader of the Opposition, Parliament Buildings, Ottawa, Ont." There could have been no doubt in the mind of the censor that this letter was addressed to me as a member of parliament and as leader of the opposition. The censor none the less took upon himself to open and examine this letter.

I protest, first of all, against that. In this connection I should like to draw the attention of the house to the reply made by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) on January 21 last, Hansard, page 4463, in which the hon. member asked this question:

> If any criticism of a department of government has been found, has such criticism been extracted from letters and sent with the name of the writer to the department involved?

The answer of the Postmaster General was:

> Such extracts are referred in confidence to the head of the department concerned, when it is considered in the public interest to do so.

In other words, if this letter from the constituency of the Minister of Finance, addressed to me as a member of parliament and as leader of the opposition, had contained critical reference to the minister's conduct of his department, shall I say, it might have been referred to the minister.

Mr. Speaker, this is an intolerable situation and one which the members of this house cannot permit to continue. This practice converts a censorship, which exists solely for the purpose of securing the safety of the state in wartime, into a petty Gestapo spying upon members of parliament and others.

May I make it very clear that my protest is not based upon any objection to the contents of this particular letter being made known to anyone. I hold it in my hand and anybody who wants to do so can read it. The letter is merely a general condemnation of the plebiscite and I would have no hesitation in reading it to the house if anybody wants to hear it. My protest is based upon a principle and that principle I enunciate as follows: Mail addressed to any member of parliament or dispatched by any member of parliament must be considered inviolate and free from interference by any servant of the crown. Unless this principle is firmly established, I do not believe it is possible for members of parliament adequately to perform their duties. If it is possible, as it is, for a letter addressed by me to, shall I say, the leader of the Conservative party in Nova Scotia, or by such leader to me, to be examined by a censor and the contents thereof communicated to the Postmaster General or even to the Prime Minister himself, I do not see how anyone can continue to carry on the duties of leader of the opposition. I do not say that this has occurred, but, under the procedure followed, it may occur.

I propose to lay on the table of the house the envelope to which I have referred. I protest against this practice with all the vigour and emphasis at my command and I ask the house to deal with this violation of privilege. Unless I have an unequivocal assurance that this practice will be stopped immediately I shall take the earliest opportunity to assert by way of a motion the rights and privileges of members of this parliament.

Mr. Speaker, I am trying to carry on one of the functions of government—perhaps in an inadequate manner but nevertheless with all the loyalty and power at my command—but if I am to be subject to this sort of espionage, I shall protest to the utmost and if I get no redress I shall carry the matter to the court of public opinion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say first, with respect to the underlying principles that are vital in the matter to which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has just referred, that I am in entire agreement with him. May I also say that if what I have been told is correct, some of my own mail has been similarly opened by censors, against which I wish to protest just as strongly as he has done.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am in good company.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It could not be better for either of us. May I say further something with which I am sure my hon. friend will be the first to agree. It is that great difficulties present themselves to some of the officials who are discharging public duties, in the matter of carrying out the instructions given to them. The letter to which my hon. friend has referred, as well as that referred to the other day, were air-mail letters, if I am not mistaken?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And there is the further fact, I believe, that they came from areas known for certain military reasons as prohibited defence areas. I think there is a part of the district represented by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) which is a prohibited area.

Mr. ILSLEY: Halifax is, but I did not think any part of my constituency is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that part of Halifax is. I cannot say just how far the area extends, but there are certain prohibited defence areas and certain restrictions in regard to air mail coming from those areas. I should not be surpised if that and that alone is the reason for the opening of the letter of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition.

I can assure him that the last thing any member of the administration would wish is to have his mail or the mail of any hon. member opened for purposes of espionage or anything of the kind. I shall take up at once with the ministers concerned with censorship the representations which have been made, and see if it is not possible to have any occurrence of this kind prevented in the future. Hon. members will realize that in a time of war of necessity there are occasions when with the utmost desire to give the fullest discretion to officials they may err on what they regard as the side of strict compliance with instructions. I am sure the present instance is one of that kind only.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to add this: I realize that from a proclaimed defence area such as Halifax a good deal more care has to be taken than from an area which is not a defence area. But Wolfville is not a defence area. An air mail letter is mailed at Wolfville; I assume it goes to Halifax and takes the plane there. But it does not originate in Halifax. I think we ought to know what instructions are given to the censors. A letter directed by a citizen of this country to a member of parliament should not be opened even if it does take the plane at Halifax. I should like to know what the rules are.

In the early part of the war I was in Florida, and my family was living at Halifax, and all our mail was censored. I expected that; there was the element, an important one, of possible contravention of the regulations of the foreign exchange control board. Such mail was international in character. People have sought to send securities out of the country by mail, and the foreign exchange control board exercise some control over that through the censorship. That is quite proper. But mail from Wolfville to Ottawa surely should never be opened. I cannot see on what principle they are opened. I suppose it is charitable to think that probably it is due to some too officious official. But that is not enough; we ought to know what the rules are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall try to get for my hon. friend the information he has requested. I would only wish to substitute the word "conscientious" for "officious".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I think it is officious.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): May I add a word in this connection, as I happened to bring this subject to the attention of the Postmaster General? The Prime Minister has said that he thought this opening of letters by the censors would apply only to air mail letters. In one case a letter was opened, an ordinary letter, mailed to my wife from Montreal. It happened to contain a Christmas card. It seems extraordinary that that should happen. I have been informed that on other occasions photostatic copies have been made of extracts from letters and these have been sent to the departments of government concerned when there has been criticism.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the last statement of my hon. friend is one on which the government should have a little more information. If he can advise me of any instance in which photostatic prints have been made from letters and sent to the government, I should like to have particulars.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Postmaster General said it was done.

THE WAR IN THE FAR EAST

FALL OF SINGAPORE—TRIBUTE TO HEROIC RESISTANCE OF ITS DEFENDERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Hon. members will I assume be anxious to know whether the government has received any information with regard to the critical situation in the far east which it is in a position to impart, beyond the momentous announcement made yesterday by the prime minister of Great Britain (Mr. Churchill) in the course of his world-wide broadcast that Singapore has fallen. Hon. members will I am sure appreciate the fact that such information as our government receives with respect to matters in the far east comes to us for the most part from London. There are very few connections between Canada and the far east if we except the direct communications we have with Australia and New Zealand. So far as London itself is concerned the sources that may be regarded as reliable with respect to events and happenings in the far east are becoming increasingly limited, and in Britain the government itself is obliged to take additional precautions by way of investigating the reliability of information before sending it out.

We have thus far received no information that would throw additional light upon the situation in the far east, beyond the announcement that was made by the Prime Minister yesterday.

I am sure, however, that hon. members would not wish this fateful hour to pass without some recognition on the part of the parliament and the people of Canada of the heroic resistance of the defenders of Singapore, a resistance which will be recalled throughout time as comparable to any recorded chapter of valour and endurance. The position of the defenders of Singapore has deeply stirred the hearts of the Canadian people. It has made us more determined than ever to resist with all our might onslaughts of the enemy wherever we can assist to that end, and to devote the utmost of our strength to the defence of freedom. This major reverse should not be allowed to become an excuse for undue pessimism, or undue recriminations. I should like to re-echo the words of the Prime Minister of Great Britain that as a people we must steel ourselves against "many misfortunes, severe and torturing losses, remorseless and gnawing anxieties." At the same time we must, with a faith that is stronger than ever, believe, again to quote Mr. Churchill, that the same qualities which brought the British people through the awful jeopardy of the summer of 1940 will bring all through this new ordeal.

Let me add, too, that with the Prime Minister of Great Britain I believe nothing could be more harmful at the present or any time than a lack of unity within our nation, or between the nations that to-day are united in seeking to preserve the liberties of mankind. We must stand together as never before in preserving our national unity and the unity of the united nations. For Canada the fall of Singapore should emphasize the gravity of the whole world situation. Coming, on the eve of the victory loan campaign, it should serve to bring forth from the people of Canada a full and immediate response to the loan as an essential factor in the war effort of our country.

SECRET SESSION OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR OPPORTUNITY TO DISCUSS DEFENCE MEASURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) whether any decision has been reached by the government concerning the suggestion that there should be a secret session of the house to consider the question of the defence of the Pacific coast, or of both coasts. The fall of Singapore may mean that Canada has only a limited time in which to prepare.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government has had in mind the suggestion advanced that a secret session of the house should be held. Thus far we have had the intention of holding that session at a date which, all factors considered, we believed would be most advisable. We had felt that the debate on the address should be concluded before a secret session was held, unless there were some special reason to the contrary. We have also felt that if the plebiscite bill could be passed and sent to the other house as speedily as possible, that would be desirable. We would then make the plebiscite the next measure to be considered, and immediately thereafter have the secret session which has been requested. If, however, there should be a general feeling that it would be desirable to have a secret session earlier than that, the government will seek to meet that desire. I am inclined to believe that if the secret session could be held at about the time I have indicated it would perhaps serve the purpose my hon. friends have in view.

Mr. GREEN: May I suggest to the Prime Minister that time is precious these days, and that he consider whether or not the secret session should be held before the plebiscite bill is under discussion, because that discussion may last for some time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Of course it is the emphasis that has been placed upon time being precious that makes us wish to get the plebiscite bill through as soon as possible. My colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) mentions to me that members of the staff of his department have certain steps in view which might obviate the necessity of having an immediate discussion on the Pacific situation. He feels that matters might be put in such shape that the house might be more fully informed if the steps that are now being taken could be taken before the secret session is held.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I rose to say something similar, except that I think the secret session should be held immediately, and that even this debate should be suspended in view of the general situation which is developing. And I do not believe any secret session should be concerned only with Pacific coast defences. It should deal with the whole of our defence effort and with our production; that is to say, there should be a complete inquiry into the situation as it now exists. Members of this house know very little more than the general public. It is about time we assumed our responsibilities and went into this thing very thoroughly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, that if the feeling is as he has expressed it, namely that the secret session should be held immediately, then we might agree at once to have the session held as soon as the debate on the address has been concluded. I believe there is a general understanding that this may take place to-morrow night.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I think we should get this debate concluded, and then we might get together and decide on a date for a secret session and what should be discussed. I am afraid that if we undertook in secret session to cover the whole gamut of government operations and responsibilities we would have a debate lasting as long as this debate on the address. I think it is a matter on which we might get together and perhaps evolve a programme; I believe that would be a fair suggestion to make.

Mr. V. J. POTTIER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): May I say that the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver South Mr. Green) with respect to a secret session to discuss defence on the Pacific coast might lead one to think that we on the Atlantic coast have not the same feelings about our defence as the people on the Pacific coast. I urge that at any secret session of the house where the question of defence on the Pacific coast is taken up, the government be prepared to discuss as of equal importance and equal urgency the question of defence on the Atlantic coast.

SECOND VICTORY LOAN

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TAKEN TO REDUCE COSTS OF FLOTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): In view of the fact that the cost of raising the last victory loan was reported to be over $8,000,000, will the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) inform the house what measures he has taken to curtail the expense of raising the present victory loan?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The proposed expenditures have been carefully budgeted for. Preparations for the loan have been made over a long period of time, covering several weeks and months. Naturally we wish to keep expenditures down to the absolute minimum, but apart from that I do not know that there is anything that I can say to my hon. friend.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I believe there is a question on the order paper by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) having to do with the cost of the last victory loan. I have heard a good deal of criticism of the cost of that loan. I do not know whether or not that criticism is justified, but I do think the Canadian people are entitled to a breakdown of the cost of the last loan. If that would prejudice the success of the present loan I would put it in the waste paper basket at once, because nothing must be allowed to prejudice this loan. I am going to have something more to say about that, perhaps tomorrow; but there is a feeling that the cost of the last loan was pretty high.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT OF PREMIER OF ONTARIO AS TO DISCHARGES BECAUSE OF LACK OF PROPER CLOTHING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): My attention has deen directed to a dispatch appearing in the Toronto Globe and Mail of Friday, February 13, containing a statement attributed to the premier of Ontario, as follows:

"He said 45,000 men had been discharged from the armed forces mostly because they developed colds and tuberculosis from lack of proper clothing."

Every implication of this grossly alarmist statement is totally unjustified. Out of more than 400,000 enlistments up to the end of December the total number discharged as medically unfit was only 27,153. The number 45,000 represents the number struck off the strength for all reasons, including among others the following: misconduct; false attestation; over and under age; compassionate grounds; unlikely to become efficient soldiers; returned to civil employment in which they had special skill. The number discharged as medically unfit, I repeat, was 27,153, which is approximately 6·75 per cent of enlistments.

A statistical analysis of the conditions leading to discharge is complete with respect to 21,000 cases dealt with prior to November 1. To suggest that tuberculosis is a major condition is utterly and entirely untrue. Up to the first of the year the number of the members of the forces discharged for physical unfitness, including wounds, was less than 7 per cent of total enlistments. For more detailed statistics, I have to go back to November 1.

Since the outbreak of war it has been an automatic procedure that the file of every member of the forces discharged as medically unfit shall be referred immediately to the Canadian pension commission for a ruling. The number of cases upon which rulings had been given on November 1 amounted to 20,982. The number of cases of tuberculosis among these were 1,320. At that time the number of enlistments in all three services was around 360,000.

The total number of cases of tuberculosis was, therefore, only one-third of one per cent of the whole of our Canadian forces in the present war. This figure includes a very large number of non-active cases—that is, of men who were found to have spots on their lungs, which made it unwise for them to continue in military service for fear of some later breakdown, but who at the time were quite well and able to carry on in ordinary civil life.

Every man enlisting in the Canadian forces in this war is given a careful X-ray examination for the purpose of detecting chest conditions which may escape attention at the ordinary clinical examination.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When did that practice begin?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am just going to refer to that. In the early months of the war this X-ray was not taken until perhaps three or four months after enlistment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Right.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Now, in most cases, it is taken at the time of enlistment, often before attestation has been completed. The Canadian Tuberculosis Association has kept a careful record of the results of these X-ray examinations and I am advised that of all the cases of tuberculosis detected in these examinations only 40 per cent were active. The remainder were inactive or quiescent.

The vast majority of these non-active cases were detected within a very short time after enlistment, indicating (1) that the condition had arisen prior to enlistment, (2) that it had not been aggravated by the man's short experience in the army, and (3) that the precautions taken by the government have probably saved young men's lives; since a man with this weakness, if subjected to the rigours of military life for a prolonged period, would undoubtedly break down.

The foregoing figures clearly indicate that of the small number of cases of tuberculosis detected in the armed forces, the vast majority existed before enlistment. Our law provides that if a condition such as tuberculosis is found to have been caused by service, or to have been aggravated by service, the man is pensionable. I have already shown that among the 21,000 men discharged as physically unfit prior to November 1, the Canadian Pension commission had found 1,320 cases of tuberculosis. These cases include the men who have been attested for only a few days, and then discharged. The extent to which tuberculosis has been caused by or aggravated by military service is reflected in the number of pension awards made. That number, up to November 1, was 39—for tuberculosis, in all our forces. That is, out of 360,000 men enlisted by November 1, we have the following facts:

Fewer than 7 per cent were discharged as physically unfit, and this 7 per cent includes a large number in whom weaknesses of pre-enlistment origin were detected by X-ray within a few days or weeks of enlistment. It includes only 1,320 cases of tuberculosis, the vast majority of which were non-active. The total number of cases of tuberculosis found in the armed forces represents only one-third of one per cent of the men enlisted. The number of tuberculosis cases due to, or aggravated by service, was 39, all told—a number too small to be expressed in any percentage figures.

The fact that we have 1,320 cases of tuberculosis recorded indicates not that the provision for the health of the troops is inadequate, but that the efficiency of our medical services has saved a large number of men with lung weaknesses from undergoing the rigours of military training.

Instead of conditions in the armed services having brought about large numbers of cases of tuberculosis, as so recklessly implied by the premier of Ontario, the efficiency of our medical examinations has actually saved hundreds of lives, and revealed to many young civilians the existence of unsuspected lung weaknesses, which they can now intelligently protect.

The irresponsible and unfounded statement by the premier of Ontario may have several consequences. First, it may needlessly alarm tens of thousands of mothers and wives as to the care their boys are receiving in the armed services of Canada. Such a statement is therefore entirely improper and thoroughly indefensible. Second, it may give comfort to the enemy by belittling the efficiency of our fighting forces. There is only one word in the English language to describe such conduct—and I shall not use it here. In the third place it may shake public confidence in the government of our country. That, of course, the premier of Ontario regards as fair game in these grim, dark days of war, as well as in the more pleasant days of peace.

I leave this whole unhappy affair to two tribunals, one being indefinite and uncertain, the elastic conscience of the man who pronounced the libel, the other very definite and certain and purposeful, the free and unfettered judgment of hon. members of this house. In my own opinion the statement was thoroughly contemptible.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the minister consider using paragraph 39 (b) of the defence of Canada regulations empowering the government to intern any person making statements likely to interfere with recruiting?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, following what my colleague has said, I should like to place on record the figures for the Canadian army. It will be remembered that Premier Hepburn's statement was that 45,000 men had been discharged from the armed forces, mostly because they had developed colds and tuberculosis because of lack of proper clothing.

As I understand it, the 45,000 is a rough figure arrived at for all discharges from all causes. The number found medically unfit after they enlisted in the army was 29,476. That is the number for two and a third years, stretching from September 1, 1939 to December 31, 1941. That is, 29,476 of those who had enlisted were subsequently found medically unfit.

Premier Hepburn's statement is that the discharges were "mostly because they developed colds and tuberculosis from lack of proper clothing". Of the 29,476 found unfit, only 1,499, or 5·1 per cent, were found unfit on account of tuberculosis. And only 55 of these men who were found unfit from this cause were so found after they had gone overseas. That is to say, there were 55 cases of discharge for tuberculosis, out of over 130,000 men overseas. It should be remembered also that the total of 1,499 men who were found unfit on account of tuberculosis is out of an aggregate enlistment in the Canadian army for this same period of nearly 300,000 men.

Premier Hepburn also includes colds as reasons for discharge. I think it ought to be known that ordinary colds are not a cause for discharge. Discharges are made where there is a chronic or serious cause of affection of the respiratory system, such as in the case of asthma, bronchitis and things of that kind. I have had these looked up as well. The total number of men who have enlisted in the army and who have later been found unfit on account of an affection of the respiratory system is 3,015 out of total found unfit of 29,476, or 10·2 per cent. Again, this number of 3,015 is out of a total enlistment of nearly 300,000.

To sum up, Premier Hepburn says that "45,000 men had been discharged from the armed forces mostly because they developed colds and tuberculosis from lack of proper clothing." The facts are that out of 29,476 found medically unfit after enlistment, only 5·1 per cent were found medically unfit on account of tuberculosis—as a matter of fact, about 40 per cent of those were non-active. And about ten per cent of those found medically unfit were cases of affection of the respiratory system. In other words, taking the total number discharged for tuberculosis, asthma, bronchitis or any other disease of the respiratory system, which might include chronic or serious colds, the total discharges were 4,514 out of 29,476, or a little over 15 per cent of those actually found unfit, and that 4,514 was out of a total number actually enlisted of nearly 300,000.

I think these facts speak for themselves without any embellishment from me.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): With respect to the Royal Canadian Air Force, I have before me an itemized list of discharges and retirements for medical reasons, September, 1939, to January 31, 1942. I would point out that discharges for medical reasons only total 2,270. Discharges for tuberculosis total 136, and for respiratory diseases, as explained by my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), 141.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, to complete the story with regard to discharges from the armed forces, I should like to say that so far as the Royal Canadian Navy is concerned the total number of discharges for medical reasons from the beginning of the war up to January 31, 1942, was 954. Of that number 53 discharges were because of tuberculosis and 56 were for other diseases of the respiratory system.

HONG KONG

PRESS REPORTS AS TO ATROCITIES UPON CAPTURED CANADIAN TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister based upon two news items, one of which appeared on page 3 of the Ottawa Citizen of February 13 and the other on the front page of the Ottawa Citizen of this morning. These articles describe barbarities and atrocities that are alleged to have been perpetrated upon Canadian troops captured in Hong Kong. The latter dispatch carried a footnote to the effect that the Department of External Affairs is taking immediate action to check the truthfulness of these reports. In view of the harrowing effects which news of this nature is bound to have upon the relatives and loved ones of these men, will the government consider withholding news items of this sort until their contents have been verified?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would say to my hon. friend that the government of Great Britain has informed us that they have received certain information. It is from sources the reliability of which they wish to investigate before making a definite statement. As soon as reliable information is available it will be furnished to our government. I make that preliminary statement, as the only statement that I think can be taken at its face value with reference to certain rumours appearing in the press or circulated from other sources as to conditions in Hong Kong and indeed in other parts of the far east. I have not before me the communications to which my hon. friend has referred, but I gather that they are dispatches that have come from abroad, either from Chungking or London. As news dispatches they are in no sense of the word to be regarded as communications from the British government. My hon. friend referred to certain atrocities which are alleged to have been perpetrated upon Canadian troops captured at Hong Kong. I do not think that there has been any communication which referred particularly to Canadian troops.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The one this morning did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not seen it. At any rate such communications as the government has had from the British government have made no specific reference to any atrocities committed upon Canadians as distinguished from troops generally that might be at Hong Kong. I wish to assure my hon. friend at once that the British government are themselves investigating the rumours to which he has referred and that up to the present they should not be regarded as belonging to any category other than the one in which I have placed them.

As to my hon. friend's suggestion that the government should seek to censor communications of the kind, I must say that personally I share his views and feelings on the matter. There is an element of unnecessary pain caused to many by rumours that occasion alarm and distress, particularly where rumours may be without foundation or are without verification. But the government is in this very difficult position. The moment we take steps to censor any rumours as to the condition of our troops in any part of the world, we may be accused of withholding information which the Canadian public would wish to have at the earliest moment. I know that such is the criticism that would arise if the government withheld any information that was reliable and which would throw light upon existing conditions. In so far as we receive information that we have reason to believe is authentic and reliable, if it is in the public interest that it should be given out, it will be given out. In the meantime I hope that the public of Canada will not assume as reliable, communications that are not authenticated by the government itself.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If I may be permitted, I should like to make an appeal to the Prime Minister. The statement with respect to Canadian troops which appears in this morning's press was broadcast over CBC last night. I am not asking the Prime Minister to indulge in censorship, but I would ask that he consider making an appeal both to the press and to the radio not to announce and repeat such heart-rending stories about these men until the government itself has been able to verify their authenticity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand in connection with this particular matter that the officials of the Department of External Affairs believed that the communication to which my hon. friend has referred would come to Canada from the United States. If it were censored in the press, it might be heard over the radio nevertheless. However, what I have said stands. In so far as the government may feel justified in seeking to circumvent unverified rumours, I take it the house will be agreeable to our so doing.

PACIFIC COUNCIL

REPRESENTATION OF CANADA ON COUNCIL TO CONCERT COMMON DEFENCE IN SOUTH PACIFIC

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) with respect to Canadian representation on the Pacific council. This question was asked on February 10 and the hon. member's remarks will be found on pages 444 and 445 of Hansard:

The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, in a speech in the House of Commons at Westminster on January 27, which was quoted in this house in reply to a question from the member from Vancouver South (Mr. Green) on the following day, announced that it was proposed to set up in London a Pacific council, comprising Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and the Netherlands, which would be able to transmit their united views to the combined chiefs of staff committee sitting at Washington. Definite arrangements had not at that time been made for the establishment and location of the council and, as members of the house will be aware, suggestions were put forward in certain quarters that it should meet in Washington rather than in London. It has now been settled that it will meet in London, and the following official announcement of its constitution has been made public:

> A Pacific council has been set up on a ministerial plane. Australia, Great Britain, the Netherlands and New Zealand will have representation on the council. Other ministers and advisers will attend as necessary.

At the first meeting of the council, held on February 10, the government of India was represented in addition to the governments named in the official announcement.

Since the question of Canadian representation in the Pacific council was raised in this house I have been again in communication with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom on the matter. The council's functions and responsibility are not quite as wide as its name might suggest. The Prime Minister has stressed the fact that as present constituted its duties are directly related to questions of regional defence of the areas in the southwest Pacific and southeastern Asia against which Japanese offensive action is now directed. The countries participating in it are those actually in the zone of hostilities.

It may be, however, that future strategic requirements will make it desirable to enlarge the scope of the Pacific council to include the whole Pacific area, in which case Canada will certainly be represented on the council.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

USE OF MOBILE UNITS AND IMPROVEMENT OF COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, as a private Liberal member of this hon. house, may I ask the government if the Canadian people, following the deplorable fall of Singapore and the notorious escape of a German naval squadron from Brest, can secure a definite guarantee that this country will not be invaded before the end of the war; and if so, what is it? If not, is it the policy of the government to create a large number of mobile units and to improve at once all means and ways of communication throughout this country?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on these questions of strategy and war policy, questions that affect other parts of the world as well as Canada and other nations as well as our own, I do not think any question should either be asked in a form which is likely to cause embarrassment, or answered, or attempted to be answered, if there is the slightest possibility of either the question or the answer being misunderstood in any part of the world. I am afraid that my hon. friend's question has been asked on the spur of the moment, and I for one would certainly not wish to reply without due consideration.

TAXATION CONFERENCE

AVAILABILITY OF REPORT—CANADIANS AT SINGAPORE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday last the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) asked on the orders of the day whether it was the intention of the government to make the report of the last interprovincial conference available to all members of parliament and "if so, will it be an unrevised copy".

The hon. member is apparently referring to the meeting with representatives of the provincial governments which took place on December 18 and 19 to discuss the proposed draft agreements to implement the offer made to provinces in the last dominion budget. This was not a formal interprovincial conference in the ordinary sense. For the convenience of representatives of the various governments, a shorthand record of the discussions was kept. The meeting, however, agreed that the record should be confidential, and I think hon. members will understand that in a meeting of this sort between governments in which certain aspects of the financial affairs and position of the various governments were discussed, freedom of discussion would have been seriously impeded if any other decision had been reached. It is, therefore, not the intention of the government to table the "report" of the meeting or make it public in any other way, although as the house is aware, I have already tabled copies of the tentative draft agreements which were, if I may put it this way, the basis and the result of our discussions.

The hon. member also asked whether any member of the government informed the provincial representatives attending this conference that there were Canadian soldiers, sailors and airmen at Singapore as well as at Hong Kong. As I have already explained, the meeting was for the purpose of discussing tax matters arising out of the offer made to the provinces in the last dominion budget and no reference was made by myself or, to my knowledge, by any other member of the government to members of the Canadian armed forces serving at Singapore or anywhere else.

My colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has already replied to a third question asked on the same occasion by the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken very often in this house but as an old soldier I should like to say a word with regard to the present situation. We do not have to worry. We know that everything is going to come out all right. We know that—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Is the hon. member asking a question of the government?

PRIVILEGE—MR. BRUCE

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN DEBATE AS TO "COUNTRY OF ADOPTION"

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I should like to draw attention to page 527 of Hansard, where the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Dubois) is reported to have said, amongst other complimentary remarks he made about me, that Canada was "my country of adoption." As I happen to have been born in Canada I assume he would wish to have these words expunged from the records of the house.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, February 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. R. T. GRAHAM (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, the debate on which we are now engaged has chiefly centred around that portion of the speech from the throne which dealt with the proposed plebiscite. If that were the sole matter I proposed to discuss I doubt very much if I would have taken part in this debate to-day. The very excellent contributions to the debate made by the mover (Mr. Fournier) and the seconder (Mr. Macdonald) of the address in reply, the statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by other ministers and the many able contributions made by other members of the house, seem to me to have reasonably served the purpose of the debate and there is very little of value left for me to say. However, having in mind that I propose to speak on another phase of the speech from the throne, I decided that if I remained silent my attitude might be misinterpreted as in opposition or at least lukewarmness to the policy of the government. Such a supposition would be wholly incorrect. I can say, as one member said, that both my mind and my conscience are in agreement in supporting the government in the matter of the plebiscite. I consider that the Prime Minister could do no other than he has done in observing the pledge he gave the people of Canada in the election of 1940. Once you accept that premise, it seems to me there is only one alternative to the plebiscite, and that would be a general election. I believe we would all be in agreement, both in this house and outside, that in the present crisis that course is one that no one would wisely or properly consider. Moreover, ever since this government has been elected, and since I have had the privilege of being a member of this house, I have followed with all the attention I could the policies adopted, and I think that the war leadership displayed by the Prime Minister and his colleagues has been magnificent, to borrow a word used by a much more eminent person than myself, Mr. Churchill. I am assisted in coming to that conclusion by the statement that was made to the Canadian troops in England by General McNaughton, the commander of our Canadian forces, a man who possesses the confidence of every section of the Canadian people, and, may I suggest, of every party in this house. It is true that General McNaughton in the position he holds might not comment at all upon the war programme of this country; but I think the fact that he did not remain silent but saw fit to give expression to his own views on the men, munitions and food that were going from Canada to England, is indeed, coming from one who is in the best position to know and to pass judgment on our war effort, a very warm recommendation for the Prime Minister and the cabinet.

[Mr. Graham.]

Personally, after listening to the statement given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) as to the success of the voluntary recruiting method, and having the assurance that neither at present nor in the near forseeable future will the system of voluntary recruiting occasion any shortcomings in our war effort, I think it would be unwise and inadvisable at this moment to attempt to put into operation the conscription of man-power for overseas service. I realize of course that it is wise for this government, while there is yet time, and in the light of the terrible events elsewhere, to secure from the people to whom they gave the pledge a complete release, so that under any circumstances and in any event their freedom of action to advise this parliament of the course that should be pursued shall be untrammelled and unfettered.

In my opinion, therefore, not only was it right for the Prime Minister to keep his pledge, but the method adopted of submitting to the people by way of a plebiscite the question which it is proposed to submit to them, is the wisest and best under all the circumstances. So far as the plebiscite is concerned, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, the conscription of man-power for overseas service is not an issue. I propose therefore to reserve to myself the right to discuss when the time comes, if it ever does come, the question of conscription for overseas service, and only when that question is properly before the house and becomes a matter which parliament is called upon to decide.

The subject that prompted me to take part in this debate arises out of a much more important section of the speech from the throne than that dealing with the plebiscite, because after all the plebiscite is merely a method of procedure. The part of the speech from the throne which I propose to read to the house is a part which actually deals with the attitude of the government to our war effort. Let me read that paragraph:

> In accordance with the government's policy of a total national effort for total war, you will be asked to approve a balanced programme for further increases in the armed forces and in the production of munitions of war and of foodstuffs.

I wish to call the attention of the house particularly to that word "balanced". I think it is most essential to apply it to our war effort. I should like also in that connection to call the attention of the house to a sentence from the speech made by the Minister of National Defence the other day in the house, in which he said at page 448.

> Total war requires a country to plan its pattern for war according to its resources, and, more than that, according to the needs and abilities of other countries with which it is allied.

That, too, is a statement of significance, indicating the duty we have to discharge in the direction of the war effort of Canada. We should never let it escape our attention. The portion of that particular section of the speech from the throne which I wish to discuss to-day is that dealing with our programme in the production and supply of foodstuffs. I am convinced that the events of the last few weeks make it necessary for this government and for us all to completely resurvey and reappraise the position of Canada in its relationship with the United States, particularly in this matter of the production and supply of foodstuffs.

What is the situation? I think I can briefly review it, and this may be of some value to the house. It will be recalled that soon after the outbreak of war the part of Europe that had supplied great quantities of foodstuffs to Great Britain was closed to her. I need only point to Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, the Danube basin, and other Eurpoean countries, which had all played their part in supplying Great Britain with the foodstuffs that were so solely needed. It is true that even after that disaster, after these sources of supply had been cut off, there was still a considerable portion of the world available to supply that vital war necessity—food. But the events of the last few weeks have completely changed that picture. Singapore has fallen, the Malay peninsula is gone, and no one in this house can be blind to the possibilities that may flow from the victories of Japan in the far east.

What does it mean in actual terms of foodstuffs? For example, the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) has often informed this house of the great quantities of edible oil that had been furnished to Canada from that area. The United States, too, commensurately with its population, imported large quantities of that commodity; and because of her peculiar position, England, in proportion to her population, imported from that source quantities out of all ratio to those imported by the United States and Canada. Is it not clear also, now that Singapore has fallen, that the sea routes to and from Australia, New Zealand and even India, may be denied to the ships of Britain and her allies? What effect must that have in the necessity of taking care of the food problem of Britain? It seems to me it can have only one effect, that is, to place upon Canada and the United States and the other American nations which are able and willing to assume it the task of making up this tremendous deficiency in food supply resulting from the events of the last few weeks. We would be blind indeed if we did not recognize the immediate necessity of reshaping our food policy to take care of the additional needs of our allies arising out of the situation in the far east.

It seems to me that despite the difficulty of keeping the Atlantic sea lanes open, Canada and the United States are the only countries that can possibly take up the slack caused by Britain being cut off from those countries as sources of supply. Keeping that route open will be a most difficult task, but it would appear to be the only continuous sea lane that we can hope to maintain. Australia and New Zealand, as everyone knows, have supplied great quantities of wheat, beef, mutton, butter, cheese and, as a by-product of the food supply, wool, to Great Britain, Canada and the United States.

I would point out that not only must we make up the deficiency in the supply to Britain and our own armed forces and the armed forces of our allies there, but it will be necessary to make up the deficiency that we ourselves shall feel as a result of the cutting off of those things that formerly came from the far east.

We should also have in mind that not only may it be necessary for us to take care of Britain's needs, but it may be our task to get great quantities of food to Russia and China. Both those nations are vital partners with us in this war, and if they for a moment fail through lack of food and any share of the responsibility of that were upon the shoulders of the Canadian people, we should deeply regret our failure to take due steps in due time. It is also necessary to keep in mind that in the production of either cereals or food in the shape of live stock it takes considerable time to produce a greatly increased supply. A crop of cereals cannot be grown in less than a season, and the same applies still more in regard to live stock. The growing in Canada of soya beans, which would immediately come to our mind to replace some of the edible oils, is not very feasible. But we know that in the United States there are considerable areas where that commodity has been successfully grown. It seems to me there must be further cooperation between the United States and Canada, after consultation and consideration of the joint problem, to see to it that those areas are used for that purpose. Canada can also assist indirectly by encouraging a great increase in the growth of flax. Flax produces linseed oil. We are using considerable quantities of edible oils for non-edible purposes, and we could make up that deficiency to some extent at least by producing more linseed oil.

I have already pointed out that as I see the problem it requires the closest cooperation between United States and Canada. That cooperation exists in many fields and it should immediately be taken into account in this very vital section of our war effort. The policy adopted by this government at the present time will of necessity have to encourage the production of the foodstuffs that we most need. In the policy to be adopted this year any suggestion of encouraging the keeping of suitable agricultural land out of production should be completely eliminated.

The situation is so serious that any land properly capable of producing any form of food should be utilized to the full, in the face of the great danger that confronts us. I used the words "suitable agricultural land". I know the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) through his long experience will have in mind the history of the last war and the difficulties that arose through encouraging the bringing into production of vast areas of western lands that were not suited to agricultural use. We should not repeat that mistake, except under the urge of dire necessity. This year certainly the policy should be to encourage the full use for production of all land that is in shape to be used. I would point out that sooner than I or probably any hon. member of this house expected the Minister of Agriculture has been proven right in two statements he made to this house. It will be recalled that he said that what we thought to be a huge surplus of wheat would in the end prove to be not a liability but a great asset. And in 1941 he told us, in introducing the wheat policy of that year, that the wheat policy would necessarily have to be a temporary one. The events to which I have referred make it quite clear that he was correct in both those statements.

I propose to deal with the question of the wheat policy, not because I believe it is not now once more in its proper alignment with the production of other foodstuffs as a national necessity, but simply because up until now wheat, it might be said, has been treated as the orphan in the storm. I think that attitude of mind on the part of the government and ourselves must cease; we must recognize that if there are areas in this country suited only to the production of wheat, they should be used for that production. It would be far better that either our allies or ourselves should have ample food supplies in the form of wheat plus a reasonable amount of fat than to find ourselves and our allies with only a little wheat and a little fat. Every acre of suitable and properly cultivated agricultural land should now be devoted to building up reserves of foodstuffs for the inevitable day when they will be needed.

[Mr. Graham.]

Every hon. member will recall the recent visit of the four hundred farmers and others to Ottawa from Saskatchewan. I think I can safely say that they made an excellent impression on this house and, in the presentation of their submissions, on the government. Despite the criticism that was directed at the expense involved in that delegation coming to Ottawa, it is my considered opinion that they did a good job and any expenditure involved was well justified. I should also like to point out that the presentation they made to the government was most reasonable and moderate; it was made with dignity and was supported by sound arguments.

Let me give briefly the main points in that submission. They urged upon the government:

1. That an initial payment of one dollar a bushel basis No. 1 northern at Fort William be made.

2. Deferred payment of the balance of what they described as a parity price to be made later, this price to be determined by the bureau of statistics.

3. The continuation of the quota system of marketing, and the taking of only the amount of wheat required for domestic consumption and export during the coming crop year.

4. The continuation and necessary amendment of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

5. Soil conservation and the encouragement of the production of grasses to aid in that policy.

It seems to me that this submission, in the light of the events that have taken place, merits the most favourable consideration by the government in determining the wheat policy which at present is under review. Personally I want to say that in 1941 I had no hesitation in supporting the wheat policy brought down in this house by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It served an unusually good purpose last year in my constituency, which was visited by drought conditions almost unprecedented in our history. But I am convinced that circumstances have so changed that there is no path open to us except to recognize the needs occasioned by these events and circumstances. I believe therefore we should see to it that our policy realistically appreciates the change that has taken place. I feel that for once—and I say this to every member of this house—the interests of the nation and of our war programme are fully in keeping with the encouragement of those now producing the foodstuffs that are or will be so badly needed in connection with our war effort. Therefore, not because we are in a generous mood but because it is right and proper and because the policy is wise and sound in the light of present circumstances, I would urge the government to see to it that for once in the history of this country, the farmer, the man whom we often proclaim to be an important element in our population, should be given that measure of justice which his situation demands and deserves.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that in connection with the policy that should be pursued by this government there has been an honest difference of opinion as to the methods by which the funds taken out of the dominion treasury should be distributed among the farming class, speaking particularly of western Canada. In view of the fact that last year we had a huge surplus of wheat which apparently we did not immediately need, the course followed then was more or less justified; but in view of the circumstances that now exist I do not believe that course should be followed any longer. I do not think it would be fair to the wheat grower, or for that matter to any other producer of foodstuffs, to say at this time, "It is vital in the interests of our war effort for you to grow all the wheat you can grow, but, because of priorities in the matter of various foodstuffs, we are going to depress the price of your commodity below what would be fair and equitable, everything being considered." I think the basis of the policy should be the establishment of fair and equitable prices to all producers of foodstuffs. Then if we wish to encourage the increased production of certain most needed agricultural commodities, we should attain that objective by paying a premium on the commodities that we desire our farmers to raise.

It seems to me this is the only reasonable attitude to assume. I further submit, Mr. Speaker, that we should encourage the greater production of coarse grains and grasses, and, as I have said already, of flax; but none of these policies should be put into operation at the expense of the wheat grower. I realize that we cannot hope to have government by delegation; I would not urge upon this house that because four hundred farmers from my own province came here and submitted their views as to the agricultural policy that should be pursued this year, that in itself should be sufficient to cause this government to follow the recommendations made by this delegation. I do feel, however, that when we examine the situation as it now exists; when we find that the policy advocated by that delegation is completely in conformity with our war needs and possible future needs, then, because it is right, proper, fair and equitable, we should give effect to that submission in its entirety. I turn particularly to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has direction over the framing of the wheat policy of this government. I address the Minister of Agriculture who, with his great experience in the production of foodstuffs, must be a close adviser of the government in connection with the adoption of any wheat policy. I hope also that my words may reach the ears of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), because I realize that in any policy affecting any part of our national life, the Minister of Finance plays an important part.

I believe the two ministers from the west will be fully aware of the necessity of taking into account the matters I have mentioned in drawing up the wheat policy for the coming year. We all know the Minister of Finance has undertaken a task unequalled in our previous history; I am sure he must sometimes consider that there is no ceiling whatever to the amount of money he must raise in order to take care of our war needs. But in all seriousness I do suggest to him that he should not forget what the Prime Minister has already told us, that the war effort of Canada will not be restricted by financial limitations but only by the physical capacity of this country to produce. If ever there was a time when that statement should be kept in mind, it is the present. That statement should be applied in all its vigour in regard to the production of foodstuffs in this country. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that posterity will forgive him, I am sure, if we should produce a surplus of foodstuffs and find ourselves left with that surplus on our hands; but I doubt whether posterity or the members of this house or the minister himself would forgive him if in the near future we should find ourselves and our allies faced with a serious shortage of the very staff of life itself.

It is for these reasons that I urge upon the government consideration of the new conditions with which we are faced in this world struggle; the awful potentialities that present themselves and the part Canada must play, particularly in connection with the production of foodstuffs and materials of war, in close harmony and cooperation with our great neighbour to the south. I leave this with the government in the hope that appreciation of the situation now facing us, together with the need for a new survey and appraisal of the position of Canada in connection with supplying foodstuffs, will have its effect in the policy that will be announced for this year.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I had decided that I would not take up any of the time of the house by participating in this debate. However, having been exposed to what might be called the infection of intermittent fever, generated by the very heated debates that have been carried on as to conscription versus the plebiscite, my powers of resistance weakened and I fell for a slight attack of the contagion. The few remarks I shall make will reflect the symptons of that mild seizure.

Before directing my attention to the subject matter of the debate I wish to associate myself with the eloquent and complimentary tributes paid the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Sound in substance, logical, factual, devoid of partisan colouring, they were veritable masterpieces, reflecting credit alike upon the hon. members who delivered them and the constituencies they represent.

Of all the items dealt with in the speech from the throne, the one which most agitated the minds of the public, the press and hon. members, was the plebiscite. Were I to presume to give a dictionary definition of the term "plebiscite", as applied generally, I would provoke the scorn of every hon. member, because I realize full well each hon. member is capable of giving that definition himself. But concerning the word plebiscite as applied in this specific instance there seems to be some difference of meaning. One would understand from some hon. members that the plebiscite as applied in this instance is a harmful thing, and that some ulterior purposes have been concealed. I fail to see why those hon. members should take that stand. My own view is that it is the most honourable, courageous and democratic means our leader could take to ask the electorate to release him from commitments made not only by himself but, with very few exceptions, by almost every other hon. member in the house.

Those who have spoken in opposition to the plebiscite have argued that it will delay our war effort. They urge that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should peremptorily bring in a measure of conscription, and they would fain make the house and public believe that that is the only manoeuvre essential to bringing about an all-out war effort. Canada's organization for this all-out effort was well explained to the house when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) made his very excellent speech here about a week ago. I was interested to learn that Colonel O. M. Biggar, who certainly should be recognized as an authority, agreed entirely with the order of requirements set out by the minister.

Those requirements were set out in five classes. The first was to ensure enough service and enough supplies to maintain the physical and mental health of our population. The second was to provide troops to protect Canada from invasion. The third was to build as many ships and manufacture as much war equipment as our materials and facilities permit. The fourth was to send across the seas as much food and war equipment as would be required to supply the needs of our home forces, part of the British forces and part of the civilian population. The fifth, and last, was to send overseas, out of Canada, troops who would be prepared to meet and to defeat the enemy wherever found.

As Colonel Biggar pointed out, compulsory overseas service was relevant to the attainment of only one of these requirements, namely that of providing troops for overseas service. It was indicated, in fact, only for a part of one of the requirements, because, as is known, there is no lack of recruiting in our naval and air forces. All hon. members know that only a small fraction of our overseas forces have contacted the enemy. We know, too, that if troops are recruited in Canada for Canada's protection those troops can be trained here, and if the time comes when there is a change of circumstances in the process of the war, their responsibility can be altered by the voice of the Canadian people.

We must bear in mind that man-power and woman-power in Canada is limited. Nobody knows to-day how far that power can be extended, any more than do we know which of these five requirements will be the most essential. Compulsory service for overseas is applied to only one of those requirements, and that only in a limited degree. Only a small fraction of the troops mustered to-day have been utilized. In my view the delay now obtaining is a proper one; it permits the people to concentrate on the question whether or not it is proper to extend the full power to our government. For that hesitation and concentration the government is taking full responsibility.

Listening to the speeches of some hon. members opposite, and reading some press comments, one might be led to believe that the government's war effort was away below what it should be. If I may be permitted for a few moments I should like to turn over a few pages of the history of this war, and hurriedly give a brief synopsis of what the government has already done.

First of all, in this fiscal year Canada is spending more than she spent during the whole of the duration of the last war. In other words 40 per cent of our national income is being spent to-day in the war effort. Or, if we may put it in another way, we are spending at the rate of $4,000,000 a day. Five times as many people in Canada are paying to-day five times as much taxes, through all means of taxation. Men and women with incomes of from $3,000 to $10,000 are paying taxes increased from 4 per cent to 11 per cent. Then, 130,000 of our young men have been taught in the art of war and, since the beginning of the war, 750,000 men have been employed in connection therewith.

The British commonwealth air training plan in three years of operation has cost Canada an amount equivalent to the whole of Canada's taxation in one fiscal year. Fifteen times as many men are employed to-day in shipbuilding as were employed before the war, and thirty-five times as many are employed in aircraft work. The total production of explosives this year in Canada will be greater than the total production during the last war. Canadian-made army vehicles are serving in every arena of war where British empire troops are participating. To-day Canada is paying more per capita to provide foodstuffs for the British empire than the British government itself is paying for the same purpose. Canada's navy has increased from 15 ships at the beginning of the war to 350 at the present time. We have an army of 265,000; our air force numbers 100,000, and we have 150,000 men serving overseas. Some of our ships are separated by 10,000 miles. They have been engaged not only in protecting our shores but in convoy duty. They have convoyed 7,000 ships overseas, carrying a total of 43,000,000 tons of cargo. The Canadian active force comprises 393,000 men, almost half of whom are serving throughout the British empire, some in England, some in the British West Indies, some in Newfoundland, and some in Gibraltar. The air training plan now has 92 schools. Canada has built about 200,000 automotive vehicles, an average of one every three minutes. Up to date there have been manufactured in this country 9,000,000 shells, 10,000,000 cases and 150,000,000 pounds of explosives. Canada is producing every type of gun, armament or equipment used to-day in modern war.

This is a synopsis of Canada's achievement since the war began. But it may not be immune to criticism. It may be said that we were slow in building tanks and ships, but anyone who realizes the transpositions that were necessary to convert this country from a peaceful nation into a belligerent country will be ready to credit Canada with a wonderful achievement. Canada has a comparatively small population. Our recruiting has been satisfactory and we have a waiting list for the navy and air force. Only a small portion of our forces has been utilized, but the danger to our own shores is becoming more menacing and imminent.

I fail to see why this matter of conscription should be considered so essential to our having a balanced all-out war effort. This bogy of conscription is being urged by the press and by other people. Sometimes I am inclined to think that people who urge conscription are more concerned with bringing about disunion in this country than they are in effecting a more unified effort. God forbid that this will result in an advantage to our financial barons of Baronfield.

I consider that our leader and his government are doing a good job. They are doing first things first. They have laid particular stress upon those things which have the greatest significance. So far they have been allowed to pursue their war effort one hundred per cent, but with the passage of time it may be necessary to have their power extended. They are asking the people in an honourable, courageous and democratic way to relieve them from the restrictions of their commitments so that when the time comes they will have a free hand to act.

I should like to make a suggestion to the government. If and when the time comes that the need for conscription is indicated, if we are to maintain the balanced effort that has been achieved so successfully up to the present time regard must be given to the producers of foodstuffs. The production of foodstuffs is one of the most essential requirements of this war. These men should be afforded all possible advantages; they should be given every facility and provided with every stimulus necessary to enable them to produce the surplus which is needed for the successful prosecution of this war. I think this government should see to it that there is no disproportion between the prices that the farmer receives for his products and what he must pay for his domestic wants and implements of production.

When the government is considering the conscripting of man-power it should be careful not to bring about a condition which will have an unbalancing effect upon our war effort. I should like to cite one case. I have a number of fishermen and farmers in my constituency who operate on a small scale. The man I have in mind was most provident. He had one son and he operated a small fishing industry. But he is now past his age of labour and his son is in the army. He has a boat and the necessary equipment to do a small amount of fishing, and now that the fishing season is coming on he has tried to have his son released from the army, but he has not been successful. This is only one of a number of cases in my constituency. This man cannot operate without the assistance of his son, and his operations are not large enough to warrant his hiring another man. Here is a man who should be a producer, but if his son is not released from the army he will probably be on relief. When this matter of conscription comes up for consideration I ask the government to see that the producers' man-power is not reduced to such a degree that they will not be able to produce the required surplus as well as their own domestic needs.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why do they not do it under the present act?

Mr. McGARRY: I could not tell you that. I was interested in hearing what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Macdonald) had to say the other day about the necessity of the government being vigilant in preparing facilities for ship repairs. In the light of what is happening off the Pacific coast it looks as though the day may come when the facilities he has in mind will be in great demand. In the historic town of Louisburg in my constituency there is a wonderful site for a dry dock. Nature herself laid out the site and has done most of the construction. Experts in the Department of Naval Services and the Department of Transport have visited that site, admired it, and reported back to the government. I do not know what has happened since, but in view of what is happening in the Pacific I would urge the government to look carefully into the possibility of constructing a ship repair plant at that site because there are strong indications that such a plant may be required on the Atlantic coast.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to say just one word more with regard to Canada's achievements in this war. I do not think this has been mentioned by any other speaker, and I shall take only a few minutes.

At the beginning of the war the government did not lose sight of the fact that some planning should be done for the day when the war is over. Some people disagree with that view. They say that we should not consider postwar problems when we are in the midst of the conflict. I do not agree with this opinion. I agree, of course, that it should be the thought and purpose of every Canadian to prosecute this war vigorously to the very best of our ability. Nevertheless I think it is our duty to give consideration to and do some planning for the day when our soldiers come back to their civilian employment and when the work of manufacturing implements of destruction ceases—the day also when prices of commodities, which in wartime are bound to reach a higher level, recede once more to the economic levels of peacetime. I think some planning should be done to meet these events. The wartime prices and trade board has prevented the profiteering and hoarding which obtained in the last war when we witnessed the disgraceful spectacle of individuals and corporations waxing fat on the sacrifices of the men who stood in arms against the foe. The ceiling which the board and the government have imposed upon commodity prices is a guard against inflation, and I think it will protect us in a great measure at least from a depression such as followed after the last war, and which brought suffering and privation almost equal to the horrors of war itself.

While in a democracy we have the right to engage in controversy and argue whether a certain way is right or wrong, our united purpose should now be to consider first our national responsibilities and to protect our democratic rights which are being attacked by the enemy who would, if possible, take them away from us. This is no time for bickering or carping criticism. Constructive criticism is helpful to the government and we should welcome it. While we may have our controversies and arguments as to the right or wrong way of doing things, we should never forget that this is no ordinary war between nation and nation but a conflict between ideologies. On the one side we have democracy, which gives us all the rights and privileges that make life worth living. On the other side we have the totalitarian tyrants who would take away from us those rights and privileges, and who seek to destroy everything that is spiritual in man. That is the crisis we are facing and we might as well face it, realizing that we are witnessing the greatest tragedy of carnage which this world has ever seen. The ghost of that carnage is almost at our very doorstep. This is a time for us to coordinate our national efforts. Let us preserve our unity and go forward with a united purpose and the single determination to win. If we do that, and if every Canadian will do his duty, we shall overthrow these tyrants who have gone absolutely mad in their desire for world domination.

I shall vote for the plebiscite. My constituency will give an affirmative answer. I trust my leader. He will not abuse the power he asks for. The people of my constituency have faith in his leadership, in war or in peace.

Mr. D. A. McNIVEN (Regina City): Long before this, Mr. Acting Speaker, you will have concluded that every subject that can properly be debated on this motion so ably introduced by yourself as the member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), has long since been exhausted by the eloquence and logic of the members who have preceded me. Notwithstanding that, I am going to venture a few remarks at this time, and in case I should omit to do so at a later stage I state now that I intend to support the motion as introduced by yourself and seconded by the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald). I intend to vote against both amendments now before the house, notwithstanding that both of them may have some merit, but because undoubtedly they are a want of confidence motion in this government. Since I am fully persuaded that this government during its term of office has handled efficiently and well every situation that has arisen, I could not under the circumstances support anything that savoured of a vote of want of confidence.

Every candidate for an election, upon the acceptance of a party nomination thereby accepts the party's policy and the declarations of its leader. The policy and the declarations of the Liberal party and the declarations of our leader were well known and widely publicized throughout this country. For that reason, sir, I intend to support the plebiscite and to use every endeavour within my power to bring about a practically unanimous vote in the constituency which I represent—and I mean every section of that constituency. I am supported in the view that such will be the fact, for among the various resolutions that I have recently received was one from the German-Canadian club of our city supporting an all-out Canada war effort. I am further persuaded in that connection because of the declaration of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and various other ministers, that the taking of this plebiscite would not mean a single day or hour of delay in the furthering and development of Canada's war effort.

The Prime Minister and the members of the government are capable men, sincere, honest, straightforward and loyal to both king and country; and they are the ones who, from the responsibility of their positions, are best equipped to know what is needed, what is essential in promoting a balanced, continuous war effort—balanced and continuous to the very end, no matter how long that may be. I am further convinced that the Prime Minister will sponsor and enact any and every measure that is essential to bring about ultimate victory.

In a recent issue of the magazine Liberty there appeared a biographical sketch of the Prime Minister written by Mr. Grattan O'Leary. After reviewing the events of what must be described as a colourful life, the distinguished author comments that the Prime Minister is possessed of something, a trait, a characteristic, subtle and impossible to put into words, but which has had a genuine appeal to hundreds of thousands of people in this country over a long period of years and which his critics have been totally unable to understand or appreciate.

With deference to the distinguished author may I suggest that that subtle something in the Prime Minister's character, which the author found so elusive, was very aptly expressed by Lord Tennyson when he penned these lines:

> Were wisdom in the scorn of consequence.

This couplet expresses a whole political philosophy; it is a chart for personal guidance; and the Prime Minister's adherence to and his courage in the expression of its truth has inspired confidence in him in the minds of the Canadian people and has brought confusion to his critics and those whose standards of political life do not reach the pinnacle which he has achieved.

The publication of the census returns a few weeks ago brought some startling results in so far as we who reside in Saskatchewan are concerned, because by an alleged reduction in population that province will lose four of its representation in this house. The representation is now twenty-one, and with the realignment in Saskatchewan the membership will be reduced to seventeen. Our population in 1931 was 922,000, and for those hon. members who live in eastern Canada, may I say that our constitution provides for a quinquennial census. Because of that provision a census of the prairie provinces was taken in 1936, and in 1936 our population had shown an increase—930,893. But by June, 1941, our population had been reduced to 887,747, or a loss of approximately 43,000. Conditions following 1936, notwithstanding the catastrophe of 1937, improved from year to year. They were better in 1938; they were better again in 1939; and they showed a substantial improvement in 1940. Where and why, then, the loss? What is the answer? There can be only one answer and that is, the exigencies of war. Enlistments from our province approximate 35,000 in all the armed forces. Geography, our own economy, and the necessity of making large shipments of war materials to Britain and the European front precluded the development of war industries in Saskatchewan. But, patriotic to the core, our people have come east where war work was to be had; and I can say, from conversations with eastern industrialists, that they are glad to have the prairie dweller in their factories because of his resourcefulness and initiative.

I protest most vigorously at any reduction in the membership of this house from the province of Saskatchewan, particularly at this time, and owing to the causes which I have already indicated. Prior to 1930 Saskatchewan was the third province in the dominion, and for the following five or six years that province experienced every kind of agricultural disaster that was ever conceived by the mind of man. Saskatchewan, however, is emerging from the effects and consequences of that disaster. While it is true that in that period the accumulated savings of bygone years have been swept away, two things stand out like a neon light in a black-out, that the fertility of our soil is unimpaired, and that the courage and spirit of our people remain unbroken. Our people look forward with confidence, faith and hope to the day when Saskatchewan will again occupy the proud position she once occupied in the galaxy of Canadian provinces. Saskatchewan will play a prominent part in the settlement of post-war problems; our wide open spaces, our resources, offer ample scope and opportunity for the industry of many millions. I appeal to hon. members, with their genius, their initiative, to find some means of avoiding the infliction of this penalty to which I have referred, upon a patriotic people at this time. What has been done before can be done again. In 1915, on the petition of this parliament, the British parliament amended the British North America Act in these terms:

51A. Notwithstanding anything in this act a province shall always be entitled to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of senators representing such province.

I am not familiar with all the reasons which occasioned that amendment, but I would point out that it was made in war time and it had the effect of stabilizing the membership of this house in so far as certain provinces are concerned. I will not develop the point further at this time except to urge that, if our constitution as it stands at present makes imperative an adjustment or realignment of the membership of this house, we immediately initiate proceedings to amend our constitution so that we can postpone this until after the war when conditions have again become settled, and that the membership of this house remain as it now is.

By that same amendment the senatorial representation of Canada was fixed. Canada was divided into four divisions, the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario and the west, each with a senatorial representation of twenty-four. I am not going to suggest that the senatorial representation of any area should be cut down, but I do say that the prairie provinces and British Columbia now have a population of nearly 3,300,000, almost equal to that of Ontario, and three times as great as that of the maritime provinces. Notwithstanding this, there has been no demand from the west for increased senatorial representation; that is due to our characteristic modesty. But I can say, sir, that the demand will become vocal and more and more insistent should this reduction of membership be forced upon us at this time. I think all will agree that that august body would be invigorated by the infusion of a little prairie vim, a little more prairie vigour, versatility and resourcefulness.

I would repeat now a statement which I made in the presence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) at Regina; there are far too many people in Ottawa occupying reponsible positions who think that nothing good can be done outside this city. While this statement has particular reference to the Minister of Finance, it is not a criticism of one for whom I have a very high regard, and who has steadily grown in the estimation of the people of this country. But, sir, a constant appeal is being made for the purchase of war savings certificates and stamps. The individual who purchases these certificates must send to Ottawa and submit to weeks of delay before his certificate comes along. Why should these certificates not be sold in our banks and post offices, under such limitations as you will, so that the purchaser may have immediate concrete evidence of his patriotic impulse? Shortly afterwards, I heard over the radio an announcement by the United States authorities that war savings certificates could be purchased from the banks, from the post offices, and even from the letter carriers as they go from door to door. I therefore suggest that a similar practice be adopted in this country to encourage the sale of war savings certificates.

When the price ceiling was introduced, licences were required, and over 300,000 licences were issued to wholesalers and retailers. They were all issued from Ottawa. The regional directors sat idly in their offices, impotent, unable to give information to the merchants who besieged them for it. When the army called for women recruits, it was announced in the press that applications would be received at military district headquarters. Later that was cancelled, and then it was to be at national registration headquarters. That was cancelled, and every woman in this country who desired to enlist in the army was required to send her application to Ottawa.

These are just a few examples of what I mean by centralization of everything in Ottawa. I do not blame the ministers; they cannot know everything that goes on. But these are examples of the conduct, the intention and the desire of bureaucrats in responsible positions to extend their authority and expand their position, irrespective of the inconvenience caused to the general public. Washington is rapidly becoming the nerve centre of the war, and almost every day we hear announced in the press that non-war departments and those having to do with civilian life are being moved to New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other centres in the United States. May I suggest to the government that a similar practice be followed here, that civilian departments be moved out from Ottawa to centres in other parts of Canada. This would obviate the necessity for continued temporary office construction in the capital and at the same time greatly relieve the Ottawa housing situation.

I mentioned a moment ago that certain facts, our geography, our economy and the necessities of war, had precluded our participation in the war industries up to the present time. However, the outbreak of war in the Pacific and the presence of U-boats on the Atlantic, in American waters, have substantially changed this picture. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is efficiently energetic and is surrounded by capable men who doubtless have a full appreciation of this problem. They will have realized that of all Canada, the prairies are least vulnerable; and that of the prairies, Saskatchewan is in a favoured position in this regard. Our anxiety over the Pacific coast extends to the industries that have been established there, and immediately suggests that any additions or extensions or new industries should be established where they will be safe from possible attack; and that place, I submit, is on the prairies. In adopting such a policy we would be following what has been done in the United States, where already they have established many of their key industries in the middle west, in that part of their territory which corresponds to the province of Saskatchewan. The westward flow of materials made necesssary by the outbreak of war in the Pacific again suggests the necessity and advisability of establishing industries on the prairies.

I make this suggestion, not from a monetary point of view, but from the innate desire of our people to have a larger place in the war picture and to use their experience, energy, inclination and training in order that they may be of assistance at this time. Just here I want to thank the Minister of Munitions and Supply for establishing Regina Industries for the manufacture of gun carriages for anti-tank guns. That plant is not yet in production, but I fully understand why that is so. They advertised for labour and received over five hundred applications from men on the prairies who had machine-shop experience. Many of them, it is true, were rusty, but they soon acquired skill and speed. Industry in the east has drawn heavily upon our population, but I submit that as a principle it is still preferable to move industry to labour rather than to take labour to industry.

The big industrialist who has been favoured with large war contracts has not farmed out the manufacture of component parts as he was expected and instructed to do. As a result, there is still a wealth of equipment and skill in the prairie regions which have not been used. A similar condition obtains in the United States, and only recently I heard over the radio that the small munition plants and small machine-shops were making a united, vigorous protest to the United States congress, urging that the policy of centralizing industry had brought them to the point of bankruptcy and was militating against the American war effort. Industrial development in Canada has reached astronomical proportions, running into billions of dollars. Notwithstanding that, I fear hon. members will doubt my word when I say that the only contracts awarded in the province of Saskatchewan have been as follows: John East, of Saskatoon, $65,000, being a sub-contract from Manitoba Bridge; Richardson Road Machinery, $150,000 for trailers; Northwest Iron Works, $70,000 for steel rollers; Northwest Iron Works, $4,800, being a sub-contract from the Ogden Shops, Calgary; and G. and G. of Prince Albert, who have had a few small contracts from Canada Car and Foundry at Fort William. I do not include in this list Regina Industries, but I do say that full use is not being made of the inclination, the training, the ability and the resources of our province.

About two weeks ago parliament played host to a representative group of Saskatchewan citizens who made a submission to the government with regard to agriculture. It was one of the largest delegations to visit Ottawa in recent years. The presentation was carefully prepared, logically arranged, and cogently presented. It was an unfolding of the democratic system; and in this time of stress and strain it is good to know that there are still countries where the people can approach their government without personal danger. The representations of this delegation were courteously received by the government, and from conversations I had with delegates I would judge that they departed for their homes with a new conception of the many problems confronting a government in a rapidly changing world. This is characteristic of that sweet sense of reasonableness which always actuates the western mind.

Prairie dwellers know that western wheat is the best food product in the world. They know, too, that the time will come when that food product will be needed by our allies, as it will be needed in the post-war period. We know the important part played by wheat in the last war. Sir George Paish, the eminent British economist, told a number of us here in 1938 that if it had not been for the productivity of the western plains and the ability of the British navy to transport our wheat to England, that country would have been starved into submission in 1916 and again in 1917. Wheat was the only commodity that was commandeered in the last war. The United States farmer received from $1 to $1.50 a bushel more for his wheat than the western agriculturist received, but the prairie farmer smilingly accepted that reduction in price as his opportunity to render national service. Wheat is temporarily a drug on the market, and that being so, the farmer does not ask for that parity of price which is enjoyed by Canadian labour and industry. He asks merely for a price that will enable him to continue as a productive unit until such time as his commodity is again in universal demand. Such a plea, presented on national grounds and from patriotic motives, must not remain unanswered, and I am sure the Canadian people generally will approve the granting of the request presented by this delegation.

Ours is a peculiar situation. We are still subject to recurring periods of drought over wide areas. Every farmer, every farm, is a national asset. He produces what is required to maintain the body and fertilize the mind, and for that reason must be maintained as a national resource.

For this reason, sir, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has become the magna charta of western agriculture, serving and fulfilling a long-felt want. The loss of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act would create consternation and dismay on the prairie farm. Of all the innovations and policies developed by the dynamic Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to stabilize agriculture, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act still holds the spotlight as accomplishing the greatest good for the greatest number.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is something for which Mr. Bennett can take credit.

Mr. McNIVEN: The Prairie Farm Assistance Act was passed in 1939. I know the hon. member would not wish Mr. Bennett to receive any credit for something entirely due to the Minister of Agriculture.

[Mr. McNiven.]

The government is to be commended for the construction of the chain of airports between Edmonton and Alaska. The purpose is obvious, and that purpose was confirmed by what happened on December 7. Supplies will be needed in the far north, and the integrated purpose of the Canadian and United States governments make imperative the immediate construction of a highway connecting the centres of production in the middle western states with Canada's and America's vulnerable hinterland. That construction is a mammoth undertaking and, in the light of existing events, has become an imperative necessity.

May I suggest to the government that, in the choice of a route, scenic and tourist possibilities be overlooked. This is no tourist expedition, and the ambitions and animosities of local areas should not be considered. The route to be constructed should be the one which is capable of quick, easy, speedy construction, and will demand the smallest part of the taxpayers' dollar. As fulfilling all those specifications, I suggest to the government the prairie route as being best calculated to serve the demand.

As residents of the prairies, we share the anxieties of the people in British Columbia with regard to their Japanese problem. The revelations respecting Pearl Harbour have justified that anxiety, an anxiety which I may say to you, sir, is most real, and not imaginary.

I would urge the government that it ought not to hesitate to remove the Japanese from points of danger in British Columbia, and, if necessary, a safe place can and will be found for them on the prairies. Consequences of delay are hard to visualize. I can best repeat the words used on one occasion by Mr. Churchill—"There is not a week, nor a day nor an hour to be lost."

A cloud no bigger than a man's hand has recently appeared on the political horizon, a cloud reminiscent of the most sinister political alliance that ever darkened the pages of Canadian history. The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) scented its presence the other afternoon, and with his keen analytical mind depicted some of its possibilities. In 1911, in Quebec the Nationalist cry was anti-imperialism, and in Ontario the Tory slogan was, "No truck or trade with the Yankees." Following 1911, these antagonistic doctrines found common ground. Messrs. Bourassa and LaVergne refused appointment in Sir Robert Borden's cabinet. They were allowed to select and they chose Pelletier, Nantel and Blondin, all Nationalists, and later, in 1916, Mr. Albert Sevigny, an outstanding Nationalist, was named Speaker of the house.

In September, 1914, after the outbreak of the last war, Mr. Bourassa said in his paper, Le Devoir, that it was——Canada's national duty to contribute according to her resources, and by fitting means of action to the triumph and especially to the endurance of the combined efforts of France and England. I have not written and will not write one line, one word to condemn the sending of Canadian troops to Europe.

Estimable, indeed! His conversion, however, was short-lived, for from 1915 on, both in the press and on the platform we find him in unmeasured terms condemning Canada's participation in any of Britain's wars. His shafts of criticism were levelled at Sir Wilfrid, and reached their climax in September, 1916, when he declared:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier is the most nefarious man in the province of Quebec, yes, in the whole of Canada.

On Wednesday last this same Mr. Bourassa emerged from retirement, rose from a sickbed, and with something of his old time vigour, combined in a single address both the arguments which in 1911 were used to undermine Sir Wilfrid in Ontario, and again in Quebec. What did Bourassa say on this occasion? As reported in a boxed position on the centre of the front page of the Montreal Gazette, he said:

Canada will be annexed by the United States within ten years.

The present policy of the Canadian government is not dictated by London, but by Washington.

Borden and Meighen were both more honest than the present government leaders.

Mr. MacNICOL: Hear, hear.

Mr. McNIVEN: "Hear, hear", someone says. He is just a little too early; I shall deal with that later.

Living in the past, this crafty old campaigner made a double-barrelled appeal to the anti-imperialists of Quebec, and to the British whose roots are deep in British traditions, by sowing seeds of distrust of our American neighbour. He likewise endeavoured to undermine the confidence of the Canadian people in the honesty of members of the administration, and his thought in that direction was similar to the invective he employed against Sir Wilfrid in 1916.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, why was such prominence given to these thoughts in the Montreal Gazette? Did that newspaper have an objective similar to that which brought Bourassa out into the limelight once again? In its editorial page, on the following day, it is true that they acclaimed those portions in which he tendered sage advice to some of his compatriots. But it is equally true that they registered only mild disagreement with the more insidious part of the address.

Commenting on the same speech, the Globe and Mail said editorially:

What will cause special anguish at Ottawa was the declaration of his belief that Sir Robert Borden and Arthur Meighen were more honest in their attitudes than our present ministers.

I wonder what standard Bourassa had in mind when he used that language? I wonder what was passing through the mind of the editor of the Globe and Mail when he quoted it with such gleeful approval? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, was it the War-time Elections Act of 1917? On the other hand, was it the famous Hamilton speech, or was it the speech delivered by the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen in the Quebec by-election in 1926? Perchance was it the famous "last gasp" speech delivered by the right hon. gentleman on January 27, 1942? Or possibly it was that amazing contradiction of past performances and past utterances delivered by the right hon. gentleman on February 3, 1942. Mr. Speaker, I leave the answer and the comparison of standards to you and to other members of this house. Again I ask you: What is the purpose and objective of this mentality which has in the past created so much trouble for this government and indirectly hindered the war effort?

I shall call another witness who has been motivated by similar ideas. Premier Hepburn must have known or should have known that his declarations against the United States navy would cause anxiety and distrust in the minds of Canadians with regard to our great ally and would create antagonisms on the other side of the line. The Winnipeg Free Press, commenting upon his action in that connection, made the following statement:

The harm done by Mr. Hepburn will outlive and outlast any amends offered by Canada.

On page 2 of the Montreal Gazette of this morning I find the following in "Lights and Shadows" by L. S. B. Shapiro:

Mr. Hepburn's feat: It would be nice if Mr. Hepburn's bright little escapade of last week could be laughed off and dismissed merely as part of the price we have to pay for having an aggressive prankster in a responsible position. In trying to be as lively as possible on all occasions, Mr. Hepburn has provided the dominion with a few guffaws and not a few headaches, the most violent of which is his current criticism of the United States navy.

I fear, however, that this one is not to be laughed off so easily. A lot of people I know in New York and Washington are laughing very bitterly and they show no sign of stopping.

And again:

More important than these examples of ruffled feeling is the comment of Fletcher Pratt, the noted American military expert. Mr. Pratt observes the U.S. navy has not attacked the main Japanese fleet for precisely the same reason that the Canadian army in Britain has not attacked the Germans who are only fifty miles distant from some of the Canadian encampments.

Thus we begin to find ourselves in a battle of recrimination over our beautiful, undefended border while we are still losing the war to the axis. A Hitler agent couldn't have done as well in a year of trying.

I mentioned a moment ago that a cloud no bigger than a man's hand had appeared on the political horizon. Knowing that the friendly relations between Canada and the United States is primarily the accomplishment of the Prime Minister, as was abundantly attested to last evening by the President of the United States, I ask you, Mr. Speaker: Are the critics of the Prime Minister developing a new line of attack regardless of its effect upon our war effort and our friendly relations with our greatest ally, the United States? I cannot believe that the retention of the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen as leader, the reappearance of Bourassa in the limelight and Hepburn's recent outbursts are mere coincidence. Rather would I believe that the opponents of this government, having failed to stampede the people on the plebiscite and conscription issues, are now trying the old game of 1911 by bringing about the unity of the Nationalist group in Quebec and the narrow-minded persons who always look askance at the United States because of the fact that a close association with that country might infringe upon the monopolies which they enjoy. Truly it is a strange alliance—the imperialistic Mr. Meighen—the anti-war Mr. Bourassa!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What nonsense!

Mr. McNIVEN: Not quite so nonsensical as the house leader of the Conservatives seems to think.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the hon. member reading a quotation or what?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is just innuendo.

Mr. McNIVEN: We have heard Bourassa praise Mr. Meighen. What has Mr. Meighen to say about Mr. Bourassa and his summary of United States designs upon this country? Do Mr. Meighen and the Conservative party expect Bourassa's support, and with it the Nationalist party of Quebec, whose campaign has been entirely anti-war, as it was in 1911? I find it hard to believe in this grave hour, accentuated as it was yesterday afternoon by Mr. Churchill in the most sombre tones, that the great Conservative party will countenance such a move. Unless, however, Mr. Meighen denounces it, dissociates his party from the statements that have been made by Mr. Bourassa and condemns his latest friend and ally, Premier Hepburn, for his recent utterances reflecting upon the navy of the United States, I for one feel justified in concluding that the group of men who are using the Meighen-Hepburn-Drew combination as a means to power will go to any length. I am quite certain that the house leader of the Conservative party will be glad to use the earliest opportunity to make such an avowal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member is simply putting up a straw-man to knock down.

Mr. McNIVEN: I see that my time is up, so I will conclude with the statement that such a declaration from the present leader of the Conservative party is now overdue.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say at the very outset of my speech that if Canada is not one hundred per cent in the war to-day, it is the duty of this parliament to remove impediments and close the gaps immediately, for in the words of Prime Minister Churchill there is not a week nor a day nor an hour to be lost. If we hesitate, if we delay, if we try to conserve our resources, and if likewise our allies should employ less than their maximum in this struggle, who is to say that we shall not be driven out of the Orient, out of Africa, yea, even out of Europe? Contemplating now such a situation, is it not imperative for our survival that we throw the entire strength of the nation immediately into this struggle? In war there is no second heat, no return game, no second chance.

The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), speaking in this debate on February 12, referred to the speech from the throne in 1936 in which was forecast a bill to create parliamentary secretaryships. I have pressed for this enlarged representation and participation by members on so many occasions in this parliament and elsewhere that I do not propose at this time to repeat what I have said. But the reference calls to mind the statement that I made in the auditorium of the city hall in Guelph when I was a candidate in the 1925 election. I was advocating the return of the Liberal government on a platform of which one plank was senate reform. During the course of preparing my speech to-day I was seeking for confirmation of that plank, and I found it in Hansard of January 12, 1926, at page 105, in a speech delivered by Mr. C. W. Bell, then member for Hamilton West. Mr. Bell referred to a speech that had been made by the then Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in a hockey arena in London, Ontario, on October 16, 1925, during the election campaign. The words of the Prime Minister, as quoted by Mr. Bell, were as follows:

> Only a few days ago a number of senators were appointed. Every one has given me his pledged word he will be prepared, once a measure passes the Commons, to give it his support. Subsequent senators will be appointed with that understanding, and as Providence takes away a few of the older members, you will have a Senate pledged to bring about the reforms for which the administration stands.

I have the utmost confidence that this is a matter which will be receiving the attention of the Prime Minister in due time.

I sometimes wonder whether it is an evidence of strength or of weakness in our cabinet make-up that we do not have family rows and resignations. Shake-ups are common in the British cabinet. I sometimes wonder whether we are not too hesitant about creating occasions for by-elections. Who will say that the recent by-elections were not without profit right across Canada in bringing all the diversified factors of our war effort into the open for discussion and decision? Boldness of policy in this respect should strengthen any government. Our democracy will be more secure as we trust the people more. Therefore I would suggest to the Prime Minister, as a humble supporter of his, that the undoubted confidence in which he is presently held by the electors will be heightened if he will more often furnish occasions on which the electors can pass judgment on the record of his government.

There is opportunity now for the rejuvenation of the cabinet, with so many senate vacancies inviting it. Whose move is it? Don't too many speak at once—make it easy for the Prime Minister. Seriously, however, these days call for forceful and resourceful men, the type that, unflinching before Hitler and his gang, would spring at them and smash them a black-out.

The two great instruments for moulding public opinion and maintaining and uplifting the morale of the nation in this time of stress and during occasional dark days of near panic are the press and the radio. Canada has been blessed over the years in having finely conducted newspapers. Readers have been able to place reliance on the news reports of events, local, national and world-wide. But one wonders sometimes whether the merging of ownerships for exclusiveness of newspaper field has not given rise to some catering to interests and the use of the newspaper columns to promote interests and to promote the views of powerful and influential groups.

More explicitly what I have in mind is the colouring of news, over-emphasizing certain features and suppressing or merging other features, depending upon some possible objective to be attained. Perhaps I should give some instances of what I have in mind.

Take (1) the speech by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser). One paper refers to his speech as a burlesque, accompanied by prolonged applause and desk-thumping. As a matter of fact, the desk-thumping coincided with a statement which was not mentioned at all in the editorial, namely, that some persons would conscript youth to fight for their dollars.

(2) A most capable member, of undoubted sincerity, in his speech dealt with a tendency of some papers to belittle members of parliament. His was a considered and reasoned argument. One paper has an isolated comment, quoting only the following of his words: "We may be a mediocre lot. God help us, I know we are."

(3) Two morning newspapers reporting the speeches in parliament of the preceding day, used the following front page headlines respectively: (a) "More Liberals from Quebec tell Commons they oppose conscription for overseas"; (b) "Five Quebec members back plebiscite plan—three others express opposition in Commons debate."

It is to be regretted if there is any trend towards colouring the news in Canada, even in isolated places; and should the colouring of news be employed to the extent of possibly undermining the nation during war time, it ought to become a matter for government attention, looking, for instance, to an amendment to the libel section of the criminal code. Not being a lawyer, I would not assume any competence to pass on legal questions, but as a layman I simply suggest that persistent colouring of news in a way that is detrimental to the morale of the nation in time of war ought not to be permitted regardless of the long-accepted principle of the freedom of the press. Defamatory libel is defined in section 317 of the criminal code in these words:

> A defamatory libel is matter published, without legal justification or excuse, likely to injure the reputation of any person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule, or designed to insult the person of or concerning whom it is published.

Provided that the scope of this definition could be and were enlarged to include the national safety, then the colouring of the reports of the proceedings of parliament would be an offence under section 322 of the criminal code which reads:

No one commits an offence by publishing in good faith, for the information of the public, a fair report of the proceedings of the Senate or House of Commons, or any committee thereof, or of any council or assembly aforesaid, or any committee thereof, or of the public proceedings, preliminary or final, heard before any court exercising judicial authority, nor by publishing, in good faith, any fair comment upon any such proceedings.

I would wish this allusion to the press to be regarded as of a more or less hypothetical nature and most certainly as in no way critical of those men and women who are in the press gallery of parliament, but nevertheless as a warning to their editors that theirs is the high mission of maintaining and upbuilding the morale of the nation during the war years.

Mr. Speaker, the true implication of certain portions of the speech of the hon. member for Northumberland, as reported at page 331 of Hansard were not grasped, or were ignored in some press reports. I wish to quote one paragraph of this speech; but before doing so, let me explain, for any one who may not know, the meaning or significance of two of the terms he used. "Who's Who" contains a list of directors, industrialists and financiers in Canada, showing the company or companies with which each is associated; and where he used the word "empire" he referred to investments or dollars, if you will. He said:

Let me go further and say to them, that if I owned an empire such as "Who's Who" says they own, I would want to conscript everybody in Canada to defend it. And, Mr. Speaker, if I had their mentality not only would I wish to conscript—insist upon conscripting—every man in Canada to defend that empire, but I would go farther and spend every dollar I could to create in this country in the minds of the people a situation which would delude and deceive them into conscripting people to defend my empire.

My purpose in referring to the speech of the hon. member for Northumberland is to lay the groundwork for my wholehearted support of any sound proposal for higher pay for the men who go forth to risk their lives for us all. Such a proposal was so splendidly set out in a speech by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), as reported in Hansard at page 387, that I cannot do better than quote what he said:

Right here I should like to make a suggestion in regard to the armed forces. Many of those who have stayed at home have earned good wages. Some have spent them; others—many—have accumulated savings. I would urge, Mr. Speaker, that a savings fund should be set up for the armed forces. I would urge that every member of our armed forces while serving in Canada, should receive an additional $1 per day, and, while in active service overseas, an additional $2 per day. These savings should not be paid now, but at the end of the war. When the boys return, some will want to complete their education. Many of them will marry. Certainly all of them will find it difficult to get back into civilian life. None of the money would have to be paid now. This would not detract from the war effort. It would be no hardship to continue war-time taxation for a few years after the war. There is another feature about this. The proposed payments would establish a tremendous reservoir of consumer demand for goods at a time when this country will badly need a consumer demand for goods to start its industries going again in peace-time operations, turning over from war-time operations.

We have a study underway. It will be a progressive study of means of assisting men, both of the armed forces and of those who have been diverted to war activities, back to a normal civilian life. Here is the place to apply the suggestion of the hon. member for Parry Sound as to the creation of parliamentary secretaryships. The study is being made under the direction of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), in whose ability we have the utmost confidence, and he is supported by an able committee of civil servant experts. There might, however, be some worth-while advantage in bringing to the assistance of this committee a few of the elected representatives of the people, men who at the next election will have to go back and account to the people for what they have done in the direction of providing for a speedy and decent rehabilitation of our returned men.

To turn next to agriculture, the condition of our great industry of agriculture is one which demands tackling by methods which so far have not been employed. Speaking of Ontario agriculture, I would say that prices being realized to-day are at a fairly reasonable level having regard to what the working man supporting a family can afford to pay. But where is the margin to the farmer to erect a new barn or even to reroof the old barn, or to replace worn-out implements, or to instal modern equipment, or to do the many things that would be profitable to our industries in supplying needed materials? Men are leaving the farms for the one and only reason that it is not possible for them to maintain those farms as their fathers and their grandfathers were able to maintain them, progressively, making farming in reality a way of life. I submit, therefore, that in relation to agriculture we must face the perplexing situation where the working man can hardly afford to pay more and the farmer cannot make ends meet at present prices for the food products of Ontario mixed farming.

Seemingly the experts in economics have not yet arrived at a solution of this problem, unless perhaps they are unwilling to do so. Here, again, I see an opportunity for the application of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Parry Sound as to the creation of parliamentary secretaryships looking to representation in the administration for eastern agriculture. We have a most capable Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), but I think he will admit that the problem of the western wheat surplus, coupled with the destitution of western farmers in drought areas, has made very heavy demands upon his time. I am not informed as to what use is being made of the Ontario Agricultural College at Guelph, the most outstanding college of its kind in the world, towards meeting the economic situation of the eastern agriculturists; but I will say that if the services of the president and staff, who are all trained in agricultural economics, are not being used to the fullest extent possible, they should be.

For the sake of the farmer, some means must be found to make his dollar go further. For the sake of the working man in our factory, the farmer must be put in a position to buy more freely the implements, the equipment and the materials the making of which gives employment in our towns and cities. We ought never to forget the old saying that whenever the farmer prospers, everyone prospers.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), speaking in this debate on January 26, as reported at page 25 of Hansard used these words:

> When the Union army of volunteers was in desperate condition, President Lincoln is reported to have said:
> Voluntarism is the unprincipled dodge of cowardly politicians. It has ground up the choicest seed of the nation. It has consumed the young, the generous, the patriotic, the intelligent, and the brave, and it has wasted the best moral, social, and political elements of the republic, and left the cowards, the shirkers, and the money makers to stay at home and procreate their kind.

