Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): We were right, yes, and every member in this house realizes it now. We had to take a lot of abuse because of our stand on behalf of the unity of Canada. Then this question came up in 1940, when the issue of conscription of man-power was fought on every political platform. We of this group advocated first of all a complete mobilization—conscription, if you like—of the financial institutions, so that we would be able, if I may use the Prime Minister's own words, to issue currency and credit in terms of public need. But when we put that resolution before the house everyone outside our party voted against it. Those who did so may have been sincere, and I am not going to say they were not, but I do affirm that it showed a decided lack of leadership in that critical time, in 1940, when the issue was being discussed.

The government is now trying to have the people say whether they wish to release it, but the government is not asking for release. To my mind it is another political trick, and shows very poor leadership; nothing indeed is more calculated to disunite the country. If the government has misjudged the necessities of the case, and can do nothing better than ask the people if they would like to release it, I say we have no time for such fooling around as that. If the Prime Minister, with all due respect to his ability as a leader, has not sufficient vision, foresight and leadership to conduct Canada through this most critical time in its history, then I humbly say to you, Mr. Speaker, that he should resign and make way for someone else who can. We know that a man is not necessarily to be blamed for mistakes he may make, but certainly you cannot expect a country to put its trust in a person who continually makes mistakes, and this government is notorious for the mistakes it has made since this war broke out. I do not believe there is another government in the whole world which has made such colossal mistakes as this particular government has.

An hon. MEMBER: The Alberta government.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Let me tell the hon. member that no government in any province has done more for this war effort than the government of Alberta. I challenge hon. members to cite one instance wherein that government has not given wholehearted support to the war effort of the dominion.

Mr. HANSELL: It bought a million dollars' worth of war bonds the other day.

Mr. BRADETTE: What about Alberta's debt to the city of Ottawa!

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Let me say to the hon. member that if he wants me to refer back to some of the remarks he made in 1939, I shall do so with pleasure.

Mr. BRADETTE: Do you want to go ahead now?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It might be a little embarrassing to the hon. member, but it would be a pleasure to do it. When this question of unity comes up, some hon. members should, I think, sit rather quietly in their seats; the less said, the less they will have to account for.

Mr. BRADETTE: What a man!

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What a member! I believe this country will have to adopt the principles which we have advocated. I challenge anyone to say that we were wrong in the stand we took in 1939, let him rise in his place now and say that we should not have an all-out war effort, with total conscription of finance and material resources before there is any further conscription of man-power. I should like to see the hon. member who interrupted me a moment ago make his stand with regard to that.

Mr. FAIR: He won't. He sits.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is all he has done since this session began.

Mr. BRADETTE: What wonderful members you have over there!

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): At least we do not have to go back on the promises we made in 1939.

Mr. BRADETTE: Bring your social dividend along.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes. The people will get that, too. But the thing with which we are primarily concerned, and have been ever since this war started, is an all-out war effort. We have not been concerned so much with political tricks as my hon. friends across the floor who are interrupting just now. That is the sort of thing which creates disunity. It leads to the sort of disorganization of which we have evidence in the laying off of five hundred men from an Ottawa plant. Were we wrong when we asked for complete mobilization of the natural and industrial resources of this country? All over Canada industrial capacity and industrial workers are standing idle, although those concerned are only too anxious to get to work. Just the day before yesterday I got a letter from an important executive of one of the aircraft factories. The situation he pointed out to me is appalling. He stated that in his factory a large number of men were laid off. Nearly all of them were expert mechanics, who have been working on the production of war supplies for the last year or two. It was pointed out to me that these men are now either enlisting in the army or seeking other jobs, and that when this company is asked to return to full production it will not be able to do so, because it will not have the experienced men. Yet we are supposed to be engaged in an all-out war effort. One of our greatest deficiencies is in the matter of production. I heard the Prime Minister say the other day that we shall probably not be permitted to discuss this subject in the secret session. Yet to me it is a matter of more concern than any other. I am not going to question the judgment of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) as to whether Bren guns should be sent to Singapore, or to Australia, or should be kept here. He is a military man, and in that I will accept his judgment. But the thing I am concerned about is this: Let us get the guns made. To say that we are manufacturing 4,500 Bren guns a month is not the point at all, because if we are manufacturing 4,500 Bren guns a month and we can bring that production up to 9,000 or 90,000 Bren guns a month, or whatever the figure may be—if we can double the present output, that is what we should be doing. If we are building a certain number of corvettes within a given time, and we could with proper organization build twice that number within the same time, that is what we should be doing.

Mr. HANSELL: Or even one more.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, as my hon. friend the member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) says, if we could put out even one more a month, that is what we should be doing. Then we would at least be endeavouring to have an all-out war effort. Can you envisage, Mr. Speaker, the government telling us that they do not even now know how many factories are working full-time? I think it is unpardonable that a government should be in such a position after almost three years of war organization, that they do not know yet how many factories are working full-time and how many are working only part-time. That is the greatest criticism I have to offer of the government at the moment.

In submitting the plebiscite, I cannot see why the government does not make it a positive question rather than a negative one. Certainly they should seek direction, and direct direction, from the people, so that the people will know without question what is going to happen. Why in the world cannot the government be honest about this matter and say to the people: We want you to release us from this pledge so that we can have conscription for overseas if necessary? But that has never been said yet. I have not found it in the Prime Minister's address. The question submitted seems to evade that. Or, if we are not going to have conscription, let us be honest and say so. I do not think there is any danger of frightening the people to such an extent that they are going to become panicky and run away from the enemy if we tell them the truth. I do not mean that they should be told military secrets such as the transport of troops and matters of that kind. But tell them the exact situation in other matters and you will find out that the people are right behind you. They are behind you now, pushing so hard that you do not know where to go. That is the trouble—they are pushing you too much.

Mr. GRANT: Did you tell the people the truth the last time?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Do not make any mistake about that.

Mr. GRANT: The hon. member did not answer my question.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If the hon. member wants to speak, he should rise in his place and speak when I am through, and we will analyse his speech.

I do not think this is any time to be fooling around with this plebiscite. I believe we could spend our time much more usefully in organizing our war effort. Just imagine, there are thousands of unemployed right across Canada! In every province of this dominion there are hundreds and hundreds of unemployed. I think that is a shame. These people want to work. It is not a case of their trying to evade responsibility. They are coming to the government and to industry to enlist in the war effort, but they are being turned away. I think that is a great waste of man-hours, a great waste of time.

An hon. MEMBER: You are wasting plenty now.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You are not doing so hot either. If some of those fellows—

Mr. HOMUTH: Hon. members.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If some of those hon. members would rise in their places and say what they had to say in 1939, it would be interesting to hear it to-day.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that the plebiscite is a waste of money at this time. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) said that it would cost about one and a half million dollars.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) said one and a half million dollars and I questioned that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And I do not know whether he means that amount.

Mr. McLARTY: I can assure the hon. member that I do mean it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am sure that the minister has made an estimate and tried to be as reasonable as he could, but if we get this plebiscite taken for a million and a half dollars, I think the Secretary of State will be the most surprised man in the house. We do not need to spend a great deal of money in taking this vote. Why should we not use the services of the different organizations set up all over Canada to take this vote? There is the teachers' organization, for example, which offered to work gratis in the national registration, and there is a board of trade in every town across the country. Municipal councils could also be of assistance in this work. Chambers of commerce and various other organizations would be only too willing to help.

Mr. HOMUTH: There would be no work for any friends then.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You cannot start out by paying some officials a nice fat salary and then expect others to work for nothing. They just won't do it. If this is a political dodge to build up a political party, that is a sad state of affairs at this particular time.

I think the plebiscite is not necessary. I have stated my objections to it, and therefore I am now going to move that the Speaker do not now leave the chair and that the house do now consider the following amendment to the resolution:

That all the words after "papers" in the fifth line of this resolution be struck out and the following be added: Be it further resolved that the said act be so designed as to,

First, provide that all plebiscites be taken without expense to the dominion treasury, except such expenditures required for necessary printing.

Second, provide that definite direction be sought from the people on all national issues submitted to them under the terms and provisions of this proposed Plebiscite Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, this is an appropriate moment at which to raise a point of order which has been in my mind in the course of this debate. I direct the attention of the house to the fact that the present motion is one necessitated by the fact that a bill is about to be introduced which will place a charge upon the public revenue. Being a bill of that nature it is recommended to the house in the first instance by His Excellency the Governor General. Being recommended by his excellency in the form in which it appears, the motion cannot be amended. That is the first point I wish to make, namely, that the amendment is entirely out of order for the reason given.

Not being capable of amendment, it is, I think, sound constitutional procedure that the motion should not be debatable. Debate on a motion of this nature, unless there is some other governing factor, is, or ought to be, out of order at the present time.

I would direct the attention of hon. members to standing order 60 on page 161 of Beauchesne:

Motion imposing public aid or charge.

If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote of the house do pass thereupon.

Standing order 60 certainly would rule out the debate that has thus far taken place upon this resolution, and it illustrates in the best manner possible why a rule of this kind should be construed literally. Most of the discussion that has taken place thus far I think I am right in saying has been a repetition of what took place in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I do not think there has been a single point raised in the speeches thus far made on this matter which was not raised in one form or another in the debate on the address.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should not like to agree to that. I had some new matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I will except from that general statement some of the things my hon. friend has said. But he and I alike I think are interested in seeing that the rules of the house are strictly construed, and particularly those placed there with a view to expediting the business of parliament. There is the strongest of reasons in connection with the very matter we are debating at the moment, namely, the wording of a plebiscite, why the matter should be decided by this house as quickly as possible. We have been told over and over again in the course of the debate that every moment's delay in getting the plebiscite before the people may occasion great concern at the end and is to be very much regretted. There will be an opportunity to debate all phases of the plebiscite question on the bill when it is before the house, and there will be opportunity when the resolution has been passed to ask questions on the resolution when the house is in committee of the whole. I do submit that the time to expect answers to questions on a resolution of this kind is not in the course of debate on the resolution itself, but only when the resolution is before the committee of the whole house.

I raise the point at this stage because, while I am free to say that I think the house in past years has frequently ignored this standing order, there has come to be almost a custom, when a motion of the kind preceding a money bill is introduced, of having a debate on the resolution itself. I think the intention of the rule was to avoid anything of the kind; that the whole purpose of a resolution is to secure time for hon. members to see the importance of the matter to be dealt with involving expenditure of public moneys, and to be afforded opportunity in committee to raise questions and receive answers before the bill is introduced. But the debate on the subject of the bill should take place on the bill itself rather than on a resolution preceding its introduction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister has raised two questions under his point of order with respect to the legality of the proposed amendment of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). With respect to the first point I am in agreement, inasmuch as the bill is a money bill. On that I shall not elaborate. But on the second point I take distinct issue with the Prime Minister. He is reading into standing order 60 something that is not there. Unless he reads something into it that is not there, there is no point or force in his argument. I am astonished that the question has been raised here to-day, because I cannot recall a point of order like this having been taken on a money resolution preceding a bill in the last twenty years. I should be astonished if the Prime Minister can find a single precedent. Certainly there is nothing in the standing order which says there shall be no debate. What it says is that:

If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon . . .

That is, you cannot enter upon it without notice from the governor general, as I understand the implications of that. But that having been given, then the motion is moved and debate ensues thereon. The question of referring it to the committee follows after that debate has taken place and the motion carried.

It is a debatable motion; it cannot be anything else. Surely for the last twenty years, and I should think a long time before that, this house has not been going wrong on a matter of this kind.

I think the first point taken is a proper point of order and this amendment must fail on that ground, but certainly not on the second ground. I would be astonished if that were the proper interpretation of the rule. You cannot construe a statute strictly by reading something into it, and a rule of the House of Commons is by analogy in the nature of a statute. On the other hand I think it ought to be construed liberally, and certainly this debate is in order and should go on.

I understand, of course, that that is not the primary reason for the Prime Minister rising at this time; he has risen because of the intervention of this proposed amendment. I think he is right on his first ground, but on the second ground I most respectfully dissent from him.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I add a word in support of what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has said? In reference to standing order 60, paragraph 542 is quoted from the British house standing orders, and I think is germane to the point at issue. That paragraph reads as follows:

If any motion be made in the house for any aid, grant or charge upon the public revenue, whether payable out of the consolidated fund, or out of money to be provided by parliament, or for any charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof shall not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house shall think fit to appoint. . . .

All that paragraph says, I think, and what is also said in standing order 60, is that the discussion shall not be presently entered upon; but it does not say that there shall be no debate. Surely we are allowed to debate resolutions brought up in this house. Always since I have been here debate has been allowed, and I am satisfied that a correct reading of standing order 60 and the supporting paragraphs do not imply that there shall be no debate on a resolution except in committee. It merely says there shall be none at the time it is introduced.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, if other hon. members have concluded what they wish to say, I should like to direct attention to the point just raised by my hon. friend. I noticed that both he and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) did not read the whole order, but stopped short at the early part of it. Let me read standing order 60 again:

If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people—

That is what this present motion is.

—the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon—

As I understand the English language that means that the house cannot at that time, when that motion is introduced, begin to discuss it; that it is not debatable.

—but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint—

Then see what follows:

—and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote of the house do pass thereupon.

The only thing that is debatable at the moment is whether the house should go into committee to consider the resolution. That is all. The resolution is considered in committee, where any questions may be asked; but the motion itself is not debatable and cannot be amended, for the reasons mentioned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With the consent of the house I should like to add just one word. I think some regard has to be given the punctuation of this order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is an important factor in construing it. My hon. friend may laugh, but he laughs out of ignorance, not out of wisdom; let me tell him that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Thank you very much. May I say I think I know the rules as well as my hon. friend knows them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Probably the hon. gentleman knows them better than I do.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I also point out to my hon. friend that he cannot know the rules, or he would know that the word "ignorance" is not parliamentary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If my hon. friend does not like that word, I will withdraw it, because I would not hurt his feelings for a moment.

Mr. GARDINER: We are trying to be agreeable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, if all the chatter is not over, or if my hon. friends do not want to hear me, I will sit down. I should like to point out that the punctuation is important. There is a semicolon before the last clause; and if you read the first part of this clause it presupposes a debate before going into committee. I think that is a fair interpretation of this order. If we are right to-day, we are making a little parliamentary history, but I submit that we cannot have been wrong for twenty years, with much better students of the rule than I am, and students at least as good as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If I may say one word, in giving notice of this motion the Secretary of State moves that this house, at its next sitting, shall resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider the resolution standing in his name on the order paper.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He did that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, I am just analysing the significance of this for the benefit of my hon. friend. Then to-day we are dealing with that resolution, which received the consent of the house when my hon. friend the Secretary of State moved the antecedent or preliminary notice the other day in this house; and the point before us now is not the merits or demerits of the resolution itself. The only point is whether this house shall immediately and forthwith go into committee to consider the resolution of which notice was given by the Secretary of State.

Mr. STIRLING: On which debate has arisen.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask a question of the Prime Minister or the Minister of Pensions and National Health. The Prime Minister said that the question was whether we should go into committee on the resolution. How are we going to debate whether we shall go into committee on the resolution if we are not allowed to debate the resolution itself?

Mr. SPEAKER: Having heard the viewpoints of so many experienced parliamentarians, I think the matter is of sufficient importance to merit further consideration, and at eight o'clock I will give a ruling.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: During the dinner hour I have been considering the point of order raised to-day on the amendment before the house. The only question before the house is that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on the following resolution:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting the taking of the votes of the qualified voters on any question submitted by way of plebiscites and for such purposes to make provision for the printing and publication of a Plebiscite Act and instructions issued thereunder, the preparation of voters' lists and other plebiscite documents, including forms and ballot papers, to provide for the fees, allowances, expenses or other remuneration of certain officials and employees.

To that question has been moved the following amendment by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston):

> That all the words after "papers" in the fifth line of this resolution be struck out and the following be added: Be it further resolved that the said act be so designed as to,
> First, provide that all plebiscites be taken without expense to the dominion treasury, except such expenditures required for necessary printing.
> Second, provide that definite direction be sought from the people on all national issues submitted to them under the terms and provisions of this proposed Plebiscite Act.

With regard to the first part of the amendment, section 54 of the British North America Act provides as follows:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address, or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

It follows that the standing orders of the house regulate the procedure, and standing order 60 so provides. It reads as follows:

> If any motion be made in the house for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the house thinks fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole house, before any resolution or vote of the house do pass thereupon.

I would direct the attention of the house to the word "vote" in the last line. That means a vote of a sum of money, and is used as in the first column of the estimates now before the house.

It is clear, therefore, that the resolution must be transmitted to the committee of the whole in the terms recommended to the house by the message of the governor general, and the amendment proposed is therefore out of order; and I so rule.

The next question is that raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who quoted standing order 60 and submitted that the resolution before the house is not debatable. With this standing order, however, must be read standing order 38, which provides, inter alia:

(1) The following motions are debatable:
Every motion
(a) standing on the order of proceedings for the day.

The resolution is on the order of proceedings for the day. I would point out that standing order 60 was passed in 1867, while standing order 38 was passed on March 22, 1927. In other words, standing order 38 is remedial to standing order 60, and I must conclude that standing order 38 must rule, and decide that the resolution before the house is debatable.

What extent may be allowed in the debate is a much more difficult problem. All that is asked of the house is that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole.

The debate, therefore, must be directed to the negative of that motion, that the resolution should not be submitted to the committee of the whole, for, as I have pointed out, no amendment at this stage can be in order.

In my judgment the debate should be general, with no reference to details, all of which can be discussed in committee, and on the bill which follows the resolution.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): Shall the resolution carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HANSELL: No; I do not believe the resolution should carry quite so soon. There are one or two questions I should like to ask the minister in this connection.

First, we have been very much concerned with respect to the amount of money the plebiscite may cost. Could the minister give a break-down of the suggested amount of $1,500,000? If he can give a break-down, will he tell us to what extent he thinks it will be possible to obtain voluntary help in taking the plebiscite?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Chairman, I am having prepared by the chief electoral officer a definite break-down of the estimated cost of taking the plebiscite. The figure I gave on Friday, that of $1,500,000, was a general approximation. At that time I said that the government would welcome such voluntary effort as would be applied to it, and such voluntary effort would of course reduce the cost. For budgeting purposes, however, it is thought unwise to make an estimate of the amount of voluntary work which will be applied to the taking of the plebiscite. For that reason it was deemed desirable to give a maximum figure; such amount of work as is done voluntarily will of course effect a reduction in such figure.

When we are in committee on the bill I shall be glad to give a definite break-down of the approximate cost.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Will the returning officers be appointed on a patronage basis, as is done at the time of general elections?

Mr. McLARTY: I would have no objection to answering that question, but I believe it would be more properly asked when we are in committee on the bill. The intention is that the returning officers appointed under the 1938 election act will continue—unless under the provisions of that act they are changed. While I have no objection to giving the committee all available information, I am of opinion that these matters relate to detail and might better be discussed when the house is in committee on the bill.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I had some further questions, but I shall leave them until the bill is in committee.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. McLarty thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10, respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes at such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

VETERANS OF PRESENT WAR—APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the following resolution:

That a select committee be set up to which shall be referred all matters relating to the settlement of veterans of the present war on the land in Canada; and

That the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records; to examine witnesses for evidence; to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and members of the house; and to report from time to time; and

That the committee shall consist of Messrs. Blanchette, Dupuis, Hatfield, Macdonald (Brantford), Macdonald (Halifax), MacKenzie (Neepawa), Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), McLean (Simcoe East), MacMillan, Quelch, Ross (Souris), Senn, Sissons, Tucker, Wright.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Might I ask if it is the intention of the government to have the proceedings of this committee printed or merely a memorandum kept of the daily proceedings?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is the intention, subject to the will of the committee itself, to have the proceedings printed and given to every member of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Including the evidence?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, yes, certainly, the same as last year.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO SETTLERS—APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS AND OTHER EMPLOYEES

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to make provision for the settlement on the land of veterans of the present war, to prescribe the terms of such settlement and to grant a measure of financial assistance to such settlers, and further for the appointment of a director, of officers and other employees in connection therewith.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF $100,000 FOR THE YEAR ENDING JULY 1, 1942

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Public Works on behalf of His Majesty to enter into an agreement to pay to the corporation of the city of Ottawa the sum of $100,000 for the year ending July 1, 1942.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, this is the resolution preceding the introduction of a bill for payment to the city of Ottawa of the sum of $100,000 as the result of an agreement which was reached between the city of Ottawa and the federal government a number of years ago in settlement of claims which had been put forward by the city for compensation for loss of revenue on properties which the federal government had acquired, and which left the city of Ottawa short of a certain amount of tax revenue. The claim of the city of Ottawa, as I stated last year and the house will remember, was for a very much larger amount than this, but as a result of discussions between the Department of Public Works and representatives of the city of Ottawa an agreement was reached that all parties concerned would be satisfied with a payment by the federal government to the city of Ottawa of $100,000 a year. This agreement has been renewed, if my memory serves me aright, for ten or fifteen years. I might add that representations have been made by the city of Ottawa that we should increase the amount, but in view of the war it was thought advisable to leave the situation as it is and not to undertake negotiations for a new agreement in place of the original agreement authorized in 1920 at $75,000 and which ran from July 1, 1919, to July 1, 1924, was renewed for one year to 1925, renewed for a period of five years from 1925 to 1930 at $100,000, and has been renewed year by year since 1930 at $100,000.

Mr. BOUCHER: Has the minister not taken into consideration the vast expansion in the services rendered by the city of Ottawa and the large number of buildings and properties taken over by the federal government, which make a very great change indeed in the services rendered by the city to the government? I think this agreement was first entered into approximately twenty years ago, when the services rendered by the city of Ottawa to the dominion government, and the city property acquired by the government were very much less than now. The situation has changed vastly since the agreement was first entered into, and in fact within the last year or two the water supply situation, in view of the services rendered by the city of Ottawa, is critical, calling for an expansion of the water service. It is a matter that should be given much more than perfunctory consideration in order that an equitable agreement may be arrived at between the dominion government and the city of Ottawa in view of the revenue-producing properties to the city which have been taken over by the government and the very much greater services rendered by the corporation. In view of these factors I think it would only be fair to the city of Ottawa that serious consideration be given by the federal government to making an equitable adjustment at this time. The excuse that we are at war and that economy is demanded surely does not apply to a situation such as prevails in this capital city of Canada. I would ask the Minister of Public Works to give the committee a few more particulars, showing the changes between the services rendered twenty or twenty-five years ago when this agreement was first entered into, and the services rendered to-day.

Mr. CARDIN: I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat that the situation has somewhat changed, but some people might argue that it has changed on both sides. I am not prepared at the moment to enter into any argument along that line.

So far as the water service is concerned, I may say for the information of the committee that the federal government pays for all the water consumed in the federal public buildings in addition to the amount allowed under this agreement. The main consideration, if I remember correctly, which was in the minds of those making recommendations on behalf of the city of Ottawa was that the city was losing a large amount of taxation which had formerly been imposed on the properties taken over by the federal government. It was this loss of revenue which was the main consideration presented on behalf of the city, although there were other minor factors. Taking everything into consideration, however, I think it is fair that we should wait until the war is over before making an adjustment in the light of all the circumstances. I promise my hon. friend that I shall have no objection to treating the city of Ottawa as well as circumstances will permit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I intended to make some remarks, not at this stage of the proceedings, but possibly on the second reading of the bill, in connection with this matter. They will relate particularly to the loss which the city of Ottawa has sustained by reason of the tremendous inroads which have been made on the city assessment roll because of the large amount of property which has been taken over by the government, by expropriation and by purchase, since the war began, and, I may say, before that. It would be well if the minister in the meantime would get some data on just what this amounts to, and if he would also arrange to tell the committee and the house what sums the government pays to the corporation of the city of Ottawa in addition to this sum of $100,000.

The minister has spoken about the amount of water used in the public buildings. I think that what my colleague had to say was about the increased water supply which is necessary for fire protection in the city, due to the erection on Wellington street of a number of very inflammable wooden buildings, which constitute, in my judgment, a serious fire hazard and a menace to the safety of the city. I am not criticizing the government for having built wooden buildings there; everything had to be done hastily. The Department of Munitions and Supply grew up overnight, as it were, and had to have accommodation, and no doubt wooden accommodation was the easiest and most quickly available method. Nevertheless, it constitutes a grave fire hazard to the city of Ottawa.

But that is not the main factor to which, I think, he should direct his attention; it is the direct loss sustained by the city treasury by reason of such buildings as, let us say, the Jackson building, which has been expropriated by the government, and which, as I understand the law, automatically comes off the assessment roll; and by the expropriation of the Brading brewery building at the lower end of Wellington street. I do not suggest that the city of Ottawa has lost a great deal on the assessment roll by reason of the Brading property being taken over, because the assessment on the building, land, and appurtenances was very moderate compared with the sum this government paid. I know the answer will be that that was an exchequer court judgment. I wonder whether hon. members know just how the amount was arrived at. I believe the sum paid was $550,000 on the basis of the exchequer court award. But it was a sham battle; the government offered in the expropriation proceedings to pay the $550,000 odd; the company in filing its defence accepted the offer, and there never was a jot or tittle of evidence taken to support the claim, one way or the other. It was a cloak behind which the government may shelter itself if it desires to justify the payment of so huge a sum for—what shall I term it?—that hole in the ground down there on Wellington street. I am going to have something more to say about that later on. It ought to have been said long ago.

Mr. CARDIN: I think my hon. friend is a little too severe, and that when the facts are brought before the committee of the house the picture will not be so black as he painted it a moment ago.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Black enough.

Mr. CARDIN: It will be established that the price offered by the federal government was tendered after three firms of competent and reliable valuators had passed on the property and had given the public works department the necessary information as to the real value of the property.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was the assessed value?

Mr. CARDIN: I regret very much that at the moment I am not in a position to say, but I promise my hon. friend that when we reach the second reading of the bill I shall have all the particulars before me, and we can clear up that situation as well as any other relating to properties which have been taken over by the federal government since the beginning of the war.

Mr. BOUCHER: I do not think the Minister of Public Works is quite fair to the city of Ottawa as far as the statement about water is concerned. As my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said, the amount of water supplied by the city for fire protection, the police protection, and other services rendered by Ottawa have increased many ways by virtue of the new additions to government-held property and government services. All these matters are of immense importance to the taxpayers of the city of Ottawa, and should, I believe, be given immediate consideration, without having the matter continued ad infinitum, or for years and years, without some proper basis of adjustment as between the dominion government and the corporation of the city of Ottawa.

Mr. McIVOR: Why is it that, when you want to rent a house or an apartment in the city of Ottawa, you can get neither a house nor an apartment? Has not this greatly increased demand come about because of the war activities which centre in Ottawa, and if the city are losing in one way, are they not gaining in another? I know that in the great city of Fort William we do not derive a cent of taxes from the public buildings which are located there. I think the government has treated the city of Ottawa well. Go to the front of this building and look at the lighting we have. I know there is a black-out but the other night, when I saw a lady tripping over her feet, I thought to myself, when this subject comes up we should ask to have lights over these steps; it would not cost very much.

As I have said, Ottawa is enjoying a good deal of compensation; every last house is rented. I think Ottawa should provide better accommodation for the population which is flowing into the city.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Cardin thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11, to authorize an agreement between His Majesty the King and the corporation of the city of Ottawa.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO GOLD CONTENT OF MANUFACTURED ARTICLES

Hon. JAMES A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, an act to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have not even seen this bill, and I think that before the second reading is carried there should be some slight explanation of it by the minister. This Precious Metals Marking Act deals with a very technical subject. I remember having made some years ago a study of it, and I recall further that when the late member for Renfrew South was minister, he undertook to amend this bill, and he got into a heap of trouble over the technicalities of it. Would the minister say what is the nature of the amendment? I have not had a chance to read the bill.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I outlined the purpose of the bill on its introduction. It is only a small matter, the object being to bring into line with United States regulations, as imposed by the bureau of standards, with regard to the marking of precious metals, the Precious Metals Marking Act of Canada. A large part of the spectacleware used in Canada is imported from the United States, and complications have arisen owing to the fact that a slightly different requirement is called for in the imported article compared with the domestic product. At the request of the jewellers' association of Canada, comprising all manufacturers as well as retailers, and with only one dissenting voice, this legislation is being introduced to make uniform the regulations so that there will be no conflict in the checking that is done by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What will be the effect from the consumer's point of view? The difference between 10 per cent and 5 per cent represents a considerable leeway. Is there a possibility of there being less gold in the alloy?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The effect is trifling. As regards the protection of the general public, there will be no difficulty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are doubling the leeway. Will it have an effect on the cost of spectacles?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): No effect at all.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1—"Gold." "Gold filled."

Mr. HANSELL: I am not a goldsmith, and I do not understand very much of the discussion that has gone on so far; but while the minister may say that the effect upon the consumer is trifling, it does seem to me that if the consumer is purchasing a certain article of gold, or containing gold, he may pay just the same price for a less valuable product. If I am right in that, I should like to know. What is the effect of the price ceiling on such commodities? I was in a furniture store the other day talking to the salesman, and he asked me if I wanted a nice chesterfield. He said, "You had better buy now." I said that I did not see what difference it made whether I bought then or six months from now, because the price would be just the same. I must admit that in that conversation I was patting the government on the back a little. He replied, "Don't fool yourself there. In six months' time you may come back and pay the same price, but it will not be the same chesterfield." Are we to understand that something like that may result from a bill of this kind? It is all very well to say that it is only trivial; but if a person buys an article for $100 and gets something with less gold in it than he thinks he is getting, it is the thin end of the wedge to encourage the giving of less value for the same money, even though there is a price ceiling. I wish the minister would make a statement along that line.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Possibly the hon. member did not follow my statement. When I said the matter was trifling I was referring to spectacleware, there being only a slight difference in the gold content of the Canadian article in comparison with the gold content of the imported commodity. About 75 per cent of the spectacleware affected, used in Canada, is imported from the United States.

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

Mr. HANSELL: It applies only to spectacles?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Just spectacles.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A day or two ago my hon. friend, referring to Bill No. 9, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways, raised some objection to going on with the bill until he had a statement from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin). I believe the minister is in a position to make a statement at the moment. Whether he is ready to proceed with the bill, I cannot say.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have an idea that this bill should not be proceeded with until we get the accounts of the railways, and I would ask the minister not to go on with it. I am willing to expedite business but I do not think the bill ought to be gone on with until we see the accounts for last year. We should have the reports of these same auditors.

Mr. CARDIN: My hon. friend made that observation the other day in my absence, and the Prime Minister promised to refer the question to me. The report of the Canadian National as well as the report of the auditors will not be ready before late in the month of March, as was the case last year. Since this bill provides only for the appointment of the auditors, it is a mere formality, and it would not matter very much if we dispose of this bill appointing the auditors, or delay the bill until the reports are in. I have been informed by the officials of the Canadian National Railways that they will have their reports ready before the end of March; as my hon. friend indicated the other day, on account of the great amount of work that has been done by the railway, the report might be delayed a little longer than last year. Therefore it may be the end of March before we are in a position to proceed with this bill if we have to wait until the report of the Canadian National Railways is ready.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are these auditors appointed for the calendar year or for the fiscal year of the railway, which may be the calendar year for all I know?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; the fiscal year is the calendar year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These auditors are acting already, it is a continuous audit; they are never off the job so to speak, and it does not make much difference whether they are appointed to-day or in March, but I do think there is a reason why we should postpone it.

On motion of Mr. Cardin the debate was adjourned.

PETROLEUM

REPEAL OF PETROLEUM AND NAPHTHA INSPECTION ACT

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (for the Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 2, to repeal the Petroleum and Naphtha Inspection Act.

Mr. HOMUTH: Explain.

Mr. CRERAR: This bill stands, it will be observed, in the name of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), but unfortunately my colleague is indisposed this evening, and in order to facilitate the business of the house I am undertaking this task. I must confess, however, that I really do not know a great deal about the bill. The explanatory note reveals the purpose of the measure. It is a repeal measure entirely. Apparently the original act was passed in 1877, which provided for certain forms of inspection. I am not able to give the house the details, but I presume, inspection of wells producing petroleum and naphtha, and also of factories or industrial establishments processing the same. Apparently the inspection has passed out of usage. I judge from the explanatory note that the regulations of municipal and provincial bodies regarding this inspection have superseded the inspection requirements contemplated under the act of 1877, and therefore there is no need of retaining that measure on the statute books. So this bill is introduced to repeal it.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I have some observations to make on this bill. I recall that in introducing the bill the minister gave a brief explanation in which he laid it down as a principle that the provisions of the act were obsolete and outmoded. That, I think, is largely true, but there are one or two things in that act which ought to be retained, and when I call attention to them, and the department and the minister give consideration to them, I believe their retention will be found desirable.