A rather extensive search has been made in the library of parliament at Ottawa, in the library of congress at Washington and by noted authorities on Lincoln such as Mr. Grant Dexter of the Winnipeg Free Press and Mr. Dave Elman of the Hobby Lobby programme, Radio City, New York, but without success so far in confirming that these words were used in a speech by Lincoln. Be that as it may, however, I am sure that many of my electors of Wellington South would feel that there is more truth than fiction in these words as applicable to the present war.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), speaking here on February 10, gave a most comprehensive review of Canada's contribution to date in all our fields of service. It is to be hoped that his speech has been read by very many Canadians. It reveals a marvellous undertaking and accomplishment to date by Canada, and gives proof of greater momentum for growing achievement in the future in all spheres of our planned service. Every hon. member has, I am sure, been impressed by the sincerity, strength and determination of our Minister of National Defence. Following a most thorough review of the results of voluntary enlistment, and after urging support of the plebiscite to give the government a free hand for whatever changes may become necessary, the minister said, as reported at page 455 of Hansard:

> I prefer the voluntary method if it works, and I shall do all I can to make it work. At the same time, we cannot know what is ahead and I feel impelled to say—here I can speak only for myself—that if the voluntary system does not meet the needs of the fateful days before us, then I shall feel it my duty as part of my responsibility to advocate the adoption of the other method.

For myself, I wish to subscribe to the view stated and the position taken by the Minister of National Defence. I hold a decided preference for the system of draft followed in the United States, where some of more mature years are called to the service before exhausting entirely the cream of the youth. We are suffering to-day from discouraging methods of recruiting followed during the earlier days of the war. Many fine young men were turned back for reasons which appeared unjustifiable, and having gone to some other war service or to preparation where still higher skill is involved, they are loath to offer themselves again immediately. Some badge of recognition is certainly due to them to lift from them the stigma attaching to slackers. Many such are waiting to be told where they can best serve. Pushing men around is something more easily said than done on a national scale. Something more definite and intensive is required in the way of system in directing them where their duty lies, whether on the farm, in the factory or in some branch of the armed services.

I come now to a phase of the discussion which carries a risk of misunderstanding, but inasmuch as some of my electors have not the opportunity I have of knowing the situation, I feel that I owe it to them to be frank for the good of all Canada. Preliminary to a discussion of our Canadian partnership let me repeat in effect the words of a great Canadian of the present day of French ancestry: "Your attitude towards the war outside of Canada is motivated partly by sentiment whereas our attitude comes more through judgment." While no doubt he is largely correct, I would say that there are strong evidences of a good deal of sentiment for the old land in the French-speaking parts of Canada since the king and queen visited Quebec and the queen spoke to the cheering crowds in French. Yes, I stand for a one hundred per cent participation by Canada in this world struggle. We must trust our government and our high military officials as to methods and progressive development, for they alone can know the secret plans of allied strategy. Decisions cannot be based alone on the view of the member for Wellington South, or the views of the electors of Wellington county, or of the province of Ontario, or of the province of Quebec, or of any other province. Total war requires total harmonization of objective and effort within Canada, plus careful coordination with the plans of the supreme command of the allies. Total war cannot be achieved amidst discord, passive resistance or indifference. War to be efficient can give no place for appeasement, because appeasement lulls, quiets and reduces striking force. I am certain that the electors I have the honour to represent have no use for any policy or attitude of appeasement. I am equally certain that they will approve all reasonable means to bring every province and all persons of whatever race into cooperation for the fullest possible use of Canada's entire resources of wealth, materials, man-power and woman-power. Firm believers in democracy and democractic government are fond of saying, "Trust the people." But in war time when so much relating to military preparations and operations must be kept secret, it is equally true that the people must more than at other times trust the government. For this very reason of secrecy many facts concerning the war programme cannot be made known, even to private members of parliament. We as members have trusted the Prime Minister and his cabinet, and in turn we are grateful that our constituents have trusted us.

I have spoken of the need for cooperation. There cannot and must not be any varying degrees of cooperation by the provinces. Canada must be a unit in this struggle to preserve freedom, liberty and justice as these have been vouchsafed wherever the British flag has flown. This war must be won. Canada must do her full part, and we hope and pray that she will do so with the fullest cooperation of all her people.

[Mr. Gladstone.]

The plebiscite is designed surely to achieve that united effort. Count not the expense if Canadians everywhere, English-speaking and French-speaking alike, will by their votes remove any hindrance to total war. And total war demands total participation of all Canadians, whether in Guelph, Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, Vancouver or elsewhere. There are, I fear, those in Ontario who misjudge Quebec because they do not understand Quebec. They have not the opportunity that members of parliament have of mingling in a social way and in conference on affairs of state with many of the altogether likable, fine and most capable members from that province, whose mother tongue is French but who for the most part speak English almost as fluently as we of Anglo-Saxon ancestry. It would seem appropriate here to quote from the British North America Act, section 133:

> Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec. . . .

The memories of the War-time Elections Act of 1917, and of the methods employed by the Union government in 1917 and 1918 to enforce the Military Service Act still rankle the French-Canadians. Knowing of the unhealed wounds from those days the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe felt compelled to define and limit Quebec's participation when war was declared on Germany in 1939. As recorded on September 9 at page 68 of Hansard of the second session of that year, he said:

> The whole province of Quebec—and I speak with all the responsibility and all the solemnity I can give to my words—will never agree to accept compulsory service or conscription outside Canada. I will go farther than that: when I say the whole province of Quebec, I mean that I personally agree with them. I am authorized by my colleagues in the cabinet from the province of Quebec—the veteran leader of the Senate, my good friend and colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), my friend and fellow townsman and colleague, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power)—to say that we will never agree to conscription and will never be members or supporters of a government that will try to enforce it. Is that clear enough?

A few months later, in March, 1940, a general election was held. I have before me now two important pieces of advertising used in the constituency of Wellington South during that campaign. One was issued in my behalf, as Liberal candidate, while the other was issued in behalf of my opponent, the National Government candidate. Each carries in bold type the words "Without conscription." It is a truism, I believe, that the giving of this pledge by the two national leaders was due entirely to the fact that Canada is a partnership of the two great races. More accurately, perhaps, the pledge was due directly to the ill-feeling engendered by the roughshod methods employed to enforce conscription in Quebec during the last great war. I realize that many electors in Wellington South are of the opinion that the government should not be bound by its "no conscription" pledge at a time when the very existence of freedom is at stake. Other electors hold strongly to the opposite opinion. The cabinet is unanimous that nothing should limit Canada's part in the war, and accordingly they are asking the electors, by means of a plebiscite, to cancel the election pledge of "no conscription" and thereby give them a free hand in whatever direction may become necessary in future to maintain a total war effort. After all, does not total war for Canada resolve itself down to a means of enlisting, not compelling, the cooperation of the two great races of this nation?

I have spoken of the lasting resentment in Quebec against the methods employed to enforce conscription in the last war. I have quoted from the speech of the late Minister of Justice, made at the outbreak of the present war, in which he declared most emphatically, "We will never agree to conscription." To-day we who are in intimate contact with hon. members from Quebec are heartened by evidence of a changed attitude in Quebec. We have growing confidence that if we employ methods acceptable to her people, Quebec will stand shoulder to shoulder with English-speaking Canada for whatever service and wherever Canadians are called in this grim struggle. This changed attitude is reflected in the speech recently made in the house by a French-speaking member, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), who, as reported at page 512 of Hansard said:

> We do recognize that the best way to defeat our enemy is to fight him outside of Canada and to prevent him from reaching our shores. To this end we are prepared to give freely of our lives and to the limit of our man-power and of our meagre means. But we want no more guns and no more bayonets hacking down our youth like wild beasts in our hills and our forests. We have open minds, but the way to convince us is not by making us guzzle it, by ramming conscription down our throats.

I cannot leave this section of my speech, Mr. Speaker, without paying the highest possible tribute to the memory of a great Canadian who is with us no more, the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. The quotation I have read from his speech on the declaration of war ought, in all fairness, not to be read apart from the whole argument of that speech. Knowing the people of his province better than any other person in or out of parliament; knowing the discord that had been aroused by the endeavour to force conscription upon Quebec in 1917 and 1918, he stood adamant against a revival of such circumstances. His very soul spoke in a plea for methods in this war that would line up his compatriots with English-speaking Canada unitedly in this struggle. So I wish to leave with you some other words of this great Canadian, as they appear at page 69 of Hansard for 1939, second session:

> God give Canadians the light which will indicate to them where their duty lies in this hour of trial so that our children and our children's children may inherit a land where freedom and peace shall prevail, where our social, political and religious institutions may be secure and from which the tyrannical doctrines of nazism and communism are forever banished. Yes, God bless Canada. God bless our queen. God bless our king.

I notice that my allotted time in this debate has almost elapsed, but if the house will bear with me for a few minutes I shall mention, without much elaboration, some other relevant factors in this debate on total war.

The word "communism" appears in a quotation I used a few moments ago. That reference, no doubt, has to do with the insidious propaganda that was waged over the world a few years back. All that can be and is forgotten to-day in our acclaim for the marvellous defence of Russian soil against the German war machine. That defence surely demonstrates to the world that Russia was not lying dormant. It is irrefutable evidence of what was taking place within her own borders, scientifically, industrially and in a disciplinary way.

In wars of other days a $20 suit, a $30 gun and a little "forming fours" made a man a soldier. To-day it is entirely different. War to-day requires a man of high intelligence to operate a Bren gun or a 50-ton tank, or to pilot a $100,000 bomber. I ask the armchair critics to contemplate just what modern warfare means in ships, guns, tanks, explosives, bombers, fighters; in training, and in all the organization and facilities for production. I ask them to inform themselves reliably of what Canada has done to date and what we are committed to do in the programme mapped out now for the period ending March, 1943, as to both men and materials. I ask them to remember that all our reverses to date in this war have been due to a shortage of munitions, not to a shortage of man-power. I ask them not to overlook the fact that Canada has been supplying munitions in huge quantities to the British isles, Russia, Africa, and the far east, even to the extent of leaving ourselves short. I ask them to note that there has been an upsurge in recruiting during recent weeks, in excess of our facilities to train men. The winter-fair building at Guelph has had to be reopened during recent weeks as a training centre to accommodate the overflow from the Chatham and Kitchener camps.

This week every person who has means will enter the war in the victory loan campaign. At Guelph the whole strength of my riding is being organized under the able leadership of an outstanding citizen, Mr. W. P. Gamble, and they will by hard work go over the top. Here I would give the highest praise to the Globe and Mail for the tremendous boost it has given the campaign to-day in the striking display occupying the entire front page of its paper. The press is powerful, so powerful that, if so inclined, it can in a week lift the morale of the people one hundred per cent. That would go a long way toward maintaining a one hundred per cent war effort in Canada. Our hearts are saddened when we know that many fine young Canadians already have made the supreme sacrifice. Their places must and will be filled over there, and additional units to Canada's maximum will be sent. We must and will have reinforcements for every emergency. May God guide us and keep us faithful through the dark days, as we struggle on toward victory and the preservation of our right to live as free people.

Mr. D. F. McCUAIG (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, it is almost four weeks since this debate began, and I hesitate to take the time of the house to speak, particularly when I realize that a great deal of important legislation is pending. I have, however, been asked from time to time why there is such delay in taking the vote on the plebiscite. Probably few people realize that it is first necessary to dispose of the motion we are now discussing before the government is in a position to introduce legislation making provision for the vote.

My observations with reference to the plebiscite itself will be very brief. When it was first mentioned there was a great deal of discussion and opposition, but I feel that as the weeks and days pass, that opposition diminishes, and I am sure when the vote comes it will be accepted by a heavy affirmative vote. I know I shall do all in my power toward that end.

I do not believe conscription was mentioned during the last campaign in my constituency. I know I did not mention it, and I believe I can say the same for my opponent. Therefore conscription was not an issue, except as it was made one by the platforms of both parties. Each member is bound by the pledges made by his party, irrespective of whether he raises the question or not.

We are also told that the vote on the plebiscite will cost a large amount of money. It is true that the vote will cost about fifteen cents or twenty cents per person. Will any of those people who have been so provocative in their language respecting the cost of the plebiscite say that it is not worth twenty cents to them to know that a pledge given by a public man, not on a minor but on a major issue involving life itself, will not be broken without first appealing to the people to whom that pledge was given? Anyone who has studied the life of our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will agree with me that he has always been prepared to trust the people. I believe this is a question where we should not be guided in our decision by the request of others; it is a question where our consciences should be our guide. If we permit our consciences to be our guide in respect of this question, I am sure none of us will look back and regret any action he has taken.

The following words from Shakespeare's "Hamlet" are a good guide to all of us in deciding questions of this kind:

> This above all: to thine own self be true,
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man.

The people I represent are satisfied with nothing less than a total effort. I believe there may be some difference of opinion as to how that objective is to be attained. A demand is raised in many parts, particularly in the urban area, that we should have a greater effort, including the conscription of man-power. If we listened to those who volunteer information, and those who tell us what they think we should do, we might consider that that is the predominant opinion. But when we make personal inquiries and investigate for ourselves we find quite often that that feeling is not so intense.

In fact, after making a survey of my constituency, I am doubtful if a vote on conscription, without including the conscription of wealth, would receive a favourable reply. It is interesting to study the response in the various parts of the province with respect to the advertisement carried in the Globe and Mail. This advertisement was carried in five local papers in my constituency of Simcoe North. My estimation is that in my constituency the advertisement in question went into approximately 6,000 homes. Hon. members will probably be surprised to learn that while those 6,000 homes were asked to write their federal member requesting him to do certain things, I received only thirty-four newspaper clippings. In addition, I received about twelve letters, but some of those were opposed to the advertisement, and others agreed with it only if conscription of wealth were included.

I believe it is the duty of every hon. member as best he can to ascertain the wishes of his constituents. But he should also be guided by the information he receives from those charged with the responsibility of carrying on our war effort. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has made it clear that up to the present time we are obtaining by the voluntary system all the men we require. He has added that he prefers the voluntary system, if it works, and that he will do all he can to see that it does work. Although acknowledging the need for men, he emphasized the need for the production of food and weapons of war, as our contribution as one of the members of a team of united nations.

The message that General McNaughton gave to the soldiers at Christmas has already been put on Hansard. In that message he praised the Canadian soldier and stated that new units and formations and reserves would arrive as quickly as ships could be found to bring them. I should like to place upon Hansard an editorial which appeared in the Windsor Daily Star of February 10 as follows:

> If anyone knows what is needed to win this war, it is Lieutenant-General A. G. L. McNaughton, general officer commanding the Canadian corps. The fact that one of his first acts after returning to Canada on furlough was to visit industrial plants turning out military equipment, coupled with his comments on this phase of our war effort, indicate the important place in his mind which armaments occupy. He has borne out what those closely in touch with the war situation have been saying all along. What our men need is equipment and more equipment. He does not suggest, of course, that there is not a need for more men but the machines come first.

There is also the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) with reference to the voluntary system, which appears on page 310 of Hansard:

> I wish to say that neither as a member of the government nor as a member of the war committee of the cabinet, nor otherwise, have I been able to find any evidence that the abandonment of the voluntary system and the substitution of the compulsory system in respect to that part of our war effort represented by overseas army service would help at this moment in our war effort.

It is my opinion that we should be guided by our desire to serve, not only the people in our own ridings but the people of Canada as a whole. We are not being true to our duty if we sponsor legislation which might lead to disunity in this country even though such legislation might meet with the approval of our own people. Lord Tweedsmuir, speaking at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island in September, 1937, and referring to the loyalty of the Scottish people, not only to the land of their adoption but also to the land of their origin, said:

> That is as it should be, for a man can never have too many loyalties. Therefore I want to see in the citizens of Canada strong and continuing love of the district to which they belong, but at the same time a strong and continuing interest in the dominion of which they are a part, the whole Canadian nation.

It is important that we should not become hysterical at a time such as this when we are faced with reverses. Reverses are inevitable in a war which is being fought on many fronts. I should like to quote from an editorial in the Globe and Mail of to-day. This refers to Prime Minister Churchill's reference to the difficulties we are facing and might expect to face in the future, and it says:

> But these blows need not be mortal blows if we keep our heads and pursue our purpose relentlessly and with grim determination. That purpose is to convert our enormous potential power into an actual fighting force as rapidly as possible. We must build ships; produce aircraft; make guns; send the tanks rolling off the end of the production lines; and train men to operate these deadly engines.

Although we may be satisfied with our voluntary system as it is at the present time, and we have reason to be if we listen to those who are in charge, this attitude may change. I think it will change if the present system does not meet the emergencies that may arise. Should the system change, I am afraid there will be many difficulties in administration. We provide for compulsory service under the National Resources Mobilization Act, and even though this is confined to service in Canada, we have experienced many difficulties.

I believe hon. members who represent rural ridings will agree with me when I say that the majority of the requests received when we go home for week-ends are received from farmers' sons who are urging postponement of their military service. It is true that farmers have the privilege of asking for postponement, but I know of many cases where men have been taken away from large farms and no one left to operate them. I do not think postponement is sufficient. A farmer must plan, not only for months ahead but for years ahead. He must not be uncertain as to what he can do. He cannot plan if he knows that at any time he may be called into service and have to sell his farm and his stock. As I say, I think they should have more than postponement; they should have exemption in order that they can go ahead and plan for future operations.

There is some dissatisfaction with the procedure. If this is so in my constituency where the greatest distance from the district registrar is only 100 miles, how much more is it so in areas where men are as far as 1,000 miles away from the divisional registrar? This is so in northern Ontario where the nearest registrar is in Toronto. There has been a demand that agriculture should be represented on these boards. Up to a short time ago the boards were made up of representatives of the Department of National Defence and the national labour supply council. This condition has been improved by the order in council passed on the seventh instant which provides that at the hearing of applications made to the board there shall also be a representative of agriculture in order that the interests of agriculture may be represented.

There also has been a demand for local boards which would be more familiar with the needs of the locality concerned. The argument against such boards is that there would be a danger that they might be influenced by representations made by people in the locality. If that argument is sound, then I suggest to the government that local committees be formed. These would not have administrative powers but would act merely as fact-finding bodies. These committees could be set up in each county or district, and they could forward the facts to the central board which would administer and deal with the application. In that way a committee need not be influenced because it could be said that they were merely a fact-finding body and were forwarding the facts to the board which was in charge of administration.

It is urged also that selective service should be extended to all branches of our war effort, including the factory, the farm, as well as military service. I know the government is dealing with this problem, but we can readily see the difficulties in the way. This was brought out quite vividly on the tenth instant when the Minister of National Defence was speaking. He was referring to the policy of the government, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) interrupted, as reported on page 452 of Hansard:

> . . . is it anticipated that the government intends to say to a man: "You shall work here and not there"? The Prime Minister has not made that clear. I do not think you can say to a man: "You must work here and not there". You might not get results.

Then, when the minister stated that this is receiving a great deal of examination and consideration in England as well as here, the leader of the opposition replied:

> I am not sure that you can make a man work.

I would ask the government to give this policy their best consideration in the hope that some satisfactory arrangement may be made in order to assure adequate help on the farm as well as in the factory. This might be accomplished by doing it indirectly, as is being done to a certain extent in the civil service, by refusing to hire a man in any industry if he is eligible for service or is better fitted for some other employment. In this regard some consideration must be given to the farmer as well as to those employed on the farm. A farmer under present market conditions cannot afford to pay the wages received by those employed in industry and, on the other hand, it is not fair to the farm labourer to be compelled to work on the farm for wages much lower than he could receive were he allowed to work in industry. This problem, I am afraid, cannot be met in any way except by allowing the farmer to receive a higher reward for the commodities he produces.

Although there may be a difference of opinion as to the method by which the war is to be waged, I can assure the members of this house that my people are insistent that we should continue to prosecute the war to our utmost ability. I know the Minister of National Defence was speaking one hundred per cent for the people I represent when he said, as reported at page 448 of Hansard:

> No person can doubt that Canada is committed to total war. We are committed to it not only for the survival of freedom generally but for our own survival and for the survival of this nation, and for the security of our own homes and families. To wage total war is the stated policy of the government and I believe, indeed I am sure, that it is the determined purpose of the Canadian people.

I will do all I can to urge the government to use every means at their disposal, including the conscription of wealth, if necessary, in order to wage total war, and I assure them that the people I represent are prepared to undergo any sacrifice requested of them. Let us all get behind the government in any move to increase the war effort, prod them on, if necessary, and show them the way by doing all we can to assist in the war loan, recruiting, the salvage campaign and the advancement of all organizations connected with our war effort; and, above all, let us remain united that we may hold this nation together in our struggle against the common foe.

Let me conclude with a quotation from the speech given by Prime Minister Churchill yesterday, when he said:

> In the English-speaking world we rejoice in free institutions. We have free parliaments and a free press. This is the way of life we have been used to. This is the way of life we are fighting to defend.

Mr. ARMAND CLOUTIER (Drummond-Arthabaska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I cannot conceal the emotion I feel on rising for the first time in this chamber to speak on behalf of the electors of Drummond-Arthabaska whom I have the honour to represent in the House of Commons since 1940. Though this emotion proceeds from various causes, I attribute it in great measure to the fact that Drummond-Arthabaska has been represented in the past by men of the first rank, and I wish I possessed the eloquence of Laurier, of Lavergne, of Dorion, or of Girouard, in order to give to the voice of my constituency the authority and competence it formerly had. Only a poet could do justice to my constituency, for Drummond-Arthabaska is certainly not an ordinary district. It is privileged in many respects. The soul of our national life is daily in evidence there, harmony reigns between the two races as among the various classes of society. Our farmers are performing real miracles on the land, and our workmen have not known even the shadow of the depression which has so seriously affected most urban centres.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, Drummond-Arthabaska has always been famous. This section of the country which is so dear to me has given great men to the nation, in the arts as well as in public life. Filled with national pride, my county has played a large part in the national war effort. At this moment my thoughts go to the brave defenders of Hong Kong, among whom many young heroes represent the contribution of Drummond-Arthabaska to the glorious Canadian army. Their sacrifice, like that of Dollard des Ormeaux and his valiant companions, will not have been in vain, and their glorious defeat is already worth more than a mere aureole of victory. They have displayed the tenacity of the Canadian soldier, his will to victory, his heroism. They are the symbol of a people which prizes freedom above all else and is ready to give everything, even life itself, to defend freedom until final victory.

I have every reason to be proud of my district, Mr. Speaker. It is admired by those who visit it and loved by those who live in it. With its vast plains recalling the western prairies, its delightful valleys, its poetic streams, its mountains characterized by beauty rather than loftiness, it is a miniature of Canada. Adolphe Poisson, whom Drummond-Arthabaska gave to French-Canadian literature, has sung the praises of this section of Canada in his immortal works, "Les heures perdues" and "Sous les pins." Inspired by the natural beauties of his native district, he expressed sublime thoughts in harmonious verse.

And when admiring the illustrious works of the great sculptors Alfred Laliberté and Suzor Côté, we understand the scruples their chisels must have felt at hewing out masterpieces worthy of the grandeur and beauty of this bit of homeland.

And who is unaware of the renown of the enfant terrible of Drummond-Arthabaska, Erick Dorion, who brought to the politics of his time a note so ardent that even the enfant terrible of Temiscouata can hardly equal him to-day. I hope the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) will not mind this presumption on my part, for I shall tell him frankly, that, just as my electors, the men and women of Drummond-Arthabaska, I hold him in high admiration and consider him a great Canadian and an ardent patriot.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay a tribute to the memory of a man the centenary of whose birth was celebrated just a few months ago, the great statesman who was the pride of French Canada and the glory of the entire country, the man whom gracious Queen Victoria called "silver-tongued", Sir Wilfrid Laurier. We cherish with veneration numerous mementos of this great statesman who spent several of his finest years in the pleasant little town of Arthabaska and the village of l'Avenir, the home of Dorion, where he published a small newspaper which had considerable fame in its day. Drummond-Arthabaska will ever be proud of having had in its midst this great Canadian and illustrious patriot, a symbol of unity and an example of straightforwardness and justice towards all the races and classes making up our beautiful country.

May I also, Mr. Speaker, associate myself with my fellow-members in paying a tender tribute to the memory of another great French Canadian, too early taken from our midst.

The people of Drummond-Arthabaska desire to pay a respectful tribute of admiration to the memory of the great patriot Ernest Lapointe. I feel that we shall miss him more and more in these troubled times. He was a man to whom we could turn in any emergency, and especially in time of peril. I hope that the policies of Laurier and of his successor Ernest Lapointe will ever be preserved by the Liberal party and that the life of those great statesmen will be an inspiration to all young Canadians. They embodied Canadian loyalty and patriotism.

I wish to tender my sincere congratulations to the proposer (Mr. Fournier, Hull) and the seconder (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They have discharged their task with dignity and expressed their views with courage. I listened to their speeches with great interest and I admired the sincerity of their language.

I shall now discuss the six main points of the speech from the throne, considering them as much as possible from various angles. The first point is the proposed plebiscite concerning the use of our man-power. Mr. Speaker, I understand that through such a plebiscite the government will request the people to release them from their past commitments as regards overseas military service. In my opinion it would have been preferable for the government to put directly to the electors the following question: "Are you for or against conscription for overseas service?" But since the government is asking the people whether they are in favour of releasing it from its pledge, I take both questions as being synonymous, even though the one that was selected may seem more ambiguous. I believe that such is the view of the people about the question of the plebiscite and they know that the future stand of the government will be either a wise one, in acordance with the policy they have followed so far, or a desperate, dangerous and useless course, according as the people reply in the negative or the affirmative to the question of the plebiscite.

The government was no doubt prompted by very grave reasons in deciding to consult the people. Besides, they promised, as I did myself in my constituency, that no momentous decision would be taken with regard to conscription without a plebiscite. For those reasons, I shall vote for the holding of a plebiscite, because I am a fervent Liberal and have the utmost confidence in my leaders.

But upholding as I do the policy inspired by Laurier and Lapointe as well as by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) whom I greatly admire, I say once again that I am strongly opposed to conscription, and that I shall ever oppose with all my strength any compulsion for overseas service.

Nothing can justify such a policy, Mr. Speaker; of this I am convinced more than I could ever say. The voluntary system has given results of which Canada can be proud. We have already supplied more troops than are needed by our allies. What is expected from us is first and above all material assistance. Ever since the beginning of the war, Canada has many times been referred to as the empire's arsenal. Our factories are working full time and they are supplying this country and our allies with weapons and munitions which may be a great contribution to final victory. Besides, we cannot as we did in 1914-18, be solely concerned with the defence of England and her possessions. Our shores are directly menaced by enemies who are drawing closer and closer to them. We are threatened with invasion from two directions. Our duty to Canada compels us to direct our energies, over and above all toward the defence of our own territory.

It would be the height of folly for us to carry our friendship—undoubtedly quite legitimate—for England to the point of giving up too considerable a part of our armed forces. If we are to be attacked, a contingency which is considered possible and even probable, the assault will come as part of a general onslaught by our enemies, and on the same occasion England and the United States will have to oppose a fierce resistance against perfectly equipped enemies. We can only expect a rather weak support from those allies, and to my mind it would be a mistake to believe that we can put all our strength into the defence of the empire while relying on help from our neighbours in a crisis. The most elementary prudence makes it imperative for us to attend first and above all to the defence of our own territory.

The tragic example of Australia should open our eyes. The Australians are now facing the terrible threat of an invasion by the Japanese and their army is no longer strong enough to withstand the attack easily.

The expected help is not forthcoming and not without emotion have we read their government's appeal and the words uttered by the venerable archbishop of Melbourne. Taking a leaf from such experience, I may say that if Britain, with its forty million people, cannot be everywhere at the same time and on every front, how can one expect Canada, with a population of eleven million, to set up a gigantic war production, supply large expeditionary forces and provide for its home defence at one and the same time? So that, while I support the government on the plebiscite, I intend leaving my constituents perfectly free to cast their vote as they wish, without bringing any pressure to bear whatsoever, and as their conscience dictates. What result can we expect? Time will tell. If the answer is in the negative, I will ask the government not to interpret this as any lack of confidence. Quite the contrary, my constituents ardently wish to retain such a man as the Right Hon. Prime Minister at the head of affairs.

I still favour expeditionary forces raised on the basis of voluntary enlistment, but here again do I urge the wisdom of attending with greater care than ever to the maintenance of a sufficiently strong home force to meet such tragic and imminent dangers as now threaten our coasts. I am in accord with the government policy as regards the sending of arms and munitions to Britain. This constitutes the most valuable contribution we can offer and we must be generous in our aid to Great Britain that she may set up a military machine capable of ensuring the final overthrow of the axis' own machine.

I now come to the fourth outstanding feature of the speech from the throne: the extension of the government's policy of selective service and mobilization of our material and human resources to increase the national war effort. I have already stated my views on one aspect of mobilization. I must add here that the government's action in this domain should be dictated by the greatest prudence. I do wish the government would wholly share my views regarding agriculture and labour whose first duty is production to meet the nation's needs. Exemption from military service should apply to all farmers, farmers' sons and every one engaged in industrial pursuits related to agriculture, so as to provide our army and our population with all the necessary food. Exemption from military service should also be applied to those who are employed in munition plants and factories producing war supplies.

I agree that the largest possible number of Canadian citizens should be in a position to take up arms for the defence of the country in case of attack. Could we not, Mr. Speaker, organize in our towns and villages courses of preliminary training which farm and factory workers could attend without interfering with their productive tasks? By that I mean elementary military training given to farmers and factory workers after their working hours and in each locality. Uniforms would not be needed. It would simply be a matter of giving the elements of military training with a view to accustoming our people to handling arms, and to forming reserve battalions or guerilla troops for use in case of attack or invasion of the country.

Our worthy people would no doubt willingly devote a few hours a week to receiving an elementary training which might prove useful in the dark days this country may yet see.

I now come to the last point of the speech from the throne—the financing of the war. I am happy to note that Drummond-Arthabaska has done more than was asked of it in that domain. It is all to the credit of my electors, and I am sure that Drummond-Arthabaska will continue in that patriotic path until the end of the conflict. My people want to purchase victory and I am sure such is the desire of all the citizens of Canada. In the face of the present danger it would be tragic and criminal parsimoniousness to count the dollars that will bring victory. No matter how heavy the sacrifice, the people will respond generously to the call. Of that I am certain.

I shall be glad to vote with the government in favour of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, because it reflects above all the government's ardent desire to collaborate in a large way to the final victory of our arms.

In joyfully accepting all these sacrifices in a true spirit of national cooperation, we shall contribute to cementing the union of the two great races which compose our fair land and to make of Canada a country of two languages but a single heart.

Mr. W. E. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): The address in reply to the speech from the throne has been very ably moved and seconded by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald). Since that time there have been many very good speeches and much has been said; in fact little is left to be said. But on behalf of the riding I have the honour to represent I feel called upon to make a few remarks. It is customary, I believe, in the circumstances under which I rise also to say a few words about the riding itself.

Grey-Bruce is two-thirds rural. The urban part consists of towns and villages, none of which has a population of more than four thousand. The rural part is given over to mixed farming, particularly the raising of cattle, hogs and sheep and the production of butter. The counties of Grey and Bruce were first and third respectively in Ontario last year in the sale of butter, and they were among the first four in the sale of cattle, hogs and sheep. The urban part is mainly concerned with providing services for the farming communities and also with the manufacturing of furniture and similar wood products.

The people in the riding are almost entirely the descendants of the original settlers who came there between 1840 and 1880, and are from two main stocks, Anglo-Saxon and German. We have been very ably represented in public life; one of my predecessors from my home town distinguished himself in the chair which the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Glen) now so graciously adorns and for whom the hon. member for Hull is at present an acceptable substitute. I might also add that in this house, in addition to the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Telford), and the humble representative for Grey-Bruce, there are the following members who were born in the counties of Grey and Bruce: the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward), the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven), the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), and the charming and hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman).

In this war the counties of Grey and Bruce are represented by three units: the 97th battery, mobilized in Walkerton in 1939, the 98th anti-tank battery mobilized July, 1940, in Port Elgin, and my own unit, the Grey and Simcoe Foresters, mobilized in June, 1940, as an infantry battalion as part of the 4th division.

All these units were raised with the minimum of delay, and enlistments have since been quite steady in the two counties. I cannot speak for the two batteries; but as far as my own unit is concerned, on those few occasions when by reason of medical discharges we went under strength there was no delay at all in getting recruits, they came almost overnight, as indeed they did on one occasion. Since that time, of course, there have been many enlistments in other branches of the army, in the navy and in the air force, and more recently there is recruiting going on for the two auxiliary women's organizations. In my unit, and in all the others, particularly perhaps the 97th battery, there is a large percentage of recruits from those areas which were settled by the original German immigrants. The young men of German racial origin in my counties have enlisted in quite as good percentage as the Anglo-Saxons.

The problems of the riding are naturally connected only with the war effort at the moment, and I should like to make a brief reference to the army, the navy and the air force.

The Canadian army which will be in existence at the end of this year, according to the plans of the government, will consist of whatever is overseas at the moment, plus the 4th division which in the meantime will have become armoured. The Canadian army will then consist of two corps: the first, of three infantry divisions with two army tank brigades attached; and the second, of two armoured divisions. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) was, I thought, rather modest when he referred to the Canadian army as it will be; he said it would be at least equal to anything in the armed forces of the empire, as I recall the phrase. But I should like to point out that Germany is popularly supposed to have invaded France with eleven armoured divisions out of sixty, and to have invaded Russia with twenty armoured divisions out of one hundred or one hundred and twenty. In neither case was the percentage of armoured units equal to the two out of five which the Canadian army will have on completion of this year's plan.

I might say that the feeling of the riding is not only commendation of the fact that the Canadian army will be self-contained and self-directed, but it is considered essential that that should be so.

With respect to the navy, we have had enlistments from our counties, and unfortunately there have been losses, which we all regret. Nevertheless the work of the navy was rather remote from the people of my riding until my battalion went east last spring, and the members of the unit began to see the navy in action and to see the difficulties with which it contends.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that the fact that the Canadian navy has grown from 15 to 350 ships and now has a personnel of 27,000 is not only commendable but laudable; yet, knowing the battle of the Atlantic and of Great Britain as we do now, and in view of the situation which has resulted from the withdrawal of at least part of the United States navy to the Pacific, in my opinion it must be the first duty of this government not only to continue the shipbuilding programme which has brought about that great increase, but to extend it and to continue to extend it for many months to come. The battle of the Atlantic has not even been won at the moment, though it has not been lost; and until our production of ships has run away ahead of our losses for some time, we cannot afford to take any risks on the danger with which we have been faced during the past two years.

With respect to the air force, of course we are familiar with that because of the large number of enlistments from my riding, and the fact that the Canadian government will spend something like $800,000,000 on the British commonwealth air training plan shows the importance of this project. But here again, in my opinion, the plan, while a great one, is not yet sufficient for the needs of the Dominion of Canada. It is heartening, of course, to learn that the number of recruits entering the training centres of the air force monthly has been quite sufficient, but that is sufficient according to the yardstick which we followed some months ago. Surely it is evident to every one in this house that in no engagement so far in this war has the side without air strength succeeded in winning. Therefore not only should the number of recruits be increased, but the plan itself should be broadened so that in the near future planes and pilots will be available in much greater numbers than we now have them.

I suppose the house would expect me to make some reference to the munitions programme. I must confess that the figures as to contracts granted and amounts of money involved are beyond my comprehension. But the figures of production do mean something to me, and I wonder whether we are not under a misapprehension about them. I do not say that in an endeavour to reflect in any manner upon the government, but some hon. members and some speakers are prone to make reference to the percentage of our production now in comparison with what it was in our first, unprepared condition. I hope that in making its plans for this year the government will bear in mind not what we did last year, but what Hitler and his allies are doing this year. Our production should be aimed to overtake that production, and no other yardstick should be used.

When we met some twenty months ago, all hon. members were acutely aware of our shortage of war equipment, and we had a rather gloomy outlook. But I am afraid we have forgotten that, to the extent that we have overlooked not only the production which Hitler had on hand at that time, but what he has been able to accumulate since. He has had the productive capacity of Europe, with the exception of Russia and Great Britain, since that time. However, 1941 did give us one very considerable stroke of good luck, shall I say. Hitler attacked Russia, and since then he has lost a large number of men and a large amount of equipment, while on our side we have gained a large number of men and a large amount of equipment from Russia. Similarly, we have lost the manpower and the productive capacity of Japan, but we have gained those of the United States. With all this, however, it is my opinion, as I think it is the opinion of my riding, that the production of this country should be greatly expanded before we undertake any great expansion of our armed forces. I understand, from figures given the other night by the Minister of National Defence, that at present there are 600,000 people in the dominion engaged directly or indirectly in the production of munitions and war equipment, and that another 100,000 will be added this year. I must say this is a large number. Yet it is not anything like what we can have and what we should have as the facilities increase.

As I pointed out a short time ago, in my county there have been many enlistments in all branches of the armed services. This has brought about a shortage of farm labour; and while the farmer himself is as willing as anyone to suffer inconvenience and loss in the prosecution of the war, he knows that food is necessary in Great Britain to-day; he knows that it will be necessary next year, and he knows that at the end of the war we should have a surplus on hand for the purpose of feeding the millions who will be starving in Europe at that time. Having all this in mind, he finds it hard to understand, in some cases at least, the drain on labour from the farm, not only into the armed forces but into munition factories and other more gainful employment in the cities. In my opinion this situation should be corrected this year, and I was glad to see that in his speech the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made reference to it, which reference I shall give in a few moments.

In addition to the farmers, other civilians in my riding have been under the impression that they have not yet done anything like what they could and should do in the prosecution of the war. They have engaged in successful salvage campaigns; they have participated in the war loans; they have bought war savings certificates and stamps; they have engaged in Red Cross and similar activities, but at the same time they still think they could do a great deal more. They agree that the change-over from a peaceful nation into one with a war economy cannot be done overnight. They agree also that the government, with all due respect to some hon. members opposite, has laid a very good foundation for our war effort, and they agree that the future will see an orderly and effective advance to an all-out effort. But with all that, they do feel that now, the foundation having been laid, something more could be done by them and, further, they believe it is the duty of the government to provide that opportunity. I am glad to say that the Prime Minister has been ahead of me in this also, and in his speech made some reference to it. With the permission of the house I shall read these references now, because they apply to both farmers and civilians. Those words appear at pages 45 and 46 of Hansard for Monday, January 26:

> The government now proposes to apply the compulsory powers of national selective service to other aspects of the war effort as well as to military service. These powers will be applied selectively and progressively to those activities where it is considered by the government that their application will contribute to the goal of a total effort. . . .
> I shall not attempt at this time to outline the measures which are contemplated in order to extend the scope of national selective service. I shall confine myself to saying that the extended policy of selective service will comprehend measures to increase the supply of man-power available for war industry and for the armed forces; also measures to safeguard and, where necessary, to assist in providing agricultural labour required to expand war production on the farm. These objects it is proposed to achieve by positive action to increase the mobility of available man-power, to add to the number of women available for employment, and to facilitate the transfer of labour from non-essential occupations to direct employment in the furtherance of the war effort.

I am naturally concerned with the present and future condition of the soldier, sailor and airman, to whom I shall refer hereafter only as soldiers. I was not satisfied that the condition of soldiers' dependents last year was what it should be, in view of the increased incomes of the civilian population, particularly in Ontario, and probably other parts of the dominion. To the soldier who went home on week-end leave it was quite evident that the civilian population were spending large sums of money on pleasures, and with respect to other matters which, at best, were luxuries. It was unfortunate for that soldier to meet the person—the young man or the young lady—who took his particular position in civilian life, because the civilian occupying the position vacated by the soldier was in all cases found to be earning considerably higher than had the soldier at the time of enlistment. In view of this I was in favour of increasing the allowance for the dependents of soldiers, and of increasing soldiers' pay, up to and including the rank of warrant officer. I hope the house will understand that neither my wife nor my children are in receipt of allowances, so that anything I may say is quite unbiased in that respect.

Nevertheless the government decided to institute trustee boards to which applications could be made by dependents, to show that they had special cases where greater allowance was required. I do not agree with this system, may I say with all respect to those who brought it about. The cost of living mounted very sharply in Ontario, at least during the twelve months of 1941, and cost of living bonuses were provided for many types of wage-earners. They were not, however, provided for soldiers. The price ceiling was placed upon nearly everything, if not everything, and the cost of living since that time has remained relatively constant. Therefore I now suggest to the government that with the cost of living well under control, the dependents' allowance might be increased by a flat rate, and that such action would not require the assistance of the trustee boards which have been set up. However competent they may be, they will make mistakes. And there will be some cost in connection with the machinery, no matter how much it is kept down by the government itself, and by those individuals who are willing to serve on it.

The disparity between the earning power of the soldier and the civilian is common to all wars, and I do not suppose it can be adjusted adequately to suit the soldier. At the same time there are benefits received by the soldier upon his return, and I believe I should place them on record. If the soldier is discharged for medical reasons, he receives free hospitalization; and if he is in a civilian hospital, he and his dependents receive some allowance while he is there. If he is discharged for other reasons at the conclusion of the war, and if he has been in the army for a period of six months, he receives, in addition to the clothing allowance, one month's pay and allowance, and he also receives free treatment in the department's hospitals for twelve months for anything which may occur during that time.

In addition to this, he receives his old job back, if he wishes to have it. I am pleased to say the government is changing this provision from the order in council which has existed for some months, into a bill already before the house. If, however, he was not employed when he enlisted, or if for any reason he does not wish his old job back, if single he receives $9 a week and, if married, $13 a week, for a limited period of time while seeking employment. He also receives training in some type of employment he may choose and, in addition, he is in receipt of the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act. If, as happens so often, he leaves his education uncompleted in order to join the army, he receives free tuition, and a modest living allowance while he completes his course. These are substantial benefits, and go a long way toward placing a soldier back where he started when he enlisted.

However, from my slight experience in the army—and this is a point which, I am sure, is appreciated by all hon. members who are returned men—I believe that nothing which can be done by the house can place the soldier back in the position he was in when he enlisted, whether his service in the army has been for only three or four months, or for two or three years. Therefore any consideration given by hon. members to provision for veterans of this war as well as those of the last will, I hope, be given with that point in mind. Nothing we can do will adjust those men completely to their previous civil status.

After what happened a week ago, I should not think it necessary to make any reference to the plebiscite. My silence might, however, be misconstrued, and perhaps I ought to make some brief observations. I am quite in favour of holding the plebiscite, partly because I believe it the right thing to do in any event, and partly for personal reasons. In my own riding I stated the policy of the Liberal party, as I understood it, in these words:

> The Liberal party is opposed to conscription for overseas service, but we are pledged to prosecuting the war with the utmost vigour, short of that.

Those are the words which I used, and which were reported in the local press. Under those circumstances I would find it quite impossible to come to the house and discuss the question; I would be limited to my promise made during the election campaign. Since it seems that conscription will be discussed, probably debated at length in the house in coming months, I would wish to be free so that I might take my part in that discussion.

It seems to me that there will be three classes of persons who will vote on the plebiscite. First there will be the person in favour of conscription for overseas service; he will vote in the affirmative. Then there is the person opposed under all circumstances to conscription for overseas service; he will vote in the negative. Then there will be the third person—and in my view this will be the largest group—who has no settled conviction one way or another, but who is willing to vote "yes", and leave the decision to the government which so far has guided the country successfully through two years of war. I am pleased that the plebiscite is being taken, and that the government has said that with the utmost vigour it would see that the question is fairly put to the people, and that an affirmative answer will be requested of the electorate.

In conclusion, perhaps I may be permitted to make a few observations respecting the soldiers with whom I have been associated for twenty months. I would remind hon. members that Hitler has said he is fighting against democracy. We tell our soldiers we are fighting for democracy. To a member of the armed forces democracy is not an abstract thing, nor is it necessarily the best form of government. Many of our men have no opinion on the point at all—nor could they be expected to have. But democracy to them is that form of government we have in Canada, the form we are fighting to maintain. We fight for it because it is our choice, and for no other reason. Under these circumstances, while democracy in the abstract may mean nothing to the soldier, the deliberations of this house do mean something. They are reported in the newspapers and are familiar to all ranks. The standard of our public life should be maintained with that in mind. I ask the house to remember that in this session and in all sessions until the war is over it is essential, not only that everything that happens here should be directed to winning the war, but that nothing be said in this house to detract from the symbol for which the armed forces are fighting.

Persons in and outside the house have at times made references to persons in the house and in authority, and to others who enjoy the confidence of the electorate which go a long way toward destroying the honour which is due to this house and to the members of it. We are expecting the armed forces to fight for us as an institution. They are willing to do that, but they expect that this house will conduct itself in a manner befitting the sacrifice they are making. I do not intend to say anything more along this line.

In all probability some time during this year, or next year, the Canadian army will proceed to the scene of conflict. They will be convoyed in British and Canadian ships, manned by Canadian sailors, guarded overhead by the Canadian air force. When that time comes we must see, not only that our soldier is well trained but that his equipment is adequate and superior in quality and quantity to the enemy's; we must be able to assure him that behind him there is a civilian population whose morale is as good as his, so that when he faces the greatest task he will be able to meet the Germans and their allies and defeat them.

Mr. J. A. BLANCHETTE (Compton): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I desire to add my congratulations to those expressed already to the mover (Mr. Fournier, Hull), and the seconder (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I desire also, on behalf of the county of Compton, to congratulate the Minister of Justice, Mr. St. Laurent. The minister was born in the county of Compton in the eastern townships, where, as he himself has stated, he learned to speak French to his father and English to his mother. In many respects he thus became a true exponent of the eastern townships.

At this late stage of the debate it would be imposing upon the indulgence of this hon. house were I to bring up again what has been said already by hon. members on the subjects of conscription and the plebiscite. In my remarks this evening my intention is not to go into the various details of the matter under discussion but rather to treat both these subjects in a general way, based upon what has been advanced in this house as well as out of it. I intend to mention the Hong Kong matter and to speak briefly on social legislation.

On September 8, 1939, when I had the honour of seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I stated, as reported on page 12 of Hansard:

> I wish to state, without the slightest hesitation and without any mental reservation, that I am fully opposed to conscription. I am completely against a system so inconsistent with our Canadian turn of mind. Experience has shown moreover that it is not effective, for, without having given the desired results, it has, in the past, fostered trouble and unsettled our national life.
> In order, therefore, that none may falsely construe my attitude in the matter, I repeat that I am completely opposed to conscription.

During the election in the following year, 1940, I repeated that assertion throughout the length and breadth of my constituency. The result was that the majority I received at that time was greater by one hundred per cent than the largest majority ever given any candidate in the history of the constituency of Compton. In making this statement I attribute no credit to myself. It is due rather to the present leader of the government whose programme was endorsed by the electors of my constituency. My conviction upon the subject of conscription is still the same. I feel that conscription is unnecessary, that it would undermine our national unity and that in having recourse to it we would defeat the very aim we have in view, that is, a total war effort. Since the declaration of war by this country, we have had practically at all times a sufficient number of volunteers whom we could clothe and equip and train. Recently we had figures from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) to the effect that total voluntary enlistments in January of this year were 18,285, broken down as follows:

Navy	800
Army	11,713
Air force	5,772

I should like to quote the words of the Minister of National Defence, to be found on page 455 of Hansard of this year, as follows:

> You can hardly say, Mr. Speaker, that the voluntary system has failed. Let us not forget that these enlistments have come not under the patriotic fervour which casualties produces, but at a time when because of comparative inactivity it was naturally harder to convince our people that the army needed men. We at national defence headquarters are going right on, and I ask most sincerely for the active interest of the members of this house and of the citizens generally to back up our efforts.

In his address to his men General McNaughton stated that this government had done all that it possibly could do in the way of an efficient effort in the war. Prime Minister Churchill, Lord Beaverbrook and others who have visited us from Great Britain have declared that our effort is magnificent. With Great Britain attacked as she has been I feel that it would have been treason on their part to assert this if they were not convinced it was the truth. I feel that these testimonials from responsible persons who ought to know should take precedence over the wails, lamentations and deprecations of our back-seat driving, shall I say, journalistic or paper generals. I feel that if these generals would only spend as much of their time in giving an impulse to voluntary enlistments as they have done and are doing for conscription, there never would be any doubt as to the results obtained in the future with our voluntary system of enlistment. In so doing they will be logical and sincere in the aim which they assume, namely, the supplying of all the men that are needed for an all-out war effort.

Let us not lose sight of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that our population consists of only eleven and a half million people, and that up to the end of 1941 we had already in the Canadian service over 500,000 men, of whom 422,000 have volunteered. In addition, according to plans laid out by the Department of National Defence, as set out at page 450 of Hansard, with additional recruits this year of from 173,000 to 193,000, we shall have over 700,000 under military arms. That is more than six per cent of our total population, which would represent, according to population, armies of the following size for some of our allied countries:

Russia	10,800,000
United States	7,800,000
United Kingdom	3,000,000
Union of South Africa	600,000
Australia and New Zealand	600,000
British empire in Africa	2,700,000
British empire in Asia	24,000,000
Netherlands in East Indies	4,200,000
China	27,000,000

The New York Times in its issue of yesterday, February 15, states in its editorial:

> An armed force of 7,000,000 (for the United States) is within reason. There can hardly be more than that number if we take official estimates of 15 or 20 civilian workers for each man under arms.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, if the United States with its population of 130 millions and its mass production recognizes officially that not more than six per cent should be placed under arms, can we outdo and outbid the United States in our efforts to enlist manpower?

I am one of those who firmly believe that our voluntary system has worked well in the recruiting of our man-power, and I feel that the government would be egregiously wrong in resorting to some other method.

That conscription would have a disquieting effect upon this country is plain to those who have eyes to see and ears to hear. In spite of the opinions which we might have to the contrary, the experience of the last war is there to prove it.

I know that there are some who make light of this term, "national unity," calling it a red herring, a bogy. We have heard those very terms and qualifications used in this house, and as a rule those who make the most pronounced charges in that sense show at present, as they have shown in the past, that, to say the best, their actions do not always tend toward national unity. Incidentally I might state that the Conservative party by its conscription propaganda has forced out of its ranks the only representative it had from the province of Quebec. No, Mr. Speaker, the success of our war effort, spoken of in such laudable terms by those outside Canada, but detracted from, to put it mildly, by a certain stentorian group in this country, has been possible only because of the success in maintaining national unity; and the moment that unity is scuttled, arrested or defeated, I shall fear for our total war effort in this war, as I would fear also for our peace effort after the war. Surely, if the fathers of confederation were able to adjust their differences in their day to make us a united nation, can it be thought that we, the sons of confederation, have so retrogressed in the realm of love of country and all that it means to us, have moved so far back to pre-confederation years, that we can no longer maintain united this young nation of ours? Unity is the result of adjusted differences; disunity represents uncompromised differences.

Everyone in this country has the same end in view, the winning of the war. The difference is only one of means to attain that end. I confess that the case might be hopeless if the end to be arrived at were disputed by anyone in this country, which it is not; and surely we can agree on the means to arrive at our objective. The war front is only as strong and as effective as the home front; the one is the necessary complement of the other. In war neither one of these fronts can continue alone if one is impaired in unity and efficiency.

What we have accomplished to date in finance, in the enlistment of man-power and in production has been done for the most part, be it noted, by voluntary methods. These, Mr. Speaker, are my humble views upon conscription, which I believe is unnecessary and would disunite this country and defeat our efforts to attain the very goal at which we are aiming.

But equally as contentious as conscription is the plebiscite proposal in the speech from the throne. This popular consultation, as I see it, represents, to me at least, the quintessence of democracy. I am one of those who have faith in the people. I believe they will pronounce according to the dictates of their mind and conscience in the matter; and is not the free expression of the people, according to their dictates, exactly what this country and all the other democracies are fighting for to-day—freedom of mind in the affairs of religion, freedom of expression in the affairs of state, all of which are advance posts of democracy?

The plebiscite is not a pronouncement on conscription. It is a release from the promise made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as well as by practically seventy-five per cent of the members of this house who were elected at the last election, a promise made by both leaders of the two major parties at the last election. But there is this to be noted, that whereas the Prime Minister asked for release from his promise, and that from the whole people of Canada, the new leader of the Conservative party, in spite of the promise in the same sense that was made by his party at the last election, relegated that promise to the four winds immediately upon —I shall not say his election or choice by the Tory party—but rather upon his appointment by a certain group in the country. Is it not more democratic to follow the course our Prime Minister has taken and have recourse to the popular will rather than to decide arbitrarily of one's own accord that an engagement shall be broken and that in spite of the promises made by Mr. Meighen in 1925, which he made first in Ontario when he stated at Hamilton:

> I have myself not the slightest fear but that, if danger threatened Canada again, this country would respond as it responded in 1914; but I believe that in future it will be best for all that before a government takes a step so momentous as the dispatch of troops, the will of the people should be known.

Again, a few days later, in Acton Vale, Quebec, during the course of a by-election in the county of Bagot, the new leader of the Tory party spoke as follows:

> If a crisis should occur in which our country's peace would be threatened, I declare, so long as the reins of power are in my hands—I declare this country will not send a man out of Canada without the country being consulted.

In other words, the present leader of the Conservative party believes in popular consultation on the subject when he is in power, but is totally against it when not in power. I feel that we can exact, and we must exact, of our public men precisely the same standard of integrity, honesty and probity in the pledged word as we expect in our common daily relations with our fellow men.

Once again, I am of opinion that the plebiscite is a democratic measure, and I do not feel that the severe criticism upon this measure is justified. I am glad to note that during the debate which has been progressing there is at least one point upon which we all seem to be unanimous, and that is the common assertion that the Department of National War Services should do all within its power, by its different boards throughout the country, to enable agriculture to carry on, in the adjournments of military training for farmers' sons. We have had instances of that this evening. Practically every member who spoke made recommendations in that sense—the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. McCuaig), the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone), the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris), the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Cloutier), for instance; and I am only too glad to associate myself with the sentiments which they have expressed in that regard.

In many instances the call of farmers' sons for military training puts in danger the continuation of the farm, and I would suggest that all possible consideration be accorded such demands. In expressing this view I am only conveying to the house the text of many petitions which I have received, and which all hon. members have received, in that connection. The carrying on of agriculture on a larger scale than ever is of equal importance with the making of munitions and equipment, and I am of opinion that everything should be done to exempt farmers' sons from military training.

There is, however, one point to which I would call the attention of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), and that is the case of farmers' sons who are at present doing military training in camps—this because the recruit did not make his representations in time, or for other exceptional reasons, the result being that he is called anyway. There are a number of such cases in my constituency, and I find that the procedure is unreasonably slow to get such men out of the training camps and to bring them back to the farms, where they are more useful to the country and to our allies.

I sincerely endorse the decision of the government to have an immediate inquiry into the disaster of Hong Kong, with a view to imposing the necessary sanction upon those responsible for this calamity, in order that this inquiry may serve as a lesson to anyone in high command who unnecessarily takes an unsound and unreasonable attitude toward the lives of the men. I do not believe any county in the eastern townships has furnished more men for the Hong Kong organization than did Compton, where men were recruited in large numbers from such centres as Bury, Scotstown, Cookshire, Sawyerville, Island Brook, East Angus, Lake Megantic and other localities of the riding.

Needless to say, the news of the fall of Hong Kong brought a great deal of sorrow to a very large portion of my constituents, and I know the sympathy of the country goes out to them and to their fallen heroes. With bowed heads at all times, let us always remember their deeds of valour and their supreme sacrifice.

I would not be true to the convictions which I hold did I not say a word on this occasion with regard to social legislation, too little of which we have heard for a number of years past, compared with European countries. I have already introduced in this house a measure for subsidizing large families; and although I do not believe that this measure, if put into effect, would result in an increase in the size of our families, I feel that such a step would greatly assist such families in the proper bringing up of their children from the point of view of proper nourishment and health, among many other advantages that would result. Had we had this legislation in the past, who is there that can deny that we might have to-day two or three hundred thousand more hands to turn the wheels of industry and to carry on our farms, as well as men in our training camps—a wealth of which we have been deprived by premature deaths or undernourishment among those who fill our hospitals to-day as a result of lack of assistance given this human capital?

The eminent sociologist, Doctor Eleanor F. Rathbone, has truly said that children are not simply a private luxury; they are an asset to the community, and the community can no longer afford to leave provision for their welfare solely to the accident of individual incomes. The Right Rev. Dean Williams, Archbishop of Huron, speaking on this subject said that the best way to populate the vacant spaces of Canada is to populate them with the children of Canada; and the following words are from Mr. Justice Powers, President of the Commonwealth Arbitration Court of Australia:

> Family allowances will, if adopted, remove the greatest cause of industrial discontentment and misery, namely, the inability of many workers to feed their children properly and clothe them decently, however hard they work for their basic wage.

In a radio broadcast address the Rev. Father S. J. Lebel, S.J., the eminent sociologist, truly stated:

> All governments have a duty to make a very serious study of family allocation. It is one of the most pressing questions of the hour. Upon its solution is dependent in large measure that true social peace and the real prosperity of the dominion.

There exists a common relation between the family and the state, a relation such that whatever contributes to the welfare and strength of the family, also contributes to the welfare and strength of the state. All that is indispensable to the family is also indispensable to the state. In spite of the seriousness of the hour, with its pain and suffering, Great Britain has already been seized with the importance of this legislation and has already submitted to its parliament a study of this important question of family allocation. I cannot too strongly urge the present government to take a step in the same direction in order that the proper orientation be given to this legislation as something that will greatly help this country and add to its war strength, at the same time granting the blessings of distributive justice. We speak of a new order to follow the war; let us not believe that this new order will arrive with the break of day some fine morning; we must begin to break the shackles of the old if we wish to prepare for the new. By all means let us slave and save and sacrifice to win the war, but let us sacrifice and save and slave also to win social peace after the war.

Mr. W. H. MILLS (Elgin): In rising to add a word in this debate on the address, I am not going to repeat what has already been said by handing bouquets to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, who both did justice to the honour assigned to them.

I have the honour to represent the pioneer county of Elgin, Ontario, noted and outstanding in many ways. The county is ideally located on the north shore of lake Erie; St. Thomas, my county town, is midway between Fort Erie and Windsor on No. 3 highway, a shortcut for United States travellers across Ontario. St. Thomas is the Canadian terminal for three great railways: the New York Central, the Wabash and the Père Marquette. The shops of the New York Central are located there, and the Père Marquette have new shops almost completed. We also have the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian National and the London and Port Stanley railways, the latter, I believe, being the last remaining electric road running across country. Therefore St. Thomas is rightly called the railway city.

St. Thomas has also the most outstanding, up-to-the-minute daily newspaper in Canada. The editor of that paper, after reading the speech from the throne, gave St. Thomas world-wide publicity by cabling to the Right Hon. Winston Churchill and telegraphing President Roosevelt and headlining on the front page the following message:

> Canadians feel humiliated and apologize for action of their premier in proposing plebiscite on military service, believing it falsely represents them as failing to realize gravity of situation and necessity of all-out effort to save themselves and empire. Believe unparalleled circumstances require that you should create precedent and advise Mackenzie King to abandon idea and take only step possible for utmost prosecution of war without delay.

I have been following the paper looking for a reply, but so far the only reply I have seen is where in the British parliament Prime Minister Churchill gave an account of the great contribution Canada has made to the war and the great applause his statement received.

Elgin is a great agricultural county, producing great quantities of hogs, beans, beef cattle, tobacco, small fruits, milk and, of course hon. members all know, the finest apples in the world.

The government, of which I am proud to be a supporter, has located in Elgin county several airports in connection with the commonwealth air training plan. Three miles south of St. Thomas was the great new Ontario mental hospital. The provincial government immediately on the outbreak of the war, turned that hospital over to the Department of National Defence. The technical training school in connection with the air training plan is now located in Elgin county, and between 5,000 and 6,000 men are stationed there all the time. Then we have the Fingal bombing and gunnery school with a personnel of 1,200 to 1,500, also Aylmer air school for pilots with about the same personnel. They have almost completed an emergency landing field five miles east of St. Thomas and needless to say, St. Thomas and Elgin county have been stimulated to great activity by reason of these training centres. We are grateful to the government for locating them there. Then we have at Port Stanley the finest harbour on the north shore of lake Erie, being the lake port for St. Thomas and London and also the home of a great fishing industry.

Last, but not least, Elgin county is the home of the best known provincial premier in Canada, in the person of Hon. Mitchell Hepburn. Mitchell is always putting Elgin county on the map. Our friendship dates back to long before either of us entered public life. We have a standing agreement; Mitch grows my onions and I grow his apples. Mitch has always given me his loyal support, and I shall always do likewise any time he appeals to the electors of Elgin county.

As to the government, one might write a book on their accomplishments in the last seven years. I have not time to dwell at any length on them, but in passing let me say that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is the only outstanding statesman and leader in Canada to-day. He is surrounded by the best ministers it is possible to get. Where in Canada could you better our three ministers of national defence? Where in Canada could you better our Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe)? Who has any fault to find with any of them? We have the most representative national government possible, a government representing more parts of Canada than any government since confederation.

I have no time to go into the benefits and accomplishments of this government since it came into power, but let me just touch on the Prime Minister's ability. For example, immediately after he was elected he negotiated a trade treaty with the United States. I shall mention just one benefit from this trade agreement, in reference to cattle. We have in our stables a great many beef cattle, and therefore I know something about what I am saying. We are allowed a quota of about 52,000 head of cattle over 700 pounds each, entering the United States every three months, at one and a half cents a pound duty. The quota which started in January was filled in about six weeks. This makes a grand market for our cattle. What would our cattle market be like at the present time, with no export to Britain, if it were not for this agreement, which Lord Bennett, as he now is, tried three years to negotiate but without success?

A great deal is owing to our Prime Minister for the great cooperation between Great Britain, the United States and Canada to-day. My opponent, speaking in St. Thomas on February 14, 1940, at the last election, six months after war was declared, was criticizing a Liberal poster which read: "Forward with Mackenzie King". He said, "Forward; where to?" Answering his own question he said, "To closer relationships with the United States." I wonder whether he would make such a statement to-day. I doubt if our Conservative friends will ever again choose as an election slogan, "No truck or trade with the Yankees." I have always advocated close relationships with the United States. Why not? Many of our sons and daughters are permanently settled there.

Canada's war effort has been fully explained by previous speakers, so there is no need for me to repeat what has been said. But let me refer to an editorial in the New York Times, which said that Canada's contribution is one of the miracles of the war, according to her population.

As I see it, the situation is that, as time goes on, Canada will almost become the cupboard of the world. A few days ago I was reading an article on conditions in Europe, where thousands are cold and hungry. Will Canada soon not have to be sending food supplies to Russia as well as England? Canadian farmers are as loyal and patriotic as any people we have in Canada. They have met the demands made upon them and are willing to continue working long hours and doing their best, but they are becoming greatly handicapped by the labour situation. The calling up of men as recruits for the training centres, the employment of men by factories, shops and the railways, make it almost impossible to hire men for farm work. The only farmer who is going to get by is the small farmer, who can do the work himself.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I come to the question of calling up young farmers for war service. The procedure under the present policy is very unsatisfactory. First let me say that Mr. W. A. Martin, the divisional registrar at London, who represents the whole of western Ontario, is the finest, fairest type of man it would be possible to have in that position. He wants to be fair and impose no hardship on anyone, but he has an impossible task; no one man can act as a tribunal for all western Ontario. I should like to give my experience only a short time ago. About ten o'clock in the morning I called his office. The long-distance operator reported back that Mr. Martin could not talk to me until after two o'clock. I said to her, "I will not be sitting at this telephone at two o'clock. You tell him W. H. Mills wants to speak to him, and I think he will speak to me." I was talking to him inside of a minute. If it had been a farmer from a back concession who had called, there would have been some other alibi at two o'clock because his staff simply have to protect him. He cannot attend personally to all the demands made upon him.

I should now like to mention my experience in interceding in one or two cases, although I could refer to many. A short time before I came to Ottawa, a lady and her son came to see me one evening. I found that she was a widow, with one son and a married daughter. The son was the only help she had. They came to see me on New Year's day, and the son had been notified to report at the Chatham training camp the following Thursday, which would leave no one to do the work. I should like to read one paragraph from the letter I wrote to Mr. Martin in this connection:

He is the only son of a widowed mother. She has one daughter who is married and away from home. They have one hundred and ninety acres of land, fourteen milch cows, sending the milk to the Corinth cheese factory, fourteen young cattle, four brood sows, turning off approximately forty to fifty hogs a year, have four horses, and do general farming. Wilford has been doing the work on this farm alone with no hired man and it is out of the question to get one. If he has to take this four-month training, there would be nothing else but a sale and quit farming. At this late date, it is even too late to have a sale in time, and they do not want to do this anyway. It is not the intention of the department that a widow's only son should have to go into training and the farm be abandoned. The Hon. James Gardiner spoke especially on this point at the London meeting a year ago.

I asked Mrs. Burwell at what time they got their mail, and she said, "About nine o'clock in the morning." So I said, "If you do not hear anything by next Tuesday as a result of the letter I will write, you telephone me and I will telephone Mr. Martin." Then I added, "You go home, go to bed, and get some sleep," because I could see that she was greatly worried. I added, "You take it from me, Wilford is not going into training next Thursday." I heard nothing more for some time, so I took it that they had received the looked-for letter. Then Mrs. Burwell sent me a copy of a letter they had received giving her son a postponement until March 31, a date not far off now. If she took that letter too much to heart, she still would not be sleeping nights because the letter said that Wilford would be expected to report at the first training camp after that date, and that he would be notified in ample time as to the place and date.

I contend that there should be some different policy from this worrying of widowed mothers. I would refer to another case, that of a young man who finished his four months' training last July, was given a postponement for six months and then was notified to return to duty on December 15. Prior to that date he and his father interviewed me to see if something could not be done, so I wrote a letter in his behalf to the commander in charge, Wolseley barracks, where he was supposed to report. This young man's father, Mr. Danbrook, has only one other son, who has been in the air force for over a year and a half. The other boy, Keith, is married and lived at home with his father, working the farm with him. They have two hundred acres—I know the farm very well—twenty-two Holstein cows and sixteen young cattle, an accredited herd. They kept hogs until some time ago, when they had an outbreak of hog cholera and their twenty-six hogs were slaughtered, but they are going back into hogs shortly, and are carrying on general farm work. This boy went to London, without result, and he was instructed to report at the barracks. I wrote the commander there, and received this reply:

This young lad has reported here for duty and is at the present moment being held in the depot for disposal.

I regret that I am unable to take any steps regarding any further postponement but would suggest that you write the district officer commanding, headquarters, M.D. No. 1, London, who will issue instructions to me as to what disposal I am to make of this young man.

I wrote as suggested, enclosing a copy of the letter I had written to the commander at Wolseley barracks, and saying I could add nothing more except that the father was confined to bed at that time with a paralysed shoulder. Then I got the following acknowledgment from him:

This man has completed his four-months training as a reserve recruit and has now automatically become a member of the Canadian army "home defence".

Had he applied to the Department of National War Services prior to 15th December it is possible that he might have secured an additional postponement, but now his status is the same as a member of the Canadian army active.

We have had this man in and suggested to him that it is thought that he might possibly secure a discharge on compassionate grounds, and further suggested that he should forward an application through his commanding officer for a discharge.

The next information I received was in a letter from his father. They had a neighbour boy helping to do the chores, and the son was sent to Camp Borden to wash dishes. He remained there for about three weeks, and then finally, on January 14, he was released on compassionate grounds and given six months leave of absence. That will take him up until around the 1st of July, when we all know he will be needed at home more even than he is now. Will this whole procedure have to be gone over again? If he does not get a postponement, there will be difficulty then.

There are several young men in training from my constituency who should be at home. Will the same procedure have to be gone through to get their release? What I recommend to the Department of National War Services is that Canada be given a more definite system, a system which will be advertised so that young men can understand it, and know what action to take if they are key men and it is almost impossible for them to take training. It ought to be arranged so that they will not be trapped, as they are now. The policy should be widely known so that an hon. member is not called upon to intercede for every young farmer in his constituency. That responsibility should not fall upon us. We have enough to do to-day to look after the interests of our constituency, without this extra work.

I also recommend to the Department of National War Services that a board be set up for every county or constituency, whichever way it would work out best, such board to comprise either two or four men. Where possible, the appointments should be made half from each political group in the riding. In Ontario the executives would be mostly Liberal and Conservative. Such committee would have for its third or fifth member, according to the size agreed upon, a county judge. It would receive applications for postponements, make inquiries, and deal with applications on their merits. The opposition could not then say that this is a Liberal war.

As to the proposed plebiscite, may I say that I have not been favourable to the taking of a plebiscite, and I still wish it could be avoided. But our Prime Minister and cabinet ministers tell us that the matter has been given careful consideration, that the government is unanimously agreed, and that the plebiscite is going to be taken. Therefore there is nothing else to do but to go back to my constituency and advise my electors to go out and vote, making a cross opposite the word "yes", so as to release the government and many private members from pledges previously given the electors respecting the raising of recruits for overseas service. In this way the government would have a free hand to meet the situation which is changing from day to day. This war must be won at any cost or sacrifice.

From my observation during eight years as a member of the house I know that thousands upon thousands of dollars are wasted by every session being prolonged month after month by speeches made for no better reason than that of publicity, so that they may be printed in Hansard and reprinted back home. This is a war session. I know how busy the cabinet is, with the unlimited work connected with the prosecution of the war. Its work is greatly increased while the house is in session, and I should think it would welcome as short a session as possible. I know that help is scarce at home, and most hon. members, including myself, are needed at home.

Therefore I appeal to all private members on this side of the house as well as those in opposition groups to refrain from unnecessary, non-constructive speeches. Let us get down to the business of conducting the greatest possible war effort. Let us consider the general business of the country, and conclude this session by May 24, at the latest. This can be done just as well as by staying here until the heat drives us out in July.

Mr. ARMAND SYLVESTRE (Lake St. John-Roberval) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the great number of my French-speaking colleagues who have taken part in this debate prompts me to follow their example. Like them, I have always been and still am opposed to conscription for overseas service. I would go further and state that any government attempting to enforce this execrable measure will meet with numerous obstacles and many disappointments in every section of the country. During the last general election campaign of 1940 I made my own the statements coming from my leaders and the electors in my constituency, by casting their votes in my favour, ratified the pledges made at the time. I know beforehand that 95 per cent of the electors in my constituency will answer "no" to the question put by the plebiscite and I have no intention of asking them to release me from the solemn pledges I have taken. I therefore intend answering with them in the negative.

For all that, I have not the least objection against the holding of the plebiscite, for it is the fairest method of ascertaining whether or not public opinion has changed in the land, as some claim it has, and it is also the method most in keeping with the democratic principle of government of the people by the people. I even believe that the vast majority of the people will answer in the negative and that the effect will be to silence once and for all the voice of those fire-brands and false patriots whose only purpose is self-interest and whose ever readily borrowed cloak of patriotism only serves better to disguise their turpitude and selfishness.

I will therefore vote confidence in the King administration. I will also add a word in connection with the abnormal situation created by calling farmers' sons for military service. Mine is principally an agricultural constituency. More than ever is a greater and more extensive agricultural production being advocated. In order to increase production, cheese factories are being operated over the winter in my constituency; work on the farm is increased as a consequence and this is no time to reduce the number of available farm hands.

The exemption board for the district of Quebec sits in Quebec city, 200 miles from my district. When a farmer's son receives a call from the registrar, he must within eight days of its receipt send a request for postponement to the latter. The registrar has no authority to decide whether the request should be granted or not, but has to transmit it to the board. The latter sits from time to time and receives hundreds of applications which it hasn't even time to read, with the result that applications for postponement are rejected when they should be granted. On account of the great distance and the consequent expense, farmers and farmers' sons cannot afford to submit their case in person. Because of the serious prejudice resulting therefrom, I would suggest that the board delegate a representative to the districts of Lake St. John and Chicoutimi to meet the applicants, examine their requests on the spot and report to the board.

Otherwise, the way things are going, we are slowly crippling agricultural production which, to my mind, is more necessary to victory than the manufacture of arms and munitions, for, as a consequence of the defeats in the Pacific, there will remain only Canada to supply foodstuffs to Great Britain in the event of the Japanese securing the mastery of the Pacific and cutting communications with New Zealand and Australia.

In addition, lumbering employs thousands of men, and in my district there was a shortage of labour this year. I know that many farmers' sons go to the lumber camps in winter. They are more useful there than in the army, for the work of the woodsman requires a degree of capacity and of physical strength which is not given to all. In calling this class of men to the colours we are crippling another essential industry.

Another serious problem calls for attention on the part of the government. I refer to the movement away from the land. My duties in the army have enabled me to grasp the extent of it for I had occasion to visit many localities, and a continuance of such a situation will spell disaster. A great number of farmers' sons leave the land to work in factories. They are attracted thereto by fairly high salaries, by comparatively short working hours and by the pleasures of city life. Most of them do not save anything, they squander all their earnings and enjoy themselves without any thought for the future. A young man who leaves the farm to work in a factory is lost forever to agriculture and the terrible lesson of the last post-war period is now quite forgotten. As every one knows, one of the main causes of the last depression was the movement away from the land. If nothing is done about this, the next post-war period will be worse than the last one, for when the factories now employing thousands of farmers' sons close their doors, those men will not go back to the land but will swell the ranks of the unemployed in our large cities, as has happened in the past. The government should make arrangements with the managements of those factories so that inquiries may be made about those who seek employment, and whenever it is found that they are from rural districts, they should not be accepted. Human nature is such that people must sometimes be protected against their own mistakes, but as I say, it is vitally important for our race that farmers' sons should remain at home.

In conclusion, I may say that I cannot understand the reasoning of those who, while claiming that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is our best safeguard, will vote against him. Such is certainly not my way of showing confidence in a man and I feel that in spite of the dark hours at hand and the clouds that are gathering over the horizon, the Prime Minister like the experienced helmsman he is, will bring the ship of state safely into port.

On motion of Mr. Eudes the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CHURCH

1941 WAR LOAN AND WAR SAVINGS CERTIFICATES—EXPENSES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, with reference to remarks made in the house yesterday and a return for which I moved on November 12 last regarding the victory loan and war savings certificates. A return was brought down in November. It was not satisfactory, and I have asked for particulars in question No. 39 now on the order paper, and also in a motion, No. 8, for production of papers. When these two matters are reached I suggest the question be passed as an order for return and the motion for papers carried with the understanding that the return be tabled after Easter. There was never any intention of interfering with the present loan.

SECOND VICTORY LOAN

RETURNS FROM ALBERTA—ATHABASKA ON THE HONOUR ROLL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. DECHENE (Athabaska): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance based upon reports appearing in the press this morning in relation to the new war loan. Has it come to the knowledge of the minister that once again communities in the fair and loyal province of Alberta have gone over the top in subscriptions to the new loan, and that Athabaska, in the riding which I have the honour to represent, stands at the very top of the honour roll?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I saw that report in the press, and assuming it is correct I wish to congratulate the province of Alberta and the hon. gentleman's riding.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And what about Mr. Aberhart?

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

IMPOSITION OF DEATH PENALTY BY HANGING—TORONTO PRESS REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): I should like to refer to an old question which I brought up in the house years ago. The Toronto Evening Telegram contains a report—the editor sent me a copy—in regard to a man who was hanged in Toronto the other day. The report states that the man was left hanging for over half an hour before he died. I bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice.

SUGAR

APPLICATION OF TWENTY PER CENT REDUCTION IN COMMERCIAL USE—WINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. C. BLACK (Cumberland): I wish to direct an inquiry to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with the wartime prices and trade board, which reports to his department. An inquiry comes to me from Nova Scotia as to whether sugar used in the manufacture of beers, wines and liquors is subject to the twenty per cent reduction imposed on other commercial users of sugar. If not, why not?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I had a letter inquiring about the use of sugar in the manufacture of beers and spirits. I made some inquiry and it confirmed my own impression that no sugar is used in the manufacture of beers and spirits. But with regard to wines I will make further inquiry and give my hon. friend an answer later.

APPLICATION OF TWENTY PER CENT REDUCTION IN COMMERCIAL USE—SOFT DRINKS AND ICE CREAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. LECLERC (Shefford): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Finance in relation to sugar. According to the press, the manufacturers of soft drinks and ice cream will have to reduce their consumption of sugar by twenty per cent. Will they be allowed to use any substitute, or will they have to cut down their production by the twenty per cent?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I shall have to get the information for the hon. gentleman from the wartime prices and trade board and answer his question later.

REDUCTION IN EXCISE TAX—ENCOURAGEMENT OF DOMESTIC BEET SUGAR PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I should like to make a statement on the subject of sugar. The increased cost of raw cane sugar, the necessity of rationing supplies of sugar both for household and industrial uses, and the desirability of encouraging the production of domestic beet sugar in the present emergency, have necessitated certain changes in the sugar situation which I would like to explain to the house.

As the house is aware, our purchases of cane sugar are made for the joint account of the United Kingdom and Canada by the British ministry of food. From the beginning of the war they have purchased for our joint account the total exportable surplus of British empire countries. The contracts are on an f.o.b. place of shipment basis and in the present calendar year the cost of such British empire sugars has been increased by 1 to 1½ shillings per hundredweight. War risk insurance costs have substantially increased and freights will no doubt average higher during the present year. Approximately one-third of imported sugars have been drawn from countries outside the empire. Last year these were purchased at an extraordinarily low price. They are mainly from Cuba and Santo Domingo, and the cost of such sugars in the present year will be $2.65 U.S. currency per one hundred pounds f.o.b. country of shipment, which is an increase of almost 1½ cents per pound as compared with last year. All imported sugars are sold by the sugar administrator at a fixed price c.i.f. refineries. This price has been held unchanged since May, 1940, at the figure of $3.30 per one hundred pounds. It is now proposed to increase this price to $3.55 and to increase the refiner's margin between his cost of raw sugar and the net selling price for refined sugar by about 21 cents per one hundred pounds. In this connection it may be noted that there has been no change in refiners' margins since control was established at the outbreak of war and the margin allowed has been below the margins obtained by refiners in the pre-war years in spite of the substantial increases in cost that have taken place. These increases in operating costs will now be further aggravated by the reduced volume of production necessitated by the rationing of sugar.

Under existing circumstances, relating to accessible supplies and shipping difficulties, it is obviously in the country's interests that the maximum amount of domestic beet sugar should be produced, and the sugar administrator some time ago notified all beet sugar producing companies that they should do everything possible to stimulate production. The increased value of about one-half cent per pound in refined cane sugar will of course extend to beet sugar and, in addition, contributions which have been made in the past to the sugar administrator to equalize the net price with the cost of cane sugar have been discontinued. This will result in an increased gross to the beet sugar factories of 83¼ cents per one hundred pounds of refined sugar.

The proportion of this increased value which will go to the beet farmers will, of course, vary on account of different terms of contracts with different factories and also as a result of differences in yields of tonnage and sucrose of the beets, but will amount, I am advised, even under the most unfavourable circumstances, to over $1 per ton in the price of sugar beets.

The new factory in Manitoba had an unfortunate experience last year. First, harvesting was interfered with by unusual rains, and an unusually early closing in of winter resulted in about one-quarter of the crop being left in the ground. With a considerable increase in the production in Alberta and normal expectations in Manitoba, it is anticipated that the production of beet sugars in these two provinces may slightly exceed the total requirements at the reduced rate of consumption of the three prairie provinces. Soft or brown sugars and other specialties are not made by the beet sugar factories, and some manufacturing processes require cane sugar. Therefore it seems probable that a considerable quantity of beet sugar from the prairies will be marketed outside that area. Prospects of an increase in Ontario beet sugar production are somewhat obscure, due principally to a shortage of labour. The departments of agriculture and labour are, I believe, studying this question with a view to possible relief.

On the recommendation of the wartime prices and trade board, we are taking certain steps to ensure that the above adjustments may not affect the price of sugar to the public. In the budget resolutions we shall propose a reduction in the excise tax on sugar from 2 cents to 1½ cents per pound. Pending such formal action, we are providing for a remission of this tax to the extent of one-half cent per pound dating from yesterday, February 16. This remission of a part of the excise tax has, as I have said, been necessitated by the desire to avoid any increase in the cost of sugar to the public. To prevent the realization of any inventory profits, one-quarter cent per pound will be collected on all inventories in the hands of the refineries as at the close of business on February 14.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So far as the consumer is concerned, his position will not be affected?

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The retail price will be the same, the loss being taken up by the treasury?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Those provisions with respect to the reduction of the excise tax went into effect yesterday?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How about prepayments on wholesalers' stocks; will they be refunded? This is an old sore in other lines of commodities of the same character, and I recommend to the minister that consideration be given the refunding of this reduction to wholesalers and other distributors. Otherwise these men are going to have to bear that loss themselves. If the principle of the loss being borne by the treasury is a good one, it ought to be carried through the piece.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall look into that situation. I would think it would depend on when the sugar was delivered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: On sugar delivered after midnight last Sunday night I should think the tax would be one and a half cents, regardless of what returns were made. But I shall look into it.

WOOL

CURTAILMENT OF IMPORTS AND SHORTAGE OF STOCKS—RATIONING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Owing to the curtailment of wool shipments from India, Australia and New Zealand, and the shortage of wool stocks in Canada, is the government going to ration wool in Canada at once?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): To the best of my information stocks of wool in Canada are not short. I have gone into the matter thoroughly and my officers see no purpose in rationing wool at the present time.

FIRST VICTORY LOAN

PERCENTAGE OF SUBSCRIPTIONS REACHING BANKS OR LENDING INSTITUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, in view of the apparent necessity of making the present victory loan a success and in view of the numerous inquiries I have received, all indicating a certain line of thought in the minds of many who might be considering subscribing to the present loan, would the minister indicate to the house the percentage of individual subscriptions, and more particularly with respect to large amounts than to small, which were taken out at the time of the last victory loan and which, in the course of a very few months, reached the channels of lending institutions or banks? That question has been asked me over the week-end. For instance, a certain firm or individual may have taken out $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000 at the time of the last victory loan, and retained only $1,000, the rest reaching the channels of lending institutions. This is an urgent matter, and I should like to have some information concerning it.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall see whether the information is available and can be made public. I made inquiries not long ago about this situation, and I must say that I was surprised at the greatness of the percentage of long-term bonds which remained in the hands of the persons who bought them. The information was very satisfactory. With regard to short-term bonds, of course more left the hands of the buyers. They did find their way, I presume, into the hands of certain financial institutions. Our experience, however, with respect to the sale of long-term bonds was exceptionally good so far as the last victory loan was concerned.

Mr. LOCKHART: I suggest that a clear indication of just what the situation is would be most timely.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

EFFECT OF INCREASED ALLOWANCE BY BRITISH COLUMBIA GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The other day the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) asked a question about old age pensions in British Columbia. I replied in a way which I find was not as complete or precise as it should have been. The hon. member asked whether the Canadian government by order in council had amended the old age pension regulations so that the increased pension being paid by the government of British Columbia will not involve a corresponding reduction on the part of the federal government, and also whether I could tell him what was "the immediate situation in British Columbia."

In regard to the first of these questions, I said at the time that I believed we had communicated with all the provinces with regard to such an amendment of the regulations, but that I did not know what replies had been received. Actually I find that we have not communicated with all the provinces but have instead been relying upon the statement I made in the house on November 14 last, to the effect that if any of the provinces desires us to take the necessary steps to allow a province to pay a supplemental pension without such payment affecting the maximum pension now payable under the present act and regulations, "the government is prepared to amend the regulations and, if necessary, the act, to ensure such supplementary payments by a province do not entail a reduction in the pension payable under the act." I find also that when one province raised this question during the meeting with representatives of provincial governments in December last, I again stated the dominion's position directly to all the provinces in substantially the same words as I used in November last.

The situation, therefore, is that if and when we receive a formal request from any province to amend our regulations in this respect, we shall be glad to make the necessary amendment. For some time it was not clear to me whether an amendment to the regulations would be sufficient or whether the act itself had to be amended. I am now advised by the Department of Justice that an appropriate amendment to the present regulations could be made under the power given in the act itself, to provide by regulation for the manner in which the income of a pensioner is to be determined for the purpose of the act.

In regard to the second question asked by the hon. member for Acadia, I find that the Premier and Minister of Finance of the province of British Columbia made the following statement in his budget speech delivered on January 23:

> The government of the province has given careful consideration to this matter and is of the opinion that conditions in British Columbia warrant the increase of old age pensions to $30 per month, and, pending appropriate action by the dominion to that effect, it proposes to supplement the pension now paid by $5 per month. Of this amount, $2.50 is the provincial share of the increase recommended, and the other $2.50 represents a war-time cost of living bonus, which will cease if the scale of pensions is increased by the dominion before the cessation of hostilities. The payment of this additional sum will be made on precisely the same basis as current pensions and will be subject to the maximum limitation provided in the act. Generally speaking, a British Columbia pensioner will now receive $25 instead of $20 per month. Should the supplemental payment, however, bring the total income above the maximum of $365 per annum, it will be reduced by that portion which would be in excess of the said maximum.

This statement apparently represents the present policy of the government of that province. I understand that an item was included in the estimates to provide the necessary appropriation for this supplemental pension, and as the provincial legislature has adjourned, the presumption is that the item was passed. I expect, therefore, that we will shortly be receiving a formal request from the province of British Columbia asking us to take any steps that may be necessary to make it possible for the province to implement its policy. I may add that if I understand correctly what the provincial government intends it may not be necessary for us to make any amendment even to the regulations, because you will note from the statement I have read from Mr. Hart's budget speech that the supplemental pension is only to be given in cases of pensioners who have supplemental income—that is, income above a maximum pension payable under our act of $20 per month—of less than $125 per year, and is only to be given in such cases to such an amount up to $5 per month as will bring the total income, including present pension, provincial supplemental pension and any supplemental income, to an amount not in excess of $365 per year.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO BRITAIN

OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION OF BILLION DOLLAR GIFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the government. Because the debate on the address in reply is drawing to a close, and there is no desire on my part to prolong the debate, may I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance whether any special legislation will be brought down during the discussion of which the billion dollar gift to Great Britain would be in order.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe there will be several opportunities for discussion of the matter to which the hon. member has referred. Certainly if the appropriation bill included that particular item, that bill would afford ample opportunity for discussion. The Minister of Finance has just intimated to me the possibility that the billion dollar measure may be made the subject of a special bill. In that event, of course, there will be ample opportunity.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION CONCERNING BRUCE COAL COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, as a private Liberal member—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HOMUTH: Thank God for that.

Mr. POULIOT: —it is my painful duty to rise to a question of privilege, not for the redressing of any wrong, but to make my position clear.

Mr. McGREGOR: You should never do that.

Mr. POULIOT: I hear only intelligent remarks. I did not hear what was said.

Paragraph 297, found at page 97 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, quotes May as follows:

> The imputation of bad motives, or motives different from those acknowledged, misrepresenting the language of another, or accusing him, in his turn of misrepresentation, charging him with falsehood or deceit; or contemptuous or insulting language of any kind; all these are unparliamentary and call for prompt interference.

I did not ask for interference, and I do not now. But I was deeply sorry yesterday when my leader, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said it was his understanding that my question regarding the use of mobile units and the improvement of ways of communication had been put with the intention or purpose of embarrassing the government.

It seems to me that what I said on January 30 when speaking on the debate we are now about to resume was not said to embarrass the government. I did on a later date raise the question about the sale of the same coal three times by the Bruce Coal company. I did so just to prevent waste and theft. And now may I bring the attention of the government to the fact that although my question of February 9 respecting the Bruce Coal company has not been answered, a new government contract has been awarded the same company since that question was asked. I should like to know if that is true, and I should also like to have an answer to this question.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The last thing of which I would accuse my hon. friend is seeking to embarrass anyone.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is fine irony.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall seek to relieve the hon. member's embarrassment by securing an answer to his question as soon as possible.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

PURCHASE OF GUNPOWDER—EVACUATION TO INLAND AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, as a public Liberal member I would like to ask a question of the government. I regret not having submitted it in writing to the government beforehand, but my reason for not doing so was that I have not the faintest idea which branch of the government is handling the Japanese situation—nor has any other British Columbia member.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does anybody know?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The Japanese in British Columbia can still, under permit, purchase powder. That is the condition, according to a press dispatch of February 6. Is that a correct statement of the situation—that the Japanese can still purchase powder in British Columbia, under permit? My second question is whether the Japs—I do not say Japanese—near the Ruskin power dam in British Columbia have been moved, and if not, why not?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As to the powder, that has been prohibited. As to the dam, I am not in position to say anything at the moment but I shall try to get my hon. friend the information he desires shortly.

THE WAR IN THE FAR EAST

AID TO THE EMPIRE AND ALLIED FORCES IN THE PACIFIC AND EASTERN ASIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to a question which I asked last week, as reported on page 497 of Hansard, regarding the Pacific, Singapore and the far east. At that time the Prime Minister answered me and said that he was consulting Britain and would give me a reply later—not on a Pacific council but on Singapore. I was not in the house yesterday afternoon, but I understand that the Prime Minister has not as yet replied to my question. I gave him notice of it to-day. He has proposed a secret session which is not legal under the rules. On June 12 last I asked the Prime Minister about a secret meeting on this matter with the British Columbia members and not the whole house. In England the Singapore question was debated on a motion to adjourn the house; the Lord Privy Seal, the leader, allowed a debate on Singapore from early in the afternoon until midnight. The whole question was gone into, and Australia also spoke strongly, publicly and openly. I think it is a mistake that this matter of life and death to the empire should be dealt with in private.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: The life of the British commonwealth is at stake and I wish to protest against any secret meeting.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not know that I am sure of what my hon. friend has just said. He began, as I understood him, by referring to a question which he had asked with respect to the Pacific council. That question I answered yesterday. If I understand him aright, he is asking why I have not replied. I would say that I have replied. He will find on page 598 of Hansard the statement I gave to the house in answer to his question. As to my having had a meeting with the British Columbia members, that would have been a pleasure for me but it is one that I have not had this session.

Mr. GREEN: He said last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, well, I beg the hon. member's pardon. I had a meeting last year with the British Columbia members of all parties in the house. I do not know whether my hon. friend is taking exception to that or whether he wishes me to repeat it this year. I shall be pleased to seek to meet his wishes. As to the house proceeding in secret session, my hon. friend is aware that arrangements are being made for a secret session. In connection with the proceedings of that session I shall be glad to take into account the representations he has just made about the unwisdom of pursuing certain courses in this house that have been pursued elsewhere.

Mr. CHURCH: Since the war started all meetings are in secret here. They are not reported under your press censorship, which should be abolished.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, February 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. RAYMOND EUDES (Hochelaga) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, since the opening of this session parliament has been seeking which one of two path opening out before it will lead straight to the objective, which is victory and the establishment of a better order. This pause is not a waste of time. Indeed, effective action stems from thought which directs.

By what principles should this search be guided? In the first place, this war is a conflict between two ways of life, a conflict from which no people is free. All nations, in varying degrees, are shaken by it. In such a conflict, to seek refuge in indifference is equivalent to desertion. Either our civilization will perish or hitlerism, slavery and iniquity will be vanquished.

From this principle there flows a fundamental consequence: each country is fighting for itself. England, Russia, the United States, China, Canada are waging war each one for its own preservation. Canada, therefore, is not fighting for the triumph of England or even of the British empire. It is fighting to defend its soil, its history, its past, its future, its freedom, its civilization. We are therefore fighting for a Christian ideal, for human civilization, for the liberty of the individual.

On what does victory depend? Only recently, a country's power was measured by its armed strength. To-day, in balancing the factors of strength, purely military might no longer has the absolute importance it once had. The strength of the best armed nation can only be measured in terms of its economic superiority. This is clearly shown by the methodical manner in which the enemy has used all his material and moral resources, as well as by the resistance offered by England, Czechoslovakia and Russia. The defeat of France is another evidence of that fact. Do you know how many German soldiers broke through the French line at Sedan, smashed the British and Belgian forces in Flanders, and destroyed at one fell swoop an army of five million Frenchmen? One hundred and fifty thousand men. Twelve panzer divisions with the assistance of a few thousand aeroplanes conquered France. The million German soldiers who followed had only a minor part to play: occupation.

Since war on the one hand brings into play all the strength and resources of the belligerent nations and since on the other hand the strength and resources of the warring countries will not become exhausted at the same time or in a single day, the basic problem in this war is one that implies a total as well as a lasting effort. Victory will come to whoever has sufficient resources to achieve a lasting effort, and enough strength to wear out the enemy.

The moral factor is an important part of that strength. In fact, public opinion or the morale of the people is an integral part of a nation's potential. History shows that an army which has a high morale and is fully conscious of its objective is a victorious army. To-day because of the constant risks of life modern man has become accustomed to calculation and reasoning, to appreciation of interdependent factors and to comparison of values. Man obeys a command and accepts a sacrifice for a purpose whenever he is in a position to appreciate the necessity of it.

Under what conditions is this long-drawn total effort to be carried on? Owing to the variety and multiplicity of needs, to the wide distribution of natural resources and to the highly specialized character of production, no one territory is capable of meeting alone the exigencies of a long-drawn-out war. Control of the sources of supply is essential to success. These sources are numerous, varied and scattered. Such control therefore implies freedom and mastery of the seas. The successful outcome of the war is therefore dependent upon a rational coordination of the total war effort contributed by each allied country.

A total effort, an enduring effort and a united determination to win, such are, Mr. Speaker, the conditions essential to victory.

In making its contribution each country will seek efficiency rather than quantity. Each country will take stock of the general need, of its own means and of the potential capacity of the Allied Nations. Such contribution cannot be the same in each case, neither as to form, extent or kind.

These brief remarks may serve to determine how Canada can and should do its duty as a warring nation.

To provide for its own defence is its first duty. As a French economist once stated, Canada is a geographical paradox.

Although its boundary follows a parallel of latitude, nature has, on the contrary, by its mountain ranges, its climatic zones, its natural resource deposits divided the North American continent along meridians of longitude. Canada is the outcome of a free pact between provinces possessing each its own characteristics inhabited by ethnical groups of various origins, cultures and ideals. A deeper interest has served to unite them on a broader basis.

For the sake of security, the government must maintain these ethnical groups and dissimilar elements properly balanced and united. The existing bond must be strengthened and, in public policy, every step that might be of such a nature as to endanger harmonious relations or would not entirely promote the common good should be consistently avoided. In the interest of security, the government is also bound to provide for the defence of the country and all civil needs.

It is only after these civil needs are met, after the home defence is organized, in other words, after public security is assured, that Canada will be in a position to contribute to the allies' war effort. Otherwise the Canadian war effort would fall short of its object.

In order to reach maximum efficiency, our effort must take into account both our own possibilities and the needs of the allied nations. England, Russia, China, Australia and north Africa may all become theatres of war, and it is evident that this situation hampers the development of resources and the production of equipment and food in all these countries.

The considerable proportion of their population thus released from these various activities can without inconvenience be assigned to purely military tasks.

Because of its geographical situation, our country enjoys a greater measure of security than the other allied nations. Not that Canada is entirely safe from attack, but the geographical situation of the enemy countries as compared with its own makes it more secure. Consequently, Canadian production is less likely to suffer interruptions liable to jeopardize victory. On the other hand, Canada's natural resources are vast and varied. Its soil is fertile. Its population, however, is small, and this fact is aggravated by the dispersion of this population over a narrow stretch of land extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

In order to be logical and to attain its fullest effectiveness, Canada's contribution to the joint war effort must therefore be concentrated upon the production and the supply to the allied countries of the war material and foodstuffs which they cannot produce or can produce only in insufficient quantities. Anything that interferes with the accomplishment of this task is an obstacle to the role which Canada is expected to play in the defence of freedom and civilization.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that no one can honestly deny that Canada has so far filled this role to the fullest. It must not be forgotten that when war was declared Canada had only recently emerged from a depression. Its agriculture and its manufacturing industry were just beginning to adapt themselves to the new markets they had had great difficulty in securing.

I invite those who criticize, either through inclination, interest or partisanship, to compare the quantity, quality and variety of our production, the effectives of our different armed forces, the amount of money raised by taxation and loans, in a word Canada's total contribution of to-day, with that of the last war. I ask them to think of the innumerable difficulties—the problems of transportation, to name only one of them—which this economic revolution, for that is what it really is, has involved. If they are sincere they will admit that our country has performed marvels. Our allies, the British people and their prime minister, our neighbours to the south and their president, have repeatedly praised and admired our achievement.

Yet, certain people are crying failure and demanding the head of the only man capable of carrying through the gigantic task which Canada has undertaken. Why? Because he has refused to yield to their wishes and make overseas military service compulsory.

In order to appraise it on its merits, conscription should be given its true perspective in the whole Canadian problem. This problem, I think I have shown, consists in providing collective security, in supplying our allies with foodstuffs and weapons, in maintaining an army, a navy and an air force. These four things are essential. Each one requires the same measure of attention in order that, a proper balance existing between them, the effort devoted to one of them may not injure the others. So, conscription is not an end in Canada's war effort. It is but a means of increasing the strength of the active army. Such is the only fair way of sizing up its importance.

Being a means, conscription must be judged by its results. If the latter are good, then conscription is desirable. If it impairs the efficiency of Canada's contribution to the common war effort, it must ruthlessly be rejected.

Let us now examine the effects of conscription. It will certainly be harmful to the war industry. It will take able-bodied men off the land, where they are already more and more needed. No one can deny the prime importance in this war of the navy and the air force, recruits for which are trained in this country. It is hard to see how conscription will help either of these two services. On the contrary, it is liable to disorganize the navy and cripple the air training plan.

Moreover, the controversy that has developed about conscription shows that the latter has not the unanimous support of public opinion. Consequently, it is a serious threat to national unity. Besides, it is a coercive measure, and coercion destroys enthusiasm and heroism, without which no victory can be won.

And if Canada were attacked, does any one believe that the soldiers sent to England or Asia through conscription—a mere handful of men in the allied armies—could defend our territory?

I cannot understand, Mr. Speaker, the admonishments given to the French Canadians by certain persons who urge them to desist from opposing conscription. I think I have clearly shown that conscription is not a problem restricted to Quebec. It concerns the whole Canadian people. Besides,—as has been stated by many honourable members from different provinces—the French Canadians have identified themselves with the cause defended by Canada and her allies with the devotion, the bravery and the generosity characteristic of the French soul. It follows, Mr. Speaker, that under the circumstances conscription is a nefarious theory, hardly consistent with true partiotism.

To my mind, such is the material contribution of Canada to the war. Before discussing her moral contribution, I wish to say a few words about the plebiscite.

It has been claimed that the government should have continued to administer the public affairs without resorting to a plebiscite. I sincerely confess that I would have preferred such an attitude. However, I cannot be persuaded that a member elected by the people can oppose the plebiscite. A democratic government derives its mandate from the people. The latter are governed by their elected representatives, who in turn must express the views of their constituents in so far as they do not conflict with the common weal. It is claimed that former statements by government leaders gave no indication that a plebiscite would be held and that, consequently, parliament should reject such a measure.

Does such reasoning sufficiently take into account every element of the problem? Politics must ensure the common good within the limits set by justice, charity and liberty. How can politics hope to live up to such virtues when deliberately setting aside the needs of the hour for the consideration of statements made under different circumstances and of directions designed to deal with needs which are no longer the same to-day.

Some still contend that the government cannot now break pledges taken at the time of the last general elections. Perfectly true. Does it follow that the parties to such contract are incapable of modifying its terms by common consent? Now, in a plebiscite, the government is asking the people if they believe that a clause in that contract between them should be changed. Should the people refuse, then such clause would remain in its original form. To refuse a contracting party the right of consulting the other is the very denial of liberty. To refuse the right of holding a plebiscite is to deny to the people the exercise of an inherent privilege of liberty, that of stating one's opinion, a privilege which the democratic system does essentially grant to the people.

In order that their war contribution may be thoroughly efficient, the Canadian people must be united in their ardent and enthusiastic determination to win. A lofty conception of their purpose must serve as the inspiration for the necessary sacrifices they must accept.

Why is there war? Why this tremendous sacrifice of the Canadian people? Is it simply for the joy of victory, simply to preserve pre-war conditions under which the individual certainly did not enjoy the fair share of well-being which the state should provide? No. We are not fighting for victory alone, but for peace, for real peace. And this does not mean the mere absence of conflict. It means a state wherein, under the aegis of justice, charity and liberty, human faculties may attain a full development. Post-war will be such as we shall have made it. The people have selected us to direct their destinies. A politician must not let events overtake him. He must scan the future that he may foresee and master it.

The new order which the post-war period will bring cannot easily be foreseen in every detail. It must first be born in the heart of each and every one. Then only can the state supply the appropriate setting wherein legitimate needs may obtain just satisfaction. Democracy will supply this setting. For the democratic formula is not static. It is dynamic and naturally tends towards improvement.

Our government has already taken steps in this direction. Under the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) a group of experts are studying post-war problems. On the other hand, unemployment insurance, stabilized trade and prices and other measures are due to temper the trying hours of the post-war days to come.

These measures are but the first step. Dealing with one of its aspects only is not solving the whole problem. The inauguration of a new order presupposes a general consideration of all post-war problems and a thorough knowledge of all questions relating to manpower and material.

This new order must be founded on justice and freedom. But there can be no justice unless the rights of the poor, the workers, the minorities and every other class are respected. Without equality and fraternity, justice is a vain word. However, equality and fraternity lose their beneficial character when the leaders use them as a bait for the weak and the lowly.

Liberty must be enjoyed by everyone. Enjoyment of power, privileges and fortune by a few while the majority labour under the weight of restraint cannot be considered as freedom. There is no freedom in the absence of political rights and these are a mere illusion unless accompanied by economic rights. There is no freedom for the worker whose future is unsettled. Finally no freedom is possible unless the representatives of the people govern with the greatest possible efficiency.

Mr. Speaker, this new order erected on justice and freedom is our goal. I am confident that our efforts will not be in vain, which would be the case unless we are guided by the principles for which we are fighting. In the present conflict we fight the enemy by our own methods. It were better not to fight than to use nazi methods.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I express the hope that when the struggle is ended in victory, this new order will prevail. Let us spread this ideal through the land. Let everyone's ambition be that of living in a united Canada in the enjoyment of justice and freedom. Then will our efforts and our hearts be united through the struggle ended by victory, for if it be true that men die in combat, it is equally true that nations often disappear for refusing to fight.

Mr. A. S. RENNIE (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few observations on the question now before the house, may I grasp this belated opportunity to congratulate the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I should like to compliment them upon the splendid speeches which they made in moving and seconding that motion. I venture to say, and I believe most hon. members will agree, that the material which they used in their presentations was excellent; and I believe that if we turned back over the pages of Hansard we should find that their speeches have been excelled by few.

The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) had the splendid opportunity of visiting England and seeing conditions there at first hand. They naturally, therefore, speak with some authority. They have returned to Canada and have given us a vivid picture of what those stout-hearted people of Britain are enduring in this tremendous conflict.

In passing, I should like to compliment the hon. member for Northumberland, N.B. (Mr. O'Brien), who a few evenings ago gave us of this house an opportunity of seeing some of the pictures which he had taken in England, and of realizing more fully the courage and endurance of those brave people. I have personally spoken to a number of Canadians who recently returned from Britain, and have been amazed at what I have learned of the gallantry and determination of the British people, and the sacrifices which they are making to preserve freedom not only for themselves but for all the peoples of the world.

I recall a speech made in this house by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) on November 19, 1940, reported on page 208 of Hansard. He said:

> Some two months ago I listened to a radio commentator from London who said that one of the amazing sights in that great city, was the number of flags that could be seen flying there. Most touching of all, I thought, was his statement that in instance after instance these flags could be seen floating over ruined buildings, many of them the humble dwellings of the poor. These people, forced to see their homes destroyed, their personal possessions gone, sometimes members of their families maimed or killed, digged themselves out of the wreckage and at once they planted above it the flag of Britain. That act seems to me symbolic. They plant that great flag there, not only to defy Hitler, not only to encourage the weak and inspire the faltering among themselves, but also as an emblem of hope and of prophecy. And the hope and the prophecy are this: that just as the flag of Britain rises over the physical ruins of some of its homes, so out of the wreck and welter of this war there will arise a greater Britain, a Britain strengthened and stiffened by its heroic struggle, a Britain which will lead the world into better and fairer ways of life, not for one class or group, but for all people.
> So long as that spirit remains we need have no doubt as to the ultimate outcome of this war. The whole of Britain is under attack now, but in her own time she and her dominions will take the offensive. They are on the offensive even now; for our gallant airmen are carrying the war to the heart of enemy countries and to the territories which Germany has conquered, and our incomparable fleet still commands the seas. Her soldiers at Dunkirk have proven their quality. We shall see Britain triumphant, and long after the name of Hitler will have become nothing but an unpleasant memory, the same flag which now waves over disordered heaps of crumbled brick and stone and mortar will be flying freely and proudly in the airs of heaven, sheltering liberty and justice and freedom and truth in its benevolent shade. That is the hope and the promise of the British flag flying over the ruins of British homes.

In these difficult days, when our empire is faced with the greatest crisis in its history, one cannot help but recall the words of a great Canadian, Doctor MacDonald, when he said on one occasion, "It would be indeed a calamity beyond compare were that world empire broken and its fragments scattered abroad." Yet on the other side of the picture one has the encouraging words of Burke, who said that the ties of empire are as light as air but strong as links of steel.

In the preservation of this British empire we need to-day the encouraging words of Burke. Canadians played a great part in the first world war, and when the history of that war was written the pages were bright with the matchless deeds of valour of our men. And, sir, after a quarter of a century we still think of those fine, stout-hearted men and their deeds at Ypres, Passchendaéle, the Somme and Vimy Ridge. So to-day we must show to the world that what Canada did in 1914-18, Canada can do to-day on a larger scale.

But in order that we shall do our best in this country there must be cooperation on the part of every individual citizen of this dominion. Cooperation is not merely a sentiment; it is an economic necessity. The efforts of every man and woman in this dominion I believe should be directed through the government into the avenues of service for which they find themselves best fitted. May I quote here Mr. Churchill's words spoken in this chamber on December 30, 1941, as reported at page 4480 of Hansard, January 21, 1942:

> In this strange, terrible world war there is a place for everyone, man and woman, old and young, hale and halt. Service in a thousand forms is open. There is no room now for the dilettante, for the weakling, for the shirker or the sluggard. The mine, the factory, the dockyard, the salt sea waves, the fields to till, the home, the hospital, the chair of the scientist, the pulpit of the preacher—from the highest to the humblest, the tasks are all of equal honour. All have their part to play.

I think it is the consensus of the Canadian people that Canada has taken a preeminent position in this great world scene. Men have their own views on politics and on political personalities; they may prefer one Canadian statesman to another. These are important matters; they are the blood and bone and muscle of democracy at work. But in a world convulsed with the mighty shock of the fiercest war of which history has record, factional, political and partisan differences should sink into their proper and proportionate place. When great forces are in action, with powerful tides and undercurrents sweeping over and through countries and peoples, the obvious has a way of being overlooked. But just because a fact is obvious it is not less significant. It is no less fraught with rich cargoes of ideas and ideals. Obviously Winston Churchill is the man of the hour of Britain; obviously President Roosevelt is the man of the hour in the United States; obviously Joseph Stalin is the man of the hour in Russia, and obviously Prime Minister Mackenzie King is the man of the hour in Canada.

While there are some who are outspoken in their condemnation of the Prime Minister's policy for Canada's war effort, these same critics are just as ready to admit that because of the happy personal relations between the Prime Minister of Canada and the President of the United States, relationships which have their roots in the common understanding of the ways of life of Canada and the United States, the three thousand miles of unfortified border between the two countries are marked with the personalities of Mackenzie King and Roosevelt. Who but our Prime Minister could have appealed to the United States in forthright language for help for Great Britain? Our Prime Minister did this in a broadcast from London last year. Canada could speak to the United States as an American nation.

Did not Canada declare war on Germany of her own volition? And in the succeeding year under the good neighbour policy our Prime Minister entered into a joint north American agreement with President Roosevelt. When Pearl Harbour was attacked, Canada declared war on Japan in advance of both the United States and Great Britain. Canada could do these things because, to put it bluntly, she was a free agent. Canada is a member of the British commonwealth of nations, but she is a nation. She showed her loyalty to the crown in the brilliant reception given to Their Majesties King George and Queen Elizabeth in 1939. She again showed her loyalty in the tumultuous welcome given to Winston Churchill in Ottawa. So I say, how properly can we assay the qualities, the seemingly paradoxical qualities of Canada? With the structure of the world organization rudely, roughly shaken, Canada, through her Prime Minister, became the stabilizer and acted to maintain the equilibrium. Winston Churchill perfectly illustrates the situation. He visits Washington; he comes to Ottawa, and then visits Washington again. Speaking in this very chamber Prime Minister Churchill said:

> Canada, sir, occupies a unique position in the British empire because of its unbreakable ties with Britain and its ever-growing friendship and intimate association with the United States. Canada is a potent magnet, drawing together those in the new world and in the old whose fortunes are now united in a deadly struggle for life and honour against the common foe.

I should like to say a word on behalf of that great mass of patriotic men and women in Canada who derive their living from tilling the soil. In my own county, according to the latest available figures, we have a land area of about 489,000 acres; the number of occupied farms is about 5,000, and the farm population is something over 20,467. These fine men and women are bending every effort to help Canada fill her quotas of cheese, bacon, eggs and other farm products for Britain, and in order to do this they are toiling from early morning until late at night. There is no eight-hour day for these hard-working people. I should like to quote a few words from the very fine address of the Prime Minister on January 26, when he presented to this parliament what one might call Canada's balanced war effort. He said, at page 34 of Hansard:

> A vital aspect of Canada's war effort is our contribution to the food supply of Great Britain. This contribution has grown steadily in importance. Britain cannot feed herself, and her own great and growing armed forces. Still less can she feed the ever-increasing numbers of men we are sending from Canada to add to her armed strength. In the present war, unlike the last, her sources of food on the continent of Europe have all been closed off by enemy occupation. Canada is the nearest source of food left open. Without our food, the people of Britain might starve.

Then, at page 40 of Hansard, the Prime Minister went on to say:

> Canada has contracts with Great Britain for bacon, hams and other pork products amounting to 618,000,000 pounds. The forthcoming agreement for cheese is expected to be for at least 125,000,000 pounds. Then, 675,000 cases of evaporated milk will probably, again this year, be required by Britain. The present contract for eggs is for 30,000,000 dozen. Further large contracts for summer and fall delivery are anticipated. Canada has also undertaken to supply Britain with 4,500,000 pounds of honey; 510,000 barrels of fresh apples; 425,000 cases of processed apples; 300,000 cases of canned tomatoes, and other fruit and vegetable products in substantial quantities. Altogether, the value of the exports of the above commodities will be at least $180,000,000. Exports of the same products in the year before the war were valued at about $50,000,000.

Prosperity on the land, Mr. Speaker, means prosperity for all. I believe no calling surpasses farming from the standpoint of health and vigour, both of body and of intellect. Farmers as a class do not ask for charity; they are willing to work for what they get. Moreover, they constitute such a large proportion of our population that their welfare demands the consideration of all. This, coupled with the fact that they are engaged in our basic industry, makes the need for such consideration doubly great. Unfortunately many city people do not know the farmer. They have no appreciation of what he contributes to Canadian life as a whole, or the relationship that exists between his work and the earning of a livelihood in urban centres. So that in passing I should like to mention briefly one or two points which I believe are in the interests of the farmer, because after all I believe farming holds the key to prosperity in Canada and that this basic industry must therefore come first in legislative thought and action.

I should like to touch briefly on the mobilization act, in regard to young men being called up for training. I come from military district No. 1, which has contributed a great many fine young men both for overseas service and for the defence of Canada. But I have long since come to the conclusion that it is most unreasonable that we in Canada should take away from our farms the help that is so essential if we are to produce the food supplies which the Prime Minister stressed so much in his address a few days ago. I appreciate the fact that if a young man appeals to the registrar he is given consideration. In passing I should like to express my appreciation of the work done by Mr. Martin, registrar for military district No. 1. I do not know the gentleman very well; I have never gone to him to ask that any young man be relieved from training, but I believe he is a reasonable and fair-minded man, who gives every consideration to any request he receives, which is as it should be. The point I should like to make, however, and the point I should like to draw to the attention of the government, is this. I do not believe that in this crisis, when the farmers are finding things most difficult, they should have postponements for only perhaps six months. A young man who is on a farm, where the only other available labour is that of an old man perhaps fifty or sixty or seventy years of age, should be given an undertaking that he will not be called for military service, because I do not believe any industry requires early preparation for its annual activities more than does farming. Then, too—and this is not a new thought—we realize that the farmer is greatly handicapped in having to pay wages more or less equivalent to those paid in factories making the munitions of war.

I have every confidence in our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and I believe the policies which will be worked out by the government for this year will be of benefit to the farmer. But I suggest to the minister that these policies should not be left in abeyance any longer. Let us frame our programme so that the farmer will know this spring just what his position will be, so that he may put in his seed as early as possible.

There is another point in connection with farming I should like to mention in passing. I refer to the price of farm implements. I realize, too, that in war-time farm implements are bound to cost more money. Nevertheless I believe some arrangement should be made by the government under which the prices of what the farmer has to buy will be closer to parity with the prices of the commodities he offers for sale.

I come from a part of Canada in which the growing of tobacco has developed into a great industry. I would ask the government to realize that this is a seasonal occupation. The men involved have spent large sums of money in equipping their farms. Usually they have five or six kilns costing about $500 each. I am inclined to the belief that in connection with the sale of tobacco there is something radically wrong with the process of grading. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to give the matter his attention.

May I be permitted to say a few words respecting compulsory service, and the committee for total war. I shall state frankly that I have taken exception to that committee for calling men from all parts of Ontario to attend a dinner at the Royal York hotel, without first informing those men as to the matters to be discussed at the meeting. I know some men attended the meeting believing it to be called for the purpose of organizing the victory loan campaign, and they were somewhat disappointed when they learned otherwise. In my view the committee by its agitation did more harm than good. Had their method been one of cooperation rather than one of destroying and tearing down, they would have contributed much more to Canada's war effort.

Although I have not the authority for this, I am told that the cost of advertising and other activities of the committee must have been somewhere in the neighbourhood of $150,000 to $200,000. In addition to that, large quantities of gasoline were used by two hundred men who drove to Toronto from all parts of Ontario. Had the committee put that amount of money to the credit of the government to purchase a corvette or a minesweeper, or some equipment for the benefit of our soldiers, it would have been making a greater contribution.

I received letters and cards from my own constituency, some of which were in favour of a total war effort, some in favour of conscription of man-power only, and some in favour of conscription of wealth. But from a constituency with a voting population of about 35,000, in comparison the number of letters and cards received was small.

In my constituency the committee for total war, sincere in its efforts but overzealous in its patriotism and its wish to see the war ended as soon as possible, gave vent to its feelings through the medium of this organization. I have received telegrams from my constituency, some of which favoured, and others of which objected to the operations of that committee. For instance, I hold in my hand a letter from a veteran of the last war, an extract from which I shall read to the house:

> As a veteran of the last war, I suppose I might be expected to be in full support of a total war effort. This is so true that I am prepared to place my property at the disposal of the government, and serve in any capacity at the army scale of pay, if the people behind this movement, including those who signed the petition, are prepared to do the same. But I am not prepared to assist in any way to conscript my neighbor's son on any other basis. You probably know that at least some of the people whose names appeared as taking the petition, made fortunes out of the last war and hope to add to them out of this one; and I want to record my objection as strongly as possible to this conscription for the other fellow. I have no authority to speak for others, but I am sure you would find my sentiments approved by a large majority of people, irrespective of politics.

And one other clipping:

> I have three sons in the air force, and I applied for enlistment myself. I do not know about military conscription. If it were absolutely necessary, I suppose it will have to be; but I believe a good, honest, wholehearted war effort, governed by good sense as at present, is what I stand for.

I should like now to touch on the question of the bits-and-pieces programme which has been functioning under the Department of Munitions and Supply. In that connection I would register a complaint which, I believe, is worthy of consideration and is in fact receiving some consideration. I am inclined to the belief that in this great war effort, and especially in connection with the development of our industry, there has been too much centralization in the larger centres, with the result that the smaller towns have not had the opportunity to compete in connection with a variety of industrial activities.

There are many small towns in Ontario where the housing situation is not acute, and where large numbers of men could be accommodated. But we find that at least up to the present time industry has been directed toward the larger cities. I leave this thought with the government, in the hope that as time passes this condition may be remedied.

I should like to make a few brief observations concerning the plebiscite. I did not feel I could add much to the debate, but I do wish to make my position perfectly clear in regard to this important matter. When I had the honour of being elected as member for the constituency of Oxford, I believed that in all matters of public interest I should use my best judgment in respect of any action I might take. I believed that that should be my course with respect to matters such as the one I am now discussing. Having first obtained information as to the facts, I believed I should vote according to the dictates of my own conscience, and, Mr. Speaker, that is what I intend to do. I believe in the truth of the old adage that honesty is the best policy. The Prime Minister and practically every hon. member supporting the government stated clearly during the 1940 election campaign, "No conscription of men for overseas service." Doctor Manion, the then leader of the National Conservative party, also made his position clear. Some have urged that because the government has the largest number of supporters, it should disregard its pledge. My thought is that the larger numbers on the government side constitute all the more reason why they should appeal to the people and have the people make the decision.

At the moment I am not saying what stand I should take if it comes to a matter of conscription. I reserve that decision for myself. In the light of my vote on the plebiscite —and I shall vote for the plebiscite—I shall then endeavour to gather a knowledge of the facts, as I have done in this instance, and shall try to vote intelligently on the matter of conscription when it becomes an issue.

At this point I had intended to quote some authorities to support my vote on the plebiscite. I had intended to quote the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), than whom there is no more outstanding man in this great dominion. I refer hon. members to his speech. In this connection I think of the Prime Minister's speech with respect to the plebiscite. I think, too, of the fine contribution made to the debate by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). I think of the splendid contributions of the Minister of National Defence, (Mr. Ralston) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I have perfect confidence in these men who are trying to direct Canada's war effort, and while I am in this house I shall be guided considerably by them. I feel that after all they know the situation better than we do; and more than anything else I am interested in the preservation of the unity of this great dominion of Canada. National unity is no bogy. National unity is of vital importance, even beyond the present crisis. After this war we shall have to face tremendous problems of world reconstruction and nations and men of goodwill must cooperate. I believe that Kipling's "The Law of the Jungle" still holds good:

> For the strength of the pack is the wolf, > and the strength of the wolf is the pack.

How can we play a part in the new world order if we have failed in the duties of brotherhood and cooperation here in our own country? With tolerance and goodwill at home we shall have taken a long step toward helping in an international world and toward the solution of Canada's own social and economic problems. Canadian unity, warm, effective and vital, is the key to our entire future.

During the last war I think all men in Canada had great admiration for Marshal Foch who led the allied armies. He represented to us the type of perfectly functioning mind which amid the storms and stresses of conflict found its way to victory. I recall that on one occasion when General Foch was addressing the students of the war college in France he said:

> You are to be the brains of an army, I beseech you in the name of God, think!

In so many places tolerance and friendship have been replaced by bitterness, freedom has given way to tyranny, the light of democracy has been somewhat extinguished. I can think of no more needed message to leave with the leaders of this country than words similar to those Marshal Foch uttered to the men who were to lead the armies of France:

> You are to be leaders in the nation;
> You are the builders of Canada;
> You are thinking for the people,
> I beseech you in the name of God, think!

Mr. H. A. MacKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, the question now before the house has been under debate for over three weeks, so I appreciate fully that anything I may say will be largely repetition. But I feel that I cannot let the question pass without making a few suggestions, and I shall try to be brief in my remarks. It seems a peculiar state of affairs, and there must be something radically wrong with world conditions, that after engaging in and winning a world war in 1914-18, and after dictating the terms of peace, in a little over twenty years we should be in a second world war which is being waged with much greater fury, more powerful armaments and equipment, and with much more disastrous results to both human life and property than the war of 1914-18. Winning this war is essential, but winning the peace that will be a lasting peace, that will give us national security, is much more important.

We are facing the greatest crisis, not only of this century but in the world's history. So much has been said about total war effort and total mobilization of all our resources that the average Canadian citizen is confused as to what total war means and what is really needed for a total war effort. Every Canadian worthy of the name wants this to be a total war. I shall not repeat in this house details of the magnificent contribution Canada has made thus far in the war with her air force, her navy, her army and the great industrial development that has taken place in providing munitions and instruments of war, when, prior to September, 1939, practically all of Canada's industries were engaged in supplying domestic needs. In the present situation the drive for total war and conscription was made by a powerful Toronto group backed by an extensive newspaper campaign. This question of total war first arose in Toronto, then in Montreal, and then it spread throughout Canada and has caused a great deal of confusion. If it can be proved or successfully argued that the previous pledge not to conscript men for overseas service without consulting the people has actually impaired the war effort thus far; if there is a serious shortage of enlistments to fill out the plans of the army chiefs; if there is any shortage of industrial man-power to turn out the instruments of war, then the issue would be much clearer. But the best sources of information in Ottawa state that none of these things are true. However, the time may come when that will not be so and, of course, we must be prepared.

One of the greatest dangers to an all-out war effort is, I believe, a shortage of labour on the farm. I am speaking now particularly of Ontario where many hired men have left the farms to work in munitions plants for wages the farmer cannot afford to pay. In many cases the farm boy was drafted for military training, and when he asked for postponement he was, in some cases, advised by the Department of National War Services to take his four months' training in the winter when farm work is slack so that he might be home for seeding and harvesting. The act was, however, changed, and these boys now find themselves in the army for the duration of the war with very little hope of getting released. I believe it would be in the national interest if all farmers who are in the armed forces and who are needed on the farms were given leave of absence for seeding and harvesting. If this is not done, I fear our farmers will not be able to supply the foodstuffs that may be required for the feeding of Britain and our allies.

I shall place the contributing forces in three categories, and one is probably just as important as the other: the armed forces, the instruments of war and munitions, and the supplying of foodstuffs. The latter could easily be the deciding factor in the ultimate conclusion of the war. I have received many postcards from residents in my riding, and no doubt many hon. members have had a similar experience, which read:

> I believe the most efficient and honourable way for Canada to prosecute total war is by compulsory selective service without restrictions. The government of Canada should introduce this measure so that men who are best on the farms will be placed on the farms; those who are most helpful in the factories will work in the factories, and those best fitted will serve in the armed forces, wherever needed. Such a plan is fair to all the people of Canada.

That would be conscription of man-power, but would it be an all-out effort? We all remember back in 1914-18 when many thousands of Canadian soldiers went to Europe to fight, many paying the supreme sacrifice. But what happened at home? At that time many industries made so much money because of the war, that they have never had to do much since—many millions were made. At the beginning of this war the government took the stand that a similar situation must not exist, and the Excess Profits Tax Act was passed. This would take by taxation over eighty per cent of all profits made in excess of the profits made in the average four years preceding 1939. There was some logic in this because of the experience of the last war, but it does not go far enough. Many industries made big dividends during the four years prior to 1939, and they should be required to make an equal contribution. War at the best is waste. What financier, what farmer, what employee, what man in the armed forces should hope to come out of this war as well off financially as when he went into it? Nevertheless, many thousands of people apparently do. We talk about equality of service and sacrifice; how much has the average man in Canada sacrificed? If total war means contribution in kind and according to ability to winning the war, then total war must reach everyone, no matter who he or she may be. It must exempt no one. Then, if you divide the contributing forces into the three categories, the armed forces, the factories, and the farm, they should be put as nearly as possible on the same pay basis.

The income tax does take a large toll on salaries and on the revenue that is derived from our investments, but it does not go far enough. If the government is going to organize labour completely, it must also organize and regiment the capital resources of this nation. The Toronto Globe and Mail a few days ago in an editorial claimed that some people, when talking about conscription of wealth, meant confiscation of wealth. I do not think that is anyone's intention or is in anyone's mind. But what if some wealth had to be confiscated? What happens to the young man who gives his all, his life? Is that not confiscation? What about the soldier who comes back from the war crippled and broken in health? Is his health not confiscated? We say that the government looks after him and his dependents, and the Canadian government has done as well as or better than most other countries in looking after our war veterans; yet I know of several men who served in the last war who, because the pension board does not attribute their disabilities to war causes, are deprived of a pension or have to eke out an existence on a war veteran's allowance. We talk glibly about an all-out war effort, but let us go all the way. We live in a democracy; then let us start with the highest office in the dominion and end with the private in the army or the labouring man and be as nearly equal in service and sacrifice as possible until this war is won.

We have in Canada a fairly large population of foreign birth. Many have taken out their citizenship papers, and are good loyal Canadian citizens. Under the provisions of our Naturalization Act they must be domiciled within the British empire for five years before they can become naturalized citizens. Many find themselves in an embarrassing position because they have not been here for five years. I submit that the Naturalization Act should be amended so that they can take out their first or second year citizenship papers and assume their responsibilities as such, or else the mobilization act should be amended so that they, too, can contribute towards our war effort—and many of them are anxious to do their share.

We have many non-permanent reserve units in Canada, and I doubt if they are making any worth-while contribution to our war effort. There may have been a time in the early days of the war when they served a useful purpose, but with the selective drafts now in operation they are not much support to recruiting. I am not able to find out the exact number of these units, but there are probably eighty or ninety units of infantry, and probably nearly as many artillery units. Each unit has from two to four full-time officers, with the rank of anywhere from corporal to lieutenant-colonel. They usually train part-time a couple of nights a week. I contend that they are an added expense and are not making any worth-while contribution, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that these units should be mobilized for active service either at home or abroad, or dispensed with altogether. The defence department has worked out something along this line but it does not go far enough.

In 1867 the fathers of confederation were successful in uniting the two great races of this continent, with the status of equal rights and privileges, and with a common purpose for a united Canada. After seventy-five years have we been successful, and if not, why not? We have gone a long way, it is true, but I should like to see a law passed that would make it a serious offence for any politician to raise a racial or a religious cry in order to gain some political advantage. We must admit that that has been done many times in the past, and no true patriot would do it.

My father came to Canada as a young immigrant boy from Scotland. My mother's ancestors also came from Scotland and I have a great regard for the mother country. True, I am a Canadian first, but I believe that Canada will give her all to aid the motherland at this time.

Unfortunately politics has apparently entered into this question, and the question of conscription cannot be fairly dealt with on that basis. I stated in my election campaign of 1940 that I was opposed to conscription and did not believe it was necessary, and that the voluntary system was the best. I am still opposed to the principle of conscription; it is foreign to the very spirit of democracy. In this present crisis, if conscription is necessary to win this war, let us not only conscript man-power but go all the way and conscript all our resources. We already have conscription, and it is selective so far as age groups and medical fitness go. Young men are being conscripted every day for the army, and conscripted for the duration of the war.

We have three Ministers of National Defence. We have faith in these men. They have surrounded themselves with qualified military men and army advisers, and these military authorities in cooperation with the British war office should know where these troops can best meet the enemy and engage them. If outside Canada, so much the better. If we expect help in case of attack or invasion, and we might need it, surely we must be prepared to give help. Look at the map of the world in September, 1939, and look at it to-day; and then ask yourself, are we winning this war?

The plebiscite will not settle this question of conscription for the armed forces overseas. It was never intended that it should. If that question is introduced by the government, it will be settled on the floor of this house and members will make their own decision in view of all the circumstances, and abide by the consequences. I have faith that, if properly presented, the plebiscite will carry, and if we must have a plebiscite, let us bring in the bill without delay and get it over with. Anything that tends to confuse, retards our war effort. I cannot see why objection to the plebiscite should be regarded as a want-of-confidence motion. I do not consider it as such. We are living in the darkest days of Canadian history and we have a job to do. Let not politics or anything else interfere with it. Let us get on with the job.

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I fain would express the usual commendations in connection with the speech from the throne and compliment the mover of the address (Mr. Fournier), as well as the seconder (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford), without excepting the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), but the measures announced and the statements contained in the speeches are of such a distressing nature as to leave me no inclination to compliment their authors. Congratulations are worthless unless sincere. The remarks I desire to make are far from congratulatory. You may be positive that I deeply deplore this fact.

Besides various financial measures of an astonishing character, the speech from the throne announces a plebiscite to release the government from pledges and commitments concerning conscription and to allow them to alter the methods of raising men for service overseas. In fact, this is the last step towards conscription as the Prime Minister told us in his speech of January 26, as reported on page 44 of Hansard:

> National selective service is the method by which the government proposes to accomplish the mobilization of man-power on an extended scale. Let me define national service as it is understood by the government. By national service is meant any form of service, either voluntary or compulsory, which contributes directly to Canada's war effort.

And, later, he added:

> In announcing that national selective service is the method by which the government proposes to accomplish the mobilization of man-power on an extended scale, the government is not announcing a new policy. What we propose to do is to extend what, in fact, we have been doing right along, that is, to apply the principle progressively. In other words, we intend to continue to extend the application of national selective service to meet new needs as they arise.
> As I have already said, this policy, too, is not new, nor is it being advanced to-day for the first time, or as a consequence of high-pressure methods employed to influence the independence of members of parliament. The principle itself, as I have already explained, was approved by this parliament in June, 1940. It has already been applied to some extent. On November 12 last, I made it very plain to parliament that, with respect to the mobilization of man-power, the government's policy was one of national selective service; and, also, that an extension of the application of compulsory selective service—conscription, if you will—was a part of that policy.

Therefore, the Liberal party forgoes the doctrine which has ensured it public support for the last 25 years. This is a national political event the extreme importance of which no one underestimates.

The speech from the throne is a typical example of the usual methods used by the government in the consideration of a difficult problem and in the handling of a given situation. They wish to skirt the obstacle. So clever are they in their impertinence that they even attempt to bring the public to approve a policy that the Liberals have always represented as a national crime. The great question of the day is conscription for service anywhere in the world.

The Conservatives make it the main issue. An important number of English-speaking Liberal members are in favour of this measure. It is said that some members of the cabinet—and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) left little doubt on this subject in the minds of his hearers the other day—are conscriptionists at heart. The Prime Minister, a modern sphynx—and I regret his absence—claims that the government are gradually enforcing this measure; however, at the same time, he leaves us under the impression that he is opposed to it. He courts both the conscriptionists and the anti-conscriptionists. He claims that, in his mind, national unity is first and foremost.

In 1916 and 1917, did the Liberals act this way, did they give a thought to national unity? Have they preached a doctrine of unity, since then, while they were encouraging anti-conscriptionists in one part of the country and ultra-loyalists in another? Is it not to be feared that, at a time when national unity is more necessary than ever, the impression may be gained that the chief purpose of the Prime Minister is to avoid a cabinet crisis and to preserve above all unity within the Liberal party.

Notwithstanding the complete reversal of their attitude the Liberal government make a show of fulfilling their promises. They assume an appearance of righteousness. They pretend to attach more importance to the pledged word. However, their opportunism causes them to create a political situation more and more tense and confused.

There are attitudes and statements that would be comical were they not so tragic.

The mover of the address, in expounding the policies of the government to the satisfaction of the Prime Minister has stated with a courage worthy of recognition, that he will ask his electors and his fellow-citizens to release the government from their promises and commitments against conscription and to accept the sacrifice of submitting to compulsory military services overseas, in order to preserve national unity.

At the outset of his remarks in reply to the speech delivered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) on January 26, the Prime Minister blamed the Conservative leader for not having dared to use the word "conscription" in his amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, in spite of his advocacy of conscription in his speech.

The Prime Minister's outburst is all the more frivolous and childish that the said amendment provides for compulsory military service in all theatres of war. Moreover, when asked what he will do after the plebiscite will have released him from his pledges and his promises against conscription, the Prime Minister evaded the issue and refused to commit himself, though his intentions had been clearly disclosed in the speech from the throne, in the speech of the hon. member who moved the address and in his own speech. It is a case of a mote in the neighbour's eye and a beam in one's own. The Prime Minister plays on words and obtains an easy victory.

After pointing out the gigantic proportions of our war effort and of our assistance and gifts to England, the Prime Minister declared that, except for some slight differences, the Liberal government's policy is the same as that of the Tory party in the matter of war and selective service.

What an astonishing confession! The Prime Minister was certainly not thinking at the moment of all the abuse, opprobrium and ignominy the Liberal party had heaped on this same Tory policy which it now makes its own. It must then be true that the punishment is found in the sin itself.

A little further on, perhaps under pangs of remorse, the Prime Minister candidly admits that, were it not for the pledges taken and the promises made during the provincial election campaign in 1939, the election results might perhaps have not been the same.

If it be true, Mr. Speaker, that inconsiderate pledges and promises were instrumental in tricking the people into approval in 1939, then the party led by the Prime Minister must also admit having as stealthily garnered the votes which returned them to power since 1921, for such is the only method they have used in every campaign. Is it to be wondered that rancours still endure and that bitter opposition is encountered? Neither should we wonder if, based on such methods, on prejudices and a most cynical opportunism, the government is now in a tottering situation and national unity is crumbling.

That very illusive national unity, invented for use by the Liberal party, based on non-participation in foreign wars and on insults for the opponents of this doctrine, is not the Prime Minister betraying it when, admitting that his party's successes are due to solemn pledges, he singles out as a target for prejudice that very province of Quebec which bore him to power and kept him there and which received at his hands that very political training which is now held against it? This is what the Prime Minister stated on January 26, as appears on page 46 of Hansard:

> Hon. members are also aware that if, at the time when Canada's participation in the war was challenged in an election in the province of Quebec by a government professing a different political faith, a like assurance with respect to service overseas had not been given in the name of the present government by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, by the Minister of Public Works (Mr Cardin), and other Liberal leaders and members of this House of Commons from the province of Quebec, the verdict of the people of that province might have been wholly different.

The Quebec Liberal leaders bear a great share of responsibility for the present situation and their electors will certainly not be satisfied with fictitious and futile explanations nor with pious regrets. They will insist that these leaders protect them against conscription, as they agreed to do when they claimed to constitute their rampart against conscription. But why does the Prime Minister, when mentioning those who have taken pledges and made commitments against conscription, always exclude himself and the English-speaking Liberal leaders?

Has not the Prime Minister himself spoken against conscription in his radio address to the nation at the beginning of the 1940 campaign? Has not the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated at Markinch, during that same campaign, that the Liberal government would never enforce conscription of manpower for overseas service? Again recently did not the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) go to Montreal in early December of 1941 and advocate opposition to this measure in the province of Quebec? Did not the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) also repeat recently his opposition to this measure which he called nefarious and futile. Has not the Prime Minister himself endorsed not only commitments against conscription but also promises made against any participation in empire wars by the then Minister of Justice, by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) and the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), when he wired Mr. Francoeur on December 26th, 1937, the following:

Lotbinière electors have voted as Canadians who put national interest above all else.

I could submit evidence to the fact that English-Canadian Liberals, with the Prime Minister at their head, have just like French-Canadian Liberals advocated in this country, particularly in the Province of Quebec, a policy of non-participation to foreign wars and, right up to recent weeks, given solemn pledges against conscription. The country must surely be aware that they are all equally responsible in trying to win over public confidence by making false promises, as the Prime Minister admits.

Why are the Quebec Liberal leaders, the honourable Minister of Public Works and his friend, the late Mr. Lapointe, alone called upon by the Prime Minister to justify their stand before imperialistic opinion? The Prime Minister makes it necessary for us to denounce his ingratitude for those and for him to whom he owes his present position and all the honours conferred upon him; he would have us believe that his friendship for the late Mr. Lapointe, his friend and benefactor, was as artificial as the tribute to his memory paid by him in this house on January 21st last.

Mr. BRADETTE: What shameful language!

Mr. ROY: It is a fact. To such evident proof of opportunism and lack of sincerity on the part of the Liberal party, I would add further evidence, more concrete proof, if I may so express myself. Let us look up page 363 of the Parliamentary Guide, Mr. Speaker, where the numerical strength of the various parties is mentioned. We see that in 1921, out of 117 Liberal members, Quebec had contributed 65 to the Liberal party. In 1925, 60 out of 101; in 1926, 60 out of 116; in 1930, 40 out of 88. Up to that time, then, Quebec constituted the main element in the Liberal forces. But in the 1935 elections, we note that the other provinces swelled the ranks of the Liberal party by adding to the 55 members from Quebec a contingent of 116 other members, making a total of 171. The new Liberal family has still grown with the 1940 elections, when Quebec contributed 61 members out of 178 or 185, if the Progressive and Independent Liberals sitting on the government side of the house are included.

Therefore, the Liberal party has started to implement its armament programme after the elections of 1935, that is in 1937, while the new family had a decided influence on the old. That was the beginning of the Liberal government's evolution towards a policy of war.

As the moving power of the Liberal party's opportunism is now coming from a different direction, the Prime Minister immediately endorses the policy of the imperialistic group forming the majority and hardly conceals his relinquishment of former policy and his severance from former supporters. The Liberal party expounded its former policy to the French population in order to climb into power. To remain in power, it now endorses the policy of the other group. This purely opportunistic evolution is the direct cause of the violent conflict existing at present between our two main racial groups whose training is so profoundly at variance.

These are the ghastly straits into which the Liberal party's opportunism has enticed the Canadian nation by promises and pledges from which it now requests a release. Before imposing conscription on Quebec, we shall grant it a plebiscite. As the government will not be released from its promises and commitments regarding conscription by Quebec, but rather by the other provinces, this, in itself, evidences the opportunism and trickery of the Liberal party.

At this dangerous turning-point of our history, I believe, Mr. Speaker, that all Canadians of good will, who are desirous of maintaining national unity, so indispensable in this hour of grave danger and who are desirous of not endangering our war effort unanimously supported for the fostering of the general interest, should react against this wave of opportunism which threatens to plunge us into disunion. We should all oppose the holding of this plebiscite which all groups of the Canadian population disapprove for various reasons.

The present trend of events more and more convinces me that conscription would be disastrous for our war effort as well as for the future of the country.

Popular confidence, especially among our youth, has been badly shaken by the pronounced depression of 1929 to 1940. Let us not forget that the financial interests, who have enlisted the conscriptionists as standard-bearers, have abandoned our youth to moral and physical suffering during that long period by the fact that they have deprived it of the enjoyment of our national resources which they make so much about to-day. What right have we, of forcing our youth to rush, on strange lands and at the cost of life, to the defence of those assets, a share of which was heretofore denied them?

The government has given us a foretaste of what may be expected if conscription is resorted to. On a request from Great Britain, they have sent bright and gifted young men to Hong Kong before they were properly trained. They were removed to China, lacking the necessary armament to bolster the defence of an insufficiently fortified outpost. May I be allowed at this point, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that about one hundred of these unfortunate young men came from the Gaspè constituency, to offer my sincerest sympathies to their families who endure such frightful anxiety and who dread the news they have been awaiting for nearly two months. We have to fear the recurrence of incidents of that kind if conscription for overseas service is enforced.

In view of the disunity now prevailing and increasing in alarming proportions from day to day, the best advice we could offer the government and the opposition, is to respect the pledges taken by both parties during the 1940 election. On this condition, it may yet be possible to maintain confidence, peace and harmony.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I shall vote against the main motion and the amendments because I am opposed to the plebiscite and to conscription, measures that I consider as inopportune.

I fail to see how else I could act. It would be useless to speak against conscription and then vote for the adoption of the speech from the throne announcing the holding of a plebiscite to grant the government the freedom they wish for imposing conscription when they please. We should fear, if this threat ever becomes a reality, to be accused of complicity and hypocrisy.

[Mr. Roy.]

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to express our deep gratitude to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the splendid harmony he has brought about among the nations with which we are now associated. For years he has sought to be friendly with the United States. He brought about trade agreements with that country; he established the British preference, and he maintained friendly relations with the British empire. He was the medium that brought the Americans and the British together, and I consider that the meeting of the leaders of those countries on the high seas was the work of our own Prime Minister. Hon. members will remember when the British empire was somewhat antagonistic toward Russia, and will also remember the attitude of this government, which sought to maintain friendship with Russia. To-day we are glad that this spirit guided our leader. I hate to think what might have happened if we had not dealt kindly with Russia in those times. Our relations with China have been almost perfect for many years, and now these countries are in harmony in support of the British empire.

The Prime Minister has been a master not only in international affairs but also in promoting unity within this country itself. He had at his side, of course, an equally strong advocate of unity in the person of the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. We in Canada ought to realize that in some respects the people of Quebec may be a little different from the rest of us. They left Europe three hundred years ago, and their songs and their hearts are all for Quebec. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) is of Irish descent. He puts on his orange lily and speaks at orange gatherings on the 12th of July. His heart goes back to old Ireland. I put on a bit of heather and march to The Road to the Isles played by the pipes; we sing the songs of old Scotland, an odd psalm and Mary of Argyle. Our hearts go back to the land of our fathers. So it is with the Sons of England. Why, when you gather with the Sons of England in Toronto you would think there was no place on God's earth except England. But that is not so with the people of Quebec. They are more parochial; they are true to the country in which they live; they marry early, have large families, and think home is the ideal place. So we must accept them as they are. But this war is the war of Canada, and we are receiving splendid support from our Quebec friends. They are showing a spirit of true patriotism, and will continue to do so, but we must not expect them to love the British isles as you and I love them. Our hearts and souls go back to Britain. If we thought anything might happen to Britain, we would be unable to express our feelings. Britain was the home of our fathers, and that makes a vast difference in our feelings toward it.

I do not like this defeatist talk that one hears almost everywhere one goes. Defeat is something we should never mention. It is true that other empires rose and fell. There was old Babylonia, but drunkenness and debauchery were the only things it wrote into history. It was weighed in the balance and found wanting. Then came the Persian empire. It wrote into history only one thing of importance, one thing that maintained it for many years, the word "truth". That word is still commonly used in the Liberal party. The people of the world had confidence in the Persians, but eventually they came to worship the god of Bacchus too freely and fell into drunken ways. Then came the Grecian empire. Their contribution was science and education, but they too fell by the wayside. They also worshipped the god of Bacchus too freely, and Alexander died a drunken wretch. Then came the Roman empire, and it established the word "law". Our laws are based almost entirely upon Roman law. We were part of the Roman empire for four hundred years. Four hundred years is a long time, equal to the time from the reformation to the present day. We fashioned our laws upon those of Caesar. We got our churches from the Romans, and the Roman empire lasted for many years because it had a more solid foundation than the previous empires.

We come now to our own empire. Why should it endure? It will endure because of the ingredients of which it is composed, because of the ideals and standards that go to make it up. We in the British empire have the word "truth" well established; that is well known the world over. We have the education and the sciences of the Greeks. We have a nobler, a larger vision; we have the love of humanity, and the brotherhood of mankind is stamped upon British people as it is upon no other race. We do not proclaim these things as much as we should among our own people. We do not altogether appreciate the opportunities we enjoy. For instance, there was Rufus Isaacs, who was a wharf rat. He went to India, where he stayed for a few months, returning to England as a waif, but eventually going back to India as viceroy. Opportunities of this kind are not accorded to the people of other nations. Take the Boer leaders; they were our bitter enemies; but after Britain defeated the Boers, they became true British subjects. We must remember that in the British empire there are practically no conquered races. They are given the privileges of freedom and citizenship and can rise to the highest levels. We saw Mr. Thomas sitting in one of the seats of this chamber not so many years ago. He was a blacksmith in England, and through his own efforts he rose to become minister of labour there, one of the highest honours his country had to give.

These are things that go to build up the heart and soul of an empire. But not only are we true to our own citizens; we have a kindly feeling toward all other nations. This is shown by those who rallied round us during this time of war. The other nations have confidence in the spirit of Great Britain; they have confidence in the truth of the British word, and they understand the kindly spirit that goes with it.

I believe we do not tell enough about our own race. Not long ago I asked a man where a certain German lived. That man said to me, "You know, he is a German, and we should take our hats off to Germans." I said, "I always touch my hat in deep respect to every race, but I take my hat off to none." He said to me, "They are above us in matters of culture, education and scientific development. What is your profession?" My reply was, "Well, I am a medical doctor." My friend said, "Where would the profession of medicine be without the Germans"—and he began to take his hat off. As a matter of fact he took his hat off two or three times, and asked me to follow suit. But I said, "Oh, no. Do you know about the plagues which have taken place in this world, and cut people down by millions? Do you know about smallpox, and do you know that the person who made a cure possible was Doctor Edward Jenner? Do you know that the circulation of blood was discovered by Harvey, an Englishman? Supposing I were called out to attend a case of appendicitis, and I had to go to a hospital, what would call the hospital for me but the invention of Alexander Graham Bell of Brantford, an old country Scot? Then, when I got to the hospital, who would disinfect all instruments used in the operation but Lord Lister of Edinburgh? When I put the patient on the operating table to be chloroformed, who gave us chloroform, if it was not old Doctor George Ferguson of Glasgow, the discoverer of anaesthetics? When I got my cheque for performing the operation, who would be behind that cheque? It would be William Paterson, a tramp from the highlands of Scotland, the founder of the Bank of England and all other banks."

We have a fine race of people, and we do not take our hats off to any. This ought to be made known. We do not tell our own people about our race, and I hate to see anyone sitting over here in sham modesty while we hear the Germans prate about their accomplishments, their culture and even their songs and music—and I do not like any of it very much. They say, of course, that it is better than ours, but so far as I am concerned it is not.

May I draw the attention of the house to the singing we hear from Toronto. Probably I should not criticize that city, but if one listens to his radio he will soon find that they do not even know how to sing God Save The King. They do not know the difference between "the king" and "our king". We must remember that when we sing "God save our king", the word "our" is the possessive, personal adjective, and refers to the personal king. When, as in the last line of our national anthem, we sing "God save the king", we are singing something altogether different. The expression "the king" is more comprehensive, including the British people, our institutions, our courts, our churches and everything else. But in spite of this fact we hear singing in churches and lodges—I was going to say in Toronto, a place where I often go—which does not seem to take notice of this fact; they sing the last line, "God save our king." While in Windsor I heard a judge of the supreme court singing the words "God save our king" in the last line of the national anthem, and I said to him, "Don't you think you are a little off the tune?"

I stand to attention when I hear the singing of "God save our king", but I stand doubly to attention when I hear the words "God save the king." And here is another thing: When we are singing God Save The King we mean that we are trying to cooperate with every form of democracy. Yet when our Prime Minister was elected by the largest majority ever accorded any prime minister, the men down in this front row got up and told him to get out. They would not stand for his being Prime Minister; they wanted someone else in his place. I say that those men who wanted the Prime Minister to vacate his seat after the people elected him were all off the tune, and they did not understand the meaning of God Save The King.

There is a vast difference between "the king" and "our king", and we ought to recognize that difference. One should listen to those churches in Toronto. I did so, the last Sunday I was home. They were singing, "God save our king", and I said, "Oh, they are just those Irish Orangemen over in Parkdale." But my wife was listening to the radio in the evening, and she heard the congregation at Old St. Andrew's singing the same way. So heaven help Toronto if they make no distinction between "our king" and "the king"! They sang it wrong in both churches.

When we sing God Save The King we should try to harmonize and put that thought into every speech made in the house. The House of Commons should be a great choir. When we rise in our places to make our speeches, are we singing God Save The King, or are we trying to disrupt? Are we trying to condemn the government unnecessarily, or are we trying to harmonize through the government a spirit of democracy and cooperation? Are we trying to sing God Save The King? I hear it sung in the churches, and I can think of no place it should be sung more frequently than right here in the House of Commons. This is the place where we should sing God Save The King. Every time a man rises in his place, I say, "Is he singing God Save The King when he is making his speech?" I appreciate the fact that frequently he is, but sometimes he is not.

I should not criticize Toronto, but its club rooms are dangerous places. I have great respect for the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson): I knew him years ago, and I consider him a noble leader. But he went to Toronto, and spent a night or two in those club rooms. After coming out he gave one of the silliest speeches possible, making references to friendship between the Prime Minister and the United States. It was a sort of political ballyhoo, and was done for political purposes. That speech was one of the hardest blows, not to him personally, but to the Conservative party.

The sooner we get together and realize that we have leaders, that we must stand behind them, that we must support them until the war is over, the better for all of us. After the war is over, do what you like with them; vote them out when election day comes. That is the way to sing God Save The King.

The reeve in my home town is the hotel keeper. At the time of election I fight against him, but as soon as he is elected I shake hands with him and say "God save the king"—to myself, of course. I am a coroner and a health officer. I can send a man a summons to serve on a jury. If I am going to sing God Save The King I should enquire from him if service on the jury meets with his convenience. I should not be a dictator. Then I have the right to expect cooperation. We must have cooperation so far as possible, whether we are in office or whether we are members of an opposition. If we are going to sing God Save The King we must have cooperation and harmony. I sincerely hope that this will be the key-note of every speech made in the house. If we are not in tune with that sentiment, we should be, and should be ready at all times to sing God Save The King.

Mr. C. A. HENDERSON (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, being a new member of this house I have not taken up much of its time in debate. I have done most of my talking to private members, the acquaintance of whom I have tried to make in committees and party caucuses. I have taken most of my problems to the departmental offices. I have taken this course because I sit on this side of the house where we are in such great numbers. I have thought it best to leave the talking to older members, more especially when I consider the great cost of carrying on these debates. I had thought that this debate would have been finished in three days, but it is now going into its third week. I am reminded of the advice given me by a good friend out west who quoted from a biography of Disraeli. When Disraeli was Prime Minister of Great Britain he was asked by a new member if he thought he should speak at the first session. Mr. Disraeli said: "Well, on the whole I think you had better not, for it is always better to have the people wonder why you do not speak in the house than to have them wonder why you do." I think that is pretty good advice for a new member.

I represent the constituency of Kindersley in Saskatchewan, named for Lord Kindersley, president of the Hudson's Bay company. I desire to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his government upon the contents of the speech from the throne. The mover and the seconder of the address in reply, the Prime Minister and the ministers of the government who have spoken in this debate have made a splendid contribution in outlining our war effort to date and our future war plans. I came to this country some thirty-five or thirty-six years ago when thousands and thousands of immigrants were going into western Canada. We went 85 to 150 miles south of the railroad at Battleford and we considered ourselves real pioneers in those days. Among the farmers who settled there were many business men and we all worked together. As additional lines of railway were put through the country, we endeavoured to build for the future. Villages were put up, and banks, lumber yards, schools, churches, hospitals, flour mills and so on were built. Under the leadership of the Hon. Mr. Motherwell, the Hon. George Langley, the Hon. Mr. Dunning and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) we were helped by the provincial government to erect creameries and cooperative elevators. Manitoba under the leadership of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) and others carried on a somewhat similar programme.

We ploughed straight furrows; we tamed the wild lands; we built our homes and erected better schools, universities and so on. We tried to build a citizenship that would be an asset to all Canada. As time went on, more railroads were built through the district, and soon the 150 mile stretch I mentioned was crossed by eleven lines of railways. Mr. James J. Hill said that if these lands were properly tilled and cultivated, they would provide tonnage for a railroad not to exceed a distance of ten to eleven miles on either side.

In those days we had markets and we prospered. We got along quite well until 1911 when we had our first setback. Our lands depreciated at least $5 an acre under the defeat of reciprocity. The United States was the first to pass the act, but they left it on the books for a number of years and we enjoyed their markets and got on splendidly until 1917. At that time more markets were opened abroad and we were asked to produce more products. The west was opened up to a greater extent than it should have been. Some of the lighter land was broken that never should have been broken. In the district where I am farming we have heavy land, dark chocolate in colour, known as edge-grain soil. This soil ranges in depth from fifteen to ninety feet and is able to store considerable moisture. We shall be able to produce crops on this land for many years provided it is properly tilled and cultivated.

Conditions changed considerably during the dry years and during the economic war that preceded this physical war. We lost our markets during the depression and now we are faced with accumulated debts. Many of our farmers have had to go on relief while others have lived on their capital and profits made during better times. We had to ask for debt adjustments and readjustments. Banks and schools closed and many lost their homes. Federal, provincial and voluntary debt adjustments have run into several millions. We have been seeking monetary reform, lower rates of interest and assisted markets, but we still have in mind the establishment of a central bank. We feel that we should have this because, when the war is over, we hope to be able to bring debtor and creditor together. Only by doing that shall we be able to settle with most of our creditors at two dollars to one on occasions.

With the help of these adjustments many of us were able to save our homes and we built up a morale that is becoming stronger day by day. The crops in 1939 were quite good and we managed to pay off some of our mortgage and machine debts. In the meantime, however, we have lost much money and many of our people. According to the last census the representation of Saskatchewan will be reduced by four, if the ratio with Quebec is applied. It would seem that our province is the dead-end province as it was called by one of the press representatives now sitting in the gallery. That may be the truth, but it hurts. We are, however, ready to stay on and win. This reduction in representation was referred to last night by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven), and I have his permission to associate myself with what he has said. I think Saskatchewan should receive the same treatment as has been given to Ontario on two or three different occasions. That province has been able to maintain its membership at eighty-two members and, according to my figuring, based on the Quebec membership the Ontario membership should be only seventy-four. If something could be done to equalize the representation as between the east and the west, it would help us very much.

I have heard it said on the floor of this house that if we cannot get on, we should get out. Even though our numbers are fewer, we are ready to remain loyal to Canada. Even though it happened that we were no longer in the federation, we would still be loyal to the empire and would continue to deal with the motherland via the Hudson Bay railway and to fight Hitler to the end to prevent his entry into our wheatlands. We have preached Canadian citizenship to all our people. In fact I have been doing this work myself more or less from coast to coast. After all, we are all good, loyal citizens.

Perhaps I may be permitted at this time to say a word with regard to the Hudson Bay railway. If Jim Hill had been permitted to exercise the charter he asked for in the early days, he would have built up an empire in that north country. He would have opened up those mineral lands just as he opened up the lands in the lake Superior district, and all this would have been greatly to our advantage. The mineral wealth of the pre-Cambrian shield has hardly been scratched, yet the two or three mines operating there have justified the expenditure twofold, and in any event it has been very largely paid for by western Canada lands. There is ample power in the north, and if through scientific development and discovery we should be able to have that transferred, it would help us industrially. We have no great quarrel with labour and industry in this country. It is simply a question of agriculture having been the first to suffer and the last to recover.

I come now to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act which has been referred to this afternoon, and which was passed under the administration of Mr. Bennett. Perhaps that is the act which my hon. friend opposite had in mind when he spoke of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, with its provisions extended under the present Minister of Agriculture, has done a lot of good, in the opening up of grazing pastures and the rehabilitation and reclaiming of many abandoned farm lands. Much more could be done along that line. Much more could be done for western Canada in the way of irrigation, if the waters were stored in Tramping Lake coulee and other large coulees. That would be better than paying money out for relief, and with irrigation we should be able to grow our feed, fodder and garden produce to make a livelihood on the prairies, without having to ask our eastern friends to come to our aid. The cheques that have been paid out by way of bonus have helped to raise the morale of our people and are much better than relief cheques. Rehabilitation would, I believe, be a splendid investment for the whole of Canada. We want to cooperate with all Canada, east and west, right across, in regard to agriculture, and so far as we are concerned we are quite prepared to assist the east with lower freight rates to aid in the movement of feed grain and fertilizer, and would support subsidies where necessary.

I believe that it would be a good thing to guarantee the price of live stock until one or two years after the war. I believe that would encourage our agriculturists to go into the raising of live stock more than they are doing to-day.

I should like to refer to the brief which was submitted recently to the wheat committee of the cabinet and the government by the 440 farmers from Saskatchewan, in which they asked for an initial payment of $1 a bushel for wheat, parity prices, and an amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as outlined by my colleague the member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham). I had his permission to be associated with him in that, and I shall save time now by not going into the matter in detail. In my portion of the country, for which I can speak, we have every confidence in the wheat committee of the cabinet, which was headed last year by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), the other members being the Minister of Finance (Mr.

Ilsley), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon). We know they have our interests at heart just as they have at heart the interests of all Canada. They have a very difficult problem to handle, and we know, too, that they realize that our problem is great. We are not asking for anything unfair or that would make the west a burden on the treasury, but now after more than two years of war there is a great need for food for the armies, particularly in view of the one billion dollars worth of supplies that is being appropriated for Great Britain. During the first war the wheat board brought the price of our wheat down, but we believe the time has come when we should have fair play and a fair chance. We are quite prepared to cooperate with labour, with whom we have no quarrel at all.

Surely in the new order that is to come when the war is over, we shall be rid of tariffs and trade restrictions, as outlined by Prime Minister Churchill, President Roosevelt and our own Prime Minister, so that our goods will move freely into the world markets.

With regard to the plebiscite, I think that is the only honourable way of dealing with the situation. The plebiscite is not definitely conscription as yet, but I think the hands of the government should be freed so that if the need for conscription arises, the government will be free to bring it in. So far as conscription being an issue in the last campaign is concerned, in my constituency it certainly was an issue. My opponent came out for conscription in his first address, while another opponent of mine was said to be a pacifist. I supported one hundred per cent total war, with a balanced agriculture and industry, and man-power sufficient to provide all the required equipment and to keep our supply lines open.

All things considered, I think our war effort has been a splendid one for a small nation of eleven million people. I think it would be well if we were more tolerant with one another, and then we should get on better, particularly with an educational propaganda, in which, as I have good reason to know, most of our French-Canadian members have been engaged over the weekends, as I myself have been doing in the west. The first volunteer we had in my constituency in this war was a Ukrainian, a returned man. We have many Germans there too. A German lad came to my farm to take my first boy's place. He was born in Germany and naturalized in this country. He afterwards volunteered and is now overseas. We require a united people, and I think we can accomplish that with proper educational propaganda. We should be tolerant of our peoples, as Churchill is tolerant of Eire, south Africa, India and all the peoples of the British commonwealth. I listened to his speech the other night when he spoke of divisions among us, and I think we should take that lesson to heart.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that we now have Japan arrayed against us, but we have the United States in the war on our side, with all her great resources, and I do not have any fear that we shall be able to equip China and Russia and the million and a half Poles who are anxious to be armed. I am sure also, without any question of doubt, that we shall be able to complete the job. I shall have pleasure in supporting the government on the main motion.

Mr. J. E. FERRON (Berthier-Maskinongè) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the session of 1942 offers a very strange spectacle. That the opposition should blame the government because the speech from the throne does not provide for conscription for overseas service and that two or three conscriptionists in the Liberal ranks should join in this blame, is in no way abnormal. But that a dozen members professing anti-conscriptionist views, as I do myself, should rise against the government because the same speech from the throne leads them to expect recourse to conscription for overseas service, and that they should vote with the avowedly conscriptionist opposition, is something that cannot but disturb a mind as little complicated as mine.

I would not for anything in the world wish to offend a single one of these hon. gentlemen. I do not question their sincerity and I know they will pardon my telling them in all frankness that I fail to understand their conduct. I cannot understand their making a profession of confidence in the Prime Minister and ending it by saying, "I have my doubts." I cannot comprehend their making eloquent assertions that there is in this country only one party leader capable of giving to the nation a government that is wise and that truly conforms to the aspirations of those who really seek national unity, and then declaring that they will not support that leader. They describe as nefarious the policy advocated by the Conservative opposition and its leader, but when it comes to voting the address in reply to the speech from the throne they intend to place themselves at the side of the latter and to vote for and with him.

It is this confusion, Mr. Speaker, which prompts me to rise in my place and explain the vote I shall shortly be called upon to give. My views have not changed since the 1940 election. I then solemnly pledged myself to oppose any measure providing for conscription of the youth of my country for service overseas, and to-day I say to the leader of the Conservative opposition (Mr. Hanson), "Go no further!" I say to him that he shall not pass with his amendment which contains the following clause:

> Completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war.

There is no doubt that this motion, particularly after the explanations subsequently given by the hon. gentleman who moved it, is one for complete conscription for overseas service. Moreover, it involves non-confidence in the only government in which I have confidence. For similar reasons I shall vote against the amendment moved by the leader of the C.C.F., the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) who likewise demands "total mobilization of wealth, industry and finance, as well as human resources."

Having voted on two occasions against motions requesting conscription for overseas service, my views in the matter can admit of no doubt.

I shall now revert to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. What does it contain? I see in it three main propositions: first, an enormous and total effort for our national defence, accompanied by a thousand sacrifices to protect our territory and help our allies resist the enemy across the seas; second, improved national selective service; third, the plebiscite.

Regarding the first proposition, I admit, Mr. Speaker, that the words "effort" and "sacrifice" are not very attractive. But thinking of the axis menace which is daily becoming graver, thinking of the enemy submarines prowling close to our shores, seeing our freedom in jeopardy and also pondering upon the value of this freedom which I heard my venerable parish priest, Canon D. Baril, appraise from the pulpit in the following words: "Never forget that under the shade of the British flag we enjoy a greater freedom than if we were free"; I would fear that if I gave a negative vote the people of my constituency and the people of my province, who want to neglect nothing to properly defend their homes, their farms, their churches, their parochial and municipal institutions and, above all, their freedom, would reproach me some day for not having agreed to those many sacrifices. In any event, I prefer being sorry for having done too much than feeling remorse at having done too little.

With respect to national selective service—for the defence of our country, be it understood—I strongly approve such a measure. I support it because it will allow farmers' sons who are indispensable to the operation of their farms—they are very numerous in my constituency—to remain on the land and produce the foodstuffs required to feed our armed forces, our factory workers and also our allies who are fighting the same fight as we are. I am in favour of selective service because I wish our hardy woodsmen to return to the forest at the proper season and get out the lumber so greatly needed for shipbuilding and countless other war purposes. In a word, I want every one to be kept where he is the most useful, in the best interests of this country.

I now come, Mr. Speaker, to one of the most controverted matters, the plebiscite. If I were to consider the feeling in my constituency as reflecting the opinion of Canada as a whole, I think I could say without any fear of being mistaken that a plebiscite is not necessary. On behalf of my constituents I would tell you: Our people want to win the war. They want to do their utmost to preserve our freedom. They are willing to accept the greatest sacrifices for the defence of our territory and they are voluntarily enlisting in great numbers to help our allies overseas. But among the numerous means of achieving victory, one only is distasteful to them: compulsion as regards overseas service. We have done our duty so far, and we are more than ever determined to do it in future. But my constituency is not the only one in the dominion, my province is not the only one in the confederation, and since the last general election many important events have happened. More than a dozen nations have been overrun by the enemy, the United States, then neutral, is now at war and Hong Kong and Singapore have fallen. In view of this situation, could I voice any objection to a question being put to the Canadian people? As regards the reply to be given, I intend to tell my constituents: "Consider the situation as it is to-day, and analyse all the facts until the date of the plebiscite. With your usual good judgment try to foresee the possible trend of the enemy action and then without passion and prejudice, vote according to the dictates of your conscience". That is the course I shall follow myself.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, and to summarize what I have said, let me state that I have always been, that I still am and that I shall always be in favour of sparing no effort for our national defence. I am opposed to conscription for overseas service, because it is intrinsically recognized as harmful to Canadian unity and further because it has been proven quite unnecessary.

I shall vote against both amendments because they are in conflict with the latter principle, and also because they have the character of motions of want of confidence in a government to which the opposition itself cannot direct any sound criticism.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the address because I believe in preserving national unity; this I think I can do only by supporting my leader the Prime Minister as well as the man who has assumed leadership in my province, the honourable the Minsiter of Public Works and Transport (Mr. Cardin).

Before I resume my seat, I may say that if I had the needed authority, I would direct to my friends and colleagues from Quebec a last appeal as follows: You as everyone else have the duty of looking into the future. But on the other hand, you have no right to ignore the past of the two great leaders, I have just named. Both have reached their second quarter of a century of public life. And their past speaks for itself. With you I beseech Providence not to remove them from our midst, but when, to my great comfort, I see the principles of Laurier and Lapointe ever advocated and ever triumphant, I say: those are not men who die forever. Their pleas for union, harmony and common sense remain alive in our memory.

I have just mentioned the name of the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe. Tribute has already been paid to the memory of that great man; and in words that expressed my own thoughts much more fittingly than I could voice them myself. However it is my desire that the vote I shall give in a few hours, at the side of his son the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Lapointe) should be a tribute to his memory and to the principles of tolerance and harmony to which he devoted his life.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. H. CORMAN (Wentworth): In rising to make my contribution in this debate my first words must be of congratulation to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I think the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) did very well, as did also the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald). May I add that I have a very high regard for the hon. member for Brantford, since his riding lies adjacent to the constituency of Wentworth which I have the honour to represent in this house.

Wentworth, as every hon. member knows, has been represented in this house for a long time, but this is the first occasion in some years when it has been represented from this side of the house. I do not, however, take the stand that I am here to speak exclusively for the Liberal party. I feel that I also represent the county of Wentworth as a whole.

May I at this point pay tribute to the late Gordon Wilson who represented this riding for twenty-four years. Although we disagreed politically, the late Gordon Wilson was a very fine man and highly regarded in his community.

Let me at the beginning inform the house of my views on the big issues now before us. I am personally in favour of total selective service for overseas or anywhere in the world. In that view I think I represent the great majority in my county, both inside and outside the Liberal ranks. Wentworth has a record of which any county might be proud. More than one hundred and twenty-five years ago people in the county of Wentworth were repelling a foreign foe. Her sons have taken part in every fight since, and the contribution she made to the first great war was no small or inconsiderable one. In Wentworth county we take the stand that the fight for Canada does not begin on the shores of Canada. Wentworth county boys have fought all over the world and are willing and anxious to do so at this time.

In making the statement that I am in favour of total selective service I am not influenced in any way by the committee of two hundred whose headquarters seem to be in Toronto and who apparently are backed by influential mining interests. As I see it, their patriotic zeal is not so much impelled by love of country as by love of power. I personally do not admire their super-patriotism; they are apparently willing to sit behind their golden towers on Bay street and try to force the boys to go and fight for them. It is all very well to wrap the union jack about their wealthy well-fed persons and call on someone else's sons to defend their wealth. I think it very fine that we should have total selective service, but not because this specially privileged group wants it. Nor am I so sure that conscription is their real goal. I think conscription is really a red herring across the trail, which, if the signs were marked properly, would point to a return to the abuses of the last war. The committee of "two hundred" dress their front windows with conscription, but let us see what they have in the back of the shop. Concealed under the counters is national government, and with that enormous power, and a little further back but ready to bring out later are such things as abolition of the excess profits tax and the destruction of the price ceiling. This committee of two hundred, who use conscription as a come-on, also have in mind the return of a great many things which made the last war linger in an unpleasant way in the nostrils of not a few people. We want no shameless exploitation of the war to make a new crop of millionaires, and we want no conscription under these terms. The purpose of this conscription ruse, as initiated from the "two hundred," is to get the gold crowd into power. If they get their way, the rest of us will be reduced as quickly as possible to economic vassalage. We shall become hewers of wood and drawers of water to Bay street.