A word on the drafting of the bill. It is a repealing section. It is declaratory, and I suggest the insertion of the word "hereby"—"is hereby repealed". I do not know that that is important, but it is better drafting.

The explanatory note reads:

> Practically all the operative provisions of this act have been superseded by other acts and regulations of municipal, provincial or federal origin. . . .

Anyone who reviews the whole act, as I took occasion to do the other day, will agree that many sections were designed to meet conditions existing when the act was passed, away back before I was born, and owing to changes in these conditions the majority of the sections have not much if any importance to-day. But it occurs to me in reading the act that there are three or four sections which are still of importance, and which, so far as I am aware, are not duplicated by any other act of the federal parliament. I believe the minister should examine some of these sections and explain why it is not proposed to retain them.

Take, for example, section 3:

> 3. The governor in council may, from time to time, make such regulations respecting the storage and possession of petroleum and naphtha as he deems necessary for the public safety, and may make special regulations as to the importation or possession of naphtha and as to the sale thereof and use for illuminating purposes;

Then sections 4 and 5 seem to me worthy of retention:

> 4. The governor in council may, from time to time, designate places at which petroleum may be imported in tank cars and in tank ships respectively. . . .
> 5. The department may make regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, with respect to the transportation, shipment or sale of imported or domestic petroleum or naphtha.

I assume that both sections have been operative in the past. Powers similar to those contained in these sections are now, I believe, vested in the oil controller under an order in council passed pursuant to the War Measures Act. But I point out to the house and to the Minister of National Revenue that these powers of the oil controller are of a transitory nature, and that at the close of the war and upon the disappearance of the War Measures Act these powers will disappear. Should there not rest in some governmental body some power to regulate the storage and possession of petroleum, which power would continue in peace time? If you repeal this statute there is no power. This deals with dangerous inflammable substances. In municipal communities, we try to keep these things away outside the city limits. I do not know under just what authority that is done; I know that in my own community we try to keep them as far away from the residential district as possible in order to keep down the fire hazard. But if sections 3, 4 and 5 are repealed, there will then be no one authority charged with the responsibility of making regulations about the conditions of storage of this most inflammable material. I do not think such an authority is necessary. At the moment it is not necessary, because I believe the order in council passed under the War Measures Act gives the oil controller full control over all these matters; but if you repeal this statute, at the conclusion of the war there will be no governmental body responsible for this sort of thing. If we have jurisdiction now to pass the legislation which was passed and which is now sought to be repealed, then of course the jurisdiction is not with the provinces. I am just assuming that; I have not looked up the constitutional aspect. But I do suggest—and I offer this suggestion in the utmost good faith —that this power of control over storage and all the other things to which these sections refer should be retained in the post-war period. I think I have only to mention that to bring home to the minister the advisability of its being done. Somebody ought to have that authority. Perhaps there is some other authority; I do not know. At the moment the only authority I know of is the oil controller; and I do suggest to the minister—and this is a concrete suggestion to which I hope he will direct his colleague's attention—that these sections should be retained and perhaps redrafted to meet modern conditions.

I can give the minister an additional reason, from a local point of view. Some time ago there was drawn to my attention what was stated to be a serious situation in connection with the storage of petroleum products in Vancouver. I was told that this situation constituted a serious hazard to the people of that city, particularly in the event of air raids. I do not know what may have been done to rectify the situation, but what I have in mind is that there should be an act of this parliament which would empower the federal government to take direct steps in an instance of the kind to which I have referred, which might threaten the safety of a large number of people. I spoke of that before.

Then a question of some importance arises from the fact that this act was actually suspended by order in council P.C. 4-5204, passed on July 16, 1941, under the provisions of the War Measures Act. I assume it was found necessary to do so because of the, shall I say, somewhat obsolete provisions of the act, which are essentially of a peace-time nature. It would appear by every criterion that it was an abuse of the War Measures Act to use it in order to suspend the operations of a peace-time act of parliament. The conditions which led the governor in council to approve passage of the order in council of July 16 last surely must have been evident when parliament was in session last year, since adjournment did not take place until June 14.

I think the position ought to be reviewed, and I believe the minister will see that there is merit in the statute if these three sections are re-drafted and brought up to date. May I make one further appeal; that there be a cessation of the use of the War Measures Act for purposes essentially of a peace-time nature. The act never was so intended and cannot properly be so construed.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to say a word on this bill. When the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) spoke on the matter previously he said that the bill was being brought down in order to stop the adulteration of petroleum and naphtha. To-day it is not a question of adulteration; the refineries are stepping up the gasoline so high that it is really dangerous, and we need an act to protect us. The Germans and Japanese are using gasoline with an octane rating of about 87. Canada and the United States are using gasoline with an octane rating of about 100. In order to step it up not only do they refine the gasoline to a higher degree; they put in propanes and other substances which bring it up to an anti-knock rating, and higher. These propanes have a freezing point of about 45 degrees below zero. That is all right when they are used in an aeroplane or an automobile, because the gases from the propane will sink to the bottom; but if this gasoline is used in a fishing boat, or any other boat, those gases will stay in the hull and cause explosions. This law should protect the fishermen from the danger of explosions caused by the use of propane in our gasoline. Therefore I believe this act ought to be revised all the way through, to take care of the sort of gasoline we are using to-day.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1—Act repealed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hardly expected that the minister would allow the observations I made to go by without some comment. I was quite serious in what I had to say. I do not want to impede the passage of this legislation, but I suggest to the minister that there is some merit in what I said and that he should ask this committee to rise and report progress in order that his colleague may become conversant with what I said, and consult his officers. They may have a very good answer to my statements; I do not know enough about the matter to say. But these were thoughts I had about it, and I believe there is something in them. I am not quite certain that there is any other controlling factor to-day than the oil controller, and obviously that is a war-time authority that will cease when peace comes. Then there will be nothing. I suggest that the minister should have the committee report progress and let this matter stand until the minister, and particularly the technical men of his department who no doubt are advising him in the matter, may consider the representations which have been made. I cannot add anything to what I have already said, but I have offered the suggestions in good faith, and I think there is something in them.

Mr. CRERAR: That will be quite agreeable to the government. I might, however, make an observation or two on the comments offered by the leader of the opposition before we went into committee. Let me say at once that I am not familiar with the provisions of this measure—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I realize that.

Mr. CRERAR: —that I have not studied it, and consequently what I have to say must be considered in view of that fact. But I think it will be found that matters concerning the inspection of oil wells, and everything having to do with them, come under provincial jurisdiction. I happen to know, for instance, that in Alberta, where in recent years there has been a substantial oil development, the provincial government does pass regulations regarding storage, transportation within the province, and like matters. I fancy these come within their jurisdiction, probably wholly so. When, however, it comes to matters of transportation in interprovincial trade, and so on, then the federal authority would have some jurisdiction. But I assume—and I may be wrong—that provisions necessarily governing the transportation are provided for in other measures probably enacted subsequently to 1877, and that that is the reason for asking the repeal in this instance.

I have just one other comment to make, and that is with regard to the observations by the leader of the opposition in invoking the War Measures Act to pass certain regulations to set aside provisions of an act which was very largely, if not entirely, obsolete. I do not think, on reflection, that any hon. member would dispute that it is necessary to have direct control, through the oil controller, over the movement of oil and gasoline when we are at war. It is quite true, as my hon. friend has said, that the provisions of that measure will lapse with the declaration of peace. But I do not believe his criticism was altogether deserved when he found fault with the government for taking steps under the War Measures Act to bring about a proper regulation of this matter in war time, and not proceeding by way of an amending act in the house.

Sometimes I am concerned with the extent of the powers which have to be used arbitrarily by the executive in war time. But we are in a war, and decisions frequently have to be made with a great deal of celerity. Time will not wait. I can assure my hon. friend and the committee that the government always has in mind the exercising of these powers in the public interest; and our good faith in that respect will have to be the justification for our actions.

CANADIAN FORCES

REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONS WHO ENLIST IN HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in his majesty's forces or who perform essential war employment.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill replaces an order in council similar in content to the bill now before the house. The bill, in turn, is similar to legislation now existing in Great Britain, New Zealand, Australia and the United States, although it follows more closely the legislation in Great Britain.

This bill provides for the orderly reinstatement, at the conclusion of hostilities, of men who have served in the forces on sea, on land or in the air. It also provides penalties for breaches of the provisions. It also provides that where agreements exist between employers and employees, on a mutual basis, provided those agreements are not less advantageous than the act itself, they shall be permitted to remain in effect.

In my opinion the measure will provide for the orderly reinstatement of tens of thousands of men who will leave the fighting forces at the conclusion of the war, a provision which, I believe, we will all agree is somewhat in advance of the condition that existed at the conclusion of the last war. I played some part in the drafting of the original order in council, and in my opinion this is legislation which the people in Canada will approve. It is beneficial to the men to whom it is intended to apply, and I believe the house will approve the principle of the bill placed before it.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, may I add something to the observations of my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). The order in council in question was applied on June 27, 1941, and was numbered P.C. 4758. It was passed on the recommendation of the general advisory committee on demobilization and rehabilitation, and an interdepartmental committee on labour coordination.

The order in council was passed, and I believe the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked the then Minister of Labour if he would supplement the order in council by legislation in parliament.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the date of the order in council?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is order in council P.C. 4758, and it is dated June 27, 1941. Then, by agreement the house came to the conclusion it would not bring down legislation at the last session, but would do so early in the next, or present one. Consequent upon the undertaking then given to the leader of the opposition, the present legislation is identical with that order in council, which was drafted by my colleague the Minister of Labour. The regulations in connection therewith are appended to the order in council and will be found at page 204 of volume 4 of the proclamations and orders in council relating to the war.

I think my hon. friend is desirous of adjourning the debate. The matter is non-contentious. It was considered by a parliamentary committee on pensions last year, and the Canadian Legion and other organizations have recommended that the government take action along these lines—first of all by way of order in council, as I have explained, and now by the bill actually before the house. I am sure all hon. members will be in agreement with the general principle of the legislation. The members who sat on the committee last year so expressed themselves. That is the only explanation I can give at the present time.

Mr. HOMUTH: Does it mean anything?

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; may I interrupt my hon. friend. In my experience in the administration of the department we have replaced, by compulsory methods, several ex-service men, within the last two or three months, under the provisions of the order in council I have recited.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the minister for reminding me of the circumstances under which the bill has been brought down. I recall them now perfectly. I regret, however, that I have not had time to study the bill. My colleague the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) wishes to say a few words about it, and I am going to give way to him. I understand it will be agreeable if he moves the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. Does the hon. member wish to speak on second reading, or in committee?

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I should like to adjourn the debate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We will not hold it up.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I may adjourn the debate, I should like to do so. The other night I spoke to the Prime Minister, and it was understood that the bill would not be before us this week. I am in accord with some of the principles contained in the measure, but I should like to point out some aspects which should be clarified.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has been kind enough to remind me of the conversation we had together. I would remind him that the night he wanted off was Friday—not to-night. I am, however, prepared to abide by the wishes of the house.

On motion of Mr. MacNicol the debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

1. Agriculture—departmental administration, $125,558.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 9.12 p.m.

Tuesday, February 24, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

SECRET SESSION OF THE HOUSE

The house, in conformity with a resolution, agreed to on motion of the right hon. the Prime Minister on Friday, the 20th day of February instant, went into secret session, until the house should otherwise order.

At the conclusion of the secret session, the following report of its proceedings was issued under the authority of Mr. Speaker.

"A secret session of the House of Commons was held at 3 o'clock p.m. on Tuesday the 24th February, 1942.

"The sitting was devoted to the question of the defence of Canada in its widest qualification. Statements were made by the Honourable Messrs. Ralston, Power and Macdonald, the ministers in charge of National Defence. A variety of questions dealing with different aspects of the war were asked and answered. Many details were given the members of the house.

J. Allison Glen,
Speaker."

It being twenty minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, February 25, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

PROTECTED AREAS—JAPANESE NATIONALS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MEASURES FOR SECURITY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to lay on the table a copy of an order in council which was passed yesterday amending the defence of Canada regulations and giving the Minister of Justice increased powers to require persons to leave "protected areas." It might be of service to the house if I were to table at this time a number of orders in council that have been passed which have a special relation to conditions as they exist in the province of British Columbia as a result of situations arising out of Japan's declaration of war.

The order in council which I have just tabled, P.C. 1486, amends the defence of Canada regulations so as to provide authority for the Minister of Justice to require any or all persons to leave a protected area as defined by order of the Minister of National Defence and to impose restrictions in respect of their employment, business, movement or places of residence. Under this authority the Minister of Justice may also prohibit or restrict the possession or use by any or all persons in the protected area of any specified articles and require their delivery to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In short, the defence of Canada regulations as now amended give the Minister of Justice full power to take any required security measures with regard to any person if in the protected area. The protected area in British Columbia has already been defined by the Minister of National Defence as the coastal area between the Cascade mountains and the sea, including all the islands off the coast of British Columbia.

In addition to the above mentioned order in council, the following orders have previously been passed relating to security on the Pacific coast:

P.C. 9591, December 7, 1941 and P.C. 9760, December 16, 1941, respecting compulsory registration of all persons of Japanese race. That has already been tabled.

P.C. 9761, December 16, 1941, providing for control of vessels used or operated by persons of Japanese race.

P.C. 251 of January 13, 1942, prohibiting the issuance of fishing licences to persons of Japanese race, and prohibiting such persons from serving on fishing vessels. That has also been tabled.

P.C. 365, January 16, 1942, amending the Defence of Canada regulations so as to authorize the Minister of National Defence, with the concurrence of the Minister of Justice to declare any area in Canada a protected area, or if it appears necessary or expedient so to do, and in the public interest, and in respect of such areas conferring certain powers with regard to the persons and property of any enemy aliens.

P.C. 1271, February 17, 1942, providing for the establishment of a Canadian-Japanese construction corps, to be formed by Canadian nationals of Japanese racial origin, and establishing conditions of enrolment and terms of service for the said corps.

P.C. 1348, February 19, 1942, authorizing the establishment of work camps for male enemy aliens including Japanese nationals, on projects outside protected areas.

P.C. 1365 of February 19, 1942, prohibiting the possession of fire-arms or explosives by persons of Japanese race.

P.C. 1457 of February 24, 1942, regulating the acquisition of land or any interest therein, or the growing of crops in Canada by persons of Japanese race and by Japanese controlled companies.

In order to complete the record of the principal orders in council in this connection, copies of the following orders in council (in addition to P.C. 1486 of February 24, 1942), are tabled herewith:

P.C. 365 of January 16, 1942; P.C. 1271 of February 17, 1942; P.C. 1348 of February 19, 1942; P.C. 1365 of February 19, 1942; and P.C. 1457 of February 24, 1942.

Mr. NEILL: Would it be possible to have these orders in council included in Votes and Proceedings? It would save a good deal of copying, and we should like to have access to them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would be very convenient.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I see no reason why they should not be included in the Votes and Proceedings if the house is agreeable. The clerk might be so instructed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I appreciated aright what the Prime Minister said, that this order in council, which was passed on February 24, probably at the time we were in secret session yesterday—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, it was passed before the session.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I am just suggesting that we did observe three cabinet ministers hurry to leave the chamber last night and come back again, and I have a right to draw some conclusions.

Mr. CRERAR: Three cabinet ministers cannot pass an order in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I may be wrong in my deduction. If I apprehended aright what the Prime Minister said, the order is not mandatory on the Minister of Justice; it is merely enabling, is it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it were made mandatory in its broad terms, I am afraid the Minister of Justice would have a very large order because it gives him power over any person in a protected area to take any step that the security of the people of British Columbia would seem to necessitate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The answer is, it is merely enabling.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, it is an all-enabling order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is a good way to put it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I should give to the house a statement I gave to the press this morning. I would have made it to the house first but I thought it was in the interest of law and order out on the Pacific coast that this communication should reach British Columbia without delay.

The statement was to the effect that power had been given to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to exclude any or all persons, regardless of their citizenship, from protected areas as defined under the defence of Canada regulations.

The new regulation corresponds very closely to the proclamation issued by the President of the United States on Friday.

Under the amended order the Minister of Justice may require any or all persons, whether British subjects or not, to leave a protected area. He is further authorized to impose such restrictions as he may specify in respect of their employment, business, movements or places of residence. He can prohibit or restrict the possession or use by any or all persons in the protected area of any specified articles and can require the delivery of such articles to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In short, the defence of Canada regulations as now amended give the Minister of Justice full power to take any required security measure within the protected area with regard to any person within that area.

The protected area in British Columbia in which the new order will apply has been defined by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) as the coastal belt between the Cascade mountains and the sea, including all the islands off the coast of British Columbia.

It is the policy of the government to use the powers of this order to take all necessary security measures to safeguard the defences of the Pacific coast of Canada.

QUESTIONS

COASTAL MOTOR BOATS

Mr. BRUCE:

1. How many coastal motor boats have been ordered?
2. How many were completed by October 31, 1941?
3. What was the total cost?
4. How many of these boats reached Halifax before the close of navigation?
5. How many of these boats are now in commission?
6. In what state of completion are the balance of the boats?
7. At what points are any boats, which did not reach Halifax before the close of navigation, tied up?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): This question was brought up the other day, and I answered it to my hon. friend privately. I hope he will be ready to drop it from the order paper.

Mr. BRUCE: That is satisfactory to me, Mr. Speaker.

Question dropped.

JAPANESE NATIONALS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. NEILL:

1. Did the government, on January 14, last, issue a statement of policy regarding Japanese in British Columbia?
2. Did one of the items state that Japanese nationals will be forbidden to possess or use short wave radio receiving sets, radio transmitters and cameras?
3. Was such prohibition enforced by order in council, and, if so, what was the number of such order?
4. Were instructions given to any military or police authorities to enforce the said order in council?
5. If so, when and to whom?
6. How many of the receiving sets, transmitters and cameras have been surrendered or seized up to date?
7. Why was the restriction confined to Japanese nationals and not extended to those born in Japan and since 1922 naturalized in Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Order-in-council P.C. 365 January 15, 1942, gives the minister the power to make such prohibition from time to time, and he has made an order dated February 5, 1942.
4. Yes.
5. February 5, 1942. Commissioner, R.C.M. Police.
6. No information as yet.
7. The restriction is not now confined to Japanese nationals.

Canada (conferences with leading prison administrators and investigation of foreign prisons); appointed inspector and auditor of penitentiaries, July 13, 1938; Canadian civil service employment 15 years.

8. This involves a question of policy.

Mr. MAYHEW:

Which, if any, of the recommendations of the royal commission on the penal system of Canada in its report of April, 1938, have already been, or are about to be, acted upon?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. (a) A convict at present earns remission as from the date of admission instead of the seventh month of sentence as was the case previously.

(b) Remission is now allowed for holidays and also for periods of sickness.

(c) For purposes of remission, overlapping terms are considered as one.

2. A thorough inspection of penitentiary industries has been made.

3. Shaving and bathing of convicts have been made more frequent.

4. In each case recommended by wardens, convicts who are to be rearrested on discharge, or deported, have been allowed their remuneration earned during their sentences.

5. Arrangements are being made to have some penitentiary farm vegetables canned commercially for own use.

6. Wardens are now more fully consulted with regard to the advisability of improvements in connection with their work.

7. More liberal visiting and writing privileges have been accorded to deserving convicts.

8. Improved cell lighting has been installed wherever possible.

9. Kitchens have been renovated and special ranges installed in practically every institution. Cleanliness and preparation of food are receiving careful attention.

10. Contributions of convicts to the radio entertainment fund have been discontinued.

11. In several penitentiaries, young convicts are now trained in the motor mechanic trade, notwithstanding that they are still segregated from adult class. In one institution, a new shoe shop has been opened and young convicts only are employed therein.

12. Practically all vegetables required in the penitentiary service are now produced on the penitentiary farms. Surpluses of over one million pounds were diverted to army and other government departments in 1941.

13. A dairy herd has been established in one of the penitentiaries not previously so equipped.

14. Wardens were authorized to use waste material for demonstrational purposes in convict training.

15. Many more officers have been made permanent within the limitations placed by the treasury board:

	1938-39	1939-40	1940-41	1941-42	Total
Kingston	30	20	Nil	Nil	50
St. Vincent de Paul	39	15	Nil	Nil	54
Dorchester	26	11	Nil	Nil	37

British Columbia	27	13	Nil	Nil	40
Saskatchewan	10	20	Nil	Nil	30
Collin's Bay	24	15	Nil	Nil	39
	171	109			280

16. Certain officers were selected to proceed to the training school, Wakefield, England, for a course of instruction. The first draft proceeded in 1939, but subsequent drafts were cancelled in September of the same year on account of the war.

17. Poultry raising has been started in one penitentiary.

18. Convicts are provided with lighters; convicts pay for flints only.

19. More convicts are being employed in industrial labour.

20. Officers' private cars now may be repaired by convict labour.

21. More schooling is provided for young convicts at St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary.

22. Recommendations regarding the keeping of stores have been followed as far as possible and are the general practice to be observed in the future.

23. Authority for expenditures by wardens has been increased, thereby reducing the number of requests and correspondence for minor expenditures of maintenance and other routine matters.

24. In several penitentiaries, showers have been installed in the cell blocks.

(c) Mr. D. Leo Dolan, chief, Canadian travel bureau. Mr. H. A. McCallum, assistant chief, Canadian travel bureau.

3. To collect and disseminate to the public, information concerning the various phases of the war effort of the Canadian people and the activities of the government in relation thereto, and generally to coordinate the existing public information services of the government and originate or employ other means in order that the same may be used in the most efficient way for the obtaining of the utmost aid from the people of Canada in the national emergency which has arisen.

4. Only to the extent of distributing material provided by those departments and the printing of booklets and posters specifically requested by them.

5. See answer to No. 4.

6. Through the news services; photographic services; press gallery; by direct mail; through clubs, societies and other organizations; members of parliament; by radio and on the motion picture screen. Poster material is distributed through factories, firms, government offices and individuals, et cetera.

*LANCASTER MILITARY HOSPITAL—WEST ST. JOHN

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What were the names of all employees, including medical and clerical staff, of Lancaster hospital, West Saint John, from the year 1919 to the year 1941?

2. What were their salaries per year and what were their pensions per year from 1919 to 1941?

3. Were any of these employees supplied with automobiles by the government? If so, how many and what are their names?

4. What were the prices of these automobiles?

5. What year were such automobiles purchased?

6. What was the cost of operating these cars from the date of purchase to the year 1941?

7. What year was Lancaster hospital opened as a military hospital?

8. What was the total cost of the Lancaster hospital since its opening as a military hospital to the year 1941?

9. What was the cost of all repairs to Lancaster hospital since its opening as a military hospital to the year 1941?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The other day I informed my hon. friend that some of this information was not available. If he will consult me or some of my officers, we shall be glad to make available what information we have.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was a question of lessening the time. I undertook to see the hon. member but did not. The question can stand in the meantime.

Question stands.

SUCCESSION DUTY

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What is the total amount of succession duty under the Dominion Succession Duty Act that has been (a) assessed, (b) collected since the said act was assented to on the 14th of June, 1941?

2. How many persons deceased since the said date have left estates with a gross valuation of $500,000 or over?

3. (a) What were the names and addresses of such persons; (b) what was the aggregate value of, and amount of succession duty assessed or levied against each of said estates?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. (a) $477,218.40. (b) $3,836,890.64 as at January 31, 1942.

2. Records not available because of six months period for filing after the death of deceased; however, the number filed is 17.

3. It is not deemed in the public interest to give the individual particulars requested in this question.

EAST AND WEST BLOCKS, OTTAWA—FIRE PROTECTION

Mr. WINKLER:

1. Are precautions contemplated or have they been taken, to prevent destruction by fire of the historic east and west blocks in the group of government buildings at Ottawa?

2. Has an estimate been made of the cost of installing a sprinkler system in those buildings?

3. If so, what is the amount?

[Mr. Hatfield.]

Mr. CARDIN:

1. The east and west blocks are protected by the May-Oatway fire detector system which is connected to the city fire alarm system. In addition there are stand pipes with hose racks, fire pumps and also portable chemical fire extinguishers.

2. No.

3. Answered by No. 2.

1941 VICTORY LOAN

Mr. QUELCH:

1. What amount was loaned by the chartered banks to individuals and corporations for the purchase of victory bonds in 1941?

2. What amount has been loaned to individuals and corporations on the security of Victory bonds purchased in 1941?

3. What rate of interest was charged on these loans?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. It is understood that loans made by the chartered banks to finance the purchase of victory loan bonds by individuals, corporations and other bodies, totalled $135,978,539 on June 30, 1941.

2. No information other than given in No. 1.

3. For a period of six months subsequent to June 15, 1941, the rate of interest charged on such loans was equal to the coupon rate received in the victory bonds.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. On what date did the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police complete the annual report of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the year ended March 31 1941?

2. On what date was the said report transmitted by the Minister of Justice to His Excellency the Governor General?

3. On what date was the said report sent to the king's printer for printing?

4. On what date was the printing and binding of the said report completed?

5. On what date was the said report laid on the table of the House of Commons?

Mr. St. LAURENT:

1. On account of pressure of other work, the report was not completed until August 16, 1941.

2. This action is not usually taken.

3. English edition, August 18, 1941. French edition, October 20, 1941.

4. English edition, October 16, 1941. French edition, December 19, 1941.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

1941 VICTORY LOAN

Mr. CHURCH:

For a return showing a breakdown of the details given in a return, November 12, 1941, in connection with the sale of the 1941 victory loan, as follows:—

Preparation and distribution of bonds		$ 363,921 86
Administration expenses:
Salaries	$149,881 67
Travelling expenses	285,038 37
Stationery and office supplies	160,673 25
Rental of office space	29,006 77
Sundry expenses, including postage, telephone, telegraph, etc.	145,226 24
		769,826 30
Publicity expenses:
Newspaper and magazine advertising	476,677 00
Posters, including billboard posters and posting	79,565 83
Radio advertising	86,618 17
Local advertising	160,888 13
Other publicity	254,319 85
		1,058,068 98
Commissions to individual canvassers on general subscriptions		1,551,713 80
Remuneration to banks, trust and loan companies—service fee for handling and delivering bonds		1,750,000 00
Remuneration to investment dealers and stockbrokers re pooled subscriptions		3,293,040 00
Total		$8,786,570 94

The said return to show the details of each of the main items set out aforesaid.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman has written me about this notice and has kindly consented to allow me some discretion as to the items which will be broken down. I am quite content to have it passed on the understanding that information which it has never been considered in accord with the public interest to disclose shall not be disclosed. That applies to some of the items.

Mr. CHURCH: I have no idea of interfering with anything. This motion was called three times when I was away. Perhaps I might say a few words about it.

My idea in bringing this up last November was in regard to past loans. I thought the chartered banks, the Bank of Canada, the post offices and other departments could effect a great economy. I think the government might well pass it, and break it down after, if that is satisfactory. If not, it can be dropped, and I will bring it up again after the present loan is over.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I assume that the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) did not hear the statement of the Minister of Finance. Could not a return be brought down subject to the reservation stated by the minister? I have an idea that the hon. member thinks the introduction of this question at the moment, and the bringing down of a return based thereon, might be detrimental to the present loan, and of course he would like to avoid that. However, I should like to see some of this information brought down, though certainly I would not want it done at the expense of the present loan, if the minister thinks it might have that effect. But could it not be passed, with the understanding that the minister will use his own discretion as to what he shall bring down?

Mr. ILSLEY: It seemed to be the feeling of some of my colleagues at least that it would be undesirable to pass this motion now, and the hon. gentleman offered to let it drop. If he wants to put it on the order paper again, however, I can give him some of this information. Some of it I cannot give; some it would be most undesirable to give. For instance, there were some seventeen thousand canvassers in the last loan, and it would be an impossible task, and undesirable, to say what each one of them received.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it would be desirable to let the motion drop now. In the meantime I will confer with the hon. member, and perhaps he and I can frame a motion that will bring down the information he desires.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS—AIR RAID PRECAUTIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all orders in council, reports and other documents in the possession of the government relative to the defence of Canada regulations. Also a copy of all correspondence exchanged with the provinces relative to the enforcement of blackouts, covered by section 35 of the defence of Canada rules and regulations, as well as a copy of the order in council delegating this authority to provincial attorneys general instead of to the district military authorities.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This motion refers to an order in council delegating authority to provincial attorneys general instead of to district military authorities. There is no such order in council. There is an instrument of delegation which I can table immediately. The correspondence will be somewhat voluminous, and to produce it may take some time.

Motion agreed to.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FERRY

INQUIRY AS TO SERVICE BETWEEN ISLAND AND MAINLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to call the attention of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Transport, who I am sorry is not in his seat, to the situation which has arisen in connection with the car ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I ask the house to bear with me while I give a brief recital of the present position as I see it.

On the 23rd instant, the day before yesterday, the ferry Prince Edward Island was held up at Borden with a leaky boiler, and there is now no conveyance by boat between the mainland and the island. All freight and passenger movement are held up, and the only chance to get on and off the island is by air. Just how long it will take to repair the boiler is not known. I am advised that last week there were over one hundred carloads of freight at Tormentine awaiting shipment to the island, and in addition to the ordinary shipments of live stock moving off the island, over two hundred reefer cars were required to ship potatoes to the United States. These potatoes represent a value to the farmers of approximately $1,000 per car, and if the situation does not improve very shortly a very severe loss will be sustained. I understand that the transportation committee of the Charlottetown board of trade met on the 23rd instant and passed a resolution, which was telegraphed to the Prime Minister, but so far as I know no answer has yet been received.

I placed some questions about this matter on the order paper for the purpose of eliciting some information, but the answers brought down on Monday last indicate that nothing is being done to improve the situation. Of course, when these questions were placed on the order paper the present ferry was not out of commission. I am also advised that if an order had been given in the United States for a new ferry within a reasonable time after the Charlottetown was lost, that order could have been filled, since they are filling orders over there for icebreakers and so on for the great lakes.

Will the Prime Minister, or the Minister of Transport, or in his absence the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who has had perhaps more to do with this matter than anyone else, indicate what is intended to be done to cope with the present situation, which is rapidly going from bad to worse, perhaps through no fault on the part of anyone in particular but because of delay in dealing with the situation.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): This matter has been giving the government a great deal of concern. I assume that the Department of Munitions and Supply is the bottleneck. The position is that in order to rebuild this ferry we would have to give up a berth in one of our shipyards for a period of some fifteen months. We would have to divert sufficient steel to build probably two or three twin screw corvettes, which are badly needed; and considering the urgency of our naval requirements and of shipbuilding generally, we have not thought it advisable to do this.

My hon. friend is quite mistaken as to the possibility of having the ferry built in the United States. That possibility was explored immediately after the sinking. We scoured the second-hand market there, and looked into the position of the shipyards. At that time every shipyard was controlled by the government, and it was quite impossible to get a berth.

The service is carried on at the moment by a car ferry which handled the service until 1929, I think, and which is a perfectly good ferry. There are two car ferries on the run, but at present only one operates; and it is not unusual for the present ferry to carry on the service for six weeks or two months at this time of year. That ferry is operating. There was a short delay while a boiler was overhauled or repaired, but these things do occur when there is only one boat in operation, causing a temporary tie-up of cars. But unless this service has changed tremendously since earlier years the present car ferry should be able to handle the traffic with reasonable satisfaction to the people on the island. At this time of year, when the floe ice is heavy, the service always has been subject to short interruptions. It is not unusual to have a ferry go out to sea and be away for thirty-six hours before being able to dock on the other side; at least that has occurred more than once. In the meantime I would remind hon. members that a second service has been inaugurated between Wood island and Pictou, which I believe will relieve the situation considerably during the summer months.