I said I favour total selective service, and I do. But it should not be obtained by the means the Toronto group seek, namely, to ram it down our throats like a gestapo order. The proper way is to obtain it through a plebiscite. This government made certain definite pledges in 1940. I am not going to linger long over this point since it has all been gone over so often, but the government now asks to be relieved of its non-conscription pledges. When that release is obtained, as I believe it will be, then the government will be free to do as it sees fit.

When that release is obtained I intend to press for total selective service anywhere it is required at that time. Let there be no doubt how and where I stand on this. I want to see total selective service put into force by the will of the people of Canada; not instituted by a little group of fascist-minded people who would split the country wide open to get their way. It may be that in the matter of total selective service, properly and constitutionally introduced, I would go further than they, but I want to go about it in the democratic way, the Mackenzie King way.

Here I should like to read an article published in the Hamilton Spectator on January 23, 1942, in which the editor of that paper comments on the government's decision to take the plebiscite. The Hamilton Spectator is an independent newspaper; its views are read and respected by many people in Canada. The policy of the Spectator is directed by Mr. Fred Ker, an outstanding citizen of Hamilton, who has always been very pro-British and pro-empire, for which he is to be admired. His opinions are highly regarded. I quote the editorial:

Prime Minister King will seek an expression of the will of the people to determine their attitude on the issue of conscripting Canada's man-power for overseas service in this war. A plebiscite will be submitted to them in which they will be asked to release the government from any past commitments which restricted the methods of raising men in this dominion for military service.

In resolving to pursue this course, it is difficult to see where the Prime Minister is impairing this country's war effort or doing violence to empire unity. Rather does it appear that he is striving to prevent the very disunity and bitter division which some of his partisan opponents are charging him with fomenting.

Mr. King's course should appeal to all even-tempered persons as a reasonable one, and also the most satisfactory way of settling this issue. After all, there is no safer tribunal in a democracy than the people themselves. Their voice ought therefore to be heard; and the premier has ensured that it shall be heard. His present position is consistent with his past stand on this question. On the outbreak of war he told parliament that no conscription for overseas service would be enacted so long as his government was in power. Later he again said that he further construed the verdict of the people, in the general election of March, 1940, as a mandate from them that they were opposed to conscription for overseas service. In the face of those facts, he should not be expected to repudiate his pledges. Were he to do so, he might invite widespread discord and reap serious results. The Conservative party leadership and candidates made no issue of Mr. King's position at the last election. They stood indeed on the same anti-conscription ground.

The speech from the throne implies that an affirmative response is sought from the people; the government asks to be "released from any obligations arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service." Canada's war effort to date has not been either feeble or meagre; so far as it has gone, it has been wholehearted and generous. That Canada can enlarge this effort is admitted, and plans are now well advanced by the government to gear the country for total war. A policy of national selective service will soon be in operation whereby the federal authorities aim to place every available person in the job for which he or she is best fitted to serve. The human and material resources of the dominion will be totally mobilized to intensify the production of munitions and foodstuffs; the armed forces will be expanded, all with the purpose of giving the fullest aid to Britain of which this country is capable. Financial provisions are also to be made on an unprecedented scale, and the wealth of Canada is to be drawn upon by an orderly and equitable process to the utmost limit of its capacity.

Premier King's government need thus make no apology for the war-time leadership it has given the Canadian people. But it is not disposed to carry that leadership beyond the limits of the mandate the people have given it as regards conscription for overseas service—not until the people themselves authorize this step. If the plebiscite rejects compulsory selective service for overseas the fat will indeed be in the fire and it is hard to see how either a national election or a new parliamentary alignment that would disregard the plebiscite and enact conscription regardless of consequences, could be avoided. Certain it is that one way or another we must have compulsory selection for service on any battlefront in the world.

Let me quote also part of another editorial from the Hamilton Spectator of February 10, which was written after the recent by-elections:

> The outcome, on the whole, is gratifying, inasmuch as it reflects an ability on the part of the people not to lose sight of the vital issues even in campaigns that were marked by such excesses of strife, party cleavage, class prejudice and confusion as these contests were. Representative government still means something in Canada, and the electors who voted yesterday have shown that they are quite capable of discharging their responsibility and not becoming lost in a foggy atmosphere of extreme partyism. In three constituencies, at least, they make it plain that their faith still reposes in the administration of Prime Minister King; and they have given him a mandate not only to carry on, but to prosecute Canada's war effort with increased vigour and adopt every measure that will contribute to that end.

The editorials I have just quoted represent the thought and feeling around Hamilton, and I have placed them on record in order that everyone in Canada may know the fair-mindedness of the press in the vicinity of Hamilton and their attitude toward the government's decision to take a plebiscite.

To turn to the question of money, it may become necessary that all profits be conscripted. We may reach the point where we shall so desperately need money to carry on this war that we must resort to this extreme expedient. We may have to take all capital, wherever we can find it, however we can get it, to prosecute this war to a successful conclusion. So we may have to have fiscal conscription, too. But this is nothing new or drastic; all these powers have already been given us under the National Resources Mobilization Act. We have only to take what is already ours. But we hear precious little from this total war group about this kind of conscription. Could it possibly be that, fearing the present government might just do that very thing, they want to get into power in time to stop that move? Conscript the boys by all means, they cry, but hands off our dividends!

I want to point out to those who seek conscription so eagerly and violently that conscription is only one part of a part of our war effort. The trouble is this. There are quite a few people in this country who think that the proper way to fight a war is to get a lot of men together in a hurry and send them some place; it does not matter where you send them, or why, or how; just send them, and the war problem is solved. To me, this ostrich-like attitude gets nobody anywhere.

First of all let us look at the man-power situation. We are already ahead of the last war, in the number of soldiers we have available for service anywhere in the world; in other words, we are better fitted in man-power in this war than in the last. But that is only part of it. In the last war our air service was very small in numbers. This time we already have raised over 100,000 men, and a steady stream of recruits is on the way. I do not have to emphasize the magnificent series of airports developed all over Canada since the beginning of the war. The erection of these is due entirely to the untiring work of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). They deserve great credit, and I believe the people of Canada are realizing this more and more each day. It is a mighty effort in itself, and will do much to win this war, since it has been shown in past battles that an army without air force protection is helpless against the enemy. I sincerely believe that the air force will play a very large part in our future campaigns. Let us pay homage and respect to the gallant boys who fly against the enemy, especially the brave lads who fly the bombers over Germany. The people of Canada and of the world owe them their deepest gratitude.

In addition to the activities of the air force, let us not forget the activities of the Royal Canadian Navy. In our navy we have hundreds of ships manned by the gallant boys of Canada. Every day we read of their exploits and see where some Canadian destroyer or corvette has left its mark upon the enemy. According to figures recently released, we have over 30,000 men enlisted in Canada's navy, and it is expected that another 13,000 will be added this year, as soon as ships can be provided. The people of Canada, especially those who live inland, do not realize the enormous work our navy is doing. It is indeed a big war effort in itself; and if we only knew the hardships and privations that these men undergo, we would surely take off our hats to these gallant seamen.

Now let us come to agriculture. My constituency is mainly an agricultural one, and the contribution our farmers are making, not only in Wentworth but, I am sure, in every other constituency in Canada, is a vast one. To feed the defence forces of Canada is a huge war effort in itself, let alone sending enormous quantities of wheat, pork, eggs, cheese and canned fruits and vegetables to Britain to feed our brothers in arms overseas. The farmers are certainly doing their part. May I interject at this point that I believe the government should have some yardstick for the postponement of the training of farmers' sons who are really producing agricultural products for the winning of the war. For instance, I would suggest that the last boy on the farm should not be taken; and in the case of a large farm, where two boys are producing twice as much, I think there should be a further postponement. I feel sure that if a yardstick for postponement were established, there would be less confusion in the minds of our farmer friends as to the calling of their sons for military training. As it is now, they cannot get help on the farms and are worried continually that their sons will be called, leaving them with no help. I agree with the policy of the government that men in industry, really doing a war job in the manufacture of munitions, should receive postponement of training, and I believe this is being done at the present time. I would suggest also that the age limit in the proclamation be raised to thirty-five, because I know there are many single men in Canada above the age of twenty-four who are doing very little to support our war effort. I believe these men should be called before farmers' sons are interfered with, and I would ask the government to take this into serious consideration.

Part of my riding is one of the most highly industrialized portions of Canada. At a later date, and in a later speech, I hope to make more extended reference to Wentworth county, of which I am proud. But I may say now that the workers in Wentworth who are turning out the sinews of war very much resent the allegations of the total war committee, who see no other effort in this war but military enlistment. The workers believe that the man behind the man behind the gun is important also. I do not intend to dwell on the war worker unduly, but I do say that Canada's whole war production has been magnificent. Starting from nothing we have reached a productive capacity little short of amazing. There has been no industrial development like it in the history of this or perhaps any other country. This is due to the management of the present government, and especially to the work of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. If you seek to blame any administration for its shortcomings, as the opposition is only too ready to do, then you must also give credit to the administration under which such vast strides have been made.

Then there is the question of finance. To me this is a highly important part of our effort, and great credit must be given the government for their assistance to Great Britain at this time, in the gift of a billion dollars and the lending of $700,000,000 without interest. I have not time to go into the question of the financing of this war, but it is reaching unbelievable proportions. The time may come when the money system should be changed. For instance, why not have an internal currency separate and apart from our external currency for the payment of imports and exports? In other words, why not arrange with the other allied nations to agree on an allied dollar, to be used for international purposes only? If we had such a system, we could do pretty well what we liked with our internal dollar, controlled, of course, by loans and taxation. With the government's present policy of a price ceiling, we could have controlled inflation.

While dealing with the subject of finance, I should like to protest in the strongest possible terms against the decision of the wartime prices and trade board to subsidize the importation of canned grapefruit juice. In the first place, this commodity should be placed on schedule 1 under the Foreign Exchange Conservation Act, and therefore would be embargoed. However, as it is allowable for imports, I can see no reason why the people of Canada as a whole should pay somewhere around $200,000 a year subsidy to United States importers.

Mr. GRAYDON: Better give it to the growers.

Mr. CORMAN: I would lift the price ceiling and let those who use canned grapefruit juice pay for it. When we have so many good fruit juices for sale in Canada, such as tomato juice, apple juice, loganberry juice, carrot juice and many other juices, I cannot see why the importation of canned grapefruit juice should be encouraged.

In conclusion, I want to repeat that I am for total selective service of man-power, and woman-power if necessary, to win this war. I agree to some extent with the subamendment in believing that if we are to have conscription of man-power we should also have conscription of wealth and industry. I believe that everyone should put everything he has into a common effort to win this war. I also believe that any young man's life is worth more than all the money in the country, and that we should have equal sacrifice as nearly as possible for everyone. I have sufficient faith in our leader, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), to carry us through to victory, and I would ask the people of Canada at this time to place their faith in him, because I am convinced he is the only man in Canada who can keep Canada united successfully to prosecute this war.

Five times my leader has been returned to parliament by the will of the people. I have, therefore, more faith in the man who has had five mandates from the people than anyone else in Canada I know of. I intend to vote for the plebiscite, and ask the people of this country to vote "yes," so that the government's hands will be free to do what they think is best for our nation.

Mr. L. D. TREMBLAY (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, since 1940 it has seldom been my privilege to take my seat in the house. I must admit that while I may be almost a veteran in the house, I almost feel that I am making another maiden speech, and that indeed I am desperately young.

May I apologize to hon. members for not having had the time in preparing my few remarks that I should have liked to have. I take great comfort however in seeing you, Mr. Speaker, in the chair. For the first time in my experience in the house I am going to attempt to deliver my speech in English, without the aid of notes.

Since June, 1940, I do not believe I have been in the house more than half a dozen times, and many changes have occurred since that date. May I take a moment, however, to add an expression of deep regret upon my failure to see in his seat, where particularly we Quebeckers were so happy and proud to see him, the late Minister of Justice, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. In these times of struggle, these tragic times, he made a great contribution to Canada's effort. In Quebec he was not only considered our leader, but recognized as a great Canadian. When we fail to see him in his seat we are indeed reminded of our great loss.

I had not intended at first to speak in this debate. From the camp in which I am now on duty I followed as best I could the trend of discussions in the house. I have been gratified and happy to see so many of my French-speaking fellow citizens from Quebec voicing their views and, under circumstances such as we have to-day, they did well to do so.

It is not my intention to add anything new to the debate, because I believe practically all shades of feeling in Quebec have been expressed, and other hon. members from other parts of Canada have spoken for their constituencies. I wish, however, to be somewhat outspoken concerning my stand on several points which I shall now detail.

First, I wish to consider Canada's war effort. Then I shall discuss Quebec's participation, and make some observations about Quebec, a province which in my estimation is not understood in every quarter of our country. I desire to point out that not only am I opposed to compulsory military service for overseas, but in such opposition I am expressing the views of my fellow citizens in Quebec. I wish to say why that is so.

Let me add that we shall carry on. We are doing our very best, our utmost, for the great cause of civilization, the cause of freedom of mankind which our leaders in Quebec and other leaders across Canada have asked us to support, to fight for. I shall also say why we take this stand.

For the past several months I have been stationed outside my own province, and for the last four months I have been living in close proximity to the queen, and so greatly discussed, city of Toronto. I am perfectly happy to be there, and I am doing my utmost to understand a mentality different from that found in Quebec. As a matter of fact I sometimes have the impression that one is as far from the other as the north pole is from the south. If narrow-minded citizens are to be found in the province of Quebec, they are just as likely to be found in the queen city, in any other province of the dominion or in any place in the world.

On January 26 the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) attempted to answer the question that everyone in Canada seemed to be asking—what is Canada doing; what is our navy; what is our army; what is our air force? This question was being asked during the election campaign, and I find the answer given by the Prime Minister reported on page 36 of Hansard. He said in connection with our navy:

> At the outbreak of war, there were some 20 ships and less than 2,000 men in the Royal Canadian Navy.
> At the beginning of 1940 the navy had grown to 80 ships, and over 5,000 men; at the beginning of 1941 the numbers had risen to 175 ships, and 14,800 men. At the beginning of this year the navy comprised over 350 ships and 27,600 men.

With reference to the army he said:

> At the outbreak of war the permanent active militia, as Canada's regular army was then called, included about 4,500 men. By the end of 1939, the Canadian Active Service Force, to give the army its name at that date, had increased to 64,000 men. The first Canadian division had just arrived in Britain.
>
> At the close of 1940, the active army included almost 170,000 men. A Canadian corps of two divisions had already been formed in Britain. Canadian troops were also on active service in Newfoundland, the British West Indies and Iceland.
> At the close of 1941, there were more than 260,000 men in the Canadian active army, enlisted for service in any part of the world. About half this number were on active service outside Canada. A third infantry division, an armoured division, an army tank brigade, forestry troops, and other specialized units, and thousands of reinforcements were in Britain, in addition to the original corps of two divisions.

About the air force he said:

At the outbreak of war the active strength of the Royal Canadian Air Force was some 4,000, all ranks. By the close of 1939, the strength had risen to over 8,000; by the close of 1940, it had reached 43,000; by the close of 1941, it exceeded 100,000 men.

Is that the total of Canada's war effort? I could read pages and pages of facts cited by the right hon. the Prime Minister, which demonstrate that Canada's war effort is large and magnificent. Its magnitude has been recognized and praised by people outside Canada as well as throughout the world. The Prime Minister referred to another aspect of our war effort, as reported on pages 35 and 37 of Hansard. He stressed the importance of our contribution in food, munitions, machines, ships, aircraft, tanks and other supplies of all kinds. Canada's war effort in these items is surprising and amazing. As I said, we have had testimonials from outside Canada, and we find one in the Toronto Telegram, that paper so often spoken of. Commenting upon a visit of what they termed key men to Toronto arsenals and munitions plants, the Telegram had this to say on January 26:

Key men of democracy's arsenal pay Toronto surprise visit.

Munitions experts from U.S. tour Toronto war plants are impressed with work.

"Most encouraging," Roosevelt's personal representative says—praise for women.

Here is what Milo Perkins, personal representative of President Roosevelt had to say:

"Our inspection of your plants was very interesting," he said. "We covered a lot of territory in the brief time at our disposal. I was particularly pleased with the plant of Research Enterprises Limited. It is a manufacturer's paradise. It is just what a plant should look like. The trouble with many of our plants is that they are old and have not always the modern machinery we saw to-day.

I was also greatly impressed by the number of young women working in the plants we visited. They all seemed capable and intelligent. They appear to be fine types of citizens who are doing important jobs and doing them well."

These experts stated that they had learned a lot in their few hours' visit to some of our war plants. The article continues:

The size and production capacity of the plants inspected yesterday was both surprising and encouraging, Mr. Currie, the president's representative, said.

"We have learned a lot which we can't discuss at this time," he added. "I will say, however, that it is most encouraging to the people of the United States to realize how much Canada is capable of doing towards our common cause, in the Pacific and in the Atlantic."

[Mr. Tremblay.]

Testimonials of that kind are much more comforting than some of the speeches which were made in some of the constituencies in the last by-elections. They are more comforting than some of the things we heard from a gentleman who has been in public life but who, I hope, is not likely to be in public life very soon again. He belittled Canada's effort, so much so that true, loyal Canadians had reason to be ashamed and veil their faces. Fortunately that gentleman encountered defeat. Then why ask for conscription? Why give the world the impression, or at least try to give the impression, because as a matter of fact you cannot fool the world, that Canada is not doing its utmost? Why deny the facts? Why insist on having conscription? A headline on the other side of the very same page of the very same newspaper might help us to understand why. The article is entitled, "Defence, excess profits and corporation taxes said in line for boost—Canada's war financing problem also likely to bring further controls on buying." Why should the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) tax excess profits heavily? Why should the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) put a limit on contractors' profits? Was the Canadian government not doing that already? It is a hundred chances to one that but for that gentleman to whom I have referred we would never have heard about conscription at a time when things were evidently going very nicely and when Canada should have been more than proud of the gigantic effort we were making. Why bring up this conscription question which, it has been said in this house by some of my fellow members from the province of Quebec, could only bring about misunderstanding and hurt Canada's war effort as a whole?

In the province of Quebec we have many a reason and every reason to be not only happy but very proud indeed of the efforts of our French-speaking province in this war. May I quote what the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) said the other day, as reported at page 250 of Hansard of February 2. He was speaking of Canada's efforts during the last war compared with this war and said:

I am reminded of figures which we sometimes forget, that of all those gallant gentlemen who went in the name of Canada in the last war, I believe only about 125,000 were Canadian-born.

In the province of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, we can say that we are all Canadian-born. In the other English-speaking provinces of the dominion, in the city of Toronto, for instance, a large proportion of the citizens came to Canada quite recently, within the last ten or fifteen or twenty or thirty years. They were born overseas. Some have been born in Canada of parents who came from overseas.

I perfectly understand the feelings of these citizens of Canada and can well understand their anxiety in matters where Great Britain or the British empire is deeply concerned. I have sometimes been shocked at hearing what I had considered good Canadians talk of this Canada of ours as "this country". Evidently their affections, their heart and soul, were first of all with the old land, England. Their parents, their brothers and sisters and other members of their families may be over there.

But with the citizens of Quebec province it is different. In Quebec, especially in the rural constituencies such as Dorchester county, which I have the honour to represent, practically every citizen's father is lying in the parish cemetery. His grandfather might lie there, and his great grandfather. We are rooted in the Canadian soil and have been for two or three centuries. We have no other country. We have no motherland except Canada. Canada is our only motherland. It has been said that we in the province of Quebec are not world-minded. We cannot be. Nor are we empire-minded. We are Canada-minded, and it must be said too that we are a bit Quebec-minded. Sometimes I have had the question put to me: What is the matter with Quebec? Well, here is one answer, and I hope when I have given it, that whenever the question is asked again throughout this Canada of ours, what is the matter with Quebec? We might answer with another question: What is the matter with you? Quebec, a province composed of wholly Canadian-born, has given to the navy up to October 31, 1941, 4,077 recruits; to the army, almost 50,000 recruits; to the air force, almost 800 officers and to other ranks of the air force over 11,000 voluntary recruits. I have been asked not to give exact figures, but we can put the total number of enlistments in all arms of the service as pretty close to 70,000.

We have had some handicaps; we surely have. May I quote from an article entitled "Language Difficulty" in Maclean's magazine of August 1, 1941, and let me say that I personally had experience of cases over a year and a half ago of many French-speaking electors—welders, electricians, radio operators and so forth—who wanted to join the Royal Canadian Air Force but were refused because they could not understand English. These are facts of which I know. This is what Maclean's magazine says:

Take, first, the air force. In setting forth qualifications for young men desirous of becoming pilots, observers, gunners and navigators, an educational standard was necessary. So one was written into the rules. It entailed, among other items, fluency in English, in which language the commonwealth countries happen to be conducting the war. Other yardsticks were required and these, too, were established. In general they may be described as those of the Ontario educational system. They were not set up by the politicians, but by the qualified top men of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

These are facts.

But the major language of Ontario is not the language of Quebec, and the education standards of Ontario are not those of Quebec either. Quebec schools of the higher learning have leaned from the time of their inception toward what are generally called the liberal arts. Not until June, 1941, for example, did Laval university produce a course leading to the degree of mining engineer satisfactory to the Corporation of Professional Engineers of Quebec. Ontario, on the other hand, carries the student along more rapidly in the subjects classed under the science heading.

That is one handicap. Nethertheless we can boast of this, and I may give the testimony of the provincial secretary of Quebec, speaking on November 24, 1941, of what is being done in that province:

Ships are now being built in Canada in such numbers and at such speed that soon our yards will be turning out a volume of tonnage comparable with that produced in England. Much of that shipbuilding is now being done in the province of Quebec.

You all know of the expansion of the Canadian navy: from thirteen vessels to about four hundred, in two years, is not a bad record. Not only have many of those vessels been built, but much of their equipment, including guns of various calibres, has been made right here in the province of Quebec. Ships have been manned with competent officers and crews found and trained on the banks of the St. Lawrence river.

Rifled cannon barrels, as well as the controlling mechanism, consisting of wheels and cogs, springs and pinions and levers, are being fashioned by Quebec craftsmen who are conscious of their responsibility. They know that the failure of a part may mean the failure of a gun, and the failure of a gun may mean the failure of artillery support for their own brothers and sons locked in battle with the enemy.

High-speed tanks, too, are rolling off the assembly lines right here in Montreal. . . . In Quebec we are producing more in a week than was produced in a month in the last war.

So much for what we are doing in a material way. Now, what about man-power? Quebec can justly boast that it provided the first full regiment of infantry in Canada. It was a French-Canadian regiment.

Le Régiment de Maisonneuve.

It was recruited to full strength under its gallant leader, Colonel Robert Bourassa, himself a veteran of the last war, and who unfortunately, after proceeding to England with his unit, has now been invalided back and lies here paralysed. He led the van of Canada in recruiting and the sympathy of all Canadians must go out to him now, to console him in his suffering.

His was the first regiment. The two regiments which followed in recruiting to full strength were one from Ontario and the other one again from the province of Quebec. Several other regiments, both English-Canadian and French-Canadian, have gone from this province.

These are facts which are known to all and which it is right to recall in times like these.

That is what Quebec has done. Now, what is Quebec doing? We are increasing our production. We can boast of one plant in particular, which is being operated in Sorel, the city of the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), which experts marvel at, and the war products of which are going all over the world. The premier of the province and all our leaders, religious, civil and political, have brought home to Quebec the ideals for which we and our allies are fighting. Recently the premier of Quebec said:

> More than ever determined that the war must bring us triumph, Canada's largest province is leaving no stone unturned in seeking means to have its share of the national effort in keeping with its important place in confederation. Its sons, worthy representatives of whom the old French province may well be proud, are serving under the colours on divers fronts. Behind them stands, solidly to a man, the whole population of their province, with an indomitable will that their effort under arms be rendered effective by the total employment of every resource of the home front—mines, forests, the land, production and service—to the great end of victory.
> Progress is enormous in every department of our governmental service and every domain of our economic life. Our proverbially sound business and industrial organization has been raised to unprecedented proportions, and in its entirety is being utilized in the battle for freedom.

Our beloved leader whose departure we regret so much, and whom I mentioned a while ago, led us towards this war effort, and we are proud of it. He fought prejudices wherever he met them, and we belong to his school. We are proud to be his disciples.

But there are things we cannot understand; things in which we cannot acquiesce. I have reference to the sort of appeal to prejudice which has been made in recent by-elections against the province of Quebec, belittling everything and ignoring totally the contribution of that province in the present war. One cannot believe for a minute that speeches such as that reported in the Toronto Evening Telegram, made by that dear Doctor Shields, at Aurora, can improve the situation in circumstances such as we are living under to-day. I would not care to put any of his divagations on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. TREMBLAY: But if such men really wanted to contribute to Canada's effort, they would not preach disunity; they would avoid everything tending in that direction.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

Now, sir, why is the anti-conscription sentiment so strong in the province of Quebec? That is a known fact; it has been so apparent in the house since this debate started, that Quebec stands to a man against conscription. We are against conscription. Why? Precisely by reason of the means and ways by which conscription was just thrown at us in 1917. We are willing to do, we are indeed doing all that is humanly possible. But hon. members may remember the discussions that took place in this house in 1917 and before the general election of that year on conscription. Quebec then was the billy-goat. The way conscription was put into force in Quebec was atrocious, just terrible. There was an evident will to misunderstanding. In our little parishes you can go into practically every house in the county of Dorchester and in every rural county in Quebec and they will tell you what seem like wild stories; they will tell you of their youngsters, seventeen and eighteen years old, quite a number of whom had hardly left their own parishes before, had never seen a soldier or a khaki uniform. They were working on the farms with their fathers—and that is another respect in which Quebec may differ from other provinces; the son to-day is working his father's land, and his father may be the second or third generation on that same land. Well, what happened when conscription was brought about? Military police were sent throughout those French-speaking parishes in Quebec province and at night pulled these boys right out of their beds and, without being able to give any explanation of what was happening, brought them down to the drill hall. It is this procedure which brought about this testimony which I found in Maclean's magazine of January 15, 1942:

> No matter how things may appear on the surface in Quebec, the fact remains that the word "conscription" is still the issue of the hour, even with our own Pacific coast an imminent danger zone. And yet, strange to say, it is not the question of service to the state or the democratic cause which is the burning issue, but the use of a word which has come to enjoy a grisly connotation in French-Canadian minds . . .
> Many people believed the Jap attack on the United States would bring about an immediate volte face. It did not, with the new battlefield of the Pacific barely opened the Hon. Arthur Matthewson, English Protestant provincial treasurer, and a Black Watch officer of fine fighting record from the last war, was on the air speaking of "sinister forces" at work to destroy national unity through their insistent drive on this one bogey-word. He spoke of certain sections of the press. It is a well-known fact that Matthewson was gunning primarily for the Montreal Gazette and, in lesser degree perhaps, for Jean Charles Harvey's Le Jour, the very name of which is anathema to French-speaking leaders of church and public life. The Toronto Telegram may also have been included.

All that is associated in our mind in Quebec with the personality of Arthur Meighen. Can you imagine anything worse? He was, rightly or wrongly—we are convinced rightly—blamed for what happened in 1917. At any rate it would have been sinister to see that same Meighen returned to this house. This writer appreciates that so well that he said:

> The latest point is Arthur Meighen. Feeling here is that if the Conservative party had definitely wanted to assure itself of no seats in Quebec at the next federal election, even though Meighen steps down before that time, it could not have made a better leadership selection.

That is a truism in Quebec. How could well-intentioned people expect, or how could it be explained, that those who undertook that conscription campaign, knowing these facts, really wanted to increase Canada's war effort? They merely wanted to secure power; that is quite obvious. Fortunately for Canada, fortunately for peace and good understanding throughout the country, the good and sensible citizens of Quebec were guided rather by common sense than by appeals to prejudice. Let us hope this may indeed constitute a lesson, painful as it may be, which will assure harmony and goodwill and cooperation from all sections of Canada.

It has been said, I have heard it in the house since this morning, that another good, kind-hearted Conservative member would resign his seat in the house to give Mr. Meighen another chance. I say—Give Canada a chance, not Mr. Meighen. Here I might make a practical suggestion. I am sure he would be defeated anyway in any constituency in Canada wherever he decided to run; why sacrifice one of the remaining Conservative seats in the house? We have a county open in Quebec, Charlevoix-Saguenay; send him there; the result will be the same.

The reason why we in Quebec like the present Prime Minister and support him and have confidence in him is just because of the psychological fact that he understands Quebec, or at least seeks to do so; he is fair; he is just; that is his record, and we are prepared to support him again, even if we have one or two defections.

I should like to quote from the Toronto Globe and Mail of February 12, following the recent by-elections.

> In countries where the British flag waves no politician ever permanently wrecked his career by taking a courageous stand in a good cause which failed at the moment to prevail. Let Mr. Hepburn and Colonel Drew remember the career of Lloyd George. In 1900 he narrowly escaped death at the hands of an irate mob in Birmingham, who resented his pro-Boer sympathies, and within eight years he was chancellor of the exchequer and the idol of the working classes of Britain.

They need not have cited this example; they could have mentioned the case of the present Prime Minister, in 1917, which would have given the same lesson to Mr. Drew and the others.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the fact that hon. members have unanimously permitted me to speak beyond my allotted time. I appreciate it the more because it is unlikely that I shall be back here very often; that may account for the generosity of my hon. friends.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of hesitancy that I rise to continue this debate this evening, a debate which has been going on now for some time. I am sure every phase of the discussion has been pretty well covered, and no doubt most hon. members would like to bring the debate to a close as quickly as possible. I should like to take this opportunity to extend my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. That they acquitted themselves well, no one will deny.

On this, as on other occasions, the speech from the throne provides an opportunity for the widest possible range of discusssion. Anything may be talked about during this debate. It is only natural, however, that the discussion so far should have been devoted largely to the one matter that has created the greatest interest, not only in this house but throughout the country; that is, the reference to the holding of a plebiscite asking the people of Canada to release the government from previous pledges made in connection with one phase of Canada's war effort. It is only natural that the discussion should largely centre round that point, and I should like to confine my remarks this evening more particularly to the same matter.

The constituency which I have the honour to represent in this house is for the most part Anglo-Saxon, and is looked upon as such. At the same time it contains numbers of French, Belgians, Icelanders, Ukrainians, Hutterites, Germans, and some Czechoslovakians and Norwegians—all Canadians, I may say, but I merely mention them to indicate the complexion of the constituency. While it is true that the Anglo-Saxon group is in the majority, nevertheless the other groups make up well-nigh forty per cent of the population of my riding, and of this number the French-Canadians form the largest group. Here again these French-Canadians are representative not only of the province of Quebec but also of France itself.

Naturally there is in my constituency as wide a division of opinion on the issue of conscription for overseas service as is manifest throughout the country at this time. Even so, I have had Frenchmen come to me and say they were in favour of conscription. On the other hand I have had English people come to me and say they were opposed to conscription. I had an opportunity to talk with one man who has lost a son in this war. I discussed with him what the government was doing, what its war programme was, and what the programme was for the future. I tried to place it before him in as reasonable a manner as possible. He was a man with a good many contacts among the people, and when I got through I asked what he thought would be the attitude of the people with whom he was in contact with respect to the government's conduct of the war. His reply was that if the people were told what I had told him on that occasion, he thought the vast majority would agree with what I had said.

This conversation brought home to me one other point; that is, the value of the instrument of propaganda in this war. I fear that we have failed to tell the people of this country about Canada's war effort in such a manner as to drive it home and cause them fully to realize what this war means not only to Canada as a nation but to each person individually. Probably we as members of parliament have failed to do our part in this regard, more particularly among our non-English-speaking Canadians. In time of war the instrument of propaganda is so important that I am bound to say I think we should make the best possible use of it.

There is another point I should like to mention, which I fear is not fully appreciated, and again this arises in connection with the French-Canadians in my own constituency. A number of them were called back to France at the time of the last war, to fight with the French armies. Later they returned to Canada. These men are as true Canadians as one could find anywhere, but to-day they are mystified and bewildered as to just what is going on and just what is going to happen. To some extent it is their desire to help the free French, but it is difficult for them to realize exactly what has taken place.

I mention these few points merely to aid in appraising the situation that exists in Canada to-day, because I am sure what I have said with respect to my own constituency could be repeated with respect to other constituencies throughout Canada, in greater or less degree. I keep asking myself, then, what there is to be gained by forcing the issue of conscription at this time. If it would help win the war, or if it would shorten the length of the conflict, there might be some purpose in urging its adoption now. It is doubtful, however, whether it would do either at the present time. It is admitted that we could not satisfactorily conscript men for the air force or the navy; in fact it is not necessary to do so, since men for these services are coming forward voluntarily in greater numbers than can be accommodated and trained. Then, under our National Resources Mobilization Act the government already has authority to call men and women for home defence, and to place them in any kind of service the state may require. If this authority is not being used to the extent it should be, there may be ground for criticism. That authority could easily be extended to take in a much wider age group, if necessary, and it could be expanded in other directions. If necessary, we could call up men and train them for four or six months, giving them a thorough training and then letting them return to civilian life. This could be done with group after group, making certain that we would have a large number of men in this country thoroughly trained at least for home defence.

The issue, therefore, comes down to the one question of selecting men by conscription for overseas service only. In other words, its application would affect only that group of men whom we might desire to send beyond our territorial waters. The enactment of conscription is not going to change the situation with respect to the postponement of military service, or the method of dealing with conscientious objectors. These items are details of what we already have, and would not likely be changed by the extension of conscription for overseas service. We would likely continue to call up men by age groups; so that feature of the present policy would not be changed.

Here we are; we have, on the one hand, those who propose conscription for overseas service, regardless of anything else; and we have on the other another group just as strongly opposed to conscription as those who are in support of it. The two groups are as far apart as the poles.

Then, also, the people of this country had commitments made to them during the last election by at least the government and the official opposition, to the effect that no conscription measure would be enacted. I should think, sir, that those who supported the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or Doctor Manion during the last election campaign, would all welcome the opportunity of being relieved of the commitments made at that time. Anyone who claims that conscription was not an issue in the last election is not telling the truth. For my part I tried to keep it from being an issue; but when a former cabinet minister came to my constituency, visited certain districts, and raised the issue in those places, I had to refer to it as well. I did so simply by reading statements made in this house by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. I said that I did not know what the future had in store for us, or what changed conditions might bring about, but there was a statement made by a responsible minister of the crown, and as such it must be accepted, for the time being at least, as a matter of government policy.

I was not aware of the position taken in this regard by my opponents in the last election. For the most part I had thought that they, too, had refrained from making it an issue in that campaign. I found, however, in the local press, the week preceding election day, that both of my opponents, in a paid advertisement over their own names, and over the signatures of their respective associations, declared themselves in those advertisements as being opposed to conscription.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Which parties?

Mr. WEIR: The Conservative party and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. We thus have these two points of view which, as I have mentioned, are as far apart as it is possible to be. We have the commitments which were previously made, and now we have these impassioned and emotional appeals from both sides, appeals which are only opening the gulf wider.

In the face of this turmoil and excitement, and having regard to the experiences of the past, can anyone contend that an appeal by way of plebiscite back to the people is not the sane and reasonable course to pursue? The gulf is too widely open to risk taking any other choice. For my own part I am supporting the proposal for a plebiscite, and I shall ask my constituents to relieve the government of the pledges previously made. I would appeal to them, regardless of their political faith, or to what race they may belong, to support this plebiscite and to vote wholeheartedly to give the government full authority to proceed with the prosecution of the war in whatever manner may be necessary, as occasion arises.

I do not think we can fail to keep in mind what happened in Australia during the last war. In that country, on two different occasions a vote of the people was taken with respect to conscription, and the sending of men outside of that country. On both those occasions it was defeated. The second time the proposal was made the government gave the measure its wholehearted support, and yet it was defeated by a larger majority than it had been on the first vote.

Having said that, I should like to say something along a little different line. I believe there is some criticism which can be made, and I am surprised that in this debate some reference has not been made to some of these matters. The National Resources Mobilization Act gave authority to call men and women in Canada for any purpose the state might require. I am bound to say that I do not think this authority, so far as the direction of man-power is concerned, has been exercised to the extent it could have been, or to the extent the country expected it would be.

I recognize immediately that it is not easy, and that it takes time to redirect people to classes of work other than those to which they have been normally accustomed. In the province from which I come there is a shortage of men on the farms. That, I believe, is recognized more and more throughout farming areas all across Canada. There is also a reported shortage of men for bush work, and also a shortage of men for some other lines of work. At the same time there are a number of men probably unfit for military service, and unfit to undertake heavy manual labour, who are without jobs. Perhaps we can look upon them as the non-manual-labour type of men. These men, however, are useful, and they could do much, if they were directed to where there is work to be done. I have had letters from and conversations with travellers who have been laid off. I have talked to men who were semi-retired office men, who are looking for something to do. Apparently as yet we have no plans to use them. I am bound to say this is a feature of our man-power situation which deserves more attention.

Then there is the question of conscientious objectors who were required to perform some service for the state. In Manitoba, for the most part they have been used in the national parks. There is no doubt that they did good work and that they were easy to handle. That kind of work, however, can wait. These men must be put to more useful employment. Under the circumstances which existed last year I am free to confess I do not know to what other type of work they could have been turned. But I feel they should be put to something more useful in the future.

I realize here again—and I do not wish to be misunderstood in this regard—that there are difficulties in the way of utilizing these people.

We had an experience recently which shows the difficulty that arises when we attempt to move a people from one area to another. We must keep these things in mind, and I have an appreciation of what the government is up against in its attempt to reallocate people to different types of work and in different places.

May I here, however, suggest to the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) that he give consideration to utilizing the services of these conscientious objectors in essential work, where they could be utilized in groups, under supervision. I have in mind at the moment the production of sugar beets, wood-cutting, lumber mill work, and work in some of our coal mines. All these are essential requirements, and all are experiencing difficulty in securing labour.

So far as the sugar beet growers of Manitoba are concerned. I believe I may say that unless some steps are taken to assure them of a supply of labour, the sugar beet acreage in that province will be greatly reduced in the coming year. The beet growers would, I believe, be prepared to use this type of labour. They would be willing to pay to the government an agreed-upon contract price for work done. The government, on the other hand, could continue to require these people to perform a service, and, a useful service, under supervision, as it has in the past. Of course, the government would be required to provide accommodation and pay whatever compensation was decided upon, but it is doing that anyway. If it carried out the suggestion I have made, it would only be extending that principle a little further. A similar policy might be worked out with respect to the other types of work that I have suggested, and it might be extended to other types of seasonal farm work.

I do not propose to place on the record again what Canada is accomplishing in providing men and weapons of war. This has been done already by others in a most effective manner, and I am sure that the country has now a pretty complete picture of what Canada has done in a very short period of time. I wish, however, to refer to certain other features of our production which I fear are being lost sight of but which, to me at least, are most important. These have a direct bearing upon the extent to which our man-power may be available for military service. These things were of secondary importance during the last war. We are liable to lose sight of what is being done and of what it may be necessary to do in order to maintain the flow of things we are manufacturing at the present time.

[Mr. Weir.]

Right now our munitions and supplies are going to every theatre of war. Our ships are sailing every sea and our aircraft are to be seen in every sky. Our foodstuffs are available in ever-increasing quantities. Do we ever stop to think of what is behind this effort, the effort that Prime Minister Churchill called magnificent? This is a war that requires equipment superior to that of the enemy, and lots of it. Equipment, planes, tanks and ships are the items being called for. These things require not only men to make them, but men to keep the raw materials flowing and men to move these things to the places where they are required. To illustrate what I have in mind I should like to refer briefly to a few changes that have taken place in our production field during this war compared with the last war. In 1914 our production of aluminum was 13,000,000 pounds; in 1939 this production had risen to 150,000,000 pounds. The comparative productions in other metals are as follows:

	1914	1939
	Pounds	Pounds
Copper	75,000,000	608,000,000
Nickel	45,000,000	226,000,000
Lead	36,000,000	338,000,000
Zinc	21,000,000	394,000,000

The production to-day of alloys is ten times what it was in 1914. We are producing our own requirements of mercury and are sending substantial quantities to Great Britain. Our oil production in 1914 was some few thousand barrels; to-day it is over eight and a half million barrels. Our gold production is away up as compared to what it was then. Timber production is another important item, and this has been expanded both for our own purposes and to meet the needs of Great Britain. Before the war Great Britain secured immense stocks of foodstuffs from European countries and from other parts of the British empire. As we know and regret, these supplies have been largely cut off, thus throwing a greater responsibility upon this country to provide these essentials. Our financing arrangements with Great Britain, which have been mentioned in this house on several occasions, amount virtually to an open charge account in Canada for Great Britain. This financing must be of inestimable assistance to the mother country These things are essential, and their production must be maintained, and increased in many instances.

Keeping what I have said in mind, and adding to it our industrial production; our financial assistance; our contribution to the armed forces, to the air force, to the navy; our efforts in charitable work through the Red Cross and other services, one cannot help but realize, having regard to our geographical position, that the contribution of Canada is something of which every Canadian can be justly proud.

For the moment some of these accomplishments are being lost sight of. For the time being our efforts are being overshadowed by developments elsewhere. The centre of the stage is being taken by developments on the battle fronts and the diplomatic activities in London, Washington and Moscow. Our minds are filled with what is happening in Libya, on the Pacific, at Singapore, at Hong Kong and in Russia. The success of the efforts in these far-flung battlefields nevertheless is still dependent to a very large extent upon what we as individuals do on the home front to maintain those in the front lines.

I had intended to refer to two or three other matters, but other opportunities will be provided for that. In 1940 the present government received a mandate to prosecute this war. There is no doubt that the efforts of the government were under review at that time. The people of Canada showed their confidence in the present Prime Minister in a manner unexcelled in the history of this country. When the history of this period is written I feel confident that the name of W. L. Mackenzie King will stand high among the names of the great world leaders because of the part he has played at this time. We entered this conflict determined to see it through regardless of cost, and we are still going to do that. The people of Canada are prepared for added sacrifices; they are ready to do whatever may be required of them. For the most part many are doing that already in their own quiet way, probably about as effectively as if they were under more rigid direction. All they ask is that they be told the job the government wants to have done. They are prepared to do it. The only other thing they ask of those who are directing the war effort of this country at the present time is that the burden of this terrific effort shall be distributed equitably.

Mr. MAURICE GINGUES (Sherbrooke) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues who have already spoken in this debate in congratulating the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) for the speech he has delivered in moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I also wish to compliment the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) on the effective manner in which he has seconded that motion.

I regret that I do not have their parliamentary experience on the occasion of my first speech in this house, for, as a matter of fact, I rise to-night for the first time since I have the honour to represent the constituency of Sherbrooke, in order to express my views to the Parliament of this country in such an important debate.

It has been ordained by Providence that I should deliver my first speech in this house at the most critical period in the history of the world and of our country. But, Mr. Speaker, before coming to the matter which to my mind transcends all others, may I thank the good people of Sherbrooke—a constituency both agricultural and industrial, where citizens of both races give to the country the example of practical and true harmony—for the honour they have done me in selecting me as their representative in the Canadian parliament. I said that I would discuss a matter which in my opinion transcends all others, and I meant the plebiscite. Since the reading of the speech from the throne, much has been written and said about conscription of both man-power and wealth, and the subject has entailed the expenditure of much money and energy. It seems that if we had taken as much care to explain to the nation the reasons for the plebiscite this house would probably be ready to-night to vote on the main motion. But once again in Canada politics had to come before country. Conscription for overseas service is the only thing that some people have seen or wanted to see in this question. The plebiscite does not mean that we shall have conscription, either of man-power or of wealth. Mr. Speaker, the plebiscite is necessary if we wish to continue to assert and proclaim everywhere that we are fighting for the preservation of democracy, for in asking the people to release them from pledges given at the 1940 general election, the administration upholds and maintains the basic principle of democracy, which is the free expression of the people's will. Moreover, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government are acting in an honest and statesmanlike manner; they are showing once again that they do not want to imitate our enemies and break their pledged word.

The plebiscite will in no way tend to hasten or delay conscription, but it is needed because the conflict is drawing ever closer to our shores and a time may come when the Canadian government will be compelled, for the defence of our territory and our homes, to take emergency measures. Let us not forget that the dreadful scourge of war is at our very door and that Canada, our fatherland, is threatened.

Never, as I say, have we faced such a terrible threat and this government know the danger that hangs over us, they are fully aware of it. Such is the reason why, while it is still time, he is calling upon the people of Canada to appreciate the gravity of the situation and asking them to give him the confidence which he needs, not to apply conscription but simply to be ready at any time to defend Canada and carry out a total and voluntary war effort.

The situation in the Pacific is daily becoming darker, and in spite of the magnificent effort put forth by this country, to use the words of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the threat to Canada is becoming more and more serious. It would be criminal indeed to let ourselves be lulled by over-confidence and then awaken just a little too late and find ourselves under the yoke of the enemy. This government enjoys the confidence of the people. It received a vote of confidence from the people in March, 1940, when we were already at war. The situation has worsened since then. As this government has conducted the war effort efficiently so far, the people are confident that it will do nothing to weaken that war effort, but will do all that is required for the defence of the country. That does not mean resort to conscription for overseas service, for the government will always be responsible to parliament and the people's representatives remain free to approve or reject the measures submitted to them.

For my part, I will show my confidence in the government by my vote on the main motion and I shall vote against both amendments; for I know that if I am here to-day it is not so much because of the esteem my fellow-citizens have kindly shown me as because of the fact that I was the candidate of the leader of the government, of the Prime Minister. I deem it my duty to give a vote of confidence to the present administration. And all who hesitate to show such confidence in the government play into the hands of those who would overthrow the Prime Minister and disunite us that they may rule. Alas, I know full well that in every parliament the world over are to be found elected representatives of the people for whom a renewal of their mandate is more important than the country itself. In this critical hour when danger threatens everything that we hold dear we must forget re-election and think only of the country. As far as I am concerned, even if it means an end to my political career, I will be doing my duty if my stand is such as I conceive it to be in the interest of my countrymen, my province and my country.

[Mr. Gingues.]

As the only man whom we can confidently trust is our Prime Minister, I intend supporting him by voting for the main motion. It is unfortunate that plebiscite and conscription should appear synonymous in the eyes of certain people. After the speeches heard during the present debate from government leaders as well as from some honourable members, I am convinced that there is no ground for such a conscriptionist measure. On the contrary, it would hamper our war effort.

Since the question of conscription has been raised, Mr. Speaker, I must make known my opinion on this measure and the attitude I will take if it is ever brought before us. Before taking my seat in this house, I was opposed to this measure which I considered unjust and inhuman, neither useful nor necessary. I still hold the same opinion and nothing will change my mind on this point. I oppose conscription of wealth as much as conscription of man-power, for in my opinion we are at this time making the best possible use of Canadian resources. If we stop to consider the taxes which Canadians are called upon to pay, we soon realize that taxation has reached a point beyond which we risk achieving destruction of private enterprise. The present taxes of every kind which must be paid by the humblest workingman as well as by the greatest financier, national defence tax, income tax, excess profits tax, succession duties, are all very well, but it cannot be denied that we have gone far enough and I trust the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), when presenting his next budget, will not increase unduly the burden already carried by the Canadian people and will rest content with the taxes we already have to meet. After all, we cannot ask from the taxpayer more than he can pay.

Notwithstanding all these taxes and all these measures, opposition members attack the government for being unwilling to assume their responsibilities. When has the government hesitated to assume responsibility, I ask you? Was it when they submitted their bill for the mobilization of national resources? Was it when they increased taxation, was it when they forced employers to pay cost-of-living bonuses to their employees or when they enforced that radical but necessary measure of price control?

No, Mr. Speaker, the present government never has refused to assume responsibility. Far from it. They have been wise enough to make it impossible for certain individuals to exploit for their own benefit the financial and industrial resources of the country. This explains perhaps the reason why a small group of men would overthrow the Prime Minister, while loudly proclaiming their would-be love of country, trying to appear more patriotic than their neighbour and endeavouring, in this critical period, to divide the Liberal party so as to obtain power and thereafter so direct our war effort that this same group of men may hold sway over the economic life of the country just like they did after the last war. The people must be cautioned against those evil persons who are ready to revive, for the workers and the farmers, the sorry policy of relief and bread lines.

I wish to state frankly, that we are fighting and we shall keep on fighting not only to defeat nazism, but also to ward off the return of disastrous conditions, to increase economic security for the worker and the farmer.

I am opposed to conscription of manpower. In the course of this debate, all kinds of sound arguments have been stated to show that this method has been a failure, but there is another reason on which I would like to dwell. This matter, Mr. Speaker, reminds me of the Canadian mothers. I wish to state that, at this particular moment, I am not speaking as the representative of Sherbrooke constituency only; I wish to speak on behalf of Canadian mothers, whether they speak French or English or any other language, provided they be Canadian. It is for them that I speak against this unfair, useless and inhuman measure; while doing so, I think of the Canadian mothers whose lives are filled with self-denial, devotion to duty, and who raise large families for their country. During the last war, the government of the day, believing that there could be no victory without conscription, enforced that method of raising men. The results are so well known that I need not recall them.

What happened since? Canadian mothers have pondered over this. In the last 25 years the birth rate has fallen to an alarming degree. If we are unfortunate enough to enforce such an unfair measure now, birth control will become more prevalent in the future and, Mr. Speaker, I claim that by the enactment of a law that would undermine the family, we would endanger the very foundation of the nation. We are fighting for the conservation of our property and the continued development of our country, for building a great Canada, a Canadian mentality, a Canadian spirit. This end will never be attained through immigration, but rather by encouraging large families, by showing that we are worthy of the great cause for which we are fighting: Christian civilization.

It behooves us, the parliament of the nation, to act in such a way that the world may gauge the depth of our sincerity. In opposing this measure for this reason based on common sense and truth, I have confidence of acting as a Christian, as a member of a Christian parliament. And whenever consription is brought up, I shall fight it with all my strength. I hope that, at the conclusion of the war, when we see the flag waving as an emblem and a guarantee of peace and freedom, then the citizens of our large cities may erect, on our public squares, not only memorials to our gallant soldiers as a reminder for generations to come, but also monuments to the Canadian mothers.

I wish to say a few words about the province of Quebec, the loyalty of which is apparently questioned by some. Have hon. members already forgotten that on October 25, 1939, the people of that province, called upon to select a government, chose the party which had had the courage to fight for the principle of participation in the war? Has there been a proper realization of the importance of that election and has due credit been given to those who were responsible for the result obtained? If Quebec had unfortunately turned out to be what some think it is and had returned to power the Conservative party disguised as the "National Union" government, Canada's war effort would have been considerably weakened.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to say that on that occasion it was the Liberal party that risked everything and that it was the Liberal leaders who waged the good fight, not the leader of the opposition nor the men who to-day are seeking to divide the nation. On the contrary the whole Conservative organization of Quebec supported the "National Union" candidates. It seems to me that on that occasion the people of Quebec gave manifest proof of their loyalty and patriotism, as they have given since at every opportunity. There are extremists in Quebec as there are elsewhere, but believe me, Mr. Speaker, their number is small in Quebec as it is small elsewhere.

If I remind the house of this action taken by my province in 1939, it is because of the important effect I believe it has had on our war effort.

Mr. Speaker, the situation is serious, danger is at our door. Let us not wait until we have to defend ourselves at Vancouver, Halifax, Quebec or Toronto. Let us join in a holy union, laying aside all prejudice and political passion. Let us put our trust in the best administration Canada has ever had. To those who abstain from voting on the main motion or who vote against it, I say that they are doing a disservice to their country.

As was so well said in his first speech in this house by an hon. member whom I wish to warmly congratulate, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Côté): Let all those who have lately devoted so much energy to dividing the nation now concentrate their activities on helping our war effort, and I am convinced that this effort will remain voluntary and will be able to bring us victory and peace.

The people of the United States are now using a motto which constantly reminds them that they are at war. On all sides they see posted up the words "Remember Pearl Harbor." The regretted Minister of Justice, Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe, speaking in Sherbrooke at the outset of the war, gave us a motto when he said: "One country, two languages, different religions, but only one heart." This is what we see in Canada to-day and what we will always see: 11,500,000 Canadians living side by side, speaking two languages, professing different religions, but with a single heart tending towards the one ideal—the maintenance of democracy as the unshakeable bulwark of our liberty.

Mr. B. M. HILL (Charlotte): I wish to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) upon their admirable speeches in opening this debate. The experience which they obtained in England, together with their legal training, helped them much and added to the excellence of their addresses.

We have heard a great deal in this debate concerning an all-out war effort. This is a term used to indicate a balanced war effort in which our military establishments, combined with our industrial effort in the production of war equipment and material for the use of our citizens, are so balanced as to result in the greatest possible war effort of our country. This can be brought to one hundred per cent effectiveness only by a certain measure of national selective service. I would add to the criticism of the government voiced by some hon. members this one thing, that a greater proportion of national selective service might have been brought about.

Canada's war effort to-day is second to that of none of the united nations, having regard to our population. Under the leadership of our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a great deal has been accomplished. I followed for many years his efforts to bring about economic cooperation between the United States and Canada, and between the British empire and the United States. I am one who believes that if this cooperation had been brought about several years ago, it would have had a steadying influence in the world and might have prevented this world war. When the history of this war is written I am sure that the work of our Prime Minister in bringing about cooperation between the great Anglo-Saxon nations will be recognized as one of the most important phases of our war effort.

Since the outbreak of the war the heads of our military, naval and air departments have given outstanding service. The figures covering the expansion in these departments have been given to the house; and I shall not repeat them. But may I say that the successful handling of Canada's financial effort by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is second to that of none of the other united nations. The excellence of his work is being recognized by the people of Canada. On February 10 the Minister of Finance spoke before the Rotary club of Montreal. In an editorial on February 11 the Montreal Star paid him this tribute:

> There is, as a rule, very little in financial matters that makes for inspiration, but Mr. Ilsley's handling of his theme was not only masterly, it was inspired. And it stirred responsive emotions in the minds of all who were privileged to hear him. There were passages in his speech that reached a high measure of eloquence, but they were not mere flights of rhetoric. They came straight from the heart of a man who has shouldered a great responsibility and a tremendous task, who is conscious of the immense strain which Canada's commitments place upon the nation, but who has absolute confidence that the nation will not fail.

That is a well-earned tribute. In his speech the Minister of Finance said:

> Let me tell you what I think we should aim to do: I think we should aim to make a reputation for Canadian achievement in this war which will be the talk of the world for generations, that will be the pride of ourselves, our children, and our children's children.

I agree with the sentiment there expressed. Let me add that I feel, and I believe all hon. members feel, that no sacrifice is too great for our generation to make to ensure that when those children's children take our places as citizens of this great dominion, Canada will still be Canada.

The work of our Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) stands out as one of the greatest pieces of organization in our war effort. I know that other hon. members who belong to the engineering profession will join with me in expressing satisfaction at the splendid service given to Canada by a member of our profession. Canada was indeed fortunate that at the outbreak of the war there was a member of the cabinet so highly trained in engineering and whose later experience in industrial engineering had so fitted him for the great task of directing the reorganization of the industrial life of Canada for war. As soon as the war broke out, the minister called many of the best industrial organizers and organizations of the dominion to Ottawa. Many of these men were experts in various lines of industry, and to their credit be it said that they volunteered their services and were permitted by their companies to give their time and effort to placing the industrial life of Canada on a war footing.

There was much to be done at the start; in fact chaotic conditions existed. Canada had but one munitions plant producing war equipment. The whole industrial life of the country had to be changed from peace-time pursuits to a war-time basis. During the first year of the war many of us felt that the progress which was being made was not as great as it should be. But in changing over the entire industrial life of Canada we had to creep before we could walk and walk before we could run, and I believe we have yet to learn to run efficiently enough to enable us to win this war. If, however, one takes the actual production month by month since the beginning of the war, it will be noted that while at first we progressed in arithmetical progression, we are now going ahead in geometrical progression.

When we look at the present output of Canada in war material and farm production we realize that we are well on the way to the goal of mass production, a term which has been used for all-out efficient production. And when we look at the number of people employed on war work and the number in our army, navy and air force, we realize that we are approaching the limit of our manpower along certain lines. There is, however, one large field which, I believe, has not yet been touched; that is in the smaller centres of population in our country. I am convinced that the Minister of Munitions and Supply has organized the great centres of mass production in Ontario and Quebec so well that he may now turn his organizing ability to the smaller centres without hurting production in the larger centres; those centres will go on under their own momentum. But in many small towns in Canada—and I know for a fact in many small towns in New Brunswick—there are many thousands of men and women who could be employed in war work without in any way interfering with the ordinary life of the country. I assume that the work of organizing these people, which has to do with national selective service, will be done by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) in conjunction with the Minister of Munitions and Supply. In New Brunswick, in the smaller towns of 1,000 to 5,000 population, there are many men and women, men not eligible for war service, who are employed only part time, or employed in non-essential work. These people could be organized to advantage, and I believe it is the duty of the Minister of Munitions and Supply to give this matter his most serious attention at an early date.

In the constituency which I have the honour to represent there are four small towns with populations ranging from 1,500 to 5,000. No war work is being done for the Canadian government in any of these towns, though one small factory in one town is doing work for the British government, in the production of shell boxes. I believe this condition exists also in many small towns throughout Canada. It is just possible that the smaller communities in Quebec and Ontario have had their available labour moved to the larger centres, but that is not the case in many sections of the prairies and in eastern Canada. I know also that when the rationing of gasoline, the rationing of tires, the reduction in the use of automobiles and the reduction in tourist traffic take place, many men will be thrown out of employment in our garages and service stations. They are not men of military age. They are practical mechanics, with many years of experience in this work. These men should be most valuable in the war service of Canada, and steps should be taken at once to see that when they are thrown out of work in the spring, their services will be utilized.

In many sections of New Brunswick there is a feeling of frustration among the people because of the fact that they are not employed at something they feel is of value to the war effort of this dominion. I should like to suggest to the Minister of Munitions and Supply that one method by which this situation could be overcome would be by the appointment of an assistant, or perhaps two assistants, one of whom should be a business man, who would be located in these smaller provinces. They should be located, not in Ottawa, but in the province whose war effort they are interested in building up. Then they could be in constant touch with the local government, and with industries throughout the province; they would know where labour could be found and could advise the minister as to the steps that should be taken to place industries in suitable locations, where these men might be given employment in active war work.

I have been told that the unit cost of production is far greater in these small centres than in the mass-production centres. I believe this is true, up to the point where you have to bring labour from other sections or other provinces to these mass-production centres. The moment you do this, you have to add the cost of transporting these men. They have to leave their families behind; they have to maintain themselves in these centres. Already the government has embarked upon housing schemes for these workers. If it would take all these costs, which are costs to this country, into consideration, I believe it would find that the cost of extending production in these mass-production centres is greater than would be the cost of production in the smaller places. Then, again, suppose we are not getting the production we should get in these smaller centres, and these people are not taken to the larger centres. This means that we lose a certain amount of production. Supposing a shell produced in a smaller centre cost $2 instead of $1.75. Many battles have been lost in this war because of lack of equipment, and I would rather have a $2 shell than none at all. I would recommend to the minister that he give most serious consideration to this matter, for I believe that production can be stepped up to a far greater extent by this method in the coming year than by the further extension of facilities which already exist in the more thickly populated centres of production.

I have some information here which comes from a quarterly review of public affairs published by Dalhousie university, in the city of Halifax. The Minister of Munitions and Supply was formerly professor of engineering at that university, so he should have some regard for these suggestions. In this publication I find that on a per capita basis, in the maritime provinces only one-third of the amount of money has been spent on war products that has been spent in the whole of Canada. When this matter was brought to the attention of the government it was said that in the maritimes we did not have the industrial equipment with which to do this work; but according to this report, having regard to each thousand dollars invested in industrial plant, we still have only one-half as much money being spent in the maritimes as is being spent in the rest of Canada. The greatest injustice to New Brunswick is shown in the final figures, which have to do with grants in connection with the construction of industrial plants in Canada. I find that New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island obtained only one-fourth of one per cent of the total amount spent for this purpose throughout Canada, though this district has five per cent of the population of this country. This, I think, accounts for the fact that we are not getting war orders in that part of the country, and for the further fact that there is a feeling of frustration among the workers there.

All hon. members must realize that there is a limit to the man-power that can be secured for military purposes. This is governed by the number of men in our population who are physically fit and between certain ages. The only way by which any increase can be brought about is by new classes coming of age or by the extension of the age limit. There is a grave question in my mind as to whether the extension of the age limit will not result in men being placed in military service who could be far more useful to our war effort in the production of military equipment. While this is true of the men available for war purposes, I am not one of those who believe that our production of materials, equipment and food for the carrying on of our war effort will ever reach a maximum. If this war should go on for another ten years, I think every hon. member is convinced that our production at the end of that period will be greater than at any intermediate stage. The reason is that while our man- and woman-power available for industrial production may reach its limit, the improvement in machines, the bringing into production of more electrical power, and the use of more efficient methods of production will each year enable the same number of employees to produce larger quantities of goods. Then, again, as the necessity arises, greater effort will be made by the man-power employed in the production of equipment.

A great deal has been said in this house with reference to the immediate conscription of man-power for overseas service as an absolute essential to an all-out war effort. After listening to the enlistment records as given by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), I am quite convinced that voluntary enlistment has not failed; in fact, that it has not yet faltered. I am one of those who believe that an army of men enlisted for overseas service of their own free will is a far more effective army than one of men who had to be enlisted by compulsion. I also believe that as long as our voluntary enlistment method does not fail, we should not bring in compulsory service for overseas. I believe, too, that an army for home defence obtained by compulsory service is just as effective in its own land as one which is formed by voluntary enlistment. My reason for making that statement is that the men have the incentive of fighting on their own soil. Therefore I believe that conscription for home service would produce an able and efficient army for the defence of our shores, should that defence be required.

The county and province I represent in the house has, I am proud to say, shown voluntary enlistments for overseas service equal to those of any other part of the Dominion of Canada. In proportion to its population, New Brunswick has the best record for voluntary enlistment in the army, for active service overseas, of any military district.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about Prince Edward Island? They are classed along with Nova Scotia, but their average is very high.

Mr. HILL: They are mixed with the Nova Scotia district, so we cannot get the exact figure.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but their average is extremely high.

Mr. HILL: Yes, I believe it is; but I am speaking of military districts. The voluntary enlistment record of New Brunswick, for all branches of the service, including the navy and the air force, stands with three other districts as being highest in the dominion. Every time recruits have been called for, or a drive has been put on to increase the numbers of those enlisted for active service overseas, the county of Charlotte, and the province of New Brunswick as a whole, have always filled their quota. In New Brunswick we have a mixed population, comprising the two great races of Canada. Approximately one-third of our population in New Brunswick is of French origin. I know all hon. members from New Brunswick, on both the government and opposition benches, and including the house leader of the official opposition party, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) will agree with me when I say that we are justly proud of the record of our French citizens, as far as enlistments for active service for overseas are concerned. They have kept that record up, man for man, according to their population, along with their English-speaking compatriots in our province, and I know that all citizens of New Brunswick are proud of this fact. When a further call is made to bring up the strength of our overseas service, New Brunswick will not be lacking.

We have heard a great deal in the house about the conscription of wealth. I say that we have already started on the conscription of wealth. When a country which produced only $10,000,000 from income tax during the whole four years of the last great war, now produces between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000 from the same source within twelve months, we are certainly on the road to the conscription of wealth. It is my firm conviction that when the Minister of Finance brings down his next budget, hon. members and the people of Canada generally will be satisfied that we are increasing the conscription of wealth in Canada.

The government proposes a plebiscite of the people, not to decide the question with respect to compulsory national selective service, but to determine whether the people are prepared to release the government and private members from pledges given during the last election campaign. In that campaign the Prime Minister and other Liberal leaders pledged their party that conscription of men for overseas service would not be brought into force without consulting the people. The leader of the National government party went farther, and pledging his party and himself, stated that he was unalterably and absolutely opposed to conscription. He based his opposition on the fact that during the last war he had supported conscription, and supported the Union government; but he claimed that conscription was a failure at the time of the last war, and that it stirred up so much misunderstanding throughout the country that it had retarded Canada's war effort. He added that for that reason, and because it was the duty of a public man to uphold the unity of Canada, he was absolutely opposed to conscription of men for overseas service. I believe that that speech pledged his party and his supporters to no conscription for overseas service.

The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) was reported in the press during the campaign as stating that his party was unalterably opposed to conscription of men for overseas service. In view of the definite pledges given to the people at that time, binding practically every hon. member, I cannot see how any hon. member can object to referring this matter to the people for their decision, as promised by the Prime Minister. The people are to be asked whether they are prepared to release the government and every member of parliament from the pledges given, and to place full responsibility for every action and decision with reference to our war effort squarely on the shoulders of their representatives in parliament.

I, for one, Mr. Speaker, believe that pledges made to the people should be carried out, and I have confidence that the decision of the majority of people in Canada will be in the best interests of the country as a whole. I have confidence that the people of the constituency of Charlotte, which I have the honour to represent, are prepared to make any sacrifice to win the war. If they will by their vote place the responsibility on me as their representative to take decisions on the serious problems which come before parliament—and these problems will be serious, before the war is ended, problems which I believe will affect the entire way of life in the country—I am prepared to assume that responsibility, and do what I believe is in the best interests of Canada, and the war effort of the dominion.

Mr. HECTOR AUTHIER (Chapleau) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, although we have now reached the nineteenth sitting of the house no one has yet forgotten the eloquence and the remarkable reasoning of the mover, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), and the seconder, the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), of the address in reply to the speech from the throne and, after so many others, I also wish to offer my congratulations. Brevity is imperative at this stage and I will be brief.

The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has moved an amendment containing but one point—and it is not striking for its novelty—namely conscription of Canadians for overseas service. His speech, fair enough in form, was spoiled by two or three partisan tirades and certain passages, which I really find quite insulting, where he quoted Lincoln to show off as cowards and slackers those who favour voluntary enlistment. I had attached little importance at first to this quotation from Lincoln, as we are in the habit —save perhaps for the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot)—to overlook many things from the leader of the opposition. But since hearing this same quotation from the lips of the honourable member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), I could not overcome the urge to protest.

Needless to state that I do not hold anything against Abraham Lincoln, who never spoke a word about us.

The generous soul of the great emancipator must be very sad when Tories use his words to insult people whose only crime is to be loyal to their country first and above all. Lincoln fought to preserve unity in his country; but our Tories are doing their utmost to divide theirs.

No, French Canadians are not cowards because they are opposed to conscription for overseas service. On the contrary, they endure sarcasm, abuse and severe retaliation on the part of a fanatical press and others. They accepted conscription for the defence of our country without a moment's hesitation; they will accept it also for the defence of the continent. They have approved the policy of voluntary participation and have generously contributed to Canada's war effort outside the country.

Why did they do it? To please their compatriots of Anglo-Saxon origin who were naturally and spontaneously drawn in this war by the call of blood. We certainly hate nazism, that German form of superimperialism which is repugnant to our Catholic mind; but such ideological considerations would have been insufficient to make us vote for war. The reason why we voted with our fellow Canadians of Anglo-Saxon origin, whose feelings we understand and appreciate, resides in a true desire to cooperate with them. Since then, we have been cooperating with them throughout. But we are not ready to accept conscription of man-power for overseas service, which would only result in disrupting the country without adding anything worthwhile to our war effort. Our English-speaking fellow Canadians should, instead of pressing this point, abide by the well defined attitude which prevailed when we entered the war. When the defence of Canada is at stake—the urgency of which is daily becoming greater—French Canadians are prepared to make all necessary sacrifices. I am one of those who believe that we should have larger home-defence forces, better equipped and better trained than those we now have. Too many people are apparently obsessed by the idea of sending overseas as many of our soldiers as we can. It is a fixed idea with them. And in a changing world like ours fixed ideas must be looked upon with a great deal of suspicion.

People who have neither learned nor forgotten anything since the last war are dangerous people.

How much nearer to my heart is the leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) who so ably manages to analyse fresh developments and the changing aspects of the world drama, and who knows how to draw from them the conclusions of real interest to us. When the history of this country is written, his prudence and circumspection will assume a legendary character. And it is this sage among sages who has been attacked and vilified throughout the country by a press in the pay of narrow and fanatical partisans, worthy successors of those who, in the last century, set fire to the Canadian parliament buildings and cast stones at a noble representative of the King in Canada, the father of our constitutional liberties. Fortunately, the majority of the people see clearly in the matter and, on February 9, those enemies of the Canadian mind already reaped part of the punishment they deserve and which will surely be visited upon them.

I anticipate with much pleasure the forthcoming entrance into this house of the victors in the recent elections: my old friend the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Saint-Laurent); my former colleague in the Quebec provincial legislature, the member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Fauteux) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), whose special ability is everywhere acknowledged; and, finally, the vanquisher of the Tory leader in the constituency of York South. Since this latter victory. I think less unkindly of Toronto.

Incidentally, I wish to tell the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation that I share many of their views in the field of economics. I shall not, however, support the amendment proposed by their leader. He goes too far. We cannot, in the midst of a war crisis, risk so radical an economic and social revolution. But the after-war will bring a new order which will surely borrow something, perhaps a good deal, from the doctrine to which they adhere. With the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) I suggest to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and to the leader of the official opposition that they withdraw their amendments so as to make the adoption of the address unanimous, as it should be.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot resume my seat without saying a few words about the proposed plebiscite and a few other questions which command the attention of my electors and of parliament.

The war takes a new turn from month to month, and sometimes oftener. We must be prepared for any emergency.

I said a moment ago that I would have no objection to our conscripts serving for the defence of the American continent. But it would be necessary to modify the existing act for that purpose. The Prime Minister, wishing to be true to his promise and to respect the will of the people, is asking by means of a plebiscite to be freed from all obstacles that would prevent him from adopting measures which the government might deem necessary.

I have enough confidence in the Prime Minister to support him on this occasion. All measures submitted to the house later on will be judged on their merits. Moreover, the electors will be free to vote according to the dictates of their conscience on this plebiscite.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is asking the Canadian people to subscribe to a $600,000,000 loan. I wish him all the success possible, but I must say frankly that the circumstances are not as favourable in my district on this occasion as they were for the preceding loan. Rumours have been heard that the gold mines may soon be forced to curtail their production. Miners and those living in mining towns, alarmed at such rumours, will naturally keep their savings instead of buying government bonds. They are likely to forget that government bonds are for all practical purposes like money in the bank.

I cannot see how the country would benefit by closing gold mines producing at the rate of $200,000,000 a year. Even if the United States were to suspend all gold imports, it would still be to the advantage of Canada to build up reserves for the future. A reserve of two billion dollars in Canada would be the equivalent of that existing in the United States. That would mean ten years' production for our mines.

Logging is also an important industry in the section of Quebec which I represent. I read in the press recently that the price of pulpwood was fixed by the timber controller. By unanimous request of the people of Quebec, the government of this province are investigating prices and sales conditions of pulpwood, in order that reasonable prices may obtain in certain sections of the province where wood is practically given away for nothing. In fact, in my constituency settlers clearing new land several miles from the railroad have often had to deliver their wood, with the bark removed, on the car for $6 and $7 a cord. This price represents poor wages for cutting and barking, very little for hauling and nothing at all for the wood itself. There can be no justification for the maintenance of such unfair prices, and I hope that the timber controller will cooperate with the provincial administration, which is willing to remove such abuses.

In his amendment to the address, the leader of the opposition referred to the necessity of preparing for the after-war period. Everyone knows that the government has the question under consideration. In a statement subsequent to the speech from the throne, the Prime Minister referred to colonization as a means to that end.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to recall that I have been living for thirty years in the colonization district which I have the honour to represent in this house. When I first settled in that part of the country, there were only a few squatters, possibly a dozen families in the neighbourhood, and the labourers working on the construction of the Transcontinental railway. One hundred miles from that railroad, on the shores of lake Temiskaming, there were half a dozen parishes, and less than ten thousand people all told. According to the figures of the latest census, the two constituencies Témiscamingue and Abitibi, forming the northwestern portion of the province of Quebec, now have a population of 110,000. The fact that their population increased by 100,000 in thirty years is chiefly due to land settlement, which ought to go on for a long time to come in that vast area. I do not say that the best tillable land in Canada is to be found there, lest I should distress my right-hand neighbour the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Sissons). But it is the last extensive land settlement area that remains in the province of Quebec. May this fact not be forgotten in the post-war programme. It would be advisable to do some preliminary work there. The Canadian government has for some years extended assistance for the building of roads in mining areas. A similar policy should be adopted with a view to opening or completing certain main roads leading into our best remaining lands.

During this session I shall no doubt have another opportunity to bring up this subject which is of vital importance in any post-war planning. I have no objection to the government helping the farmers of the west, the industries of central Canada and the fishermen of our coastal provinces, but they should also encourage the efforts of the settlers in the newly opened lands of Quebec, who are constantly extending our agricultural area through hard and often thankless work, for which they deserve all the more credit.

Mr. JOSEPH H. LECLERC (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, as very few minutes remain before adjournment, I shall be brief. I have but a few remarks to make, anyhow.

At this stage of the debate on the address, which has now lasted for three weeks, I must say how much I admire your patience in listening to the same arguments put forth in different tones. I intend being very brief as I do not approve of indefinitely travelling beaten roads. Believing, however, that the people of my constituency wish to know what stand their representative is taking, I wish to say a few words on the subject of conscription, which is so much in the public mind at the present.

Mr. Speaker, there is no need for me to play both ends against the middle, as I expect nothing from politics and my sole ambition is to remain ever faithful to those whom I represent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LECLERC: I do not hesitate to say that the electors in my constituency, in my province and in the country have much more confidence at the present moment in the Right Hon. Mackenzie King than in the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen who has just met defeat in York South. All Liberal members, including the dissentients, state that their confidence is far greater in the King administration than in any other.

I am not a real politician, Mr. Speaker, but it does seem to me that you will readily understand how illogical those dissenting Liberals are. Should we all follow their example and vote with the Conservatives against adopting the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the present government would be overthrown only to be succeeded by a union government. For my part, I do not feel inclined to present the electors of Shefford constituency with such an offering. Has not the Liberal party just won four victories? This is a clear proof of the confidence the electors still place in the hon. Prime Minister. So that my position will leave no doubt whatever, I wish to state that I am personally opposed to conscription for overseas service for many reasons. The first is that I took this pledge at the last election and if there is anything I wish above all else, it is to continue to deserve the respect of my compatriots. A second reason is that, at the present time, events are taking a disquieting turn and in spite of what certain strategists, with nothing but defeats to their credit so far, might say, I feel that the sending of troops to foreign lands becomes more and more a reckless adventure.

Mr. Speaker, after this explanation, which I believe is clear enough, I shall add that it is not my intention, in constituencies which I do not represent, of holding meetings that might stir emotions in a time when composure and moderation are desirable. I do not look upon myself as the saviour of my race and I do not take myself seriously enough to assume leadership of a new party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LECLERC: The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) has assumed leadership of the Canadian party; however, noblesse oblige; will he prove equal to the task? Using the expression this hon. leader has coined to designate his humble colleagues, I trust his "followers" in the future will be sufficient in number to insure greater success for him than at the last election.

I could add much more, but I said I would be brief. The electors of Ontario, along with those of my province, have rejected the ultra-conscriptionists. Common sense has prevailed. The electors of those constituencies have done good work for national unity and I congratulate them. Therefore, for the sake of unity, I shall not rehash the old or the new stories; I shall follow the advice of the well-meaning people and remain calm and moderate, so as to assuage the bad feelings all too prevalent.

Mr. Speaker, before I conclude my remarks I want to make a request to the government concerning farmers' sons who, though indispensable on the farm, are called for military service. At the present time, we experience all kinds of difficulties when we try to obtain even short postponements for those who are necessary on the farm the whole year around. The mobilization act should be amended so that farmers' sons who have never left the farm and bona fide farm workers could obtain an indefinite postponement. I maintain that the farmer who owns fifteen or twenty milch cows, not taking into account his other live stock—yearlings, hogs, et cetera—and a maple bush, never enjoys free time from one end of the year to the other. A farmer who has to look after twenty-five or thirty milch cows, even if he enjoys perfect health, cannot do all his work without the aid of at least two helpers. Whether these helpers are his own sons or hired men, they are absolutely needed for the operation of his farm. In 1941 there was a labour shortage. In 1942 the situation appears to be getting worse, with indications of a smaller agricultural production. The government is aware that England, whose people are now on short rations, needs all that we can produce on our farms.

I wish to point out that I have received no requests for postponement from men of the town of Granby and that those I have received from farmers' sons are legitimate. We are at present obliged to parley with the registrars who apparently know very little about farming.

Needless to say that the production of foodstuffs is just as essential as that of arms and munitions. The government should therefore leave the farm workers on the farm and have the mobilization act amended so that farmers' sons absolutely needed on the farm may obtain an indefinite postponement.

On motion of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.52 p.m.

Wednesday, February 18, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the clerk of the house has received from the chief electoral officer certificate of the election and return of the following member, viz:

Of Joseph William Noseworthy, Esquire, for the electoral district of York South.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Joseph William Noseworthy, Esquire, member for the electoral district of York South, introduced by Mr. Coldwell and Mr. MacInnis.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Transport) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, respecting the appointment of auditors for National Railways.

He said: This bill is to provide for the appointment of auditors for the Canadian National Railways.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

HEALTH OF DISCHARGED MEN—REMARKS OF PREMIER OF ONTARIO AS REPORTED IN TO-DAY'S PRESS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, in this morning's Citizen there appears a Canadian Press dispatch referring to Premier Hepburn's comment on the statements made in this house last Monday in regard to health conditions among discharged men. May I emphasize that this statement was officially presented on the records of the assembly at Queen's Park, Toronto. I quote from his remarks:

Mr. Hepburn said he did not blame defence minister J. L. Ralston, navy minister Angus Macdonald or air minister C. G. Power for their criticism of him but he did blame Prime Minister Mackenzie King.

"He (Mr. King) is not the kind to shoot you verbally but he would buy a gun, hand it to the other fellow and tell him to shoot you."

The report of the same incident appearing in the Toronto Star does me the honour of indicating that the premier also referred to me. I wish to state to this house most definitely and emphatically that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had no knowledge of my intention to make a statement on the subject of health conditions among discharged men, and therefore the statement of the premier of Ontario is absolutely false and utterly untrue in every detail. May I add, sir, in anticipation of further prevarications from Queen's Park, that until the present moment the Prime Minister of Canada had no knowledge of the statement I am making now.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Referring to the matter mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), I notice that the account which appears in this morning's Citizen of Mr. Hepburn's remarks is headed as follows:

Hepburn Scores Press Reports as "Erroneous."

Ontario Premier Absolves Three Defence Ministers for Criticisms, Placing Blame on Mr. King.

It might be thought that as the Minister of Pensions and National Health is not included in the category to which reference is made, there has been some suggestion made by me to one or other of the other ministers. The article states:

Mr. Hepburn said he did not blame defence minister J. L. Ralston, navy minister Angus Macdonald or air minister C. G. Power for their criticism of him but he did blame Prime Minister Mackenzie King.

Then referring to myself:

"He (Mr. King) is not the kind to shoot you verbally but he would buy a gun, hand it to the other fellow and tell him to shoot you."

Just in case anyone reading that particular article might infer that I handed a loaded gun to one of my colleagues in the defence departments, I wish to say that I had no knowledge that any minister of the crown was going to make any reference whatever to the subject which was referred to the other day by the different ministers whom the Premier of Ontario has mentioned.

Mr. HOMUTH: Would you, shoot him yourself?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would not say whether I think he is worth shooting or not.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

INCOME TAX

1941 FORMS—NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) a question based on a conversation I had yesterday morning with a gentleman in reference to the purchasing of victory loan bonds. He was at a loss to know how many to buy because, he said, he was unable to obtain forms to figure out his income tax and did not like to commit himself without knowing how much money he would have left with which to buy bonds. I saw him again this morning and he was greatly perturbed over an article in this morning's Globe and Mail referring to the fact, I presume, that the Minister of Finance and the Ontario government have not yet come into agreement as to what is to be the situation in regard to the Ontario income tax. I told this gentleman to possess his soul in patience and buy all the bonds he could, but I would like the Minister of National Revenue to tell us when the forms will be ready. I went to the post office this morning, after having this second conversation, and was still unable to obtain the income tax forms, except for the very low brackets. What we do not know yet is whether we will have to pay two income taxes, one to Ontario and one to the dominion.

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) was kind enough to give me notice of his question.

In recent years the income tax branch has been collecting income tax for five of the provinces. This required special forms for each of those five provinces. In view of the recent provincial negotiations it was uncertain whether or not these special forms would again be required. The consent of the provinces was necessary before leaving particulars of the provincial taxes off the forms. As a result the individual forms were not available this year until ten days later than the usual date. Forms T-1, for individual incomes over $5,000, and T-1 special, for individual incomes of $5,000 and under, were available in January, together with an informative pamphlet which had been prepared for use in the event of the income tax forms not being available before the end of January. I am informed that 3,000 of the forms T-1, for incomes over $5,000, and 120,000 of the forms T-1 special, for incomes of $5,000 and under, were delivered in Toronto in January, and that a total of 218,000 of form T-1 and 879,000 of form T-1 special have now been delivered in Toronto.

I might point out that it is the practice of local inspectors to supply the demand from their own offices, and then to make general distribution through banks, post offices and other appropriate places. I understand that the post offices and sub post offices in Toronto district have been supplied with forms, following their receipt by the inspector of income tax in Toronto. Whether or not that applies to Ottawa, I do not know, but I shall secure the information for the hon. member. The forms are of course available at the income tax offices.

RUBBER, OIL AND GASOLINE

DUPLICATION OF TRANSPORT SERVICES BY BUS, TRUCK AND RAIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. In view of the shortage of crude rubber, oil and gasoline, what steps has the government taken to survey the duplication of transport services by bus, truck and rail, with the object in view of having services which can be dispensed with discontinued, thereby conserving tires, oil and gasoline?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): As my hon. friend knows, the regulation of truck and bus traffic is a matter under the jurisdiction of the provinces. A bill was introduced in this parliament to give the dominion government jurisdiction, but it did not pass. I may point out however that we are not issuing new tires for buses, unless it can be shown that these buses serve an essential war service. I think that as a result of what is being done, coordination will be worked out.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the minister use his influence to see that buses do not pass, at a rate of sixty-five miles an hour or more, civilians who are travelling at forty miles an hour? That is happening on the highways.

Mr. HOWE: I have no influence in that quarter.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

COMMUNICATIONS WITH NORTHERN OUTPOSTS FOR DEFENCE PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. A press dispatch this morning from Washington quotes President Roosevelt as warning that an enemy attack on Alaska is a perfectly possible military operation, and as declaring that there is an urgent need for improving communications between the United States and Alaska. In fact the president is quoted as saying that a decision to start must be made within the next two or three weeks, if something is to be done by January, 1943. The dispatch also states that there have been renewed discussions with the Canadian government with respect to the Alaska highway, or some alternative means of rushing men and equipment to the northern outposts of the continent.

This is a matter of vital importance to Canada, and a statement on the subject from the Prime Minister as to how Canada is cooperating would greatly reassure the Canadian people.