I can assure every hon. member that the government is exceedingly anxious to rectify this situation, but at the moment that could be done only at great cost to our war effort. We are organized in one set of yards to build cargo boats, which we are launching every two months from every berth. It would perhaps mean losing eight or ten cargo vessels if we built a new ferry or, alternatively, losing two or three corvettes. In this period of war we must weigh the relative urgency of the needs in both directions, and that we have been doing. The moment we think we can spare a berth of any sort that can build a successor to the Charlottetown, the boat will be built. In the meantime a ferry has been found, I think in San Francisco or Los Angeles, which may be of some service as a stand-by boat. This is being examined very closely, and if it is found at all satisfactory it will be brought around and put on the service for such assistance as it is able to render.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

LEAVE FOR FARMERS' SONS—LENGTH OF DEFERMENT OF SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence, arising out of a very large number of communications I have been receiving from farmers located all across Canada, asking whether or not in view of the pronounced labour shortage which now exists on the farms it is the intention of the government to enable farmers' sons or others qualified to do farm work to go on leave, so that the spring work may be properly completed.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can say that just at this instant I have not in mind any special or new policy with regard to that matter. It has each year been taken into consideration, having regard to the requirements of various units, and where they were placed. I may say that with respect to certain units in certain locations it was impossible to make any substantial break in the ranks by the granting of leave. In other locations, and with respect to other units that was possible, and it has been done.

As I say, I have not at present in mind any general principle which could govern uniformly across Canada. But I assure my hon. friend the matter will have every study, and the very best possible will be done in order to make men available where they can be made available for the important work to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, further to the question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), I will not attempt to read or to refer to the many communications I have received, but I should like to ask a further question of the minister, indicated in several of the communications I have received. Is there any possibility of the extension of the term of exemption to, say, one year, in connection with farmers' sons? I have some very urgent cases I could show the minister, and I shall be glad to do so. But could that term be extended so that it will cover the whole year?

An hon. MEMBER: What about conscription?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is referring to regulations made by the Department of National War Services rather than by the Department of National Defence. Furthermore, he will realize that what he is asking for is, in effect, direct exemption for one year for a certain class. That does not fit in very well with all that has been said with respect to the necessity for the utilization of man-power, and the effort for total war.

In so far as my department can be of service in working out any more equitable situation with respect to those on the farm, I shall be glad to see that its services are available, and that conferences and consultations are held. But I cannot say anything further than that. One cannot offhand and without due consideration indicate a new policy or draft a new regulation.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am not asking that extended exemption be given in general; that is not my point at all. But there are extreme cases. For instance, may farmers about to do their spring work be assured that they will have a continuance of at least a short exemption?

Mr. RALSTON: That is a matter, first, of regulation. The regulations provide that the period of exemption shall be six months. There is only one deferment granted at one time, but there is nothing which makes it positive that another deferment will not be granted. Secondly, it is a matter for the board to decide whether or not the case is one of emergency, and of the kind my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. CHURCH: What about those in the cities who want exemptions?

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, following up the questions already asked with reference to farmers' sons in training being given leave to help with spring seeding, I would ask the Minister of National Defence this question. Such cases as I have had come to my attention I have referred to the Deputy Minister of National Defence, who has been very considerate and suggested that if the men will make application to their commanding officer consideration will be given to such applications. But most of these men do not know that, and the result is that scores of letters on the subject are coming to almost every member representing a rural constituency. Would the minister give consideration to having a statement printed in army orders to the effect that where men are needed at home on the farm and can be spared, leave can be had by applying to the commanding officer?

Mr. RALSTON: I would not want to have a statement made in quite that way, but I will see if some statement can be prepared with regard to the procedure in cases of the kind. Very recently we have made a rule which I think will be made uniform, that where men are actually in the army—not just those who have been called up and have not yet actually reported—we are referring such cases of men actually in the army, at least in the early stages of their training, to these boards. We are asking the Minister of National War Services to request his boards to look into these cases so that they may be dealt with on a uniform basis, and not on the basis of what one commanding officer may think in one place and another may think in another. This will help to get a set of principles laid down with respect to these men being entitled to deferment if deferment seems to be required.

DEFERMENT OF SERVICE OF FOURTH SON FOR BUSINESS REASONS

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence which arises out of the question asked by the hon. member for Lincoln. A widow has three sons who have enlisted voluntarily for service in England and she wants to have a fourth son kept home for business reasons, but the tribunal ruled against her. There should not be conscription in some homes and not in others. Are any instructions issued to the tribunals in these matters?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): If I understand my hon. friend aright his question is: are any instructions issued with regard to business men?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To the tribunals.

Mr. RALSTON: That question is really one which ought to be referred to my colleague, the Minister of National War Services. No instructions are issued to tribunals by my department in that respect.

[Later:]

Mr. CHURCH: Can the Minister of National War Services give me an answer to the question I asked a few moments ago?

POSTPONEMENT FOR FIFTH SON

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I should like to ask any of the war ministers or the Minister of National War Services if a man who has four sons who have enlisted voluntarily in the army can secure an indefinite postponement of training for the fifth son?

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): The matter is covered by the national war services regulations which are administered by divisional boards. It is within the discretion of the board to grant a postponement, but each postponement is confined to a limit of six months. There is nothing to prevent a board from granting either one or more extensions of such postponement.

SECOND VICTORY LOAN

RETURNS FROM ONTARIO—VILLAGE OF OMEMEE AND TOWNSHIP OF EMILY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. BRUCE McNEVIN (Victoria, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I note in this morning's Globe and Mail a report with regard to those Ontario municipalities which were first in reaching their allotments in connection with the victory loan. I have not the slightest desire in any way to detract from the splendid record of these municipalities. However, in order that the record may be clear, may I say that the village of Omemee and the township of Emily exceeded their objective of $65,000, by six and one-half per cent within fifteen minutes after the victory loan offices opened on the morning of Monday, February 16. I believe there should be a word of commendation for the joint chairmen of these municipalities, Rev. R. M. Patterson of Omemee and Rev. Father McFadden of Downeyville. The canvassers Messrs. D. Weir, A. Carroll and A. McQuade are still going strong and have exceeded the sum of $100,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I believe that is not a question of privilege.

RETURNS FROM QUEBEC—MEGANTIC COUNTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOSEPH LAFONTAINE (Megantic-Frontenac): I should like to read a telegram which I received yesterday, reading as follows:

We take pleasure in advising you that Megantic county has to-day obtained and passed its objective of one million and four hundred thousand dollars. We understand this is the first county in the province of Quebec to reach its objective.

A. S. Johnson,
J. A. Forand,
Joint Chairmen, victory loan committee, county Megantic

PRIVILEGE—Mr. KINLEY

OTTAWA HOUSING CONDITIONS—COMMENT OF MAYOR LEWIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I desire to bring to the attention of the house an article appearing in to-day's issue of the Ottawa Morning Journal. It stands as the chief item of news on the front page, and refers to a statement made by his worship the Mayor of Ottawa. The news item is as follows:

Mayor Tells M.P's to Go Home
Make Room for War Workers

"Some of these M.P.'s who are wasting their time around Ottawa should go home so that their offices could be used by war workers," Mayor Lewis declared at Board of Control on Tuesday.

Then what appears to be the motive follows:

Mr. Lewis made his remarks after the board had endorsed the stand taken by G. Russell Boucher, M.P. for Carleton county, in the House of Commons on Monday night for an upward revision of the $100,000 granted annually to the city in lieu of taxes.

Then the article goes on to say:

Controllers Geldert and Pickering agreed with Mayor Lewis that the government had created the serious housing situation in the capital and was doing nothing to relieve the shortage of accommodation.

May I bring to the attention of the Prime Minister certain press dispatches which indicate that in Washington, where there is a similar condition, some departments of government are being moved to other cities. It might be a splendid idea, for instance, to remove the naval department to the coast.

Some hon. MEMBERS: East coast.

Some hon. MEMBERS: West coast.

Mr. KINLEY: And the Department of Agriculture to Winnipeg. Then, with respect to the personal affront indicated in the article, may I point out that most members of parliament are proud of the national capital, and naturally we are chagrined by the discourteous remark of the chief magistrate of the city of Ottawa.

Mr. HOMUTH: He knows only the Liberal members.

Mr. KINLEY: Most of us would be busy at home. But that is one of the tests people usually apply before sending us here.

It seems to me that the criticisms about members of parliament are hard to understand, especially in war time. If a debate continues for a long time in the house, we are accused of wasting the country's time. On the other hand, if hon. members do not speak, it is said that they are dumb. So far as I am concerned, practical business is usually run in a harmonious and quiet manner. To my mind that is the most effective kind of business. But it seems that sections of the press and some people across the country want us to put on a show.

Mr. PINARD: On a point of order, my hon. friend is complaining about the city of Ottawa.

Mr. KINLEY: I have the floor.

Mr. PINARD: Sit down, please. The hon. member says that he is speaking to a question of privilege. I am speaking to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) has introduced a question of privilege concerning an item appearing in a newspaper. He has extended his observations as far as he should, in the circumstances.

Mr. KINLEY: I should like to say just a word more, because this article is an affront to members of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should confine his remarks to the question of privilege.

Mr. KINLEY: Most of the criticism of members of parliament seems to be by people who do not understand just what we do. Some seem to think that the whole performance of a member is spread upon Hansard.

That is contrary to the fact and contrary to responsible government. Hon. members, especially those supporting the government, do their work most effectively and use their influence before the legislation ever comes into the House of Commons.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KINLEY: I subscribe to the sentiment expressed in the Scripture:

Should a wise man utter vain knowledge, and fill his belly with the east wind?

NATIONAL HEALTH

QUESTION AS TO INTRODUCTION THIS SESSION OF HEALTH INSURANCE SCHEME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. Would the minister care to comment on the prevalent rumour that the government proposes this session to introduce legislation designed to provide a national scheme of health insurance?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The answer to the question is in the negative. However, there were certain discussions departmentally last June on the question of national health, as a result of which certain departmental proposals have been canvassed thoroughly with the Canadian medical association, the dental profession, the nursing association and the hospitals of Canada. On the outcome of this canvassing the departmental policy will be determined.

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

PROBLEMS OF THE FARMER—SUBMISSION OF CANADIAN FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is it proposed to convene at once the standing committee on agriculture and, if so, will an opportunity be afforded in that committee, or in a special committee, for a comprehensive consideration and exhaustive review of the more pressing problems facing the Canadian farmer at the moment?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): It is intended to have the committee on agriculture convene just as soon as possible and there are certain matters which I, as Minister of Agriculture, intend to refer to that committee. These do not necessarily include the matters referred to. If there is no other opportunity provided during the session, there is always opportunity when the estimates are being discussed of obtaining whatever information can be given by the department with regard to different matters.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was wondering if the minister had in mind referring to the committee any of the problems which were raised in the submission of the Canadian federation of agriculture which met the Prime Minister and members of the government in January?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not given consideration to that, but I shall give consideration to it.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

KIRKLAND LAKE STRIKE—PROTECTION OF TRADE UNIONISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour, of which I have given him notice. It arises from a telegram received this morning from Sudbury, which reads as follows:

Forest Emmerson, international representative, and Jack Whelehan, international organizer, have been brutally and viciously assaulted in union office. Organizers in hospital. Union office completely demolished. Thugs demanded list of union membership. We believe this direct reaction of government policy in Kirkland Lake strike. Incessant anti-union campaign conducted by Sudbury Star. A committee of Sudbury miners request this to the attention of our government.

A. K. Smith,
J. McCool,
W. Cavanough,
J. Navalkoski.

Has the minister any information in regard to this matter and, if so, would he please make a statement to the house?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): My answer to the first question is no. My answer to the second question is that, as no doubt my hon. friend knows, the responsibility for the maintenance of law and order is primarily that of the municipalities and provincial governments.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice which arises out of a telegram similar to the one just read by the hon. member for North Battleford. One of the organizers who is now in hospital, due to the assault described in the telegram read by the hon. member, is a United States cititzen legally admitted to this country as a representative of organized labour. I should like to ask what protection the Royal Canadian Mounted Police gives to officials who are endeavouring to carry out instructions issued by the government as contained in order in council P.C. 2685. Can the minister give the house an assurance that there will be a thorough investigation into the complaint contained in the telegram read by the hon. member for North Battleford?

Hon. L. S. St. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): The only answer I could give to the hon. member would be similar to that given already by the Minister of Labour. The hon. member was good enough to address a letter to me containing a copy of the telegram, and I made inquiries from the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. He told me that he had no information and wished to point out that the responsibility for maintaining order there was upon the municipal police of Sudbury and the provincial police of Ontario.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice following the question raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. This is a very serious situation, and I do not think it should be passed over as lightly as it was by both the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labour. If labour causes any disturbance in any area—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Put the question.

Mr. MacINNIS: Just a moment, now. Parliament cannot afford to ignore this matter. I am saying that if labour causes any disturbance in any area the government would very soon send in the mounted police, and I think that at the present moment the government should give every assurance that these people will be protected. What protection are trade unionists going to have in this matter?

Mr. HOMUTH: The marriage is not so happy after all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It seems to be dissolved already.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I should like to point out that the practice is becoming prevalent of putting supplementary questions following original questions submitted to the ministry. That means almost a general debate on questions that have been put to the ministry, who have given an answer to the original question. Furthermore, in the asking of questions, expressions of opinion are being given and statements of fact made. These are not questions addressed to the ministry, and I would ask hon. members to remember that on questions put to the ministry on the orders of the day there can be no general debate, and supplementary questions should be prohibited.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I have been very careful not to make speeches in asking questions, but we cannot afford to leave this matter to the gorillas who are at the present time running the province of Ontario.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a point of order. While I have no brief for the premier of Ontario, and I do not think he particularly needs any defence, I submit that hon. members of this house ought to show respect for the premier of any province of the Dominion of Canada, and under the rules of the house, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) had no right, I submit, to use the term he did with reference to Premier Hepburn, when he called him a gorilla. I think he ought to withdraw that remark.

I should like a ruling on my point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand that the hon. member had asked for a ruling. An hon. member must take responsibility for any statement he makes with respect to somebody who is not a member of the house. If it were a member of the house it would be a different matter.

[Later:]

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to the point raised by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), citation 294 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms reads:

> If a member should say nothing disrespectful to the house or the chair, or personally opprobrious to other members, or in violation of other rules of the house he may state whatever he thinks fit in debate, however offensive it may be to the feelings, or injurious to the character, of individuals; and he is protected by his privilege from any action for libel, as well as from any other question or molestation.

WHEAT

LEGISLATION RESPECTING 1942 CROP—RECOMMENDATIONS OF POOL DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I wish to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce two questions. This question follows one asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre. The farmers of the west are anxious to know just what will be required of them this spring, whether there is to be any reduction in seeding, and so on, and what is going to happen with respect to price and marketing. Would the minister inform the house, first, when he will be prepared to bring down legislation dealing with the price for the 1942 crop and its marketing? My second question is prompted by the statement of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) that government members of the house do their best work, not on the floor of the house, but, consulting with the cabinet before they ever come into the house. I would ask what success the minister is having with the western Liberals, what suggestions he is getting from them, and what assistance in framing the wheat legislation and carrying out the recommendations of the pool delegation?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In reply to the first question asked by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, I wish to say that those advising the cabinet on matters of wheat and farm policy, and those members of the cabinet who are particularly responsible for policy along that line, and the cabinet generally, have been holding practically continuous meetings on this question for a long time. In the last few days, for instance, we spent all Saturday afternoon, Sunday afternoon, Monday and last night until twelve o'clock, considering this subject and endeavouring to arrive at unanimity on a question of such great importance to western Canada and Canada at large. Most sympathetic and anxious attention is being given to the problem, and I can assure the hon. member that a decision will be brought down at the earliest possible moment.

I do not think the hon. member really expects an answer to his second question.

Mr. PERLEY: I think it would be very interesting to have one.

STANDING ORDERS

ENFORCEMENT OF RULE WITH RESPECT TO READING OF SPEECHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): Now that the speech from the throne is disposed of, I would like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, if the rule that prohibits members from reading their speeches will be enforced from now until the end of the session?

Mr. SPEAKER: The rules of the house are there and will have to be enforced.

HONG KONG

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO CANADIAN CASUALTIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, to-day the government has received the first official information from which any definite conclusion can be arrived at with respect to the number of casualties at Hong Kong. A message has been received from the Canadian Minister at Buenos Aires transmitting a message which was received from the Argentine embassy—I take it to be the Argentine embassy at Tokyo. The message is very meagre. It gives figures, and that is all. The statement is that "Japanese government officially communicate figures for prisoners of war Hong Kong, Canadians, 1,689." Hon. members will remember that the number who embarked was 1,985. That means, on the basis of those figures, I most sincerely regret to say, that, at least without further information, 296 would be regarded as either dead or missing.

SUGAR

INQUIRY AS TO RATIONING AND CONSERVATION OF FOREIGN EXCHANGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspé): Will the Minister of Finance inform the house whether the government's policy with respect to the conservation of foreign exchange has anything to do with the rationing of sugar?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the reason for the rationing of sugar was the action taken by the United States and the fact that there was a possible prospective shortage of sugar. It had no relation whatever to the conservation of exchange.

PLEBISCITE ACT

PROVISION FOR TAKING OF VOTES ON ANY QUESTION SUBMITTED BY WAY OF PLEBISCITE

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10, respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes of such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The bill which is now before the house for its second reading is, as the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), who introduced it, announced a few days ago, in the nature of a general plebiscite act; that is to say, it makes provision for the taking of a plebiscite which ordinarily would be as applicable to a plebiscite on one subject as another. The intention, however, is that the bill should be for one plebiscite only, and that the plebiscite when taken, shall have reference to only one question. That question has already been made clear to the members of the house and the public, but I will take occasion at once to bring again to the attention of the house its exact wording.

It will be recalled that in the speech from the throne it was announced, as part of government policy, that a plebiscite would be taken on the question of removing a certain limitation which now is imposed upon the government with respect to the enlistment of men for service overseas. The question which it is intended to ask the public in the plebiscite is the following:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

As I said, at the time of speaking on the address, the question is very simple in its language and meaning and is a straightforward one. I do not think it is capable of any more than one interpretation. It asks the people of Canada whether they are willing to release the government from a certain limitation which arises out of past commitments with respect to the enlistment of men for overseas. If the answer is in the affirmative it will mean that the government, according to the opinion expressed by the people, has been released from commitments that have been made; if it is in the negative it will mean that the majority of the electors are of the opinion that the government should continue to be governed by the commitment that was made at the time of the last general election and on previous occasions, and on subsequent occasions as well.

The subject of the plebiscite has been debated at such length that it would perhaps seem unnecessary to discuss it further. My purpose this afternoon is not so much to attempt to add to what has been said but rather, if possible, to clear away some of the confusion that has arisen out of the discussion that has already taken place.

To that end, let me first of all make quite clear the purpose of the plebiscite. As I have said, the purpose is to give the government—I put it in general terms—a perfectly free hand to deal with all matters affecting the war in the manner which, in its judgment, is most in the national interest.

There is a distinction to be made between the legal powers which the government has and the moral authority which it possesses. With respect to the legal power, there can be no question whatever that this parliament has full power to do whatever it may decide to do with respect to the management of matters pertaining to the war. The one limitation which exists on that power so far as this parliament is concerned is not a legal limitation but a moral obligation.

There may be some who take the view that, in matters of government, in time of war, moral obligations count for nothing. May I say that, in my opinion, moral obligations, especially where they relate to a specific measure, a concrete matter related to the war on which the government of the country itself has given a pledge, are as binding as any obligation could possibly be. To say that the parliament of Canada, which derives its powers from the people, after a solemn pledge has been given to the people on a matter which is of deep concern to them, is released from this pledge the moment the people have elected it, is simply for parliament itself to create a precedent which would be subversive of parliamentary institutions.

Let me ask first of all how this limitation arose. It arose out of a situation that existed several years ago in this country. That of itself is significant as indicating how long the public memory is with respect to matters which affect the people themselves. I would pause here to say that the public memory is going to be long in the matter of how this parliament views its moral obligations as well as its legal powers. It is because I feel very strongly that the people of Canada will wish to have their present and their future governments pay the utmost regard to pledges given to the electorate that I feel it all important that this matter of past commitments should be presented to the people in the form of a question which will secure their opinion, before the time comes when the government may be called upon to consider whether further action than it is empowered now to take, should or should not become necessary later on.

During the last war the question of conscription came up near the end of the conflict. I will not go into what took place at the time except to remind hon. members of the fact that nothing in the political history of Canada since Confederation has given rise to so much bitterness, so much ill feeling, or has done so much in the way of dividing the peoples of this country, setting one lot against another, as did the conscription issue at that particular time, and the manner in which it was dealt with by the government of the day. Now it was because of that fact that, when the government of the day saw looming on the horizon the possibility of a future war, it was recognized that this question of conscription would present itself immediately. It was of importance therefore to national unity that a position should be taken and stated by the administration which would prevent any of the kind of controversy and bitterness which had previously arisen, and would maintain the unity of the country at a time when the situation might be most critical. Having that in mind, the government of the day—this was before the present war began—and, not merely the government, but members of the opposition and members of all parties in this House of Commons, expressed very frankly and emphatically on the floor of this parliament their view that, if another war came, and it became necessary to consider the sending of men overseas to participate in what was then thought might be a war confined to Europe alone, the only method that would be resorted to for overseas would be the one of voluntary enlistment—there would be no compulsion, no conscription. I think I am right when I say that that was the view which was generally expressed before the war by all parties in this house. It was expressed for the one reason that it was felt that it was absolutely necessary to maintain, as far as that might be possible, the unity of the country at a time when it might be faced with the great crisis of war.

But let me go a step further. When the war came in Europe and this parliament met to decide whether Canada would enter the war or not, a declaration was made by the government of the day that, if Canada did enter the war, there would not be compulsory service for overseas, but that service for overseas would be by voluntary enlistment. That declaration was made when this house was deciding whether Canada should go into the war or not. And that statement was made not by the government to hon. members of parliament only but by members of parliament of all parties speaking to the people of the country, and assuring them of the position that would be taken. I submit that no more solemn undertaking could possibly have been given to the people of Canada than that which was given to them by their representatives in the House of Commons at that time.

What was the effect of giving that declaration? The effect was that, when Canada decided to go into the war, this House of Commons, I think to a man—there may have been an exception, but practically to a man—decided that Canada should participate in the war at Britain's side. We were told beforehand that it was all nonsense to ask parliament to decide whether the country should go into the war, we were told—I am speaking now of what the government was told by its opponents—that the government should decide that question; not leave it to the people's representatives in parliament to decide what they should do. I took the position very strongly at the time that parliament would decide, and I suppose no one received more abuse and criticism from certain sections of the press and public speakers than I did for taking that stand; I took the position that Canada would not go automatically into war just because one part of the empire might be at war, but that we would decide on the merits of the case as the situation was known, and would take our own action by the vote of the people's representatives in parliament.

Having given the assurance that conscription would not be resorted to in connection with enlistment for service overseas, this parliament voted practically unanimously to enter the war. But that was not the only occasion on which the position was asserted.

We also had a general election in 1940 to decide what administration was to carry on the affairs of the country during the period of war. At that time from one end of Canada to the other members of the government renewed to the people of Canada the undertaking which I have just cited, as the one which would be followed in time of war. Hon. members opposite have been referring to this pledge or commitment as "Mr. King's commitment", "to relieve Mr. King of his commitment", "relieve the Prime Minister of his commitment". May I say that the commitment was not a commitment of myself alone. To begin with, it was a commitment on the part of all my colleagues in the government, it had been made in this House of Commons in the presence of every one of them; it was a commitment made in the name of the entire party which supports the administration; and, may I say, a commitment quite as broad, quite as emphatic, was made by the leader of the opposition of that day on behalf of the Conservative party in this house. The very same commitment was made on behalf of the Conservative party of Canada in this House of Commons by its then leader, it was made also on the platforms of this country by its leader in terms just as emphatic as anyone on this side of the house could have made it.

So that there will be no misunderstanding of this, let me give hon. members exactly what the then leader of the Conservative party, and of the official opposition, Doctor Manion said, speaking in this House of Commons on March 30, 1939; as reported in Hansard at page 2440:

> In the last war the conscription of men to go to the front caused violent racial antagonisms, much disharmony, bitterness and misunderstanding—conditions from which as yet we have not wholly recovered, and on top of that I believe I am expressing the opinion of authorities when I say that it was of no real military value so far as the empire was concerned.

He stated that as far as he could ascertain only some ten thousand men at the most got into the fighting line as a result of conscription. Then he went on to say:

> The policy that I suggest is the one which I gave three days ago in an interview: first, that there should be no conscription of Canadians to serve outside the borders of Canada; second, that we should have full cooperation with the British empire short of the conscription of men to serve outside our borders.

That was the statement Doctor Manion as leader of the official opposition, and of the Conservative party, made to parliament. But he also made similar statements on the public platforms during the campaign of 1940. Here is what Doctor Manion said at Quebec, speaking in the name of his party:

I stated on March 30, 1939, just about a year ago, in the House of Commons, that I was opposed to conscription because of its failure in the last war, and because it had stirred up misunderstanding and strife in our country, when the duty of our public men is to hold this country together, rather than to break it up. I have not waited until I came to the province of Quebec to make this statement. I made it a month ago at Brockville in the opening speech of my campaign. I have made it more than twenty times, since then, in almost every speech which I have delivered as far west as Victoria, B.C. Thus I have set forth my attitude in five provinces of Canada before coming to Quebec, and I state here again to-night that I am against conscription and that a national government such as I propose will not put in conscription.

Now there is the statement made by the leader of the Conservative party who was asking the country to support his party—not, it is true, under its old name of the Conservative party, but under the new name which it was taking for the purpose of the election —national government party—a pledge that if a national government party were returned they would not put conscription into force.

Now let me assume for a moment that a national government party had been returned. I ask my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, if he had been a member of that government, or Doctor Manion's successor in that government, whether he would have felt that he had no obligation whatever to see that that particular undertaking was lived up to? Would he have taken the position that although he had been returned to power on a specific pledge solemnly given to the people in the different provinces at a time of war, in a general election when they were being asked to return his administration rather than another, that having been returned to this parliament would he then immediately thereafter have turned around and said, "I recognize no obligation in this matter to those who elected the administration, I am going to proceed without any reference to the people at all?" I do not believe my hon. friend would have done that, and I am surprised that he criticizes me for wishing to have the people pass on this question in order that the government may be freed of all limitations upon its authority to act, except its responsibility to parliament, and through parliament to the people.

It is true that my hon. friend has said to me, "I think what you should have done was come to the House of Commons and ask the house to release you, and I am sure the house would have done so readily." But may I say to my hon. friend that my undertaking in this matter, as Prime Minister of the country, was not given to this House of Commons; it was given to the people of Canada. It was given, just as the pledge of his leader of that day was given, not to the House of Commons but to the people. It is true that a statement to the same effect was made to the house before the recent general elections, and before the war, but it was not a statement to the members of the house so much as a statement of what we and our parties and followers would do if we were faced with a situation which demanded the question being decided one way or the other. The pledge was given later direct to the people, to the electorate themselves; it was a pledge made between the leaders of two great political parties in Canada and the electorate of this country in regard to the most solemn question that could have been put before them at that particular time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I see it either we are going to destroy the faith of the people of Canada in their public men and in the responsibility of parliament to the people themselves, if we ignore these pledges, or we are going to maintain that faith by making it perfectly clear to the people that we regard such power as we have as coming from the people themselves and that we intend to be ever mindful of this, and that if we have given a solemn pledge to them we intend to carry out that pledge. If, after situations have arisen which did not exist at the time a pledge was made, we believe in their own interests we should be released from that pledge and we take the necessary steps to that end, by consulting the people first, then I say we are helping to keep the faith of the people in their public men and in their parliament.

That is why to my mind this question is fundamental. It goes to the very roots of government itself, the very source from which power is derived by a parliament. Has my hon. friend any authority other than that which comes from the people? Have I any power except that which comes from the people? Is that power changed the moment I get into parliament? Being returned by the votes of the people themselves, I have constantly to keep in mind, as I think every member of parliament must, that obligation, which is an abiding obligation with respect to membership in any House of Commons worthy of the name.

Well, now, that being the purpose of the plebiscite, let me state the present position. The position is that the government has full power with respect to everything, excepting one thing; and that one thing is that commitment, that obligation, with respect to the enlisting of men for overseas service. There the government is not free. You may ask why the government should come forward at the present time and ask to be made free. First of all may I make it clear that it is not because of any situation that exists at the moment. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has made it perfectly clear that with respect to voluntary enlistment we are obtaining men for overseas service at the present time as rapidly as we can train them. For our programme this year, and up to March, 1943, there is an honest belief on the part of the government that we will be able to get the men by voluntary enlistment for service overseas, and will not have to resort to conscription. But no one can say how long this war is going to last. No one can say what particular turn it is going to take. None of us knows what the conditions are going to be a few months hence, or several months hence, or a year or two hence. What we all know is this, that every month of this war has made it apparent to every member of this House of Commons, and I think should have made it apparent to every citizen of Canada, that a government cannot possess too much in the way of freedom to take the course that may be demanded in the national interest at a time like the present. It is because of this we want to have perfect freedom of action as an administration, to have all the right to do what is in the public interest at the time the situation may demand it, and we feel we ought to be given this freedom as quickly as possible. The reason we want it, as I have stated already, is to be free to act in the manner which will best serve the interests of the people of Canada; the manner that will make Canada's war effort the most effective. That is the sole reason, and that is all that is involved in this plebiscite. Hon. members have been talking about conscription, about no conscription and the like. That is not the issue in this plebiscite. This is the issue: Is the government of Canada, in time of war, to have freedom to take whatever action it thinks most advisable with respect to the furtherance of Canada's war effort?

That is the only question, and I am amazed that any person who has to do with the moulding of public opinion in Canada, with the making of its laws or who has to do with any political institution, could for a moment hesitate to give immediate support to a request of the kind. What argument can be urged against giving to a ministry the right to have full power in time of war to deal with any question, just as in time of peace it has full power to deal with any question that may come before it?

But there is another point I wish to bring out in connection with the special need for the plebiscite at this time, and it is this. First of all, the government is being put in an entirely wrong position before the people of this country and before the world just because we have not that full power. I ask hon. members to reflect upon that. I have said that the public has a long memory. Other countries, other nations have memories as well. To-day we are in a great partnership with a large number of nations, who are helping us as we are helping them. It is important that our position should be perfectly clear. It is being represented to the people of this country, and it is being represented to the people of Britain, the people of the United States and the people of all the allied nations, that this government is not seeking to have an all out war effort. Why? Because it is precluded, under a commitment which it has given and to which it is adhering, from resorting to conscription for men for service overseas. In other words the all out war effort is being identified with that one single thing, namely the commitment against having conscription for overseas service whether that should ever become necessary or not.

That is putting the government in an entirely false position. Let us take the position as it is to-day. Would anyone say that we have not been working as hard as we possibly could toward a full out war effort? Will anyone say that at the present time, if we had that full power, we would be resorting to conscription for overseas service? No one will say that, because it is not necessary, has not become necessary, and may never become necessary. Nevertheless as long as that commitment is there we are being represented to the people of our own and other countries as a government unwilling to go the lengths other countries are willing to go, even should necessity for so doing become clearly manifest. That is a false position and a very wrong one in which to have the government placed.

Moreover, the present position in regard to that one commitment places the parliament of Canada, as well, in a false position. Suppose the question of conscription were urgent at this time, and we wished to discuss it on the floor of the house, could we have a free discussion of conscription on its merits, with that commitment binding many hon. members at the present time? The very minute the subject were brought up, one hon. member after another, if it suited his purpose, would rise in his place in the house and say, "I cannot discuss this question, because the government is committed not even to raise it." So long as that commitment is there, no matter how the war may develop, there can be no discussion of the merits of the question of compulsory service for overseas. I say that that is putting parliament in a wrong position before the people of Canada.

I have not any fear, personally, that parliament will not take the right course with respect to any phase of the war effort, once it is debated on its merits. I have faith in the judgment of the House of Commons to do what is the wisest and the right thing, having respect to the merits of the case. But in existing circumstances I do not want to see this parliament placed longer in a position where it cannot even discuss the merits of an all-important question with regard to Canada's war effort. And so I say to those who are taking exception to the course which the government is pursuing that they are only helping to place their own parliament in a position in which no parliament should be placed in a time of war.