Mr. CHURCH: And Japan has the command of the sea there.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In reply to the hon. member for Vancouver South, may I say that the appropriate defence agencies of the two countries have been and are giving close consideration to the problem of communication with Alaska. I do not know that I can say more than that at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: Will the Prime Minister at an early day make a statement concerning the Alaska highway, or some other means of communication?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say offhand how soon a statement can be made on the matter. But at the appropriate time it will be made.

Mr. CHURCH: The proposed road and air bases there are of little use without sea power.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN AMHERST, N.S., FOR LACK OF REROLLING MATERIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, arising out of a telegram received from a representative of the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee at Amherst, Nova Scotia, stating,—

> One hundred and fifty men out of work in rolling mills, Canadian Car and Foundry, Amherst, for the lack of rerolling material. Man named Sonnell claims that he can supply material.

Has the minister any knowledge of this situation, and if so what steps does he propose to take to remedy it?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave me notice of his question, but I received it only as I was coming into the house; therefore I have not been able to look into it as fully as I should like. I might say however that these small rerolling mills deal directly with the scrap metals trade. Their raw material is scrap rail and scrap metal of various kinds, and it is doubtful if this operation would come within the purview of the steel controller. However I shall take the matter up with the steel controller and see if something can be done.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I have had similar telegrams, and I took the matter up with the heads of the company in Montreal and in Amherst. I thought it was more appropriate to do that than to take it up with the minister.

AIR TRAINING PLAN

QUESTION AS TO PARTICIPATION OF INDIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence for Air if the government of India was consulted when the empire air training scheme was set up, and if there are any natives of India at the present time in training in Canada?

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Offhand I would say that so far as I know there are no natives of India at the present time in training in Canada. Suggestions have been coming from time to time from the government of India to the effect that some of their people should come here for training, but these representations have never come to anything.

SUGAR

APPLICATION OF TWENTY PER CENT REDUCTION IN COMMERCIAL USE—WINES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) asked me about the reduction in the quantity of sugar available for wineries. I find that the twenty per cent reduction applies in respect to wineries, just as it does in regard to other industrial users.

With regard to beer, which was mentioned yesterday, I find that my answer given at that time is only 99·9 per cent right. In other words, one-tenth of one per cent of sugar is used in the manufacture of beer. The amount is so insignificant, however, that no order was made with respect to it.

[Mr. Gillis.]

OIL

STEPS TO INCREASE CANADIAN PRODUCTION—DEVELOPMENT OF TAR SANDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. In view of the serious situation in the far east, and the possibility of our losing our far eastern oil supply, what is the government going to do to cause an actual increase in Canadian production of oil?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Various steps have been taken. The tax structure was revised at the last sitting of the house to encourage drilling for oil throughout Canada. That revision had a very stimulating effect in the direction indicated. At this time steps are being taken to develop small oil areas for specific uses. Those negotiations are going on at the present time. I do not know that we have gone further than that. But I can say that we think we are developing considerably the production of oil. I have no suggestions to make to the government to enlarge our operations in that respect.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Is anything being done with the tar sands?

Mr. HOWE: I have a very exhaustive report on the subject of tar sands, and I should be very glad to let my hon. friend have a copy of it. It indicates, however, that the location of the sands and the possibility of development is too remote to be of any great use in this war.

BRUCE COAL COMPANY

QUESTION AS TO INVESTIGATION BY ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to a question asked by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and reported at page 401 of Hansard for February 9.

The hon. member for Témiscouata has raised the question of the Bruce Coal company receiving contracts from the government since it was made public that they were under investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

All contracts placed by the Department of Munitions and Supply with the Bruce Coal company were placed prior to the seizure by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, on January 21, of all books and files of the Bruce Coal company, and none have been placed since. The Bruce Coal company is still delivering coal on contracts placed prior to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police's action on January 21, and will continue to do so until such time as this department receives the proper legal advice to the contrary.

SHIPBUILDING

SUGGESTED AUGMENTATION OF PROGRAMME BY BUILDING OF WOODEN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. According to a statement in last night's press, the chairman of the wartime shipping board, Mr. MacMillan, stated that supplies from this country are being held up owing to the lack of ships. Will the minister give further consideration to the proposal that our present shipbuilding programme be augmented by the building of wooden ships, especially as we have the materials and men available?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I did not understand Mr. MacMillan's statement to be that supplies are being held up because of the lack of ships. I hardly think that that is true. Of course, there is always the danger that our increased output of supplies will outrun the increase in shipbuilding. I may say that the matter of the building of wooden ships has been considered fully by the department and is I think a closed issue.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

PLANS TO ENSURE ECONOMIC SECURITY OF NATION'S WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Pensions and National Health. First, has the government taken under consideration any pension plans to ensure the economic security in old age of the nation's workers, over and above a subsistence relief plan? Second, if the problem has been considered, has the government evolved a plan which it considers workable? Third, is there any likelihood in the near future of the introduction into parliament of legislation establishing such a plan?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I shall consider very carefully the question of the hon. member when I see it in print and give an appropriate answer at the appropriate time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to prolong this debate unduly, because I think it has perhaps gone too long already. I was astonished to learn that I am the 136th speaker, and I am included in the previous 135. I was astonished also to learn that of the 135 who have spoken, 95 are supporters of my right hon. friend, including, if I may say so, the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) who has constituted himself a party sole in this house. My primary object in asking your indulgence and the indulgence of hon. members is to pay at least some attention to the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I desire to analyse his position, although not at great length, and compare his amendment with my own. I shall make other observations, some of which may not be strictly in order. If they are not, then I ask the indulgence of this house. During the course of my remarks, I desire to say something about the victory loan now before the country and to give it my support. I do not intend to proceed precisely in the order I have indicated.

Before going any further, I should like to offer to my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), who is just departing from the chamber, my congratulations upon his natal day and upon being fifty-three years young. On coming into this house after an absence of five years I found him occupying a most responsible position in the government of this country. He has been universally courteous to me and I appreciate it. With these few brief preliminary observations, may I refer to the course of the debate.

Although I consider the debate has been long, I consider also that for the most part it has been conducted upon a very high plane. Of course, there have been a few glaring exceptions, but on the whole I think I am justified, notwithstanding any criticism that may have been levelled at the debate from outside the house, in saying that I believe most hon. gentlemen have shown a sense of their responsibility, having regard to the distressing times through which we, in common with our allies, are now passing. So far as I am concerned personally I have tried at all times to keep the debate on a high plane and to avoid raising strife, especially racial strife. I do not think anyone can accuse me of doing that here in the past, nor will they be able to accuse me of doing it in the future. In any appeal I have made in this house or in the country I have tried to appeal to reason alone, and I shall continue to pursue that course no matter what criticism I receive.

Aside altogether from the speeches of cabinet ministers who have participated in this debate, there have been two or three others that are outstanding. I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) upon the manner and matter of the speech he made. I think it took great courage on the part of the hon. gentleman to say what he did. The plane upon which he carried on his discussion was of the highest, and I think it was one of the best speeches we have heard in this house.

I should like to offer a token of appreciation to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore), who I am sorry is not in his seat at the moment, for his address. It revealed to me an intelligent grasp of the problem of government which I do not think is excelled and perhaps not even equalled by any other member of the house.

I am sorry to say that there have been other speeches delivered during the course of this debate which do not deserve such praise as I have attempted to shower upon the two members to whom I have referred. I listened with the greatest regret, and as intently as I possibly could, to the speech of my fellow New Brunswicker, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), and in my view it was one of the most dangerous speeches ever uttered in this House of Commons during all the years I have been here. I say, further, that I think it was quite unworthy of the hon. member and, from his own personal position, quite unnecessary. The particular part of his speech to which I refer was that portion in which he declared that the issue of compulsory military service was a racial issue. I deny that allegation categorically and with all the force and power at my command. I do suggest that there is no racial issue involved.

An hon. MEMBER: You made it one in 1917.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was no racial issue involved in this question, now or then or at any other time. It has become a political issue, and for that I am truly sorry. There is raised in this issue only the question of equality of service and equality of sacrifice. The hon. member for Gloucester has made a speech which is designed to set race against race; and having regard to the conditions existing in the province of New Brunswick from which we both come, it may have repercussions which will not help the position of those whom he champions.

I deplore the attitude of the hon. member for Gloucester. He knows, as I do, that the Acadian portion of our people is loyal. I have said so before, and I reaffirm it now, that it has enlisted for active service in far greater numbers than it did in the last war; that as opportunity offered, men came to the colours—an opportunity which was denied them in the early stages of the war by the ineptitude of the recruiting officials of the Department of National Defence, a situation which was rectified after proper representations were made to them. I understand from officers in the army that these young men have made good soldiers. I saw many of them in Britain and I am glad to pay this tribute to them.

One of the difficulties with respect to our young Acadian men in New Brunswick was that in the early stages of the war there was a lack of trained officers and instructors speaking the French language, but that difficulty has, I believe, been overcome in very large degree. I verily believe, and I want to pay this compliment to our Acadian population, that they would have accepted compulsory service without any demur if their leaders, including the hon. member for Gloucester, had shown the way. On the contrary, he has indicated his determination to make this not only a political but a racial issue. I deplore that. How can his action help the cause of national unity? I am going to leave his speech there.

Mr. VENIOT: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: May I ask the hon. member if he has read a book called "Crisis of Quebec, 1914-18," by Elizabeth H. Armstrong of New York?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I have not read it. As a matter of fact I do not think I ever heard of it before. I would not go to New York for inspiration on this question.

Mr. VENIOT: If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have allowed the hon. member to ask his question, Mr. Speaker, and may I now be allowed to proceed with my speech?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes.

Mr. VENIOT: If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. VENIOT: —that book is in the parliamentary library.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am thankful for that information, and if I can get around to reading it within the next two or three years, I shall probably do so.

While we have been debating the issues raised in this debate, what has been happening outside? With the exception of the position in Russia, the campaign in every other theatre of war has been going from bad to worse. Never since Dunkirk have I felt so upset as I was on Sunday with the fall of the great bastion of Singapore, announced by Mr. Churchill. The position in the Pacific has been one of continued deterioration. No wonder that Australia is alarmed!

Then there was the spectacle of the German warships successfully negotiating the strait of Dover in the face of the combined resources of the British air and naval forces—something which had never been accomplished by a foe of Britain in more than a century.

These are things to make one think, and certainly I drew some conclusions. One of them was this. If we do not face realities, we may lose this war. We have a just cause, and the intentions of all of us, this government included, are of the very best. But we cannot win this war with good intentions, even if we have a just cause.

Canada's war effort has passed the organization stage and we are now in production. Great strides have been made; let us freely admit that. But because great strides, on a comparative basis, have been made, do not let us be lulled into a sense of false security. That I fear is happening here. That I fear is happening in the United States, judging by the newspaper reports to-day. That has happened all along in Canada. It is not enough for ministers to make laudatory speeches so long as there remains so much to be done, so long as our position in this struggle is at such a low ebb. I am speaking of the whole picture—not of just our own effort.

Let me illustrate. A few days ago Mr. Ralph Bell, for whom I have a very high regard, told the board of trade in an eastern city that the growth of aircraft production in Canada had been eighty per cent, and he added that it had been "one of the industrial romances of the British empire." That is very fine stuff for an after-dinner speech, but what in fact does it mean? Eighty per cent of what? It really means nothing in terms of production. What was our production of planes? Practically nothing before this war—thirty planes a year. It is just that sort of extravagant statement which breeds complacency.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will permit me, he spoke of ministerial statements. Mr. Bell was not speaking for the Minister of Munitions and Supply. He was, as a matter of fact, speaking contrary to instructions issued to all officers of the department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that apply to Mr. Carmichael?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister had better "inspire" him. I do not advocate firing either Mr. Carmichael or Mr. Bell; both are high-class men. If Mr. Bell exceeded his instructions, he must have had a reason for doing it. I am not complaining especially about that statement of Mr. Bell; I am complaining about the effect created in the minds of the people of Canada who have still to be shaken out of their complacency with respect to winning this war. That, and nothing else, is the point of the reference.

I want to say this, and I have said it before, that we have done well in respect of the air training plan. It has been our biggest undertaking. I have often said that we started too late; but that is water over the dam; we have done well, and I want to give credit to the minister who fathered this scheme. He knows what I think about it. I have told him this on many occasions; and as far as I am concerned I do not want to embarrass for a minute either him or any other of the defence ministers; I want to help them.

I sometimes wonder whether the Canadian people will ever wake up to a knowledge of the life-and-death character of this struggle—and for us here in Canada. Sometimes I despair. Can it be that nothing but a blood bath, perhaps at our very doors, will awaken us to realities? Something has to be done to instil into the minds of the Canadian people the danger which now confronts them.

The house will, I believe, bear with me a few moments while I make some references to the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of January 26. It will be recalled that near the outset of his remarks he attempted, by banter and otherwise, to belittle the terms of the amendment which I had the honour to move. I confess that his observations left me cold. There is no one in this house who does not understand the purpose and the import of the amendment. As analysed by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) the other day, its purpose is fourfold. First, it condemns and opposes the plebiscite. Second, it proposes a total war effort without any limitations. Third, it emphasizes the necessity of complete mobilization of all our resources for total war, without any limitations. Fourth, it regrets that no mention is made in the speech from the throne of proposals for the post-war period.

In the speech which I made on January 26, I did not ask the house to listen to references to the latter part of this amendment. I did not think I could inflict at that time a speech of the length which would be necessary to elaborate my views. I propose to do so, in a very summary way, to-day at a later stage.

But to return to the Prime Minister's gibe, I suspect that its basis was the omission from the amendment of the word "conscription." Now, I ask this question, does not everyone in this house and the country know the import, substance and meaning of the amendment? Call it what you like, it means total and complete effort and, if you like so to describe it, conscription of everything—wealth, resources and man-power; for that is the price we shall have to pay for victory.

With respect to his announcement of the generous treatment which the government has decided to accord Britain, both in regard to the present adverse balance of war accounts to date and also with respect to the gift out of our abundance, in food, materials and supplies, I have nothing but praise and commendation.

So far on the battle front we have not contributed much. I say that in no disparaging sense. The air training plan and our contribution of mechanical transport, and now of munitions, have been both impressive and substantial. The opportunity, apart from the ill-fated expedition to Hong Kong, has not been present. That time will come, and the contribution of our gallant men overseas will be, I feel sure, as important, as heroic and impressive as was the contribution of Canada's sons in the last war.

In the meantime, why should not Canada make this contribution? It is a magnificent contribution. But may I be permitted to remind the Prime Minister and hon. gentlemen opposite that it is the contribution of the Canadian people and not of any political party—a contribution in which every one of us has a share—a contribution given gratefully, with a sense of gratitude not for favours yet to come but—mark you well—for services already rendered to us and ours, for value already received over a long period of years, for protection to us and to ours, for security to our shores over a long period of years, when we looked upon the British navy as our one sure and only defence—a defence to which, be it said and to our shame, we have not, in the days gone by, contributed a single man or a single dollar.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Yes! Why should we not now in this, the greatest crisis in history, give of our abundance, and for services rendered?

The enunciation of the establishment of two new divisions overseas in 1942 is not a new policy. It is a continuation of the policy heretofore adopted and, I believe, endorsed by the great mass of the Canadian people, although we know there are exceptions. The extension of our active army programme is an extension of the existing programme and is based on the extension of our productive programme. It is creditable to Canada and to the Canadian people, but it is not beyond what we should do.

And it will be welcomed in England; for the danger of invasion is still imminent. Do not let us for a moment forget that. It is much more than a possibility; it is wholly probable that the attempt will be made in the very near future, and Canada will be proud to have two more divisions to aid in that gigantic struggle.

I hope that the government will see to it—I hope that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) will see to it—that adequate reinforcements for these six divisions overseas are provided. When the battle begins, when the casualty lists begin to roll in, then will be the testing time—then will be revealed whether our method of obtaining recruits for service anywhere is satisfactory.

I listened with profound interest to the statement of the Minister of National Defence the other day. The requirements of the active army for the next fiscal year will be substantial. It may be that we shall produce the numbers required by the voluntary system. I am doubtful. I gather that the minister is doubtful too, because he left the door wide open so that he might turn to the other avenue if the present system failed. I observe, however, that he is cheered by the results for the month of January. I wonder whether my hon. friend knows that these results were obtained because of two important factors—Pearl Harbour, and the belief that conscription for overseas service was not only a possibility but a probability. I have concrete evidence of the truth of this latter factor—a personal experience in my own riding.

I do not intend to argue further the point of selective national service. The government will interpret, it does interpret no doubt, the by-elections as a mandate to carry on the voluntary system. That may be open to question. I imagine that conscription was only one of the many elements entering into the result. There were others. In Welland, I should say there was the most brazen appeal in the way of wholesale bribery to a constituency that we have witnessed for many a long day. We had the spectacle of a minister of the crown, and perhaps his most outstanding executive, telling the people of Welland that, if the Minister of Labour were elected, new war plants would be established in the community.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, that is absolutely false.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I base that statement on reports in the newspapers.

Mr. HOWE: Will the hon. member lay those reports on the table?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I haven't got them with me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am man enough to say this, however—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just hold your horses for a few minutes and listen to me. If the minister pledges his word that neither he nor Mr. Carmichael made any effort at bribery of the electors of Welland, of course I will withdraw.

Mr. HOWE: What Mr. Carmichael said is a matter of permanent record.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister speaks for himself, and I assume he speaks for Mr. Carmichael.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Carmichael's speech is a matter of permanent record in the hands of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. What I said I said in a very public way, and if the hon. member can find one man in the constituency who says that I said what he has indicated, I should like to meet the gentleman.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course I will take the minister's statement that he did not say it. My information was quite the contrary, but the minister's word on the floor of the house, under the rules of the house I do accept and must accept.

Mr. SLAGHT: Where did your information come from?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, now, I am not under cross-examination.

I desire to make one further reference, and a very limited one, to the Prime Minister's declaration on the plebiscite. I do not intend to labour this point further. I do not intend to labour a discussion on the principle of the plebiscite when the bill is introduced, but I am wondering whether the Prime Minister and the government have taken cognizance of what occurred at St. James street market in the city of Montreal last week and, in particular, the declarations of Mr. Henri Bourassa who, coming out of his retirement, rent the veil of the temple of Liberalism and exposed the fallacies and futilities of the political stratagem behind this gesture of a plebiscite. He announced his unalterable opposition to conscription for overseas service, and he warned his compatriots not to vote to release the Prime Minister from his pledge. To me that is portentous. The strangest part of his speech, to me, and one for which I am sure there can be no foundation, was his warning to his great audience to be prepared for the attempt by the government to impose full conscription, under pressure from Washington, not from London. Well, I have no fear that Washington will attempt in any way to intervene in our domestic affairs here. But that is the sort of thing the government is going to meet in the province of Quebec, and I deplore it.

An hon. MEMBER: You taught them that in 1911.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not teach them anything. Nobody can teach Mr. Bourassa anything.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I call attention to the fact that the leader of the opposition is now giving his address after listening to 135 speeches and very rarely interrupting. I would ask hon. members to refrain from interruptions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not mind ordinary interruptions, but if they are intended to throw me off my train of thought I do object.

These declarations of this gentleman are rather ominous. I hope the Prime Minister and those who surround him will give thought to their effect in the province of Quebec. To me, one of the most striking statements made, and one with which I fully agree, was the declaration of Mr. Bourassa's belief that Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Meighen were more honest in their attitudes than the present ministers.

In closing this part of my remarks, may I quote just one paragraph from Mr. Bourassa's speech, which was the gem of it all. He said:

> The attitude of Prime Minister King is similar to that of the young man who became engaged to be married. Later he came to his fiancee and asked to be given back the ring. He doesn't tell the young lady that he doesn't intend to marry her, but he wants the ring back just in case he doesn't.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He's Scotch.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think the fiancee will believe him.

I should like now to pay some attention to the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). The Minister of Finance made an impassioned address in this debate, during which he elaborated upon the ethnical background of himself and the people he represented. He said in effect that they were British and that they thought in terms of the British empire and, I gather, not as isolationists. These utterances struck a responsive chord in my heart, because his background is my background. My people, too, are British and think in terms of the British empire. Most assuredly they are not isolationists. And then as I listened to his address I could not help but think how unhappy the hon. gentleman, with such a background, must have been in days gone by when he found himself led and surrounded by isolationists, like the Prime Minister, by others of his cabinet colleagues who, like the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), in the not far distant past were not only isolationists, but positively for neutrality—

Mr. THORSON: That is not true.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is a matter of interpretation. I think I could prove it. I reflected to myself, as I have so often done during the course of this debate, that party loyalty and party politics make strange bedfellows. Whatever may be said about the Conservative party or about any individuals within the ranks of the Conservative party, it cannot and it never shall be said that the Conservative party ever failed at any time to give adherence to the British crown and the principle of British connection. It has never wavered in that regard, and please God, it never shall. Whatever the consequences may be, and come what may, it will continue to press, as it has from the very beginning of hostilities, for a full-out war effort.

But to return to the minister's speech, it was an apologia or defence of the government's proposal of a plebiscite. In my view he had a difficult job, and he did a far better job than did the Prime Minister. It did not carry conviction, because all the way through it was based on false premises. "It was an intelligent defence of an indefensible project," as one writer has stated. I wonder just how it struck the hearts and minds of the loyal British people of Digby-Annapolis-Kings, whom the hon. minister represents in this house? I wonder whether he has not been hearing from some of the more thoughtful of his own supporters, as I have, men who have in the past supported him through thick and thin, and who now write to me that never, never again will they do so. That is what I got from some of them.

The minister appears to have some confidence that the voluntary system of recruiting is a success in producing adequate numbers of recruits for the active army and for service overseas. But the admissions of the Minister of National Defence, which I cited at length in my previous address, as well as those of others, all indicate to me that the voluntary system has reached the end of its usefulness if we are to have those reinforcements and reserves of trained men for the active army when that army finally gets into action and the casualty lists begin to roll in.

Aside from all that, there are strong reasons for abandoning the system. I do not intend to argue that point again, but this question I ask the minister: Why did he not give us a straightforward pronouncement of his own attitude on the principle of compulsory service? It is an open secret in Ottawa that the minister and his fellow Nova Scotians in the cabinet, not to speak of others like the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), are personally in favour of the principle, but that they have consented to a compromise for a plebiscite, and to father it on the cry of "Trust the people." If that be true, it is not a very manly or courageous course.

Searching the minister's speech, there is some evidence discernible that he is in favour of the principle of compulsory service if he were free and not restricted by the theory of cabinet solidarity. There is his declaration that if the plebiscite passes affirmatively, "We shall then be free to act and will act," and I underline those words, "and will act."

Mr. ILSLEY: Just read the rest of it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the crux of the statement. The speech will speak for itself. What does that statement mean?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it makes much difference, but I do not like to have anyone quoting me stop in the middle of a sentence. My recollection is that I said, "will be free to act in the best interests of the nation in the war effort," or something like that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): "And will act." That is the point upon which I wish to lay emphasis.

Mr. ILSLEY: I deplore this, Mr. Speaker, but my hon. friend should quote me accurately and finish the sentence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is importunate. I recall that just a few days ago he rebuked me very severely for interrupting him. I should like him to take a leaf out of his own book and not interrupt me. He can correct me later on, if he wants to make another speech.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not misquote my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, the words are there, "We shall be free to act and will act." What does that mean? If that is a sincere declaration—and I do not suggest that it is not—if released by the plebiscite, the government will then act to put the principle into effect. "Free to act and will act" means that the government will act affirmatively to put the principle into effect by repealing the limiting clause of the mobilization act. What other interpretation can any thoughtful person put upon that language? But compare that declaration with the language of the speech from the throne, and with that used by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister desired to be free to act, but never did he say that the government would act. On the contrary, the Prime Minister's declaration was a bid to the people to free him of his pledge and then allow him and his government to do as he pleased. Does the minister adhere to that, in the light of his declaration that the government when free to act, would act? The two positions are incompatible. No wonder the loyal people of this country are bewildered by the ambiguity of such a position and such declarations!

I was glad, Mr. Speaker, to hear the minister address some plain and wholesome truths to his supporters from the province of Quebec, and, above all, his challenge to their contention that under no circumstances should this nation compel its nationals to undertake military service abroad. What he said needed to be said. Why? Because for twenty-five years the people of Quebec have been taught in season and out of season, by the leaders of the Liberal party in that province and, indeed, by others high in the councils of that party, that they had no national obligation to the state, to the empire, to the world at large in such circumstances as have now developed. He did well to remind our French-Canadian compatriots that this struggle was not one for imperial aggrandizement but a life-and-death conflict between two philosophies of life, between freedom and slavery; and that this struggle will be decided not within the territorial limits of Canada but in theatres of war far distant from our shores. Indeed he might and should have gone much further and pointed out to them that their ideas of imperialism, which have been so repugnant to them, are ideas which are outmoded and no longer in existence. In this twentieth century, Mr. Speaker, imperialism means trusteeship, not aggrandizement. That is a principle which the minister might very well have brought home to his compatriots, but he missed the golden opportunity.

But on the principle of cabinet responsibility and solidarity the minister backed up and endeavoured to justify the plebiscite, and he announced his intention of supporting it in the country. Having taken a noble stand in the early part of his address, he boxed the whole compass. He started off with the lofty attitude of a statesman; he took his seat with the stature of a party politician.

I want now to put this question squarely to him: If the testing time comes, will he support the principle of compulsory military service? And will the government act? He should make his position clear. The people of Canada want to know. The people of Nova Scotia want to know. They will not be content with a declaration of "wait and see." That policy smacks of opportunism, of putting party politics above the safety of the state, and that is not good enough. The manly course is to say and say now what the government will do if the plebiscite carries. And if the plebiscite fails to carry, what then will the minister do? Will he say, "I bow to the will of the majority no matter if I disagree on a great matter of principle"? If I apprehend the minister's position aright, as disclosed by his speech, he will resign; and he will be right, and his people will applaud him. If the result is indecisive, and if eight provinces out of nine vote "yes" and one great province votes "no", as well it may; what then? Will he adopt one of the only two courses open to him, that of resigning on a matter of principle, or will he proceed on the British principle of constitutional government, which as a student of the law and of the constitution he must believe in, namely, the adoption of a policy on this question, one way or the other, and stake his political life on the position he then takes?

May I commend to him and to this house the authority of a great student and writer on the law of the constitution, Dicey, where in chapter 94 he discusses and sums up the argument against introducing the principle of the plebiscite into parliamentary institutions, and where he advocates the doctrine of the rule of intelligence. The late Lord Asquith was a great lawyer, a great parliamentarian, a great orator and a great debater; someone has said he was the last of the great Liberals. I think I should qualify that and designate the hon. member for Ontario the last, at least in Canada, of the Liberals. Asquith said that the referendum would impair, if it did not destroy, the sense of parliamentary government. To use his own words, "It would really destroy the law of government by representation." I commend this dictum to the minister as a lawyer, as a parliamentarian and as a Liberal, if there be such a genus still at large in Canada.

I want now to say a word about the loan; and I suspect that the minister made his speech when he did, and said some of the things he did say, not so much in support of a bad case for the plebiscite but because he was alarmed for the success of the loan, and he had reason for that fear. When I first read of the plebiscite proposal, one of my first reactions was that the proposal, put forward in the form it was and at the time it was, would be disastrous. The timing was frightful, having regard to the loan. The minister has been hearing from the country, and so have I. The minister made a vigorous attack upon some of those who wrote him. He called them saboteurs of the national war effort, and declared that their action was a strike against the state.

I do not think that calling names will help his position. Rather would I commend to him the appeal to reason when dealing with these people. Apparently a large number of people have been writing the minister, threatening to cancel their pledges to buy war savings certificates, and to boycott the victory loan, as a means of expressing their disapproval of the government's subterfuge of a plebiscite on an important issue.

Human nature being what it is, that is a natural thing for some people to do. I have heard it on many sides. But I deprecate that attitude; I oppose it. On cool reflection I am sure those who have so declared themselves will reverse their judgment.

Let me make my position and the position of the Conservative party clear on this issue. Notwithstanding our disapproval of the government's policy, notwithstanding our belief that it is a policy of evasion of responsibility, and the negation of responsible government, we believe that the loan should and must be supported to the limit, and I appeal here and now to the great army of loyal Conservatives in this country, as well as to the great mass of our citizens, to rise above the situation which the government has created and which they abhor, and put this loan over.

To them I say: That is the nobler course; that is the patriotic course; that is the course which national obligation imposes; that is the course which we owe to the men overseas and to those we are asking to go overseas to fight for us, to defend us. Any other course is unthinkable—any other course will but play into the hands of the isolationists, the unpatriotic, the disloyal. Let it never be said that this nation stultified itself. The wealth of the nation must be put at the disposal of the state. It must be marshalled and mobilized. Yes, and if needs be, if it means the winning of the war, it must be conscripted. Let there be no mistake on that score.

Many times I have told this house that the people of Canada would give the government the money to carry on the war, give it in abundance and in full measure. They will hold them accountable for how it is expended. That prophecy has been amply justified up to now. It will continue to be justified. I have supreme confidence that no matter how distasteful government policies may be, no matter how much we abhor the lack of leadership so apparent in this plebiscite, the loyal people of Canada, who all along have been ahead of the government in a determination to pursue total war with total effort, will never stultify themselves. I know they will not do it.

I endorse the minister's appeal in this regard. The great army of Conservatives in Canada will respond to the nation's need in full measure.

May I turn now to the amendment which I had the honour to move on January 26, and which is based on two fundamental principles. The first relates to the proposal for the plebiscite. I shall not take time at this point to read it.

I dealt with the question of the plebiscite at considerable length in my previous address, and I do not propose to repeat my arguments to-day.

I would, however, commend to the Prime Minister and to all thoughtful students of parliamentary government the highly significant and reasoned address delivered to this house on Monday, the 9th instant, by the hon. member for Ontario. I regretted that the Prime Minister was not present to hear that speech. As a student, as a Liberal, he could not have listened to it without some heart-burnings and stirrings of mind and conscience; for the hon. member put the matter of plebiscite and government responsibility before this house and before the people of Canada far better than I am capable of doing, far better than anyone else so far has done. With inescapable logic, with apt phrase and sound reasoning, he exposed the fallacy of the government's proposal.

The second underlying principle of my amendment is my attempt to state, in general but unmistakable terms, the principles under which I think this country can and should wage war. I shall not read it, but it is a matter of record.

There is no ambiguity about this amendment. We propose the complete utilization of everything we possess to wage total war and to attain victory. It includes much more than the mere mobilization of our man-power for service anywhere. It visualizes the utmost use of our wealth and material resources to back up our man-power. It means among other things, the conscription of wealth, to accomplish that end. Indeed, we have the power to conscript wealth to-day. Up to date the power has been exercised in a very limited degree, but the power is there to be used and the people of this country are prepared to make this or any other sacrifice if called upon to do so. All they require is to be told what to do. I have scores of letters from men who are capable, willing and anxious to do something, but they do not know where to go to do it. Our people will never refuse this or any other government all the tools that are necessary, including, if needs be, both their lives and their wealth.

There is a great deal of mixed thinking on this question of conscription of wealth.

Taxation—heavy and severe taxation such as that to which we have subjected ourselves —is a form of conscription. The direct deduction of the national defence tax from the mechanic's pay cheque is a form of conscription. The levy of income tax is another form; but it is not confiscation, because any income tax is predicated on the theory that there must be capital and/or services upon which the income is earned and these are to be maintained; else there is nothing to tax. We have conscription in the form of the new Dominion Succession Duty Act.

Yes, let us completely mobilize the wealth of the country to attain total war! But do not believe—and I direct the attention of hon. members to this point—that such mobilization means the complete nationalization of all our financial institutions, as my friends on the left pretend they would have us do. That is socialism, pure and unadulterated.

I reject socialism, because it not only eliminates the principle of private enterprise but contemplates a definite revolution in our economic fabric. Most of us are individualists. I believe we all pride ourselves upon being individualists. I am, and I admit it without shame or apology. But I do recognize that in war time I must subordinate my undoubted rights as an individual to the paramount necessities of the state—even, perhaps, under the censorship to which we referred the other day. I may for a while not object to the viciousness of a censor. But I am not willing to give up my rights forever.

The official opposition finds it impossible to support the subamendment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Let me analyse that amendment. In part it states that:

> In the opinion of this house no total effort adequate to meet the present needs of the war, domestic problems, and the preparation for post-war conditions is possible without total mobilization of wealth, industry and finance as well as human resources.

The underlying thought of that section of the subamendment is much the same as that part of my amendment to be found in subparagraph (a) which reads:

> (a) completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war.

To that part of the subamendment I can not take exception. While it is not inherent in the literal wording of the subamendment, I suspect that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar intends his resolution to be an endorsation of the principles of socialism as the fundamental agency for governing the nation in war time. But if he so intended, he has not expressed it—

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Meighen accepted it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Meighen did not say so.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Meighen stated before the York South electors that he accepted my outline for the conscription of wealth on his own behalf and that of the Conservative party.

Mr. MacINNIS: He accepted it for himself and the Conservative party.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But if the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar so intended, he has not expressed it, and therefore I find myself in substantial agreement with the section of his subamendment to which I have referred. The second paragraph of the subamendment requests that:

> . . . the forthcoming plebiscite should seek the support of the people of Canada for the complete and effective conscription of war industries, accumulated wealth and financial institutions, at the same time and on the same basis of sacrifice as the suggested extension of the conscription of man-power.

This section of the subamendment at least tacitly approves the proposed plebiscite and seeks to have an additional question submitted to the people of Canada. This is directly inconsistent with the first part of my amendment which condemns the proposed plebiscite as an evasion of responsibility and a negation of responsible government. The submission to the people of the question proposed by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation subamendment would, in my view, equally be an evasion of responsibility and a negation of responsible government. Both the question proposed by the government and that proposed by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation should, in my opinion, be determined by this parliament. If the opposition were to vote for both the amendment to the amendment and the amendment, it would in effect be voting to approve and then to disapprove the proposed plebiscite. We would be directly inconsistent with the principles enunciated in our own amendment, and I reiterate that we have not deviated from the opinion regarding the proposed plebiscite which is expressed in my amendment.

I do not intend to labour this, but may I refer particularly to one principle which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar enunciated: The national ownership, or at least the control of all our war industries to produce everything we require to maintain civilian health and morale and to provide our fighting forces with adequate equipment. How can we who believe in private enterprise subscribe to that principle? We have to a large degree nationalized the war industries of Canada. Are we to go the whole length? Are we to accept socialism as an economic factor in war time and then have it continued in the post-war period?

Mr. REID: You mean one form of socialism.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One form of socialism. That is what these gentlemen mean, and for myself I certainly cannot accept it. However, in voting against it we are not to be taken as disapproving "total mobilization of wealth, industry and finance as well as human resources."

The fourth part of my amendment refers to the question of post-war problems. One cannot, within the brief compass of a speech, touch upon all the topics with which one would desire to deal. I put that clause in my amendment because there is definitely no reference to this matter in the speech from the throne. If the Minister of Pensions and National Health will give me his attention, I should like to say that I referred to this in the amendment because I recall that in a speech which he delivered in Quebec city on June 20 last he painted a glowing picture of what was to be at the conclusion of peace—a peace, he declared, dictated "by the people" and a post-war world where problems will be solved "by the will of the masses of the people." He then proceeded:

> Never again, I hope and pray, shall you and I know the Canada we knew before this war broke upon us—when unemployment and relief and distress and hunger and poverty and want were rampant in the richest country in all the world. The new day, the new order, the new plan must bring, and will bring, a remedy for all that.

I can just hear him raising his voice to high heaven. He then went on to speak of a policy of collective security based upon collective force and collective preparedness rather than upon collective idealism. But he failed to sketch the new plan, like so many people who talk about the ideal condition that is to be when this war is over. It is true he gave his vision of post-war Canada, a vision of timed public works, of coordinated municipal, provincial and federal effort, of progressive highway development—nothing new about that; they have all been tried and they will not bring about the millennium—to be ruled by a sound and progressive agricultural policy. We are still waiting for that. He omitted to refer to the soundness of the principle of private enterprise. Has he divorced himself from that? Is he fearful of that?

Then, rising to great heights of eloquence—I can hear him now—he adopted the classic cry of the old London watch: "Watchmen, what of the night?" from the book of Isaiah. And he quoted the answer:

> The night is far spent—the long, long night is nearly over—the morning cometh.

And he wound up with this prediction:

> We shall soon witness the glory of the dawn.

Magnificent! My heart glowed when I read the report of that speech, but I fear we have not yet witnessed the glory of the dawn and we are not likely to until victory is won. Meanwhile, what of the preparations for the post-war period? In his speech of February 6 the minister stated that the government had submitted to the house a series of far-reaching measures dealing with post-war problems and announced that at least two further important measures would be submitted at the present session. He cited the Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940 as being primarily a post-war measure. I concur in a degree, but no one, even rising to the wildest heights of his imagination, can ever say that unemployment insurance is a cure for unemployment. It is merely a palliative.

He then referred to the post-discharge plan, passed somewhat belatedly, I believe, by means of an order in council, after he had been hearing from the returned soldiers and the country. This gives the benefit of the Unemployment Insurance Act to members of the armed forces and provides certain other measures of assistance to discharged men, and the minister referred to it as a post-war measure of the highest importance. In a degree that is also true, but it, too, is merely a palliative and not a cure for what may be.

He then stated that of the measures to be introduced this session one would deal with a system of land settlement which would be one of the most constructive and far-reaching proposals of its kind ever submitted to parliament. We may expect something enormous. We shall reserve judgment with regard to this announcement, but I should like to say this to him and to members of the government: Be sure to benefit by the history of the past. I lay it down as axiomatic—it is no use putting a man on the land who does not have his roots deep in the soil and a love for the soil. Furthermore, any man put on the land should have had some knowledge of farming prior to his enlistment. Over and above all—as important as any at all events—before asking a man to go on the land the government of this country and the provincial governments should propose and put into effect, by coordinated effort if possible, policies which will result in farmers receiving for their products such financial returns as will make it profitable for them to go on the land and remain there. This is fundamental, and if you do not do that, no land policy will succeed.

Most people in this country are and have been fearful that when the war is over and a lasting peace, let us hope, is attained, large numbers of our people will find themselves out of jobs and that we shall experience a depression far greater than that after the last war and greater even than that of the great depression period.

May I suggest that these prophets of calamity bear in mind that the biggest job on our hands apart from the war, and as big a job at least as that of defence, will be waiting for the people of Canada—the job of rebuilding our national economy—and that a depression need not occur unless by private and official folly one is created.

In this connection may I refer hon. members to a speech made by Mr. W. J. Cameron on the Ford Sunday Evening Hour on October 12 last, in which he deals with this matter and deals with it realistically. He said:

> Look at the factors. First, a production plant largely obsolete for years, never able to supply all our people, is now being modernized and enlarged. Second, a general stock so greatly reduced by defence restrictions on manufacture and purchases that, with defence secured, the demand for all sorts of merchandise will require every man and machine we have to satisfy it. Third, new industries like aviation being firmly established, the use of plastics extended, older industries rejuvenated and a closer partnership formed between larger and smaller businesses. Fourth, with its production mechanism smashed to pieces, where can Europe look for the means of rehabilitation after the victory, except to America? Why, it will require twenty years of shipbuilding alone to replace the bottoms that have been sunk the last two years! These factors unless we are hopeless fools, will help to accomplish the transition without hard times.

Then he goes on to state that a depression was in the cards following previous wars, but that this time it is not in the cards, that conditions are different. Many minds are giving forethought to preventing a depression, but nothing can protect us or our nation against ourselves. Then he adds this wholesome admonition and preaches the doctrine of thrift which I should like to have every man, woman and child in Canada take to heart:

> Let those who are earning more money put some of it where they can get it back. A spending panic is as bad as a hoarding panic. We can protect our nation and we can protect ourselves if we assert and believe, on the basis of facts, that a post-defence depression is not necessary and can be avoided.

I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for having spoken so long, but perhaps the house will bear with me for about five minutes more.

To me the plebiscite is as objectionable as when it was first announced. But the government will not alter its course. It will pass the address notwithstanding the opposition which comes from various diverse elements, and for various reasons. That being so, we should next await the government's proposals with respect to the modus operandi of the plebiscite. Let us examine them judicially with a view, if possible, to improving them. During this debate we have not had much light thrown on this topic—the discussion has centred around the principles involved. Let us then turn our attention to the proposals, and examine them as business men, not as partisans. I shall then, I hope, have crystallized my views on what I think I should advise our people to do.

Then we can turn to the general business of the session. I have offered the government, and I renew this offer, constructive cooperation in its general war programme. I have tried to follow a consistent course in that regard, no matter what certain critics have said, and I shall continue to do so. I may not be a Willkie, but no one will ever be able to say that I and those who sit round me have sabotaged or obstructed the government's war effort. On the contrary, we have sought and shall seek to help the government by constructive criticism, but we must not be expected to submerge our opinions on matters of principle. That we shall never do. That we should not be expected to do.

I listened on Sunday, as all hon. gentlemen no doubt did, to Mr. Churchill's speech in which near the close he announced the fall of Singapore. I listened to it with mingled feelings. Here was disaster; here was defeat. But I was buoyed up with his soul-stirring message to us and the other nations, and I shall close by quoting one paragraph from his address which sank into my heart, my mind and my soul. He said:

> This, therefore, is one of those moments when the British nation can show its quality of genius. This is one of those moments when it can draw from the heart of misfortune the vital impulse of victory. Here is a moment to display that calm and poise, combined with grim determination, which not so very long ago brought us out of the very jaws of death. Here is another occasion to show, as so often in our long history, that we can meet reverses with dignity and with renewed accession of strength.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have not spoken on the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition and I intend to say a few words.

It seems to me it is important to give the house an idea of the real feeling and sentiment of the province of Quebec. Members who live one-half of the year in their constituencies have one superiority over those who have not the same advantage on account of pressure of business. They meet thirty, forty, fifty people each weekday—people who tell them about their joys and their troubles and ask them for information and help. Of course all those who come to the office of a member do not give information about personal matters. Some come just to ask for a recommendation, or a word of encouragement. But others have sufficient confidence in their member of parliament to tell him about very personal matters, to open up their hearts to him and ask for advice. They also inform the member about the general feeling of those who live near them and of the community in which they reside. Therefore a member of parliament has the advantage of knowing well the feeling and sentiment of his constituents. So that when the opinion of members of parliament is asked by the government, it is very easy for them to inform the government about the soundness or unsoundness of any policy.

Sometimes, Mr. Speaker, hon. members exchange gibes in this house. They try to break the monotony and dullness of the proceedings with some repartee; but though this happens at times I must congratulate very heartily and very warmly not only the mover and seconder of the address but all my colleagues who have taken part in this debate, from the Prime Minister down. We realize the seriousness of the moment, but what I cannot comprehend is the use of commonplace sayings when each of us should be at liberty to speak with more freedom than ever in expressing his own views. Whether or not my colleagues share my views, there is one thing I must and will do; that is, respect their views.

With the loss of our mutual friend, the late Minister of Justice, this House of Commons reminds me of the Quebec seminary where I was a student, after one of the greatest educators in Canada, Monsignor Mathieu, had left that institution to become the first archbishop of Regina. At times I have seen the broad smile of the former Minister of Justice, even while I was speaking; and once I remember he told me he had been told by someone sitting in front of him not to smile when I was speaking, because he was encouraging me. As I rise to speak to-day, sir, I remember some events of my political life, particularly the day when the former Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe, came with my leader, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the house in which I live, at Rivière du Loup. Though notice of this event had been given only a short time before, and the weather was bad, some eight hundred people from my county came in to pay their tribute of respect both to my leader, the leader of the Liberal party, who was then leader of the opposition, and to their old friend the Minister of Justice. The Prime Minister, I am sure, must remember the kind faces of those good people. Many of them were farmers; and they all said how delighted they were to have the privilege of shaking hands with him. Among them was an old gentleman who died a year or two ago at the age of ninety-four, who had voted for my grandfather, for my father, and for myself, and who used to preside at my meetings. He was a dear old gentleman, tall and with a long white beard; and I introduced him to my leader as the Liberal patriarch of my county. The Prime Minister was thoughtful enough to send that old gentleman birthday messages of greetings and good wishes each year until his unfortunate death.

Well, Mr. Speaker, this is not an exceptional case. I am proud of my people. I respect them. When I speak to them, and when they do me the honour of listening to my speeches, I consider it a very great privilege. It is a great sacrifice for me to remain in politics. I could have an easy life otherwise, but it is my duty in time of war to stand by my people and show my appreciation of the confidence they have placed in me during the long time I have represented them in this House of Commons.

This afternoon I listened to the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson)—I wonder if he is still acting, or if he is the full leader? He said, "If we do not face realities we may lose this war." I agree with that. Then he added, "We, the loyal people, are bewildered." It sounded like, "We, the people of England; the 'tailors of Tooley street.'" Is he the only person in Canada who is not complacent? Speaking of the plebiscite he said it was neither the manly nor the courageous course, and then he spoke of the probability of the invasion of England. The question is not whether the plebiscite is a manly or courageous course. The question is whether the plebiscite is the best course to follow at the present time, bearing in mind also that the plebiscite is closely related to conscription for overseas service. Then the hon. gentleman said the province of Quebec should understand that this war is a conflict between two philosophies of life, freedom and slavery. A friend of mine who occupies a high post in the government of Quebec told me once that French-Canadians are not strong for abstraction. There is one point however I should like now to suggest to the government. I have already made the suggestion, but unfortunately it was not accepted. I suggest that a radical change be made in the information service of the government.

Why do we have trouble and agitation on the part of people in Toronto and elsewhere who have advocated total war? We have it because the information service of the government is totally inefficient, and because it is headed by a man who has been loaned by a big company and who receives at least $15 a day for expenses, while at the same time receiving salary. He is a neurasthenic and a fascist. How can fascist propaganda be dear to the hearts of French-Canadians in Quebec, any more than to the hearts of the good English-speaking or French-speaking citizens in other parts of Canada? This I do not understand. There should be a radical change in that regard. Moreover, with regard to information, the province of Quebec should be given the same brain food as any other part of Canada. We are all citizens of the same country, and I cannot understand why one story should be told in Quebec and another in Ontario, the maritimes and the west.

There is one other point I have stated before; let me repeat it. The day when our English-speaking compatriots will have with regard to Great Britain the same views we French-Canadians have toward France. That day we shall have a perfect union of hearts in Canada. As we are at war it is essential to have enough courage to take the necessary steps to bring about a most efficient war effort. What do I mean when I say that? I mean that each one should be at his place, so that he can do the best possible to help the country win the war.

There are farmers' sons who would like to enlist but who cannot. They are in the same position as any young man who has a beautiful and charming sweetheart he cannot marry now because he has to take care of his old parents. That applies to many farmers' sons. Although my offer to recruit a whole regiment in my constituency was turned down two years ago, yet from the city of Riviere du Loup, with a population of only 9,000, over 1,200 boys have enlisted in the three branches of the service. From Cabano, a town in my constituency with a population of 2,000, over 250 boys have enlisted voluntarily in the army.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Very often farmers are confronted with the problem of choosing between entering the army and putting a padlock on the old homestead or the old farm which for generations has been cultivated by the same family. Everyone knows that Great Britain can live only with the supplies shipped from all parts of the world. What the farmers are doing for this country—and when I refer to this country I include the army as well as the civilian population—they are doing for Great Britain. They are doing the same even for Russia, since the invasion of the fertile plains of the Ukraine by the barbarous huns.

Our friend Mr. Lapointe, the former Minister of Justice, lived in my constituency for many years. He was born there, and he loved it so much that even last summer he paid it a visit, as he had done each year, to spend some months of relaxation. In August, 1940, after the National Resources Mobilization Act was passed, he had been working very strenuously in Ottawa, and proceeded to Temiscouata county to take a vacation. While he was away from Ottawa, regulations were drafted in virtue of the mobilization act, and according to those regulations farming as well as other essential occupations were classed as seasonal. Mr. Lapointe was not here when those regulations were approved by order in council. They were drafted by men who knew no more about agriculture than the fellow who sees a horse and then says, "What a nice cow!" or sees a cow and says, "What a fine colt!" They knew positively nothing about agriculture.

What happened afterward? Members of parliament had to carry on the fight with the authorities to have opportunity given farmers to stay on the land and continue their work —a work which is not "secondary", but which is essential.

Listening to speeches in the house and reading them in Hansard I have been pleased to note that even hon. members favouring the conscription of man-power have suggested the exemption of farmers on the very ground that their work is essential to Canada in a time of war as well as in a time of peace. May I pay tribute to the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson); to his very able deputy, General LaFleche; to General LaFleche's associate, Major Benoit; to the registrar at Quebec city and his staff, and, now that some improvement has been made in the commission of our district, to the commission itself.

Members of parliament are deluged with requests, and they are reasonable requests, from farmers for delay in their training. I am ready to do any useful work for my constituents even if I have to work day and night. I am ready to argue the case of the farmers in my constituency with any official in the Department of National War Services or the Department of National Defence. But this is a ridiculous burden to be placed upon members of parliament; these cases should be taken care of automatically. As soon as the man can show that he is farming in earnest, that he is able to do his work well as a farmer, that he is contributing to feeding the army and the civilians of this country, he should be permitted to continue to do his work without being disturbed.

I should like to read a few remarks made by my leader, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), on June 19, 1940, as reported on page 922 of Hansard. He said:

An hon. member on this side of the house made the statement publicly this morning that he felt he could go into his constituency and, by making it known to his constituents that this measure had to do with the protection of Canada and our own Canadian soil, bring forward in a very short time men from the forests, from the fields and from the factories, all prepared immediately to join the Canadian forces to resist any possible invasion, and that he would be prepared to guarantee that that could be done in constituency after constituency throughout the country, once it was understood that there was the necessity of defending our own Canadian shores. I pointed out to him that in doing that he might be making the greatest mistake possible with respect to the national interest; that, to win this war, we might wish to keep at work in the forests the men who are now working in the forests, to provide the timber which will be required for docks and wharves and required immediately; that the men who are working in the factories may be a thousand times more useful to the government of this country in giving their skilled labour to the manufacture of aircraft, munitions, or other weapons of war than they could possibly be in lining up and presenting themselves for military service; equally that on the farms, if we are to perform what will be expected of us, we shall need all the production that can be effectively and rapidly carried out on the farms of our country.

That was expressed much better than I could say it. I urge hon. members to read this in Hansard to-morrow. I do not find it absurd to have to come to the assistance of farmers, farmers' sons and farmers' helpers. What I find absurd is to have to do this work, sometimes without satisfactory results, when the matter could be definitely and automatically settled. These farmers should be allowed to continue to do their work in peace until the war is over, and even afterwards. Our farmers, settlers and farm hands are the most stable element we have in this country. Moreover they are the ones who have time to think and to think right. No government in this country can expect to serve us, no party can expect to serve us, unless they keep faith with our farmers.

Why did the Conservative party headed by Sir Robert Borden lose the confidence of the Canadian people? Because they broke the pledge they gave to the farmers that conscription would never be imposed upon them. When the farmers came to Ottawa they found that the doors were shut against them. They were not received then any more than they were received afterwards when Mr. Bennett was Prime Minister and had the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with loaded guns waiting to receive such peaceful people as the farmers of our country.

I do not want the Liberal party to fall into the ditch where the Tory party has been stagnant since the last war. I sincerely believe that the Liberal party is the only force that can maintain order when this war is over and after we have won it.

We were told the other day by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) that in the province of Quebec we did not understand the meaning of a total war effort. My fellow citizens of the province of Quebec understand quite well what is a total war effort. They apply to this country the well known proverb that charity begins at home. They want to see this country well protected in the east as well as in the west and in the centre. They are good Canadians and they understand that their duty is to defend the shores of British Columbia as well as the shores of the maritime provinces and their own. They are ready to do anything they can to help Great Britain win this war, and the proof of this is the number of French-Canadians who have enlisted from my part of the country. But they want this country to be well defended. Before any move is made to impose conscription for overseas service they want the defence of this country to be complete and assured.

After consultation with some of our colleagues, it is my duty as the private Liberal member for Témiscouata to move, seconded by my hon. colleague and friend the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lizotte), the following amendment to the amendment:

That all the words after the words "this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers", in the said amendment be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

are contemplating, with regard to conscription of man-power for overseas service, a reversal of policy which is uncalled for, untimely and detrimental to the defence of Canada;

I should like the farmers of York-Sunbury to see the grin on the face of their member at this moment. Not one of them surely would vote for him if they had seen him this afternoon grinning as I spoke of the distress of the farmers. I continue the reading of my amendment:

This house further holds the view that the defence of Canada should always have priority over any commitment with or in favour of any other country and also that it would be in the interest of Canada and our allied countries as well that farmers and farm hands should be exempted from the military service.

I regret, sir, that the only way open to me to carry out what I propose is to move a subamendment. I do know that some officials of some of the departments hold the same opinions as I and many other members have, regarding the necessity of exempting farmers and farm hands from military service because their work is really a war work. But on account of the stupidity of so-called experts this has not yet been decided upon. That is to be regretted. For the common good it should be made easier for the farmers to continue with their work in peace. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but with so many countries at war and out of production it is all the more necessary for us to stop this policy of cutting the acreage under production, and instead, to get more and more farm goods produced. We do not know what will happen after the war, but certainly it will take time for many warring countries to recuperate and produce enough even for their own consumption. Therefore I urge the government to appreciate that what is being done now by the mover and the seconder of this amendment is not anything that is detrimental to the Liberal party or to the welfare of this country, but rather it is something that should have been done two years ago when we declared war. At that time it was mentioned vaguely, and I congratulate the government upon having changed the regulations of the national war services department to provide, by order in council, that farming is an essential as well as a seasonal occupation. But that is not enough. It was a mistake to state in those regulations that farming was a secondary occupation. It is not. The farmers have to work from dawn to dusk in winter as well as in summer. I urge the government to strike out the word "secondary," leaving in the word, "essential." I earnestly hope that the government will accept the subamendment as their policy with regard to the farmers of this country.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the amendment which the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has just moved to the amendment has my unqualified support. I will vote for it with satisfaction, knowing that I shall be performing a great duty towards agriculture. The agricultural industry is and remains our first line of defence. We should ensure the defence of Canada first of all by protecting our farmers through exemption from military training and from compulsory military service.

The hon. member for Témiscouata need have no regrets. He is moving in the right direction, and I follow him with pleasure on the path of Canadianism and of honour.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I must protest against the amendment just proposed by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and seconded by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lizotte). I do not know what the people of the old country can be thinking of us and of Canada at the present time. If it were not for the glorious British army, navy and air force, that slumbereth not nor sleepeth while Canada talks, the enemy would have descended upon the St. Lawrence before this and blown down the citadel at Quebec.

May I say to my hon. friend the member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), who wants to change the flag, that he had better hang on to the union jack because if Hitler comes over here—and the enemy is not far from our shores at this moment—it will be the black flag that will be hung on the citadel at Quebec and on the parliament buildings at Ottawa—and there will not be any referendum about that either. I protest against this amendment. The city of Toronto sent 55,000 men to the last war, 4,700 of whom lie buried in France until the resurrection morning. They fought for Canada, Britain and the glorious country of France, which in the last war did so much to ensure that freedom and liberty and civilization shall not perish from the earth. Let me say to my hon. friends from the province of Quebec—and I have a great many friends amongst them—what I said when I first entered this house, that no city in the world is less bigoted than the city of Toronto from which I come. Nowhere do protestants and catholics and all races and classes of our people get on better together than they do in Toronto. Toronto subscribed one-third to the victory loan and enrolled of its citizens who enlisted from there and in other cities across Canada nearly one-third of the recruits for the army, navy and air force. They did not need to be conscripted. They did not need to be sent to the war because our young people rose as one man to serve, and if we had had a proper system of recruiting in this country we would have had a million men now under arms under the voluntary system, although the other system is fairer and more equitable to all.

I object to the principle of this amendment. Farmers' sons in our province in the last war did not want to be exempted. The farmers of Ontario showed their patriotism in going to the war, and they were patriots at the ballot box on election day when they asserted the rights and privileges of the people of Ontario in respect of the reciprocity treaty of 1911—that much-attacked province which is contributing more men, money and munitions than any of the other provinces.

The enemy is not far from our shores at the present time. But for the British fleet and air force, Quebec, the maritimes and Ontario would long ago have had first-hand experience of the concentration camp, the loud-speaker, the sergeant-major, the spy, the tramping of feet, the gestapo, the whip, the spirit of barbarism, brutality and savagery. I repeat that but for Britain we should have known these things long ago in Canada from coast to coast; yet we sit here day in and day out, debating such things as this amendment, refusing to pay a tribute to the people of the mother country who are bearing the brunt of the war and, up to the last summer, were bearing it alone over the whole civilized world, fighting our battles on the Atlantic, in the Mediterranean, in Libya and every other place. There is no such thing as home defence as applied to Quebec, or Three Rivers, or Montreal, or Ottawa, or Winnipeg, which can have any bearing on our future. The defence of Canada will not be at those cities; it will be decided in Europe and Asia. There is, indeed, no such thing as home defence in modern warfare. We must go wherever the enemy is. The fate of civilization for the next two hundred years is being decided on the shores of Britain, in Russia, in the Mediterranean, on the sands of Libya, and in the Pacific—that great ocean which is lost to us to-day, in which Japan is dominant in sea power—and the fate of freedom is in the scales. Talk about building a road to Alaska; all the bases which may be belatedly constructed at the Pacific coast will not count a snap of the fingers without sea power to back them up on the Pacific, because without control of the sea you cannot transport either troops or food or munitions or anything else to the endangered areas in the Pacific without a base. If the battle of the Atlantic is lost, the same consequences will follow.

For over two years of the war Britain had to fight and go it alone. Later we found two new allies—Russia and the United States. The latter country was not ready for war; like Canada, she had been listening to the babble of the pacifists and isolationists. Canada urged Britain to throw away her army, navy and air force, and did the same herself, with the result that when war came we were not prepared. We threw away our defences and our friends.

All this talk about home defence and the plebiscite which the hon. member for Témiscouata mentions in his amendment is just a smoke-screen gotten up and thrown out at the last moment to cover up the mistakes some of whose consequences we have seen in the Pacific—Singapore, Hong Kong and other places. As I understand the hon. member's amendment, he wants to exempt farmers' sons and railway employees. They are not asking to be exempted. I have spoken of one province where the farmers are going to the war. The hon. member stated that a plebiscite is a reversal of policy. There I agree with him. It is true. Did you ever know this government to carry out any of their pledges, either as regards trade, defence, immigration, armaments, or anything else? I never have. They had posters on the billboards, "Beat Bennett and Bad Times". Well, they beat Bennett but they did not beat bad times. "End Unemployment; Vote Liberal". The people voted Liberal but the government did not end unemployment. So much for their pledges to get in on, but never to stand on. If there is a reversal of policy, it is just an afterthought at the last minute to tide things over until such time as the situation rights itself, and to save the wrath of the people.

What are the people of eastern Canada depending upon for their defence? Are these hon. members representative or typical of opinion in Quebec and Ontario? I admit that these two provinces have done very well, but the enemy would have been here long ago—in the spring of 1940 they would have come up the St. Lawrence by air and sea, but for that one agency, the mother country, which has protected our shores in peace and war alike, ever since we have been a country.

I concede that the hon. member who moved this amendment possesses some likable qualities. Sometimes he speaks out, like the former house leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Woodsworth) on behalf of the underdog and the common people; sometimes, I think, he goes too far at times about Conservatives, and in this motion to exempt the sons of farmers, and railway workers, he has gone too far. Nor do I agree with him in his plea about home defence. I can tell him this, and the government likewise, that there is no such thing as home defence. We found that out on the Pacific coast. We threw overboard our old ally, Japan, which had been a good friend to us and to the empire; we threw Italy overboard; we supposed that we could discard our own defences and our friends as well—with the results which are now evident in the Pacific. The situation is very grave at present for the people of our great Pacific province, and it is not going to be cured by the sort of home defence which is indicated in this amendment, or by holding secret meetings of this house which will cover up our mistakes. As I said yesterday, secret meetings about what? About home defence? About nothing. There is nothing to hold a meeting about. The British people in their own house, as is evidenced in ninety-five pages of Hansard published last January, have gone into the whole trouble at Singapore, Hong Kong and other points in the Pacific.

Our people are getting sick of this talk of home defence and plebiscite. Canada is being injured in the eyes of our empire. Last session I asked the minister to produce papers on the subject of home defence for cities, and he replied that it was a matter for the localities interested. They might lend them a few magic-lanterns and some sirens and whistles to blow, or fireworks, but as for providing an army, navy or air force, there is not a thing for home defence in any city in Ontario, excepting the black-out. There is no use in fooling the people into supposing they are secured by measures of this kind or any other provision for local defence which is simply no home defence at all. Home defence simply and mostly consists of one local volunteer company, the police, the girl guides and the boy scouts, and it can be nothing else, even though the people of the good county of Témiscouata should send five or six members to the House of Commons. All Canada is dependent on the mother country to defend us.

There is no doubt that the plebiscite is a reversal of policy, not mentioned in the 1940 election. Even hon. members who support the government knew nothing about it until the proposal was introduced to the house. Did you ever hear of such a thing? The people of this country know that, in the first year of the war, without a plebiscite, mechanized hordes swept over Norway, Czechoslovakia, the low countries,—Belgium, Holland, Denmark—France and all Europe, all of which countries had been talking about home defence One of the countries which was overrun, Luxembourg, had a police force of 250. In the second year of the war the enemy conquered Jugoslavia and Greece. Their "home defence" fell to the ground and amounted to nothing. I can tell you this: but for the agency I have named, Britain, the enemy would long ago have been in the maritimes, in the province of Quebec, and through Ontario right to the head of the lakes.

I did not intend to speak in this debate, but I object to the remarks which have been made about the soldier city of Toronto. We are not sitting up all night long worrying about Quebec. I know the people of Toronto; I was born there. They are hard-working patriotic citizens. I have never had any bigotry in me, nor have I ever met a bigoted citizen there, and I am only one of five or six hundred thousand persons similarly conditioned. We are not worrying about Quebec or any other province; our only worry is to win the war. We like the people of Quebec; they are our own kith and kin; they have done a great deal for Canada, and in this war they have done better than they did in the last—the records speak for themselves. But let me say that I hope that in the speeches in this house we have heard the last of home defence and shall hear more of what we owe to the mother country, which has protected our shores and ourselves from the same air forces and mechanized hordes which overran the small countries of Europe, and threatened the very life of freedom and civilization.

On motion of Mr. Neill the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 19, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Hon. Louis Stephen St. Laurent, K.C., member for the electoral district of Quebec East, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. C. G. Power.

Gaspard Fauteux, Esquire, member for the electoral district of St. Mary, Montreal, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. P. J. A. Cardin.

HONG KONG COMMISSION

INQUIRY AS TO ORDER OF REFERENCE—SITTINGS IN CAMERA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is reported to me that Sir Lyman Duff, the commissioner appointed under order in council to conduct the Hong Kong inquiry, has announced that owing to the nature of a substantial portion of the evidence which will be adduced before the Hong Kong commission, he is satisfied that it would be inadvisable to hold an inquiry in public, and he has decided accordingly. May I ask the Prime Minister if this report is correct? May I add that certainly there are some portions of the evidence to be adduced which would be, in my judgment, of a confidential nature; but there is a large body of evidence which will be produced before the commissioner which, in my view, should be made in public, in the public interest, and especially that part relating to the sending of untrained men overseas, and the action of the department and the government in the premises.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the word my hon. friend has just given the house is the first intimation I have received of the decision of the chief justice in the matter of holding sessions of his commission in secret. I assume my hon. friend's information is wholly reliable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I assume it is; I have not had confirmation from the chief justice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume it is, too. Neither of us apparently is aware of the facts. However, at the time I asked the chief justice if he would undertake the inquiry I gave him the assurance that the government would not wish to restrict him in any particular, and that it would be for him to decide how the proceedings should be conducted, what assistance he would require in connection with the conduct of the proceedings, and in fact all matters with respect to the commission. I assume if the chief justice has decided to hold the sittings of the commission in secret, as was the case with the United States inquiry into conditions at Pearl Harbour, he has evidently had the best of reasons for so doing. I do not know that I can say more than that.

TAXATION

DOMINION JURISDICTION IN RESPECT OF INCOME AND CORPORATION TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question in reference to the invasion of the municipalities' field of taxation. I shall supply him with a copy of it.

The city of Toronto is a municipality contributing huge sums of money in income and corporation taxes. Last June when the appropriation bill was under discussion here I suggested that the government should get the opinion of the supreme court of Canada as to whether the federal power has jurisdiction to take away these municipal and provincial revenues and raise moneys for provincial purposes by taxation, which under the British North America Act are allocated to provincial authorities. The point is open to much doubt. The city of Toronto is a large city, and its income and corporation taxes run into many millions of dollars. It is suffering the loss of these revenues, and municipal budgets are all upset, and also the province.

I would suggest that any agreement reached with Ontario herein, when made, be validated. When it was under discussion last June I made that suggestion. There should be some procedure to validate the taking away from Ontario of these large revenues, especially from municipalities throughout the province. The words, or the definitions of them, are not clear in the appropriation act. I suggest to the minister that when he has the agreement with Ontario completed, he validate what has been done under the agreement; and he should also earmark this money so that the municipal share will go direct to the municipalities, such as Toronto, Hamilton, London, Ottawa and other places. The revenues of the municipalities have been taken away from them so often that we might just as well abolish our municipal institutions.

I would like to ask the minister if he is prepared to recoup Ontario and the city of Toronto for the taking away of the income tax and corporation tax revenues under the appropriation bill of last June. If the agreement based on it is to be validated, then the minister should earmark the money for the municipalities so that they can get the money either directly or through the province. I should like to ask the minister if he has any further statement to make in view of this and of Ontario's objections yesterday. He gave a statement yesterday that the first objection was last Friday, asking for validation. I raised this same question when the appropriation and unemployment insurance bills were being considered last June and argued that the federal government had no power to take away these provincial revenues or impose taxes for provincial purposes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: The only way they could do it is by consent of the provinces concerned, and such agreement needs validation.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The question of the validation of the agreements with the provinces is now receiving the consideration of the Department of Justice. It was assumed throughout the negotiations that this government had been given the authority to enter into these agreements by the relevant section of the supplementary appropriation act which was passed last spring. Last Friday, Mr. Conant, the attorney general of the province of Ontario, for the first time raised the question that this was not sufficient authority and stated that if the province of Ontario entered into an agreement with the dominion they would like it ratified by the parliament of Canada. I told Mr. Conant directly then and there that he was entitled to ask that we have the necessary authority to enter into an agreement and that I would consult the Department of Justice at once and if an act was required, that act would be introduced.

Mr. CHURCH: It savours of British Honduras, the whole programme.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

EVACUATION TO BRITISH COLUMBIA INLAND AREAS—MESSAGE FROM KELOWNA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a question based upon a telegram which I received this morning from the city clerk of Kelowna, British Columbia. This reads as follows:

Copy of resolution passed by municipal council of Kelowna on sixteenth.

Whereas under dominion regulations all male Japanese of military age have to vacate areas west of Cascade range by April 1st; and whereas apparently no supervision or restrictions have been made of this evacuation; and whereas these Japanese are steadily seeping into the Okanagan valley seeking to purchase land, residences and to settle, many of them coming in new automobiles and acting in a very truculent and insolent manner; and whereas public indignation is being roused to such an extent that violence against this infiltration may easily break out and unless stopped almost certainly will break out;

Be it resolved, (1) that all male Japanese of military age be interned by the dominion government; (2) orders in council be issued prohibiting the sale or lease or rental of land and other real estate to Japanese during the present crisis; (3) any evacuation of other Japanese to east of Cascade be under strict supervision of the dominion government only to such areas as may be deemed advisable where strict police supervision can be made at all times and in such a manner as not to arouse popular indignation and outrage.

A copy has been sent to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in position to make a statement which will alleviate the anxiety of those who take charge of the inhabitants of the interior of British Columbia?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was good enough to send me a telegram which had been received this morning, and while it is not in the same terms as the one he has just read, the purport is much the same. I would say at once that the policy of the government for the duration of the war is to restrict, except under permit from the Minister of Justice, the acquisition of land by purchase, lease or otherwise by persons of Japanese origin or by Japanese controlled companies.

In replying to my hon. friend, I think I ought perhaps to express just a word of caution with respect to the wording of messages and public utterances generally which may relate to the present position of Japanese nationals and other persons of Japanese origin in Canada at this time. I need not say how critical the situation is and how necessary it is, if we are to maintain law and order in the different communities and prevent hasty and unwarranted action on the part of individuals who may not be sufficiently appreciative of the effect of their actions, for all to be as restrained as possible in the language used in dealing with these difficult questions.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

PLANS TO ENSURE ECONOMIC SECURITY OF NATION'S WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Yesterday the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) asked a question with reference to old age pensions. I would inform him that this matter does not come within the jurisdiction of my department. His question should be addressed to my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, as the question I asked yesterday on the orders of the day, at page 687 of Hansard, comes within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance and not of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, I would ask the Minister of Finance to be good enough to give me an answer at some future day.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Yes, I shall be glad to do that.

SS. "LADY HAWKINS"

INVESTIGATION OF LOSS IN ATLANTIC BY TORPEDO ATTACK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I forwarded a notice of a question to the Minister of Transport on February 4, and I asked a question publicly on February 13. I am wondering if the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services has drawn it to his attention. If so, may I have a reply on this question about the sinking of the Lady Hawkins?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Transport): I understand that the subject matter of the question asked by my hon. friend comes within the purview of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. I understand that the minister is now or will be quite soon in a position to give an answer.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I be permitted to say that in the interests of the relatives of those who perished on the Lady Hawkins—I am speaking of the passengers as well as the crew—some assurance should be given that a thorough investigation will be held into the loss of this ship.

[Later:]

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, I can now give the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) an answer to the question he asked the other day respecting an investigation of the loss in the Atlantic of the SS. Lady Hawkins.

The matter of routing, diverting and protecting shipping is a naval responsibility of the allied powers and strictly cannot be discussed in public or made known to our enemies.

It may be said, however, that the SS. Lady Hawkins was independently routed, not convoyed. She sailed from a United States port after the British Consular Shipping Adviser had consulted with the master of the ship and had issued relevant instructions and precautions. The Consular Shipping Adviser works closely with the United States port director.

When the Commander in Chief, America and West Indies, reported that the Lady Hawkins was overdue, an investigation was carried out by instruction of the Chief of the Naval Staff of Canada. Nothing has come to light to indicate that the regrettable loss of this ship is anything other than an unavoidable accident of war.

FIRST VICTORY LOAN

PERCENTAGE OF SUBSCRIPTIONS REACHING BANKS OR LENDING INSTITUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): On the orders of the day, on Tuesday last, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) requested information as to the amount of 1941 victory loan bonds that had been sold by original purchasers and had reached the hands of banks and lending institutions.

I have had inquiries made to see whether I could add anything to the remarks I made on Tuesday. I learn that it is practically impossible to make even a rough estimate of what holdings have been sold since the time of their original purchase. The hon. member will realize that in the 1941 victory loan, bonds in bearer form were issued in denominations from $50 up to $25,000. These bonds are sold in the open market and pass freely from hand to hand without any record of such sales being registered in the Bank of Canada.

It might prove useful to place on record the figures for the combined total security holdings of the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks as at June 30, 1941, immediately after the sale of the 1941 victory loan and as at December 31, 1941, the latest available date. On June 30, 1941, the holdings of dominion and provincial direct and guaranteed securities totalled $2,085,220,028, and on December 31, 1941, the holdings of these securities totalled $2,124,401,449, or an increase of only $39,181,421.

However, in that period there were a number of factors that would affect these figures to some extent, namely, an increase in the amount outstanding of Dominion of Canada treasury bills, maturities of dominion and provincial issues, etc. The very satisfactory market which has prevailed on these victory bonds is a further indication of the fact that they could not have been sold in any large volume. Considering all these facts, I am of the opinion that there is nothing in the situation as a whole to cause any worry.

At the same time, I think I should repeat what I said on Tuesday, namely, that in the case of the short term bonds more sales appear to have been made by original purchasers than I would have liked to see. I did not regard this situation as very satisfactory and I trust that in the present offering those who buy the short term issues will do so with the intention of holding them.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASED PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to inform the house whether an announcement will be made regarding an increased price for wheat before the prairie farmers begin their spring ploughing.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question should have been addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In reply I would say that the matter has been receiving consideration, and we had hoped to have reached some finality by this time, but I expect that we shall reach finality in our recommendations within a very few days.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Will the bill be referred to the agriculture committee?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): That is the intention.

AIRGRAPH SERVICE

SPEED OF DELIVERY TO OVERSEAS TROOPS AND POSSIBILITY OF EXTENSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I would ask the Postmaster General, with respect to the sending of airgraph letters overseas, first, whether his department has been able to ascertain the length of time it takes on the average for letters mailed in Canada to reach the troops overseas; and, second, whether this same airgraph service is being extended to the troops overseas so that they may send airgraph letters home to Canada.

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): The hon. member for Parkdale was kind enough to advise me in advance that he intended to ask for this information to-day. In reply to his first question, the shortest time is five days and the average is twelve days, which time will doubtless be materially reduced when climatic conditions are more favourable. In reply to his second question, the United Kingdom and Canadian postal administrations have already studied the establishment of a return airgraph service. Inauguration depends on the establishment of a regular, direct airplane service of reasonable frequency from the United Kingdom to Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has any consideration been given to the extension of the airgraph service to our men serving in the middle east? If not, will the minister give it consideration? I had an inquiry regarding that in to-day's mail.

Mr. MULOCK: Does the hon. member mean service from England to the middle east, or from Canada?

Mr. COLDWELL: From Canada.

[Mrs. Nielsen.]

Mr. MULOCK: I shall be glad to obtain the information and give the hon. member an answer in the course of the next day or so.

PETITION

REQUEST FOR INTERNMENT OF JAPANESE ADULTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. MAYHEW (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a petition signed by 1,100 residents of the municipality of Saanich which I ask permission to lay on the table at this time. Saanich is in the county of Nanaimo, and as the representative for that district is at present serving overseas, I am laying this petition on the table in his behalf. I shall not read the whole petition but just the substance of the prayer, namely:

We therefore do earnestly petition the government of the Dominion of Canada to take immediate steps to eliminate all possibility of subversive acts by the resident Japanese in this province.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Pouliot.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, with respect to the amendment to the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) I should like to ask whether Your Honour has considered whether the amendment to the amendment is in order. I respectfully submit that it is not in order inasmuch as it deals with a future contingency with respect to which it is impossible for any final opinion to be pronounced at the present time.

First of all I would point out to hon. members that, as they are well aware, while an amendment may deal with three or four different subjects it has to be considered as a whole, and if any one part of it is out of order the amendment as a whole would necessarily be declared out of order. The amendment to the amendment is couched in language which in part would read: Your Excellency's advisers are contemplating, with regard to conscription of man-power for overseas service, a reversal of policy which is uncalled for, untimely and detrimental to the defence of Canada.

How can any hon. member say what the ministry is contemplating, and contemplating with respect to a situation that may or may not arise in the future? I should like to ask whether an amendment on the following lines would not perhaps be in accord with what hon. gentlemen opposite who are smiling at the moment have not been saying right along: That the ministry are contemplating, with regard to conscription of man-power for overseas service, a continuation of the policy which has been in existence since this parliament came into being. An amendment setting forth either point of view as to what is in contemplation by the ministry would, I submit, be out of order, inasmuch as it would relate to some future action by the government which cannot be decided at the present time, and which, as has frequently been said from this side of the house, if the government is given a free hand to deal with the important matters to which this particular amendment relates, will be decided in the light of all the circumstances as they exist.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is not often that I rise to support anything that the member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) proposes, and whatever representations I shall now make will be strictly confined to the question of the legality of this proposed amendment and certainly not out of sympathy for the purpose of the hon. member for Témiscouata, which I think everybody knows is political. But I believe that he is within his legal rights in making this motion and it is for that reason alone that I now rise.

If I gathered aright what the Prime Minister stated, his point of order is based on an argument with respect to the use of the word "contemplating". The argument is that the government is not contemplating what is suggested, and that therefore the first part of the motion is based on a false premise. I do not so construe the word "contemplate", because according to Webster, in its ordinary connotation it means "having in view as contingent or probable; to view or consider with continued attention; to meditate upon." Surely this government has been meditating upon a reversal of policy, otherwise it would not have asked for a plebiscite. The holding of a plebiscite itself indicates in a degree that the government has such a reversal in view as contingent or probable. I would suppose that this amendment would be in order, although I am not in sympathy with it. But the rules are there, and I think they should be followed. It is not being attacked on the ground of irrelevance—that is quite certain—but on a play on the word "contemplating" as used in the proposed amendment. My view is that, under the correct wording of the rule and of the meaning of the word "contemplating", this amendment is in order, and I so submit.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I thank the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) for his remarks, but I regret that he has said that this subamendment has been moved for political motives. Here, sir, is the definition of the word "contemplate" in the house copy of the Oxford Dictionary which I have just taken from the table:

> Contemplate. . . . Gaze upon; view mentally; expect; intend, purpose; meditate. So Contemplation . . . (templum temple, open space for observation).

Now, no one besides the members of the cabinet knows what happens behind closed doors in the east block. But here, sir, is the speech from the throne which I hold in my hand and which contains the following paragraph, as reported in Hansard of this year, page 4:

> My ministers accordingly will seek, from the people, by means of a plebiscite, release from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

The words "overseas conscription" are not mentioned in that paragraph. But let us see the wording of the amendment. The first paragraph reads thus:

> This house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers are contemplating, with regard to conscription of man-power for overseas service, a reversal of policy which is uncalled for, . . .

The only difference between the wording of the amendment and the wording of the speech from the throne is that in the amendment the word "overseas" is included. On the other hand, if you take the wording of the speech from the throne, one article of the programme of the government is to seek release from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service. Very well; I believe that the amendment, which was very carefully drafted, is in line with the speech from the throne, and I will further submit that, technically, the Prime Minister can say that no one knows what the government contemplate, but when the government come with a programme for the whole session, and when an article of that programme is to relieve the government of all restrictions concerning military service, it seems to me that it is perfectly in order to move an amendment with the wording of the one I have had the honour to move. I rely upon you, sir, and your knowledge—which is much greater than mine—of the English language, and your knowledge and experience of the rules and practice of this house, to render an unbiased decision. It is a matter which becomes purely legal. The whole thing is to decide whether the speech from the throne indicates that the government is contemplating a change, whatever it is, regarding military service in this country. I leave the matter in your hands to decide whether the subamendment is in order or not.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Might I, with all respect to the Prime Minister, ask him if he can give the house some precedent or ruling as to whether or not the amendment to the amendment is out of order. Has the question not come previously before this house or another house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I have not precedents at hand. I have no doubt that many could be found and cited. I can only say to my hon. friend that I think anyone familiar with the rules of the house with respect to amendments will agree that the point of view I have taken accords with the rules of the house as they are laid down with respect to motions in debate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not a fact that this is a brand new point and has never been heard of before?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to the remarks made by hon. members on the amendment to the amendment made by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), I have been considering yesterday and this morning the relevancy of this amendment.

The hon. member for Témiscouata has moved as an amendment to the amendment on the address, a subamendment containing these words:

> This house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers are contemplating, with regard to conscription of man-power for overseas service, a reversal of policy. . . .

In answer to the statement made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), I take it that the plain meaning of the word "contemplating" used by the hon. member for Témiscouata is the putting into effect now of a reversal of policy, and he refers specifically to the conscription of man-power for overseas service.

The house cannot now entertain an amendment to this subamendment which deals with a future action of the government. The rule is well known that not more than two amendments can be moved at a time. For this reason it is necessary that the strictest rules of interpretation be applied to a second amendment.

A motion of no confidence—and this I may interject is a motion of no confidence—based on the fact that the government has reversed its policy, would be in order, but to base such a motion on the unproved assumption that the government is just contemplating a reversal of policy seems to be holding the government responsible for something it has not yet done. If such a practice is encouraged the only limit to no confidence motions will be the collapse of human imagination. What the government is contemplating is a fact which the government alone knows and which is not supported by the speech from the throne, neither by the Prime Minister's statements during this session nor any measure now before the house. It is an assumption which the house is asked to vote upon without the government having the opportunity to modify it by another amendment; for the reason, as I have already said, that there can be only two amendments before the house at one and the same time, and the government therefore is in the position of having no opportunity to modify it by another amendment.

What is the object of an amendment? It is, as May says, to effect such an alteration in a question as will obtain the support of those who, without such alteration, must either vote against it or abstain from voting. The impossibility of moving a further amendment in this case is all the more serious because the amendment, being against the adoption of the address, is a motion of want of confidence based on the government's future action of which the house can have no knowledge. For that reason it is futile and should not be allowed. I therefore rule the subamendment out of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I respectfully appeal from your decision, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

> The speaker having decided that the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is out of order, the hon, member for Témiscouata appeals from that decision.

The house divided on the question: Shall the speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss this afternoon the question of the Japanese in British Columbia. Since it is an important and burning question there at the present time, it is almost impossible to tell the tale in the required time, and I may ask to have a few minutes longer. If so, it will be the first time I have had to do so.

I am not unmindful, nor shall I try to be, of the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he warned against hasty and unwarranted language, calculated to inflame the situation in British Columbia, as regards Japanese. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to that appeasement talk for twenty years from the government benches, and I think the time has come to take a different stand. I believe we can best serve the interests of our country, and promote peace, by having plain talk, straightforward discussions and, I hope, definite action, with respect to the issues before us.

In the first campaign in which I took part for election to this house in the fall of 1921, I was struck by two outstanding features in the district, first, the predominant place the Japanese had acquired in the fishing industry, and, second, the vast increase in their population in British Columbia, both through immigration and by birth. The fishing industry was dominated by the Japanese during the last war, when our men were overseas. Then, later, they started a policy of pushing the white men out of that industry. The methods they adopted in that procedure were too often those which are not expected in ordinary business competition.

Early in 1922 I got the then government of the day to make a cut in the quota of fishing licences allotted to Japanese in salmon trolling—a part of the fishing industry—to the extent of thirty-three per cent. Later, in the summer, a royal commission was appointed, and it decided to cut all Japanese salmon fishing licences to the extent of forty per cent. The following year they were again cut another fifteen per cent, and the year after that another ten per cent. This made a very substantial reduction, which has been since maintained.

The house is aware that a few weeks ago all Japanese fishing vessels, numbering about 1,200, were seized. If the influx had been allowed to continue, and had not been checked in 1922, as I have described, the number now to be seized would have been something like 3,000 or possibly 3,500. That would have greatly aggravated the situation in British Columbia to-day.

Then, let us look at the other point, namely their increase in numbers by immigration and by birth. The Japanese birthrate is about double that of the white race—rather more than that. And that, of course, goes on all the time. We can stop immigration, but we cannot stop increases by birth, especially when the Japanese government allows to emigrate only those women who are likely to bear children. If they do not have those children, they are sent back to Japan, and others are sent out in their places.

Prior to 1884 there was no immigration of Japanese into British Columbia. From that time until 1907 they came in in ever-increasing numbers, until the situation became alarming. Then the government of the day—a Liberal government, by the way—made a deal with Japan or, as they called it, a gentleman's agreement. On the face of it, it was an arrangement whereby Japan pledged itself to see that no more than 400 Japanese left Japan to come to Canada in one year. No greater travesty of language could be found than to call that a gentleman's agreement, because when one makes a gentleman's agreement it is presupposed that both parties to the agreement are animated by the desire and intention to adhere to it in faith, truth and honesty. But when you find that one of the parties has not the slightest intention of adhering to those principles, control becomes much more difficult. In other words, in those circumstances a gentleman's agreement is just a joke. I have said that the matter was a joke, and I make that statement sincerely because I found that instead of only 400 entering Canada in any one year, the Japanese were entering to the extent of 1,700. That is a matter of record; I have taken it from the records. Then, the other part of the contract was such that the whole matter was left wide open. I shall leave that part of the subject for the moment.

In the spring of 1922, for once in their lives the British Columbia members had sense enough to take united action. I do not believe they have ever done it since, nor do I think it had been done before. We all got together—I believe there were four groups at that time—and presented a resolution to the house asking for the total exclusion of orientals from British Columbia and Canada. The government opposed the resolution and moved to amend it by striking out the words "total exclusion" and inserting the words "effective restriction". Of course the government's majority carried the amendment. We were told at that time that the two expressions were synonymous, and that the term "effective restriction" meant total exclusion. The government majority carried the amendment—and that was the end of total exclusion. It did not operate as we had been led to believe.

Time has gone on and taken its toll of those fourteen members who supported that principle. There have been deaths, both politically and physically at one end of the rainbow, and the senate and big government appointments at the other end. All these have reduced that little band to the point where I am the only one left. I can say, like the man in the Bible—in the Book of Job, I believe it was; some of my parson friends can correct me if I am wrong—"I only am escaped alone to tell thee." I continued pressing the matter as best I could, but I found that governments were not sympathetic.

There was too much talk of appeasement in the air. One of the arguments was this, "We want to do a big trade with Japan, with her seventy million people. We do not want to lose that trade. If we do anything they don't like they will take their trade to the United States." That argument had some plausibility; at any rate it was good enough to stall me off for a year or two.

Then I saw the psychological moment open in 1924. The government of the United States, out of a clear sky, passed a total exclusion act against orientals, including Japanese. There was our chance to do the same, without loss of trade. I begged the then Prime Minister—the same one as we have to-day—to make it apply to all orientals; but he could not see his way clear to do so. He did apply it to Chinese, and that action has been most successful. Unfortunately, however, it was not applied to Japanese.

I continued from time to time to do what I could; and then along about 1928—possibly it was 1929—the Prime Minister was kind enough—and I give him full credit for it, because he did not have to do it—to readjust the joint agreement so that instead of an entry of 400 a year there would be only 150. He put some teeth in the terms of that agreement, so that we really had at least a gambler's chance of enforcing it. I believe the Japanese with their accustomed ability and subtlety found loopholes whereby at least to some extent they evaded the terms of the arrangement, but not to any great extent. Then, of later years the war has stopped any serious immigration.

I was told at that time that there were other reasons why we should not do anything to offend the Japanese nation, reasons of a diplomatic nature. I remember as well as if it were yesterday the answer I gave—I believe it is in Hansard—"The house and government might be assured that the Japanese nation would attack us the very moment it suited them, no matter what we had done by way of appeasement, favours or anything else." The very moment it suited them to attack us they would do so—and to-day tells the answer.

If my advice had been taken, even as late as 1924, to-day there would have been in Canada perhaps 5,000 or 6,000 fewer Japanese than there are to-day. Six thousand taken from 24,000 would have helped to ease this very acute situation which exists in British Columbia to-day.

I continued to look anxiously at the situation, and in 1938 I thought I had another opportunity. I brought in a bill to provide for an educational test. The Japanese were not mentioned by name, but the provisions of this bill would have applied to three-quarters of the world's population. If it had been put into force, it would have set up a method which has been used in Australia and New Zealand for thirty years without any objection from the Japanese. This has helped to keep Australia and New Zealand white. The government refused to allow my bill to go through. The matter was put to a vote and, if hon. members are interested in the matter, they will find it fully set out in Hansard of May 31, 1938, at page 3411. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) and the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) should be proud now that they withstood the pressure of the whip at that time and voted in the interests of their province rather than at the dictates of the party. In justice to the hon. member for Victoria, B. C. (Mr. Mayhew), I must say that he was sick at home at the time and could not possibly be here.

In September, 1940, Japan signed the deal, agreement or whatever you call it with Italy and Germany. In plain English, they bound themselves to enter into war against us and the United States whenever it suited Germany or Hitler. Pressure was put upon the government by British Columbia, and I suppose some realization of the situation also led the government to take action. They appointed a hand-picked committee to investigate the subject, which committee came back with a number of recommendations, I believe ten in all. There were only two of any importance, Nos. 5 and 7, and I shall deal with them. No. 5 recommended against allowing Japanese to enlist in our volunteer army then being raised. That was a very good idea, otherwise we would have had perhaps 1,500 Japanese training in our army, possibly in key positions, petty officers and the like. They would have been familiar with every detail of our army operations. Protests were made by the mayor of Nanaimo, and I think by other cities and by myself, and the recommendation of the committee carried. That was all right.

Recommendation No. 7 was that there should be a re-registration of the Japanese in Canada. It had been claimed by many people that the registration that had been taken was just a fake as regards the Japanese. Only those who felt like it registered, and there was a demand for a new registration. The recommendation was that they should be photographed at the same time. That was a good idea, but it had one fatal defect, if deception is regarded as a fatal defect. It was clearly understood that this registration was compulsory. We were told how well it was going on, how successful it was, and it was hoped that we malignants would now be satisfied and keep quiet. The whole thing turned on the point that it was compulsory.

If it had been voluntary, what use would it have been? Supposing we decided to make a history of the people by the name of Smith, to have a record of everything they had done, whether they had been in gaol and so on. If this was carried on voluntarily, how many Smiths would come forward except those with clean hands? Was it expected that Japanese who had entered the country illegally would come forward and say, "Yes, I came in illegally, take me." Of course they would not. A Jap is not a fool, any more than we are. The guilty ones did not register and the whole thing was a gigantic failure. It could not be otherwise if it were anything but compulsory.

Our main complaint was that many of them had come into the country illegally and this re-registration would have discovered that. Was it expected that those who had come in illegally would disclose that fact? The thing is ridiculous. When the war came on, after Pearl Harbour, it was discovered that it was not compulsory, that it was just a gesture to keep us quiet, just a farce. Then what happened? The war was on and the people know what war means; this government should know what it means. These same people were given two months in which to register; they were given until February 7 to get things fixed up, to get a fake birth certificate or a forged entry card. You can buy them in Vancouver. If they could not get either, they were given two months before they would be subject to the same action as that to which any other enemy alien would be exposed. Why give them two months? We were practically saying to them, "We are at war with you, but we will give you two months in which to get faked papers, or get out of the country." I never heard the like of it before, and I hope I never shall again.

If I were challenged to offer proof of these things, I could no more do it than I could offer proof of the day of the week on which my last birthday fell. You do not keep track of these things that are so well known. I suppose I could have kept the newspapers that I read at the time, but I did not. I never dreamed that such action would be necessary to show that they had said it was compulsory. On February 9, the Prime Minister made this statement, as reported on page 398 of Hansard.

> The committee received the utmost cooperation from Japanese nationals as well as from Canadians of Japanese racial origin. When a state of war was proclaimed as existing between Japan and Canada, the registration was all but complete.

The utmost cooperation! We know the extent of that cooperation. Here is what a man wrote—a white man for a change, and perhaps we can take his word—to the local paper in Vancouver a few days ago:

> About three years ago I was talking to a Canadian-born Japanese boy in a store and said to him, "if the Japs ever came over here would you fight against us?" He replied, "I wouldn't want to, but I would either have to or commit suicide."

That is the sort of blind it is. There is your cooperation. Only when they attacked Pearl Harbour was it announced that the whole thing had been only voluntary. Here is an article that appeared in the papers a few days afterwards:

> During the registration proceedings, several hundred Japanese left Canada for Japan. Most of these were known to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Many of them were believed to have entered the country illegally.

It is only after war breaks out that we discover all that. They were given two months in which to fix things up or get out. If that registration had been compulsory, we would have got the best of these Jap agents and the best of their spies. They have now gone home with their charts and plans and with a local knowledge that could not be bought for any money. Perhaps we shall see some of these Japs again peering over the side of the bridge of a German gunboat in Vancouver, Nanaimo or Port Alberni, because we now know that many of them were expert naval men. Agitation continued, and the government called a conference which was held here on January 8 and 9. With possibly one or two exceptions, the twenty-five gentlemen who attended this conference were in government service. Their continuing or advancement in the branch of the service in which they were, might depend upon—putting it politely—their thinking the same way as the government about these matters.

I suggested that they should call in the British Columbia members who were elected by the people and who have some claim to represent the people. But, oh, no! I should like to give another quotation. I shall not give names because I do not think it is fair to attack people when they are not in a position to reply. When an official is mentioned, I shall refer to an official, and when reference is made to a member of the government, I shall simply call him a minister I quote:

> I fail to see any need of getting the members from British Columbia together and asking them what they think should be done.

They were not called together, but the twenty-five government officials were there in full strength. They were fully informed of the government's views because some came from the Department of External Affairs.

I have here the statement got out by the Prime Minister. This is an official document, after the conference had reported, and so there is no harm in my quoting from it. It contains seventeen paragraphs, a great many of which are build-ups for the rest of it. I will deal with the more important ones, paragraphs 6, 7, 8 and 11.

Paragraph 6 recommends that the government should seize immediately the Japanese fishing boats. That was done. It was done immediately war was declared, and for that action I have nothing but the utmost praise. It was done promptly and thoroughly. I have a vague idea that I see in it the efficient hand of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). At any rate it was done, and done well. While this is not part of the report, I may as well finish up that matter by saying that after they had 1,200 Japanese boats in their hands, the question arose, what to do with them? It was desirable to get them back into fishing again, so that white men could catch the fish so badly needed for the British market. Therefore they set up a committee to try to sell these boats. Whoever chose that committee deserves great credit. They made excellent choices. Here they are: Chairman, Hon. Mr. Justice Sidney Smith, a man with a master mariner's papers, so he would understand boats; Commander B. L. Johnson, D.S.O., R.C.N.R., a man of outstanding ability and repute in Vancouver. Then there was a Japanese, Kishizo Kimura, who I am told, is a very able man, familiar with the work that he undertook. I give all credit for that. Like all government offices, it is true that they were rather slow in going about their work, but they got started at last. They issued a circular, a copy of which I hold in my hand, explaining their procedure. I am very glad to get this circular because I can pass the information along to the fishermen, who are continually writing to me to know what to do. I am afraid that the whole scheme will not be entirely successful because the government will have left on their hands hundreds of boats. That is not the fault of the government or of this committee. Well, they got this thing started and have sold fifty-six boats up to date, and marvellous to relate, they told the members of parliament about it. They even accepted a suggestion I made—another remarkable thing. I suggested that they could not sell these boats for cash because the fishermen did not have cash, but they would be able to buy them on time, and accordingly that was arranged. The general idea of a lot of these officials, the people on these new boards, seems to be that there is no loyalty, intelligence or usefulness in any member of parliament. I do not know where they get the idea because it is not so very long since the people elected us. But that is the idea you find among the people on these new boards and among these dollar-a-year men. Since we are not told what is being done, we shall have to guess or simply deal with what we see, and if we guess wrong, the government is to blame. I do not think members of parliament are any more unworthy than they were in years gone by.

I want to quote recommendation 7 in which was contained the policy of the cabinet. It reads:

> For the same period—
>
> That is during the war.
> —the sale of gasoline and explosives to persons of Japanese racial origin will be directly controlled under conditions to be prescribed by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

That is a good idea too, a very good idea, but unfortunately I read in the papers—I have to go to the press for information because I cannot get it anywhere else—that these sales are still going on.

Mr. HOMUTH: The sale of powder is still going on?

Mr. NEILL: Explosives. A man wrote to the Vancouver Province the other day and suggested that if this order was in effect, why was the Japanese station at the corner still selling gas the same as usual? That has been going on for two and a half months now, and I rather think permission has been extended to the 1st of April. The language is doubtful, but if it can be interpreted to the benefit of the Japanese, be sure it will be so interpreted. You are dealing with clever, subtle, unscrupulous enemies—and they are enemies—and when you say that you are not going to stop the sale for two months, that is just an invitation to them to accumulate as much gas and explosives as they can in the meantime. We say to them: "Remember, on the 7th of February or on the 1st of April we are going to shut down on you." Is that not an invitation to them to get explosives and gasoline against a rainy day? That time limit should never have been put in. The order should have been made applicable at once.

I want to say one more good thing for the government, and it will be the last, I am sorry to say. It does not pay to state your case unfairly, and I wish to be strictly fair. In these two instances I have mentioned, the seizing of the Japanese boats, and this order with respect to the sale of gasoline and explosives was made applicable to all Japanese, and all honour is due to the government for doing it.

There are three classes of Japanese we must deal with. There are the Japanese nationals, those born in Japan and never naturalized in Canada; they are Japanese nationals. Then there is the man born in Japan and naturalized in Canada. He is called a naturalized Japanese or a Canadian. Then there is the Japanese who was born in Canada, who can call himself a Japanese-Canadian if he likes. The government orders with regard to seizing the boats and the sale of gas and explosives applied to all three classes. That was all right.

Now I deal with paragraph 8. It says that Japanese nationals will be forbidden to possess or use short-wave receiving sets or radio transmitters in Canada. A most excellent thing. Hon. members can all understand why it was necessary to do that. That was fine. But it does not come into effect until the 1st of April. Did the Japanese give us four months' notice of what they were going to do at Pearl Harbour? Yet we say to them: "Go wandering about with your cameras and take pictures, and use your receiving sets to send word to Japan, and your receivers to get instructions from Japan. You can do this as much as you like until the 1st of April." Even if the order had been withheld, and they had been allowed to continue doing these things without being told of any date when they must stop, it would not have been so bad, because then they would never have known when the order was coming into force. But they were warned—you will not be interfered with until the 1st of April. The order was the equivalent of that. We told them: "Do your dirty work now. Use your radio and your receiving set but, remember, hide or bury them before the 1st of April, and then everything will be lovely." They told the Japanese nationals that they must not use these things in a protected area. But they can use them outside. I have a police order to that effect. It is signed by the police and says:

> No enemy alien shall have in his possession or use while in such protected area any camera, radio transmitter, radio short-wave receiving set, firearm, ammunition or explosive.

But that order does not apply outside the protected area, and it does not apply to a naturalized or native-born Japanese.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not quite familiar with the regulations as to cameras, but does my hon. friend suggest that the same date applied with regard to evacuating a protected area and the possession of cameras? They must evacuate by April 1.

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend used the same date, April 1, when speaking of cameras and receiving sets.

Mr. NEILL: Yes. I said that the language was so ambiguous that it could be read two ways. It reads:

> Notices ordering all enemy aliens to evacuate the coastal area of British Columbia west of the Cascade mountains by April 1 and to surrender cameras and radios will be posted in public buildings to-day.

Then:

> Orders to Japanese . . . to get out of the coastal areas within forty-seven days and to surrender cameras, radios and other banned articles, were issued to-day.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend is reading some sort of newspaper paraphrase of the order. The order to give up radios and cameras is effective immediately. The order of evacuation is not. The order referred to, is effective on April 1.

Mr. NEILL: It is signed by Colonel Hill, and states that no enemy alien shall have in his possession or use while in such protected area any camera, radio transmitter, radio short-wave receiving set, firearm, ammunition or explosive.

Mr. RALSTON: That is effective immediately. You don't wait until April 1 for that.

Mr. NEILL: Well, as I said, it is doubtful. There is, however, no question whatever that a man who is not a Japanese national can do these things any time, any place. The order applies only to nationals; that is, to men born in Japan and coming over here, and these are comparatively few in number, something like 1,700 out of 24,000, and only while they are in the area. The remaining 22,000 of naturalized Japanese are free to come and go, as I have said, anywhere. They can photograph what they like, radio what they like. They can do something else which I have not touched upon, and which is—not to make a joke—a burning question in British Columbia. Three, two, one of them can do endless damage in British Columbia with a box of matches. The most deadly enemy of the lumber industry in British Columbia is fire. Lumbermen are so afraid of it, it is so dangerous, that they shut their camps down in the middle of summer, as soon as the humidity reaches a certain point. A man can wander out in that bush, ten, fifty, a hundred miles from anywhere, and do more damage with a box of matches than it would take two armies to put out. The large number of forest rangers whom we have could not touch the fringe of the thing if these aliens were determined to commit sabotage. Some of the biggest lumbermen on the coast are much alarmed at this situation. If the Japanese were out of the area, they could not do this damage, because you can't do a thing if you are not there.

I have spoken of the freedom of Japanese to come and go with cameras, radios and matches. That is not restricted to two months or four months; that is for eternity, if the war lasts that long; it is for the duration of the war that the naturalized or Canadian-born Jap can go out and commit sabotage; he is free to do it the whole time, and he is the most dangerous of the lot. The naturalized Japanese speaks our language fluently, possibly he has been to college. He possesses far greater potentialities of trouble as a spy or an agent than if he had just come from Japan. The fellow dressed up like a white man, speaking our language glibly, is the one who should be interned. It is very hard for me to believe that the government are so remote from what is taking place or may take place as not to understand the situation.

Paragraph 10 of the statement to which I referred makes a rather vague reference to the establishment of a civil corps for Canadian and naturalized Japanese. Because the project is a voluntary one, and in view of the vagueness to which I have referred, I imagine that presently it will fade away.

I should now like to make three charges against the government. The first is this, that, with the exception of seizing these boats, they have been far too slow in handling the Japanese situation. They have let days go by when it should have been hours, and a month when it should have been days. Look at what was done in Mexico. There the government dealt with the whole lot as soon as war was declared, and ordered into the interior every Jap who was on the coast. They did it; they didn't talk about it. Cuba did the same thing. They arrested, I believe, eighteen Japanese, all but two of whom were naval officers. Nicaragua took the same course, and took it speedily.

Mr. CRERAR: Could my hon. friend tell the house—I am merely asking for information—what has been done in the United States?

Mr. NEILL: No. I have not made myself familiar with what is happening there. I know that on the Pacific coast they took prompt steps. But they did not have the same incentive and need for action as we have, because there were not fishermen in the state of Washington; most Japanese there worked in paper mills and the like of that. But I am not in a position to state in detail what was done. I have troubles enough of my own. I do know what the situation is in British Columbia.

The only reason why we have not had a Pearl Harbour bombing in Canada is that we have no Pearl Harbour to bomb.

I note here that the council of the city of Vancouver has passed a resolution urging the government to get a move on. The report speaks of increasing irritation and criticism at the coast over the apparent failure of the government to implement its announced policy of removing Japanese.

The legislature of British Columbia, before adjourning a few days ago, passed unanimously a resolution urging the dominion government to strengthen Pacific defences. The feeling is very strong at the coast. I wish I could get the government to realize it.

Here is one incident I must quote, reported under a big headline in a leading Vancouver paper, the Daily Province:

Japanese live undisturbed on dike adjoining airport.

There are 200 Japanese living a mile west of the airport. They are living on a dike. It would be very easy to blow up or open that dike, and the airport would be rendered useless for a long time to come. Yet they are living undisturbed within a mile of the airport; they are on a dike into which a gap could be blown with a few sticks of powder that would make the airport useless for a long time to come. Why does the government not take some action in this case?

The second charge is that even the small restrictions to which I have referred are applicable only to nationals, and I say it is inexcusable that they are not made applicable to all naturalized Japanese aliens in this country. To whom do you suppose they think they owe loyalty? If they were scattered all over Canada, the case might be different, but think what may happen when they are turned loose in a small area, when 25,000 are concentrated in an area where they could so readily combine to take action against Vancouver, or Victoria, as the case may be. It constitutes an unspeakable menace; I cannot understand why it is allowed to continue.

The third charge is that the government have shown indifference to British Columbia defence, also to air raid precautions work and the like of that. I am not blaming the government for preparations which they might have made six years ago. That is not their fault; I know that. We could not get the appropriation through the house. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation moved resolutions condemning the government for proposing, as the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) did, to spend some money for these purposes. But I do blame the government for not having taken the situation in hand since war was declared. They are too slack; they appear to adopt the attitude, "Oh, well, we have to take chances; we are doing the best we can; it will be all right." Well, they told us it would be all right about Hong Kong. But people make mistakes—even military men, even high military men. They told us it would be all right at Singapore. Yet we know that mistakes were made there. Here is the government's paper, the Vancouver Sun, expressing this opinion:

Canada obviously has not made its plan of defence on the assumption of any real attack on the Pacific coast. . . . That is the plan which must be reconsidered . . . we do expect a well-equipped, mobile striking unit which could pounce upon any Japanese landing attempt from Alaska southwards.

No such force exists on our coast. No such force exists in Canada.

I am afraid that is too true. Perhaps in the secret session which is to be held we shall be given more information on this matter. I do not propose to blame the government for things which happened before they had control and knowledge of the situation, or for not having done what at the time was beyond their power. But the government must be ready at that secret session to give us genuine information, not general assurances and smooth-sounding platitudes. There has been too much of this in connection with the management of the war.

There is a certain place—I will not name names, I will call it Y. When the government began to think about building aerodromes I thought that Y would make a good site for one, and I said so. I put it up to the officials, and they said that they were experts and ought to know better than I did. Well, I accepted that decision—but they are building that aerodrome now with frantic haste. I fear we may have to paraphrase the hymn and say:

> Too late, too late will be the cry
> The Japanese gunboats have gone by.

There was another aerodrome at a place we will call X. I wrote to the government in connection with this one, informing them that there were two things wrong about it. This was a year or two ago. I pointed out to the officials that there was a Jap village 200 yards from the mouth of it where the Japs could take photographs and keep a record of any aeroplanes leaving, with all the details, so that they could have it all recorded for the benefit of the Japanese. They were about as far from the mouth of the aerodrome as Sparks street would be from where I am standing. I have in my desk a letter in which some official tried to stall me off. I was told that they would expropriate the Japanese, but that they could not do it because there was some hitch. However, they said they would look into the matter. Imagine looking into the question of expropriating this particular property when other nations, as we know, take first what they require and then talk about expropriation. Again, I pointed out to the officials that there was a Jap who had been seen taking photographs from an aeroplane over the harbour, where the aerodrome was being built. It was a civilian aeroplane. I took this matter up with various bodies—I will not mention any names because I do not wish to give them away—and what was the answer? I was informed that the investigation was closed. They had ascertained the name of the man and had found that he had gone to Japan. I suppose he took photographs with him as a memento of us because he loved us so much. Well, he has gone back to Japan with whatever photographs he took—we do not know how many—and God knows how many more may have gone there. But the officials did not seem to think it was important. I was told that it would be difficult to take photographs through the glass of any aeroplane unless you had a particular sort of apparatus with which to do it. Well, would the Japanese not have that type of apparatus? I submitted all these matters to the department, and I have it all on record. One of the officials said to me, "There is nothing to this anyhow because it is not against the laws of the country to take photographs of an aerodrome."

I took it up with some of the higher officials, and they juggled with it and finally explained that they could get the Japs under the Official Secrets Act. The aerodrome is still there; the Japs are still staying there under their four months' lease of life, and doubtless they are still taking these photographs, which I have no doubt will be sent to the right place.

These men are not all Canadian nationals. Some of them may be the very best class of spies and foreign agents, and I contend that there has been too much sympathy for the Japanese viewpoint and Japanese interests. We must remember that we are at war with these people. Ottawa is 3,000 miles away from us out there, and it is useful to have a man here who is familiar with conditions on the coast to advise. So they sent for a man who for ten or fifteen years had been notorious—there is no other word by which to describe his activities—in the province of British Columbia, for his championship of the Japanese, for his advocacy of their interests. He was a protagonist of the Japanese. There was never a man who believed so strongly and implicitly in Japan.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exceeded his time, and he may proceed only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Go ahead.

Mr. NEILL: I thank the house and the Prime Minister; I have never asked for this licence before. To proceed, I may say that a great deal of ill-will has been excited in British Columbia. The people out there said that this man was paid a big salary as a provincial official, and they wanted to know why they should be paying him if he was so disloyal to the province. That was before the war, and it was said that it was only a matter of opinion. He has now been transferred to a position in Ottawa in which he can give advice—that is what he is here for, to speak with authority. He is on the ground, and he is also in a position to have early knowledge of any action that might be taken against the Japanese and to drop a hint in the right place. Anything of that sort, just a hint in the right quarters, might make a great deal of difference in the carrying out of a policy.

Perhaps I shall be told that this is unfair, that this is a fine man, and that I should not make such statements. I agree that he is entitled to his weird opinions; he was entitled to that before the war. But since the war, no —a thousand times no. He is too one-sided and biased to be kept in such a place.

During the last war there was a member of the royal family, Prince Henry of Battenberg, I think, who was married to Queen Victoria's daughter. He was an admiral of the fleet and his loyalty could not be questioned, but he voluntarily asked to be retired. It did not look well to see a man of German origin in command of the fleet, and so he asked to be retired. I submit that in this case a feeling of decency should have impelled this gentleman to whom I have been referring to ask to be relieved of his position, where he is open to suspicion. Scripture says that we should abstain from even the appearance of evil.

We who have taken the position that I am now taking have been called all sorts of names. We have been called agitators. It is said that we are willing to exploit the interests of Canada for our own political advantage; that we are rabble-rousers, Jap-baiters, and that we have a very dangerous influence—that was not said of me; it was said of a reputable alderman in Vancouver. I have heard that sort of thing, and hints of it even in this house, and certainly in the government press. You can get a man to write any letter you want; you can get a white man to make a tool of himself for a Jap if you pay him enough. There was a man who wrote to the papers saying what fine people the Japs are. I laid a trap for him and I discovered that he was a white man all right, but also a paid agent of a Japanese association, but he did not say that when he signed his name.

Yes, we are all bad because we want a white British Columbia and not a place like Hawaii! Fifty years from now, unless something is done to stop it, all west of the Rockies will be yellow. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we want but little; we simply want to be left alone, like New Zealand and Australia, all white. I have no ill-will against the Japanese. Perhaps you may think I have been showing ill-will, but I assure you I have none towards the Japs. No Jap ever "did" me—I never gave him the chance. I wish to be fair to the Japanese, and I think that if we expatriated them, as we ought to do, they should be given full justice in regard to their property, because I am strongly in favour of a Japan controlled by the Japanese, just as I am in favour of a Canada controlled by Canadians. Let us continue to trade with them; let us do business with them across the ocean; but do not force into one nation two peoples separated by something that is wider than the ocean, two peoples who are different in race, in religion, in traditions and in their whole philosophy of life. This difference always has prevented assimilation and always will prevent it, between two nations so utterly divergent in every respect. The greatest path towards assimilation is marriage. Well, the Japs have been here fifty-eight years and there is no record of a single marriage, although there might be one. I asked a Japanese to produce the record of one marriage and he could not do so. We have heard of second generation Japanese born here going to Japanese schools here to learn Japanese, and that has been regarded as a small matter. We went into their textbooks and had them translated and we found that they were very anti-British. Yet there were people who thought that was a small matter—only the sort of thing that irresponsible people like myself would talk about. But when the war came, it was thought wise to shut down the Jap schools. There were fifty-nine in British Columbia, and leaving out small areas where they could not run a school, the great bulk of those children must have attended some Japanese school.

I have one more word. When the time comes to talk peace, I suggest that the services rendered by Canada and by her Prime Minister should surely entitle both him and this dominion to be fully represented when the terms of peace are being settled, when the treaty comes to be made, and have their voice heard in no uncertain terms. I do suggest—perhaps it is too early to talk about it now, but it is well to get it started—that we should make an arrangement that when peace time comes, we expatriate all the Japanese left in Canada; do it on fair terms, buy them out, pay them liberally. It was done in the present war, I believe, between Russia and Germany; and after the last war it was done on a large scale, some 200,000 people, between the Greeks and the Turks, I think. If they could move 200,000, it is much easier for us to move 25,000, and it is better to move them while their numbers are so small. Let us settle once and for all this canker in the life of Canada which prevents us from being a united white Canada. And that is what British Columbia wants.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. I believe we are discussing the amendment to the motion. I submit to you, sir, that on the basis of your ruling on the amendment to the amendment the amendment itself is clearly out of order.

Your Honour ruled that the subamendment sought to condemn the government on what amounted to a want of confidence motion for something it contemplated doing. The amendment states:

> This house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers, instead of giving to the country the leadership so essential at a time properly described in the speech from the throne as the greatest crisis in the world's history, on the contrary, have sought to evade their responsibility by holding a plebiscite.

My submission is that the government has not held a plebiscite, but that the speech from the throne contemplates the holding of a plebiscite, which is precisely in the terms of the amendment to the amendment that was ruled out of order. Therefore on precisely the same ground this amendment to the motion is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the difference is very apparent. The government has announced its determination to hold a plebiscite. The amendment that I ruled out of order referred to a contemplated future action of the government, which may or may not take place. Therefore I cannot see any similarity between that proposed subamendment and the amendment which is now before the house.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Now that the proposed subamendment of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has been ruled out of order, and before the vote is taken on the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) I intend to move an amendment to the amendment of the leader of the opposition.

Canada in its entirety condemned conscription on March 26, 1940. Canadians of all origins repudiated this measure. There is no better demonstration thereof than the defeat of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen in York South on February 9. Personally I will not relieve the government from its solemn pledge and sacred commitments. Now the Prime Minister of our country, who heads the most powerful government which Canada has ever had, would withdraw before a clique of imperialists. Why this plebiscite, if not because the government wishes to be released from its pledges and commitments? It would be so easy for the government to respect the precise, clear and almost unanimous mandate which it received from the people of this country on March 26, 1940. Furthermore, thousands of Canadian voters approved the same mandate on February 9 last; they requested the government to respect its commitments to the people of Canada. I will not mention to-day the results of the by-elections of February 9, but I will speak again on that subject at the right moment.

The Canadian party has sown the seed of Canadian ideals. This seed has already sprouted in good soil. Having regard to the generous and sympathetic welcome with which the electorate greeted our doctrine, we are sure that our ideas and principles will make their way.

The amendment to the amendment which I shall move is not an amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, but an amendment to the amendment of the leader of the opposition. Lest hon. members should misunderstand the meaning of the amendment I shall move, let me give the following explanation.

I cannot support the leader of the opposition; on the contrary I must disapprove of his amendment as firmly as I can, because sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 states that:

> —this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have not seen fit to recommend to parliament without delay additional measures designed to
> (a) completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war.

During all my life I have been opposed to conscription and mobilization for overseas service. It is not in this most decisive hour that I will fail in my duty. According to the very words of the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, "conscription for overseas service would be an error of such tremendous magnitude that it would split the country wide open."

Many of my colleagues have already voiced their disapproval of the plebiscite. They have spoken in this debate and asserted that they would vote against the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Because my colleagues are sincere and consistent and have asserted that they are beside me against conscription I beg them to help me defeat the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition requesting conscription and mobilization for overseas service.

This amendment to the amendment will also deal with the necessity of exempting from military training and compulsory service, farmers, farmers' sons, fishermen and fisheries employees, and all persons employed in war industries. Agriculture is our first line of defence, because it feeds our armies and our civilian population. As for employees of war industries, their work is essential to the carrying on of the war and to the defence of Canada. The great majority of munition workers already possess invaluable training and experience; to replace them would mean disorganizing and even ruining our production of aircraft, tanks, ships, guns, machine guns, shells, and so forth.

The government has not the right to commit the tremendous error of ruining or even lessening our agricultural production. Nor has it the right to harm the output of our munition factories. Many married farmers and their sons had to abandon their farms to join up in the training camps. Even more numerous were the aged and sick farmers who were compelled to sell their farms and herds because their sons were mobilized and called for training. Farm labour has become so scarce that we anticipate with great fear the imminent failure of agriculture in Canada.

During the year just gone by agricultural production has decreased by twenty-six per cent. This decrease is reaching such a point that our best informed agricultural economists are thunderstruck by the seriousness of this situation.

I shall deal further with the vital importance of maintaining, and even of increasing, production in our war factories. Many young men who had acquired a previous experience in this line had to leave their factories to take up military training. I know many tradesmen, skilled mechanics, plumbers, welders, electricians and graduates from our technical schools who were compelled to leave their work, so important to our war production, in order to respond to the colours. In many cases they were replaced by apprentices or completely unskilled workers.

One should not wonder, then, why our war factories have worked and are still working at a very slow rate. In order to redress this deplorable state of affairs an investigation should be conducted into the acts of the responsible parties.

According to the war aims of the allies, we are fighting first of all to maintain Christianity in the world, and then democracy, liberty, justice and right. Why is it that the Lord's day is violated more than ever in our war industries? Sunday is God's day. For thousands of years it has been respected and observed by all Christian and civilized peoples. Do you believe, Mr. Speaker, that Christ, whose teachings are constant and eternal, will bless the success of our armies? Our Lord Jesus Christ decreed that Sunday must be observed as a day of rest and prayer. Those who violate His commandments must expect the worst catastrophes. Let the government stop everywhere, while there is still time, all work performed on Sundays, and God will bless the success of our armies.

Coming back to the necessity of maintaining and increasing our agricultural production, I wish to direct the attention of the house to numerous difficulties which face the farmers and gardeners when they wish to obtain the labour required to operate their farms. It is evident that at the present time our farmers are living through the most difficult period they have experienced for many years. In many cases they are driven to bankruptcy as a consequence of their being exploited by the trusts controlling feeding stuffs, chemical fertilizers, and all by-products of wheat such as bran and shorts. At times when wheat was worth 38 cents a bushel the farmers have had to pay as much as $3.40 and $3.60 for one hundred pounds of wheat flour. Feeding stuffs which three or four years ago they could buy for $19.80 a ton are now sold to them for as high as $38 a ton by the powerful companies which derive their profits from the sacrifices, the labour, and the misery of farmers and workers.

These monopolies will kill the production of bacon, cheese and butter in this country. Farmers tell me they are getting rid of their dairy cattle, and would sacrifice their bacon hogs rather than lose money on them every day. Others have already abandoned their farms because they cannot get labour. No farmer can face the actual agricultural situation without losing his savings and the capital which it took many years to build up. On top of all these vicissitudes he must bear daylight saving time. Anyone with the least knowledge of farm life would never impose daylight saving upon farmers. The government seems to think that the farmer does not experience enough difficulties yet in securing the required labour. Is there no expert on the department's staff who can tell the government that daylight saving time is very detrimental to the agricultural class? Is there no one who can show that harvesting cannot be done before the sun has dried up the dew which covers all fields at daybreak? Will the government ever be aware that the imposition of daylight saving time upon farmers deals a very hard blow to agriculture itself? Indeed, it deprives production of thousands and thousands of most precious hours, the hours which follow sunrise.

I see these gentlemen protesting that the farmer will work more and longer hours in the evening. No, Mr. Speaker, this argument is false, and invented in their imaginations. One cannot work in the fields at such a late hour because the dew has already descended. Why not maintain standard time in all rural municipalities? Daylight saving will save very little, if we look at the immense loss of time imposed upon agriculture.

A while ago I called to the attention of the government the evil doings of the trusts who exploit farmers and workers. During the months of October, November, and December last, the very companies I denounced a while ago bought from farmers potatoes at a price ranging from 40 to 50 cents a bag. These potatoes were stored away in huge quantities by financial sharks. The wartime prices and trade board set the maximum price for potatoes at $2 a bag. Once more the worker, the consumer and the farmer have been robbed. As for the government, it is still buying from Canada Packers, for army consumption, potatoes stored away by trusts who thus make profits of 250 per cent. The same story repeats itself. During the fall of 1940, for our military training camps the government bought butter from Canada Packers at prices as high as 36, 37 and 38 cents a pound. The same butter—that is, 60,000,000 pounds—was stored away by a gang of scoundrels who, during July, August and September, bought it from farmers at prices as low as 21, 22 and 23 cents a pound. At that time, Mr. Speaker, I protested against it in this very chamber. I was given the official figures, and the government set the price of butter at 34 cents a pound. It was too late. The people and the government had been robbed and exploited by unbridled profiteering which led democracy to the verge of the abyss.

Before concluding, I wish to point out to this house that the market gardener's co-operative association of the province of Quebec in the district of Montreal will be deprived of 6,000 to 8,000 experienced workers in 1942. Where are we heading for, if not for agricultural disaster? I had the same representations from the United Farmers. The Catholic farmers' union of Quebec also shares these views. We receive thousands of resolutions passed by county corporations and local municipalities requesting that farmers and farmers' sons be exempted from military training. If we do not grant the unanimous request of our agricultural classes, if we do not exempt from military service the employees of our war factories, we may justly fear great set-backs. Suppress the vital strength of our nation, its agriculture, its war factories, and you will see its first line of defence crumble; you will see the country fall into decay and ruin.

Consequently I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix):

That all the words after "this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers" in the amendment, be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"(a) did not deem it proper to advise Your Excellency that the government should adhere to its commitments and the terms of its mandate against conscription for overseas service which it received from the people of Canada at the general elections held on March 26, 1940;

(b) that the farmers, farm employees, fishermen, fisheries employees and all persons engaged in industries connected with agriculture or with war industries, should be exempt from military service."

Mr. HOMUTH: Why not add barbers and bakers?

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Before the vote is taken on the amendment I wish to say just a word or two. Amendments are sometimes peculiar things. We read part of them and we say we agree; we read another part of them and we say we disagree; and it is a case of deciding which part outweighs the other part, in order to know how to vote. That, Mr. Speaker, is the position in which we in this corner of the house find ourselves with respect to the amendment moved by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Hanson). There are some things in the amendment with which we agree—agree most heartily. I might suggest that paragraph (b), that the government have failed to "supply the imperative needs of agriculture, industry, and the fighting forces of the nation" is something with which we agree.

It is already recognized, of course, that we of this group represent constituencies in western Canada. For the most part our ridings are agricultural; and we agree that the government has failed, and miserably failed, to supply the needs of agriculture comparatively with the needs of other industries since the war began.

Before coming to Ottawa I took a trip through the eastern part of my constituency, and honestly I was ashamed that I lived in a country where the governmental administration of the nation was such as to bring upon the farmers of that constituency the embarrassment and suffering which it does. Men came to me almost crying, saying that they had met the government's request to reduce their wheat acreage and yet could not get their bonuses paid. I know that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) can rise in his place and say that perhaps something was wrong with this case or that case. I am not saying that there is anything particularly wrong with the fundamental principle underlying the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, but I do say that there is something miserably wrong with the administration of it. Men came to me almost crying, saying, "What am I to do? I have no money and the grocer will not let me have groceries on credit even though I am expecting a cheque any day from the government for my acreage reduction."

What could I tell these people? And that is the position not only in my constituency, but in many others. Indecision after indecision has resulted from some important point with respect to the administration of that act. Farmers who should have been paid last fall are not yet paid, and we receive letters every day asking what is wrong and why these farmers cannot get payment for their acreage bonus. That sort of thing should not go on in time of war when we desire our people to feel free to fight for a country that is worth fighting for. We are leaving in the minds of some of these people the thought that perhaps, after all, there is not very much to fight for. I do not like to think that: it should not be. I am perfectly satisfied that we have one of the greatest countries on God's earth. Then let us satisfy the needs of the people who belong to and are appealing to this nation.

The other paragraph reads that the government has failed to make mention of things with respect to preparation for the post-war period. I am not going to take time now to go into a discussion of what might happen in this matter, but I will say that not very much encouragement is offered to this country from the point of view of what will take place after this war is over, judging by what is happening to-day to the dependents of men who fought in the last war.

I have a letter which is only characteristic of many that we receive. It is characteristic of the underlying principle that the government has not been able to care for the veterans and their dependents who fought for this country to make it safe for democracy in the years from 1914 to 1918. I have a letter from a young lady whose mother is the widow of a man who fought for four years in the last war. Her dependent's allowance has now run out so that she is thrown on the rolls of public charity—a woman of 65. Listen to what this young woman has to say:

> My father was a veteran of the last great war and served at the front for four steady years. His number was 435830.

We may as well put this on the eternal records of this house.

> Upon his return, of course, he was honourably discharged. Well do I remember his homecoming and how shocked we were to see how greatly he had aged in those four years of absence from home. However, I am wandering from my point, upon obtaining the age of sixty he became entitled to a veteran's allowance of $40 per month, but as usual he was squeezed down to the magnificent sum of $25 per month upon which he and my mother were expected to live, or, should I say, expected to exist. His strength failed rapidly the latter part of his life; he suffered terribly from neuritis and bladder trouble, and finally in January he was told an operation would be necessary in order that he might live. In short, he had the operation and died at the age of sixty-three, leaving my mother, who is the same age, shocked, lonely and heart-broken, knowing full well those years spent in damp trenches had at last taken their toll.

What happened? The poor widow had nothing. She applied to the administration for assistance. What do they do? They round out the year by continuing to pay her $25 a month, and when the year ends she gets a notice that this is the final payment. I took this matter up with the department. Of course, we have our acts that govern the administration of these departments. I took it up with the department and got it in writing. I received a letter from them saying that they could no nothing for this woman. I want to read a part of the letter. This is from the war veterans' allowance board:

> I regret to inform you that there is absolutely nothing that can be done, under the terms of the War Veterans' Allowance Act, for . . .
> I am sorry that I cannot send you a more hopeful communication.

That is a very bright spot, is it not, in the administration of this country's affairs when we are fighting a war and asking young men to go to the front? I have two boys in the air force. What am I to think if I know that should they marry and come back and die, their widows will be turned over to public charity and be obliged to go and bow down in obeisance to the city fathers in order to get a hand-out? Is that the way we are going to treat them?

It is all very well for the department to say, "We regret to inform you that absolutely nothing can be done under the terms of the act." They attempt to hide behind some statute. Well, I am a preacher, but I would say, "damn the statute." Let us scrap the statute and put another one in its place in order to give something of encouragement to the aged mothers who have raised their families, struggled hard while their husbands were spending four years in damp trenches in the last war. The government by reason of the War Measures Act can contravene existing statutes; they can scrap them; they can change them while we are sitting right here. But when it comes to changing them in order to get a few dollars to the needy wives of our veterans, oh, no, no, they cannot do that! They then use the War Veterans' Allowance Act to hide behind.

I know they may say, "It will cost so much money." I know we have a war on and it takes money to fight a war. But before the war is over, we shall perhaps be raising and spending three or four billion dollars a year to blow into kingdom come, yet we cannot afford a few dollars to help the destitute widows of the soldiers who fought for this country.

With that part of the Conservative amendment this group heartily agrees. We are, however, going to vote against that amendment. We do so by reason of another part of it. I do not wish this statement to be interpreted that we are therefore voting on the side of the government; we are voting against the main motion too. Let me make this statement on behalf of this group. This group with which I am associated favours the general principle of plebiscites and referenda designed to determine the direct will of the people. We agree with that part of the Conservative amendment which asserts that by holding this plebiscite in the manner in which it is to be held the government is evading its responsibility. We favour also paragraphs (b) and (c) of the amendment, which state that the government has failed to supply the needs of agriculture and has neglected to make mention of post-war reconstruction. We shall oppose the amendment on the ground that we have no confidence in the Conservative party's stand on the mobilization of our wealth and material resources as suggested by their amendment. Nowhere in their speeches or their recommendations have they indicated that their idea of conscription of wealth and resources means the same as the conscription of finance as advocated by this group.

Mr. MacNICOL: What do you mean by conscription of finance?

Mr. HANSELL: I suggest that the hon. member ask his own leader, who himself says he wants to mobilize wealth.

Mr. MacNICOL: You said you did not agree with that; now what do you mean by it yourself?

Mr. HANSELL: Those who proposed this amendment have never asserted that there is any need for change in the basic principles now operative in the present privately controlled financial system.

Mr. F. G. HOBLITZELL (Eglinton): I am going to vote for the amendment to the motion, which implies endorsation of the plebiscite resolution, because I believe in the principle of universal compulsory selective service. If the amendment is defeated so that we cannot have immediate universal compulsory selective service, then I feel that the only course open to me is to vote for the main motion endorsing the plebiscite proposal to free the government from any election pledge given against conscription and thus allow it to bring in compulsory selective service if it will do so.

In pursuance of this reasoning I shall use what influence I have to induce the electors to vote "yes" on the plebiscite. If the plebiscite is carried, I shall then urge the government to introduce universal compulsory selective service immediately.

I would prefer the immediate release of the government from its anti-conscription commitments by a vote of this house, but since that does not appear to be feasible, I shall support the plebiscite on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread.

[Mr. Ian MacKenzie.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre) moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 6.30 p.m.

Friday, February 20, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

READING OF SPEECHES—FORTY MINUTE RULE—STATEMENT OF MR. SPEAKER

Mr. SPEAKER: I have a statement I should like to make to the house. Now that the debate on the address has been completed, I have been concerned with what I am sure has been evident to all members of the house, namely, the breach of the rule which deals with the reading of speeches. I would refer hon. members to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, at page 95, citation 293, which states:

Besides the prohibitions contained in this standing order, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not:

(o) read from a written, previously prepared speech.

As long ago as April 19, 1886, a resolution was adopted by the house, which reads:

That the growing practice in the Canadian House of Commons of delivering speeches of great length, having the character of carefully and elaborately prepared written essays, and indulging in voluminous and often irrelevant extracts, is destructive of legitimate and pertinent debate upon public questions, is a waste of valuable time, unreasonably lengthens the sessions of parliament, threatens by increased bulk and cost to lead to the abolition of the official report of the debates, encourages a discursive and diffuse, rather than an incisive and concise style of public speaking, is a marked contrast to the practice in regard to debate that prevails in the British House of Commons, and tends to repel the public from a careful and intelligent consideration of the proceedings of parliament.

During the course of the debate members have been reading from manuscripts without regard to the rule, and all sides of the house have practised it. I think that I express the general sense of the house when I say that this practice is to be deplored. It is true that the debate just completed was very important, as hon. members are likely to be quoted thereafter for their attitude now, and in consequence they wish to have the written word before them rather than rely on the inspiration of the moment to find the proper expressions. I wish to intimate to the house that I shall have to insist upon members observing the rule. I realize the difficulty of enforcing it and the chair can only do so with the positive support of all members.

On a former occasion I agreed, and the house consented, that when important statements involving government policy are made by ministers on behalf of the government, such statements could be read rather than expressed extemporaneously. This practice is, I understand, being followed in the British House of Commons and it has been extended here to include statements made by the official leader of the opposition, whose status is regulated by section 42 of the Senate and House of Commons Act, chapter 147.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer. That is standing order 37, which reads:

> No member except the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than forty minutes at a time in any debate.

The house in generous mood usually consents to an extension of this rule beyond the forty minutes. But I feel that hon. members rely upon the indulgence of the house to obtain extra time. It may be that some ministerial statements require a longer period than forty minutes, and it would be inappropriate and perhaps inadvisable that the rule should be applied to them Here, again, however, I think all such ministerial statements should be prepared in view of and be in conformity with the rules of the house. I must, therefore, point out that the Chair should not be placed in a position where discrimination is necessary and hon. members must realize that with every right to be heard in the house, such hearing must be subject to the rules of the house.

MAIN ESTIMATES 1942-43

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1943, was presented by Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE FOR GOVERNMENT BUSINESS ON AND AFTER MONDAY, FEBRUARY 23

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I should like to move the following motion:

> That on and after Monday, the twenty-third of February, 1942, to the end of the present session government notices of motion and government orders shall have precedence at every sitting over all other business except the introduction of bills, questions by members, and notices of motions for the production of papers.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had rather assumed that in the absence of this notice the government would have been disposed to give a few days to the discussion of private members' motions. I know the practice we followed in the previous sessions of this parliament. At the first session we were all very much obsessed and upset by the course of the war and I agreed to the waiving of the rule at that time. At the second session the Prime Minister urged the same reasons for such a motion, and now after almost a month or four weeks of this session, private members, in the absence of any notice to the contrary, had assumed, I think, that some provision would be made for discussion of their motions. My hon. friend the member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) has a motion on the order paper which he is prepared to discuss on Monday, and which in the absence of this notice he had the right to assume he would be within his rights in presenting to the house. I do think that the Prime Minister should not press this motion to-day but leave at least one day open for the discussion of private members' motions. It is not very much to ask for. I do not see how otherwise we could get consent to this motion being brought down at such a late date. I would ask the Prime Minister to let private members have at least one Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that this matter was raised at an early stage of the session and at the time I replied, as I recall it, to the effect that the arguments which had weighed with the Commons in previous years were even stronger this year, and I assumed that the house would so regard them. I must say that the government does so regard them. We believe that the international situation is more critical at this time than it has been at any other time since the commencement of the war and that government business ought to be proceeded with as rapidly as possible, particularly that part of it which relates directly to the war.

Much has been said in the debate on the address about the time that must elapse before the plebiscite can be held. A month has been taken in debate on the address, in which private members have had the opportunity to speak on different matters, and if I were to meet my hon. friend's wish and have Monday next devoted to private members' resolutions, that would again delay the progress of the legislation with respect to the plebiscite.

I expect to announce a little later this afternoon that a secret sitting of the house will be held on Tuesday afternoon. I must say that I think hon. members will upon reflection see that there are strong reasons why the time of the house should not be taken up with a discussion of private members' resolutions until at least very considerable headway has been made with government business.

As to the particular request which my hon. friend has made in respect to one of the members of his party who had expected to speak to his motion on Monday, it will be recognized at once that were I to meet his wish, much as I might desire to, I would be discriminating against other hon. members who may equally wish to speak on their motions, some of which may even appear on the order paper before that of my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, his is No. 1.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, if we allow No. 1 to proceed, No. 2 will wish to have his say as well. I would ask the house to consent to the passing of this motion to-day so that on Monday we may continue with government business.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, if I may say a word. I agree with the Prime Minister that the house has had a very long debate in which a number of matters have been discussed thoroughly. I think now the country would expect us to get on with government business connected with the war. We should proceed without delay. But I do say this to the Prime Minister, that opportunity should be given to the private members to move their resolutions on the order paper, and I would suggest that, either by consent or by a change in the rules, time be allowed towards the end of the session for private members to present and debate their motions. There are occasions during the session, too, when government business is not always ready for presentation to the house, and it might be possible on such occasions, if sufficient notice were given to members who have resolutions on the order paper, to allow them to be proceeded with then. But I would urge that all of us forego the particular matters which we wish to discuss that are not related to the war effort and that we make every effort to speed up the business of the house, which, I take it, at the present session will be devoted mainly to the war. So far as we are concerned we shall be glad to support the government in speeding up its efforts in that regard.

So far as resolution No. 1 on the order paper is concerned, we are very much interested in that motion, but I understand that a statement will be made regarding its subject matter, and may I suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) that it be made as soon as possible.

With these qualifications we agree to what the Prime Minister has suggested.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I find that the hon. member for Rosetown-biggar (Mr. Coldwell) does not give me any support, and I certainly do not want to be the hold-out. I am not usually that type. I have just conferred with my colleague, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), and while he is anxious to debate his resolution he advises me that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has given an undertaking that the wheat question will be the subject of a bill which will be brought down and debated in due course and referred, I understand, to the committee on agriculture. At that time he will have the opportunity which the moving of his resolution would have afforded him in the house. On that theory he is quite content to waive any rights he has. Of course, if notice of this motion had been given yesterday, we would not be having this debate at the moment. Rather reluctantly I am going to give my consent to the motion of the Prime Minister.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house will unite with them in the formation of a joint committee of both houses on the subject of the printing of parliament, and that the members of the standing committee on printing, viz., Messieurs Bercovitch, Bertrand (Terrebonne), Blanchette, Bourget, Casselman (Grenville-Dundas), Castleden, Chambers, Chevrier, Claxton, Corman, Denis, Dubois, Dupuis, Durocher, Edwards, Emmerson, Esling, Evans, Ferland, Fleming, Fraser (Peterborough West), Furniss, Goulet, Grant, Green, Hallé, Healy, Hlynka, Hoblitzell, Hurtubise, Kuhl, Leader, MacDiarmid, MacKinnon (Kootenay East), MacLean (Cape Breton North-Victoria), McGregor, McNevin (Victoria, Ont.), Mills, Moore, Mulock, Nicholson, Purdy, Rhéaume, Ross (St. Paul's), Sinclair, Sissons, Soper, Tucker, Tustin, Weir, White, Whitman, Winkler and Wood, will act as members on the part of this house, on the said joint committee on the printing of parliament.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has appointed the honourable the Speaker and Messieurs Adamson, Aylesworth, Black (Chateauguay-Huntingdon), Bruce, Cardiff, Casselman (Grenville-Dundas), Castleden, Emmerson, Eudes, Farquhar, Fontaine, Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont), Gershaw, Goulet, Graham, Green, Henderson, Howden, Hurtubise, Jaques, Jean, Lizotte, Macdonald (Halifax), MacKenzie (Neepawa), MacKenzie (Lambton-Kent), Macmillan, Marier, Martin, Mayhew, Moore, Poirier, Pouliot, Purdy, Raymond, Reid, Rickard, Ross (St. Paul's), Shaw, Telford, Thauvette, Warren, Winkler, Wood and Woodsworth a committee to assist his honour the Speaker in the direction of the library of parliament, so far as the interests of the Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a joint committee of both houses on the library.

Motion agreed to.

SECRET SESSION OF THE HOUSE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF DATE—PROHIBITION OF UNAUTHORIZED REPORTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on any day set aside for that purpose by the house without notice having been previously given, the sitting of the house shall be a secret session until the house shall then otherwise order, and that all strangers be ordered to withdraw during such secret session; provided however, that this order shall not affect the privilege enjoyed by members of the Senate of being present at debates in this house.

He said: This resolution is similar to one which was passed by this house during the war, in 1918, when a secret session of the House of Commons was held. The motion at that time fixed a definite day. The present motion, as hon. members will see, leaves the date to be arranged by agreement.

In the British House of Commons, in order to protect secrecy, there has been passed under the authority of the Emergency Power (Defence) Act, 1939, the following regulation:

His Majesty, in pursuance of section one of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, and of all other powers enabling him in that behalf, is pleased, by and with the advice of his privy council, to order, and it is hereby ordered that regulation three of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (a), shall have effect as if at the end thereof there were inserted the following paragraphs:—

(2) If either house of parliament in pursuance of a resolution passed by that house holds a secret session, it shall not be lawful for any person in any newspaper, periodical, circular or other publication, or in any public speech, to publish any report of, or to purport to describe, the proceedings at that session, except such report or description thereof as may be officially communicated through the press and censorship bureau.

The government has thought it advisable to enact a similar regulation, adding it to the defence of Canada regulations, in the following terms:

39AA. If the Senate or House of Commons, in pursuance of a resolution, holds a secret session, no person shall in any newspaper, periodical, circular or other publication, or in any public speech, publish any report or description of the proceedings at that session, except such report or description thereof as may be officially communicated through the Speaker of the House.

As to the time of the secret session, I have had a conference with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and also with the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore), and we have agreed that Tuesday afternoon would be the most convenient time at which to hold the secret session. I might say there is a special reason for selecting Tuesday, inasmuch as the Senate has been adjourned until Tuesday next, and as senators will have the privilege of being present in the gallery when the secret session is held, it would obviously be desirable to have the sitting held on a day that senators were likely to be here. I have nothing else to add at the moment.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I do not rise for the purpose of either debating or opposing the resolution to which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has referred. I note that the terms of the resolution are quite general; it does not limit the action of the house to any one particular secret session, but it contemplates other secret sessions if they are found necessary or desirable or are asked for. I did not understand that such would be in the motion; however, I am not objecting to that, because it may become necessary to hold further secret sessions.

I am not at all optimistic that a secret session will be of great value, because it seems to me that we cannot possibly use any information which we get there—especially in view of the amendment to the defence of Canada regulations to which the Prime Minister has alluded. At the same time, it will afford to hon. members an opportunity of putting questions to the ministers, and I hope that some useful purpose will be served.

I am curious to know who will prepare the official report which is to be given to the public.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Speaker.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It says that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not in the resolution; in the order in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, the order in council? I have not had that before me. It, of course, will be official, coming from that source. I am content to leave the matter at that for the moment.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I am opposed to the passage of this proposed motion for the reason that it upsets the whole constitutional practice of the British empire since we have been an empire. What does the motion say? I quote:

> That on any day set aside for that purpose by the house without notice having been previously given. . . .

You will observe those words, Mr. Speaker, "without notice." In the parliament of Great Britain notice is given, sometimes a week or ten days ahead. Yesterday notice was given for a two-day session, grand assize to inquire into the whole war, to be held in the open House of Commons but not in secret session. The resolution goes on to say:

> . . . the sitting of the house shall be a secret session.

Matters of the utmost importance will be discussed in that session. Talk about having a judge inquire into Hong Kong and Singapore! I have in my hand here volume 377 of the Parliamentary Debates of Great Britain, 173 pages, dealing with all phases of the war in the Pacific and all other theatres. All these questions are discussed in public with pages of criticism. The same is true of Australia.

My first objection to this motion is that the functions of parliament are being taken away from us with all these secret bodies that have been appointed. In fact, parliament is looked upon by the government as a nuisance—here to-day and gone to-morrow. They have closed the doors upon us. The last clause of the resolution declares that the privilege enjoyed by members of the Senate, of being present at debates in this house, shall not be affected —a sop to the senators. Well, the senate have been here for four hours since last June, without duties to perform. Three sessions ago I asked the government so to arrange matters as to provide more work for the other house of parliament. That other house is composed of men of ability and they should be given more to do.

My main objection to the resolution is that no secret committee or private caucus should decide these questions, because we are simply turning over the whole military work of the nation to a political body. Military problems should be dealt with by the military authorities and the army council. Of course, there are certain state secrets that should not be given away even to this parliament. That holds true in the old land. There are state secrets of such importance to the safety of the realm that they should not be divulged even to members of parliament. My objection, however, is taken on this ground, that this is more or less a political body, and we are supposed to meet in public and not in secret. We should not ask the heads of the services to come into this chamber, with the doors locked, in a sort of star chamber, to answer questions. We are only wasting the time of the heads of the departments. Military strategy is for military experts, not for us.

Under responsible government there are ministers who are answerable to parliament, and they are the ones who should answer here any questions that are to be asked. We have had only a political administration of the war, as I have mentioned before. As regards the troops in England, we were told at the fall session that it would be the government of Canada who in the last resort would say where they should be dispatched. I have the exact words on record here in Hansard of November 6 and 7 last.

The ordinary member of parliament is in a critical position in this war. There are ministers in the government who have the direction of affairs relating to his majesty's forces, and perhaps they cannot always, for reasons of state, give a direct reply to questions. But I do not like to have criticisms of his majesty's forces. There are three splendid soldiers who are in charge of departments having to do with affairs relating to the military forces, and who served their country well in the last war. Criticism is the function of this house, and it should be made in public. Moreover, the opposition has a duty to perform publicly. We should know the facts. That is what is wrong with our war effort. For five years before the war the people were in the dark; they were not given any facts even in this house. They were given just so much information, so much of the facts, as their rulers wanted them to know.

In a war like this, criticism is necessary, and it is the duty of every member of parliament, if he is sincere and considers the issues well, to do what he can to give constructive criticism. This should not be regarded as being necessarily an attack on the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or on any member of the government or on the government itself, because no member of any government is infallible. We all make mistakes, even the greatest leaders. Napoleon and Nelson both made their mistakes, and Great Britain has never had a greater leader than its present Prime Minister, no man comparable as a leader except, perhaps, the great Pitt, and yet he made mistakes in the long war with Napoleon.

The question of tactics is one that should be the responsibility of our military commanders and military council. The trouble is that we have been disregarding this principle; that is the reason for most of the mistakes that have been made in the war by the allies. Mistakes have occurred in consequence of political interference with army, naval and air force commanders. That is so in the Pacific and it was so in Libya, Greece and Singapore. The direction of the war, and all questions of strategy, should rest with the militia council, the purely civilian function of administration being the direct responsibility of a war cabinet. And here let me say that we should have had a war cabinet long ago and an all allied war council also.

I have already said that in my opinion this motion is not in order. If it passes, the rules of the house will be changed.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I call attention to the fact that the hon. member is committing a breach of the rule to which I referred this afternoon. He is reading his speech.

Mr. CHURCH: I am referring to the present system and the changes which are being made in our parliamentary practice, and quoting Hansard. I am pointing out, Mr. Speaker, that under our present parliamentary system this motion is not in order, but will be if it passes. There are permanent officials who are able to look into these problems. It should be the duty of the militia council to consider the questions which it is proposed to bring before us. What do I know about military matters? I have never been a military man, and I know nothing whatever about military tactics and strategy. I am only a common or garden variety member of parliament. What does the combined membership of this house know about military problems, except for those hon. members who have served overseas? As I say, there are three ministers of the government who have had considerable war experience, and in my opinion we should be very reluctant to take out of their hands and out of the hands of the army council the administration of a war like this. We do not know where it will end.

I do not wish to reflect on our parliamentary system, but even in the old country the Prime Minister there has said that the present political system is not sufficient to cope with all the changes that are taking place. In the old days wars lasted for a few weeks, now they last for years. The enemy is coming pretty close now; we must prepare to meet him at the gate. If we are to change the procedure of parliament, let us do it in a lawful way. I wish to commend you, Mr. Speaker, for the fair way you have presided, because I think not only have you added to the dignity of parliament, but in the last weeks you and your splendid clerk of the house have almost saved parliament itself.

If the government have some new method by which they want to conduct the business of the house, well and good. I contend there should be an empire war cabinet, and we should have an allied war cabinet with the United States and the Netherlands in it, so as to have a united effort in this war. The war has now lasted for two and a half years, and what has been done in reference to the houses of parliament? Nothing has been done. In the past two and a half years we have failed to achieve production sufficient for a total war effort. It is too late to change that system now or the methods which are being used in a parliamentary way. We have staked all the assets of this country on this war to defeat Germany and Japan; we should exert ourselves to get a system and machinery of government which would be more efficient than a proposal to sit in caucus or private session and have questions asked. The enemy I believe are superior in their strategy in these matters.

The method I would propose would be, instead of our meeting in secret, to have an army council and the three ministers meeting with them to decide all these matters of strategy in military affairs. We have made mistakes in the past; I believe they have all made mistakes. The government should not be afraid to tell the people of Canada that they have made mistakes, because the people do not expect their leaders and governments to be gods. They all make mistakes. But I say if we are to be efficient and achieve our ends in this war, we shall have to be more active. The parliament of Canada too often forgets that we are part of an empire—the British empire. Meeting in secret in this way we forget that we have a duty to the other dominions and the mother country. We should not allow secret meetings to interfere with that duty.

It is contended by some that by having this secret session, members of parliament will be enabled to get some news to reach the public and give members an opportunity to question the government. The effect of the whole thing will, in my opinion, be bad. The other dominions, whose efforts are as great as ours, have been left out of consideration in this motion. In my judgment Canada's parliament should not meet in secret; Canada can afford to state her case and her policy before the court of public opinion of the world. We have a strong case, and the case has been made clear by this parliament. We cannot conduct a grand inquest or assize into this war behind closed doors. I am opposed to the motion.

What about the press? The press of this country has been doing a magnificent work and giving leadership in this war all over Canada. Some journals have raised great war funds, such as the Evening Telegram's British war victims' fund in Toronto; yet the press is being left out in the cold. The press was the main factor in England before the war when all the leaders over there were pacifists and the people listened to the babble of pacifists and tossed away all their defences; it was the press that opened their eyes and brought them around. They made us realize that the enemy is at our gates.

We have no mandate from the people to upset these constitutional practices by secret meetings in a great war like this. In the last war only one secret meeting was held. The people want to know the facts, the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth about our war effort. No one wants any military or state secrets revealed; they should not be revealed even at a secret meeting. Some of these secrets should be known only to the king and his military advisers and relate to the defence of the realm.

I shall oppose the motion. The people have not been given sufficient information either before or since the war began. They are totally ignorant of the main problems. On March 21, 1939, on a motion to go into supply I urged the government to give the people the facts, and I quoted what Prime Minister Chamberlain said in England that if the people are not allowed to know the facts concerning the danger at their gates, if they are allowed to know only what their leaders want them to know, that course leads to danger. Within five or six months of that time war was declared, and the people did not know the facts even then.

The motion has connection also with the bureaucrats and boards and commissions, numbering, with employees, some 3,500 to 4,000, who have been appointed and are taking away the functions of this parliament whether we meet in public or in private. They have taken our functions; they have upset the rules and regulations and changed the whole purpose and intent of parliament, with their press agents, radio spokesmen and these other officers that have been appointed. About the only intimations and information given to the public that are not under the control of this magnificent information bureau are the Votes and Proceedings and orders of the day. Everything you read has to be stamped with a badge showing it to be issued under the authority, advice and consent of this wonderful department and its minister, this information bureau and the minister thereof, and even at that the public are not getting much information. Then you have a secret service, unnamed spokesmen on the radio almost every night. I call them the ghosts behind the scenes, dealing with all these matters.

Sometimes the information given by this standing army of officials is only half the truth. All kinds of bureaucratic orders are issued by them, involving fines and gaol penalties over the head of parliament. Gradually the functions of this parliament are being taken away altogether. A civil war was fought in England for nearly one hundred years over just this question of the control of the public expenditure and to have their representatives in parliament made responsible to the people. Now the principle fought for in that war has been altogether upset. Are we just to act the part of yes-men and nodders of approval of everything the bureaucratic dollar-a-year men pass? Goodness knows they are passing enough. One czar announces he is going to take the cuffs off the trousers of members of parliament, they are going to abolish ties, they are not going to let the well-groomed Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) wear vests any more, and all that kind of thing, and in the women's column and the society column there are pages of what is to be cut out. Who is paying for it over the head of this parliament and we know nothing about it? This is absolutely illegal, and has been done without the consent of the houses of parliament. We have never heard a word about it, yet penalties and fines up to $5,000 are announced every day by these people, who form what is almost a separate parliament by themselves as czars and dictators. The rules and regulations they pass have the force of statutes, without the knowledge and authority of this parliament, but now we are going to impose more secret government upon the people in the way indicated of a secret session of this house. These boards, commissions and so on are usurping the powers of parliament; they even exercise control over members of the cabinet by the orders they issue secretly. Some of this may be and is necessary to a limited extent. The radio is another secret institution. The Department of External Affairs, as I have contended for some years has been conducted as though its business was its own, without parliament being given all the facts.

That is not the way in which things are done in England. There they publicly debated the whole Pacific question, the collapse of Singapore and everything else. The British Hansard contains sixty-five pages of questions and answers and statements made in the house by responsible ministers. Some of the questions were asked in the house by government supporters, admirals, major-generals, some of the finest soldiers to serve in the last war and many of whom are serving in this war as well. All these matters were discussed in public there; and no questions were asked, and no information given, which would reveal any particular military secrets. We are in the very darkest hour of the war, and this is no time to withold anything from either the public or the press. The real facts and the real picture should be given. As I have said, I believe the press has a great function and duty to perform. It is a connecting link between the government and the electors, as members of parliament are; and the censorship over the press, instead of being further extended, should be abolished altogether. In my opinion the opposition have been led into a trap by supporting this move to meet in secret. In Australia the prime minister, Mr. Curtin, and the leader of the opposition, Mr. Hughes, who was in Canada many times during the last war, have spoken strongly on the whole question of publicity and criticism of our war effort and the danger ahead. They have done splendid work in asserting the rights of Australia as a dominion. Sometimes, when I see what little information we are given compared with the information given in the Australian parliament and when I see the dictators at their doors I think we have let Australia down in not making greater efforts to help her by the Singapore base in 1937-38. The very life of the British commonwealth is at stake, yet we go ahead holding secret meetings, plebiscites, and all that sort of thing.

It is my belief, Mr. Speaker, that anything that might be accomplished in secret, with reference to the Pacific question, could be better accomplished publicly in this house. We have met intermittently; on again, off again, on again; and one branch is here very seldom. Its members have been sent home, with no war work to do. Instead of having this secret meeting of the house, we should have a reallocation of duties as between the two houses of parliament, in connection with the war. It may be too late now to do very much about the Pacific coast. Our belated air bases and the proposed road through British Columbia will get us nowhere without the most important thing of all, supremacy on the sea. Information in this connection should be given the house publicly, not in secret.

I have a great deal of respect for the Prime Minister. I believe he has worked hard, and in many ways I think the government have done a good job, except in regard to manpower. But I believe the government misjudged the whole European situation, as well as the Pacific question. I believe it would be far better for the Prime Minister to make a statement in this house, similar to that made in the British house with regard to the Pacific, Singapore, Hong Kong, and all the other places, and have a two-day debate. This is a story that goes back twenty years.

Canada, as a part of the British empire, has no divine right to expect victory, or that victory may be attained by secret meetings. The path is going to be more difficult from now on. As I said in this house four years ago, on February 12, 1938, we were short-sighted in not backing the Singapore base as New Zealand and Australia did; and now it is too late. The government seems to think there is a royal road to victory, and as a result we have neglected to prepare for war on land, sea or in the air. Victory will come only with resolute leadership, a total war effort, service and real sacrifice. There is no use in talking about victory, as though it would be ours by divine law; we can gain victory only by telling the people the truth, by facing the real facts and building upon the worst of them.

The time has come when Canada must decide whether or not she will do her duty, when the government must speak to the people and let them know the facts. Man-power is the main issue, whether it is discussed in public or in secret. By proposing to hold this secret caucus we are upsetting the practice that has existed for the last two or three hundred years. Up to the present all our meetings have been held in public. I often feel that they have not been adequately reported by the press, but often you cannot blame the press because in many ways parliament has simply effaced itself by allowing its functions, privileges and powers to be taken away and given to these bureaucratic boards, with a resulting lack of information. It seems to me the government is always very glad to see the House of Commons go home, to get rid of it, in order to have a breathing spell and conduct the war itself.

I am afraid of this secret meeting; I am afraid we are falling into a trap. I do not want this motion to pass without a protest, because as soon as the motion passes we create a precedent for the separatists and isolationists of the future, for those only too eager and anxious in the future to initiate the methods of Hitler and Mussolini. I believe I represent a large body of public opinion which is opposed to any such principle. I do not want to see the House of Commons dealt with in this way. So far as I know, there is nothing to meet about in private. The question of the security of the Malay peninsula was dealt with in public in the British house, where they have also discussed Libya, Greece, Crete, Singapore, and all the other places. Only the other day Prime Minister Churchill discussed the very thing about which we are to meet in private; and what did he say to the British house? He said we had to send to Russia tanks, aeroplanes and other equipment that had been destined for Libya and various other places. Then he went on to say that the fall of Singapore had very gravely affected command of the sea; and, after all, it is Britain's command of the sea that enables Russia to obtain supplies of all kinds from the United Kingdom and the United States. At the present time that command is seriously threatened. That was what he told the British House of Commons in public, and that is the very thing about which we are to meet in secret. Unfortunately Japan has obtained temporary command of the sea in the Pacific. You can meet in secret all you like; Japan has that command, and that is a terrible thing for the British empire.

For the first time in many years we find Great Britain committed to an important campaign in the Pacific at a time when she has commitments in other places. The United States cannot now get a fleet across the Pacific because she has no bases and Singapore has fallen. This is the kind of information we may get, and it has all been given publicly in the British Hansard and by the British Prime Minister. Great Britain and the United States have not full command of the seas because their lines of communication will be broken by raiders. Japan is even in a position to land forces. This is what is happening while we are sitting here.

This is not the time for us to embark upon this new secret course. The losses sustained yesterday in our own navy amounted to 55 men. We have a duty to the rest of the dominions and the rest of the empire. Nothing should be done to change our constitution because we are entering the darkest hour of the war. Great Britain had to do everything alone up until the end of last June. We now have two active allies. Russia has been a revelation and her military strength has saved Great Britain. Otherwise, the mechanized hordes might be now in Great Britain. We are going to have dark days ahead, and I was hoping that some information would be given to the people. I believe the proposed secret session is a retrograde step.

The press has been eliminated by this motion. The press has been a great factor in giving information to the public of this country, and we owe a great deal to it. Were it not for the press and the money it has spent, the people would not know anything. The establishment of the information bureau was a reflection upon our press. During the last war there was no censorship of the press in effect. Mr. Chambers, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod was the censor. We should follow the lead of England where there is no censorship. The editors of the papers are directly responsible. This will be the first time in the history of this House of Commons where the press has not been present, except the one meeting which was held in the days of Sir Robert Borden.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I think we are all anxious to get more information, but after we do get the information in the secret session which is to be held, how are we going to impart that to our constituents? The people of the country are the ones who really want information. I know that we as members of parliament will be satisfied, but if the information which we hope to get is given to us then, a tremendous responsibility will be thrown upon us. We will be laying ourselves open to criticism or suspicion if any information given in this secret session should get out. It is a detriment to the freedom of parliament. Of course I am willing to take that chance, as are other members. I have made up my mind that I shall see what comes forth in this secret session, but if I do not think sufficient information is being given, I shall not attend further sessions as a result of which I might lay myself open to criticism.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister if every Tuesday is to be set aside for a secret session. The wording of the motion is:

That on any day set aside for that purpose by the house without notice having been previously given—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I propose to move a resolution in a moment, fixing Tuesday, February 24, as the day.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Will that be every Tuesday?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not quite understand how you are going to do it.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before the discussion closes I should like to say a few words because I am very strongly in favour of the holding of a secret session. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) always interests me because he is so typically Conservative. He does not like a change except when it suits his own convenience. As for the argument that this upsets the whole procedure of the British empire for the past several centuries, if we accept this view then perhaps we should regret very much that this same procedure has been upset about once a week during the last year at Westminster itself. We are following good British precedents in holding a session of this description when it is thought necessary.

We want to know something of the government's difficulties. There is information which we cannot get in public because the questions we might ask would give information to the enemy. We are not holding this secret session, as the hon. member for Broadview seems to suggest, in order to badger officials of the Department of National Defence or any other department. I imagine that the only people who will be present at the session will be the responsible ministers, the officials of the house, members of parliament and members of the other place if they care to occupy seats in the gallery. Consequently there will be no opportunity, nor will there be any desire, to pillory anyone in connection with our war effort.

I feel sure that after members of parliament have had the opportunity of asking questions of an intimate nature and receiving replies, they will be in a much better position to decide what questions it is in the public interest to ask the government in the public sessions of parliament. In war time there are matters which we dare not raise on the floor of this house. Several times during the debate on the address some hon. members came very close to asking for information that ought not to have been asked for. On one or two occasions ministers themselves, in placing publicly before the house details regarding equipment and so on, divulged information that might be of interest to the enemy. Of course that was because members of the house sought the information in the only way in which it could be sought.

The object of this secret session, from my own point of view at least, is not to pillory the government, not to indulge in criticism of the government in secret—I shall do that in public—but to gain all the information we possibly can so that we may be able to discuss matters intelligently on the floor of this house.

May I say that I am sorry the government has decided that the inquiry into the Hong Kong affair shall also be held in camera.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government did not decide that. The chief justice made his own decision.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sorry that the commissioner so decided. I cannot think that any of the facts upon which a judgment could be based in connection with that episode ought to be withheld from the public. It is thoroughly in the public interest that the facts in connection with it should be given.

So far as the secret session of the house is concerned, let us understand among ourselves that—as in Great Britain and as, I believe, in Australia and New Zealand, where secret sessions have been held—it is not being held in order that members may pillory, criticize or do anything else of the kind to the government, but rather that we may obtain information which because of the war situation could not be given publicly and upon which we may base considered and careful comment afterward.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who during the last twelve months have found it necessary on a score of occasions to withdraw from secret sessions which have been held on matters of great concern and of like nature to the one now under consideration. I realize and recognize the gravity of the present situation and am anxious that everything that can be done shall be done, and accordingly I shall revise my conduct and sit in at this secret session of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): When I say that, Mr. Speaker, may I add, in reply to the "hear, hear" which came from the rear, that the basis of my conduct in this matter is a little different from that which obtained on a previous occasion. The previous occasion to which I refer, sir, had to do with the conduct of the war expenditures committee. There will be a time and place when we can debate that matter, but in the meantime I address myself to this particular question.

One other observation I should like to make, and it is that the report of this session is in very able hands, being in the hands of the Speaker. I recognize that we are not now in committee of the whole and that we cannot by question and answer get information from the Prime Minister as to the wisdom of having you alone, sir, assume that great responsibility. The thought ran through my mind that you might wish to have someone, the leaders of the parties perhaps, associated with you in the task of drawing up that report, but on reflection I am of the opinion that it might better be left to Mr. Speaker to draft the report of the secret session. All hon. members of goodwill in this house in the one task which is predominant in our minds will, I hope, be satisfied with that report. Nevertheless, in a democratic institution, we must reserve our right not necessarily to concur in the report which after careful consideration emanates from Your Honour. I felt that I ought to make a statement of this kind, Mr. Speaker, so that you would have in mind the feeling of some of the members in this very difficult time. I am confident that the report may well rest in your hands.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have on one or two occasions been a member of committees which were supposed to hold their sittings in camera. I quite understand that there may be a slight difference in interpretation as to committees holding their sittings in camera and committees holding their sittings in secret. But whether it be in camera or in secret, the result of information getting out from those committess is just as serious as the result of information getting out from a secret session of this house. Yet to my amazement I have discovered that not only has information gone forth from committees that have been held in camera, but it has actually been printed in the press and blazed before the public. I objected to that on one occasion, and perhaps I shall do so again. Because of that I believe that when a secret session is held it should be regarded as secret by every member, and not one word should be breathed outside of what has gone on inside the chamber during the secret session.

May I add that I am a strong believer in the administration of law and justice. I do not suppose that I shall ever be a judge. I hope I never am, because I am afraid that I would be a little hard upon those who break the law. When people go out deliberately and utter words of a subversive nature they should be punished. Yet, though I say that, I am rather inclined to think that to put members of parliament under the defence of Canada regulations because of this secret session is perhaps not just the best thing. Personally I find difficulty in thinking my way through the question who is to determine whether or not some utterance made on a public platform was made on the basis of what the speaker might have heard at a secret session of this house.

I would also ask the Prime Minister whether a Hansard report will be kept of the secret session. If such a report is kept I do not see that it could be a secret session. If it is not kept, who is to know whether this or that member has revealed something secret after the session is over? I am wondering whether a better method of dealing with any such betrayal of information would not be to bring the member before the bar of this house. I offer that as a suggestion.

One further question. During the secret session are we to understand that the house will go into committee of the whole in order that questions may be asked? I am one of those who have in the past advocated a secret session every once in a while. I agree with the hon. member who leads our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation; I have no desire whatsoever to badger the government or put forth any political arguments or put the government on the spot in any particular, but there are some things which I believe the members of the House of Commons should know in order to be able better to serve this country. That is my attitude. At present we are in the dark on many matters of public concern. I have had people ask me things about which they have obtained information somewhere but about which I have not known a thing; I am in the dark about them, and I am certain that all members feel as I do in that respect. I think the secret session will serve a good purpose if the government will be absolutely open and free to say, "Gentlemen, this is the situation; there it is; now, what can we do to benefit that particular thing?" If the government will be absolutely open and frank I am sure that it will receive the cooperation, and not the opposition, of members of this house in a secret session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word in reference to some of the remarks that have been made.

First of all, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) drew attention to the wording of the resolution itself. I agree with him that it is a little ambiguous. The explanation is that at the time the resolution was placed on the order paper it was impossible to say what day could be fixed for the secret session; I knew that hon. members desired to be assured that a secret session would be held very soon. I accordingly had the notice placed on the order paper to provide for an early date. In order to remove ambiguity and to place the matter in a shape which I think would be preferable, I would ask the house to allow me to amend the resolution before it is put to the house by Mr. Speaker so that it may read:

> That on Tuesday, the twenty-fourth instant, the sitting of the house shall be a secret session until the house . . .

Et cetera. That removes any ambiguity about secret sessions being held from week to week, or anything of the kind, and is, I think, preferable in every way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what I thought it would be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; my hon. friend says he thought it would be that. The intention of the government was simply to make the resolution broad enough to fix a day, but it was not intended that there should be a series of secret sittings of the house.

Mr. SENN: Will the sitting be confined to one day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope it will not occupy an entire day, but I cannot say how long it will last. We will see what time is necessary when the sitting actually takes place.

May I say this with respect to the secret session, particularly in view of what has been said this afternoon? At the previous session a request was made for a secret session of the house. The government has not met that request up to the present time. We thought it was inadvisable for many reasons to have secret sessions if they could possibly be avoided. But when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked at the beginning of this session if a day could be fixed for a secret session, I felt, and my colleagues agreed with me, that to refuse that request would cause the government to appear to be unwilling to give information to hon. members which they ought to have and which they could not obtain in any other way. We agreed to the secret session in order that we might not be misunderstood with respect to our wish not to withhold anything that hon. members desired to have in the way of information and which we of the government were in a position to give.

But may I say to hon. members that there is great force in much that has been said this afternoon by some hon. members who have evidently been giving this matter a great deal of thought. If the session related to a matter which concerned Canada only and to giving information which would concern Canada alone, I should feel that the responsibility upon the ministry was much less than it is in the light of a situation such as exists in the world to-day. Canada's war effort is bound up with the war efforts of all parts of the British empire. It is also linked now not only with the war effort of the United States but also with those of the united nations, some twenty-six in number; and our plans, as I think is generally known, are related to the combined plans, in so far as they have thus far been combined, of all the nations which are allied with us in the war. It is going to be exceedingly difficult for the government to disclose much information with respect to questions which will arise in the minds of many hon. members, without giving information which, if it were ever publicly disclosed, would react, not against the government of Canada, but against the war effort of the combined nations; and I want to make it perfectly clear that when the secret session is held the government will have to keep constantly in mind that great and very grave responsibility.

I do not mind saying that time and again we have received communications from England regretting that we had found it necessary to make certain statements in this parliament with respect to some phases of our war effort, particularly in answering questions as to the extent of equipment and production in certain directions, and the like. These things may not appear to us to have the significance which others attach to them. But in relation to a war effort so closely knit as this is, between many nations, and directed against a foe who stops at nothing to obtain information on every single point about which it is possible to acquire information, the responsibility of giving any information other than that which can be communicated in open parliament is very grave indeed.

Now, I have confidence in the honour and integrity of all hon. members; but when I acknowledge that personally I repeatedly find it very difficult, while in conversation with different persons, quite unconsciously not to tell something which is in the nature of a state secret, I can imagine how difficult it is going to be for many hon. members who, perhaps, have not to reserve their words with the same caution that I have to apply to my own, to avoid, in the course of conversations with friends or on occasions when some particular point is raised, not to unwittingly give out information which has been obtained at a secret session, never thinking it to be of the significance which in fact it may have. I had thought that when the session was being held I might say a word of caution in this connection, but perhaps it is as well that it should be said now. What I wish, however, to make clear, and I would like the country to understand it, is that the government is not asking the house to meet in secret session in order that it may disclose something which it regards as critical or as otherwise necessitating a secret session. It is seeking, rather, to meet the wish of some hon. members to get information which otherwise they might not be in a position to secure.