I would say further, that not only is it putting the government in a false position to have its hands tied at this time, in the manner indicated, and that it is putting parliament in a false position, but it is also putting Canada in a false position, before all countries of the world, including her allies in the war.

We have seen in communciations which have appeared from time to time, and we have heard in the public addresses, what has been said recently about the position of the United States vis-a-vis Canada. Notwithstanding the fact that for over two years Canada has been sending thousands of men across the seas, we have in the last month or two heard it said that Canada's war effort is not as fine as that of the United States, and why, forsooth, not that they have sent large numbers of men overseas, not that the United States have thousands of men, men who have been in the war for two years, but solely because there are alleged limitations on our war effort since we are not able to send a man overseas under compulsion, regardless of the fact that up to the present we have been and may continue to be able to get all we require under the voluntary system.

I do not believe Canada should be placed in that false position. We should not be placed in that position before the United States. We should not be placed in that false position before Great Britain and, not only before our allies, but also before the enemy. It must be remembered that, as some are only too anxious to do in this country, the enemy will construe this commitment as a limitation on the war effort of Canada.

I say on these grounds, Mr. Speaker, I feel very strongly the time has come when that limitation should be removed, and when the government should be given the utmost freedom to deal with any phase of the war effort as it thinks best subject always to its responsibility to parliament.

I have said that this is not a question of conscription. Hon. members opposite have been saying, "Why do you not have a referendum, and refer the question of conscription itself to the people?"

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who said that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You never said that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am delighted to hear it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: You never have said it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who said it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I can show my hon. friend several papers supporting his opposition—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, well—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say this, then—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then I understand that my hon. friend now says they are not in favour of a referendum.

Mr. MacNICOL: They never said anything else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What are they in favour of, then? They are in favour simply of calling parliament and enforcing conscription without reference to the people, either by plebiscite or referendum! There we have the difference between the two parties. Notwithstanding their position in the House of Commons, and the solemn undertaking given by their leader at the time of the last general election—which they did not denounce, but which they supported—they say to the people of Canada to-day, "We will not give you even a referendum. We will not give you a plebiscite; but we will take it into our own hands to do the very thing which our leader said he would not do, or we would not do if our party were returned to power."

Mr. STIRLING: On a question of privilege, may I interrupt the Prime Minister? I have stated in the house this session that the course I consider should be adopted by the government is that of submitting a resolution to the elected members of the House of Commons as to whether they should be freed from the commitments under which they placed themselves.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In other words, if I understand my hon. friend correctly he suggests that we ought to decide among ourselves, without any reference to the people at all.

Mr. STIRLING: The 245 representatives of the people, elected at an election at which this was not an issue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And that is where I entirely disagree with my hon. friend. If it was not an issue it was because the leaders of all parties took similar positions, and the position so adopted was that there would be no question of conscription. But that makes the obligation all the greater on every hon. member sitting in the house to see that, before that question is so much as discussed, he should be released from any commitment which may have been made.

In reference to whether the plebiscite is to be in reality a referendum, there is a question which is being asked now which changes the plebiscite into a referendum—and I believe my hon. friend asked this question only a day or two ago—it is, "What are you going to do if the decision is such-and-such?" He wishes me to say that I am going to do so-and-so. If I were to give him an undertaking at this time, and that undertaking is before the people when the question is put before them, is that not a referendum? That is, I commit myself to one course or to the other, and the people then are being asked to decide whether the government should take it or not. In other words I throw on the people of this country the onus of making a political and military decision, when the only body by which such decision should be taken on a question of this kind is the government which is responsible for such decision, advised by its military advisers, and taking all other relevant facts into consideration and debating its decisions on the floor of parliament, thereby making itself responsible to parliament for the decisions it makes.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That brings me to the question of evading responsibility. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) used some language the other day to which I thought I might raise objection when he spoke. I decided, however, to refer to it later on. He described as a subterfuge the course the government is taking. I believe the term "subterfuge" as applied to government policy in a matter of this kind is one which you, Mr. Speaker, might properly have ruled out of order.

He also said the government lacked courage, and stated later in his remarks that the course we were adopting was an evasive one. Let us see how far it has been evasive. What are we doing in the matter of responsible government? With respect to responsible government, at the present time we have not full powers. Our powers are limited. We cannot have fully responsible government until there are no limitations upon our powers. What we are asking the people in this plebiscite is to give us perfect freedom, to give us full responsibility. We are not asking the people to relieve us of responsibility, we are not asking the people to make a decision for us, we are asking them to give us full responsibility. We will take it and we will exercise it in the light of our responsibility to their representatives in the House of Commons. Where is the evasion of responsible government in that?

Let me go back to the course my hon. friends propose to adopt, if I understand them aright. They say, "ignore the people; we are here now, we will decide this thing in this House of Commons without reference to the people at all". Well, I say that that is irresponsible government. Because we are here with a mandate which the people have given us, which is full in all particulars but one. They say with regard to that one particular, "we will ignore it altogether, we will pay no attention to it one way or another". Talk about being courageous, I do not see anything courageous about that. Courage comes when you face the people, not when you run away from them. That runaway course is the one my hon. friends opposite have been advocating right along.

When this government decided during the course of the war that it was going to hold to the constitution of this country by appealing to the people before the end of a five-year term to elect a new House of Commons, we were told we were doing the wrong thing, that we ought to stay here, that we ought to extend our term and theirs as members at the same time. "Don't face the people, that is wrong." I think the people showed that they were not ready to give much support to those who were not prepared to trust them but who wanted to have power without recognizing the source from which political power comes. I hope I have made it clear that the government is not seeking to evade any responsibility. It wants full responsibility. When it has that responsibility, it will come here, not sheltering behind commitments, but with full authority to inform this house of the course it feels should be taken. It will stand or fall by the decision which it makes.

My hon. friend has said that the taking of this plebiscite means that it will delay matters in a time of war. What is it going to delay? Is it going to delay the production of munitions or equipment of war, or of ships? Is it going to delay the sending of airmen overseas? Is it going to delay the enlistment of men in the navy? Is it going to delay the enlistment of men in the army, either for service in Canada or overseas? I say it is not, not by one minute. More men are offering themselves for training to-day than the administration is able to train, and that will be so for some time to come. Is it delaying the production of food? Is it delaying contributions to the war loan? Some people recently said they ought to cut out contributions altogether because the government was seeking to recognize its obligations to the people. There is no delay anywhere. But there is a pause sufficiently long to allow the people to express their own views with respect to the future freedom of action that the government of this country should have the right to take.

Something has been said about the cost. I assume that it will cost something to take the plebiscite and I regret that it will be as long as it will be before the vote itself can be taken. But we are spending a good many billions of dollars at the present time and those billions of dollars are coming from the people. When this house undertakes to put through estimates amounting to something like three billion dollars in a year, I think the people of this country will be relieved to know that the government submitting those estimates wants to be perfectly sure of their confidence in everything that it does; that it is prepared to trust them by going before them for increased powers when it feels that these increased powers are necessary in the public interest. I do not think that the plebiscite should cost very much. I believe that many of those who will serve as enumerators or who will perform other duties in connection with the taking of the plebiscite will be patriotic enough to realize that in this time of war this is one method whereby they can render a war service that will be a real contribution to the country at the present time. I should be surprised if many of them do not return to the public treasury the small amounts that will be paid to them for the discharge of their important duties. I do not think the additional amount that will be required will be very great.

The taking of this plebiscite will not be using up war materials except perhaps the paper that will be necessary for the instructions, the ballots and the like. That is the only material that I can see that is going to be used. Such other incidental expenses as may be necessary will I hope be met to a considerable extent in the way I have indicated. May I say that I feel very strongly that as this expense is one which the government is asking the people to incur at this time in the people's own interest, the people themselves will be quite willing that it should be incurred.

The last day upon which we discussed this question my hon. friend said that he was going to ask his party to vote "yes" on the plebiscite, that he was going to ask the country to vote "yes." Why did he not do that during the debate on the address? Why did he not come out when we were debating the address and say that he thought that every good Conservative in this country ought to support the government's proposal for a plebiscite? There is only one reason I can think of, and that is the one that was in the minds of newspaper editors, public speakers and others who came out so violently against the suggestion made in the speech from the throne. Four by-elections were due in this country and these patriotic gentlemen were going to have an issue at all costs. They were going to make an issue of something that had created all sorts of division in this country before. They were going to do this notwithstanding that it was war time and notwithstanding the fact that this government needed the services of the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labour perhaps as they had never been needed before since the war commenced. They were prepared to create this issue, they were determined to have these by-elections carried on in the manner of elections of past years when the question of conscription was the most controversial thing which had been raised in the history of Canada.

Where it suited them in Welland, and where they thought it was going to suit them in Toronto, the ground was put forward that the people were for conscription but that the present administration was opposed to conscription. Their candidate came out for conscription first and foremost. If we are going to judge from what took place, it is pretty clear that so far as Welland and Toronto are concerned, the people were in favour of the plebiscite.

Mr. MacNICOL: There was no vote in Toronto.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: York South. The vote may not have been in Toronto, but most of the ammunition came from there. Quite the opposite campaign was waged against the government in another province in Canada. I have no complaint to make about the results. I think that so far as they signify anything with reference to the plebiscite itself, it is that so far as it has been possible for the people to speak on this matter we have had an expression favourable to our consulting them on this particular question.

During these campaigns every effort was made to becloud the war record of the government. That is one of the reasons this issue was raised. In every possible way it was sought to confuse the public mind rather than to clear it with respect to the issues themselves and with respect to the government's record in prosecuting the war. As I have said, the outcome has shown already the unwisdom of the course which was followed, by the government's opponents, the unwisdom of those tactics and the wisdom of the course which the government itself is taking at this time.

My hon. friend the other day asked me a number of questions with respect to the plebiscite. He said that he would like to know before the question was put to the people what the government was going to do in certain eventualities. Let me answer the question first of all in a broad way. The government is asking the people for a free hand in order that it may do in the circumstances as they may arise what is most in the interests of the people of Canada. We wish to make Canada's war effort as effective as it can possibly be made. What we shall do at any particular time will depend upon the course which we think at that time is necessary and advisable and most effective in Canada's war effort. That decision is not going to be made in the light of any one factor. It is going to be made in the light of all conditions as they exist and as they are known to the government at the time that it has to assume responsibility for any policy or any change of policy which it may deem advisable. Surely that is the only right position for an administration to have or to take.

My hon. friend says: Will you tell us, first of all, if the plebiscite is decided in the affirmative by a large majority, what you are doing to do? Then he asks: If it is decided by a very small majority, what are you going to do? Then next: If it is decided by say only thirty-seven per cent in favour, and the rest against, what are you going to do? Then I think his next query was: If several provinces are in favour, and one or two others are not in favour, what are you going to do? I think he had one other question: Yes, it was, if the vote is indecisive, what are you going to do?

Why did he not go on and ask several other questions? Why did he confine himself to thirty-seven per cent? Why did he not ask what we would do if only twenty-seven per cent or thirty-eight or thirty-nine per cent was in favour?

He submits to me a sort of political catechism and expects me to give an answer to every hypothetical question he can imagine. Why did he not ask: What are you going to do if the United States take such and such a course? Why did he not ask several other hypothetical questions? He asked enough to reveal his intention to embarrass the government, but I can assure him that he has not embarrassed me nor the administration in the least. The government will do in this matter as it has done, and as he himself would be doing to-day if he were in office. He would be saying this same thing to me if asked a similar question. The government will make its policy known at the time when it is essential to have it made known—and not before. All government policies should be made known at the right and proper time. This is not the right or the proper time to make any pronouncement as to what the government is going to do as a result of this vote, other than the pronouncement which I have already made, and made very clearly, that the government is going to do the thing that it believes is going to further to the uttermost Canada's war effort, all circumstances considered. May I say that when I say "all circumstances considered" I have in mind the conditions as they may exist in respect to the war in different theatres and the conditions that may exist in Canada itself.

We have heard on the floor of the house within the last few days suggestions made that we should send more men overseas to Britain. We have had other suggestions made that we should not send more men over to Britain but send men over to the Orient in larger numbers.

Mr. HOMUTH: Secret session.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who said: "secret session"? My hon. friend may be giving away some facts which I can assure him, if he thinks they are secret, he should not give away. But what I am stating now has been said here in this parliament in open session since parliament opened. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) suggested that we should send an expedition to Australia. I have understood the hon. member who has just interrupted is in favour of sending more men to Britain. We also have had suggested in this house in open session that we ought to be keeping our men here and not sending them across either the Atlantic or the Pacific. May I recall the words my hon. friend the leader of the opposition addressed to me when he was waxing eloquent over this matter? He said: With the enemy knocking at our very doors you are going to take this plebiscite. If the enemy is knocking at our very doors, I do not think there will be very much demand in this country to send men overseas. We shall in that eventuality be keeping all the men we can put at our very doors where they can do the most effective work. I believe myself that the most effective way to defeat the enemy is to defeat him away from our shores altogether so that he will never get near our shores. But I do say that if he ever comes battering on the shores of this country, public feeling in this country will be so strong that any government, no matter what its view might be, will have to think twice before it adds to the number of men that are being sent out of Canada.

I mention these things because they help to illustrate how impossible it is for the government to give a decision here and now as to what it is going to do next September or October or November or December, or in 1943 or 1944. We cannot make any decision at the present time as to what we are going to do then, and we would be foolish if we led anyone to believe that we were going to be governed other than by all the facts that exist at the time this matter is under further consideration.

There is another matter. My hon. friend says that I ought to tell the people this and that. And yet he—perhaps not he, but several of those who sit around him hope that I shall not be here very long. The one thing they wish above everything else is that I should be out of office instead of in office.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought the right hon. gentleman was going to say that we wished him dead. We have never gone that far.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend and I are too good friends for that. I say that, politically speaking, most hon. gentlemen immediately opposite would be thoroughly pleased, and their friends as well, if I were not in the position I am in at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there anything wrong about that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The only thing that is wrong about it is that they won't tell us who they are going to put in my place.

Mr. SLAGHT: Thirty-eight Barkises, and they are all willing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend the leader of the opposition ought to have a very kindly feeling towards myself on that particular question because he has seen efforts that have been made to have someone else take his place. They have not succeeded, and may I say to him sincerely that I think the country is much better off having him there to-day. I can tell him I am saying that not only on behalf of my own supporters but on behalf of a good many of his supporters as well. But I wish to make this clear. The present government, as I think my colleagues will bear me out, is not a one-man government. We are not imitating dictators; we are trying to remain the government of a democracy and to get as far away from dictatorship as we possibly can in all our actions. Any decision that is going to be made with respect to what will be done in a matter of future policy is not going to be made by any one member of the government or any two members; it is going to be made by all the members that sit in the government. Every member in the government will have his voice in the shaping of policy, and those who cannot accept the policy of the majority will find it convenient to retire, and a government will remain in office which will stand as one with respect to policy.

I could not if I wished, therefore, undertake to tell the people of Canada to-day what was going to be done some months hence by a government of which I might not be a member, or with respect to which different views might be entertained from those which I have, or which other of the present members of the administration may have. These facts are elementary. They should appeal to everyone who has to do with parliamentary procedure and government. Perhaps I can give an illustration that will help to make clear the wisdom of not indicating at the present time just what decision may be reached a little later on in certain circumstances.

In order to carry on war men are necessary, money is necessary. Both have to be raised, one in large numbers and the other in large quantities. With respect to the men that are being raised at the present time we have two methods. They are not ends in themselves but methods, and we are taking the method which we believe will be most effective and serviceable to Canada's war effort when we resort to the one or to the other. We have two methods of raising men for the army. Some of them are raised by compulsion; they are serving within the territorial limits of Canada. Others are being raised by voluntary enlistment, some of them also are serving in Canada. But all that are going overseas are being raised by the voluntary enlistment system, which has proved effective up to the present.

Now with respect to the raising of money, we are using the same two methods. We are raising money by compulsion, under taxation in its different forms; and we are raising money voluntarily by the loan system which is in progress at the present time, and which the people of the country are supporting splendidly, and, I believe, will continue to support. Supposing my hon. friend were to ask me, "What are you going to do if the voluntary system fails in the matter of the loan? Will you tell the people that now?" Could I tell them that? Would it be wise to tell them that? But a decision will have to be made if the voluntary system in the matter of loans should fail to produce the results which it is necessary should be produced in the securing of an amount of money requisite for the purpose. Under such circumstances I think probably there would be resort to the conscription of wealth. I do not see any other alternative than for the government just to come along and take the wealth that exists, if the required sums cannot be raised voluntarily.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the ideas of our friends down below—to make money by the bank?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That might not be found sufficiently effective. However, I do not wish to be diverted from what I am saying because it is wholly pertinent. I wish to make it very clear, because through the next couple of weeks or months the people will be saying, "Why did not the Prime Minister state his position as to what he would do if this plebiscite did not carry or if it did carry?" I wish to have this parallel kept in mind. What the government is going to do when the voluntary method fails in the matter of loans it will decide when the time comes; and it will do exactly the same thing as respects the matter of raising men. When we find that we cannot raise the required numbers of men for enlistment overseas by the voluntary method, and it is absolutely necessary to raise more men by other methods, then we will make our decision, present it to parliament and have it discussed on its merits. I am putting this forward now so that the public may understand quite clearly why it is impossible to give any immediate decision. And may I say this: I think the people of the country will see to it that both things are linked pretty closely together if one or the other becomes necessary.

My hon. friend says we are asking that the government be given a blank cheque. What does he mean by a blank cheque? A blank cheque for what? Not a blank cheque to ignore parliament. The blank cheque is simply the cheque the government has with respect to all matters excepting this one thing, of the choice of method for raising men for overseas service. With respect to all other matters the government to-day has full power and authority. That may be the blank cheque If that is what he means by blank cheque, I say, let us have a complete blank cheque so that we can take whatever action we wish. But when he speaks of a blank cheque, what he is trying to infer is that the government is seeking to exercise some power independent of parliament. That is not what we are asking for in this plebiscite. We are simply asking to be given freedom to make an untrammelled decision and to come to parliament with that decision. Let my hon. friends keep that in mind, that before any measure can be passed in this parliament, no matter what it relates to, conscription or anything else, it has to get the support of a majority of the House of Commons, and the ministry has to consider very carefully every aspect of the question which will bear upon the situation in presenting any measure to parliament.

As to the conduct of the campaign, my hon. friend asked a word or two about that. I should hope that the campaign would be made an educational campaign which would help to impress upon the people the necessity of giving the government full power in time of war. I think it can be made that. My hon. friend and I are to-day agreed that the government ought to have this power and we are agreed for the same reason. And the leaders of the other parties are agreed. I know that the Social Credit party feels that something ought to be added, but at least I take it that they are not unwilling to give the government the freedom that is needed to act in such a way as will best serve the interests of the country. So that we are all pretty well agreed in this parliament that the government ought to have that power. But could we do anything better to serve the national interests of this country than, as representatives of all shades of opinion in this House of Commons, to go out to the people of Canada and tell them that this is a time when the war situation is so serious that no power should be withheld from the government in the administration of public affairs? I hope that course will be taken.

My hon. friend asks me what the government's attitude on the plebiscite will be. I took care to state that at the time I was speaking on the address, and I should like to read this one word in conclusion, from page 51 of Hansard of January 26:

> In the presentation of the plebiscite to the electorate the desire of the administration to possess complete freedom of action will of course, receive the vigorous and wholehearted support of all members of the government. It will, I hope receive the support of every member of parliament, and will, I believe, receive the support of the Canadian people.

There is nothing half-hearted about our purpose in this. I do not believe it will be possible for an administration to carry on, in a time like this, with the sense it ought to have of complete authority without being given complete power. It should not be put perpetually in a false position just because of some obligation necessary at an earlier time, but which, as I explained in the debate on the address, is having an effect quite different from that originally intended in its relation to the state of affairs that exists at the present moment. I have not gone into that this afternoon, because I spoke on it at length in the debate on the address. The reasons which to-day would actuate the people in respect of the powers being given to a government when we have war all over the world, on every continent and every ocean, are surely vastly different from what they were when we were contemplating a war which was expected to be limited to the confines of Europe. I think that almost all the people realize that it is in their interest to give to the government, in time of world-wide war the utmost powers that can possibly be given, realizing of course, that these powers can only be exercised in the light of its responsibility to parliament and that the government must receive the support of the majority in parliament before any measures can be given effect to.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Would he care to say a word in regard to the grave difficulty I foresee in respect of getting the vote out?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In regard to that I have this feeling. The people themselves will realize that the government would not ask for this full power unless it was in the interest of the people themselves that it should be given to the government. This matter is one that affects their lives. The situation is different from a general election; it is not a general election to decide between one party and another, but it is a matter that affects the home of every individual, that may affect the life of every individual in the country, certainly will affect the future of every individual, and will determine to what extent every man, woman and child in this country is to be half slave and half free or wholly slave or wholly free. If the people understand that and if hon. members will present the case to their constituents, pointing out the seriousness of the war and the state of the world at the present time and how it is to the people's own interests that they give the government full power, I think the people will come out and vote.

Also there is no reason why voluntary organizations should not be furthered to the utmost. Those who feel deeply—and I think that includes most of the people in this country—should organize themselves into voluntary groups to bring the people out. Let me make this perfectly clear so that there can be no mistake about it; if the vote should be overwhelmingly in support of the question asked in the plebiscite I shall not for one moment claim that it is a vote of confidence in this particular government in the carrying on of the war, but that it is a vote by the people of this country to give to any government the right to have and to feel it has the full power and authority which a government should have under conditions such as exist at this time of war.

Let me make this very clear, because it has been said that the government will claim a large majority as a great victory for itself, we are past the time when anyone can afford to talk in terms of party politics. We have in the recent by-elections had one illustration of the folly and baneful effect of doing that sort of thing through the amount of controversy to which they gave rise. Let us seek to unite ourselves, and here is the ground on which we can be united, to tell the people the situation, a situation so serious that they must show to the country at large that they are prepared to give to the government all the possible power needed to deal with it.

One other point. A great deal has been said in different parts of the world, and in our own country, about the New Order that is to come when this war is over. I have said on two or three occasions, I feel it very deeply, that unless that new order emerges and asserts itself before the war is over we shall see very little of any new order when the war is over.

What is the old order that is to give place to something new? The old order, the order which has brought on this war, is an order which attaches no value whatever to any treaty, to any contract, to any pledge, to any obligation, to anything that is honourable, but which says that no matter how deceitful, how crooked, how wrong, whatever will get results through might and force, is the order that should be followed in the world. In other words, its supporters seek to build a totalitarian world on deceit, and betrayal, doing away with free institutions, doing away with democratic government, doing away altogether with any real relationship between the people and their governing institutions. Does anyone in this assembly believe that Hitler would ever have been permitted or able to go to war if a free parliament had been maintained in Germany? Does anyone believe that Mussolini if he had not worked into the position that he did of complete control himself over his people and above them would ever have had the freedom to bring that country into the war? The thing the people are going to demand in the new order is that all relationships, so far as it is possible to have them so, between a government and a people shall be maintained on the highest grounds on which they can be maintained. They will insist on public honour in the transaction of public business, and they will insist above everything else that the government that is carrying on the affairs of their country shall be responsive to the will of the people and see that it is administering that will and no other.

A good deal has been said about leadership and lack of leadership. The question of individual leadership is a small matter, men come and men go and they are soon forgotten. But the history of nations continues to be remembered through generations. Canada has taken a great place in this war. Canada's war effort, I believe, is something that when the war is over and we get through with political controversy the people of this country will be more proud of than any other thing in the history of this Dominion; because it has been, in Mr. Churchill's own words, a magnificent effort and all of us should seek to have it known as such. And as I have said over and over again, it is not the effort of the government, it is the effort of the people of Canada. What the government has been able to do has been done only by virtue of what the people have been prepared to allow them to do. In connection with the new order of things which is to control the future, I say that this country apart from its war effort in the aspects we have been discussing here has in some other particulars set a noble example to every nation. And they are particulars which relate to the future of democracy, and to the question of whether democracy is possible or not. We were told that it was not possible for a people to decide in their own free parliament whether they should go to war or not; that that decision had to be made for them by some government before they were assembled together. Well, this country has proved the opposite, Canada has shown the world that the representatives of the people brought together from all parts of the dominion in a free parliament are able to decide, and to decide promptly the position which they will take with regard to participation in war. That is a great gain for democracy.

Another thing which Canada has done has been to show the world that it is possible for a democracy to see that the people's voice continues to govern in its affairs even in a time of war; that those clauses in its constitution which have been framed for the purpose of preserving the rights of the people in their own affairs of government can be exercised in times of war as well as in times of peace. Some of us were told that we could not have an election in war time, that it was all wrong, would create confusion and the like. Well, the government did not view it in that way, the people of Canada did not view it in that way. We had our election in war time; and we are able to say, as Lincoln said at the time of the civil war, "The whole purpose of the people's concern in the war itself would have been lost, if the people had to be deprived of the fundamental rights which were reserved to them by their constitution." We have not usurped the constitution of this country. We have held to it; and I view with a good deal of concern this business of assemblies perpetuating their own existence for indefinite periods of time without allowing the people to have any voice in the matter, regardless of what their constitution may be. I think the people are able to look after themselves in these matters if they are given an opportunity to do so.

There are two outstanding achievements, in the nature of a national example. I put third, although perhaps most important of all, that the government of a country should have a sense of its moral obligations as well as a sense of its legal obligations. There has been very little said in the recent past about moral obligations on the part of nations, but unless I am greatly mistaken there is nothing that is going to mean as much in the future of mankind. If we are going to rule out of our public life the honour of public men and of parliament; if we are going to rule out those things which above all else we have been taught all our lives to regard as most sacred, namely the promise, the word that is better than the bond, the contract expressed or implied that has been made between a government and its people, the treaties between nations—if these things are to be ruled out of our public life then public life will become chaos indeed. But if we allow the people to see that when we do give a pledge, when we do assume power at their instance, we are continually reminded of the source from which that power comes; that we are going to honour their rights as we seek to honour our own conscience, so we shall be laying the foundation of the kind of order that will be enduring through the years to come.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Naturally, Mr. Speaker, I cannot begin to follow the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in all the arguments that he has advanced. As I listened to the termination of his speech and the plea for a new order, I could not but agree with his words. If only that plea had been made in the beginning of his address, for a new order in Canada at this time, a new order free from political partisanship and with only one thing in mind —the desire to be guided in what we do by the opportunity and the challenge that is ours —it would have been something to inspire this country at this time.

The Prime Minister says, "Trust the people." Yet, Mr. Speaker, does he trust the people when he fails to place before them the question they will be required to answer? They are not told what is going to happen after this question is answered. I thought, as the right hon. gentleman spoke, that he would have told the people of Canada, in language that would be unmistakable, of the challenge to this country at this time; of the need for action; of the necessity, if you will, that he be relieved of his responsibilities incident to this commitment, and of what he would do, and the leadership he would give, if Canada should release him from that commitment. Five or six weeks have gone by in this session; the question has been asked over and over again of the government and the Prime Minister: What are you going to do? That is what the people of Canada want to know to-day.

Mr. SLAGHT: You have been told.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The hon. gentleman says we have been told.

Mr. SLAGHT: Of course you have.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In one province we have been told that there will be nothing done; in other parts of Canada we have been told that selective service will be brought into effect. We do not know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says the people have been told these things. Will he tell us by what authoritative source that has been said? Will he cite one case of anyone with any authority to speak in the matter who has made any such statement?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, Mr. Speaker, the by-election campaigns just concluded were characterized in one province by the stand taken by the premier of that province that no action is contemplated, which was clear and unequivocal, and in other parts of Canada the stand taken was that there would be action. Yet to-day, when events are taking place the like of which this empire has never seen; with Java being attacked, with the Malay states overrun and with Singapore fallen, the Prime Minister of Canada says things are not yet serious enough to demand further action in the matter of man-power. Singapore, it is said, fell partly because of the lack of man-power. But the answer by the Prime Minister as to what action will be taken is that he cannot tell the people at this time and that it will remain his secret, a secret that time and circumstance alone may reveal.

I have in my hand a copy of the bill. Why does it not incorporate the question to be asked of the people? This bill as placed before parliament will have but one result. It will change the constitutional history of this dominion, in that it will permit the Prime Minister at any time from this day on to submit a plebiscite on any matter whatsoever to the people of Canada, with the authority of this parliament. It is so worded, Mr. Speaker, that it is operative beyond the war. It is so worded that the Prime Minister can continue to submit plebiscites at any time and without restriction. Let me ask this question. Why was not the method followed this time similar to that adopted in submitting the plebiscite of 1898? In my opinion this bill represents a milestone along the way that will destroy responsible government. The Prime Minister has said in effect that a great harm was done to the principle of responsible government in 1940 when he promised that there would never be conscription for overseas service, and now in effect wishes to undo the harm so that responsible government may be restored again.

I am not dealing to-day with the arguments that have been advanced against the taking of a plebiscite containing these words: "Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligations arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for overseas service?" I repeat, and this epitomizes my viewpoint on this subject, that the submission of this plebiscite in those words without the people of Canada knowing in advance what the government intends to do, or without even a suggestion as to what the government intends to do, is going to divide the people of this country as never before; that it is the repudiation of governmental responsibility, and just one more step along the road that leads to derision of parliament and of parliamentary institutions generally.

The Prime Minister for years—in fact during all his political life—has stood for the principle of the supremacy of parliament, and he has stressed that position since 1935. But what is the record? This legislation falls in line with his attitude toward parliament since 1935. I realize that during war time there is a necessity for orders in council incident to the carrying on of the war, but that does not excuse the issuing of orders in council in ever-increasing manner with respect to peacetime measures as well. There is no justification for that at all.

Only yesterday it was revealed that since the outbreak of war 20,677 orders in council had been issued, and that of that number 5,470 had been passed while parliament was in session. Yes, even since parliament has been in session in the last five weeks 412 orders in council have been passed. So general has this situation become that when I asked a question in the house as to how many statutes of parliament had been changed or suspended by orders in council the Prime Minister of Canada could give me no particulars. He said in effect that there were too many of them, and that it would be difficult if not impossible to give the information. The answer he made on May 19, 1941, is reported at page 2912 of Hansard, in reply to the question whether any orders in council purporting to change or suspend the operation of the provisions of any dominion statute, either in whole or in part, had been passed since the outbreak of war. He said:

I might reply orally to this question. To the first part the answer is yes.

As to the second—

A question, by the way, which asked for details—and surely the people of Canada have a right to know what statutes passed by parliament have been suspended or amended by order in council—

—I am informed by the clerk of the council that there is no separate index of orders in council which amend statutes, and that it would require a great deal of research to discover the different orders which might have that effect and also to reply to the question as to the operative effect of the respective orders so passed.

That answer means that while this parliament is supreme, the government is unable to tell what statutes have been amended or suspended by order in council.

What of the supremacy of parliament now? Almost every day, regulations with all the force of law are passed by the governor in council, by ministers of the crown, by heads of departments and by government agencies and boards, until we have reached the position where seventy-five per cent, if not more, of the laws put into effect since the war began, and which affect the lives of every citizen in Canada, have been passed not by this parliament but by this indirect method. Parliament is constantly receding in importance as the trend continues unabated.

We have before us in this bill the latest step. This measure was drafted by exceptionally able legal draftsmen, and in my opinion the omissions are not unintentional.

I am not now opposing the plebiscite to release the government from its pledge. I am not here for the purpose of adopting an attitude of obstruction and I may point out that while this parliament has been in session for more than five weeks at the most serious time in the history of the British empire, any delays which have arisen have not been caused by the official opposition. Less than one-fifth of the time in debate has been taken up by us. We placed our views before parliament, in opposition to the submission of this plebiscite, but the majority in this house have decided that a plebiscite should be submitted to the people of Canada, and we must abide by that decision. A plebiscite is to be taken regardless of the fact that in the long history of Great Britain, with all the constitutional changes which have taken place, no government has ever submitted any matter to the people by way of plebiscite. In Canada such procedure is a departure, excepting, as was mentioned by the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), in the case of the liquor plebiscite submitted to the people in 1898.

To illustrate the difference I should point out that under the measure as it now appears before parliament the Prime Minister and his government do not have to submit any questions to the people, whereas under the plebiscite of 1898 the question to be asked was in the statute. The other major difference is that the government may submit as many questions as they choose when they choose. They may place a plebiscite on any question before the people at any time in the future. There is no control whatsoever—and I intend to refer to those sections which have particular reference to that situation. The statute of 1898 allowed for only one submission. Mr. Speaker, while the empire fights, Canada plebiscites.