My understanding with regard to the secret sessions held in Britain—and I have taken occasion to make careful inquiries—is that such sessions are usually held at the instance of the government itself, where the Prime Minister has some statement which he thinks it is desirable to impart to the members but which he would not wish to impart openly. Secret sessions are for that purpose rather than for the purpose of giving an amount of detailed information.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the Prime Minister allow me? I am surprised to hear him make that statement, because my understanding was entirely the reverse—that it is very rarely the government asked to have a secret session for the purpose of making statements, but that it usually came from the demands of private members.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had not finished what I was going on to say. My information as I have given it to the house is exactly as I have received it in a communication which I shall be glad to show my hon. friend later, but the communication goes on to state that in the secret session opportunity is afforded members of the opposition, or members of parliament generally, to make to the government suggestions and criticisms which they would hesitate to make in open session. The one point I wish to stress is that facts in regard to such matters as equipment, disposition of troops, questions of strategy, and the like, which might assist the enemy, are not disclosed at all at secret sessions in Britain; those sessions are as limited, in the matter of disclosure of detailed information, as it is possible for sessions to be, and usually, as hon. members know, the sessions themselves are few and far between and do not last for any length of time.

As regards the question which an hon. member has raised as to the use of Hansard, of course no record of any kind will be kept. The purpose of the session is that discussions may be off the record and that nothing shall go out, nothing shall be retained of the record, with respect to questions that have been raised or answers given.

As to procedure, whether the house will proceed in committee of the whole, I understand that in Britain the Speaker is usually in the chair when the minister concerned or the Prime Minister is making his statement. The house then resolves itself into committee of the whole so as to permit of question and answer on the statement which has been made. That may be found to be the most convenient way to proceed when we meet on Tuesday, but that the house can decide for itself when in secret session. That is all I wish to say, but I should like to have the motion put in the form amended as indicated.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A question arose, from the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), about the record.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I answered that. There is none to be kept.

Mr. McIVOR: One question. When two know a thing it is a secret, and when three know it it is not. Is any penalty attached to anyone who is known to be giving out news, apart from yourself, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have mentioned the order in council that provides penalties for a disclosure on the part of anyone with respect to what takes place at a secret session.

Motion as amended agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—HON. MR. HANSON

CENSORSHIP OF MAIL ADDRESSED TO OR DISPATCHED BY MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to refer at this stage to the question of privilege which I raised on Monday last regarding the censorship of mail addressed to or dispatched by members of parliament. I had anticipated that an additional reply would be forthcoming either from the Prime Minister of from the Postmaster General before this. It will be recalled that I requested that the rules and regulations governing this practice be laid before the house, and the Prime Minister promised to endeavour to secure information. I now wish to renew that request and to seek from the Prime Minister or the Postmaster General an unequivocal assurance that the practice of which I complained will be abandoned.

Since I spoke on Monday last I have been doing a little investigating myself and I find that every telegram that I send, or any other member sends, is censored, whether it is within or without the country. I find also that so far, in Ottawa, our long distance telephone messages have not been tapped but that telephone messages from certain defence areas are tapped and recordings made of them.

I do not want to use too strong language about this. I can quite appreciate that telephone messages from a defence area, and telegrams from a defence area—perhaps letters from a defence area, if that is the right technical term to use—addressed to certain people, especially outside Canada, may and in certain instances should be censored. But a telephone message to me from Halifax surely ought not to be censored. A telegram from myself to somebody in Winnipeg ought not to be copied and censored.

This thing has gone beyond all reason. I do not think hon. members are aware how far it has gone.

Mr. REID: In British Columbia they warn you before you telephone outside the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The only warning I ever had over the telephone was not to talk about the weather. I talked to my daughter in Halifax.

Mr. RALSTON: And other things too—ships and so on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are not to talk about that, or things of that sort. That is quite all right. But we have reached the stage where any telegram I send to any of my political friends is copied, and the contents may be submitted to some minister across the way. Surely this sort of thing cannot go on. I am not disloyal; I am not dealing in treason. I may be at times engaged in political warfare, but I am certainly not dealing in treason. Nobody will for a moment think I am. If I were, I would be unworthy to occupy not only this position but a seat in this house.

I do appeal to the Prime Minister to have some review made of this whole position. I sent for an official of the company the other day and he was good enough to come and see me. I had been warned that my conversations were being tapped—I think that is the word—and I know from investigations I have made in New Brunswick that it is quite possible to do that. Anybody can listen in. In operating the telephone they can listen in and they do listen in. I made it my business as director of the New Brunswick Telephone company to inquire once pretty thoroughly into the question, because complaint had been made to me, and the party making the complaint had just cause for doing so. I found out what the modus operandi was. I did not think it was right, and that was in peace time. I certainly raised cain so far as I was able to in connection with it.

Mr. POWER: Who does the tapping, the telephone company or some employee of the government?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I found out that, so far as anything transmitted out of this building is concerned, there is no tapping. I was therefore reassured and I was very much relieved. The minute you take down your telephone you are automatically put in touch with central in Ottawa and there is no intervention. I am assured that there is no opportunity for intervention in this building. That of course is a relief. At the other end of the wire there may be opportunity for intervention.

Mr. POWER: By the telephone company?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It must be with the cooperation of the telephone company. Out of Halifax, there is no doubt about it that the officers were sitting right in. We have had the spectacle of a prosecution of one of the leading citizens of Halifax on the basis of a telephone conversation. I do not know much about the merits of that case, but this gentleman was prosecuted and he was found not guilty. The government has appealed that decision. There may be sound grounds for that; I do not know, but I am informed that that was a case which should never have been brought up. Of course opinions may differ about that. Counsel may have been asked to give an opinion, or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police may have felt strongly, or it may even have come up to the government itself. I do not know. However, the situation exists. That is what I am referring to and I think we should know something more about it.

On the point of censoring letters to or from members of parliament let us have an end of that. On the question of telegrams, it is well to be forewarned. I suppose we shall have to get a secret code. I do not want every member of the government to know what I am sending out to Mr. Meighen, we will say. I just mention that in passing. It would be terrible if we were to have this espionage go the extent of including long distance telephone messages. Liberty in this country will be gone. Surely we are confined enough now; we are regimented enough. I am willing to take my share with anyone in that regard on my personal prerogatives and freedom of action. But this is spying; this is espionage, and I object to it. I want it to end if I can possibly have it ended.

I renew my request with added force to-day for the production of the regulations in regard to this matter so that we may know under just what system we are living.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that when he brought this subject up the other day I immediately spoke to one of my colleagues in reference to having the whole situation carefully reviewed. It was pointed out at the time that it concerned different departments of the government, and in order to have a complete review I have waited until inquiry could be made sufficiently comprehensive to give my hon. friend a reply. I will try to see that the review is expedited and an answer given to him in a day or two. But I would say to my hon. friend that I do think he is unduly concerned about the extent to which others are interested in his mail or his conversations.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would hope nobody is. But apparently they are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I mean so far as the government is concerned. The last thing I should wish, and I am sure any of my colleagues or any members on this side of the house, would be to have the slightest knowledge of any matter which my hon. friend regarded as confidential.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a fair statement, of course.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would say first that as far as the safety of the state will permit all his confidential correspondence should be kept so. I agree that every precaution must be taken to preserve the absolute right of every citizen to have his mail kept free from censorship as far as possible, but there are certain military obligations that have to be observed at this time. I suppose that by degrees we shall overcome the difficulties that arise in that connection. I would say, however, that spying or espionage is not a part of what the government is seeking in this connection.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to support the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in this matter, and I should like the Prime Minister to make a much more definite statement than that he will give the leader of the opposition a copy of the regulations or even make further inquiry and give further consideration to the matter. Under the circumstances I do not think that is good enough.

I can see a reason why letters, telegrams and so on from certain defence areas should be censored, but I cannot see why letters addressed to members of parliament should be censored even when they come from those particular areas. We are here representing the Canadian people. If there are those among us who are suspect, they should be dealt with in another way. May I add that I do not think there is any such member in the house. But for my own part, for example, a soldier who has written to me on matters concerning himself would hesitate to write to me at all if he knew that the letter was going to be opened and a paragraph from it forwarded say to the Minister of National Defence, who in turn might forward it to the soldier's commanding officer, and the man would then undoubtedly receive some penalty or reprimand for having written to a member of parliament. We are fighting for democratic rights, and surely one of the democratic rights a citizen possesses, whether he is in uniform or out of uniform, is the right to approach his elected representative in this house without let or hindrance.

I strongly support the leader of the opposition in the protest he has made. I regret that the Prime Minister has not given a more categorical assurance that this interference with mail, at least mail addressed to members of the House of Commons, will cease immediately. The situation is much too serious to be allowed to rest simply with a promise of consideration. In saying what he did I am sure the leader of the opposition, as I did, was speaking not merely on behalf of opposition members of this house; I have heard expressions of opinion from members on the government side which coincide very closely with the opinions we are expressing. Let us not in this struggle for liberty and democracy allow these elementary rights of citizenship and parliamentary representation to be taken from us or interfered with.

I strongly urge upon the Prime Minister that he give a categorical assurance to this house that at least so far as members of this house are concerned this interference with the right of the citizen to approach his member unhampered, unhindered and unsupervised will cease immediately.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think my hon. friend can have quite caught the purport of my reply to the leader of the opposition. I did not say the matter was receiving consideration; I replied that I intended to make a full statement when the review which is now being made of the situation is completed. May I add that I did express to the Postmaster General the personal view that I thought all letters addressed to members of parliament should go without censorship altogether and that I should like him to have that aspect of the situation inquired into particularly and let me know if there is any reason why that rule should not prevail.

My hon. friend spoke of the tapping of telephones. I do not mean to pose as an authority, but some years ago I, along with another gentleman, was appointed a commissioner to inquire into certain conditions of employment obtaining among telephone operatives. The commission learned at that time that one aspect of telephone operations as conducted by the company itself was to have as part of a regular procedure what was known as a listening board, at which operators sat and took down parts of conversations. It was considered part of the regular business of the telephone company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think that is true to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me finish, because it may serve my hon. friend's purpose as well as my own. I have kept it in mind ever since. The explanation which was given was that the company was interested in knowing whether telephones were being used for private purposes or for purposes of business, there being a higher rate charged on telephones used for business purposes than on those for domestic use. Upon the report made by the commission this parliament subsequently passed an enactment making it an offence to disclose any information obtained over a telephone in that way. Parliament did not do away with the listening boards. I do not know whether they are still used, but I know that at that time it came as a surprise to everyone—this was some thirty or more years ago—to discover that while there was such a law with respect to disclosing contents of telegrams, it did not apply to disclosure of telephone conversations. It may be that conversations over the telephone are listened to still, but I would certainly not countenance the government listening in on telephone conversations unless for very exceptional reasons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The fact is they do. Recordings are made of conversations in Canada to-day in certain areas. I am not unreasonable about that. There may be sound reasons for it, because this country is full of spies. I have no doubt of it. And they are not hiding up in this gallery listening to the twaddle that goes on in this house. They are down where there is business going on that might interest their nation. I agree with that. But so far as we are concerned here why should there be any attempt to censor our telegrams or our telephone conversations?

WAR APPROPRIATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF BILLS FOR PRESENT AND ENSUING FISCAL YEARS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance when it is expected that the war appropriation bill for the next fiscal year will be introduced. Will there be a supplementary war appropriation bill for the present fiscal year, and if so when will it be brought down?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY: (Minister of Finance): Well, Mr. Speaker, I have not completed my plans with respect to the introduction of these bills. What I have in mind is the introduction of a bill relating to the financial arrangements with Great Britain, as the first of the financial bills; then, probably shortly after that, the introduction of both the supplementary appropriation bills for the present fiscal year and the war appropriation bill for the next fiscal year, bringing them in at the same time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There will be a supplementary bill as well?

Mr. ILSLEY: It would appear that a supplementary appropriation bill will be necessary.

HONG KONG COMMISSION

REPORTED APPOINTMENT OF COLONEL GEORGE DREW AS COUNSEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. T. FULFORD (Leeds): Is it true that Colonel George Drew has been appointed by the opposition as counsel to the royal commission investigating the Hong Kong affair; and, if so, could that be the real reason the Ontario legislature has been adjourned?

[Later]

Mr. FULFORD: When may I expect an answer to my question?

Mr. SPEAKER: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) is not bound to reply.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INQUIRY AS TO ANNUAL REPORT AND REPORT OF THE AUDITORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, when it is anticipated that the annual report of the Canadian National Railways and the report of the auditors of the Canadian National Railways will be laid on the table? I should think we ought to have this information before Bill No. 9, respecting the appointment of auditors, is proceeded with. It will be recalled that last year these reports were delayed and it was not until late in the session that they were received and the committee set up. I can understand that with the present tremendous volume of work there may be some delay on the part of the Canadian National in getting out these reports, but perhaps this would be timely notice to the minister, if we could have the reports later. My suggestion is that this bill be not proceeded with in the meantime.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall draw the attention of the minister to my hon. friend's remarks.

WAR INSURANCE

CONTRIBUTORY INSURANCE FOR MEN IN SERVICE—WAR RISK PROPERTY DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the government advise us as to whether they have in view making available to the general list of airmen, pilots and officers on active service, officers and other ranks of the active army in hazardous jobs, the personnel of the naval services and the merchant marine, some sort of contributory scheme of life insurance, such as that in force in the United States? Would it be possible for the government to make available to the insurance companies of Canada the statistics with respect to the mortality in these services, from time to time, so that the life insurance companies would be able to set rates which would be available to the members of the forces? At the present time no such statistics are available, and the making of rates is more or less of a gamble.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would the government advise the house and the country as to what war risk property damage insurance is available to the public in such places as Halifax and Vancouver, and other vulnerable points? Some months ago I inquired by letter of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, under whose jurisdiction I understood this came, as to what had been done in this matter. I was advised—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): —that the whole question was being considered. It seems to me that we should follow the example of Great Britain and act in this matter without delay.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman should ask his question without making a speech.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to just finish my question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to say further that in certain circumstances it is delaying our war effort. Shippers who in all probability have bank commitments are diffident about shipping their goods—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let the Speaker call the hon. gentleman to order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not a question at all for the orders of the day. It is definitely out of order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It is not a question; it is a statement.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think this is a question that should be answered at once.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald) has no right to lecture either the hon. member or myself across the floor of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I raised a point of order, and I had every right to raise it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman should have asked his question. He proceeded to make a statement. He should address his question to the government.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): As to the first two questions, I submit that they should be placed on the order paper, because they are not the sort of question which the rules permit on the orders of the day. As to the third question, there may be a slightly greater element of urgency in that, because it relates to war risk insurance. I can say to my hon. friend that some time ago I instructed an eminent member of the legal profession in whom I have confidence to make a report to me on the type of war risk insurance scheme that would be appropiate to this country. He has not yet done so, though I understand that he is just about ready to do it. When that report is received the government will take such action as is appropriate in the circumstances.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is three months since I first inquired. This matter should be dealt with.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

EXTENSION OF POWER OF REQUISITION TO MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct one more question, this time to the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who is not here. Perhaps it might be addressed instead to our new friend the Minister of Justice, who has just come to us. My attention has been called to order in council P.C. 995, passed on the 9th instant under the authority of the War Measures Act, on the recommendation of the acting Minister of Justice. This order in council amends the defence of Canada regulations, as consolidated in 1941, by rescinding the present regulation No. 48 and substituting a new regulation No. 48, whereby the Minister of Munitions and Supply is given power—a power heretofore reserved to the ministers of defence, air and navy—to requisition, among other things (a) any chattel in Canada; and (b) any British ship or aircraft registered in Canada.

If it is not convenient for the ministry to answer my questions to-day it will be all right to have them answered later. But I should like to ask, first, the reason for this amendment to the regulations. Why is this power now sought to be vested in the Minister of Munitions and Supply rather than in the defence ministry, and what is the reason for this extension of the power of requisition—because I think in substance there is an extension of that power. Then I wish to know if the owner of such chattel, ship or aircraft, as the case may be, is to be compensated therefor, or is it to be conscripted, if that is a proper word to use in this house? And will members of parliament be provided with copies of the order in council? I think everyone ought to know about this; that is why I am drawing attention to it.

These are wide powers which are given to the ministers, I have no doubt quite properly. I am not criticizing the policy at all, but I want to get before the public the fact that there already exist very wide powers, and that now the Minister of Munitions and Supply, in addition to the defence ministers, can come in and take anything I have. They are welcome, as far as I am concerned, but the public ought to know about it and the reasons for the extension of that power to the fourth minister.

Hon. L. S. St. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this order in council was published in the Canada Gazette of February 14, 1942.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many people read it?

Mr. St. LAURENT: If it is desired, copies can be made available for the information of hon. members. As to the other information requested, might that stand over until the beginning of the week, so that an appropriate answer may be prepared?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Surely.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

TRANSFER OF UNEMPLOYED WORKERS—UNEMPLOYED EMPLOYABLES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I gave notice of a question or rather a series of questions that I intended to ask to-day of the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty). My questions arise out of a picture which appeared some days ago in the Winnipeg Tribune depicting the delivery of an unemployment insurance cheque to a young man, twenty years of age, unmarried and living at home. Since unemployment insurance is denied to those who can secure employment or who have been given an opportunity for employment, I should like to ask the minister the following questions.

Why was this young man, who is apparently able-bodied and intelligent, not transferred to some work or occupation suitable to him where his services might be utilized instead of paying out unemployment insurance to him? And arising out of that question: Have the national employment or regional committees transferred unemployed men to such positions as are vacant and available within or without the province where such persons were living at the time they became unemployed? If so, how many persons who would otherwise be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits have been transferred in that manner? Finally, how many unemployed employables are there in Canada to-day?

Mr. SPEAKER: The questions asked by the hon. member really should not be asked on the orders of the day.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Acting Minister of Labour): I have no objection to answering the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) with such information as I have. The case to which he refers has perhaps received some publicity because it was the first cheque paid out for benefits under the unemployment insurance fund. The young man in question was an usher in a theatre, and the employment service has been and is still endeavouring to secure him work. Not being a robust young man, he could not join the forces and cannot take on heavy work. In other words, he is pretty much limited to the class of work he was doing or work of a clerical nature.

With reference to the second question about the transfer of unemployed workers, I am advised that the employment offices are endeavouring to secure employment for any unemployed by every possible means, by transfer if necessary, provided they are willing to be transferred.

I am sorry that I have not had sufficient time to get the figures as to the unemployed employables, but I shall be glad to furnish my hon. friend with that information.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

PLEBISCITE ACT

PROVISION FOR TAKING OF VOTES ON ANY QUESTION SUBMITTED BY WAY OF PLEBISCITE

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the taking of the votes of the qualified voters on any question submitted by way of plebiscite and for such purposes to make provision for the printing and publication of a Plebiscite Act and instructions issued thereunder, the preparation of voters' lists and other plebiscite documents, including forms and ballot papers, to provide for the fees, allowances, expenses or other remuneration of certain officials and employees.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do I understand that the minister does not intend to make a statement?

Mr. McLARTY: My intention was to make a statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Now is the time to make it, before Mr. Speaker leaves the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It could be made in committee of the whole.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the minister ought to make a statement now because there are certain members who want to speak on this resolution.

Mr. McLARTY: There is no objection to following that procedure. I thought possibly the statement could have been made in committee of the whole, but it does not make any difference, certainly as far as I am concerned. In rising to move this resolution standing in my name, I realize that in some respects it is unique. A resolution of this kind is usually moved to accord the house and the committee an opportunity of considering the legislation which will be based upon it and of dealing with the matter in a general and not a detailed way. In the case of this resolution, however, the situation is somewhat changed. Ever since the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne commenced, most, if not all, of the attention of the house has been directed to the particular subject matter of the resolution which I am now moving. There were other important matters mentioned in the speech from the throne, but they were more or less neglected, or at least not extensively referred to. For that reason, I feel that I can best occupy the time of this house if I do not traverse the ordinary course which would ordinarily be traversed with a resolution of this kind, but deal with the particular features of the enactment which it is proposed to have follow the passing of this resolution.

Now that the holding of the plebiscite has been decided upon, I believe it will be the wish of this house that it be proceeded with in the fairest manner possible, in the speediest manner possible and in the most inexpensive manner possible. That being the situation, I think I can best use the time of the house in dealing with certain particular features of the enactment.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the remarks which you made earlier in the day about hon. members not reading statements, that in the statement which I propose to give this afternoon there is nothing argumentative; I trust it is largely expository and explanatory. If I refer to my notes somewhat extensively, it will be only for the purpose of contracting the time that otherwise it would be necessary to take to deal with this resolution and perhaps of not overlooking some of the more important features. I shall endeavour, however, to trespass upon your injunction to the smallest possible degree.

This will not be the first plebiscite bill to be enacted in Canada. Hon. members are aware that the prohibition plebiscite act was passed by the parliament of Canada in 1898. One of the outstanding features of that act—it was not a lengthy one—was that it did not reenact any election act; it enacted the specific legislative features that were necessary to found the legislation upon and then left to directions the creation of the appropriate machinery and the procedure that would be followed. In the case of this enactment, it is suggested that a similar course be followed, that we do not try to reenact the whole election act, as we did in 1938, but that we enact essential legislative features, leaving to regulations, which regulations will be modeled as closely as possible upon the provisions of the election act, to provide the machinery which will be necessary to give force and effect to the plebiscite bill.

There will be another difference between the present bill and the act enacted in 1898. It is not proposed to put in this measure the exact wording of the plebiscite or the date upon which the plebiscite will be held. The wording has already been given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and that wording, together with the date, will be incorporated in a proclamation, provision for which is made in the bill itself.

It is proposed also that after the bill has received its second reading, it will be submitted to a special committee of the house for consideration. To that committee will be submitted, not only the bill itself but the regulations and the forms which will be promulgated after the passage of the bill.

This course appears to have a number of advantages. In the first place, the regulations must necessarily be lengthy. They will consist of two major divisions—those dealing with the Canadian service voters and those dealing with the ordinary voters in Canada. When combined, these regulations will comprise something like one hundred and thirty sections, and, when printed, cover about one hundred and twenty-five pages; and it is thought, bearing in mind the opportunity possessed by a special committee of receiving submissions and taking evidence, that they would receive a more thorough and, as well, a more expeditious consideration if, in the first instance, they were discussed in the special committee rather than in committee of the whole house.

As a safeguard, the bill will provide that the regulations shall, as near as may be, conform to the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and, in the matter of taking the vote of Canadian service voters, to the method employed at the last general election.

The bill consequently, Mr. Speaker, will not be a lengthy one. It will have but ten sections. Of these, several are of a nature which will require very little discussion, and for that reason I shall not deal with them at this time.

Perhaps the most important sections of the bill are those which provide for qualifications and disqualifications of voters. But before dealing in a general way with those sections, might I make one or two preliminary observations on the general principles which have been considered in the framing of the bill.

In the first place, it is the desire of the government and will, I believe, be the desire of parliament that the fullest possible opportunity shall be accorded to the people of Canada to express their views upon the particular question which will be submitted. On the other hand, it is equally desired that this expression will not be stifled by any undue restriction on those who will be permitted to vote.

In the second place, it is recognized that while the pledge was given to the qualified voters of Canada, there are certain classes of voters who, because of war-time conditions, must necessarily be excluded from voting, and others who, on account of their religious beliefs, would not in any event be affected by the giving of the pledge. Bearing in mind these observations, there are two classes of voters for whom the bill provides: (1) the Canadian service voter; and (2) the ordinary voter.

(1) The definition of a Canadian service voter is an extremely wide one and is made as ample and complete as could be devised. This provision in the act has only two restrictions, namely, that he or she be a British subject and at the time he or she became a member of such forces or corps, was ordinarily resident in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any age limit?

Mr. McLARTY: I was just coming to that. Service may be performed within Canada or any other part of the world, but their right to vote is definitely ensured. Whether they are or are not over twenty-one years of age is not a restriction.

(2) But in the case of the ordinary voter, different considerations apply and the explanation cannot be as brief.

The general qualifications applying to electors under the election act apply in the plebiscite. Any voter must be a British subject, must be twenty-one years of age at the date of polling, must have been ordinarily a resident of Canada for twelve months prior to the polling date and ordinarily resident in the polling division on the twenty-eighth day before polling day.

There are necessarily some disqualifications, and with these I should now like to deal.

(a) In the first place, I would point out that those who are disqualified from voting under the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, will be disqualified from voting at the plebiscite.

(b) In addition, every interned person will be disqualified.

(c) In addition, too, every person resident in Canada whose racial origin is that of a country at war with Canada, if such person would be disqualified by reason of race in any one of the provinces of Canada while residing therein from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of that province, and who did not serve in the naval, military or air forces of Canada in the great war, as defined in the Pension Act, or in the war declared by his majesty on the tenth day of September, 1939, against the German reich and subsequently other powers.

The purpose of this section can be best illustrated by a concrete example. Suppose a citizen of Japanese origin were permitted to vote, the fact that he was permitted to do so would be resented. It would quite possibly result in some measure of public disorder.

[Mr. McLarty.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that an extension of the present principle, or is it the same principle?

Mr. McLARTY: It is the same to this extent. The present principle, under section 14(2) of the Dominion Elections Act excludes from voting in a dominion election any person who is excluded from voting in any province. This is an exception to this extent, that if they are excluded in any particular province and are of enemy origin, they are excluded from voting on the plebiscite. By a country of enemy origin I mean if they originate from a country with which Canada is at war. The only limitation is to the extent to which any particular race may be excluded by provincial legislation.

Mr. STIRLING: Does that apply only to that province or to all Canada?

Mr. McLARTY: If a person is excluded from voting in any one province and the person comes from a country with which we are at war, that person is excluded throughout Canada generally.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is clear enough.

Mr. MacINNIS: That applies to only one particular race, but we are at war with a number of different countries.

Mr. McLARTY: Perhaps we might better deal with these questions in committee. Careful consideration would have to be given before a reply was made to the question of the hon. member.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not ask a question. I followed the precedents given me by other members of the house, and I do not think certain members of the house have privileges over those accorded to other members.

Mr. SPEAKER: We are not in committee on the resolution now, and questions can be permitted only with the consent of the minister.

Mr. McLARTY: I have now dealt with the exclusions from voting on the plebiscite under the terms of the proposed bill. I do not apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that criticism will be directed to or exception taken of those who have been excluded from the vote. I rather surmise that any criticism which may develop will be that certain classes have not been excluded.

Canada is a country which, while not as great in population as many other countries in the world, is composed of many nationalities and of many creeds. Until the beginning of the present century the population of this country was largely of British and French stock. But at the turn of the century, Sir Wilfrid Laurier announced that the twentieth century belonged to Canada and that we had a vast and largely undeveloped area which, if populated, would result in this country becoming the granary of the empire. A broad, liberal and expansive immigration policy was instituted and, as a result, a great many immigrants came to Canada from European countries and from the United States. They brought their families with them and intended to make this country their permanent home. In due course a vast majority of them became Canadian citizens under the terms of the Naturalization Act. They took the naturalization oath, which is as follows:

I, ... , swear by Almighty God that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty King George the Sixth, his heirs and successors, according to law. So help me God.

What does naturalization involve? It involves this: I quote the terms of the Naturalization Act:

A person to whom a certificate of naturalization is granted by the minister shall, subject to the provisions of this act, be entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges, be subject to all obligations, duties and liabilities, to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject, and as from the date of his naturalization have to all intents and purposes the status of a natural-born British subject.

I am fully aware, Mr. Speaker, that the judicial committee of the privy council has dealt with this particular section of the act. It has decided that the right to exercise the franchise is not inherent in those who enjoy by virtue of this naturalization the "political and other rights". I might also point out that those citizens who enjoy these rights are subject to "all obligations, duties and liabilities" which are conditions precedent to their enjoyment.

It is not the intention of the government to take away lightly either the privileges or the responsibilities which arise from citizenship. Neither is being done under this legislation which is now proposed. The right to do so would require to be clear and imperative; and the fairness in doing so would require to be immediately apparent.

This is not, however, a general election. Such an election would necessarily involve a number of considerations, and—important as any one might be—the overriding consideration would be the particular government which would exercise power in Canada, at least until a subsequent government was elected to give direction and maintain control.

In this plebiscite the electors of Canada are asked to answer one question and one alone:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

The question is one which seeks relief from commitments. But the one especial commitment referred to is the matter of military service.

May I go one further step? While no further disfranchisement is envisaged, it is provided that anyone who holds the views of conscientious objection to military service and who votes on the plebiscite, shall, after so voting, be disqualified from applying for postponement of military service under sections 18 and 19 of the national war services regulations.

I should now like, Mr. Speaker, to deal with some of the more mechanical phases of the bill.

In the first place, there is the preparation of voters' lists. A great deal of consideration has been given to the most appropriate method of compiling the voters' lists to be used in the plebiscite.

It was first suggested that the lists prepared and printed in connection with the last general election might be sufficient for the purpose. But the objections to this course, bearing in mind the events of the last two years, seemed to make this extremely undesirable.

In the first place, in the larger cities and towns many changes of residence occur every year, but more changes than usual have occurred in the last two years. In the second place, a great many have changed their residence by reason of their enlistment in the military forces of Canada. In the third place, it is estimated that in the neighbourhood of 400,000 young Canadians have attained voting age since the last general election. Their names, of course, would not appear on such voters' lists.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Four hundred thousand?

Mr. McLARTY: That is the figure which has been given to me. That would of course, include both sexes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is larger than I got from the bureau.

Mr. McLARTY: Well, those are the figures which were supplied to me by the chief electoral officer, and I understood he obtained them from the bureau of statistics.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, there may be some explanation.

Mr. McLARTY: In the fourth place, there are many places now in Canada where large industrial plants have been established since 1940 in districts which at that time were sparsely settled but which now have populations running into thousands, and where the 1940 lists would prove of no value whatever.

Another suggestion received was to the effect that no lists of any kind be used but that every voter take an oath in the polling station before being allowed to vote.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to know who made that.

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Speaker, I personally received a number of such suggestions. I cannot recall at the present moment from whom they came.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps that is an embarrassing question.

Mr. McLARTY: Not at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is the resolution now open to questions, or do we have to wait until we go into committee?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The house is not in committee, and the minister has the floor. Unless he consents to any questions being put, as he has the floor, questions are not in order.

Mr. McLARTY: If it were a situation where questions could not be asked later on, I would have not the slightest hesitation in replying to them now. I should like, however, if possible to complete my remarks on the resolution by six o'clock to-night. I think I can do so without any difficulty; and while I have no objection to answering questions, perhaps, with the opportunity which will be accorded later on, it would be better to postpone them.

Mr. MacINNIS: If they are awkward questions!

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. It is the privilege of the minister to make his statement uninterrupted.

Mr. McLARTY: As I have said, another suggestion received was to the effect that no lists of any kind be used but that every voter take an oath in the polling station before being allowed to vote. It was felt that there were two serious objections to this course.

In the first place, it was believed that a procedure of that kind would be strongly resented by very many voters who by this method would consider themselves as challenged at the poll.

In the second place, such a procedure would very materially slow up the taking of the vote and would probably necessitate almost doubling the number of polling stations to be used. The increased cost of these additional polling stations would amount to almost as much as the preparation of the lists themselves.

After consideration, therefore, it has been decided to prepare a complete new list of voters in each polling division. These lists will be compiled by enumerators who will secure the necessary information. When prepared by the enumerators, these lists will neither be revised nor printed, and will constitute the official lists of voters to be used at the polls.

But in order to avoid the revision of the list and so that each qualified voter has an opportunity of exercising his franchise at the plebiscite, the vouching provisions of the elections act, restricted under the act to rural polling divisions, will be made applicable to both urban and rural polling divisions.

This will mean that where the name of a qualified voter has been inadvertently omitted by the enumerator from his list, such voter will be allowed to vote on polling day upon taking the required oath and upon being vouched for by a voter of the same polling division, whose name appears on the official list of voters as prepared by the enumerator.

In order that this vouching provision will not be made use of illegally, penalties will be specially provided in the bill.

In recommending the use of what are known as open lists, three considerations have been given weight.

In the first place, it was felt that this method would provide the best opportunity for every person entitled to vote to do so.

In the second place, by avoiding the delay ordinarily necessitated by revision, it is estimated that there will be a saving of at least one week and possibly more in the taking of the vote.

In the third place, it will prove to be less expensive, and it is estimated that a saving of about $200,000 will be effected by the use of the open lists in preference to the closed ones.

Might I state that this provision, as any other provision in the bill, will not be as immutable as the laws of the Medes and the Persians, but will be capable of such changes and amendments as the committee to which it is submitted may deem desirable.

I should now like to deal with the time required for taking the vote.

The chief electoral officer has prepared a memorandum setting out the minimum time required for the taking of the plebiscite, and since it is somewhat detailed, I believe it would be of advantage to read the memorandum prepared on that subject:

The minimum time required for the taking of a plebiscite, from the day that I am authorized to proceed with the printing of the necessary material to polling day, is ten weeks. This period may be divided into two sections.

For the first section, a period of six weeks is required for the preparatory work and I find it difficult to break down this section step by step as it consists of the period required for the printing of the necessary material, the shipping of this material to the various returning officers and its distribution by the returning officers to the enumerators appointed to prepare the lists of voters in each polling division.

I do not see how it could be possible to get the necessary enumeration material printed and transmit the same to every returning officer in a shorter period than five weeks. This would allow one week to the returning officers to make their distribution to the enumerators.

To obtain this result it would be necessary that my requisitions be given priority by the king's printer.

For the second section, a period of four weeks has been fixed in the proposed regulations; the day fixed for the commencement of enumeration in urban and rural polling divisions being the 28th day before polling day. As at the last general election the enumerators are allowed six days to complete their house-to-house visitations and three days to make the necessary number of copies of their list of voters, which in most cases must be written by hand. The lists are then transmitted to the returning officer who must in turn divide the lists for polling divisions containing more than 350 names, certify each part of the list so divided, and affix to each sheet of the enumerators' lists an impression with a rubber stamp designating that it is the official list to be used at the poll, then transmit the official list to the deputy returning officers with the ballot papers and other documents.

It is felt, especially in sparsely settled districts, that this preparation of the list by the enumerators, the sending of such list to the returning officer, the preparation of the list for the poll by the returning officer and its transmission to the deputy returning officer in the ballot box could not be accomplished in a shorter period than four weeks. It is true that the period between the date of the issue of the writs and polling day at the last general election was approximately eight weeks, but in that connection I wish to point out that on the day of the issue of the writs every rural enumerator had already received from the returning officer a complete set of enumerator's supplies with his instructions. After the writs had been issued all that was necessary for the returning officer to do was to complete the official appointments of the enumerators and transmit same to them with advice stating the days upon which the various operations had to be performed. Moreover, the remainder of the material required for a general election, consisting of some 300 printing jobs, was completed at the date of the issue of the writs and ready to be sent forward.

Furthermore, consideration must be given to the time required to prepare ballot papers, regulations and instructions for the special returning officers, and other officials who will conduct the taking of the vote by Canadian service voters in Canada, in the United Kingdom, in Newfoundland, et cetera. The printing of this material and its transmission to the United Kingdom et cetera will take quite a period of time. This material should be received by the special returning officer in London at least three weeks before polling day, since the voting starts twelve days before that day.

I should like now to deal with the estimated cost of the plebiscite. It is estimated that the cost of the plebiscite will be $1,500,000. It is not anticipated that this figure will be in any way exceeded, and it is possible that it will be somewhat reduced.

The suggestion has been made that we should endeavour to use voluntary workers in this connection. It would, however, be unwise to assume that the plebiscite could be carried on in all districts on a voluntary basis and, for this reason, in budgeting the cost it is necessary to assume that payment will be required for all services to be rendered.

The amount so stated will be required if everyone necessary for taking the plebiscite requires to be paid for his or her services.

On the other hand, it is the hope of the government that a large number will undertake the work without remuneration, and, if this hope is realized, it will result in a considerable reduction in the amount of this expenditure.

I have endeavoured to place before this committee the general principles which have been followed in the framing of the measure, and the general procedure which will be followed in the taking of the vote. I believe that the bill itself is the best guarantee of the desire of the government that people in every electoral district of Canada and those enrolled in military service will have that opportunity, which only a democratic form of government provides, of expressing freely his or her wish upon the issue which is involved.

The bill is one which is so just and fair that, bearing in mind the fact that the holding of a plebiscite has been already decided by this house, and irrespective of opinion held as to the desirability of holding one, all parties and groups can agree upon it.

Might I point out, however, that the measure is not unchangeable in form and immutable in its terms. If, in the course of its consideration, it can be shown, on the one hand, that the bill is too broad or, on the other, too narrow, every consideration will be given to the suggestions thus made.

The important point for this committee to remember is that this bill, when finally passed, will be evidence—and conclusive evidence—that the parliament of Canada, notwithstanding that the clouds may be threatening and the skies black, has kept faith with the people of this country.

At a time when we are fighting to maintain the democratic way of life throughout the world, let us endeavour in every way to maintain it in our own country.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): This is not a very good time to start an extended debate on a matter of this kind. I do not propose to debate the measure at length, but, there are some observations which I desire to make with respect to this resolution. The proposal to which the resolution seeks to give effect has already of course been the subject of a lengthy debate in this house, and personally I see no great advantage to be gained by entering into a long discussion of the principle involved.

I have not changed my view with respect to this plebiscite. To me it is just as objectionable as when it was first announced. I am still convinced that it is an unworthy evasion of a responsibility which properly belongs to this house. I am still convinced that the importation of this practice into our parliamentary system is inconsistent with the principles of responsible government. The Secretary of State said that it was unique in the history of parliamentary institutions, or rather that the legislation proposed was unique in the history—

Mr. McLARTY: I wonder if my hon. friend will allow me to correct him on that. When I began my remarks I said that the position was unique in one respect, namely, that the general resolution which would ordinarily be discussed on this motion had already been discussed in the debate on the speech from the throne.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I misapprehended the purport of the minister's statement. I stand corrected, and I am obliged to him for the correction, but I would say this, that a government asking to be released from a position which it voluntarily took, without being asked to do so by the people of the country, is unique in the history of Canada—absolutely unique. In this connection I want to quote a paragraph that has come to my attention in a periodical with which I think all hon. members are familiar. I am quoting from Maclean's magazine of February 15 under the caption "Backstage at Ottawa, by the Man with a Notebook." I think most of us have read these articles from time to time. This is what he says:

> In the whole long history of British government, in all the story of democratic government, there has been nothing like this.
> Democratic governments—though not British governments—have taken both plebiscites and referendums; plebiscites to give them direction before legislation was passed—with the verdict not binding—referendums to approve or reject legislation already passed. Nowhere in democratic government has there been a case where the leader of a government, whether in peace or war, has taken a plebiscite to release himself from a pledge.

That is true. Never in the whole history of parliamentary government have the people of the country been confronted with a proposal to release a leader of a government from a pledge of this or any other kind, a pledge which, as I stated on a previous occasion, was self-imposed and which I assert was not an issue in the last general election.

In the course of his remarks the Secretary of State made the assertion that this was not the first plebiscite bill to be found upon the statute books of this country. I recall that some forty-three years ago the then leader of the government, Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in order to stall off a proposal which was then being pressed upon him by the temperance and prohibition forces, did hold a plebiscite on the question of the sale of intoxicating liquor in Canada. I was a boy in 1898 but I remember the occasion well, and I remember the anxiety everyone felt as to what would be the result of the plebiscite. I recall, too, that the temperance people fathered the affirmative, and the brewers and distillers fathered the negative—fathered it pretty well, I think.

Mr. POWER: Look at the results—not the brewers and distillers; but there were a great many wet votes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In your province, yes. The liquor interests were pretty well out opposing the plebiscite. That was their right; I am not questioning it, nor am I making any attack on the liquor interests of this country. I am merely reciting a matter of history. But this is the point: on that plebiscite the people voted by a substantial majority to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquor.

Mr. POWER: Thirteen thousand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, the people of my hon. friend's province voted overwhelmingly against it, but the great mass of the electorate in every other province, I think, voted for the principle. Sir Wilfrid refused to act, on the theory that the majority was not sufficiently decisive. That is my recollection. I have not looked up the debates; I did not think it necessary. I should not have referred to it at all had not the Secretary of State himself said that there was a precedent for a plebiscite. But Sir Wilfrid did not act, on the theory, as I recall it, that there was too nice a balance among the electorate. I think that is a fair statement of the position.

An hon. MEMBER: A great number did not vote.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Many did not vote, and there will be many who will not vote in this plebiscite; make no mistake about that.

That brings me to the consideration of this question: if upon this plebiscite the result is inconclusive, what will the Prime Minister do?

An hon. MEMBER: Stall a while.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): "Stall" is not a nice word to use; it is a slang word and I am not going to use it. But I have no doubt that if the result is indecisive the Prime Minister will do nothing unless the ministers who sit around him and beside him and who want to do something compel him to do something. If the exhibition we had from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) the other day is an indication, I am not at all sure that party loyalty and partisan considerations will not outweigh principle with hon. members on the treasury benches. I am afraid it will.

Why is this plebiscite being taken? Perhaps I should not rehash that whole story again, especially when it is so near six o'clock. But without doubt this plebiscite is being taken to save the face of the ministry. Has it a single element of courage about it? Silence gives consent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We are just being courteous.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, the minister usually is very courteous. I should thank him. But I am not quite so sure that that is the reason for his silence. If the result is indecisive, I ask, what is the ministry to do? Will they tell the house and the country? That is one of the first considerations. Someone should answer that question before this debate closes.

Mr. KIRK: You should go out and make it decisive.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the hon. member say that it is any responsibility of mine to go out and ask the people to vote for this plebiscite?

An hon. MEMBER: It is everybody's.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not my baby. On a matter of principle I prefer the direct approach rather than the indirect approach of hon. gentlemen opposite. I am prepared to stake my political life on any matter of principle, while hon. gentlemen opposite are seeking to hide and save their political skins behind a subterfuge, to do by the backdoor method something they do not dare to do at the front door. On the one hand their followers, like the premier of Quebec—I am not so sure about the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent); but at all events his political godfather the premier of Quebec—told the people of Quebec in the recent by-elections that the Prime Minister of this country had always been against conscription and always would be and there would be no compulsory military service—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He did not say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —while the Sifton press that supports this government is assuring people in the west, to keep the boys in line, that if the plebiscite carries of course there will be compulsory military service. Heads I win, tails you lose; that is what this is.

On the question of the plebiscite itself, I was astonished to hear the Secretary of State say that the question to be asked would not be in the bill but would be a matter of proclamation. As to the time, it is of course obvious that you could not, if you want to hold this plebiscite within a reasonable time, fix a definite date, because nobody knows when the bill, if passed, will become law. But certainly the Prime Minister gave the categorical undertaking that a certain question would be put to the people of this country. Why should it be left to a proclamation which may be twiddled around by the government and we may not have that question put to the people? You might have something entirely different, or something which will have a shaded meaning, or something which will be different in principle, even, from what was stated not only in the speech from the throne but by the Prime Minister himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I made the statement very clearly as to what the question would be. If my hon. friend has any doubt about my word in the matter certainly I would have no objection, as I do not think any of my colleagues would, to the question being inserted in the bill. I rather gathered from what the minister has said that it was assumed no one would question the word of the Prime Minister on a specific statement which related to a measure of this kind, and that the insertion of the question in the bill would therefore be superfluous.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to have the Prime Minister make that statement, because I want some certainty. When I hear the Secretary of State say that it will be the subject of proclamation, over which parliament will have no control but over which the government will have full control—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —I may be pardoned if I appear a little suspicious that there is some change in plan, or that there may be some change. Of course the Prime Minister now has pledged his word that the question will not be altered—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Absolutely not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and that, if necessary the question will be put in the bill. So that we have learned something this afternoon.

Mr. CRERAR: You had that statement before.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We had the statement, but that was all washed out when the Secretary of State said it would not be in the bill but would be in the proclamation.

Mr. McLARTY: But I stated that it would be identical with what the Prime Minister told this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understood that the general scope of the question would be the same, but the Prime Minister categorically placed upon the records of this house the exact question that would be asked.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the one that will be given to the people.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; now we certainly have got something definite on that point. I am glad I raised the question, because it left me, at all events, somewhat up in the air, if I might use the expression, as to what we could expect. Of course I had not seen the prepared statement of the Secretary of State. Hon. gentlemen opposite knew exactly what he was going to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had never heard a word of it until this afternoon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had to gather what I could as it went along. But I do not recall that the Secretary of State used the word "identical", or said that the question would be identical with what the Prime Minister had stated.

Mr. McLARTY: Just to clear that up, what I said was this: "The Prime Minister has already announced in this house the question that will be submitted to the people." I do not know that I used the word "identical"; I assumed that the question he announced in the house was the one that was going to the people, and stated so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not desire to get into any discussion, and I have never questioned the honour of the Prime Minister, as he knows. But I should just like to make this observation, that the Prime Minister's statement in the House of Commons cannot be read into a statute. I found that out in the course of some litigation; a statement made by Mr. Fielding, when he was Minister of Finance, did not receive much attention from the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. One would like to remind courts of law what legislators had in mind when they passed legislation, in order to ascertain the meaning of that legislation; but the judges of this country, the judges of Britain and for aught I know the judges of the neighbouring republic, treat very cavalierly statements made by legislators during the passing of legislation. Certainly I had no intention of questioning the Prime Minister's bona fides. I am glad I raised the question, however, because it is now certain.

I do not want to say anything more on the question of the general principle. Apparently the government are adamant in their decision to proceed, adamant even though the enemy may be knocking at our door. That would seem to be a difficult thing to comprehend. We will hold a plebiscite to ascertain whether the Prime Minister is to be relieved from an election pledge, when Vancouver may be under assault by Japanese forces. Is that not a ridiculous position in which to place the people of this country, and for the government of this country to be placed in, during war time? I do not think I shall say anything more about it, but as the opportunity offers, while now registering my disapproval of the whole procedure, I shall seek to analyse the detailed proposals as judicially as possible, with a view to improving them if that can be done.

It is now almost six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. I really do not think I can finish this afternoon, therefore I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 5.58 p.m.

Monday, February 23, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the clerk of the house has received from the chief electoral officer certificate of the election and return of the following member, viz.:

Of Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, for the electoral district of Welland.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, member for the electoral district of Welland, introduced by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. C. W. G. Gibson.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

RECOGNITION OF SOVIET UNION

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. What decision has the government reached regarding the recognition of our present ally the U.S.S.R.?
2. If recognition has been decided upon, will the government exchange representatives with the Soviet Union?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Answered by a special statement of Prime Minister in House of Commons, February 5, 1942.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MONTREAL TERMINAL

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. How much steel was used in the construction of the new Canadian National Railway station project in the city of Montreal during the years 1940 and 1941?
2. How many man-hours of skilled labour were used on this project during the years 1940 and 1941?
3. What has been the cost of this project to date?
4. What is the estimated cost of continuing this work for 1942?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. 1940, 1,903 tons; 1941, 1,614 tons.
2. Information not available as most of the work was performed under contract.
3. As required by the Canadian National Montreal Terminals Act, 1929, the railway authorities report to the Minister of Transport annually upon the nature and extent of the work on the said project. This report is tabled each session, and is expected shortly. It will contain the information called for by Questions 3 and 4.
4. See answer to question 3.

PORT ARTHUR TERMINAL ELEVATOR

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What amount of rental was paid to the government by McCabe Brothers Grain Company, Limited, for the rental of the government's terminal grain elevator at Port Arthur, during the years, 1939, 1940 and 1941?
2. What amount of storage fees were paid to the said McCabe Bros. Grain Company, Limited, for grain stored in the said elevator during the years, 1939, 1940 and 1941, and by whom was this amount paid?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

Crop year	Rent
August 1, 1938 to July 31, 1939..	66,876.37
August 1, 1939 to July 31, 1940..	72,230.98
August 1, 1940 to July 31, 1941..	67,900.25

2. No information.

POSTAL SERVICE—BONUS TO CITY EMPLOYEES

Mr. FAIR:

1. What cost of living bonus is being paid to employees in city post offices?
2. Is this bonus limited to 5 per cent on postage commission in the case of revenue postmasters? If so, for what reason?
3. Why was payment deferred until the 1st of October, 1941?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. Eleven per cent of compensation earned, or $11.91 per month, according to conditions as outlined in the Order in Council of the 26th August, 1941, P.C. 6702, as amended and interpreted by the Treasury Board.

2. Yes. Revenue postmasters are not paid a fixed salary as in the case of employees of city post offices. Instead they receive a commission, the amount of which increases in ratio to the amount of postal business transacted at their post offices. Under present day conditions there has been a general increase in postal business throughout the country, which has resulted in increased commissions to revenue postmasters.

3. The decision to grant revenue postmasters a cost of living bonus was not reached until some time in September, 1941, and the bonus was, therefore, made effective from the next month, 1st October, 1941.

LEASE OF REGINA BUILDING

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Has the government acquired a leasehold or any other interest in the whole or any part of a building situated on Eleventh avenue, Regina, being lots 1, 2 and 3 in block 308?
2. If so, from whom was such interest acquired?
3. What were the terms of payment for such interest?

4. What amount, if any, has been or is to be spent by the government to make the building suitable for its purposes?

5. What was the assessed value of the said building and lot?

6. What valuation was placed on the building by the government officials, (a) before; (b) after the completion of the building?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes.

2. David Silverman, Esq.

3. 72·84 cents per net square foot per annum for duration of war, plus six months with annual option to the crown of renewal at same rate thereafter.

4. Necessary partitioning, etc. for office accommodation will be installed by the government and removed by the government at conclusion of the lease.

5. Lot—$32,800; building—$16,930 (at 30% valuation).

6. New building not appraised for value by government officials. Such appraisal unnecessary for government purposes, but building appraised by city appraisal department for taxation purposes at $56,433.33.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE CONTROL—GRAPE FRUIT JUICE

Mr. LOCKHART:

What amount of foreign exchange will be required in connection with the importation of grape fruit juice in the year 1942?

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer to this question would involve an attempt to forecast the future and no such forecast can be made with any degree of accuracy.

*AIR RAID PRECAUTIONS—NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. ISNOR:

1. What air raid precaution equipment has been provided the province of Nova Scotia since January 1, 1940?

2. Have any complaints been received from the province of Nova Scotia or the city of Halifax, concerning (a) lack of A.R.P. equipment; (b) style, type, usefulness or uselessness of equipment received?

3. What further equipment, if any, will be sent to Nova Scotia within the next two or three months?

4. Has a report been received from the province of Nova Scotia concerning the disposition of equipment?

5. If so, to what centres was equipment sent, and what quantity to each?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer this question orally. The reply to questions 2 and 4 is no. It is not in the public interest to make public answers to the other questions, but I should be very glad to give the information privately to the hon. member or to any other hon. member of the house.

[Mr. Perley.]

QUEBEC CITY AIRMAIL SERVICE

Mr. PARENT:

1. Is the Postmaster General aware that there is a private air service between the cities of Quebec and Montreal?

2. Is the Postmaster General aware that there is no airmail service in the city of Quebec?

3. If so, will the minister establish an airmail service in Quebec city?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Matter under consideration.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BONUS PLAN

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. Is the dollar for dollar bonus for returned soldiers operating under the soldier settlement board still being paid?

2. If not, when was it discontinued and for what reason?

3. What consideration, if any, has the government given to the reestablishment of this bonus plan during the year 1942, and future years?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. No.

2. March 31, 1941, in accordance with amendment to the Soldier Settlement Act—2 George VI, Chapter 14, 1938, Subsection (1) of Section 73.

3. It has not been considered necessary to re-establish the "dollar for dollar" bonus provisions of the Act.

PUBLIC SERVICE—BILINGUAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. GOULET:

1. What was the total number of employees in the income tax division of the Department of National Revenue on May 15, 1941, (a) who speak one language only; (b) bilingual?

2. What was the total number of employees in the head office of the income tax division, on May 15, 1941, who (a) speak one language and are in receipt of less than $3,000 per annum; (b) bilingual and in receipt of less than $3,000 per annum; (c) speak one language and in receipt of $3,000 or more per annum; (d) bilingual and in receipt of $3,000 or more per annum?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. (a) 1,359; (b) 511.

2. (a) 176; (b) 40; (c) 31; (d) 5.

Mr. GOULET:

1. What are the names of the bilingual members of the following boards, (a) board of referees; (b) war contracts depreciation board; (c) succession duties?

2. What is the total number of employees employed in the head offices of such boards from September 1, 1939, to date, specifying, (a) those speaking one language only; (b) those who are bilingual?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. (a) The Honourable Mr. Justice W. H. Harrison.
(b) Nil.
(c) There is no board for administration of succession duties. This is dealt with by the Income Tax officials in general along with their other duties.

2. (a) (a) 15; (b) 4.
(b) (a) 6; (b) 1.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—BONUSES TO MANUFACTURERS

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Has any bonus been granted to the manufacturers of leather by the Wartime Prices and Trade Board?
2. Has the Wartime Prices and Trade Board granted a bonus to the manufacturer of any other commodity?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No.
2. Yes, subsidies have been authorized for milk, leather footwear and coal.

IMPORTS OF TAPIOCA STARCH

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What was the amount of tapioca starch imported into Canada during each month of the year 1941?
2. What was the value of such tapioca starch imported during each of these months?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1 and 2. No information. Tapioca starch not separately classified for statistical purposes.

WOOL IMPORTS AND PRODUCTION

Mr. HATFIELD:

In view of wool imports from Australia being cut off, what is being done to stimulate the raising of sheep for wool production in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: Some replacement of fine wool imported from Australia is made through fine wools produced in western Canada and some expansion has taken place in its production.

Ewes and rams have been imported from the United States by the Dominion Department of Agriculture and breeding flocks for flock improvement purposes have been established.

Wool grading has been introduced to improve the quality of wool generally and make it more suitable for Canadian requirements.

TURNIP, CARROT AND ONION SEEDS

Mr. HATFIELD:

Is any inducement being offered the farmers of Canada to raise more turnip, carrot and onion seeds, the import of which may be curtailed due to the war?

Mr. GARDINER: In cooperation with provincial departments of agriculture, arrangements have been made with respect to the growing of turnip seed under contracts.

Our requirements of onion and carrot seeds are largely produced in Canada and any shortage in particular varieties has been met by obtaining supplies from the United States to meet 1942 requirements.

NITRATE OF SODA

Mr. HATFIELD:

What provision has been made to secure a supply of nitrate of soda for use in Canada?

Mr. HOWE: Canada's requirements of nitrate of soda for 1942 have been provided for. Negotiations are now under way for an adequate supply for 1943 and no difficulty in this regard is anticipated.

AGREEMENTS UNDER WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

1. How many agreements have been concluded between his majesty and individuals or corporations pursuant to Part III of the War Exchange Conservation Act?

2. What is the estimated total value of the increase in Canadian exports which will result from such agreements?

3. What is the estimated present and future loss in revenue to the federal treasury due to the special credits and/or special allowances for depreciation or depletion which will result from such agreements?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. 29.

2. $27,793,000 (United States) annually when the additional facilities provided in the above agreements are in full operation.

3. These agreements have been drawn up in such a manner that the total tax revenues of the Dominion Government will not be less than they would have been in the absence of such agreements. The general principle followed has been that tax assistance given under these agreements should not be more than the additional profits resulting from the expansion programmes so that in general the taxes payable by these companies on their original operations are not reduced by the effect of the agreements. There is distinct probability that total tax revenues will be increased because of these agreements.

SYDNEY AND LOUISBURG RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Is a subsidy paid the Sydney and Louisburg Railway Company?
2. If so, for what reason and on what basis?

3. What amount, if any, was paid by way of subsidy to the said railway company for the years 1940 and 1941?

4. What were the earnings for the years 1940 and 1941 of the said company?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.

2. The Maritime Freight Rates Act, 1927, provides for a reduction of 20 per cent in ordinary tariff rates on railways operating in the Maritime area, the said Eastern lines to be reimbursed by the Dominion Government for the revenues thus denied them.

3. Fiscal year ended March 31, 1940—$192,457.19; Fiscal year ended March 31, 1941—$295,609.64.

4. Dominion Bureau of Statistics advise that this company reported earnings in 1940 (calendar year) as follows:

Gross revenues	$1,719,695
Operating expenses (including taxes)	1,127,805
Gross corporate income	591,890
Deduct non-operating expense	483,926
Net corporate income	$ 107,964

The operating figures for 1941 are not available as yet.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAR FERRY SERVICE

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

1. On what date was the car ferry Charlottetown sunk?

2. Was she insured for the voyage during which she sank?

3. If so, has the insurance been paid?

4. If so, what is the total amount of the insurance paid?

5. Was payment made to the government or to the Canadian National Railways?

6. Have any attempts been made to salvage the vessel?

7. If so, what is the nature of such attempts?

8. If not, why not and what consideration has been given to attempting her salvage?

9. Did the Minister of Munitions and Supply recently express confidence that it is possible to salvage this vessel?

10. If so, was this confidence based upon reports made to him by officers of the Department of Transport and/or the Canadian National Railways?

11. When was the car ferry Prince Edward Island built?

12. When was she first placed in service between Borden and Cape Tormentine?

13. When was she retired from regular use on such service?

14. Before her retirement from such service were reports made by officials of the Department of Railways and Canals and/or the Canadian National Railways to the effect that she was inadequate for this service?

15. What is the tonnage of the car ferry Prince Edward Island?

16. What is the tonnage of the car ferry Charlottetown?

17. Has any consideration been given to the building of a new car ferry to replace the Charlottetown?

18. If so, what decision, if any, has been reached?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. June 18, 1941.

2. Yes.

3. Yes.

4. $995,000.

5. Payment was made to Canadian National Railways in the first instance and then turned over to the Dominion Government, less an amount of $11,193.92 to reimburse the railway for capital expenditures on said vessel.

6. No.

7. See answer to question No. 6.

8. The following is an extract from the report of the Underwriter's Surveyer:

"The undersigned conferred with officials of the Canadian National Railways, also Maritime Towing & Salvage, Ltd., Halifax, and Messrs. Merritt, Chapman & Scott Corporation, New York, on the possibilities of salvage of the Charlottetown. The Salvage companies, after careful consideration of the vessel's location, and with the plans of the vessel at their disposal, consider the salvaging of the Charlottetown not practical. It is, therefore, recommended that no expense be incurred by attempting examination or salvage of the vessel."

This report was concurred in by Foundation Maritime Limited.

9. Not recently. Immediately following the loss of the vessel, hope was expressed generally that salvage would be possible. That hope was dispelled by the subsequent reports of the Underwriters' Surveyor, and Foundation Maritime Limited.

10. See answer to No. 9.

11. 1915.

12. 1917.

13. 1931.

14. The report of the royal commission on Maritime Claims (Duncan Report), dated September 23, 1926, page 27, reads as follows:—

"The present car ferry affords a much improved service as compared with that which the island formerly enjoyed, but in recent years traffic and freight have considerably increased, and will continue to increase, particularly at certain seasons of the year. When the present ferry steamer was constructed, it was not contemplated that there would be motor car traffic to be taken care of, and the arrangements at the piers are, from the point of view of this traffic, very unsatisfactory. There have been many complaints by visitors and tourists. During the winter there are frequent calls made upon the present ferry steamer, by reason of other craft getting into difficulties and the steamer requiring to proceed to their aid; and at times when the ferry steamer is undergoing overhaul, the boat taking its place is unsuited for the purpose. Altogether the ferry boat service is unsatisfactory. The railway administration admitted that there was need for supplemental provision being made in the form either of a second ferry boat or a special freight boat. We recommend that the matter be gone into from the point of view of placing at the disposal of the island such satisfactory means of communication as will ensure as regular and complete a service as can reasonably be made".

15. 2795 gross tons—1100 net tons.

16. 5889 gross tons—3385 net tons.

17. Matter receiving consideration. The time occupied in the construction of the Charlottetown was fifteen months and the cost $2,320,000. To replace the lost vessel would entail the use of 3300 long tons of urgently required ship steel (including machinery); would occupy almost one million man-hours of labour and, under prevailing conditions, the cost of such a vessel would be increased from 65 per cent to 75 per cent. The diversion of so much steel and labour from wartime industry is a matter requiring most careful consideration at a time so critical as the present.

18. See answer to Question 17.

*COASTAL MOTOR BOATS

Mr. BRUCE:

1. How many coastal motor boats have been ordered?

2. How many were completed by October 31, 1941?

3. What was the total cost?

4. How many of these boats reached Halifax before the close of navigation?

5. How many of these boats are now in commission?

6. In what state of completion are the balance of the boats?

7. At what points are any boats, which did not reach Halifax before the close of navigation, tied up?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, if I may say so, I think this question should be dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know anything about the question, and as the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) is not here, perhaps the minister would allow the question to stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

PENNFIELD RIDGE, N.B., AIRPORT

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Have any difficulties been found because of sea fogs and bad weather, in using the airport at Pennfield Ridge, New Brunswick?

2. Has it been found possible to use this airport for the training of pilots, or, have these had to be transported elsewhere for training?

3. On whose recommendation was this site chosen?

4. What is the total cost of building and equipping this airport?

Mr. POWER:

1. No difficulties have been found because of sea fogs and bad weather with respect to the use of the airport itself. The school originally allocated to this aerodrome was an air navigation school for the purpose of advanced training of air observers but the cloud layers in the surrounding district have been such as to make stellar sights and solar sights necessary for the teaching of air navigation difficult.

For this reason and reasons of economy it has been decided to amalgamate two air navigation schools in one, leaving the Pennfield Ridge site free to be used for the training of pilots in operations.

2. No pilot training has hitherto been attempted for the reasons mentioned in No. 1, but no difficulties are foreseen in the proposed change.

3. The Department of Transport and Aerodrome Development Committee recommended the siting of this school.

4. The following table shows the total cost of building and equipping this airport:

Construction of buildings, including heating contracts	$1,152,650 56
Services (water, sewers, roads, parade ground, fencing, etc.)	209,351 30
Railway siding	21,416 00
Total	$1,383,417 86

NORTH TORONTO BIBLE HOUSE—MAIL SERVICE

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Has the Post Office Department restricted or cut off the mail service to and from the North Toronto Bible House, 2721 Yonge street, Toronto?

2. If so, when was such order made?

3. What procedure was followed by the post office authorities in arriving at the decision to prohibit such service?

4. Was an investigation taken before doing so?

5. If so, was evidence taken at such investigation, and what persons gave evidence?

6. If no evidence was taken, were representations received requesting that such order be made, and what are the names of those who made such or any representations?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. Yes.

2. September 15, 1941.

3. The attention of the department having been directed to the fact that the Canadian mails were being used for the distribution of printed literature advertising certain books, the literature in question was submitted to the Deputy Minister of Justice, who ruled that it was published for an illegal purpose within the meaning of the Canadian Postal Regulations, and that the posting of such literature was forbidden by the postal regulations. As a result of this ruling, the department, acting in accordance with the procedure followed by all administrations, withdrew Canadian mailing facilities from the Protestant Book House of Toledo, Ohio, U.S.A., and The North Toronto Bible House, Toronto, Ontario, the names of which organizations appeared on the literature as distributors.

4. In view of the ruling of the Deputy Minister of Justice, an investigation was not considered necessary, but, as a result of protests received from the proprietor of The North Toronto Bible House, the circumstances of the case were fully explained to him and he was informed that if he would furnish an assurance that he would not in future use the Canadian mails for the distribution of the literature declared illegal by the Deputy Minister of Justice, the prohibitory order against the North Toronto Bible House would be cancelled. Although the proprietor of the above organization has been afforded more than one opportunity of furnishing the department with such an assurance, he refuses to do so. In view of this refusal and the ruling of the Department of Justice that the literature in question is illegal, the department has no option but to maintain the prohibitory order in effect until such time as the assurance asked for is furnished.

ERECTION OF BUILDINGS FOR OTHER THAN WAR INDUSTRY

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many licences have been granted for the erection of buildings other than those required for war industry since construction control has been adopted?

2. How many buildings have been erected pursuant to the issue of such licences?

3. What is value and location of each such building?

4. What is the total amount and value of the steel that went into such buildings?

Mr. HOWE:

1. There have been issued up to February 5, 1942, a total of 3,150 licences for the erection of buildings. Records covering these do not differentiate between war and non-war industries. A clear line of demarcation is not possible.

2. The department has no knowledge of how many buildings which have been licensed have not been erected.

3. The controller of construction has not the necessary staff to compile the extensive data requested re the 3,150 licences granted.

4. Information re the amount and value of steel used in the buildings which have been licensed is not asked for on the application for licence forms, and except in isolated cases is not available.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

How many orders in council have been passed, (a) since the outbreak of war; (b) while parliament has been in actual session during the said period; (c) since the beginning of the present session on January 22, 1942?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

(a) 20,677 orders in council and 11,645 treasury board minutes from September 1, 1939 to February 6, 1942, both dates inclusive.

(b) 5,470 orders in council and 3,161 treasury board minutes while parliament was actually in session since September 1, 1939.

(c) 412 orders in council and 166 treasury board minutes since the beginning of the present session on January 22, 1942.

STRIKES IN CANADA

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

How many strikes have taken place in Canada and what is the number of man-hours that have been lost in consequence during each of the years 1939, 1940 and 1941?

Mr. MITCHELL:

	Number of strikes and lockouts in existence	Time loss in man working days
1939.....	122	224,588
1940.....	168	266,318
1941.....	211*	430,812*

* Preliminary figures.

Strikes and lockouts are not recorded separately. A dispute which is clearly a lockout is rare. The calculation of time loss is not carried to man-hours.

WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION BONUS

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What amount was paid to farmers in each province, during the year 1941, under the wheat acreage reduction bonus?

2. What has been the cost of administration of this bonus?

3. What number of inspectors, supervisors and office staff have been employed in each province in connection with the administration of this bonus?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Manitoba, $2,931,908; Saskatchewan, $13,239,408; Alberta, $7,241,040.

2. To December 31, 1941—$644,015.03

3.

Province	Office Staff	Supervisors	Inspectors
Manitoba	62	10	43
Saskatchewan	133	16	307
Alberta	91	14	96

The above supervisors and inspectors also carry out the field work under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

CANADIAN ARMY—BADGES FOR DISCHARGED PERSONNEL

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government decided to issue a badge for discharged personnel?

2. If so, what instructions have been issued by the department to give effect to same?

3. Have such badges been issued or distributed to the various military districts?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. Yes.

2. Classification and regulations published in Canada Gazette dated December 13, 1941.

3. No. The badges will be issued direct from National Defence headquarters.

PURCHASE OF CHEESE FOR EXPORT

Mr. STOKES:

Ltd., Ingersoll, Ontario; Belleville Cheddar Cheese Ltd., Belleville, Ontario; Jas. A. Sanderson, Oxford Station, Ontario; Whyte Packing Company Ltd., Stratford, Ontario; Flavelles Limited, Lindsay, Ontario.

2. Brantford Produce Co. Ltd., Brantford, Ontario, refused permission to export cheese to the British Ministry of Food during 1941. P. W. McLagan Ltd., Montreal, Quebec, was instructed to discontinue buying cheese on October 1, 1941. This instruction was rescinded with respect to cheese made after the 31st of October, 1941.

3. No.

4. Yes.

5. This information is considered confidential.

FORTH-ULLIN, ALTA., RAILWAY LINE

Mr. SHAW:

1. Has the board of transport commissioners for Canada handed down a decision regarding the application of the Canadian Pacific Railway to abandon the line of railway between Forth and Ullin in the province of Alberta?

2. What was the nature of the decision?

3. Has this decision been made public?

4. If so, when and by what method was it made public?

Mr. CARDIN: The board of transport commissioners advise that no decision has as yet been reached in the application referred to. Judgment is expected shortly.

POPULATION—ENGLISH AND FRENCH LANGUAGE

Mr. PARENT:

1. What is the English language population born in Canada?

2. What is the English language population resident in Canada and born in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Ireland?

3. What is the French language population resident in Canada and born in France?

4. What is the population in Canada speaking French and born in Canada?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

Census of 1931

1. British Isles racial origin born in Canada—

English	1,920,259

DEPENDENTS' ALLOWANCE BOARD—RED DEER

Mr. SHAW:

1. How many district representatives and temporary employees have been engaged by the dependents' allowance board in the Red Deer federal constituency since September 1, 1939?
2. What are the names and addresses of all such persons?
3. When was each appointed?
4. What rate of salary or wages and allowances are paid to each?
5. What amounts have been paid to date to each such person?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. None.
2, 3, 4 and 5. See answer to question 1.

CHARTERED BANKS—REMUNERATION FOR FEDERAL SERVICES—INTEREST

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Do chartered Canadian banks receive remuneration for any of the following services: (a) acting as agents of the foreign exchange control board, (b) agents or representatives for the custodian of enemy property, in respect to enemy assets, (c) raising of funds by government for its ordinary needs and the prosecution of the war, (d) acting as agents for deliveries and finalization of subscriptions to governmental issues, (e) agents for the sale and distribution of war savings stamps and certificates?
2. What rate of interest is charged the Canadian government on, (a) borrowed money, (b) overdrafts?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. (a) Yes. The Canadian chartered banks receive from the Foreign Exchange Control Board a commission of one-eighth of one per cent on purchases and sales of foreign exchange completed by such banks in their capacity as authorized agents for the board. (b) No. (c) and (d) In the case of issues sold to the public prior to 1941, the chartered banks received the usual selling commission (usually three-quarters of one per cent on long term bond issues and one-quarter or three-eighths of one per cent on medium term issues) allowed by the government on all sales. In such issues the banks did not receive any other remuneration for the handling of applications from subscribers and for the delivery of bonds to purchasers. In the case of the 1941 Victory Loan the chartered banks did not receive any commission on sales negotiated by their offices but a service fee was paid for services rendered in connection with the receiving and handling of applications to purchase bonds and in connection with the delivery of bonds to the purchasers (excluding bonds purchased by certain government departments or agencies) on the following basis: one-quarter of one per cent of the principal amount of all bonds delivered except bonds for which payment was made from deposit accounts on the books of trust and loan companies. The same service fee is being allowed in connection with the second victory loan. (e) No.

2. (a) Particulars of interest paid by the Dominion of Canada on all borrowings will be found in the appendix to the public accounts of Canada entitled "Interest on Public Debt." (See pages 72-75 of the public accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1941.) (b) Since the commencement of operations of the Bank of Canada in March, 1935, the Dominion of Canada has not had an overdraft with any chartered bank. Particulars of interest paid on short-term ways and means advances by the Bank of Canada will be found in the appendix to the public accounts of Canada entitled "Interest on Public Debt." (See pages 72-75 of the Public Accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1941.)

BANK OF INTERNATIONAL SETTLEMENTS

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. Is Canada a member of the Bank of International Settlements?
2. What transactions, if any, have taken place between the Bank of Canada and any other member of the Bank of International Settlements since the outbreak of war?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The Bank of Canada is not a member of the Bank for International Settlements.
2. Transactions with other central banks which may be members of the Bank for International Settlements form a part of the ordinary banking operations of the Bank of Canada and it is not considered in the public interest to disclose any information concerning such transactions.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—CANADA'S MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax):

1. Did the Canadian National Railways distribute a booklet, Canada's Maritime Provinces, during the year 1941?
2. If so, how and where was this book distributed?
3. What was its total cost?
4. Was it prepared by Canadian National Railway officials in Montreal?
5. If not, who compiled the same?
6. Was the work supervised and checked by railway officials before acceptance?
7. If so, by whom?
8. What firm, or firms printed this booklet, and at what cost?
9. Were tenders called on this work?
10. Who supplied the picture of the four-masted schooner on page 14, labelled, Maritime Fishing Schooner?

10. Canadian National Railways' maritime province connections.

AIR RAID PRECAUTIONS—BLACK-OUT EQUIPMENT

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What equipment has been loaned or given to cities or to the provinces of central Canada, including Toronto, in connection with black-out?
2. What is the date of the next black-out in Toronto, what time will it begin and of what duration will it be?
3. Has any further direct home defence been afforded to municipalities since that set out in the return tabled last session, which sought by direct military aid from Canada to provide adequate local defence measures?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. It is not in the public interest to divulge information regarding quantities of equipment in any locality for air raid precautions.
2. No information since the authority to order black-outs in Toronto has been delegated to the attorney-general of the province of Ontario, who must obtain the approval of the senior defence officer in the area.
3. Question not understood.

*SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What is the number of soldier settlers who settled in Saskatchewan under the soldier settlement board?
2. What was the total original indebtedness of these settlers to the soldier settlement board?
3. How many of such original settlers are still on their land?
4. What was the original indebtedness of the settlers who are still on the land?
5. What are the total payments made by those who are still on the land?
6. What is the present indebtedness of those who are still on the land?

Mr. CRERAR: In regard to this question, there is a very great amount of work involved in preparing the answers to it in its present form. I suggest that the question be allowed to stand, and I would be glad if the hon. member who asked it would consult me about it, and perhaps we can reduce the amount of work required.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

COAL SUBVENTIONS

Mr. HANSELL:

1. What was the total amount paid in each province by the dominion government by way of subventions to assist in the movement of coal during each of the years 1939, 1940 and 1941?
2. What quantity of coal was moved in each province under these subventions during each of the above years?
3. To what companies, firms or individuals, and what amounts were paid under these subventions during each of the years 1939, 1940 and 1941?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Subventions are not paid to the provinces but to the railways or to coal mine operators or distributors.

Subventions paid, calendar years as follows:

Province of origin of coal	1939	1940	1941
Nova Scotia	$2,988,403 66	$2,643,366 54	$2,188,364 52

British Columbia	401,275	413,814	434,328
Totals (net tons)	3,403,581	3,008,290	3,318,968

3. It is not considered in the public interest to provide details of payments to individual companies, firms or individuals.

IMPORTS OF COAL

Mr. HANSELL:

What was the total tonnage of foreign coal imported into Canada during the years 1938 to 1941 inclusive, and from what countries?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Imports by countries of coal entered for consumption in Canada during the calendar years 1938 and 1939, and total imports of coal during the calendar years 1940 and 1941.

Countries	1938 Tons	1939 Tons	1940 Tons	1941 Tons

Alaska	....	52	....	....
Total imports	13,012,491	14,998,645	17,426,734	20,388,393

Countries for the years 1940 and 1941 not available.

AIR RAID PRECAUTIONS—BLACK-OUT REGULATIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Was the opinion of the Department of Justice obtained as to legality of the penalties imposed for breaches of black-out regulations?

2. What compensation is to be given in claims for damages to municipalities, or others, who sustain damage?

3. Have methods and plans in connection with various black-outs to be sanctioned by the government of Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. Yes.
2. No information.
3. No.

INTERNMENT OF ALIENS

Mrs. NIELSEN:

1. How many anti-Fascist and anti-Nazi internees sent from England still remain interned in Canada?

2. Where are they interned?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

3. What are the reasons for their continued detention?

4. Does the British government have to give its consent to their release?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. No person sent from England to Canada for internment came to Canada under the classification of "anti-Fascist" or "anti-Nazi". All civilians sent from England to Canada for internment were described as "civilian internees". Subsequent to the internment of the persons so sent, an official of the home office came to Canada and brought with him dossiers relating to individual cases. This official between November, 1940 and June 1941 investigated the cases of civilian internees and arranged for the return of some 700 of them to England. As a result of his investigations 1,542 of the remaining civilian internees were provisionally classified as refugees. On the 1st July, 1941, refugee camps were established under the supervision of a commissioner of refugee camps. The administration of these camps is separate and apart from the administration of internment camps. The number presently in refugee camps is 1,179. Since the refugee camps were established some 166 have been returned to the United Kingdom, some 121 have been released in Canada, under sponsorship, to continue their education, and 35 have been released to engage in war industries.

2. The refugee camps are located at Sherbrooke, P.Q., and Ile-aux-Noix, P.Q.

3. Persons may only be released for residence in Canada under the Immigration Act and each case is considered on its merits.

4. In respect of all cases of release, communication is had with the Government of the United Kingdom, in order to ascertain that there does not appear reason, disclosed in the records available in the United Kingdom to question the bona fides of the person recommended for release.

WARTIME HOUSING—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. REID:

1. How many houses have been constructed by Wartime Housing Limited in the province of British Columbia?

2. At what place or places were these constructed?

3. What has been the total cost of these houses, and the individual or average cost of each?

4. What valuation for sale has been placed on these houses, and does the price asked include the ground?

5. How many of these houses have been sold and on what terms?

6. Under whose direction were these houses constructed, and what firm or firms built them?

Mr. HOWE:

1. In process of construction—426.

2. North Vancouver—200. Prince Rupert—151. Esquimalt—75.

3. These projects are not completed and the following figures are estimates only. They include all accessory services such as sewers, water, walks, roadways, etc.

North Vancouver—Total, $599,395; average per house, $2,996.97.

Prince Rupert—Total, $516,468.75; average per house, $3,443.12.

Esquimalt—Total, $250,055; average per house, $3,334.06.

4. No valuation has been placed on the houses for sale.

5. None. The houses are not for sale.

6. Wartime Housing Limited, and the supervising architects for all projects are Messrs. McCarter & Nairne of Vancouver.

The houses are being built by: North Vancouver—Smith Bros. & Wilson of Vancouver; Prince Rupert—E. J. Ryan Construction Co. of Vancouver; Esquimalt—Bennet & White Construction Co. of Vancouver.

DISCONTINUANCE OF GOLD PRODUCTION

Mr. NICHOLSON:

Has the government negotiated with the governments of the United States and Great Britain with a view to discontinuing the production of gold for the duration of the war in order that men and materials now being used in gold production might be employed in other more essential industries?

Mr. McLARTY: No.

CANADIAN CONSUL AT ST. PIERRE-MIQUELON

Mr. LECLERC:

Does Mr. C. C. Eberts, Canadian consul at St. Pierre-Miquelon, speak French?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—EMPLOYMENT OF E. SAMPSON

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Was Mr. E. Sampson, Tuberose, Saskatchewan, employed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act or the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, or in any capacity at any time, during the year 1941?

2. If so, how much salary, mileage and expenses was he paid in each or any of these employments?

3. Did he receive a crop failure bonus for the year 1941 on the south ½ of section 4, township 23, range 15, west of the 3M., or any other property?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Mr. E. Sampson was employed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act from August 9th to December 31st, 1941, as an inspector.

2. Salary, $444.92; mileage, $425.74; Expenses, $83.60.

3. On the south ½ of section 4 and the southwest ¼ of section 9, township 23, range 15, west of the 3M., he received:

Under Prairie Farm Assistance Act....	$300
Under Prairie Farm Income.....	150
	$450

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—EMPLOYMENT OF R. WHALEN

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Was Mr. R. Whalen, Kyle, Saskatchewan, employed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act or the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, or in any capacity at any time, during the year 1941?

2. If so, how much salary, mileage and expenses was he paid in each or any of these employments?

3. Did he receive a crop acreage bonus for the year 1941?

4. If so, how much?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Mr. R. H. Whelan, not R. Whalen, was employed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act from April 17 to November 29, 1941, as an inspector.

2. Salary, $477.74; mileage, $414.90; expenses, $43.35.

3. Yes.

4.

Prairie Farm Assistance Act..	$196 50
Prairie Farm Income..	98 25
	$294 75

DECENNIAL CENSUS—EMPLOYMENT OF E. SAMPSON

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Was Mr. E. Sampson, Tuberose, Saskatchewan, employed in taking the 1941 census?

2. If so, what total amount did he receive for this service?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Yes.

2. $114.11.

GASOLINE PRICE INCREASE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. REID:

1. Was permission granted to the oil companies to raise the price of gasoline one cent per gallon in the province of British Columbia?

2. If so, what reasons were given for this increase at the present time, and in view of the fact that they were granted an increase in 1941?

3. Will part of this increase be passed on to the gas stations?

4. Have any applications been made by the oil companies for any increase in price on gasoline in any of the other provinces?

5. If not, what reasons were advanced by the oil companies for singling out British Columbia and compelling the people of that province to pay this further increase?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No permission has been granted to any oil company to raise the price of gasoline in the province of British Columbia since July 16, 1941. We have no information that the price has been raised. The increase of one cent per gallon of July 16, 1941, was common to every province in Canada.

2. There has been no increase granted since 1941.

3. Answered by 2.

4. No formal applications have been made in any of the other provinces for general increases in the price of gasoline since the price ceiling order of October 23, 1941.

5. Inasmuch as there has been no increase, the people of the province of British Columbia have not been singled out; on the contrary, there was an increase of one cent per gallon in October, 1941, in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes, but this increase did not apply to British Columbia or the prairie provinces.

SASKATCHEWAN AIR FIELDS—WATER SUPPLY

Mr. PERLEY:

1. What company, firm or individual had the contract or contracts for drilling wells and supplying water to the air fields and air training centres in the province of Saskatchewan?

2. What was the original price per foot for drilling wells and for gravel casings?

3. Was any of this work sub-let?

4. If so, to whom and at what price for such drilling and casing?

Mr. HOWE:

1. International Water Supply, Limited, London, Ontario. E. W. Rigsby, Regina, Sask. W. T. Cowley, Regina, Sask.

2. International Water Supply, Limited, not on the basis of a price per foot. The company was authorized to do preliminary test drilling at airports all through the prairie provinces. This work was done at a prearranged unit price of $2 per foot plus costs of transportation of drill-rigs and crews. On the basis of the results of test-drilling the contracts with International Water Supply were entered into with payment based on a unit price per gallon of water per minute actually produced. There were no unit prices per foot in their contracts. E. W. Rigsby, $15 per foot complete (for gravel wall well); W. T. Cowley, $18 per foot complete (for gravel wall well); E. W. Rigsby, $1.60 per foot (for 4-inch cased well).

3. Yes.

4. For test drilling only: H. D. Hadlund, $1.25 per foot; W. T. Cowley, $1.25 and $1.50; E. Rigsby, $1.25; R. E. Creelman, $1.25; Ward, $1.25.

The difference between the sub-contractors' rate and the contractor's rate is explained by the fact that the sub-contractors were supplied with well casing and miscellaneous equipment by the International Water Supply, Limited.

*"CAPTAINS OF THE CLOUDS"—VISIT OF MEMBERS OF R.C.A.F. TO NEW YORK

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Who was responsible for the sending to New York recently of hundreds of members of the Royal Canadian Air Force to witness the premiere of a moving picture entitled Captains of the Clouds?

2. To what extent did the dominion treasury contribute to the cost of this expedition, including and covering the expenses of all other individuals who went from Ottawa to witness this premiere?

Mr. POWER: I should like to answer this question verbally. This picture, "Captains of the Clouds", deals largely with the joint air training scheme. It is a picture on which Warner Brothers have spent over $1,900,000. The Royal Canadian Air Force sent to the premiere in New York a band and a number of men who gave an exhibition in New York, partly in order to assist at the ceremonies of the premiere, but partly by way of reciprocity for what the United States government did in sending some hundreds of American troops here on a visit of friendship. All expenses were defrayed by Warner Brothers, with the exception of transportation to New York, which amounted to $5,739.04.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Mr. PERLEY:

1. How many meetings were held by the advisory committee to the Canadian wheat board from July 1, 1941, to date?
2. Where were such meetings held and what subsistence allowances and travelling expenses were paid to each member attending these meetings?
3. Has the advisory committee made any recommendations to the wheat board with respect to prices and marketing 1942 crop?
4. If so, what are the said recommendations?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Meetings held from July 31 to date—August 27, 1941; December 8 and 9, 1941; January 12, 13, and 14, 1942.
2. The August meeting was held in Calgary, and the other two meetings were held in Winnipeg.

3 and 4. Matter of government policy, not considered in the public interest.