When the statute was passed in 1898 there was nothing evasive in the attitude of the government. The question was put in the statute. The regulations as to voting were contained in the statute. The elections act, with the necessary changes, was incorporated in that statute. The act is chapter 51 of the statutes for 1898. Section 3 is as follows:

There shall be submitted to vote of electors hereinafter declared entitled to vote thereon the following question:

Are you in favour of an act prohibiting the importation and manufacture or sale of spirits, wine, ale, beer, cider and all other alcoholic liquors for use as beverages?

It even states how the ballot paper is to be worded, and what question is to be placed on it.

What about the measure now before us? If I am correct—and I believe anyone reading the bill will conclude that I am—this bill is plebiscite legislation, and by the authority of this parliament if passed it will establish in Canada the right to govern by way of plebiscite. Unless the bill is restricted in its scope, from now on the government of Canada may continue to submit questions, without any control whatsoever.

The Prime Minister has spoken about responsible government. Is it not the principle of responsible government that the elected representatives of the people shall legislate for the safety and welfare of the state, and that the government shall continue in office so long as it has the support of the majority in parliament? When that support is lost, an election follows where no person or group can command the support of the majority.

As I listened to the Prime Minister terminate his remarks to-day I wondered whether they were not in fact a prelude to an election regardless of the outcome of the plebiscite. His speech indicated that possibility to me. Here is the bill as it has been submitted to this house, and I am going to refer to it in some detail. Section 1 reads:

This act may be cited as the Dominion Plebiscite Act, 1942.

That is general enough. Then the bill goes on to define the various persons who are entitled to vote, and it defines plebiscite as follows:

(d) "plebiscite" or "dominion plebiscite" means the taking of a vote on the question set out in a proclamation of the governor in council issued under section three of this act.

If the Prime Minister, under section 3 of the bill, had set out the question to be asked, then there would be no doubt that this bill contemplated only one plebiscite for a definite purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but may I say that I did make it quite clear to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) when he referred to the same matter that I could see no reason whatever why the question itself should not be inserted in the bill. I hope it will be by the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why not make this a special bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is all it was intended to be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Apparently the Prime Minister did not get his ideas across to the draftsman of the bill. If this bill becomes law, if it is passed in its present form, we are going to have in Canada government by plebiscite, not by responsible government.

Mr. McLARTY: The insertion of the particular question would avoid any possibility of that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But this is the bill upon which we are asked to vote. If we pass this bill we allow the government to submit a plebiscite at its will, at any time and on any matter whatsoever, and against that I protest. Let me read section 3:

3. (1) The governor in council may by proclamation order the taking of a plebiscite under the provisions of this act.

(2) The proclamation shall state fully the question to be submitted to the voters at the plebiscite in the same words and form as it will appear on the ballot papers to be used at the plebiscite.

It becomes perfectly clear that unless the members of this house, representing as we do the people of Canada, demand that the question to be asked be embodied in the bill, we are giving to the government, not a blank cheque but the right to submit any matter they choose to the people of Canada at any time. There is nowhere any limitation on so doing. Section 5 reads:

Any person who shall have voted at a plebiscite taken under the provisions of this act during the present war shall thereafter be ineligible—

"During the present war." Why the insertion of the provision that these people shall be ineligible when they have voted at a plebiscite during the present war if only one plebiscite is to be submitted? These significant words reveal the situation exactly. The statute will continue in effect beyond the termination of this war, but the only disqualification of exemption from military service of conscientious objectors would be in connection with anyone who had voted during the period of the war. This shows the danger of legislation such as this unless it is strictly limited within the ambit of the question that the Prime Minister says will be submitted to the people of Canada.

The leader of the opposition gave the government warning on Friday last of what our attitude would be in this regard and of our wish to have the question included in the bill, but it has persisted in placing this bill before parliament in this form. Therefore, we feel that we have the duty to move an amendment to ensure the inclusion of the question in clear and unmistakable language. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth):

That the bill be not now read a second time but that this house is of the opinion that the use of the powers conferred thereby be restricted to the submission thereunder of one plebiscite only.

I intend now to make a few suggestions with regard to the bill. I repeat that I think the government should have told the country what it is going to do after the vote has been taken. To-day it is Janus-faced; in one part of Canada it looks one way, in another part it looks another way. The Prime Minister says that he thinks the people will give an all-out vote. I hope they do, because there would be nothing more tragic if this plebiscite were defeated. We on this side of the house have asked the Prime Minister to tell the people of Canada just how serious he regards the situation, but without avail and the only conclusion that can be taken from the speech of the Prime Minister is that conditions are not serious, for he has stated clearly that he would not think of asking for more man-power under the selective system as conditions are at this time.

I should like to see a one hundred per cent vote on this matter. I do not believe in a compulsory system of getting out votes, but I do ask the Prime Minister and the government to shake themselves out of the lethargy they are in and tell the people of the gravity of the empire's position and of the imperative need of action. Many people are going to fail to vote because they believe that this is a vote of confidence in the government. The Prime Minister has said that he would not interpret a favourable vote as a vote of confidence. I do not care how it is interpreted. Time is running against us and he should act. "Wait and see" is apparently to be the policy of this government, even to-day as we listened to the casualties in Hong Kong.

I repeat that the people have a right to know at this time what the government intends to do. I am not one to advocate a sit-down strike as far as voting on this matter is concerned for such action would be reprehensible. The government asks us over here to be Willkies, but I ask the Prime Minister to be a Roosevelt from now on, and to refer to the war effort of this nation not as the governments' war effort but as the war effort of Canada.

Mr. SLAGHT: You did hear him say that, my friend.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That was after he had referred several times with exultation to the results of the campaign that recently took place. In the last paragraph of his address he did ask the Canadian people to regard this as a Canadian war effort. Why wait ten weeks for a vote on this matter? The ordinary routine peace-time election procedure should not apply to-day. We should shorten up that period. Where shall we be in ten weeks? Only on Thursday last we read in the press that if Java falls and Australia be attacked, the next places on the Japanese time-table to be attacked are Hawaii and Alaska in April.

Voluntary workers should be asked for over the radio. Why were not great patriotic organizations in this country asked to take over this work? But they will not do it enthusiastically, Mr. Speaker, unless they know that in getting out and working to the end that this government may be empowered to do something, the government, when it gets the power is actually going to act and without delay.

I have had complaint after complaint over the suggestion that men are going to be sent overseas for the purpose of taking the vote. In my opinion such a course is unnecessary. Send the ballots over to Canadian general headquarters in Great Britain, have them distributed to the divisions and battalions, and set out in military orders the date of the voting, have the voting take place at battalion headquarters. What does the government intend to do in regard to the counting of the soldiers' votes?

I commend the government and am glad that it has stood firm against those who would have had all the votes in Canada thrown into one common container. That would have done away with initiative in every province and every constituency of this dominion. I commend the Prime Minister for the course he has adopted of letting each province and each constituency know just how it stands on this question.

But so far as the voting overseas is concerned I do think this, that the men who to-day are serving this country know what they want, and I would not divide their votes among the constituencies. I suggest that their votes be counted without regard to constituency so that we can have the message of the men overseas in a united voice as to what they think the government should be doing at this time.

I have nothing more to say, Mr. Speaker, except again to point out the necessity of having the bill as it now stands amended at once as I have suggested, and with that in mind I have moved an amendment. To do otherwise would be for us to pass another milestone in this dominion beyond the point we have reached to-day in the decline of responsible government. Parliament is being emasculated as a result of the creation of administrative boards of all kinds and order in council government. This act unless amended may well be just another milestone towards the destruction of that which we are fighting to preserve in these days of war—our free parliamentary institutions characterized by the principle of responsible government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I submit that the amendment is out of order, and I raise the point now in order that your honour may have an opportunity to consider the matter. The amendment tends to amend the bill, which I do not think is right, and the amendment does not object to the principle of the bill.

On motion of Mr. Veniot the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Thursday, February 26, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN FORCES—SEPARATION ALLOWANCES TO WIVES OF PROFESSIONAL ENLISTED MEN, CARRYING ON PRIVATE PRACTICE

Mr. WINKLER:

1. Is separation allowance paid to wives of any enlisted men who besides their military duties carry on a private practice in their civilian profession?

2. If so, in what professions and how many in each?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. (a) There is no record of any enlisted men on active service who, besides their military duties, carry on a private practice in their civilian professions.

(b) In so far as officers are concerned, there are no records to show that any officers on active service practise a private profession in addition to their military duties. Certain medical officers who are members of the reserve army are called up from time to time for periodic employment with standing medical boards and the wives of such officers are entitled to receive dependents' allowance for the number of days in each month in which their husbands perform military duties. These officers are not members of the active forces and are, in fact, civilian practitioners. It is reasonable, therefore, to expect that they would continue to maintain their private practices during those hours when not actually employed on military duties.

2. See answer to question No. 1.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION—RECOMMENDATIONS OF LEAGUE OF NATIONS ECONOMIC SECTION

Mr. MARSHALL:

1. Has the economic committee of the cabinet set up for the purpose of formulating plans for the post-war reconstruction period invited suggestions from the economic section of the League of Nations?

2. If so, what is the nature of such recommendations received thus far from this body?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre):

1. The committee on reconstruction, through its chairman, Dr. F. Cyril James, has had contact with Mr. Loveday, economic section of the League of Nations.

2. No recommendations have been received as yet.

GASPÉ PETROLEUM PRODUCTS*

Mr. ROY:

1. Has the government taken any steps or made representations, since 1940, to any private company or public body to engage in prospecting the petroleum deposits of Gaspe?

2. If so, with what results?

Mr. HOWE: The answer is no.

YOUTH TRAINING PROGRAMME

Mr. SHAW:

1. How many vocational schools and special training centres have been organized to date in each of the nine provinces under the war emergency programme (youth training programme)?

2. How many applications for training were received from each of the nine provinces between July 1, 1941, and January 31, 1942?

3. How many such applicants were accepted for training?

4. How many applicants were rejected, (a) by reason of failure to meet physical requirements, (b) by reason of lack of training facilities?

5. How many trainees, in each of the nine provinces, completed their training during the period July 1, 1941, and January 31, 1942?

6. Out of those graduating, how many, by provinces, (a) secured work in war industres; (b) enlisted in the army, navy, air force; (c) were drafted for home defence under the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act; (d) secured employment in peacetime industry; (e) are at present unemployed?

7. Have any advanced training schools been established in Canada to give advanced or specialized traning to graduates under the war emergency programme? If so, how many, and where?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Training under the war emergency training programme was carried on during January, 1942, at the following number of centres: Nova Scotia, 5; New Brunswick, 10; Quebec, 22; Ontario, 33; Manitoba, 6; Saskatchewan, 8; Alberta, 11; British Columbia, 17—Total, 112.

2. The selection of trainees is made locally and information as to the number of applications received is not a matter of record with the Department of Labour at Ottawa.

3. During the period July 1, 1941, to January 31, 1942, the following numbers of trainees were admitted to war emergency training classes in the various provinces. These figures do not include the numbers which were in training on July 1, 1941.

6. (c) All enlistments reported by the provinces are shown in 6 (b). Men within the compulsory military training age group are not admitted to the industrial classes unless they have been rejected by the military authorities or are otherwise ineligible for compulsory military service.

6. (d) The industrial training given under the war emergency training programme is only for industries engaged on war production work except in the case of rehabilitation training of discharged soldiers. The latter training has only recently been commenced and no reports as to placements have as yet been received.

6. (e) The following number of trainees were reported as having completed their training between July 1, 1941 and January 31, 1942, there being no record of their having been placed in employment. A follow-up of trainees reported as unplaced is carried on by placement officers and it is known that the majority of them have either secured employment or will be placed after a short interval.

3. How many men called for 30 days' training enlisted in the active force?

4. What further training have the men called for 30 days' training received to date?

5. How many men were called for four months' training or for service for the duration of the war?

6. How many men called for four months' training or for the duration enlisted in the active force?

7. What is the strength of the reserve force units that train at local headquarters, and what is the date of the return of strength of these reserve force units?

8. Are the men who received 30 days' training and then attached on paper to reserve force units included in this total?

9. How many days will reserve force units train in 1942?

DEPENDENTS' ALLOWANCE ACT—RED DEER CONSTITUENCY

Mr. SHAW:

1. How many district representatives, temporary employees or others have been engaged by the Department of National Defence or any other department of government, since September 1, 1939, in connection with the administration of the Dependents' Allowance Act as far as it has been made to apply to the Red Deer federal constituency?

2. What are the names and addresses of all such persons?

3. When was each appointed?

4. What rate of salary and/or allowances are paid to each?

5. What amounts have been paid to each such person to date?

DOMINION LOANS

QUESTION AS TO FINANCING THROUGH U.S. RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is it true that the Canadian government is contemplating the negotiation of a loan of something in the neighbourhood of five hundred million dollars from some such agency as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the United States? If so, would the minister care to give the house some information about the proposed terms of the loan, and would he also give the house the reasons for incurring such a debt at the present time?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I never heard of such a proposal.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENTS—ACREAGE BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Last night I received a letter franked by the Clerk of the House. Inclosed in it was a letter addressed to "Members of Parliament." This letter had been opened, and apparently it was decided to send it to me by reason of the fact that the writer lives in my constituency. I wish to ask a question based upon this letter, and as it is very short I will read it and then address my question to the Minister of Agriculture. The letter reads:

Members of Parliament,
Ottawa.

Dear Sirs—

Why isn't the wheat insurance money paid? There are some people who have received cheques but there are many who have not, and what do you think we are living on in the meantime? It should be paid. You don't seem to realize what trouble and havoc is being caused, but I could tell you. I wish we of the western prairies could tell you face to face.

Yours truly,

Mrs. Donald Sutherland

In view of the fact that many western members have received similar letters, what is holding up the payment under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act? Secondly, will it be possible after March 1 to include the second payment with the first where the first payment has not already been made?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I am not in a position to state with regard to any individual case what is holding it up, without making inquiry at the Edmonton office so far as Alberta is concerned and the Regina office so far as Saskatchewan is concerned. But I would say that a very considerable part of the payment has been made, and there is some reason for delay wherever there has been delay. Some $7,500,000 of the amount payable in Saskatchewan had passed through the prairie farm assistance office in Regina on January 8, when I was there, and a considerable part of those payments had gone out before that time.

Mr. QUELCH: How much has been paid in Alberta?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to say offhand, but a return was brought down the other day in answer to a question, which indicates fairly closely what the amount would be. As far as the last part of the question is concerned, I was informed more than a week ago that all payments now being made are for the full amounts. That has been done for the past week or so; and all payments now going out are not for the sixty per cent that was earned up to December but for the whole one hundred per cent.

Mr. QUELCH: Do the payments include the bonus of 75 cents an acre?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, wherever there was prairie farm assistance paid; but where there is no prairie farm assistance that goes out separately.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA WOODWORKERS—COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour based upon some information received from the International Woodworkers of America, British Columbia section. My information is to the effect that since last September they have been endeavouring to get certain of the logging companies, engaged largely, I believe, in producing aeroplane spruce, to enter into a collective bargaining agreement. Last January they called in the western representative of the Department of Labour, Mr. Harrison. Did Mr. Harrison make a report to the department on this dispute, and is the department still endeavouring to bring about a collective bargaining agreement in this industry?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I believe my hon. friend is referring to Mr. Pritchett's organization.

Mr. MacINNIS: They did not tell me who owned it, but it is the International Woodworkers of America, British Columbia section.

Mr. MITCHELL: A report has been received from Mr. Harrison in connection with the dispute. The question of wages has been referred to the regional war labour board in British Columbia. It will be necessary for the question of union recognition to be referred to a board under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. The hon. member may rest assured that the federal Department of Labour will give all possible cooperation in the amicable settlement of the dispute.

BRUCE COAL COMPANY

INVESTIGATION BY ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—A. E. BRADFIELD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): As a private Liberal member of this honourable house may I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply if there have been any new developments with regard to the matter of the Bruce Coal Company, which sold the same coal three times, not on government contracts but on contracts that were not signed. My second question is whether the secretary of that company is at present in the employ of the government, in the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, the matter of the Bruce Coal Company was referred by my department to the Department of Justice, and I understand that appropriate action is being taken or has been taken. With regard to the employment of the secretary of the company in my department, I have no knowledge; but if the hon. member will give me his name I will make inquiries.

Mr. POULIOT: His name is A. E. Bradfield.

PLEBISCITE ACT

PROVISION FOR TAKING OF VOTE ON ANY QUESTION SUBMITTED BY WAY OF PLEBISCITE

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. McLarty for the second reading of Bill No. 10, respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes of such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Last evening an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) to which exception was taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Does any hon. member wish to speak to the point of order raised?

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Last evening, just before six o'clock, and after the hon. member for Lake Centre had moved his amendment, the Prime Minister raised a point of order, submitting that the amendment was out of order. He further added, at page 839 of Hansard:

> . . . I raise the point now in order that your honour may have an opportunity to consider the matter.

Then he briefly stated the point of order:

> The amendment tends to amend the bill, which I do not think is right, and the amendment does not object to the principle of the bill.

In that connection, as I recall it, the right hon. gentleman cited one of the rules of this house, though that is not incorporated in the objection which he made. If I apprehend his position aright, however, it was standing order 75 to which he alluded. Is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Standing order 75 appears at page 216, of Beauchesne and reads:

> Every public bill shall be read twice in the house before committal or amendment.

I have a legal argument to make; it may take me some little time, and I crave the indulgence of the house while I do so. I should like to say that I have not had the opportunity to prepare a thorough brief on the matter, but what I have I should like to give to the house without interruption, if I may.

I have just read standing order 75, and I ask hon. members to note the date: 1867. Now I propose to read the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre, appearing at page 838 of Hansard

> That the bill be not now read a second time but that this house is of the opinion that the use of the powers conferred thereby be restricted to the submission thereunder of one plebiscite only.

Even at first blush, on reading standing order 75, I submit there is nothing in this amendment which is contrary to the provisions of that order, unless something is read into it. But we have been able to find at least four cases since 1867 where what is now proposed has been done in parliament. I want to cite a number of authorities. The first to which I direct Your Honour's attention is a ruling given by the Speaker of the British House of Commons on the Anglo-German agreement bill, in which it was laid down in Hansard debates, 1890, third series, 347, at page 743:

> It is competent for any hon. member to move a resolution superseding the motion for the second reading, but it is not competent to add words to the motion "that the bill be now read a second time."

That is a statement of principle, and that is what is sought to be done here. The amendment offered by the hon. member for Lake Centre does not propose to add to the motion that the bill be now read a second time. It proposes to supersede that motion entirely. I therefore submit that under the rule which I have quoted it is competent for him to move such a motion.

The amendment in question proposes that the bill be not now read a second time, and then proceeds to assert a principle. The important word in the first part of the amendment is the word "now", where it is stated that it be not now read a second time. That does not mean "never". The amendment does not mean that the bill will never be read a second time. If the proposed amendment is passed in the affirmative the Secretary of State would be entirely within his rights to move again without notice the main motion, that the bill be now read a second time. That is clear from the statement appearing in May, thirteenth edition, page 392, as follows:

> It must be borne in mind, however, that the resolution, if agreed to—

And in this instance I would use the word "amendment",— > —does not arrest the progress of the bill, the second reading of which may be moved on another occasion. The effect of such an amendment is merely to supersede the question for now reading the bill a second time; and the bill is left in the same position as if the question for now reading the bill a second time had been simply negatived or superseded by the previous question.

The result is that if the amendment is carried in the affirmative the bill may, at a later stage, be read the second time; but in the meantime the house will have asserted an important principle in connection with the operation of the bill, namely,— —that this house is of the opinion that the use of the powers conferred thereby be restricted to the submission thereunder of one plebiscite only.

These are the words of the amendment. I could quote to Your Honour a large number of precedents, both in the British House of Commons and in this house, showing that it is possible for an amendment to be made on the second reading of a bill, provided that such amendment does not seek to add words to the motion that the bill be now read a second time, but on the contrary proposes to supersede it.

At pages 390 and 391 of May, thirteenth edition, this is made quite clear.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but I had asked not to be interrupted. However, go ahead.

Mr. SLAGHT: Do I understand the hon. member to suggest that this proposed amendment is not an amendment to dispense with the second reading of the bill, but merely to delay this house in dealing with it until a future occasion?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The question is not germane to the point at issue, and I do not propose to answer it. I am dealing with a very technical question of parliamentary law and practice, and notwithstanding the erudition of which I know the hon. member is possessed, I would ask him to possess his soul in patience. I do not mean anything offensive in that, but I must point out that in my opinion the interruption was not pertinent.

When the hon. member spoke I was proceeding to refer Your Honour to pages 390 and 391 of May, thirteenth edition; and with your permission I shall read this citation, one which I believe makes my submission quite clear;

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move, as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from the principles, policy or provisions of the bill; or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence, or, in the Lords, the opinions of the judges.

On page 391 it is stated that an amendment must not "attach conditions to the second reading of the bill". This merely means that an amendment must not seek to add words to the motion "that the bill now be read a second time", but that if it supersedes the motion entirely and asserts a principle, it is entirely in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. May I point out to the house that I have to listen to the hon. member, because I have to reply to him. But because of the noise I cannot hear him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am obliged to Your Honour, although I am not sure that I like the way you have put it—that you have to listen to me. I suggest it may be a pleasure to listen to me.

I have in my hand a number of precedents where such amendments have been moved both in the British House of Commons and in the Canadian House of Commons. Then, in addition to those I have before me, reference may be made to an amendment moved to the second reading of a bill respecting the northwest territories. I refer Your Honour to the Journals of the House of Commons for 1890, pages 86 and 102. I shall submit those references without reading the full subject matter. However those are complete cases, similar to this one. And, mind you, they arose after the passage of standing order 75.

The second case is an amendment to the second reading of a bill to readjust the representation in the House of Commons, and that reference is found in the Journals of the House of Commons for 1882, pages 410 and 412. These references are entirely applicable here. I refer them to Your Honour without reading them.

Mr. SPEAKER: I should be obliged if the hon. member would read them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Very well. The citation from the Journals of 1882 is as follows:

The question being again proposed that the bill be now read a second time—

That was the main motion before the house—

—Mr. Mills moved, in amendment, seconded by Mr. Rymal, that all the words after "that" to the end of the question be left out, and the words, "in readjusting the representation of the people in parliament, there should be no needless interference with existing arrangements, and the principle of justice and fair play toward both political parties should be observed; that the bill contains numerous needless changes, and is framed with a view to concentrate large bodies of the Liberal voters in a few electoral districts, and to add Conservative voters to, or remove Liberal voters from, many electoral districts, and thus to weaken the effective strength of the Liberal party, and to pack the constituencies of Ontario in favour of the Conservatives" inserted instead thereof.

That amendment, I must say, has a familiar ring to it. That question was in order, was put, and was defeated.

Then, if Your Honour will refer to the Journals of the British House of Commons, volume 146, for the years 1890 and 1891, you will find this, at page 303:

The order of the day being read for the second reading of the Newfoundland Fisheries bill;

And a motion being made, and the question being proposed, that the bill be now read a second time: And a debate arising thereupon;

An amendment was proposed to be made to the question by leaving out from the word "that", to the end of the question, in order to add the words "this house, having been informed that a satisfactory act has now passed the legislature of Newfoundland, and declaring its readiness to support the government in taking all measures necessary for carrying out the treaty obligations of this country, and the arrangements for arbitration made with the government of France in this matter, does not now proceed to the second reading of the bill," instead thereof. And the question being put, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question:—It passed in the negative.

And the question being put, that the words "this house, having been informed that a satisfactory act has now passed the legislature of Newfoundland, and declaring its readiness to support the government in taking all measures necessary for carrying out the treaty obligations of this country, and the arrangements for arbitration made with the government of France in this matter, does not now proceed to the second reading of the bill" be added to the word "That" in the original question: It was resolved in the affirmative.

And the main question, so amended, being put;

Resolved, that this house, having been informed that a satisfactory act has now passed the legislature of Newfoundland, and declaring its readiness to support the government in taking all measures necessary for carrying out the treaty obligations of this country, and the arrangements for arbitration made with the government of France in this matter, does not now proceed to the second reading of the bill.

That, surely, is some authority. Then I quote from the Journals of the British House of Commons of 1859:

The order of the day being read, for the second reading of the Representation of the People Bill;

And a motion being made, and the question being proposed, that the bill be now read a second time;

An amendment was proposed to be made to the question, by leaving out from the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "this house is of opinion, that it is neither just nor politic to interfere, in the manner proposed in this bill, with the freehold franchise as hitherto exercised in the counties in England and Wales; and that no readjustment of the franchise will satisfy this house or the country, which does not provide for a greater extension of the suffrage in cities and boroughs than is contemplated in the present measure," instead thereof.

I would refer Your Honour to two specific precedents in Canada. I refer first to the Journals of the House of Commons, volume 19, 1885, pages 308 and 309, April 16 and 17, 1885:

The order of the day being read for the second reading of the bill respecting the electoral franchise:

And the question being proposed, that the bill be now read a second time;

Sir Richard J. Cartwright moved in amendment, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie, that all the words after "That", to the end of the question, be left out, and the words "in the opinion of this house, it is not possible at this late stage of the session, and having regard to the present condition of the public business, to discuss the said bill satisfactorily," inserted instead thereof;

And a debate arising thereupon;

And the house having continued to sit till after twelve of the clock on Friday morning;

And the question being put on the amendment; the house divided: and the names being called for they were taken down, as follows.

So it passed in the negative.

It was quite in order to do that, and in principle this is the same as that.

I refer Your Honour to the Journals of this house, volume 19, 1885, pages 93 and 94, February 19, 1885:

The order of the day being read, for the second reading of the bill to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court;

Mr. Landry (Montmagny) moved, seconded by Mr. McMillan (Vaudreuil), and the question being proposed, that the bill be now read a second time;

Mr. Ouimet moved in amendment, seconded by Mr. Dupont, that all the words after "That" to the end of the question, be left out, and the words, "there are in our judicial system too great a number of tribunals having an appeal jurisdiction; that an humble address be presented to His Excellency, the Governor General in Council, praying him to communicate with the several provincial governments, with the object of arranging a judicial system which will diminish the number of appeal jurisdctions, whilst guaranteeing an efficient administration of justice equally satisfactory to all the provinces", inserted instead thereof.

And the question being put on the amendment; the house divided:—and it passed in the negative.

There are at least four Canadian precedents for the course which we are seeking to pursue under the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre. I suggest that the amendment does not come within the ambit of the principle enunicated by the Prime Minister, and therefore it is in order. I do not wish to labour the point. In my mind at least, and I hope in the minds of legal gentlemen of the house, the point is clear. I could hardly expect that laymen would be quite so appreciative of the technicalities of the situation.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not one of that enlightened company, the members of the legal profession, to which my hon. friend has alluded, and to which he belongs, but I am a humble member of this house and like him I have perused the Journals of the House of Commons. I notice that my hon. friend has given us several citations from the Journals which run back a good many years, some of them fifty or more. Perhaps as a member of the legal profession as well as a member of this house he will be inclined to place more importance upon the more recent rulings given by former Speakers. Therefore, I would direct Your Honour's attention to rulings which have been made by the Speaker of the House of Commons in regard to similar motions and which support entirely the point of order which I raised at the time the hon. member introduced his amendment.

I would refer the house and Your Honour to the Journals of the House of Commons of Thursday, March 8, 1934, at page 156 as follows:

The order being read for the second reading of Bill No. 19, an act to incorporate the Bank of Canada;

Mr. Rhodes moved,—That the said bill be now read the second time.

And a debate arising thereon;

Mr. Coote, seconded by Mr. Irvine, moved in amendment thereto: That all the words after "That" in the main motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"in the opinion of this house the government should give further consideration to the matter of providing that the stock of the proposed central bank should be owned by the government, and that the governor and directors of said bank should be appointed by the governor in council."

And a debate arising thereon;

Mr. Rhodes raised a point of order that the proposed amendment of the honourable member was out of order for the reason that it anticipated amendments embodying the principle which may be submitted in committee on the bill.

After debate thereon;

Mr. Speaker declared the said proposed amendment out of order for the reason that it deals with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved in that it provides that stock in the bank should be owned by the government, whereas the bill by section 16 provides that the stock shall be allotted to the public with certain restrictions in regard to chartered banks and foreigners. The amendment proposes that the governor and directors should be appointed by the governor in council, whereas the bill by sections 8 and 9 provides that the directors be appointed by the shareholders. This is an amendment which may be moved in committee and not such an amendment as can be moved on a motion to read the bill a second time. Further, the amendment attaches conditions to the second reading of the bill in that it calls for further consideration of the matter set forth in the amendment before the bill is given second reading.

The debate on the second reading of said bill was then resumed.

That is precisely the position we are in at the moment with respect to the amendment of the hon. member for Lake Centre. I have taken exception to it on the score that while it is an amendment which may be moved in committee, it is not such an amendment as may be moved on a motion to read the bill a second time. Further, the amendment attaches conditions to the second reading of the bill in that it calls for further consideration of the matter set forth in the amendment before the bill is given second reading. That is one ruling of a former Speaker of this house.

There is another ruling which perhaps I have even stronger reasons for recalling in that apparently while in opposition I had managed to get into the same box as my hon. friend and had moved an amendment which related to clauses in a bill which should instead have been considered when the bill was in committee. I had not taken exception to the principle of the bill and His Honour the Speaker ruled my amendment out of order in the following terms—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When was that?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was on April 24, 1934. The record will be found at page 271 of the Journals of the House, and if it is necessary to emphasize the authority, particularly to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, I would say that the ruling on that occasion was given by his friend and my friend the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Black) when he was occupying the chair of the speakership of this house. I quote from page 271:

The order being read for resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Weir (Melfort), for the second reading of Bill No. 51, An Act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of national products in Canada and in export trade, and to make further provision in connection therewith, and the proposed motion of Mr. Mackenzie King in amendment thereto;

And a point of order having been raised;

Then comes the quotation of Mr. Speaker's ruling:

Mr. Speaker: "It having been moved that Bill 51, An Act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products in Canada and in export trade and to make further provision in connection therewith, be now read a second time, the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King moved in amendment: 'That all the words after the first word "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

this house, while prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products, is unalterably opposed to the enactment of any compulsory measure which delegates to unnamed and undetermined individuals, groups or organizations, sweeping powers over the production and trade and commerce of the nation, and which confers upon a minister of the crown, and upon the governor in council unprecedented authority and unusual powers to restrict production, and interprovincial, inter-imperial and foreign trade as regards both exports and imports, as well as other autocratic powers.'

"Hon. Mr. Stevens raised the point of order as to whether the said amendment is in order inasmuch as it constitutes what might be termed a declaration of policy instead of offering reasons why consideration of the bill should not be proceeded with or should be postponed or proposing something else germane to the actual motion before the house.

"The Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King in moving the amendment quoted paragraph 755 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, which paragraph is published as a quotation from May, 13th Edition at page 390, which is repeated by Bourinot at page 509:

"'It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.'

"This rule is subject to certain limitations.

His Honour the Speaker continues:

If the right hon. member had continued to quote from May, he would have found the following reference to an amendment to a motion for second reading of a bill—'Nor may such an amendment deal with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee.'

That is from May, thirteenth edition, page 91, and the precedent as cited in May in support of this from 188 Parliamentary Debates, 4th series, column 76, "The Education (Scotland) Bill" reads:

"'Mr. Speaker: I have to rule that the amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Glasgow and Aberdeen universities —to the effect that the house while welcoming educational legislation for Scotland regrets that the present measure does not propose change in the educational areas, which is urgently required in the interests of efficient administration—is not technically in order, because it does not challenge the principle of the bill. The question raised can be decided by an amendment to the bill itself. If the hon. member wants to object to the second reading, he should move that the bill be read this day six months.'

Then His Honour the Speaker continued with his ruling:

"The amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition does not challenge the principle of Bill 51, and it anticipates the committee stage. It declares that the 'house is prepared to support legislation for assisting the orderly marketing of natural products' and the bill is intituled: 'An Act to improve the methods and practices of marketing of natural products.' There is so much similarity between those two propositions that one cannot be moved as a reason to reject the second reading of a bill enunciating the other. The bill deals with powers and methods which may be altered in committee.

"The objection to the enactment of any compulsory measure which delegates to unnamed and undetermined individuals, groups or organizations, sweeping powers over the production and trade and commerce of the nation can be decided by amendments when the committee of the whole is considering section 3 of the bill which establishes the Dominion marketing board and section 4 which defines the powers of the board. The action to be taken by the governor in council and the minister in administering the act is described in almost every section of the bill and may be strengthened or weakened by amendment when the bill is in committee.

"The objections raised in the proposed amendment cannot be looked upon as reasons why bill 51 should not now be proceeded with and, moreover, they may be considered after the bill has been read a second time.

"For these reasons, I find the proposed amendment to be out of order."

I think, Mr. Speaker, you will agree and that hon. members will also agree that the parallel is perfect with respect to the relevancy of the amendment which I had sought to introduce in 1934, and which was ruled out of order, and the amendment which the hon. member for Lake Centre has introduced, and which I believe will also be ruled out of order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was going to ask if the right hon. gentleman agreed with the ruling at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was not a matter of choice; it was a case of having to, and having to, I have remembered it from that day to this. I wish to draw attention in particular to these words in the Speaker's ruling:

The amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition does not challenge the principle of Bill 51, and it anticipates the committee stage.

Those were the two points I raised in speaking last night just before the house adjourned as the ones which I felt Your Honour would wish to consider in deciding whether the present amendment was in order or not.

May I say to my hon. friend the mover of the amendment, so that if His Honour the Speaker should rule against him he will not feel too much overcome, that the purpose which he has in mind will be admirably served by the course which I have already suggested to the leader of the opposition and which I am prepared to state now on behalf of the government, namely, that while the bill as it stands is in the nature of a general plebiscite bill, it may be an instruction to the committee to which the bill is to be referred to insert a clause which will confine the bill to the one single question which I formulated and stated in speaking on the address, and which will be the question to be submitted to the electorate at such time as it may be presented to the people.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has been very frank on that point and much more explicit I think than he has been at any other time. May I be permitted to suggest to him, having regard to the declaration he has just made and the declarations he made on the twenty-sixth of January, and again yesterday, as well as the implications in the speech from the throne and in the speech of the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), that the predication of my remarks on the occasions on which I have spoken on this question was that we should have an enabling bill confined to this one question and that we would not be importing into our constitutional practice a brand new theory for the future. Would the Prime Minister not think it the wiser course, in order to facilitate its passage, to withdraw this bill, redraft it along the lines of the bill of 1898, and reintroduce it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the wisest course to adopt is the one which will get us through the business in the quickest possible time. In order to expedite the passage of the measure and avoid unnecessary discussion in the house the government has agreed in advance that when the bill passes its second reading it will be referred at once to a special committee, which will have power to deal with this matter of changes in any of the provisions that may be desirable and which will, I am perfectly sure, incorporate the specific change which my hon. friend wishes to have incorporated.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the present debate on the second reading of Bill No. 10, "An Act respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes at such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada," Mr. Diefenbaker moved an amendment:

> That the bill be not read a second time but that this house is of the opinion that the use of the powers conferred thereby be restricted to the submission thereunder of one plebiscite only.

I have listened very carefully to the cases which were cited by the leader of the opposition, but I did not find in any of them, that they related to amendments—I include those instances which were discussed in the British House of Commons and also in our own—which were not dealing with the principle of a bill. I have had occasion to see and to read the cases which were cited by the Prime Minister, and I think they are on all fours and entirely apposite to the position we are in to-day.

In Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, standing order 75, page 217, citation number 753, it is stated:

> The second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure.

It is very necessary to state that it is the principle of the measure which is being discussed on the second reading. That is so clear and so distinct that there can be no misunderstanding of the intention of that citation. Further, citation 755 of standing order 75 states:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

And there is a reference to May, thirteenth edition, page 357, and Bourinot, fourth edition, page 509.

A motion opposing the second reading of a bill must not anticipate amendments which may be moved in committee, and alterations which may be effected by amending the clauses of the bill cannot be moved in the second reading, as decided by the Speaker in the two cases quoted by the Prime Minister. I may point out that in the latter case, that of the 24th April, 1934, a division took place on an appeal from the Speaker's decision, and this house sustained the Speaker in ruling the amendment out of order.

The amendment now moved does not challenge the principle of the bill; in fact it agrees with the principle of the bill for the taking of a plebiscite; and I would again read the terms of the amendment:

That the bill be not now read a second time but that this house is of the opinion that the use of the powers conferred thereby be restricted to the submission thereunder of one plebiscite only.

Therefore in the amendment there is an agreement with the principle of the bill, namely, the taking of a plebiscite, but it states that the powers therein conferred should be restricted to the submission thereunder of one plebiscite only. The amendment also anticipates the committee stage of the bill; and the hon. member would serve his purpose by moving amendments to those clauses in committee on the bill.

For these reasons I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. C. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): As the first member on this side of the house to take part in to-day's debate, I wish to extend congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon his statesmanlike and masterful address of yesterday, wherein he expressed without equivocation his views and those of his associates in the cabinet on the subject under debate at the present time. He clarified many points, and expressed his continued desire to maintain throughout the nation peace and harmony—a condition which is just as important to-day as the manufacturing of tanks and guns. What a difference there would be in the situation of Canada if we had had as head of the government a man whose character was synonymous with intolerance, narrowness of views, rapier-like thrusts, and vituperation. I feel certain that long ago this country would have been subjected to a great number of disturbances, perhaps to the point of riot and revolution, if certain ideas which are advocated to-day had been carried out sooner. With all the fervour in my heart I say, let Canada thank the Almighty for having at its head today a man of the steadfastness, the equanimity and the balance of the present Prime Minister of Canada.

Before approaching the subjects with which I desire to deal, I should like to take a minute or two to consider certain statements made yesterday by the brilliant young member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), in which he upbraided the cabinet for what he termed its abuse of government by order in council. I wish to refer to historical facts of the last war as contained in a book which I have already mentioned, "The Crisis of Quebec, 1914-18," by E. H. Armstrong, page 54, in which it is stated:

The Canadian War Book, analogous to the British one, provided not only for the eventual raising of troops, but also for the issuance of orders in council and proclamations dealing with such wartime measures as the censorship of cables and the prohibition of certain exports.

On page 65:

What came to be known in 1918 as 'order in council government, comprising such unpopular measures as the wholesale cancellation of draft exemptions by a mere decree of the governor general in council, was legalized by the wide powers granted under the War Measures Act of 1914. At that time it met with scarcely any opposition.

On page 232, referring to the same subject:

. . . as time went on and dissatisfaction with the Military service Act, the cancellation of exemptions, and the so-called "order in council government" pervaded the dominion and led to riots elsewhere, the Quebec riots took on much less of a distinctively French-Canadian character and were seen to be parts of a nation-wide movement of resistance to conscription.

And on page 236 the author, referring to this same subject of orders in council, says:

There were many members, English as well as French-Canadians, who protested against the government's use of the order in council to enforce its wishes, especially in the administration of military service. There was considerable feeling that legislation by order in council constituted an abuse of the executive power, being no more nor less than government by ordinance issued by the federal cabinet.

The Prime Minister, when he rose to uphold the government's mode of action in the Quebec riots, immediately defended the use of the order in council. He stated that the right to use this form of legislation had been granted very extensively by the War Measures Act of 1914, that in the war emergencies it was often necessary to act quickly, and that the delay of an appeal to parliament might on occasion be disastrous.

So much for that. I now come to the theme of my discourse.

Since the beginning of this session, I have received, as no doubt many other hon. members have, letters requesting information concerning the definite object of the plebiscite. Some view the measure as containing the germ of conscription; others expect conscription to follow immediately on the conclusion of the plebiscite. So far as I can see, the official opposition seem to entertain the wishful hope that this will take place, in order to bring about what they conceive as the ideal measure of an all-out war effort. Others —and to this group I belong—see in the plebiscite an indication of the desire of the government, in case the nation is confronted with a supreme danger, to be free by the will of the people to take whatever measures it deems necessary in order to protect the nation and the allied cause, even if we must have recourse to a certain measure of conscription for overseas.

What I cannot conceive is that this government, even if we arrive at the point where the nation is confronted with supreme danger, would endeavour to enforce conscription, any measure of conscription, in the odious way in which it was carried out in 1917, for instance, when troops from Ontario were sent into the province of Quebec to track down evaders; and the same condition of affairs occurred in New Brunswick. I have already expressed myself as willing to accept a certain measure of compulsion for service overseas, provided that I can be shown the absolute failure of voluntary enlistment. But I wish to remind the house and the government that it is a very dangerous policy to ask a nation or a people to make the supreme sacrifice until this nation or people is convinced of the need for such supreme sacrifice. In my estimation the hour has not yet arrived when such a necessity exists. We have before us the gigantic task of educating our people as to the seriousness of the situation. You, sir, and I, see the danger; but the great majority of the people do not entertain the same view. For reasons which already have been submitted to this house I repeat that this country is far from being ripe for the acceptance of any form of compulsion for overseas service. In this opinion may I say that I have the concurrence of a newspaper which is not in great favour with the opposition party, but which nevertheless expresses practically the same view; I refer to the Winnipeg Free Press. In a recent editorial it stated:

> The Free Press is published a long way from the province of Quebec, but it knew that the state of opinion in that province was such that any attempt to impose conscription for overseas service by arbitrary, high-handed courses would result in an explosion that would destroy for the duration of the war, and for long after, national unity in Canada. It therefore opposed this policy of coercion and urged more politic and moderate measures. That the Free Press was right in its estimate of the state of public opinion in Quebec can no longer be denied.

May I continue a quotation from this same editorial indicating the trend in favour of imposing conscription on Canada, in spite of the fact that the country is not ripe for such a measure. The editorial continues:

> Their hope—
> The hope of the Toronto junta which decided some four months ago that they would take charge of the affairs of Canada—
> —was that by exploiting demands for national government and for conscription, they could disrupt the dominion government; drive Mr. King from the premiership; make it impossible for the French ministers to remain in office; make possible the coming into office of a government which would be exclusively English-speaking with a parliamentary support similarly exclusive. This may look like a wild statement, but nevertheless it is true. The French were to be put in their place; a government more agreeable to reactionaries in financial and political circles was to come into office; there was to be considerably less "truck and trade with the Yankees". In short the clock was to be put back and a government created with policies that would meet with the approval of all those folk who agree with the contributor of the current issue of Saturday Night, who tells us that "the essence of French-Canadian outlook" is "an unwillingness to concede the battle of the plains of Abraham". It is startling that such unspeakable idiocy should command some measure of support; but unfortunately it does. A quite prominent member of the Toronto group has given expression to this very view in recent years.

I ask the leader of the opposition what he thinks of such dangerous and provocative utterances coming from some of his supporters in the holy city. Is it not a strange coincidence that the intensification of the clamour for conscription occurred last fall precisely at the moment when it became known that the bulwark against conscription, that giant Canadian statesman, the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, was about to disappear from the political scene? Is it not a coincidence that it happened when it was definitely realized that his mighty voice defending Canadian liberties and privileges was about to be silenced by the pall of death? His passing was the signal, as everyone knows, of a sudden blitzkrieg of forces aimed at splitting the Liberal party by renewing with accrued vigour the sudden cry for conscription which reached even the ranks of the Liberal party.

Not so very long ago I was castigated for having made what was termed a most dangerous speech, when I characterized conscription as having been transformed into a racial issue. No doubt the ire of the hon. gentleman who so characterized me was aroused by the fact that I placed this child on the doorstep of the Conservative party which directed the affairs of Canada in 1917. Hon. members from New Brunswick, although we have personal regard for the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) as a gentleman, know his habit of viewing certain questions by the light of a small tallow candle instead of by the radiance of God's own sunshine. At the first opportunity he tried to convey to certain sections of this country the idea that I entertained the determination to make conscription a racial issue. I wish to state that there was no such determination on my part. That determination was made by the fathers of conscription, who conceived that child in 1917 and fostered it ever since. That determination was made rather by the gentlemen from Toronto to whom the Winnipeg Free Press referred in the editorial I quoted a few minutes ago. I wonder if the leader of the opposition listened carefully yesterday to the quotations made by the Prime Minister from speeches delivered in this house by the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, by the leader of the opposition in March, 1939, and by these gentlemen during the last campaign. I wondered also, as the Prime Minister said yesterday, why the hon. gentleman did not denounce the words of his leader of that time as being dangerous, because his utterances then dealt with the racial nature of conscription, the dangerous elements which it contained, and the possibility that it would develop strife and division throughout the dominion.

Of course I realize with regret that the hon. gentleman's knowledge of French does not permit him to understand all the speeches made by my fellow Canadians from the province of Quebec concerning the question of conscription. I realize also that he may not have had time at his disposal to read the English translations of those speeches which appeared in Hansard; and I realize also that he may not have time in the next two or three years to read certain books which treat very forcefully this same question of conscription, and throw a great deal of light on the nature of the issue.

All the speeches and books I have mentioned contain the same thoughts that have been expressed in this house in recent days, except that they have been couched in different language. My crime has been that of stripping conscription of the hypocrisy with which it has been surrounded for the past twenty-five years; of pulling it out of the odious pussyfooting and beating around the bush to which it has been subjected by, I may say, all political parties since the last war. Let us call things by their true names. A rose by any other name still smells as sweet. Dynamite by any other appellation contains just as much destructive power. Pussyfooting about conscription is just as dangerous as so many tons of TNT under the foundations of national unity in this country. It is potentially fraught with just as great disaster and dissension when it is called by the sweet sounding name of selective service for overseas.

To explain my position on this issue may I be permitted, though it is rather disagreeable to me to do so, to speak of my background. Within the last two weeks I have been pointed out as a French fanatic, though I regret to use that term. Let me say that my father, one time premier of New Brunswick, and one time postmaster general in this House of Commons, devoted his entire life, as every hon. member of this house knows, to fostering and promoting bonne entente, harmony and union between the two great races of this country. I will admit that between my father and the leader of the opposition there did exist political animosity; but I also know, as the hon. gentleman knows, that there existed between them a certain amount of personal friendship.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Right.

Mr. VENIOT: And there is that same personal friendship between us at the present time. We may hold different political opinions, but as individuals we leave those things aside, no matter what bitter enemies we may be in politics. My father endeavoured to instil into me and the other members of the family that same desire to foster a better feeling between the two races. As a physician and a public man I have endeavoured in every way to follow in my father's footsteps in that regard. The dearest and truest friends I have, in and out of my profession, are of English-speaking descent, and the great majority of them are Protestants. I can also say that in my active professional practice the great majority of my clients were non-Catholics, and the same thing applies to my large drug business in the town of Bathurst. My three daughters—I am going all the way—were educated and received their university degrees at an English institution in the city of Halifax. Why? Because I desired them to have the broad English view as well as the French view, so that they might be better Canadians. My only son is a third year medical student, not at the French university of Laval, for which I have a great deal of respect, nor at the university of Montreal, but at the English Protestant Dalhousie university, for the same reason.

I ask this house: Is such a background conducive to fanatical expressions in this house with regard to race? I deny that in toto. My sole endeavour has been and will continue to be to enlighten my fellow-Canadians as much as I possibly can as to the factual, historical, political and racial significance of conscription as I have studied the question, and to point out the explosive dangers to the nation of any such measure. I realize that I have not much time at my disposal, though I did not take note of the time I started to speak; but I propose to indicate certain facts concerning conscription which are found in a book which I think it very important that every hon. member of this house should read, a book to which I referred a few moments ago. This book contains all the historical facts, for which all the references are indicated. It was written by a person who lives outside Canada, a former New Yorker but now a Washingtonian. That may be disagreeable to some hon. members in this house who formerly preached the slogan, "No truck or trade with the United States." The author of this book is a disinterested outsider who has no axe to grind for the province of Quebec or any other province of this dominion; for conscriptionists or anti-conscriptionists; a person who spent six months practically without interruption in the library of this House of Commons, as can be verified by consulting our librarians, and in the archives of the government, gathering material for this very valuable work.

The first chapter of this book is concerned with the roots of French-Canadianism; it indicates the struggles which took place from the conquest of New France by England up to the beginning of the last war. The second chapter deals with the trials of French-Canadian nationality. The third chapter indicates French-Canadian nationalism at the outbreak of the war. The fourth and fifth chapters, which should interest this house, show the united Canada of 1914 and the revival of national conflict with French Canada on the defensive in 1916. May I be permitted, as time allows, to read a few quotations from this work, the first from page 55:

Britain entered the war on August 4. . . On the same day the governor general telegraphed the king that "Canada stands united from the Pacific to the Atlantic in her determination to uphold the honour and traditions of our empire."

Then, in the next paragraph:

The most striking phenomenon in the first months of the war was the practical unanimity of all shades of Canadian opinion.

And a few lines further down:

But in 1914 Canadians of both races and all religions were bound in a sort of union sacrée . . . throughout the length and breadth of the province of Quebec there were demonstrations of popular acclaim for the cause of Britain and her allies.

And on page 56:

In Quebec, the old capital of Canada, there were enthusiastic pro-war demonstrations in which English, Irish, and French Canadians joined.

And in the next paragraph:

With a unanimity that is all the more striking when the bitter divisions of the later years of the war are considered, the representatives of every shade of French-Canadian political opinion, Liberals, Conservatives and even Nationalists seemed to vie with each other in expressions of enthusiasm for the allied cause and for Canadian participation. . . . From the very beginning of the European conflict, the official leader of French-Canadian thought—

Sir Wilfrid Laurier—

—ranged himself on the side of an active Canadian participation in the war.

Then, on page 57:

Laurier appealed to his own countrymen in eloquent terms to enlist.

And on page 58:

That the Catholic leaders did not at this time shirk from envisaging a whole-hearted Canadian cooperation in the empire's war effort is proved by Archbishop Bruchesi's supplementary statement—

Then the statement follows. And further:

Laurier . . . admonished the French Canadians among the soldiers to remember that "England has protected our liberties and our faith. Under her flag we have found peace, and now in appreciation of what England has done, you go as French Canadians to do your utmost to keep the Union Jack flying in honour to the breeze."

And at page 59:

Pastoral letters . . . have been at times of great influence in keeping the French Canadians in the path of obedience and loyalty to the mother country.

And further down the page:

The bishops did not hesitate to assert that because England was engaged in the war, it was clear that the fate of all parts of the empire was linked to the success of her arms.

I could go on quoting endlessly to show that in those days the most perfect harmony and unity existed among Canadians of all races, all creeds and all nationalities.

Then, at page 64:

On the Liberal as much as on the Conservative side of the House of Commons it seemed to be the consensus of opinion that the government should be given carte blanche to help win the war.

And at page 67:

There was absolutely no difference of opinion on the righteousness of the cause of the allies or of the necessity of Canada's coming to the help of the mother country in the great emergency.

I now pass to the next chapter, in order to save time. At page 83 I find this:

It was only natural that there arose at that time a widely supported movement for the formation of a battalion to be exclusively composed of French Canadians.

There was an insistent demand for a French-Canadian unit.

French Canadians were sometimes assigned to units predominantly English-speaking and protestant, where the atmosphere was decidedly uncongenial to them.

And further down:

They were further annoyed by the lack of French-Canadian instructors and by the refusal of the authorities to allow more than one French-Canadian company under French-Canadian officers in the first contingent. . . . The consequent desire for a unit in which French Canadians would be assured of a sympathetic milieu for the free exercise of their religion and customs was very strong. Meanwhile French-Canadian leaders of both parties had given their support to the scheme for a French-Canadian unit. . . .

The consequent authorization on September 30 for the formation of a battalion to be known as the Royal 22nd French Canadians was hailed with patriotic satisfaction throughout the province of Quebec. Conservative and Liberal editors of rural and city newspapers alike united in cordial approval of the scheme. . . .

With the formation of a French-Canadian battalion and the recruiting campaign, of which the Parc Sohmer meeting was an outstanding event, it seemed that French Canada's war effort had been given exactly the proper impetus and that it would only be necessary to keep it going.

Immediately following are these words:

Unfortunately, the government and particularly the recruiting authorities failed to do just that. The Conservative government of Sir Robert Borden was severely handicapped throughout the war by the fact that its French-Canadian members represented a minority instead of a majority of their compatriots.

And the further quotation at page 90:

The year 1915 was marked not only by a magnificent expansion of Canada's war effort, but also by the revival of racial conflict and a decided break in the unanimity of French- and English-speaking Canadians for the successful prosecution of the war. . . .

Underneath this seeming unanimity, there were forces, currents of emotion and counter-emotion that were destined seriously to impede Canada's war effort and practically to destroy the 1914 enthusiasm of French Canadians for active participation in the European war.

It was most unfortunate for the cause of national solidarity that the controversy over the teaching of French in the Ontario schools should have come to a head at this moment to strengthen those forces of disunion. . . . The agitation over the Ontario bilingual schools . . . results in growing bitterness between the races until the average French Canadian lost a good deal of his enthusiasm for fighting England's battles.

And on page 92:

As a result of this instinctive feeling, it was not surprising to see French Canada's war effort become less enthusiastic as the Ontario schools controversy progressed.

And further down on the same page:

The bitterness aroused by the dispute over the Ontario bilingual schools was responsible more than anything else for the gradual slowing up of the war effort of French Canada.

To have such an issue raised at a moment when mutual tolerance and cooperation were essential to a successful prosecution of the war was unfortunate in the highest degree.

I realize the time at my disposal has practically elapsed. In conclusion I would ask every hon. member to take cognizance of this work, if he sincerely desires to be posted on the exact significance of conscription as a menace to the unity of the Canadian people.

May I terminate my observations by quoting from a letter received only a few days ago from a friend:

What are we going to do about conscription, after the plebiscite? Why hold conscription like a red rag in front of a bull? Let us bear in mind its true significance, and drop it like a curse. Let us direct all our efforts toward any other method of raising the manpower required for the outside defence of Canada. Let us eliminate from our vocabularies this element of national discord and cleavage, and get together on some common ground where susceptibilities are not smouldering at red heat. Let us act and talk more like brothers under the skin, which we really are. Let us consolidate our forces, not divide them, bearing in mind the tremendous task which we all have of winning this war at the side of our sister nations of the commonwealth.

To indicate that there are no hard feelings in my heart toward any hon. member who may have criticized me, and particularly toward the leader of the opposition, may I, through you, sir, and with my compliments, offer a gift of this book to the leader of the opposition so that he may have an opportunity of studying it and conveying some of its contents to his fellow members.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to follow the arguments of the last speaker except to make reference to some of the statements which he made. He referred to the question of conscription. This question of conscription has been raised so often in this house that one would think we did not have conscription in Canada. We have conscription in Canada; let us face the fact. The only difference is that we have not conscription for overseas service. Boys are being taken away from the farms and factories of this country and conscripted into the Canadian army. I think we should make that perfectly clear and get away from this nonsense of intimating that we have not conscription in this country. Furthermore, I should have thought that the last speaker in his eloquent pleading for national unity would have committed himself as to where he stands on this question of the plebiscite and what active part he intends to take to try to get the people of Canada to vote "yes" to relieve the government of restrictions.

Mr. VENIOT: May I point out to the hon. gentleman that I have done so already.

Mr. HOMUTH: I am glad to hear it, because the hon. member's speech this afternoon did anything but help to create unity in this country. I think the address of the hon. gentleman will do more to create disunity in Canada than any other thing.

I do not intend to deal with the general question of the plebiscite, because that has been dealt with already. The house has passed on the matter and we are going to have a plebiscite. I had thought that the discussion on the second reading of the bill was limited to a discussion of its principle. My own opinion is that the hon. member who has just spoken was entirely out of order. In fact, I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was out of order yesterday because there was very little discussion of the principle of the bill. What I want to deal with is the principle and the proponents of the bill.

I have listened carefully to the arguments which have been advanced for and against the plebiscite during the debate on the resolution and so far on the bill itself. I listened carefully to the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, which was practically all on the question of holding a plebiscite. This bill and those speeches must revive in the mind of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) some fond memories of his political career, and also of some of the speeches the Prime Minister has made in the past. I can imagine the Minister of Mines and Resources sitting in his seat and every once in a while giving a little squirm when some criticism of the War-time Elections Act and of Union government crossed the floor of the house, evidently aimed at the Conservative party but sometimes hitting him in passing. I can hear him saying, "Ouch, that hurts," when some of those barbs struck him. The Minister of Mines and Resources was first elected to the Canadian House of Commons under the War-time Elections Act, 1917, and his mind must have gone back to those days. I have here a few extracts from some of the speeches which the Minister of Mines and Resources made during that campaign. They are interesting when compared with his attitude to-day on this question and his very loyal—I think that is the best term to use—support which he gives the present Prime Minister.

Speaking at Carman, Manitoba, on December 3, 1917, the Minister of Mines and Resources, who was then a Union government candidate, said:

> Conscript wealth as well as flesh and blood. [Mr. Homuth.]

He offered hearty congratulations to the Liberals who because of their loyalty and sincerity had joined the Union government and deserted Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Then on December 13, 1917, he said:

> Compulsory military service, as the Honourable Arthur Meighen has said, is the rock upon which Union government is built.

At that time he was a strong supporter of Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. He followed his every speech and he watched his every gesture; he considered him one of the great Canadians. He then went on to say:

> There is no chance of a referendum if this Union government is defeated on Monday next. Canada will then be committed to a policy which will bring shame to her.

Sir Wilfrid had proposed a referendum. On December 14, 1917, there was a tremendous crowd in Grace church, Winnipeg. Speaking at that meeting the Minister of Mines and Resources said:

> I do not question Sir Wilfrid Laurier's loyalty, but I do question the loyalty of those who are standing behind him in Quebec. The very best element in the Liberal party is in support of this Union government.

This Liberal party is now supported by all members, whether they come from other provinces or from the province of Quebec. Needless to say his leader, the present Prime Minister of Canada, was not in that group in 1917. The minister said:

> When the boys go over the top there is no question as to whether they are Liberal or Conservative. Cannot we too stand united and go over the top on December 17?

The Prime Minister has talked a good deal about national unity. I should like to refer to a speech which he made in 1940 as it relates to the bill now before the house. Referring to national unity, the Prime Minister said:

> Least of all was it brought about by pledges to extend the life of parliament in a time of war without any reference to the people, or to form a so-called "national" government that might enforce conscription or disfranchise many classes of Canadian citizens. The memories of those experiences in the last war are still bitter in the minds of the Canadian people.

In dealing with the present bill, we can only do so perhaps by comparing it with the War-time Elections Act of 1917. The government has found that the country is at war and that it is necessary during this war to take a vote on a certain question. In arranging to take that vote they find that they have to present to the house a bill which will provide for those who may or may not be able to vote. They have a problem on their hands which to my mind they will find it difficult to solve. We must remember that in the county of Waterloo, in some of the neighbouring counties and in many other places throughout Canada, whenever it has been found useful to use it since 1917, the old War-time Elections Act has been dragged out of the closet and waved before the eyes of electors to whom it might mean something. And so this bill is presented to the house. I think I am not unparliamentary, Mr. Speaker, when I say that this bill contains more political trickery than any other piece of legislation that has ever been introduced into the House of Commons.

Mr. CLEAVER: Is the hon. member supporting or opposing it?

Mr. HOMUTH: I shall tell my hon. friend all about that. But first I want to compare this bill with the Wartime Elections Act of 1917.

The act of 1917 contains clauses with which I thoroughly disagree, clauses which in my opinion were unfair and should never have been embodied in an election act. But this bill contains clauses which are or might be just as vicious. By the act of 1917 the franchise was extended to certain classes of women in this country. There was no women's franchise in Canada in 1917. The first time the franchise was extended to women was in Ontario in the elections of 1919. But in the act of 1917 the franchise was given to the wives and mothers of men who were overseas, and after all, I know of no one who was more interested in the war than the wives and mothers who were waiting patiently and anxiously for husband or son to come home, waiting perhaps only to receive a telegram saying they would never be home again.

Mr. McLARTY: Surely the hon. gentleman is not suggesting that they are disfranchised under this bill?

Mr. HOMUTH: I am not suggesting that at all. I am comparing some of the clauses of the act of 1917 with some of the terms of this bill, which certainly are not clear to me, and unless they are very much modified, will not be clear to the electors.

The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) the other day referred to paragraph (c) of subsection 2 of section 4 of this bill, which deals with those who are barred from voting on the plebiscite through being barred in the province in which they live. He made an eloquent plea that the great Liberal party should never do a thing like this; he appealed to the great principles of Liberalism in urging that this provision should be struck out of the bill. So far as pleading for the principles of Liberalism is concerned, he was pleading for something that is deader than a mackerel. Nevertheless he made the statement, and I reiterate it, that this clause is one of the most dangerous that could be put in any election act. Suppose a German warship should be able to approach, let us say, some town in Prince Edward Island, and it was feared that German fifth columnists in Prince Edward Island might become active, and that therefore the legislature immediately met and decided to intern many of them and deprive them of their right to vote in a provincial election. That would mean that everyone of German origin throughout Canada would be debarred from voting on the plebiscite, and that might happen two days before the plebiscite vote was taken. People of German origin throughout Canada would be debarred from voting on the plebiscite, thousands of mothers and fathers whose sons went overseas in the last war and died for this country—families who have been settled here for a hundred and twenty to a hundred and fifty years and have played their part in every war in which Canada and the empire have been engaged. That disqualification might apply to other races. Why the clause is in there at all I do not know unless the government was given to understand that it applies to the Japanese because of the situation in British Columbia. If that be so, let us be frank and put it in the bill that the Japanese are barred from voting. But why should the bill contain such a general clause as this?

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) made a point yesterday which I think was well taken—that this bill would bring about a complete change in our constitutional set-up and system of government in Canada. He made that so clear that the point needs no labouring. But I go further. I remember what happened when the National Resources Mobilization Act was before the house, and the national registration. We had a meeting in the railway committee room at which Mr. Justice Davis and the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who was then also Minister of National War Services, discussed this whole matter with the members of this house. At that time they said there would be no exemptions whatsoever under the National Resources Mobilization Act. They did provide, however, for indefinite postponements for members of two religious creeds, the Doukhobors and the Mennonites. But for fear there would be resentment among the other peoples of this country because the Doukhobors and the Mennonites were being granted an indefinite postponement the government decided to establish and did establish work camps, and the boys of those two faiths were taken from their homes, from the farms of this country, and sent into those camps to build useless roads that some tourists may drive over years hence. But in western Canada the Doukhobors, I understand, refused to go into these camps, and so they were taken before the courts and sentenced, some of them to serve time in gaol, some to pay a fine; and in the event of not paying the fine they had to serve an extra month in gaol. Now they are free. I doubt whether the government will call them and fine them and gaol them again, because they have purchased their freedom by serving two months in gaol and paying a fine of $200, or serving three months in gaol. From a casual reading of this bill one would think that these people were denied the right to vote on the plebiscite, or that if they did vote on it they would be subject to military service. That is the general impression one gets from a first reading of the bill. But as a matter of fact it does not deny to them the right to vote on the plebiscite. The conscientious objectors, the Mennonites and the Doukhobors, can vote on this plebiscite, and that is part of the trickery that is in this bill. The government should make it abundantly clear to the people of this country whether or not these people are going to be allowed to vote on the plebiscite. It is not clear now.

Take the case of a Mennonite or a Doukhobor family, consisting of the father, the mother, three daughters over twenty-one and therefore old enough to vote, and a son of military age. If the son votes he is liable to military service, but the father, the mother and the three daughters can vote, knowing that they will not be required to serve; the son refrains from voting and is not liable to military service; and there are five votes in that family against the plebiscite. That is according to a provision of this bill. The government is in the position of saying that while on the face of it it looks as though these people dare not vote, in a very subtle way we have arranged that they can vote, because the only one who is debarred from voting is the son of military age. These people do not have to fight for their country or serve in any capacity, and five out of a family of six will be permitted to vote against the plebiscite. Surely that is not the type of legislation we want.

Mr. ROEBUCK: What does the hon. member suggest?