DECENNIAL CENSUS

Mr. HAZEN:

1. How much money has the government spent to date in taking the census?
2. How much money has the government spent to date in each province in taking the census?

Mr. MACKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. The amount spent to January 31, 1942, on account of 1941 census is $2,130,215.
2. No record of amount spent in each province.

STE. ANNE DE LA POCATIERE, QUE., FISHERIES SCHOOL

Mr. ROY:

1. Has the government received representations from the provincial government of Quebec, through the Minister of Fisheries or any other person, recommending the withdrawal of federal grant from the fisheries school at Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere?
2. If so, on what date were such representations received and what action has the government taken thereon?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.

LANCASTER MILITARY HOSPITAL

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What were the names of all employees, including medical and clerical staff, of Lancaster hospital, West Saint John, from the year 1919 to the year 1941?
2. What were their salaries per year and what were their pensions per year from 1919 to 1941?
3. Were any of these employees supplied with automobiles by the government? If so, how many and what are their names?
4. What were the prices of these automobiles?
5. What year were such automobiles purchased?
6. What was the cost of operating these cars from the date of purchase to the year 1941?
7. What year was Lancaster hospital opened as a military hospital?
8. What was the total cost of the Lancaster hospital since its opening as a military hospital to the year 1941?

9. What was the cost of all repairs to Lancaster hospital since its opening as a military hospital to the year 1941?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I regret that it is not possible to answer this question for the period it covers. I should be glad to notify my hon. friend in regard to all information available in the department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let it stand. The hon. member who asked the question is not here to-day, but he will be present to-morrow. I will draw his attention to the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

NEW BRUNSWICK PENSION TRIBUNAL

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What are the names of all the employees of the pension tribunal which was formed in New Brunswick in 1930 and abolished in 1933?

2. What were their expenses, including travelling expenses, from the time the tribunal was established until it was abolished?

3. What compensation was paid to the members and employees of this tribunal when it was abolished in 1933?

4. Who was the pension advocate and what were his educational qualifications and his previous experience?

5. What previous pension experience had the members of the pension tribunal?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. No pension tribunal was formed in New Brunswick; the pension tribunal constituted under the authority of an act to amend the Pension Act, chapter 35 of the statutes of 1930, heard applications at convenient places throughout Canada.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

4. Two pensions advocates of the veterans' bureau, appointed to prepare and present applications for pension appeared before the pension tribunal in New Brunswick between 1930 and 1933, namely:

(1) Lt.-Col. George Alex. Gamblin, M.C., V.D. Educational qualifications: public school; business college; diploma in accounting—no previous pension experience

(2) Major C. R. Mersereau. Educational qualifications: Chatham grammar school; Chatham high school; Mount Allison University, one year Arts; King's College law school. B.C.L. (1922)—no previous pension experience.

5. Answered by No. 1.

NATIONAL WAR SERVICES—H.N.M. STANBURY

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Is H. N. M. Stanbury in the employment of the Department of National War Services?

[Mr. Hatfield.]

2. If so, what is his salary, what are his duties and what was his former occupation?

Mr. THORSON:

1. Yes.

2. (a) $2,880 per annum.

(b) To promote salvage organizations in communities where they do not exist, and to stimulate the conservation and collection of secondary material throughout the maritime provinces.

(c) Last position—Manager of the Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation and the Canada Permanent Trust Company.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—DOUGLAS LORIMER

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Is Douglas Lorimer an employee of the Department of Munitions and Supply?

2. If so, what is his salary, what are his duties and what was his former occupation?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes; appointed by order in council No. 4996, July 10, 1941.

2. (a) Mr. Douglas Lorimer is on loan to the department by his firm, and receives no salary from the department. He is paid his actual out-of-pocket travelling expenses incurred by him in the exercise of his powers or discharge of his duties as Controller of Chemicals.

(b) To control, restrict and regulate the production, sale, distribution, consumption and use of chemicals which are, or are likely to be, or may be, necessary or useful for, or in connection with, the production, storage, transportation, and/or supply of munitions of war, or necessary or useful for the needs of the government or of the community in war, with a view to conserving the financial, material and other resources of Canada and facilitating the production of munitions of war and supplies essential for fulfilling the present and potential needs of Canada and her allies.

(c) Mr. Lorimer, prior to his appointment, was vice-president and managing director of May and Baker (Canada) Limited, which is the Canadian house of the international chemical firm of May and Baker Limited, Dagenham, England. Mr. Lorimer has been in the chemical business 45 years.

EMBARGO ON EXPORT OF PULPWOOD

Mr. HATFIELD:

What consideration, if any, has the government given to the exemption from the pulpwood export embargo, of pulpwood cut by farmers on farm property?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): There is no embargo on the export of pulpwood cut by farmers on farm property. The export of pulpwood is, however, under export control. Where farmers regularly exported in the past, they are allowed to continue to export normal quantities to the United States.

SHIPMENTS OF CERTIFIED SEED POTATOES TO SOUTH AMERICA

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Did the Department of Agriculture prohibit the issuing of certificates of health on shipments of certified seed potatoes to any country in South America during the month of December, 1941?

2. If so, for what reason?

Mr. GARDINER: 1 and 2. The Department of Agriculture issued instructions to withhold certificates of health to cover the export of potatoes to Uruguay pending an investigation of arrangements with regard to shipping space.

WARTIME HOUSING—FOUNDATIONS AND CELLARS

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Of what construction are the foundations of the houses built by Wartime Housing Limited?

2. Are cellars provided in these houses?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The houses are built on posts—usually of concrete. Where the cost is too great, wood cedar posts are used.

2. No.

PRISONERS OF WAR

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Who is the protecting power so far as Canadian prisoners of war in Germany and Italy are concerned, as successor to the United States of America?

2. Has the United States been thanked for the splendid work they did in Germany, Italy and the occupied countries, in aid of British prisoners of war?

3. What neutral countries are available for this work in the future, and what arrangements, if any, have been made by the government, through Great Britain or otherwise, with the governments of the enemy countries for looking after and safeguarding the interests of our prisoners of war?

4. What power, in lieu of America, is now acting as our protecting power for the inspection of enemy war camps and repatriation of prisoners?

5. What friendly country is at present the protecting power in the case of Japan and the Canadians there who are prisoners of war in the Pacific and Far East, and is there any inspection of Japanese internment camps by a protecting power?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The protecting power for Canadian interests in Germany and Italy is Switzerland. The responsibility of the Swiss authorities for the protection of Canadian interests in these countries includes the protection of all members of the Canadian forces taken prisoner by Germany and Italy.

2. The Canadian minister at Washington has expressed to the department of state the gratitude of the Canadian government for services rendered by the United States as the protecting power for Canadian interests in Germany and Italy and in territories occupied by Germany and Italy.

3. It is not possible to say what neutral countries might be available to serve as protecting powers for Canadian interests should further occasion arise. The Canadian government is and has been taking parallel action with the governments of the United Kingdom and of the other dominions for the protection of members of the Canadian forces taken prisoner by the enemy through the protecting powers for Canadian interests and through the International Red Cross Committee at Geneva. The specific arrangements made are those provided for by the International Prisoner of War Convention of 1929.

4. As stated in reply to question 1 Switzerland has assumed the protection of Canadian interests in Germany and Italy and German and Italian occupied territories. This responsibility includes the inspection of prisoner of war camps where Canadians are held and making arrangements for the exchange of sick and wounded prisoners of war. Argentina as the protecting power for Canadian interests in Japan and Manchuria exercises a similar responsibility there.

5. Argentina is the protecting power for Canadian interests in Japan and Manchuria. Switzerland is the protecting power for Canadian interests in occupied China. Up to the present, no reports have been received of inspections by representatives of the protecting power of internment camps in Japan and China where Canadians are detained.

CAR FERRY "PRINCE EDWARD"

Mr. McCULLOCH:

1. Are the boilers of the ice-breaking car ferry, Prince Edward, to be converted from coal burning to oil burners?

2. If so, who authorized such change?

3. What is the purpose?

4. Is oil as economical as coal?

5. Is oil as easily obtainable as coal in the section in which the car ferry operates?

Mr. CARDIN.

The Canadian National management have replied to this inquiry as follows:

1. Yes.

2. The Oil Controller on the recommendation of the railway management.

3. To provide more reliable and efficient operation.

4. Yes.

5. No difficulty is being experienced.

REPRESENTATION OF CANADA ON INTER-ALLIED WAR BOARDS

Mrs. NIELSEN:

1. Is the government taking measures to have representatives of Canada take seats upon all inter-empire and inter-allied boards, charged with responsibility for the strategic direction of the war and the production and allocation of munitions and war materials?

2. If so, who will represent Canada upon (a) the Chiefs of Staff board in Washington, (b) the Munitions Assignment board in Washington, (c) the Pacific council in London?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. This is a matter for consideration with the governments of the other nations concerned. Many factors, such as scope, functions and responsibilities, must be taken into account in each case.

Canadian interests in these matters are being given the closest attention.

2. See answer to No. 1.

FRONTENAC CREAMERIES—COLD STORAGE

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

1. What financial support, if any, was given by the government to the Frontenac Creameries of Kingston for the purpose of cold storage?

2. What financial guarantee was given by the Frontenac Creameries to the project?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Paid: 1940, $2,100.83; 1941, $980.39. Amounts to be paid, 1942, $560.22; 1943, $280.11; 1944, $280.11.

2. No information.

*CANADIAN NAVY

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Of the 350 ships or more that comprised the Canadian navy at the beginning of this year, how many were: (a) battleships, (b) cruisers, (c) aircraft carriers, (d) submarines, (e) destroyers, (f) corvettes, (g) mine sweepers, (h) patrol boats, (i) motor torpedo boats, (j) sloops, trawlers and other craft.

2. What is the total tonnage of the Canadian navy?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I would ask my hon. friend to allow the question to be dropped from the order paper.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On what grounds?

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, no. I am not questioning the decision, but there must be a reason assigned. The minister cannot arbitrarily say "Question dropped".

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Has my hon. friend the leader of the opposition read the question?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Does he insist that it be answered?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say that. What I did say was that a reason should be given, and it is not open to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services arbitrarily to say that a question shall be dropped; that is not within his jurisdiction.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It is as much within my jurisdiction to say that it should be dropped as it is for the hon. gentleman opposite to say that it should not be dropped.

Mr. HOMUTH: He did not say that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All that I ask is that reasons be given.

Mr. HOMUTH: We in this house still have some rights.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not many, but a few.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No. I object to that.

FERTILIZER BONUS

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Is the government paying a bonus on the fertilizer used in the production of spring wheat in eastern Canada?

2. If so, why is the government paying such bonus and at the same time paying a bonus in western Canada for summer-fallow rather than wheat?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes.

2. Spring wheat in eastern Canada is largely used for feed purposes, the supply of which has not been adequate for requirements. Assistance provided for summer-fallow for 1941 in western Canada was limited to wheat acreage reduction which was summer-fallowed.

TRANSFERS FROM ARMY TO AIR FORCE

Mr. CORMAN:

1. Can a young man in training at Halifax, under the National Resources Mobilization Act, enlist at Hamilton, Ontario, in the Royal Canadian Air Force, when home on leave?

2. If not, why not?

3. Are there any arrangements for such transfers in different military districts?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. No, except he make arrangements with the commanding officer of his unit and air force authorities before going on leave.

2. On transfer from army to air force a man must be medically examined, his army pay adjusted, uniform and equipment turned in and deficiencies accounted for by the soldier, and formalities of discharge from the army, including discharge certificate, completed. There must be liaison between the commanding officer of the soldier's unit and the air force recruiting officer. To adjust these matters satisfactorily the man should be at his training centre or unit. These arrangements can be made at Halifax before the man leaves, however, in which event it is possible for him to enlist at Hamilton.

3. Yes, under arrangement between army and air force, instructions have been issued and have been in operation for many months.

Every National Resources Mobilization Act soldier cannot enlist in the air force. During his first two months at the basic training centre an "R recruit" may freely enlist, and air force officers then may recruit these men at the centres. While at the advanced training centre, or on home defence service, the man cannot enlist in the air force unless he has made application therefor before commencing basic training, and the district officer commanding consents. After the man is made into a trained soldier and has become an integral part of an army he would not be allowed to transfer to the air force unless there were special reasons why it should be done.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. ROY:

1. Has the government reached a decision on the subject of the adoption of a distinctive national flag for Canada?

2. If so, what is that decision?

3. If not, what is the reason that Canada has not her own flag?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.

2. Answered by no. 1.

3. Matter is one still under consideration.

Mr. ROY:

1. Has the government declared war with other countries in 1939, 1940 and 1941, in the name of Canada as an autonomous country and independent of England?

2. If so, are our armies fighting under a Canadian flag?

3. If not, why have they not their own flag?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. It is substantially correct to say that Canada declared war with other countries in 1939, 1940 and 1941 as an autonomous country and independently of the United Kingdom. It would, perhaps, be more correct to say that, following upon the decision of the parliament of Canada, advice was tendered to His Majesty the King by the Prime Minister of Canada. Pursuant to this advice, His Majesty approved the issuing of proclamations in Canada in his name declaring the existence of a state of war with Canada in the following cases: (a) Germany, September 10, 1939; (b) Italy, June 10, 1940; (c) Hungary, Roumania and Finland, December 7, 1941; (d) Japan, December 7, 1941.

2. The Canadian armies do not fight under a Canadian flag as a national colour, as there is no flag lawfully authorized for general use. There are, however, divisional flags, the use of which is authorized for special purposes.

3. See answer to No. 2.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ENLISTMENTS—RECORDS BY MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will any change be made in the keeping of the records of his majesty's forces so as to enable a municipality, as in the last war, to know the names of its citizens who enlist?

2. How many men in his majesty's forces have enlisted, (a) for home defence; (b) for service anywhere?

3. If so, did the government express approval or disapproval of the representations made by the delegation?

4. What is the amount of the appropriation made by the Department of National War Services for the purpose of educational work to discourage the use of alcoholic liquors?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

AGREEMENTS BETWEEN DOMINION AND MUNICIPALITIES RESPECTING MUNICIPAL SERVICES

Mr. WINKLER:

1. What agreements or contracts has the government with municipalities other than with the corporation of the city of Ottawa for services usually provided by municipalities?

2. What valuation is placed on government real estate and buildings in the corporation of Ottawa?
3. What relation or proportion does this figure bear toward the municipal assessment of the corporation of Ottawa?

GRANTS FOR CADET SERVICES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will the government consider reestablishing grants to school boards or boards of education for cadet services and towards the cost of uniforms and instructions?
2. What was the prior policy?
3. What is the present policy?
4. Will any changes be considered so as to aid recruiting for the reserve army?
5. Were any requests for such grants received by the government?
6. If so, what action will be taken?

PRICE CEILING

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. How many manufacturing plants in Canada, if any, have closed down due to there being a price ceiling on manufactured goods and no such restriction on raw materials?
2. Is an import bonus being paid by authority of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board on any articles of food or manufactured goods?
3. If so, upon how many articles and what are they?
4. Is a bonus being paid on certain articles in Canada in order to keep their cost to the consumer below the price ceiling?
5. If so, on how many and what are they?

Mr. ILSLEY: Return tabled.

GOLDEN BALL GARAGE BUILDING, SAINT JOHN, N.B.

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Has part of the building known as the Golden Ball Garage, on the corner of Sydney and Union streets, in the city of Saint John, New Brunswick, been rented to the government?
2. If so, what part, from whom and at what rental?
3. When was it rented and for how long a period?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

DOMINION ARSENALS—MEDICAL EXAMINATION OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. ROY:

1. What is the name of the doctor in Quebec whose duty it is to examine employees of both sexes working in the dominion arsenals at Quebec and at Valcartier?
2. Since the beginning of the war what salary has been paid to him monthly for examinations, or for treatment of such employees in case of accidents?
3. What is the total amount paid to him for expenses, salary or honoraria of all kinds?

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled.

CANADIAN ARMY PENSIONS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many soldiers have been returned from overseas since the beginning of the present war, (a) unfit for service; (b) unlikely to make satisfactory soldiers?
2. Of this number how many are still serving in the Canadian army?
3. Of those returned, (a) how many have applied for pensions; (b) how many have been held entitled thereto; (c) how many appeals have been taken against refusals to award pensions; (d) of these, how many (i) have been finally determined; (ii) how many still remain to be heard; (iii) in how many cases to date have appeals been allowed?
4. What is the total amount paid to date and since the outbreak of the present war for pensions for services in the present war?

WAR SAVINGS CAMPAIGN

Mr. CHURCH:

What is the breakdown of the sum of $1,244,129.11, which was spent on the war savings campaign to the end of 1941 with respect to, (a) salaries, (b) travelling expenses, (c) hotel expenses, (d) dinners and banquets, (e) entertainment, (f) billboards, (g) newspaper and magazine advertising, (h) radio, (i) local advertising and entertainment, and other publicity, (j) remuneration paid to personnel?

CANADIAN ARMY—TRAINING FOR OFFICER RANK

Mr. WHITE:

1. Is it the rule of the Department of National Defence that a person who never served in any army or graduated from the Royal Military College, and who now desires to join the armed forces with officer rank, must first join up as a private and serve in the ranks as such for several months before he will be put in training for officer rank?
2. Are there any exceptions or exemptions to this rule; and if there are, when were the exceptions and exemptions set up, to what classes of persons do they apply, in what parts of Canada are they being made effective, and what is the nature of the exceptions and exemptions and why are they set up?
3. Are there boards to select prospective young Canadians both English and French to take officer training without first serving in the ranks?
4. If there are any such boards who are the members of the various boards, what are the military qualifications of each member, when were the boards set up, and where are they located?
5. How many young men (a) English speaking, (b) French speaking have been selected by these boards to take officer training without first serving in the ranks?

Mr. RALSTON: Return tabled.

WAR SAVINGS CAMPAIGN—REVENUE AND COSTS

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. What amounts have been raised in each of the years, 1939, 1940 and 1941, through the sale of war savings certificates and stamps?
2. What was the expenditure incurred in connection with the sale of war savings certificates and stamps in each of the above years for (a) advertising and sales promotion, (b) printing certificates and stamps, (c) compilation of

2. What are the names of the persons or firms to whom grants or bonuses have been paid, or who have made claims for such grants or bonuses on vinegar-cured herring in the calendar years 1937 to 1941, inclusive, stating the amount paid or claimed by each person or firm for each year, and the quantity of fish in each case?

NEW GLASGOW, N.S. MILITARY TRAINING CENTRE

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Did the Department of National Defence purchase or lease lands and buildings from the Standard Clay Products Limited, at or near New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, for the purpose of a military training centre?

2. If so, what sums have been paid or are payable up to December 31, 1941, to the Standard Clay Products Limited for such lands and buildings as, (a) purchase price, (b) rentals?

3. What has been the total cost to December 31, 1941, on account of such training centre for, (a) improvements to grounds, (b) repairs or improvements to buildings, (c) new buildings, (d) equipment and installations in buildings and on premises, (e) total costs?

4. Did the department enter into contracts with the Eastern Woodworkers for buildings or supplies in connection with the military training centre at New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, in 1940 and 1941?

5. If so, of what nature and to what value?

6. Did the department purchase lumber from the Eastern Woodworkers for such centre?

7. If so, what quantity and at what cost, during the years 1940 and 1941?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—MONTREAL TERMINAL

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What was the total expenditure to December 31, 1941, in connection with the new Canadian National Railways station at Montreal, including excavation, building construction, furniture, furnishings, equipment of whatsoever nature, and also including rearrangement of tracks, yards and all other items incidental to the establishment of the new terminal, specifying, (a) expenditures by the government of Canada, (b) expenditures by the Canadian National Railways and subsidiaries?

2. What further estimated sums are required to complete the project?

3. What is the estimated completion date?

4. What is, (a) tonnage of steel delivered to December 31, 1941, in connection with the project, (b) estimated tonnage of steel required to complete the project over and above tonnage delivered to December 31, 1941?

5. Have municipalities been refused steel for, (a) street cars, (b) use in needed betterments of municipal public utilities and other municipal services that cannot be postponed till after the war?

6. What is the policy involved and decided on?

7. What municipalities were refused needed equipment as aforesaid?

8. Is the Canadian National Railways, a public utility, building new cars and other equipment and betterments, and is it securing equipment denied to municipal public utilities?

UPLANDS AIRPORT RAILWAY EXTENSION

Mr. REID:

1. Was an application made to the Board of Transport Commissioners by the Canadian Pacific Railway for permission to link up with the Canadian National Railways within Uplands airport?

2. Was the request granted?

3. If not, what were the reasons given for refusing the application made by the Canadian Pacific Railway?

4. What reasons were advanced by the Canadian Pacific Railway to the Board of Transport Commissioners showing the need for duplication of railway services to Uplands airport?

5. What number of tons of steel were used by the Canadian Pacific Railway in the construction of a line of track from Prescott to Uplands?

H.M. FORCES—SALUTES

Mr. CHURCH:

What regulations are now contemplated with regard to the abolition of salutes by members of his majesty's forces when not on parade?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—WHEAT ACREAGE BONUS

Mr. PERLEY:

1. How many claims were made to the Department of Agriculture for the wheat acreage reduction bonus prior to January 31, 1942, in each of the three prairie provinces?

2. How many of such claims were (a) paid in full, (b) partly paid, (c) refused?

3. What amount was paid in each of the three prairie provinces in connection with such claims?

4. How many cheques were issued on the wheat acreage reduction bonus for (a) $1,000 to $5,000, (b) $5,000 to $10,000, (c) over $10,000?

5. How many awards were made under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in each of the three prairie provinces and what was the total amount paid in each province?

6. How many farmers received payment under the prairie farm income in each of the three prairie provinces and how much was paid on same prior to January 31, 1942?

TRACADIE, N.B., ARTILLERY RANGE

Mr. GILLIS:

1. How many parcels of land have been expropriated by the Department of National Defence for the artillery range at Tracadie, New Brunswick?
2. From whom have they been acquired?
3. What price was paid for each parcel?
4. How many have not yet been settled for?
5. What amount of taxes, both for schools and municipal tax, including road tax, was due on each parcel?
6. How were these taxes settled for?
7. What amount of money was paid to Clovis P. Richard, M.L.A. (agent solicitor) for the Department of Justice, in searching the title, attending to the execution of the title deed, etc., for each parcel, showing detailed statement?
8. What was the method used in arriving at a value of the various lots comprised within the area?
9. Has any protest been filed by any one regarding the methods used to induce the settlers to hand over their properties to the department?
10. Have any of the settlers protested against the adjustment of the amounts offered them in settlement for their lands? If so, what are their names?
11. Have any of these persons offered their lands gratis for the purpose for which they have been acquired, for the duration of the war, rather than accept the offer made by the department? If so, what are their names?
12. What settlement was made with those who were living on lots approved by the government of New Brunswick, but for which no grants had been issued, and what amounts were paid in each case and by whom were these amounts paid?
13. By whom were the several parcels of land appraised?
14. Is this area in a French speaking community?
15. Did the appraisers sent to make agreements with the people for the sale of their lands speak French? If not, how was conversation carried on between the adjuster and the settler or owner of the land, and who acted as interpreter?
16. What amount of money was paid to him and what are details of his account, both as interpreter and as taxi driver for the adjuster?
17. How many of these lots are in Northumberland county (if any) and have any adjustments been made with the people living there?
18. Is it the intention of the department to extend this range? If so, in what direction will it be extended?
19. What amount of money was paid by way of adjustment, or compensation, to the commission in charge of the estate of George Dignard, how was the amount arrived at and how many lots of land were involved?
20. Have any houses been destroyed on lands that have not yet been settled for? If so, whose?

STE. ANNE DE LA POCATIERE, FISHERIES SCHOOL

Mr. ROY:

1. Has the government paid any grant directly or through the medium of the provincial government of Quebec to the fisheries school at Ste. Anne la Pocatiere, Quebec?
2. If so, for what amount and for what years?

Mr. MICHAUD: Return tabled.

B.C. DOG-FISH LIVERS AND FISH LIVER OILS

Mr. REID:

1. Who is the controller of dog-fish livers and fish liver oils for the province of British Columbia?
2. Under what department of government does such controller operate?
3. What position did he occupy before appointment to this office?
4. What salary does he receive?
5. Has the Department of Fisheries any control or jurisdiction over such controller?
6. Is the Department of Fisheries consulted by the controller in matters pertaining to the prices set by him?
7. What is the maximum price allowed fishermen in British Columbia for dog-fish and other fish livers?
8. Is any maximum price fixed on the fish liver oils processed and sold to the buyers or public by the manufacturers of these fish oils?
9. What price is being paid to United States fishermen for dog-fish and other fish livers?
10. What price is being charged by processers of fish liver oils to buyers in the United States?

BREN GUN—JOHN INGLIS PLANT

Mr. BRUCE:

1. What was the total amount of money expended by the government in building the necessary additions and repairs to the original John Inglis boiler plant to provide accommodation for the manufacture of Bren guns?
2. What amount of money did the government spend in providing new equipment for this plant?
3. What was the value of the old equipment transferred to this plant?

INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS MACHINES LIMITED

Mr. MARSHALL:

What amounts have been paid in each of the years, 1936 to 1941, inclusive, to International Business Machines Limited, for rental of business and accounting machines by the various departments of the dominion government?

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. At what places in Canada have housing units and staff houses been built by Wartime Housing Limited, and how many are being constructed at each place?
2. How many houses were occupied at each place on January 31, 1942?
3. How many were residing in each staff house on January 31, 1942?
4. How many were employed at each staff house during January, 1942?
5. What rent is being charged for each house by Wartime Housing Limited?
6. In what centres have Wartime Housing Limited completed building houses and providing the necessary services?

7. What was the average cost per unit, including all services?

8. What was the total amount paid for the administration of Wartime Housing Limited up to January 31, 1942?

9. What experience did Victor T. Goggin have as an architect or builder, prior to being appointed general manager of Wartime Housing Limited?

WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION REGULATIONS

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. What is the total amount paid to date under the wheat acreage reduction regulations, and what amount is still to be paid?

2. What is the total number of acres taken out of wheat production, (a) summer-fallow, (b) sown to coarse grains?

3. What is the total cost of supervising and administering payment of this bonus?

4. What are the names and addresses of persons who acted as supervisors and inspectors in the administration and payment of this bonus, and what amounts were paid to each by way of (a) salary, (b) expenses?

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. What is the total amount paid under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act for the crop year 1941-42?

2. What is the total amount still to be paid for the crop year 1941-42?

3. What amount has been paid under section 3 of the act, and what amount under section 4?

4. What amount was paid in each of the prairie provinces?

5. What was the total cost of administration of the said crop during the crop year 1941-42?

6. What was the total amount received from the one per cent levy under the said act for the crop year 1941-42?

7. What are the names and addresses of the persons employed as inspectors and supervisors under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in the province of Saskatchewan, and what amount was paid to each in (a) salary, (b) expenses?

INDIANS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. What was the total Indian population in British Columbia at the 1941 census, (a) male, (b) female?

2. How many Indian agencies are there in British Columbia and what are their names and locations?

3. How many Indian schools are there in British Columbia?

4. How many hospitals are assisted by the Indian department in British Columbia and what are their names and locations?

5. What was the total expenditure for 1941 of each agency?

CANADIAN ARMY—CHAPLAINS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many chaplains are there in the Canadian army, (a) in Canada, (b) overseas?

2. How many (a) in Canada, (b) overseas are (1) Protestant, (2) Roman Catholic; (3) Jewish?

3. What is the unit or numerical basis, if any, whereby entitlement of the said religious faiths to appointment of a chaplain is determined?

4. How many chaplains are there in each of the following religious denominations, (a) Anglican; (b) United; (c) Presbyterian; (d) Baptist?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS—COST OF LIVING BONUS

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government of Canada or any officer thereof and any other person or persons relating to the paying of a high cost of living bonus to dependents of those serving in His Majesty's forces.

CANADIAN FORCES—RELIGIOUS AFFILIATIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

For a return showing the number of officers and men serving in the active service forces of the army, navy and air force, with their religious affiliations as set out on their attestation papers.

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to this motion, I should prefer to give the enlistments rather than men serving, for the reasons already indicated to the house, so far as the army is concerned. Secondly, I am not in a position to give completely the religious affiliations of all men in the service. A compilation was made up until March or April, 1941, and we got from that the percentages of different religious affiliations at that time. I think the only thing we could do would be to use those percentages and estimate the enlistments in the same proportions for each of the denominations. With these reservations I have no objection to the motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister suggests that there would be an immense amount of work involved in examining every one?

Mr. POWER: So far as air is concerned, I shall not be in a position to give numbers but percentages.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. MARSHALL:

For a copy of all recommendations made to the Canadian Wheat Board or the government by the advisory committee of the wheat board for the year 1941-42 and the year 1942-43.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Inasmuch as the recommendations are confidential, interdepartmental documents, I suggest that the motion be dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the minister whether they are interdepartmental documents? The wheat board is a body corporate, set up under statute. It is a wholly owned corporation in that sense. It is not a department of government, therefore I do not think that the minister's answer covers the position. He may hide behind some other reason, but not that one. Perhaps I should not use the word "hide." I withdraw that and say, take shelter.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I think the explanation given does cover the point, but another reason for asking that the motion be dropped is that they do deal with matters of government policy and as such are privileged.

Motion dropped.

DELEGATION OF MINISTERIAL AUTHORITY

Mr. TUSTIN:

For a copy of all instruments or other documents signed by any minister of the crown purporting to delegate authority vested in such minister by any act of parliament, or otherwise, to a deputy minister or person holding the rank of deputy minister or any other official of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With regard to this motion, having regard to the explanation given by the Secretary of State, and particularly in view of the provisions of the Interpretation Act, which I have not read for a good many years, this may be dropped. I understand that the hon. member has written a letter indicating the information he wants.

Motion dropped.

SYDNEY, N.S., WARTIME HOUSING

Mr. GILLIS:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents exchanged between the government of Nova Scotia, the city of Sydney, Nova Scotia and the Department of Munitions and Supply or any other department of the federal government, on the question of the desirability of Wartime Housing Limited, carrying out an emergency programme of wartime housing to care for the needs of the city of Sydney, Nova Scotia.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BOARD—DISMISSAL OF W. H. WHITESIDE

Mr. SHAW:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents passing between the civil service commission, the Soldier Settlement Board of Canada and any person or persons from April, 1941, to date, having to do with the appointment of William Henry Whiteside, of Innisfail, Alberta, as field supervisor, soldier settlement, grade 1, and his subsequent dismissal.

Mr. CRERAR: I think it quite probable that all this correspondence can be brought down in the order asked for. I should like however to make a reservation. There might possibly be some correspondence of an interdepartmental kind which would be privileged, but with that reservation I have no objection to the order passing.

BAY ST. LAWRENCE, N.S., PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

For a copy of all payrolls and accounts in connection with construction or repairs by the Department of Public Works, during months of August, September, October and November, 1941, to pier, breakwater or other public work at Bay St. Lawrence, Victoria county, Nova Scotia.

1941 VICTORY LOAN

Mr. CHURCH:

For a return showing a breakdown of the details given in a return, November 12, 1941, in connection with the sale of the 1941 Victory Loan, as follows:

Preparation and distribution of bonds		$ 363,921 86
Administration expenses:
Salaries	$149,881 67
Travelling expenses	285,038 37
Stationery and office supplies	160,673 25
Rental of office space	29,006 77
Sundry expenses, including postage, telephone, telegraph, etc.	145,226 24
		769,826 30
Publicity expenses:
Newspaper and magazine advertising	476,677 00
Posters, including billboard posters and posting	79,565 83
Radio advertising	86,618 17
Local advertising	160,888 13
Other publicity	254,319 85
		1,058,068 98
Commissions to individual canvassers on general subscriptions		1,551,713 80
Remuneration to banks, trust and loan companies—service fee for handling and delivering bonds		1,750,000 00
Remuneration to investment dealers and stockbrokers re pooled subscriptions		3,293,040 00
Total		$8,786,570 94

The said return to show the details of each of the main items set out aforesaid.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suggest that this stand until the mover is here. I have a few observations to make on the motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no objection to its standing, but we should like to get the information if possible.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will argue that at the time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion stands.

NEW BRUNSWICK FISHERY REGULATIONS

Mr. HAZEN:

For a copy of all correspondence, written representations and reports made to the government and/or the Department of Fisheries dealing with the netting of fish in the non-tidal waters of the Saint John river during the five years prior to the passing of an order in council, on May 9, 1940, which is now embodied in section 9 of the special fishing regulations for New Brunswick.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS—AIR RAID PRECAUTIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all orders in council, reports and other documents in the possession of the government relative to the Defence of Canada Regulations. Also a copy of all correspondence exchanged with the provinces relative to the enforcement of blackouts, covered by section 35 of the Defence of Canada Rules and Regulations, as well as a copy of the order in council delegating this authority to provincial attorneys-general instead of to the district military authorities.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to this motion, I think it will be recognized at once that to try to meet its request would involve an infinite amount of search in the departments for reports and documents and also much time and expense in copying the same. The motion asks "for a copy of all orders in council, reports and other documents in the possession of the government relative to the defence of Canada regulations." There is a very large amount of correspondence on that subject. The orders in council themselves have already been tabled. If the hon. member would indicate in a specific way the particular reports he has in mind, it might be possible to meet the request. As regards the rest of the order, I think it should be said that there may be some correspondence which it would not be in the public interest to disclose and in that event it would not be brought down. So far as the remainder of the correspondence is concerned, there can be no exception to bringing it down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think there is a good deal in what the Prime Minister says, especially with reference to the first part. I suggest that the motion be allowed to stand. The hon. member will be here probably this afternoon and he will see what the Prime Minister has said.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion stands.

CANADIAN ARMY (RESERVE)—ATTESTATIONS FOR OVERSEAS SERVICE

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a return showing the number of men called up for either 30-day or 4-month training pursuant to the National Resources Mobilization Act who enlisted and were attested for overseas service in any branch of the armed forces during each month since October, 1940.

WEYBURN, SASK., AIRPORT

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

For a copy of all contracts and agreements entered into by the Canadian government and any person or persons in connection with the acquiring of the site and the construction of the airport at Weyburn, Saskatchewan.

SHIPPEGAN, N.B., PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. HAZEN:

For a copy of all payrolls, vouchers and accounts in connection with construction and/or repairs by the Department of Public Works during the months of August to December, 1941, inclusive of (a) Shippegan wharf, and (b) Shippegan gully breakwater, in the county of Gloucester, New Brunswick.

INTERNMENTS

REPRESENTATIONS OF DELEGATION FROM CIVIL LIBERTIES ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister. According to a press report appearing in Saturday's papers a delegation from the Civil Liberties Association of Toronto—Toronto, of all places—headed by Mr. B. K. Sandwell, who was also designated as leading spokesman for the delegation, presented on Friday last to the Prime Minister and a group of cabinet ministers a memorandum urging, among other things, open trials in all cases for internees and those charged under the defence of Canada regulations, and that certain classes, I think including trade unions, be given representation on tribunals sitting on cases other than open trials. The report further states that Mr. Sandwell told newspaper men after the two hour hearing that the Prime Minister had expressed "entire sympathy" and given the delegation to understand that action would follow.

I now ask the Prime Minister if this report is in substance true; if he did express himself as being in "entire sympathy" with the request of this delegation, and what changes in policy have been promised, having in mind the statements of policy enunciated from time to time by the late Minister of Justice, based I think largely on the reports of the special committee of this house, and followed in practice up to this time.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The report is quite correct when it states that I was in entire sympathy with the representations made. Those representations will receive the consideration of the Department of Justice. The extent to which they may be acted upon will be made known in due course.

TAXATION

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question I wish to ask the Minister of Finance. Will he be good enough to lay on the table of the house as soon as possible all correspondence with the provinces in regard to the dominion-provincial agreements? I recall that some months ago at my request some correspondence was tabled, but it was sparse and unimportant. Three weeks ago to-day, on February 2, an order for return requiring the production of all this correspondence was passed on the motion of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross). I understand that all the provinces with one exception have signed the appropriate agreement—

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I misunderstood the minister's statement. I am led to believe that there is a substantial volume of correspondence which in the public interest should be made public. At all events I request that such correspondence as has not already been brought down be tabled as soon as possible. May I add as an additional reason that validating legislation is now before the legislature of New Brunswick and it is important that the correspondence with that province at least should be made public immediately.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I think I shall be able to lay that on the table to-morrow. Such at any rate is my intention.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

KIRKLAND LAKE MINERS—QUESTION OF DISCRIMINATION AND PRESERVATION OF SENIORITY RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. I sent a copy of it to the Secretary of State, not knowing that the Minister of Labour would be in his seat to-day. It arises out of a telegram received this morning from one of the officials of the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers' union of Kirkland Lake, a copy of which I understand is in the hands of the Minister of Labour.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

My information is that a formula was worked out between the Department of Labour, the union and the operators, to the effect that on termination of the strike the men were to return to work without discrimination, and that the rule of seniority would be observed as far as possible. This understanding is not being lived up to by the operators. Rank discrimination is being practised, and an intolerable situation is developing. In view of the fact that the Department of Labour negotiated the return to work and is a party to that agreement, what is the Department of Labour doing to see that the terms of the agreement are being enforced?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The fact is that the strikers returned to work in greater numbers than could be absorbed by the mines. In view of the departure of several hundred miners from the area during the strike, and the consequent reduction in employment available for surface workers, the men returned unconditionally without intervention by the Department of Labour. A delegation of miners did wait on the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. McLarty) and asked that the department should seek to have the men reemployed without discrimination. On February 14 the department sent the following telegram to Mr. Robert Bryce, president of Macassa Mines and chairman of the operators' committee:

> Minister of Labour has been asked to request the Kirkland Lake mining companies that as men return to work they be reemployed without discrimination and that seniority rights be respected. Minister would appreciate a statement in reply.

On February 16 Mr. Bryce sent the following telegram in reply:

> As the reopening of various sections of the mines permits the procedure outlined in your telegram to me being followed as closely as possible having due and proper regard for the efficiency and safety of the operations.

Representations contained in the telegram from Mr. James Rankin, vice-president of the Kirkland Lake local, have been referred by the departmental officials to the mining authorities, and when further information is available I shall be glad to give it to my hon. friend.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN AMHERST, N.S., FOR LACK OF REROLLING MATERIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): On February 18 last I inquired of the Minister of Munitions and Supply as to the laying off of 150 men at the rolling mills of the Canada Car and Foundry company at Amherst, Nova Scotia, owing to the shortage of material. At that time I was informed that there was material available. The minister's reply was to the effect that he did not have sufficient information to answer the question at the moment but would make further inquiries. Is the minister now in a position to give the house further information?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I made inquiries, Mr. Speaker, as I promised, and I find the situation is that the raw material for this mill is used rail from the railways. The fact of the matter is that the railways are so hard pressed for rail at the present time that they are not able to offer rail for sale; and so far as my officers are concerned, they know of no alternative source of supply.

AIRPORTS

USE OF CANADIAN FACILITIES IN FLYING UNITED STATES AIRCRAFT TO ALASKA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence for Air. I am sorry I was unable to send more promptly to his office notice of the purport of my question, but if he is not prepared to answer to-day it will be quite all right.

A few nights ago hon. members may have listened to a broadcast from Chicago during the course of which the broadcaster took strong exception to the remarks of the premier of Ontario with reference to the United States navy, and then asked a question. Apparently the broadcaster was unfamiliar with the political set-up of the provinces under which the provinces have separate jurisdiction and the dominion government has complete control over air transport. Not knowing that, he said, in effect: I ask Mr. Hepburn why his government prevents the flying of United States bombers via Edmonton, Grande Prairie, Fort St. John, Watson Lake and White Horse on their way to Fairbank, Alaska.

I was up there last year so I know something about some of these air fields. I would ask the minister if the broadcaster was correct in his statement. I understand the United States have authority to send their bombers by that route.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): I am very glad to say that the United States army air force, and I think the navy air force, have been constantly, particularly within the last few weeks, sending bombers and other aircraft up to Alaska through the facilities built last year by the Canadian government.

QUESTION AS TO DEFENCE MEASURES IN STRATEGIC AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, on February 6 I asked the Minister of National Defence what steps if any were being taken to protect the airports in the Yukon and northern British Columbia. At that time the minister told me he would consult with the Minister of National Defence for Air. I repeated the question on February 11, and at that time the minister said, at page 499 of Hansard:

> My hon. friend knows, as I spoke to him personally, that the matter is at present under discussion between the Minister of National Defence for Air and myself and the chiefs of staff.

That was twelve days ago and we have heard nothing since. If there is any reason why the answer should not be given or why I should not know whether or not the airports are being defended, well and good; but I had a communication to-day from a resident of a town near one of these airports, perhaps the most important of them, who said that following a meeting of the citizens they had communicated with the officer commanding military district No. 11, which includes the Yukon, whose reply was that it had been ruled that the Yukon was not in the defence area. I do not know whether the Japanese would be kept out by that ruling; I doubt if they would. These airports certainly are worth defending, because the government has spent millions of dollars on them and they are being used both by Canada and by the United States. Many United States bombers are making use of those airports day in and day out, on their way north, and they should be protected.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): In the first place I can say to my hon. friend that the matter has been completely overlooked by me, or I would have called him up, as I did previously when I asked him to allow me to consult the chiefs of staff. I have not had a report as yet; but if I may anticipate the session to-morrow I can say to him now that already there is a blanket defence of these aerodromes. My hon. friend realizes that you do not always defend aerodromes by immediate local garrisons; but apart from that, I shall have a report from the chief of staff and will deal directly with my hon. friend.

WAR INDUSTRIES

WORKING HOURS IN PLANTS PRODUCING WAR SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). I am sorry I did not send him in advance a copy of the question but I did not know that he was going to be in the house to-day.

On February 2, I asked the Acting Minister of Labour a question in regard to the working of our factories in Canada which are producing war supplies. I sought to find out how many factories were working full time and how many were working only part time. The acting minister at that time informed me in effect that he did not know but that there were negotiations being carried on between the dominion and the provinces to find out how many factories were really working full time. The office of the director of public information has released a publication, the weekly bulletin for the United States newspapers, of February 11 and 17, 1942, volume 2, No. 7, at page 3 of which I find the following:

> Every aircraft plant in Canada is booked solid at least until the end of 1943; some into 1944, and even 1945.

I should like the minister to tell me which of these statements is correct, and if he would kindly give me the correct answer to the question I asked the acting Minister of Labour on February 2. I should like to know if this statement is true.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. gentleman, of course, said he did not give me notice of his question.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is right.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is a little too much to expect that at such short notice I should know how many factories are working on full time, how many on part time and how many on what is called short time, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that if the information can be obtained I will get it for him.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Is this statement true, as issued by the director of public information?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is not true?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know; I have not read it.

[Mr. Ralston.]

AIRGRAPH SERVICE

POSSIBILITY OF EXTENSION OF DELIVERY TO OVERSEAS TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): On Thursday last the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked a question with regard to the extension of airgraph service to our men serving in the middle east.

Representations have been made to the United Kingdom postal authorities respecting the use of the airgraph service from Canada to members of the armed forces in the middle east. Airgraph messages received, intended for the middle east, at present are sent on the original message form by air to the United Kingdom, where the messages are photographed and transmitted to destination through the medium of the British airgraph system.

When there are sufficient messages daily from Canada to the middle east to justify a separate film daily for the middle east, items will then be photographed in Canada and the film sent to destination via the United Kingdom or such other air route as may be more expeditious. Messages will be delivered at destination through the medium of the British airgraph system.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE WITH RESPECT TO HOLDING OF SECRET SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last the house decided that to-morrow a secret session would be held. At the time I made a brief announcement as to the procedure that it was intended we would follow at the secret session. One phase of that procedure would be the resolving of the house into committee of the whole in order to permit of greater freedom of discussion on the matters which may be before the house. In order that we may follow the regular procedure of the ordinary sittings of the house, I think it would be advisable that an item relating to war or defence should be before the committee. I think also that it would be more appropriate we should resolve ourselves into committee of supply in an open session, in order to have an item before the committee, than to reserve that procedure for to-morrow when proceedings will be in secret.

In the circumstances I was going to ask hon. members, seeing that I had not given notice on Friday of an intention to move the house into committee of supply to-day, if they would agree to my calling the first item on the order paper to-day, in order that we may immediately resolve the house into committee of supply and, in committee, to have one item called. This would not be for the purpose of discussion of the item in committee but simply for the purpose of having before the committee at a later stage an item that might, with the consent of the committee, be regarded as broad enough to enable its members to discuss generally matters relating to the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should think there could be no objection to the course indicated by the Prime Minister, and we shall be glad to consent.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have no objection to the Prime Minister's suggestion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is no objection on our part.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, looking through the items, I observe that all those relating to defence or war services are specified as "other than war appropriations." It will be recalled, of course, that the defence items appear in the war appropriation bill. In the circumstances I think the most appropriate item to call would be No. 206 under the Department of Pensions and National Health, at page 27 of the estimates, "European war pensions." The European war would be broad enough, I should think, to cover what we have in mind, though to-day the war has become a world war instead of a European war.

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

206. European war pensions, $38,000,000.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

PLEBISCITE ACT

PROVISION FOR TAKING OF VOTES ON ANY QUESTION SUBMITTED BY WAY PLEBISCITE

The house resumed from Friday, February 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. McLarty:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the taking of the votes of the qualified voters on any question submitted by way of plebiscite and for such purposes to make provision for the printing and publication of a plebiscite act and instructions issued thereunder, the preparation of voters' lists and other plebiscite documents, including forms and ballot papers, to provide for the fees, allowances, expenses or other remuneration of certain officials and employees.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned on Friday last I had been speaking on the underlying principle of the resolution, and I then registered my firm opposition to it. I shall not repeat those observations to-day.

We, sitting on this side of Your Honour, while registering our firm disapproval, will now seek to analyse as judicially as possible the detailed proposals with a view to improving them. We shall examine the government's detailed proposals in as cool and dispassionate a manner as possible, and not as partisans. We shall seek to offer to the government that constructive criticism which has been our constant objective in all aspects of the war programme.

There are however a number of questions which I believe should be answered by the government at this stage of the discussion.

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did I hear someone say "louder"?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I cannot face all parts of the house. I have only one face, and I believe I should speak to the Chair. However I shall do the best I can to have hon. members hear me.

I first ask the government to give the house and country a straightforward pronouncement indicating what action they will take if the plebiscite is decided in the affirmative. I think we have the right to know that, and I say the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) owes it to the country to tell it that much. Up to date he has studiously avoided giving any indication of the government's proposals. I tell him now, as I told him before, that that is not good enough, and that the people of Canada expect something more.

The Prime Minister has at his disposal all the facts of the situation. He is in a position to forecast the future requirements of our forces, and the means by which it will be necessary to raise them. We have not that information. We are entitled to those facts, and to a government pronouncement concerning them.

I therefore put this direct question to the Prime Minister: If and when he is released from his past commitments, what action has he in view? I request an answer to that question. Surely he must be in a position to tell that to the house and country. Does he not think the people of Canada are entitled to know what his intentions are, before they vote on the plebiscite? Unless the people know his intentions they will be voting blindly, voting to give him a blank cheque. What direction or leadership is there in that procedure? What enlightenment have the people of Canada received from the Prime Minister as to why they should vote yea or nay?

Further, I believe the Prime Minister should tell the house and country what he will do if the result of the plebiscite is indecisive—that is, if there should be a very small majority in favour of releasing him from his commitments, or a small majority the other way. Will he take the attitude of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at the time of the temperance plebiscite, and say that a small majority does not give him a mandate to proceed with his proposals, notwithstanding the fact that the enemy may be knocking at our doors?

Last night I listened to a radio broadcast. With some of it I agreed, and with some I did not agree. It was an address by Professor Thompson of Manitoba university. Among other things he said that the week Singapore fell was the blackest week in a whole century. I agreed with that. Yet here we are, twiddling about a plebiscite to release the Prime Minister.

I place this question before him: Suppose that only fifty per cent of the qualified electors cast a ballot on this plebiscite, and as a result only twenty-seven per cent or thirty per cent of the total electorate favour the release of the government from its past commitments—and that may well happen—what will the Prime Minister do? I have known of general elections in my own constituency where not more than sixty per cent of the people voted, and I fear that is what will happen in the present instance. How will the government interpret a vote of, we will say, twenty-seven per cent of the total electorate?

These are questions which naturally arise in the minds of all of us. Here is another situation which I can visualize, and which may very well happen—and I wonder if the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) would be good enough to lower his voice. If he is going to talk in this chamber while an hon. member is on his feet, then I suggest he should lower his voice, or leave the chamber. I cannot continue if the minister continues his talking too. Only one of us can talk at a time.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HOWE: I am talking to one of your supporters.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My supporter is a very reasonable man, and usually the minister is too. But it is very disquieting to have to hear the minister, even if he is talking to a gentleman as high placed in my affections as the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), when I am trying to make a reasoned argument.

Here is another question I put to the Prime Minister: What will happen if the plebiscite carries by a large majority in seven or eight provinces, and is defeated in one or two? How will the Prime Minister interpret that result? Will he feel at liberty to proceed with his proposals—if he has any to make—or will those proposals be abandoned? That is something about which we should be informed. The house and country are entitled to know the answers to these questions.

Then, I put this further question to the Prime Minister: If there is a large majority, a substantial majority or, indeed, any majority, against the release of the Prime Minister from his commitments, what will he do then? Will he interpret this result to mean that his government has no mandate to defend Canada, the empire and the whole family of allied nations, to the last man and the last dollar?—and it may well come to that. Or will he interpret it to mean that his government has lost the confidence of the people? What will he do in these circumstances?

These are questions which are bothering the Canadian people and, I am sure, bothering hon. members in the house, even those who blindly follow the administration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, some of them blindly follow the administration; and when I say that I do not believe I am putting the case too strongly.

Mr. HOMUTH: They never had their eyes opened.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If one were to recall the adulation heaped upon the Prime Minister by some of his followers in the country, one would think that he was omnipotent. I should think that the Prime Minister if he had any—I shall not use the word I might use—I should think he would be revolted by such adulation as I have heard coming from hon. members opposite. To me it would be most embarrassing. The Prime Minister would be the first man to admit that he is only human, and that he has as many imperfections as most of us. I say that hon. members opposite blindly follow their leader, without any why or wherefore.

An hon. MEMBER: So do the people.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So much the worse for the people, then.

Mr. ROWE: You have not talked to them all yet.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A reasoned and informed public opinion in Canada is something that we want. I am afraid throughout the country there is too much blind complacency—the blind following the blind. There is a lot of it. Public opinion in Canada needs an awakening to the true position of affairs. They are beginning to awaken on the east coast. Where are the two members for Halifax? Where are they to-day? We may hear from them to-morrow. They have been called down by their constituents, and the question of the defence of the east coast is being put up to these two hon. gentlemen, not by any partisan committee, but by the people of Halifax, who know that it is not possible to guarantee the defence of their fair city. They are alarmed about it.

Mr. KINLEY: They are better off than in other parts of the province.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I daresay they are, but that does not mean much. I do not mean to be an alarmist. I do not believe the people of Halifax are in immediate danger of invasion. I should think that invasion of the east coast of Canada is one of the most remote possibilities, although the escape of the German battleships from Brest is a menace to the Atlantic coast. There is a certain amount of danger of a sporadic attack on the city of Halifax, as there is on the city of Vancouver.

An hon. MEMBER: And on Port Darwin.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Port Darwin is nearer to the Japanese forces. But a sporadic attack on our coasts is a possibility. Therefore I think the people of this country have a right to know what are the government's proposals in a given case. I have instanced three or four of them, and I ask the Prime Minister to tell, when he comes to speak on this resolution, if he does, what the government are going to do about these things. Will he tell the people what will be done in certain eventualities? Or are the people to be content to follow blindly, trusting in the Prime Minister—trusting in the Prime Minister whose aim, as long as I can remember, has been to assume and continue to hold political power. That has been the chief ambition of my right hon. friend all through his lifetime. If you do not believe me, I call to your attention a book which has recently appeared in this country, written by Mr. Bruce Hutchison. Read what he says—and he is not an unfriendly critic of the Prime Minister.

An hon. MEMBER: He is no authority.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not even know the gentleman except to see him, but I would think he is a student of public affairs and of Canadian political history. I commend to hon. gentlemen the reading of that book, and if I can help sell a few copies for him, so much the better.

There is another question I want to ask the government. What will be the attitude of the Prime Minister and of his cabinet colleagues while the plebiscite campaign is proceeding? Will they campaign for a favourable vote, or will they campaign against releasing the government from its obligations? Both questions are pertinent having regard to what must be the division in public opinion in certain quarters in this country.

An hon. MEMBER: What will the leader of the opposition do?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am going to tell you before I am through. I am not entitled to be put on the spot at this moment, but I am going to be frank. I am going to tell the people of this country and the Conservative party that they should vote yes, without any question. Then, if the Prime Minister and the government do not proceed, we will turn on the heat just as strong as we can, so that this country shall have an all-out war effort.

What will the government do while the plebiscite campaign is proceeding? I ask again these two questions: Will they campaign to release the government? Will they campaign to defeat the object of the plebiscite? What will the Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin) do? I ask him now, where is he going to be on this plebiscite?

Mr. CARDIN: I have no hesitation in answering my hon. friend. I find it extraordinary that he should ask such a question of me. I am a member of the government and I stand with the government. If I were not taking that attitude I would not be entitled to the position I hold in the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not understood yet what the minister's attitude is.

Mr. CARDIN: It is very clear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I interpret the minister correctly, he is going out to campaign to release the government from its pledge?

Mr. CARDIN: Certainly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And then what will he do, if the government is released?

Mr. CARDIN: As much as my hon. friend will do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As much as I will do? The minister knows exactly where I stand in regard to releasing the government. I have stated my position. But if the government are released, then what? Where will the Minister of Transport be then?

Will the Prime Minister and his colleagues address meetings and give radio broadcasts during the campaign? What opportunity will be provided for leaders and representatives of other parties in this house, and other bodies of public opinion in this country, to express their views over the national radio network?

Mr. HOWE: Is the hon. member going to oppose it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister evidently was not listening. He is not informed; he is not up to date. What opportunity, I ask, will be provided for the leaders of other parties in this country and other bodies of public opinion to express their views over the radio, free of charge, just as the government does? That is a pertinent question, and I desire to press it. What facilities will be afforded to me to tell the people of Canada over the radio, when the time arrives, what I think they ought to do? This is a question which I think should be answered while the resolution is still under discussion and before the bill is introduced. That is all I have to ask the Prime Minister at the moment, but some other questions may occur to me as I go along.

The Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) estimated that the cost of the plebiscite would be one and a half million dollars. I am going to ask him to give us a break-down of that amount when we get into committee, and I give him notice now. I fear it will be very much more than a million and a half dollars—and it will be a million and a half dollars of the taxpayers' money which will be absolutely wasted unless we have some assurance that the government will act on the plebiscite vote.

When will the plebiscite be held? I think we ought to have more specific information on that point. Time, I suggest, is an all-important factor, and under conditions as they exist to-day, if the plebiscite must be taken, I urge that it be taken at the earliest possible day.

I welcome the announcement that all soldiers, including those who are under twenty-one years of age, will be allowed to vote. I ask the Secretary of State this question: I assume that the vote will be taken under the jurisdiction of his department?

Mr. McLARTY: Under the chief electoral officer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To whom does he report?

Mr. McLARTY: The Secretary of State is only a contact point between him and the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is the man to direct the vote. There must be somebody here as spokesman of the chief electoral officer, and I am taking it for granted that the Secretary of State is that spokesman; therefore I am asking him to give us some information as to how the vote will be taken in England. What arrangements will be made to take the votes of airmen and others who are in far distant theatres of war such as Libya and Burma? They are entitled to vote, just as much as a soldier in Newfoundland.

I come to another important proposition. If the plebiscite is carried in the affirmative, will the Prime Minister bring his detailed proposals, if any, for increased effort as regards the mobilization of man-power—I am for the moment limiting it to that, but it need not necessarily be so limited, it should probably cover the whole gamut of mobilization, not only of man-power but of wealth and material resources—to the House of Commons, where they may be passed upon, and where they ought to be passed upon? Or will he merely seek the repeal of section 3, the limiting clause of the mobilization act, and then institute his policies by order in council? If this is to be done by order in council, I object. Whatever may have been said of the Military Service Act of 1917, the proposals were brought down to parliament and they were debated here and they were improved here. That is the only democratic way of doing it. In other words, will the Prime Minister interpret an affirmative result as giving the government a free hand, or merely as giving parliament a free hand? There is a distinction between the two. In my view any proposals which may follow the plebiscite should be brought down to this house and passed in the form of legislation, so that the people's representatives may have something to say about them.

I believe there is a terrible sense of frustration on the part of private members of this house. They have not a word to say about this question of mobilizing man-power, wealth or material resources. Why, they are not even rubber stamps, because all these things are done by order in council, and they never know a word about anything—good, bad, or indifferent—until it is all over.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): What a hero!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, if the hon. member has courage enough to stand up and make his interjection, let him make it.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): Quite a hero!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I never posed as a hero, but I have never been a rubber stamp, and I never will be.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that to institute by order in council any elaborate scheme of compulsory service of man-power or of mobilization of resources and wealth would be quite improper, no matter how extensive may be the powers of the governor in council in that respect.

I now desire to make a few brief observations on the concrete proposals as indicated by the Secretary of State.

The modus operandi is to be governed not so much by legislation as by the regulations authorized by the legislation. I believe that is a correct interpretation of what he had to say. Now our ordinary election law is fully covered by the Dominion Elections Act, and I want to point out to the minister and to hon. members that the regulations passed under that act, speaking generally, are interpretative, not legislative. Under this proposed act the regulations will not be interpretative; they will be legislative. Is that not a correct statement, and does it not accurately interpret the minister's position? If that be true, I think, it is wrong in principle and it is derogating from the powers of this parliament that we should delegate by this bill of ten sections power to legislate by order in council. God knows we have had enough of that in this country. This is not a war matter. It is not something which is being dealt with under the War Measures Act. It is being dealt with by parliament up to a limited point. Why should any legislative functions be left to the governor in council to be passed under regulation? I put that question to hon. gentlemen, and to the minister. Is it too much to ask that the policy of the law be changed to conform to that of the Dominion Elections Act? That is all I am asking for. It is a matter of principle. I ask the minister to take that into consideration. If, however, the government is to go on and legislate by regulation, then I do suggest to the members of this committee which is to be, that they will have to exercise the greatest possible care in framing the regulations, and I express the hope that the committee will examine them very carefully.

I was glad to learn—I think I am correct in this assumption—that the regulations as drafted to date are not immutable. I believe the minister used that very word. Otherwise there could not be any point in referring them to a committee. We have that assurance, that they are subject to review, and I hope that review will be given to them by this committee. But let not the Secretary of State lose sight for one moment of the point I have just raised, that under the elections act the regulations are interpretative, not legislative; under the proposed act they are legislative and not specially interpretative—and that, I think, is wrong. To my mind it is a defect in the bill.

Until we have the detailed provisions of the bill I do not wish to comment on the question of qualification and disqualification of voters. That is a matter which has often been the subject of debate in this house. There are particular situations which will have to be dealt with with great care; there are certain people who ought to vote, and certain people who ought not to vote. At this moment I am going to make just one suggestion to the minister in the utmost good faith, and based, I think, on principle. In August, 1940, we had a national registration, when our population, male and female, above the age of sixteen years were all required to register. By the way, that registration cost something like $900,000—quite a substantial sum. I wonder if we have had value received for it.

Mr. LOCKHART: The work was mostly voluntary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And, a good deal of the work was done voluntarily, as I am reminded and as I happen to know from personal observation. However, I have often had doubt whether that registration was one hundred per cent complete. I do not know. Some estimate, I suppose, might be formed by the bureau of statistics, the people who had charge of the census and so on. But I would urge upon the government that it be a condition precedent, so far as the civilian vote in Canada is concerned, that every voter who presents himself for the ballot produce his registration certificate, and that unless he or she does so he or she shall not vote. I urge the government to adopt this suggestion. The reason is obvious. Anyone who has not registered and complied with the law may properly be classed as a shirker, and no shirker should be allowed to vote on this plebiscite.

In respect of the other aspects of disqualification I shall reserve further comment.

From the minister's statement, I observe that a new electoral list is to be compiled. From something I saw in the newspapers a while back I was very fearful that the government were contemplating using the lists of the 1940 elections, and I called attention to it at that time. I was told that the matter had not been considered, or something to that effect. These lists of course are two years old and they would be most unsuitable, and for the reason that the minister gave. I desire to correct myself on the question of statistics. I had in mind just the males coming of age. I find that in the year 1941 approximately 107,000 males attained the age of 21, and 106,000 females, making a total of 213,000, or in two years 426,000. The ten year average it stated to be 204,000 per annum, so that since the 1940 lists were made up nearly half a million voters have come of age. That is a large number and they are undoubtedly entitled to vote.

Then there is the question of change in the location of population, to which the Secretary of State made reference. All these considerations make it imperative that a new list should be compiled, and I commend the government for that decision.

On the question of open or closed lists, there are two views. I have always favoured open lists for rural areas, where everyone knows everybody else and where there is not a chance, not one in a thousand, of any electoral fraud. But with respect to urban areas, I am of a contrary opinion. I think there ought to be closed lists there, even if there is to be a revision. There is no danger in the rural areas, but there is a very grave danger in certain urban localities. One has but to follow the history of elections in one of the great cities of this country to visualize what will happen if the principle of open lists is to be followed in all the large urban areas, and I do beg the government to reconsider this aspect even if it should involve the cost of revision in urban areas and some little delay and expense.

There are one or two other things that have bothered me about the plebiscite. Who is to man the polls and see that the law is complied with, and that people do not vote who are not entitled to vote? I do not know whether consideration has been given to this question. Then there is another question. How in winter or in early spring are the voters to be drawn to the polls? I know the answer will be that there is no provision in the law now, and I do not suggest that there should be. But let us not delude ourselves. I have run seven or eight elections myself. Hon. gentlemen opposite and around me have all run elections, and they know that the biggest problem is getting the people to the polls.

Mr. REID: Most of them will be walking at that time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They will not walk; that is just the point. I remember sending a horse and buggy once for a woman to come to the poll and she absolutely refused to come unless she could be brought in a fine motor car. That is the attitude of people. They do not want to come and vote. Who is to get them out? I do not suggest that the government should arrange to have them driven to the polls. It is against the law now, I believe. But that is a provision of the law that is more honoured in the breach than the observance, and we all know it in our hearts. Why continue it in the statute? I suggest, however, that some provision should be made with regard to scrutineers. That would not cost a great deal. I have nothing further to offer on that line at the moment, but I do know that it is important.

My learned and hon. friend the member for Regina city (Mr. McNiven) rather anticipated in his question what I am about to say now. Since this whole proposal was mooted I have given serious and rather continuous thought to the attitude that I should take with regard to the matter. One's first reaction is to say, "to Hades with the thing," but that will not do. It is too serious. A responsibility rests upon me not only as a citizen of the country but as a member of this parliament occupying this position for the time being. I cannot ignore that responsibility. I just cannot do it. I have given consideration to what I should do. On Friday last the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Kirk), who does not often take part in the debates in this house, suggested that I should go out and make the result decisive. Well, that is beyond my power, but I know what the hon. member meant, and he was well-intentioned. Then I asked him this question: Does the hon. member say that it is any responsibility of mine to go out and ask the people to vote for this plebiscite? I put it to him and he replied, I think, in the affirmative; and right off the bat, without stopping to consider and think as one ought to do, I said, "It is not my baby." Now, I do not wish anyone to infer that, because I am opposed to the holding of a plebiscite and do not wish to father it, I consider that to be the end of my responsibility. I do not.

Briefly, what is the position? The government is asking the people for a release from its pledge, given gratuitously and voluntarily, and that it be allowed to take whatever course it desires. If the plebiscite is defeated the government will construe that position as indicating that it should not be released from its commitment—it may take that view. If the plebiscite carries we have no undertaking or guarantee that anything will be done. That appears to me to leave us all in an impossible position. I have a sense of frustration. The only person who wins anything in that is the Prime Minister. He is freed. Heads I win, tails you lose—or to put it in the reverse, heads he wins, tails I lose and the rest of us lose.

We ought not to be put in that position, but we are; and after the most mature reflection I cannot take the responsibility of advising anyone to vote no, because that would not only tie the hands of the government but would make it impossible for any further steps to be taken with regard to extending the man-power of the country for service beyond the territorial limitations of Canada. That I think is an impossible position for this country to occupy at this critical time. It should not be in that position.

On the other hand, if the vote carries we have absolutely no guarantee that anything will be done, and that brings to me a feeling of frustration. Neither of these positions is acceptable, but on the theory that if one has to make a decision and choose between the lesser of two evils, I am going to ask the people of the country to vote to release the government, and I now do so. I call upon the adherents of the Conservative party in Canada to go to the polls and vote yes on this plebiscite. That is the loyal and patriotic course. That is the course which may make possible the achievement of the objectives we have as a party.

As to what course I shall pursue to that end myself during the campaign on the plebiscite, I have not finally determined. I had thought of going to my own constituency, calling a public meeting, at my own expense, advertising it, asking the people to come, presenting to them the facts of the position as judicially as I could, and urging them to go to the polls and vote in the affirmative, in order that the government may be freed. If the government does not then act I notify them that the fight of the loyal people of this country will just be beginning.

I do not propose to speak at any greater length at this time. In committee and during the various stages of the bill ample opportunity will be afforded for full discussion of the detailed proposals of the government. But I reiterate that I believe we should have at this stage of the resolution a full statement from the Prime Minister in reply to the various questions I have asked.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): In these my first remarks in this house I want to thank all hon. members for the very warm welcome which was accorded me on the occasion of my introduction. I want also to thank the many members of parties other than my own for the assistance they have given me in the first few days of my presence here, assistance which helped to make my first days here much more pleasurable and less terrifying than they otherwise would have been.

I wish to make a few remarks on the resolution now before the house. I want to make these remarks now because, as hon. members know, I was absent, not being a member of the house, at the time the plebiscite was so fully discussed in connection with the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

During our recent campaign in York South the question of conscription of man-power for overseas service and of the plebiscite became a vital issue. My opponent in that campaign, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, went to bat first with a radio broadcast that concerned itself almost entirely with the question of conscription for overseas service. That was followed next day by the full-page advertisement of the total war committee. In that advertisement there were many definite references to conscription for overseas service, but in only one phrase in one line of that page was there anything definite about conscription of anything other than man-power. We, in our campaign, countered that move of our opponents by insisting that conscription of man-power for overseas service was only one phase, and not by any means the most important phase, of a total war effort. One issue that we kept before the electors constantly was the need for the mobilization of everything necessary to win the war. From my experience in that campaign I am confident that the people of York South and—if they are representative, as I think they are, of the rest of Canada—the people of Canada will not by any means be satisfied with conscription of man-power only. Judging by letters which I have received both during my campaign and since the election from every province in Canada, from Liberals and Conservatives of long standing as well as from members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, from office workers, professional men and women, labourers and farmers, labour organizations, and numerous other organizations, I am quite confident that this country is to-day ready for a much greater and much more far-reaching war effort than anything that this government has undertaken or even envisioned.

During the latter weeks of our campaign I was constantly questioned regarding my stand on the plebiscite issue. My opponent chose, as the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in this house has chosen, to oppose the taking of the plebiscite. At no time during the campaign did I take occasion to criticize the action of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his associates for the taking of that plebiscite. Nor did I find at any time in that constituency, apart from the pro-conscriptionist press, any great indignation against the taking of the plebiscite. I found no such indignation expressed among the rank and file of the voters as I have heard expressed in this house by the leader of the official opposition. The people of York South—and I think they are representative of the people of Canada—are not nearly as much astounded at the phenomenon of the Prime Minister keeping his pledge to the electors as the opposition in this house appears to be.

What these people are really concerned about, and what they really want, is that all parties and all members of all parties should devote their combined intelligence and their combined energy to getting on with the business of winning the war. That is the business foremost in the minds of the people of the constituency from which I have just come.

I am personally convinced that the Prime Minister should be relieved of his electoral pledge. Furthermore, I am convinced that the only decent course he can follow is to appeal to the people of the country as he has chosen to do. As a matter of fact, the feeling of the people of York South on that point was so clear that my opponent was obliged to dissociate himself from his party or from the pledge that his party had given in the 1940 election that there would be no conscription introduced if they were in power, that statement having been given during the election campaign. There was no criticism then. As a matter of fact, my opponent was challenged with the question, "Had not his party and its erstwhile leader of that period given the same pledge to the people of Canada?"

I should like to see a great and overwhelming majority given to the government on the plebiscite. I feel confident that the government will receive that majority provided they are prepared to give to the people of this country, before the plebiscite is taken, a pledge in some form that they propose to embark upon a genuine all-out war effort that will include a much greater mobilization of wealth than anything yet undertaken.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why do hon. members on the government side not applaud that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hear, hear.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Such a pledge to gain the confidence and support of the Canadian people should, in my opinion, envision also a bold policy for the mobilization of industry.

The only fear as to the plebiscite that I ever heard expressed among the electors of my constituency was that a favourable vote would give the government the right to conscript man-power for farm, factory and the armed forces—and that power, I agree, they should possess in this crisis—but that it would leave the government free to carry on its present policy, which I term a policy of appeasement, with regard to wealth and industry.

I have read in the press that my opposition in the York South by-election are drawing some comfort from the myth that that election was directed by the government from Ottawa. I am amused by the fact that the official opposition place such confidence in the efficiency of that government direction. I am amused that they can accept that myth as an explanation of their loss of five thousand Conservative votes in the working class areas of that riding. The Prime Minister and his associates must, I am sure, feel quite elated over this compliment paid them by the official opposition.

Quite seriously, Mr. Speaker, that is not the answer to what happened in York South. The only intelligent answer is that the people of that constituency want an honest-to-goodness, all-out war effort. They are serious-minded people. They are deeply concerned, as all Canadians are concerned, about the winning of the war. They want more than a conscription bill which will enable the government to send men wherever they choose to send them. The working-class people of this country have already shown that they are ready to endure any sacrifice required of them in order to win this war; but they are sufficiently intelligent to know that something more is needed to win the war than the conscription of men for overseas service. I am fearful of the results of the plebiscite unless a pledge in some form can be given to indicate what other steps the government proposes to take in addition to the conscription of man-power. If the government wants the workers and farmers to give it a blank cheque—and I do not borrow that word from the leader of the opposition—that will enable it to use our man-power as the government sees fit, then you must first create in the minds of the people a confidence that such power will never be used to exploit the working-class people of this country in the interests of any powerful group. You must convince the people that there is to be a much greater degree of equality of sacrifice than anything that has prevailed up to the present. You must also give the people the assurance that all industry is to be utilized for the war, regardless of the demand for private profit.

I should like to call attention for a moment, on this point, to a few statements reported in the Ottawa Morning Journal of to-day, from the recent radio broadcast by Sir Stafford Cripps. Speaking to the people who are unable to enlist for service, he is reported as having said:

> . . . that those who "for age or other reasons" could not give their lives for their country "owe an obligation of service and devotion to the last ounce of our strength and the last dollar of our wealth."

Later, speaking of the situation in England, he said:

> Personal interests are being allowed to obtrude themselves where the country's interest should be supreme, selfishness and the desire for petty profits sometimes taking the place of that all-embracing patriotism which leads our young men and women to give their lives for their country and its cause.

Then, speaking to Canadians, he asked this question:

> But have you considered whether you in your country have yet realized how total must be the effort it required if the axis is to be conquered?

These words, I feel, express the wish and desire of the great majority of the Canadian people to-day. I can assure this house that across this country there is a seething dissatisfaction regarding our war effort. Not only have I met with it in my own riding; I have found it in hundreds of letters that I have received from every province since my election. That dissatisfaction does not rest on the failure of the government to secure enlistment for active service. Much of that sort of dissatisfaction I feel has been engendered in Canada by a pro-conscriptionist press.

The real dissatisfaction which exists in the minds of the people and which is wide-spread throughout this country, is the feeling that industry has not yet been geared to a maximum production for war purposes. I am told, for instance, that although we are in our third year of war we are not producing a single aeroplane engine for use in the planes that are to be used to defend our shores. That may or may not be correct. If it is correct, then I say it is a deplorable and regrettable situation. There are to-day hundreds of industrial plants in and around Toronto alone which could and should be utilized for war production but which are still producing consumer goods for profit. I have received complaints from workers "by the dozen", if I may use a famous phrase, that they are obliged by force of circumstances to "rest on their oars" in the matter of war production. I am told that the present cost-plus profit system that prevails in some of our war industries does not give opportunity to the workers to put forth their maximum effort. Men and foremen from munition and war industry plants around Toronto came to me in numbers during the election campaign, complaining that they were sick and tired of being forced to loaf on the job of war production in which they were engaged. There is a situation which demands investigation and clearing up, before we shall convince the Canadian people that we are engaged in an all-out war effort. It is because I know that it is in this field of our war effort, particularly, that this discontent exists, that I urge the government to give to the electors some knowledge of what steps it proposes to take for the mobilization of wealth and industry, before it asks the voters for a blank cheque for the mobilization of manpower.

Let me repeat that the government need have no fear of the plebiscite vote, provided it is prepared to adopt a bolder and much more far-reaching policy in regard to wealth and industry. The people of Canada to-day are clamouring loudly for bold government leadership, leadership which will give us the only policy worthy of our cause, a policy which will mobilize everything we have for the winning of the war.

Mr. W. A. TUCKER (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended saying anything in the debate at this point, but there were some observations by the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) which I felt called for some comment, before I see passage of the resolution.

Before dealing with the subject in hand, however, I should like to extend to the hon. member who last spoke my sincere congratulations upon the ability he has shown as a parliamentarian. Certainly one can see that his election means a distinct acquisition to the debating power of the house as a whole, and I am sure the party to which he belongs have every reason to feel great satisfaction at his accession to their group.

I hope I have misunderstood some of the words used by the Secretary of State in explaining the provisions of the measure. It seems to me that in Canada we have not gone as far as we should have by this time in building up a distinct sense of Canadian nationality and citizenship. There has been far too much emphasis laid upon racial origin of people who have come to our country in past generations, and who have shown their desire to be good citizens. Indeed I think far too much emphasis has been laid upon the suggestion that we have two great races in Canada because, from what I can see, the French race in Canada is, after all, very closely related to the English race in Canada. I doubt very much whether we have in fact two distinct races in Canada, and it is my belief that we of those two races are closely united in racial origin. If we were to get away from that idea of thinking so much of racial origin, it would be better for Canada as a whole.

I hope, as I have said, that I misunderstood the Secretary of State when I thought I heard him say that any person resident in Canada whose racial origin was that of a country at war with Canada, and who was disfranchised by a law of any legislature in Canada, would not be permitted to vote on the plebiscite anywhere. I hope I am mistaken in my understanding, because I can see tremendous repercussions from such a provision in the law. We may know now what provisions there may be in the provincial laws; but, as I understand it, once we legislate that way, if at any time before the voting takes place any provincial legislature chooses to disfranchise the people whose racial origin is that of any country with which we are at war—no matter how long those people may have lived in Canada, or how many generations they may have lived here—they would be disfranchised by this particular section.

We should go very slowly when writing any such provision into the statutes of our country. I am prepared to trust the government of Canada, but I am not prepared to trust what any single legislature in Canada might do, driven on by some of the leadership which at times they have displayed. Just to show the danger of that kind of legislation, let me put this to the house: Let us suppose—and God forbid that it should happen—that before the voting takes place Hitler drives Vichy France to war against us. Let us suppose, further, that some legislature in Canada passes an act stipulating that no person of enemy origin shall have any right to vote on the plebiscite. Under such circumstances, in what position would this parliament be placed?

There is no suggestion as to how far back we should go, in tracing racial origin. Are we to go back one generation, two generations, five generations or ten? I protest against the division of Canadians into groups having certain racial origins.

[Mr. Tucker.]

There are in Canada many hundreds of thousands of people of German origin, who are just as loyal to Canada as any member of the house. What would happen if some legislature passed an act whereby a person of German origin were not permitted to vote? Under the explanation given by the Secretary of State those people, whose sons may be serving in the army, whose husbands may be in the army, would be disfranchised by an act of this parliament.

I do not wish it to be understood that I am becoming hysterical about such legislation, but I cannot help thinking about the tremendous amount of harm done in 1917 by similar legislation. People who were loyal citizens of Canada felt tremendously hurt when they were not permitted to exercise the ordinary duties and rights of citizenship at the time of the war-time election. Before the bill is placed before the house by a Liberal government, I urge that any discrimination on racial grounds should be stricken from it.

I know of dozens of people within my own constituency who undoubtedly are of German racial origin, and who are serving in the armed forces of this dominion. Are we to say that their fathers or their brothers are not to have the right to vote, the same as any other person in the country? I know there are many people who will vote either in favour of or against the plebiscite, when the time comes, who will know there will be no chance of their being conscripted. Why make any discrimination on racial grounds? If a man is a good citizen of Canada, if he has done no harm, and if he is expected to discharge the obligations of citizenship, then I submit he should be given all the rights connected therewith. Under the National Resources Mobilization Act there is no discrimination as to racial origin. Young men of German origin are expected to serve their country the same as people of other origins. Thank God that, so far as that measure was concerned, there was no discrimination against people of different racial origins. If they are good Canadians, we treat them as such.

In the present instance are we to say to people of German origin, "Yes, you are good citizens; we expect you to defend the country; we expect you to obey the call and to offer your lives, if necessary, in its defence; but we will not give you the right to vote on a problem like this." I suggest that our government should not introduce an act which might do such a thing.

Then there is the vexed question respecting conscientious objectors—a most difficult question. But I know, too, that many of our Mennonite groups have suggested to the government that they are quite ready to enter the armed services, provided they are permitted to do non-combatant work. They are willing to go into the ambulance service, the hospital service, labour battalions and so on, as long as they will not have to go against their conscientious beliefs and actually fight or kill their fellowmen. The attitude has been taken that there is no such thing as a non-combatant in this war and that, therefore, unless a man is willing to go and kill his fellowmen, he shall not be permitted to enter the armed forces. He cannot go and be a stretcher-bearer or do hospital work; he must go on the basis of being prepared to do anything he is ordered to do in the way of killing.

In passing I suggest, with all deference to our own military leaders, that this has not been the attitude of the great President of the United States. I saw myself an order which he signed, that conscientious objectors who are willing to serve their country, could do so in non-combatant branches of the armed services of the United States. I saw a copy of an order signed by the chief of staff of the United States stating what branches these conscientious objectors would be able to serve in. But we are saying that conscientious objectors who are willing to go into the armed services of the crown and risk their lives in those armed services, just because they are not willing to go in on terms whereby they may be required to fight and kill, shall not have the right to vote on this question. I know dozens of good young friends of mine, who belong to the Mennonite faith, who have gone into Red Cross work in the army, trusting that they will not be asked to bear arms. Many have gone into the Royal Canadian Air Force. By this very measure—and I ask every member of the house to consider what we are doing—the relatives of these young men will be prevented from voting unless they say they are ready to go into the armed forces and be prepared to go and kill, against their religious beliefs.

The reason why I have spoken at this particular stage is that I want the government to reconsider the question of introducing a bill with any provisions like that in it. I call back to memory the shades of great leaders of Liberalism who fought against similar provisions in the War-time Elections Act of 1917. I cannot begin to echo, with anything like their eloquence, the sentiments which they voiced in support of the principle that when you give a man citizenship you should not deprive him of the rights of citizenship. I hold in my hand the Hansard in which those great speeches were made, and I ask this government in all sincerity, and in the hope that it will not embarrass them in any way, that before they introduce in the house a bill embodying any such provision, they reconsider the matter and refrain from taking a step which I think, on more mature consideration, and especially in the light of the teachings of Liberalism, they would consider inconsistent with those great teachings.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to say a few words on the resolution before it passes, but before I refer to the resolution itself, may I extend my congratulations to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) who took his seat in the house for the first time on Wednesday last. I think he made a good job of his speech, and I do not believe he will need assistance from others so far as his work in this house is concerned. He seems quite able to take care of himself.

As regards the general principle of going to the country on a plebiscite, we have no objection when it involves a matter of policy or principle; but I certainly have an objection to this particular plebiscite because it is most evasive, and I cannot see any good result that will come from it. I have heard over and over again in this house the statement that the government was asking to be released from its commitment. That is not right. The government is not asking to be released from a commitment. Let us see what it asks? The plebiscite is worded thus:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

That is an entirely different matter. It is asking people if they are in favour of releasing the government; but the government is not asking to be released. There is quite a distinction there, a great difference. It simply puts the government in this position, that if the people express their desire of releasing the government from its commitments, the government can sit right down and do nothing. It is not asking to be released, and in that regard the government is perfectly within its rights to go on and do exactly as it has done in the past. I spoke on this particular question before, and it is my considered opinion that the government does not intend to change its policy. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) told us that in his speech when he first spoke in this house. I referred to the remarks of the late Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe; I also referred to the remarks of the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) and to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). When the late Mr. Lapointe, then Minister of Justice, was speaking in this house, he told the people of Quebec and the members of the house, in no uncertain terms, that there would never, never, never be conscription; and the Minister of Public Works was one of those to whom he referred. The hon. gentleman is sitting in his place now and I ask him to correct me if I am wrong. Mr. Lapointe said: "I speak for Mr. Cardin and I speak for Mr. Power; we will leave the government before there will be any conscription put into effect in this dominion."

I should like to hear the Minister of Public Works contradict that statement if I am wrong. I sincerely believe I am right in this. In my opinion it is a wrong attitude for the government to take, and that is why I will oppose this particular plebiscite. If they can convince me that they really intend to do something on this thing, then it is an entirely different matter.

Mr. CRERAR: Does the hon. member object to putting the government in a position where it could do something if it considered it necessary?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The government, under the mobilization act, can do anything it likes. If the question were put in a positive way on this plebiscite, then there would be some sense in it. But the government is definitely not doing that. It will be recalled that when I was speaking before, I pointed out that there were two sides to the question of the plebiscite—one was meant for the French-speaking people of Quebec and the other for the English-speaking people of the other provinces. I do not think anything could be done that would create greater disunity in the country than that very thing. If the French people of Quebec and the English-speaking people of the rest of Canada were given clearly to understand our situation, clearly to understand that this government intended to go all-out, that it intended to mobilize completely finance and material resources, right to the last man and the last dollar, I believe that the people of Quebec—because I have spoken in that province many times, and I know them—would agree for an all-out war effort.

An hon. MEMBER: You have not made much impression.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Well, you have not made such a hot impression either. I am sure that the people of Quebec would be just as enthusiastically behind an all-out war effort as those of any other province. I do not blame the people of Quebec for being a little cautious as to the promises which this government has given, because the rest of us elsewhere in Canada have sound reasons for being a little suspicious of its promises.

This whole question is not one which has come up overnight. When I hear some hon. members speaking in this chamber I am almost led to believe that in their opinion this issue has risen rather rapidly. Let us make no mistake; this is a political trick; it was begun in 1940; and I am amazed at the shortness of the memory of some hon. members, who cannot even think back to 1939. I well recall the occasion in this house when the party with which I am associated asked for an all-out war effort. Some of us were told that we were committing political suicide, and in fact we lost seven of our members.

Mr. HANSELL: But we were right.