Mr. HOMUTH: What do I suggest? I suggest that the government come out honestly and say where they stand on this matter, whether these people have or have not the right to vote. So far as I am concerned, let me tell my hon. friend that any citizens of this country who, while enjoying the freedom, the opportunities and the protection which this country and this empire give them, are not prepared to serve in the military forces or the non-combatant forces to the very limits of which they are capable, are not fit to be called Canadians. That is my opinion, and I have no hesitation in expressing it. The Mennonites are not averse to serving; they are prepared to do anything they can in support of our war effort so long as they do not have to bear arms and kill, because to do so is against the principles of their religion. But there are many things which they could do, and do much better than they are being done to-day, without dragging them off their farms and putting them in camps.

Let me say further that this bill does not jibe with the war service act, because, while these provisions are in the bill, these people are subject to being taken out and put in those camps. I wonder whether the Secretary of State drew up this bill. I do not know, but I should not be surprised if he did, because it is just about as double-barrelled as many of the orders in council which came from the Labour department when he was in charge of it, and the meaning of which half the time we did not know.

Also, Mr. Speaker, there is no provision to get out the vote. The Prime Minister called yesterday for national unity; he asked hon. members to go home, organize their ridings, engage the help of service clubs and other people to serve as returning officers, scrutineers, and so forth, for no compensation. I believe many people can be persuaded to do it. But when he calls for national unity, the place for him to start, so far as this plebiscite is concerned, is within the ranks of his own party; because the only people in this house who have said that they would refuse to release the government from its promise to the people are members within his own ranks, and the only organizations in respect of this plebiscite in Canada to-day are those which are opposed to it. To judge by some of the speeches delivered in this chamber, and by a meeting which was held in Montreal and ended in a riot, a tremendous organization is going on against releasing the government from its promise. Now, what does the government intend to do in order to ensure that there is an equally strong, strenuous and active organization to see that there is a sufficient vote to release it from its promise? It has a tremendous responsibility. I am fearful of the position of this country in the eyes not only of our own people but of the other nations of the world, if this plebiscite should be adverse to releasing the government. It would be a tragedy were such a thing to occur.

Mr. CLEAVER: Well, then, why not support it?

Mr. HOMUTH: I am supporting it. Who said I am not?

Mr. CLEAVER: I have not heard any word of support so far, and I have been listening.

Mr. HOMUTH: The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) is continually interjecting remarks on things he knows nothing about. He is like the famous Topsy; he doesn't know where he came from and he doesn't know where he is going—politically.

Mr. CLEAVER: I have not boxed the compass yet, though.

Mr. HOMUTH: Now, Mr. Speaker, I say this, and in all seriousness. The Prime Minister has a tremendous job on his hands. He has first of all to close up his own ranks, to see to it that his own supporters in this house get out and do the job which he is asking us to do. He need have no fears about what we are going to do. He need have no doubt about the stand which the opposition will take. Our leader has made it abundantly plain. But if this plebiscite results in a negative vote, Canada will stand in a very serious position.

This week we had a secret session of the house to get information on our war effort. In May we are going to take a plebiscite; the people are to be asked to relieve the government of a promise. Yet they have no such knowledge as we have of the war situation. It is time that the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet told them plainly just what that situation is, and how great a danger it holds for Canada and for everything we hold dear. Rather than see the plebiscite defeated I would endorse action by the government to withdraw the whole thing from this house and forget the matter entirely. Unfortunately the government, in its effort not to promote national unity but to play with this question, has grabbed a wild cat by the tail.

Mr. MacNICOL: It dare not let go.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is afraid to hang on and it dare not let go. In my opinion it would be better to let go and take a few scratches rather than, by hanging on, to endanger very seriously Canada's war effort.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): The hon. gentleman who just sat down stated that the government has a wild cat by the tail and cannot let go. Possibly the illustration is unfortunate from his point of view, because hon. gentlemen opposite did have that wild cat by the tail and have now let go.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). It is notable for what it does not say rather than for what it says. The argument against the plebiscite was riding high, wide and handsome until a few days ago, when the opposition observed that they had a wild cat by the tail. I note that to-day they no longer oppose the plebiscite—it is too much like a wild cat to hold by the tail; they limit themselves to making attacks on small details of the bill which no doubt will be settled in committee in a way satisfactory to all concerned.

For instance there was the attack by the hon. gentleman from Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) on section 5 of the bill, which is directed possibly towards the Mennonite or Doukhobor vote of the west. That section provides that those who vote on the plebiscite may not later claim exemption from military service. The hon. gentleman worked himself up into a great heat and fury about some Mennonite family who might all vote with the exception only of those liable for military service. I asked him what he suggested and he went into a heated reply but did not answer the question. A friend at my side handed me a book in which he pointed to a quotation from some philosopher of old who said "in politics heat is in inverse proportion to knowledge". I thought it applicable and timely because, although the hon. gentleman got very warm, he did not give me any knowledge as to what he proposed to do. What would hon. members do under these circumstances, granted the picture is correct as he has presented it? Would they disfranchise all the Mennonites and all the Doukhobors? Would they not make those who vote liable to military service? It seems to me that a practical viewpoint rather than a condition of heat is required when one is discussing the details of a bill. Is not the bill as it stands probably the best solution that could be obtained under the circumstances? It provides that young men capable of military service may not vote on the question and later claim exemption.

I am inclined to compliment the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) upon his attack on section 3 of the bill. There are before the house at the moment two principles involved in this bill. One is the principle of giving to the executive the power to have general plebiscites on any question and at all times. That is what is expressed in the bill. But we now have the intimation by the government that this will later be changed in committee. Were the bill to stand as it now reads, I would approach it with a great deal of doubt; I do not like these general powers given to an executive unless there is a distinct understanding as to how they are to be used.

We have the illustration of the War Measures Act passed in the early days of this parliament—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not this parliament. I would say it was at the time of the last war.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I accept the correction. It was before this parliament was elected but after the war was declared.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, it was passed in 1914—in the former war; it was dormant in the interval until this war.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Then it became active and was re-used during this parliament.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was revived.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes; I thank my hon. friend for the correction. When that measure was revived—I do not remember that there was a vote in the house, but, at that time, I suppose no hon. member, whether in the executive or out of it, anticipated that by this time there would be some twenty thousand orders in council passed. I suppose there was no one who anticipated that these orders in council would go into such broad measures as the limitation of prices, the regulation of wages and other such matters of a civil nature. When you hand over power to an executive you must look to it that the limitations are such that the executive will not go further than you would yourself. I have looked with regret on the limitation of the activities of parliament and the absorption of so much power by the executive, so I would hesitate to give to the executive the power to hold general plebiscites on any question. I compliment the hon. member for Lake Centre for having objected while this only was before us. But with the assurance that we now have from the government I think we may assume that what is before us is a plebiscite on the question:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

That is the matter before us now.

I did not speak in the debate on the address in reply. It was very largely given up to the discussion of the pros and cons of conscription. I did not speak because I felt that practically every veiwpoint was covered and because I felt that very little was to be gained by much talking on that most contentious problem; that the more one spoke on it, the more angry one became, the further the disputants drew apart, and the more difficult became the situation presented to the Canadian people. There would be very little difficulty indeed, were hon. members on this side of the house left free from the influence of stirred-up public opinion abroad, in arranging some reasonable solution of that question. The whole difficulty arises from much talk and perhaps a too partisan attitude on the question.

I did not take part in the argument. Yet I feel that for the sake of my own constituents I should not allow this opportunity to go by to put on record where I stand on this question.

I am neither a conscriptionist nor an anti-conscriptionist. There are two main arguments on the matter. There is first the desire which I and many others have for a voluntary army rather than a conscript army, because we believe that the volunteer army is better. I can go back in my own memory to the time when we used to hold almost in contempt the conscript armies of Europe, and used to look with pride on the British armies of those days which were raised by voluntary enlistment. I am reinforced in my opinion by the remarks of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who said it was most important that our present splendid volunteer army be reinforced by volunteers and not by conscripts. I am satisfied that one of the prime requisites—or perhaps that is a little too strongly stated; that one of the best qualifications for joining the armed forces of Canada is willingness to serve. It is a most important factor; and I cannot see, as some people argue, that anything is to be gained, as far as the army is concerned, by abolishing voluntary service and replacing it with some kind of compulsion. So I am not in favour of compulsion for compulsion's sake.

On the other hand, I have before me a comment made by Mr. Winston Churchill in one of his speeches, published in his recent book, which I should like to read to the house. He was speaking about the conscription act that was introduced into the British house during this war, and said:

At the beginning of the war of 1914 we soon had a million volunteers on our hands, for the bulk of whom no weapons were available. Ultimately over two million men demanded to be led to the front. But after that the limits of voluntary recruitment were exhausted. The war continued and the armies could not be maintained. Then we had the hateful spectacle of volunteers who had been wounded twice or even thrice being sent back to the trenches, and of regular soldiers who had served two whole years in the front line being deprived of their right to claim expiry of their contract. This proved intolerable to the national sense of justice. Moreover, two million households and families whose menfolk had borne the whole burden were infuriated by the fact that there were very large numbers of perfectly fit men remaining at home, filling at higher wages the jobs of those who had volunteered. It was this sense of wrong and injustice, which spread through the country in the spring and summer of 1916, that alone carried the conscription bill.

So you have these two conflicting ideas: the value of a volunteer army on the one hand, and the utter unfairness of voluntary service on the other; the unfairness of having in the army only those whose public spirit is sufficiently great to induce them to enlist, and the unfairness of allowing those whose public spirit is insufficient to remain in the safety and comfort of their homes. Those two arguments are irreconcilable; the longer you talk about them, the more they clash. So you come to the point where you must make practical decisions, rather than an out-and-out choice between the two.

The time has not yet arrived in Canada, as it did in Great Britain, when people are outraged at the unfairness of the situation. If the war continues; if casualties increase; if there are published in the press long lists of names of those who have been lost; if many months of arduous service go by, that feeling will become overwhelming in this country, the unfairness of keeping the public-spirited men in the front lines while the loafers, the shirkers, sit comfortably at home. Therefore the desire for the fairness of selective service will overcome our desire for a volunteer army. We must put ourselves in a position to do what is right under the circumstances as they exist from time to time.

For that reason I am heartily in accord with the bill now before the house. The opposition to it is perhaps uninformed; perhaps it refuses actually to see or consider the points involved. May I lay before the house a resolution which I recently received from the clerk of the city council of Toronto. Mr. J. W. Somers, city clerk, wrote me as follows:

Pursuant to instruction, I forward herewith, a copy of a resolution which was adopted by the city council, at its meeting on February 9, 1942, as follows:

"Whereas, it is the proposed intention of the federal government to hold a plebiscite on the general question of conscription and whereas the cost of the same has been estimated to be well over one million dollars, and whereas, at this time, leadership is needed to be given, more than ever, by the elected government at Ottawa, and whereas the holding of such a plebiscite will tend to harm rather than help Canada's war effort;

"Be it resolved: that this city council petitions the federal government to reconsider its decision on a plebiscite of this nature being placed before the peoples of this country at this most critical time, and further, a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Prime Minister of Canada and his cabinet and to all federal representatives of this city."

I received that resolution, and it may be of some interest if I may be permitted to read my reply. I wrote the city clerk in part as follows:

I am glad to know the view of the city council in respect to this matter, and thank you for your letter.

It strikes me, however, that the resolution is incomplete, and I would like a little more information. I am of opinion that our selective service law requires amendment, and I think the council agrees with me on this. It does not make clear, however, how the government is to free itself of the pledge given to the public, if a plebiscite is not held. I am sure that the council does not suggest that the government violate or disregard its pledge, and I am also fairly confident that it does not advocate that the government carry on indefinitely as we are. As the act now stands, we could not send draftees across the international border into the United States, nor could we, for instance, hold the Aleutian islands against the Japanese with drafted men.

I value the thought and wisdom of the city council and I would like to know what it is they actually propose.

That letter was dated February 16, and so far I have not received a reply. In private discussions of the matter I have found that when you bring somebody right up against the question: "Do you advocate that we stay as we are, or do you advocate that the government violate a pledge?" you seldom obtain an answer, certainly not from a partisan. I think many people have not really realized what the attack on the plebicsite means.

Yesterday the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) advised that all 245 members of this house join together and adopt a resolution releasing ourselves from the pledge. The hon. member seemed to think we might then in honour proceed to deal with the matter as we saw fit.

I spoke in the city of Toronto on Sunday evening on this question, to a very considerable audience. I told them that I personally, in that very hall, and from that very platform had told those very people that if the government was returned to power, the government led by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) they would not have conscription. I was justified in that statement because I had the pledge of the Prime Minister, and I also pointed out in that speech that I also had the pledge of the then leader of the opposition, Doctor Manion. Therefore, no matter which party won, there would not be conscription in Canada during this war, until another general election took place.

I told these people that I personally did not stand for broken pledges and that I would not be a party to making the breaking of pledges a principle of political action. That is my view, and that is where I hold myself right now. I will not take part in the breaking of these pledges; and, Mr. Speaker, I do not see how, if I joined with the hon. member for New Westminster, (Mr. Reid), and the two of us concocted something, I would in any way relieve myself from the pledge. Nor if I added all the gentlemen around me would I relieve myself from it. Nor indeed would I help myself in any way if I joined with the hon. member for Yale and the leader of the opposition.

There is an old story to the effect that when thieves fall out, honest men get their due. It is when thieves join together that honest men must beware. One cannot recover from a pledge solemnly given to the public by joining in some kind of conspiracy to get our own way without their consent. We would not increase by one iota the morality of our action by each severally violating his pledge, in association with all other members of parliament who were violating theirs.

Therefore in my judgment, so far as I can see, there is no way of handling the practical needs of the situation other than by taking a plebiscite and asking for a release. That is the honest way, the decent way; it is needed; it is necessary.

The hon. member for Waterloo South was most anxious about the vote, whether it was or was not going to carry. He complained that we should throw obligation on hon. members of the oposition to have it carried. His question was: What is the government going to do? Well, I throw back the question. I can tell him what I will do, because I have already done it. I advocate voting "yes" on the plebiscite. What are you going to do? There is no doubt about what the great majority, at least 95 per cent, of hon. members on this side of the house will do. Now, what will the opposition do?

There is no lack of money, no lack of organization on the Conservative side. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) referred to the junta which recently met in Toronto to stimulate an all-out war effort, a junta which spent thousands of dollars upon advertising in the public press.

Mr. JACKMAN: They were all Liberals.

Mr. ROEBUCK: The same gentlemen, in association with my hon. friends across the aisle, can still spend their money, and get up a campaign of that kind. I hope they will be more successful than they were with the last one. But still they may do it; they may advocate it.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): What is the basis for the use of the term "in association with"? The hon. gentleman used the expression "in association with my hon. friends across the aisle".

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): What is the basis for that suggestion?

Mr. ROEBUCK: The basis for that statement?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Yes.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Why, the basis lies in the fact that the junta which gathered in the roof garden of the Royal York hotel played to the extent of their ability the Conservative hand in the by-election.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): That is just your opinion.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes, just my opinion—and it is supported by the facts. Furthermore, the results of the by-elections also support my statement that their action was attended with a minimum of success.

Perhaps the house would be interested in my own experience in connection with that advertising, and the junta's work. You know, I come from Toronto, and I am proud of that fact. I am proud of it, notwithstanding the fact that public opinion of Toronto is so often misrepresented by wealthy Conservatives. There are two cities of Toronto: there is the great mass of the people, and there are those highly respectable gentlemen who so often assume to speak on their behalf.

Perhaps the house would be interested to know the extent of the success of the so-called all-out war campaign. I represent a constituency in the centre of Toronto, a city which is looked upon as imperialistic, Tory and hide-bound. It is a field in which the three great provincial newspapers circulate—and there can be no question about the circulation, because the advertising these gentlemen paid for was published in all the newspapers. There were pages of it, day after day, column upon column of exhortation to the electors in my riding to write to me and tell me what I should do. There was column after column of exhortation. I read in one of the newspapers that one man is reported to have telephoned to seven hundred people, asking them to write to their member urging conscription, all-out war or something of the kind.

That campaign continued for days. My name was given as the representative in my constituency, and my address was furnished. Under those circumstances, knowing the power of the press, knowing the influence of advertising, how many replies, Mr. Speaker, do you suppose I received? I represent a constituency of between 60,000 and 100,000 people. How many truckloads of letters do you suppose I received? It will be recalled that not only were the people directed to send letters, but they were told to cut copies of the advertisement from the newspapers, place them in envelopes and mail them to their representatives.

Mr. REID: No postage was required.

Mr. ROEBUCK: No postage was required, and my address had been given. Remember, I represent about 60,000 people right in the middle of this hide-bound city of Toronto. How many truckloads did I get?

Mr. JACKMAN: About three hundred?

Mr. ROEBUCK: About three hundred? The hon. member for one of the Toronto ridings suggests that I received three hundred truckloads. Well, ladies and—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROEBUCK: It was the beauty to my right that caused me to make the mistake. Hon. members may be interested when I tell them that I received less than one hundred letters.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): They knew to whom they were writing.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes, they did. The explanation was that the people in my constituency had no reason to suppose that they were any more patriotic than I am, or that they had any more knowledge of what was right in the circumstances than I had. They refused to be stampeded by newspaper advertising, or by wealthy people who gathered at sumptuous dinners in the Royal York hotel.

There are two cities of Toronto. There are the broad-minded people of that city. I join with the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) when he said a few days ago that Toronto was not a narrow city, but rather that it was broad-minded.

Mr. MARTIN: It has narrow streets.

Mr. ROEBUCK: It has wide and beautiful streets—and a few narrow ones, too. And some back lanes, shall I say?

Mr. MARTIN: Well, I would not know that.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Yes, both in thought and in physical fact. The unfortunate part is that the narrow lanes are the ones too often seen, and the people who live in narrow lanes of thought, the ones too often heard, while the great mass of the people of the city of Toronto are inarticulate but thinking all the time.

I want my riding to understand that I am going to vote "yes" for this bill, that I am going to urge them to vote "yes" on the plebiscite.

There are two phases to this question. One phase has been dealt with so thoroughly by the Prime Minister that there is practically nothing left to be said on the question. His magnificent speech yesterday was conclusive, but one thing sticks in my mind.

We have been dealing with the question of how we can raise men, whether by voluntary enlistment or by conscription. There is, however, a second phase which has not been mentioned but which is just about as important. It occurs after these men have been raised; and a considerable number have been raised by the selective system. As I stated in my letter to the city council of Toronto, we are not in a position to use these men if it is necessary to cross the international border between ourselves and the United States, or in order to protect the islands on the Pacific coast. It is most unlikely, but it might happen that an enemy expeditionary force be landed on the Pacific coast and that it hold the passes of the Rockies against us. Our only hope of dislodging such a force would be by sending men to the south and bringing them up along the coast. As things stand now, we could not do that. We cannot raise men for service overseas by selective call. And having so raised men, we cannot use them on any expedition which takes them across our borders or beyond the three-mile limit.

So I submit that, whether you are a conscriptionist or an anti-conscriptionist, the necessity for the correction of this situation is such that you should vote "yes" on the plebiscite.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow the previous speaker, but I was interested in the reference he made to the two cities in the good city of Toronto. That is a situation which applies and has applied everywhere for many years. Lord Beaconsfield, at one time Prime Minister of Great Britain, wrote a book about the two nations, the two Englands. He wrote about the England of the rich, the wealthy and the aristocrats, and the England of the toiling masses, the mud sills upon which the other England rested. He made a very good job of it too.

There are one or two points in connection with this bill upon which I should like to comment. One has been cleared up to some extent by the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday. It is to be regretted that his speech of yesterday was not made during the debate on the address. It would appear that he was speaking then with the by-elections in mind, while his speech yesterday quite properly had the plebiscite in mind. As the discussion went on during the debate on the address I was at a loss to know whether the proposed plebiscite was being introduced because the cabinet felt that it was desirable to have this additional power or because of the slings and arrows of the "committee of two hundred". The speeches of hon. members opposite throughout the address debate stressed two things, criticism of the "committee of two hundred" and satisfaction with the voluntary system. This was true to such an extent that I felt somewhat concerned about the fate of the plebiscite.

If we are going to have a plebiscite—and evidently we are—it is absolutely necessary that it should carry. Neither the government nor the country can afford to have the plebiscite defeated, or carried without strong support. It seems to me that the government will be in a bad position, both for its own sake and for the sake of the country's war effort if the vote is indecisive, that is, if there is only a small majority in favour of the plebiscite, or if there is a majority in favour of it in one part of the country and against it in another, even though there be an over-all majority. I am going to indicate to the government where the danger of the plebiscite being defeated lies, if it is going to be submitted as it now reads.

In both the speech from the throne and the speech by the deputy governor general upon the prorogation of parliament there is given in unmistakable language the reasons which the government should put forward as to why the plebiscite must carry. Speaking at the prorogation of parliament on January 21 last, the deputy governor general said:

> Since the present session opened, we have witnessed the extension of war until, to-day, it encompasses the globe. As aggression has succeeded aggression, the active resistance of free peoples everywhere has risen to meet it. The myth of national isolation has vanished from the earth. It is now recognized that the freedom of each nation is bound up in the freedom of all.

I agree with that, but what has been said by hon. members opposite since parliament opened on January 22 to bring home to the people of Canada, to bring home to the isolationists of Canada, that Canada's cause is one with the cause of every free nation in the world? A similar statement is made in the speech from the throne. The very first paragraph reads:

> There no longer can be any question as to the character and scope of the present war. It is a world-wide conflict between irreconcilable forces. On every continent, including the confines of our own, and on all oceans, forces that aim at world domination oppose forces that seek the preservation of freedom. In every quarter of the globe, civilization is confronted by savagery.

It appears to me that in that paragraph lies the reason why the government of Canada should have power to use the whole resources of Canada in men and materials to fight the enemy wherever the enemy may be found.

As I said, the speech of the Prime Minister yesterday to some extent cleared away one of my fears, that is, that the government did not sufficiently realize the urgency of the situation. It is urgent. Speaking for myself and also, I think, for the group with whom I sit, we believe the government should be given the freedom and authority which it seeks. But we are not satisfied to leave the matter there. From what I hear from my own province of British Columbia, I am satisfied that if the plebiscite is put in its present form to the people of Canada without some assurance that not only men will be conscripted but also the wealth and industry and material resources of this country to the last ounce and last cent and that those resources are going to be used, the plebiscite will be defeated in British Columbia just as sure as the people are asked to vote on it. The same thing will happen, I believe, in other provinces.

The Prime Minister in his speech yesterday said that the plebiscite was not a question of conscription but a question of freeing the government's hands. It is just nonsense to talk in that way because, when the people of my province are voting on the plebiscite, they are not voting to free the hands of the government. No they are voting on conscription. When the people in the province of Quebec vote on the plebiscite, what are they voting on? They are voting on the question of conscription. No mere play with words can alter that fact. The plebiscite says that it is for the purpose of freeing the government's hands, but the government's hands are tied only in one respect, in respect only of the compulsory enlistment of men for overseas service. Let the government be frank with the people. Let the government take the people into its confidence. Let the government appeal to the intelligence of the people and tell them exactly what the circumstances are and what they are voting for. Let the government demonstrate itself by its dealings with the people that it believes in those phrases it uses when it says we are fighting for freedom and democracy and such things as that.

It is essential that the government should have this power. But that does not necessarily mean that Canada would send more men out of the country than it is sending now. That would depend a great deal on how the war goes. To be quite frank, I am not sure that anything has been gained so far in a military way because of the men Canada sent out of the country. I am saying that nothing has been gained up until the present time, and that the men could have been used to much better advantage at home. But I say again that this does not mean that I am opposed to sending them out of the country if that is considered necessary. They should be sent where and when they are needed. We are fighting a world-wide war. We are fighting out in the far east. Why in the world should Canada send soldiers to the far east to fight the Japanese when China has her millions who are anxious to fight the Japanese. Not only that, but her soldiers are acclimatized and know and understand the country where the fighting is taking place. Canada's work in these circumstances would be to supply the Chinese with the arms with which to fight. We cannot do both things. We cannot be on the sea and on the fighting front in the far east, and at the same time be producing equipment in the factories in Canada.

Since it is nearly six o'clock I shall try to conclude before the house rises. In my opinion there are two things the government should do if it wants to get a satisfactory affirmative vote on the plebiscite. First, it should give a solemn undertaking, just as binding as the pledges that were given in regard to enlistment for service overseas, that concurrently with the conscription of man-power there shall be conscription of industry and finance. I want to say here as clearly and as definitely as I can that if that is not done, there is great danger that the plebiscite will be defeated. Second, as I have already said, the government should tell the people the urgency of the war situation and indicate clearly to them that it is going, if necessary, to use the power it is asking for—going to use the whole resources of the country. I ask the government to observe the changes that are taking place in the mind of the people all over the world. There is a change of mind in Great Britain. Many people are convinced that our reverses in the far east have been to a large extent due to our refusal in the past to grant or guarantee to the people of the far east equality of status with ourselves. If we do not do that—and there is rising hope that it will be done—we are not going to get as much out of this war as we thought we would.

There are one or two suggestions I should like to make in regard to the taking of the vote. There is danger, unless a great deal of enthusiasm is created in connection with the plebiscite, that the vote will be very small. We know that in parliamentary elections great pressure has to be used to get the people out to the polls. The opposing candidates have an incentive to apply that pressure, and they try to get out every possible vote. But such an incentive will be largely lacking in taking the vote on the plebiscite. There may be a general desire to get out a large vote, but there will be no specific desire unless the thing is well organized. We should see that every possible vote is polled. I understand that the statement has been made by the chief electoral officer that the enumeration of voters and the other work necessary for the taking of the vote will be carried out on a patronage basis. It is a terrible thing that the government should allow a statement like that to be made.

Mr. McLARTY: May I interrupt, for a moment, my hon. friend? I have not heard of any statement such as that having been made. I do not know the circumstances, but I would doubt the correctness of the report.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not read it myself in the press, but I have it from people whose word I accept, that they read it in the Ottawa Journal of last Saturday. It is something with which the government has plenty of time to deal.

May I offer, what seems to me to be a feasible suggestion, that instead of having an enumeration of voters and voters' lists such as are used at a general election, there should be a registration of voters along the same lines as the general registration of 1940. It would be obligatory on each person to go to a particular station to register, and if he were entitled to vote he would receive his ballot and proceed to vote. Of course there may be valid objections to the proposal; I do not know.

Mr. MARTIN: Why does the hon. member say it should be obligatory? It was obligatory.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, it was obligatory in 1940. I am referring, not to the general election but to the national registration conducted by the Department of National War Services. An individual would not be compelled to vote, but he would be at the place where he is entitled to vote, he would receive a ballot, and he could mark it either for or against the proposal or leave it blank. The registration and the voting would be carried out in one operation.

Mr. McLARTY: Would the hon. member make voting compulsory?

Mr. MacINNIS: No, I do not think so. It is the old point: you may take a horse to water but you can't make him drink. You can take voters to the poll, give them ballots, and direct them to the polling booths, but you can't go in with them and compel them to mark their ballots.

Mr. McLARTY: Would the hon. member make it compulsory for everyone to attend?

Mr. MacINNIS: Decidedly. I would make it compulsory for them to register. Everybody was compelled to attend the national registration; there is no reason why that phase of compulsion should not be repeated.

I do not see why this suggestion could not be carried out. At any rate I hope the government will take it into consideration. Let me add that the government must give a definite assurance—one which the people will accept as binding—that its purpose is to conscript not only man-power, but the wealth and industry of this country as well, so that we can fight the war with everything we have.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to occupy a very brief space of time this evening, and shall, so far as may be possible, devote my entire attention to this Bill No. 10 now before the house. When the speech from the throne was brought down on January 22 and it was announced that the ministry would seek release from its pre-election pledge in regard to the man-power situation by means of a plebiscite, there was not the slightest intimation that the bill to be brought down would be anything other than an enabling measure designed to fulfil the promise contained in the speech from the throne and providing a way and means whereby the people would be asked to say whether they released the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government from a past commitment with respect to a particular pledge.

When I made my remarks on January 26 they were predicated on the theory that there would be brought down an enabling measure of a particular kind and nature, patterned in some degree at least upon the Plebiscite Act of 1898, designed to enable the government to secure release from a particular commitment. When the Prime Minister made his speech on the same day the whole underlying reasoning of his statement with regard to the legislation for the plebiscite was based on the same theory. Again in the speech which I made on Wednesday the 18th instant, just prior to the vote, I predicated my remarks on that same theory. Again in the remarks which I made on the resolution preceding the introduction of this bill on Monday last I based my entire argument on the assumption that the bill was to deal with a particular situation in a particular way. And when on the same day the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) made his speech supporting the resolution it was, as I interpreted it, predicated on the same theory, that the house was being asked to pass a measure designed to meet a particular situation which had arisen, and from which the government sought release, and on that theory alone and to meet that situation alone. If the hon. Secretary of State had any other design, I should say that he most skilfully concealed it.

When I spoke on that resolution on Monday last I had not seen the bill. I had tried to get a copy—

Mr. McLARTY: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I stated the specific question that would be asked and stated specifically at that time that it would not be included in the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is another matter. The Secretary of State made it clear that the specific question would not be in the bill. He stated that it would be in the proclamation, and I remember interrupting, or in some manner it developed at that time that the Prime Minister stated that, if necessary, it would be put in the bill.

I tried that day to get a copy of the bill. I tried to get a copy immediately after the resolution passed and the bill was introduced, and again I failed; the bill had not been printed. I tried again early on Tuesday last and again was denied it for the same reason. I am not complaining of any lack of courtesy; the bill had not been printed. I did not apply to the minister personally for a copy of the bill; perhaps I might have done so and probably he would have given me at least a draft of it. But it was not until late on Tuesday that the bill was distributed.

I then discovered really for the first time that the bill as introduced and given first reading was not designed particularly to carry out the announcement in the speech from the throne and the announcement in the Prime Minister's speech of January 26. But to my surprise it was and is general in its nature and is designed to be general, and to import into the constitution of Canada an entirely new principle. This is a general act to be introduced in the statutes of this country, to be there for all time unless it is changed. I am going to speak later about the promise, the very definite promise, which the Prime Minister made this afternoon.

To me that was a rather startling situation, the importation into the constitutional practice of this country of a new constitutional principle, a new instrument in government. It is chiefly because of that that I am participating even briefly in this debate to-night.

This is not only an innovation in our constitution; but, may I say, it is a violation of the political principles on which the Canadian constitution is established, principles which have been developed over the centuries by the matured experience of British statesmen; and I certainly object to the introduction of a new constitutional principle in the system of our government in Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: It was never contemplated.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We can only take things as they are.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend has been told at least four times that we are willing to put the question in the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am coming to that. But this protest is on a matter of principle and I am entitled to put it on the record. I shall deal with the altered situation in due course, and if any credit is coming to the government and the Prime Minister I am quite prepared to give it to them. But I do protest against the introduction of this new departure in constitutional practice. This is not the bill we were promised.

There is one other protest I want to make. This bill, even if altered—and I am going to deal with that in a few minutes—merely sets up the substantive proposals of the government. It leaves the rest to a large number of regulations which we have not seen, but which I understand are ready to be taken to the committee with the bill—regulations which are in themselves legislative in character.

Let me call attention to the elections act. We have in Canada an elections act, containing a very large number of sections; and all the legislative features relating to the carrying on of elections in this country are incorporated in that legislation itself. Accompanying that election law are an equally large or perhaps a larger number of regulations. but those regulations are in no sense legislative; they are explanatory, instructional, interpretative.

Let me make that point clear. Here it is proposed to do by regulation something that under the election law of this country we do by legislation. That itself is a departure from established principles. Of course I have not seen the regulations; none of us have. We do not know what they contain; but I would not be astonished if a large number of sections of the regulations deal with this question of legislating in respect of the plebiscite that is to be held. That, I think, is quite improper. That function should be reserved to parliament.

Let me turn now to the bill itself. As I said before, it merely sets up the substantive law relating to the holding of a plebiscite; and, as I stated a while ago, until it is changed it provides for the taking of a plebiscite on any question that may be submitted by authority of the governor in council, under proclamation. The Prime Minister stated very early in the discussion, I think, that the question would be incorporated in the bill itself, and for that I thank him; but I am going to ask him to go further than that. Unless there would be a violation of some understanding, arrangement or agreement, I suggest to him that this bill should be entirely revamped, so that we shall not even have the appearance of incorporating into the constitutional system of this country the principle of the plebiscite. That I think he should do; and I think he has almost gone that far. Not only should he limit the operation of the statute that will be passed to the holding of this one particular plebiscite; the whole bill should be redrafted on that theory and along the line of the bill that was passed at the time the temperance plebiscite was taken away back in the last century. I believe the proper way to do that would be to withdraw this bill and bring in a new bill, based upon that theory. I do not know whether the government will do that, but I offer the suggestion. I do not think it would delay matters; so far as I am concerned I would undertake that there would be no delay, though of course one would want to see the bill.

If the government will not yield to that suggestion, then, in accordance with the undertaking given explicitly this afternoon, I ask them to give instructions to the committee, of which they will be in complete control, that the bill be revamped in committee along the lines I have suggested. I submit with great seriousness that there is a principle at stake, that this is a violation of the principle of responsible government as we understand it in Canada. If we once incorporate a principle like this into the constitutional practice of Canada,we shall have departed from every principle of representative and parliamentary government that we have followed down through the decades since Canada has been a confederation, and for decades before that under the British constitution. Under our practice the people of the country delegate to their elected representatives power to make laws in accordance with the constitution of the country. The principle of the plebiscite is the negation of responsible government, and so is the referendum. I did not quite understand the reference made by the Prime Minister yesterday to the referendum. I have never heard anyone recommend a referendum; at least I have not done so. I have not mentioned the question of a referendum, which of course stands upon a somewhat different principle. A plebiscite may or may not be binding upon the government that submits it, but a referendum has to do with a particular statute or proposal, and when submitted to the people it becomes binding upon the government. As I understand it, that, in a word, is the distinction between the two. I could not quite appreciate the point of the questions which the Prime Minister directed at me and others across the gangway here. We have never advocated a referendum. We are opposed to both referendum and plebiscite, but since the Prime Minister is bound to have a plebiscite I say, let him have it; let us get it over with; let us limit it to the particular situation and that alone, and let us not hear any more about it as an integral part of the system of responsible government in a British legislature.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend wish me to explain my reference to the plebiscite, in regard to himself?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I have no objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It comes just to this, that my hon. friend wished me to say what I would do if we got a majority, whether I would regard that as an obligation upon the government to introduce conscription. If I were to say anything of that kind, the plebiscite thereby would in reality become a referendum. When the plebiscite was placed before the people, they would then be voting on the question of conscription, which is the very thing the plebiscite is intended not to have them do. A referendum would require the people to make a military and political decision, something which I contend should be the responsibility of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with the Prime Minister on that, but I had never advocated other than a plebiscite, and therefore I could not understand the implication of the questions he directed to me.

The Prime Minister has referred to the plebiscite, and he has argued at great length that the plebiscite would not deal with the question of conscription. Theoretically that is absolutely correct. So far as I am concerned, in whatever part I take in connection with this plebiscite, it should not and will not; but I am going to tell him that in the country I fear it will be for or against conscription. That question will be raised, and, believe me, by his own people. It is raised now, here in this house. It was raised the other day by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), and if I followed him correctly he reaffirmed that issue to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was raised in the recent by-elections.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It may have been. I did not take part in those by-elections; I do not know what occurred, and I am not responsible. But I do know this, that much as the Prime Minister would like to get away from it; much as I—and I am very frank about it—should like to see the plebiscite freed from a discussion for or against conscription, I fear that is what will happen. Being anxious that something should be done in the event of a great tragedy occurring in this war, that is why I want this government to be free; that is why I want this plebiscite to pass; that is why I am going to advise my constituents, at all events, to vote yea and not nay.

I rose primarily for the purpose of voicing my protest against the form in which this legislation has been submitted. If we are to take the Prime Minister's word at its face value, as I am sure we may, then this whole bill should be redrafted. It should be either withdrawn or, when it reaches the committee, revamped to make sure that this parliament is not going to be committed to the principle of the plebiscite as an instrument of government under the British constitutional system under which this parliament is set up and under which it has been carried on during all the years. I hope this appeal will strike a responsive note in the minds of the ministry and their supporters.

I wished to say a few words about the Prime Minister's speech. He made one of the big efforts of his life.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, quite so. He is much too modest, and I really do not think anyone would have accused the Prime Minister of being unduly modest about his public efforts. As a rule they are studied efforts. While he did not use a manuscript yesterday, I am sure he spent a good deal of time in the preparation of that speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not spend two hours.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then, of course, he is much more competent than I thought he was—and very much more competent than I am. I can say that, with all humility and modesty.

Mr. JACKMAN: He has had a lot of practice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, he has had long experience, and a good deal of practice. He has had a good deal of practice in putting up straw men to knock down; and he did that yesterday to a large degree. He has had a great deal of practice in public debates—undoubtedly more than any other man in the house. He is a past master at the art of making the worse appear the better part. There can be no doubt about that, and I pay him that compliment. That, of course, is an art, and the Prime Minister is therefore an artist.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Compliments to-night.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He asked that the public give the government a free hand. For different reasons we want the government to have a free hand. He pointed out the distinction between the legal power possessed at this time by the government, and the moral authority which it possesses, or should possess.

With respect to the legal aspect of the matter, there is not any doubt about it that parliament is sovereign and supreme. I have heard the Prime Minister ring the changes of that phrase on many, many occasions in the house. Parliament has full legal power to pass any legislation. But he bases this on a high moral plane. He says that the one limitation is a moral obligation he owes the people, and he devoted a great deal of his speech to that issue.

He made a case—of course we can have our own opinions as to whether it was a good or a bad one. But he certainly made a case at least to the satisfaction of his followers. Now I put this to him: Is the moral obligation he described of such a nature as to prevent the government from doing what is necessary in wartime, with an invasion threatened, and if the necessities of the situation are as many people believe them to be, or believe that they may become? If the Prime Minister held the opinion that it was necessary to change the mobilization act by eliminating the limiting clause, would he pause to take a plebiscite? Would he do that, at a time when the country was in danger?

Of course he denies the truth of the premise. His suggestion is that the situation is not that bad now, that we are doing nicely. Yet the war comes home to us nearer, nearer and nearer every day. We grant—he grants—I grant—we all grant that parliament has legal power. He says the one defect is the moral obligation. Is that a detriment to doing what we ought to do, if it is the right thing to do? What did the people send us here for? Why did they give my right hon. friend such an overwhelming mandate on March 26, 1940? It was to carry on the war to a successful conclusion, no matter what the cost, no matter what the needs might be. There was no limitation from the people, because conscription as I understand it was not an issue; certainly it was not an issue with me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has asked what I would do in case of invasion, or in a perilous situation such as he has just described. Well, I say the last thing I would do would be to begin compulsorily to recruit men to send them overseas. I would keep the men at home, and see that they were prepared to meet the invasion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes. Would my right hon. friend send them to Seattle? Would he send them to the panhandle of Alaska?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not mind answering that. I regard the moral obligation as one not to send men overseas. But with respect to any technical limitation, should immediate necessity arise—in the panhandle, or any place in the vicinity of the coast of Canada—I certainly would make use of the War Measures Act to see that the men were sent, within these immediate areas, to protect our own shores.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yet that would be illegal, because of the very language the Prime Minister has put in the mobilization act. According to him, it would be immoral to send them beyond the territorial limitations of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The reference was always to overseas. This is quite a different thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the language of the mobilization act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am saying what the moral obligation is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then the Prime Minister would go further than the mobilization act. He would violate the pledge in the mobilization act, because that represents government policy in the most concrete form in which policy can be formulated and set out before the people, namely in an act of parliament. The Prime Minister has proved my thesis.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would get parliament to amend its provision.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, he would get parliament to amend it; and parliament would do right to amend it—and parliament can amend this situation, without going through the form of a plebiscite.

But, we have to have a plebiscite, so let us have it. I have said all I want to say on that point.

An hon. MEMBER: So has the Prime Minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I say the Prime Minister, when he talks about moral obligations—and especially in the light of the admission he has now made—was putting up a straw man to knock down again. He has proved it himself by his utterances here to-night.

In days gone by the Prime Minister and his government have not always been so concerned about political morality. When I heard him speak yesterday I could not help recalling the days of Beauharnois. I remember the political morality of Beauharnois—how the Beauharnois corporation had applied to his government for the passage of an order in council allowing the deflection of a certain number of cubic feet per second of water through their canal at Beauharnois. I remember how the application was held off, and off, and off until the stage had been fully set. Then the government passed an order in council authorizing the diversion. We all know what happened. Hundreds of thousands of dollars contributed by the public of Canada to Beauharnois securities, I shall not say were stolen by the promoters, but were taken from those funds put up by the public and passed along by the promoters to the organizers of the Liberal party.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wonder why my hon. friend would make a statement of that kind? He knows as well as I with respect to Beauharnois that not only was no charge of any kind whatsoever proved against the government, but the government's record in the matter was as straight as anything could possibly be. In addition to that, while hon. members like himself tried to make a case against the government before the public in one, two or three general elections, on every such occasion the public sent back this government with a stronger majority than ever.

My hon. friend had better be careful what he says when he talks about moral obligations. Something can be said from this side of the house, if he begins to reflect upon anyone here.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not reflecting upon the government; I am reflecting upon the Liberal party. I never heard it said that it was actionable to libel a party. If it were, there would be a good many libel actions in this country. My only answer is to ask hon. gentlemen to recall the speech which the Prime Minister made from this side of the chamber in regard to the Beauharnois transaction.

Another thing about pledges. I recall the platform of 1919; I recall the various planks in that platform. Among others was one with respect to the British preference. Does the Prime Minister say that those pledges in the 1919 platform were kept? I remember hearing something about their being just a chart to go by. In his opening speech in the 1940 election the Prime Minister said that there would be extravagant statements made and promises given. Those are not his exact words. That is always done during the course of an election by everyone in the hope of influencing the votes of the electors. I do not think these extreme appeals meet with great success very often. I have been most careful about making concrete pledges because I have always had a horror of not being able to keep any concrete promise which I made. I am leery about making election pledges. I do not think promises of public works and the expenditure of the taxpayers' money and that sort of thing ever brought many votes. I know that actual expenditures on public works prior to an election do not bring votes; all they do is to make enemies. These simply illustrate the futility of using the taxpayers' funds in an attempt to influence votes. Other people's experience may be different, but that is mine.

The Prime Minister made a strong political speech. I thought he was rather truculent in dealing with the political aspects of the question he was debating. When, however, he reached the point where he wanted the help of the country in relieving him of his pledges, he was most conciliatory. It shows how clever the Prime Minister is. He appealed to our better judgment; he appealed to all of us to vote favourably to relieve the government. I could not help but call to mind a couple of passages in the book entitled "The Unknown Country", recently written by Mr. Bruce Hutchison, a gentleman who is not at all unfriendly to the Prime Minister. He sizes up the Prime Minister's character at page 93 as follows:

> The Prime Minister, the egoist and autocrat as Mr. Dafoe calls him, is not merely the first among equals, not just the chief minister. He is the boss.

That is intended to be complimentary, and it is. I think it is true of the Prime Minister. He is the boss over there, and in a measure he is the boss of all of us.

An hon. MEMBER: What about over here?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, you too.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend would not think that I was just the office boy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not even suggested it. I am merely showing the Prime Minister what his own friend is saying about him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can give my hon. friend several more extracts by the same author.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Here is one that is rather mixed; it is complimentary and it sheds some light on the Prime Minister's character. At page 96 the author said:

He is a highly complicated and finely spun creature, half mystic, reading his Bible—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is that wrong?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; that is quite right. I used to do it myself, but I have not had the time to do it for a long time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought my hon. friend must have given its reading up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quote:

—praying daily, believing devoutly in the human soul's immortality—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Anything wrong about that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I ask the Prime Minister to listen to this. Perhaps he will agree with it.

—half ruthless and selfish politician, who can slit an enemy's political throat with a single expert motion of the wrist and without changing expression.

I do not think anyone will ever put me in a book. Certainly I would not want anyone to say that about me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the only way to treat certain classes of enemies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps it is. "Ruthless"—the Prime Minister admits it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend is going to take Mr. Bruce Hutchison as authority for my character, I shall be glad to give him lots of recommendations by Mr. Bruce Hutchison. I am ready to abide by Mr. Hutchison's decision.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think he is a friendly critic.

An hon. MEMBER: On that same page he says the Prime Minister is a great man.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly he does. I have not the time to read it all, but I hope hon. members will read this book. Perhaps I have been a little facetious, but I want to be serious for a minute. The Prime Minister's whole position, as indicated by his speeches and his requests, ignores the principle that the safety of the state is paramount in war time and that pledges given long anterior to the happening of a given event must and should give way before the realities of an occasion such as that with which the nation is faced to-day. That is the factor which should override everything. The time for parliament to act is when that situation presents itself. We may disagree as to whether the time has arrived.

I have been greatly interested the last day or two in reading what has occurred in Great Britain with respect to India. Anybody who has read Mr. Churchill's speeches in days gone by before he formed his national government must know that in season and out of season he combated from first to last the proposal to give self-government to India. He was the bulwark of the forces that opposed dominion status, if I recall correctly, and yet without any mandate from anybody save and except the situation which has grown out of the necessities of the war—I am not questioning his decision; I do not know enough about it to say whether it is wise or not—it is contemplated now to give India at least dominion status, perhaps something more, as part of this war effort. Did he pause to hold a plebiscite?

The Prime Minister said that the government must have full power. I agree absolutely. No government could undertake to carry on this war without full power. That is axiomatic; that is fundamental. The Prime Minister limited his powers by his own action, and of course he has to be released. He should have full power. No one will deny that proposal for one moment. We may differ only in the method of giving him that full power. We say that the people's elected representatives can do it under our constitutional practice, under the powers delegated to us. The Prime Minister says that that is not good enough. Let us give him full power to conduct an all-out war effort by all means, even if we do differ about the method by which that is to be attained.

I have one other brief observation which perhaps would have come in better in the early part of my remarks. If this bill is not altered, if it is not restricted to a specific case of one plebiscite, I say that we shall cast responsible government out of the window and substitute therefor the principle of government by plebiscite.

The Prime Minister expressed great concern as to public opinion outside Canada, particularly in Britain and the United States, with regard to the government's war effort. I say to him that he may well be concerned about public opinion concerning the government's war effort, not in respect of the things that have been done, because most peoples think we have done well and I think so too, but in respect of the self-imposed limitation on our war effort. That is what the Prime Minister is concerned about, or he would never have adverted to it in the course of his speech yesterday. He knows as I know, and as I read in the United States press, that the fact that this government has not full power to do any and everything in relation to the war has called forth a good deal of adverse criticism. I have seen it. In the United Kingdom they wonder why we have not full powers of mobilization. They are too polite to say so publicly. They would say publicly, they do say publicly, that it is none of their business, and they refuse to be drawn into a discussion over it. Nevertheless they are wondering about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are they wondering about Australia too?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but conditions are a little different there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And about South Africa, too, and Northern Ireland?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let me say to my right hon. friend in respect of Australia that if the Australian people were to-day to decide this question, does he doubt what they would decide when every man in Australia has been called to the colours for the defence of his country? If that defence lies beyond the seas, they will be sent there. With respect to South Africa, I think we should be careful what we say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Be careful what you say about any of them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hold this view, that if it were not for one man South Africa would be neutral in this war. That is my view. That, however, is not very germane to what I have to say.

I now urge the government to put this plebiscite through just as quickly as possible by means of a bill in redrafted form. I think the government should submit to the house at some stage—I presume it should be when the special committee reports—the regulations so that those of us who are not on the special committee may be accorded an opportunity to review them before they become law.

Mr. McLARTY: There will be opportunity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a good undertaking, unequivocal. I also think that those parts which are in the nature of legislation should be incorporated in the legislation itself. Those parts which are not in the nature of legislation, those parts which are instructive and those parts which are interpretative, need not be in the form of legislation.

I am not going to detain the house further. I am going to ask the government to withdraw the bill. But if they will not do that, we have the unequivocal undertaking of the Prime Minister that the question to be submitted to the people will be put in the bill, that the bill will be limited to one plebiscite, this proposed plebiscite and this plebiscite only, and that when this plebiscite is over, this bill ceases to be the law.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, during the long weeks of debate in which we have indulged it has been difficult at times to be sure just what are the questions at issue, and there has been so much of almost irrelevant talk and so much of what appears to be a failure to see what are the relevant issues that the whole matter has been somewhat confusing.

It seems to me that there are three main matters which probably it would be fitting for me to touch upon in the short time at my disposal. The first is the question of a plebiscite. I am not sure that I entirely concur in the views of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) with respect to plebiscites. As a matter of fact the plebiscite is a device which is only being tried. It has been experimented with considerably in various parts of the world, but I am not sure that what we know concerning the success or failure of attempts in other lands is sufficiently definite to justify us in drawing any very clear conclusions. But this I think all of us desiring to preserve democracy must grant, that democracy is passing through testing fires. Times are changed; events happen fast; news travels speedily, and opinions change rapidly. Any government, particularly in a democracy, should keep in contact with the will of the governed, for governments must govern in accordance with the will of the governed. How any government in such hectic times as these can keep in contact with the will of the governed over a period of four full years without recourse to some such device as a plebiscite, no member of the opposition has succeeded in making clear to me. It would seem, therefore, that perhaps the plebiscite might be tried. We may find in it an instrument which will assist us greatly in carrying on a democracy.

There are, however, certain conditions which we must take care to see applied. In the first place, I would say that the subject of a plebiscite needs to be rather simple. The wording of the question submitted must also be very clear, and the question itself should be of such a nature that its meaning is not in doubt. Also there should be a thorough education of the people with respect to the whole matter concerning which the plebiscite is being submitted. Then there should be a number of safeguards thrown around the plebiscite to avoid the creeping in of abuses.

So much having been said regarding plebiscites in general, let us turn to the bill before us. This bill in its present form, as I see it, has three main defects. In the first place, it fails to prescribe the length of its own life, and this defect has been laboured by several speakers. Second, it fails to provide for making clear the meaning and significance of the question which is to be put before the people. This also has been dealt with more or less by various speakers. Then, the bill neglects to provide for such adequate education of the people as would enable them completely to apprehend and understand the reason for the plebiscite and the significance of the vote, either yes or no, with respect to the plebiscite.

May I deal with the matter of the length of life of the plebiscite. As the wording in the bill appears—as I think the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) pointed out—there is no automatic limitation of the life of the bill; one would say that this is to be a plebiscite bill in general, is to go on the statute books for an indefinite period of time, and is to be a measure under which any administration at any time could hold a plebiscite on any subject whatsoever. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) reflected upon that situation, and several other speakers have spoken about it. I will grant that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) specifically stated that the bill was not intended to last long. He said, as reported in Hansard, page 822.

> The intention, however, is that the bill should be for one plebiscite only, and that the plebiscite when taken, shall have reference to only one question. That question has already been made clear to the members of the house and the public, but I will take occasion at once to bring again to the attention of the house its exact wording.

Which, by the way, he never did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, yes. The hon. member has not read the whole speech.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, it is just as clear as mud. The members of the Prime Minister's own cabinet would not agree, I am sure, as to the meaning of the bill.

Mr. McLARTY: Oh, yes. The Prime Minister stated it specifically.

Mr. FAIR: What does it mean?

Mr. BLACKMORE: My hon. friend must have a different meaning of "specifically," much different from the one I used when I taught school.

Mr. McLARTY: Just the dictionary meaning.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I turn to the bill itself, in opposition to what the Prime Minister said? In clause 3 it reads as follows:

> (1) The governor in council may by proclamation order the taking of a plebiscite under the provisions of this act.

It does not say whether that is to be in 1942 or in 1952.

> (2) The proclamation shall state fully the question to be submitted to the voters at the plebiscite in the same words and form as it will appear on the ballot papers to be used at the plebiscite.

So far as I can find from a perusal of the bill, there is nothing more specific and definite than those words to limit the life of this bill. Suppose the bill were enacted in its present form, and the Prime Minister, after having given the house the assurance which I have just read, should die, or should fall ill—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Don't be morbid!

Mr. BLACKMORE: —or should for some reason choose to leave public life, we would have nothing whatever to guarantee that the promise he gave there would be kept by his successor as long as the bill remains in the form in which it now appears.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The pledge there is given in the name, not of the Prime Minister only, but of the government. The hon. member will find all members of the government wholly reliable.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are obtaining some assurances, Mr. Speaker, as we go forward. If the bill remained in its present form and a new administration came in—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Which is very likely.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Don't be optimistic!

Mr. BLACKMORE: —a new government, such as a Conservative government, there would be nothing whatsoever to bind the new administration but the Prime Minister's few words. I believe we are perfectly safe in saying that the bill as it is must be changed, otherwise there is no legal protection for the Canadian people against any one of several abuses which might creep in as a result of the application of the bill.

As regards the meaning of the plebiscite, the Prime Minister has contended that the meaning is clear. I maintain that, as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) pointed out the other day, this plebiscite is being used throughout Canada as meaning either of two things. It may mean that if one votes "yes", one brings in conscription, or it may mean that he insists that the Prime Minister shall continue without conscription. The plebiscite could be interpreted as meaning no conscription, just as easily as it could be interpreted as meaning conscription.

There is another difficulty which I think I can show some cause for fearing. I turn to page 823 of Hansard and read a passage from the Prime Minister's own speech yesterday. He said:

As I have said, the purpose is to give the government—I put it in general terms—a perfectly free hand to deal with all matters affecting the war in the manner which, in its judgment, is most in the national interest.

If the Prime Minister's remarks concerning the life of the bill are to be taken as affecting the interpretation of the bill, surely his remarks as to the significance of the bill can likewise be taken as a modifying clause of the meaning of this plebiscite. May I direct the attention of hon. members to another passage of his speech, which they will find on page 826 of Hansard:

This is the issue: Is the government of Canada, in time of war, to have freedom to take whatever action it thinks most advisable with respect to the furtherance of Canada's war effort?

In that passage, the plebiscite is not particularly limited to the raising of men for overseas service. Let us now turn to page 827 of Hansard, and read:

. . . I feel very strongly the time has come when that limitation should be removed—

The Prime Minister there is talking of the power to conscript for overseas service.

—and when the government should be given the utmost freedom to deal with any phase of the war effort as it thinks best subject always to its responsibility to parliament.

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

I turn now to page 833 and read the last passage which I shall read in this connection:

In the presentation of the plebiscite to the electorate the desire of the administration to possess complete freedom of action will of course receive the vigorous and wholehearted support of all members of the government. It will, I hope, receive the support of every member of parliament, and will, I believe, receive the support of the Canadian people.

I believe there are sufficient statements there to make it quite clear that this plebiscite can be interpreted to free the government in respect of far more matters than the raising of men by conscription for overseas service. Some people may say, has the government not all this power under the National Resources Mobilization Act? The government has. But when we remember some of the things that this government has attempted to do under the excuse that they were advantageous to Canada's war effort, one will not hesitate to conclude that there are some things which the rank and file of the people should not interpret as being involved in that act. I refer to the iniquitous recommendations of the Sirois commission. Imagine that, with the statements which are in that speech to give meaning to this plebiscite, the people all over Canada voted "yes"; and the government then declared that the implementing of the report of the Sirois commission was essential to the war effort of Canada; then it would have the mandate of the whole people of Canada to go over the heads of the provinces and implement the recommendations of that report. People may disagree as to the implementing of that report, but I have an idea that when the smoke has cleared away and people realize more fully what that report means, they will certainly not be as much in favour of it as many people have seen fit to be up to the present.

There has been a most dangerous attempt on the part of the government to invade provincial taxation fields, and to do so with the most callous disregard for the commitments, obligations and responsibilities of the provinces. The rebuff which they received in connection with the Sirois report made them a little more cautious, but imagine with what impunity they would go forward if they were backed by a plebiscite such as that upon which we are now going to vote, with the Prime Minister's remarks to give colour to the interpretation of that plebiscite. The wording of the plebiscite should be far more specific and its significance should be far more unmistakable.

The bill should provide for an edequate educational campaign. Upon reading the bill it will be noticed that there is in it no provision whatsoever for the education of the people. Long ago it was said:

> Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.

Especially is it necessary for the people of a democracy to know the truth. Throughout this dominion the truth has been withheld, has been garbled, has been distorted in a way that ought to make the public men of Canada for the past several generations hang their heads in shame. To-day we are reaping some of the harvest that was so plentifully sown by the men who distorted the truth. The people must have the truth; otherwise how can they vote intelligently? For example, in many provinces and in many parts of many provinces there is a complete failure to understand this racial problem which goes to the very heart of Canada. There is failure to sympathize with and appreciate the point of view of Canadians who were raised to speak French. As a result, there is bitterness which there never should be and which would be removed if the full truth were known. This bill should provide for educating the people of Canada from coast to coast concerning the races that live in Canada, their numbers, their needs, their preferences and their history. A full account should be given, without reservation, of the shameful appeals that have been made in election campaigns to Canadians who speak French, when men have stooped to sordidness which will forever constitute a stain upon them, to misinform, to inspire with apprehension and anxiety innocent people.

I was much enlightened by two speeches from the other side of the house, one by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. McDonald) and the other by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot). Many hearing them felt that those hon. members were, shall I say, indelicate in having brought out into the open details of the reprehensible behaviour of which Canadians who speak French had been the victims. I never have been able to find any more successful way of adjusting differences between people than the simple method of telling the truth, finding out just why there is misunderstanding. I fail to see why the application of the same principle would not greatly improve conditions in Canada. Here we are, two great races of people, as it were, those whose blood is drawn from French people and those whose blood is drawn from Anglo-Saxons. I think there are no finer peoples in the world to-day than those two races. I find the French-Canadian people whom I know in every way admirable and estimable, and I see no reason why there should be any prejudice. We are, as it were, two races married. We have a glimpse of ourselves in the midst of a great stream of national life that flows out of a remote past, for which we have no responsibility, and flows into an indefinite future for which we are in some measure responsible. We are similar to a man and wife in a home, with children. We do not wish to break up the home. We do not wish to have a separation or a divorce. If we did wish anything like that, surely a time of such peril as this is not the time to bring the matter to a head. We must come to understand each other. There is only one way in which that can be done; that is, by hearing the facts, sordid as they may be. I can now understand what I have heard men say in this chamber during the four or five years of my sojourn here. I can understand why they have spoken in this way, when I look at the speeches of those two men to whom I have referred. I marvel that the speeches have not been even more extreme.

There should be provision in this bill for an educational campaign from coast to coast, to teach the Canadian people the facts concerning those who dwell with them in this great national household of Canada. The Prime Minister, as reported at page 832 of Hansard, mentioned his desire for an educational campaign, in these words:

> I should hope that the campaign would be made an educational campaign which would help to impress upon the people the necessity of giving the government full power in time of war. I think it can be made that. My hon. friend and I are to-day agreed that the government ought to have this power and we are agreed for the same reason. And the leaders of the other parties are agreed.

But the Prime Minister did not touch what in my judgment is the festering sore which is threatening to break out in eruption, resulting in several kinds of disorder in this country, of which none of us desires even to think. Why not insert in the bill provision for education? While I am referring to this point, may I say that I have never been able to see why the two major parties did not decide to make the last election campaign an educational campaign also. I do not believe the leaders of those parties should be forgiven by generations to come for their neglect to attend to the important matter of educating the people to the truths for which they stand.

When war was declared, in September, 1939, I rose in my place and urged the people concerned that they should go into Quebec and tell the truth; everywhere tell the truth. Is it to be conceived that it could not have been made known to every Canadian at that time how colossal was the preparation that Hitler had made, how terrible a foe was Italy, how charged with dynamic explosiveness was the whole Japanese situation? How much more wisely and sanely, and with how much better feeling all would have gone forward if such had been done. Instead of that, what had we? We had an appeal to the basest prejudices, with every attempt to becloud the issues and distort the facts, I presume in every constituency throughout this country. So I say that in this bill there should be specific clauses providing for the setting aside of an adequate fund to provide for the education of the people.

May I turn now from a consideration of the bill to a brief consideration of the Prime Minister's speech. I agree with the leader of the opposition; I do not know whether the Prime Minister has ever delivered a greater speech in his history. It was great, I thought, in every respect. At the same time, he said things which I think should be pointed out. He spoke of the false position in which the government finds itself. If the government finds itself in a false position, the government has only itself to blame.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There may be smiles, but the more deeply we probe into that statement, the more truth we shall find in it. As reported on page 827 of Hansard, the Prime Minister makes one remark which is worthy of our attention:

> I would say further, that not only is it putting the government in a false position to have its hands tied at this time, in the manner indicated, and that it is putting parliament in a false position, but it is also putting Canada in a false position, before all countries of the world, including her allies in the war.

Then at page 833 there is another passage which I believe is worthy of note:

> I do not believe it will be possible for an administration to carry on, in a time like this, with the sense it ought to have of complete authority without being given complete power. It should not be put perpetually in a false position just because of some obligation necessary at an earlier time, but which, as I explained in the debate on the address, is having an effect quite different from that originally intended in its relation to the state of affairs that exists at the present moment.

I said a moment ago that the government had only itself to thank. There was no reason why the government or any member of the Liberal party should have committed himself on the question of conscription. The leader of the opposition has repeatedly declared that he did not make conscription an issue in his constituency. Why did any of the Liberals need to make it an issue? I would say that any grown man over the age of twenty-five, equipped with even a smattering of the facts, should have been able to foresee that we were preparing to enter, or that we were already entered into a conflict which would become so terrible as to render it necessary that the government in control of the country should have the freest hand possible. In the light of that fact can anyone possibly excuse a man for committing himself on any platform in the dominion on the question of conscription? Why was it done? Simply to get some sordid votes; that is all.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Political advantage and sculduggery.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is all. That was a noble object!—simply to beat somebody else.

Mr. GRANT: What did you run for?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If my hon. friend will come around to see me some time, it may take a little time to tell him, but he will be quite satisfied. In respect of what I ran for I have a record I can be proud of—which is a good deal more than my hon. friend can say.

It may be said that the Liberals feared they would lose the election. It seems to me I have heard that the British people were left unprepared because the government of the day feared the loss of an election. With that in mind they risked the loss of an empire, and the welfare of 600,000,000 people, rather than lose the election.

Mr. HANSELL: There is no answer to that one.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The Conservatives were not in any way disposed to make the conscription question an issue. They had made it abundantly clear that they did not wish to fight on that issue. That fact removes from under the feet of the Liberals the last vestige of excuse for making conscription an issue. Why did not both parties go out sensibly, sanely, patriotically and with public spirit and say to everyone, "Now, folks, we are in a most terrible war; heaven only knows what may happen in the next four years; we do not dare to tell you."

Mr. WOOD: Offer them $25 a month.

An hon. MEMBER: They are entitled to it, too.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Gems of wisdom.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Remarks like that help a person to understand why the Liberals took their stand on conscription, and why they lacked vision. Was it because the people in power lacked vision, or did they just lack courage?

The Prime Minister expressed great anxiety and concern about the fact that the government now has its hands tied. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if the people of Canada vote "no," where will the government be? Its hands will be worse than tied; they will be manacled. Yes; they will be hanging alongside the government's sides, and the whole thing will be inside a plaster-of-paris cast.

Mr. POULIOT: It will be the best solution for the defence of Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall leave my hon. friend to explain himself at length some time. If the government wishes to be sure of freeing its hands, then the last thing it ought to have is a plebiscite.

To avoid the possibility of defeat of the plebiscite, which may possibly come about, I am going to make a suggestion, and then I shall have completed my remarks. The people of Canada, from coast to coast, those who are informed and those who think, have begun to realize that there is some sort of dead-hand lying over the whole war effort of this country. I am neither minimizing nor disparaging what the government has done. But it is certain that in a country like Canada, with such bountiful resources, but which at the end of this length of time still has as many unemployed, there is something radically wrong—and simply passing a plebiscite on conscription is not going to set it right. What the people want is that the full, majestic, magnificent strength of this dominion shall be mobilized. People now realize that the devices being used by the government cannot achieve that end, and they are looking for leadership along some new line which will achieve it.

I would suggest to the government even at this late stage that along with the plebiscite in which they are asking if the people are willing that the hands of the government be freed to conscript men for overseas service, if needs be, they ask the further question as to whether the people would be willing to leave the government free so that it could adopt any new financial system which it might find to be advantageous.

I am going to suggest that the last words in the resolution passed by the legislature of Alberta be given careful attention. Those words were:

> The people should be given an opportunity of approving or disapproving not only of the conscription of man-power but also the complete mobilization of all our material and financial resources through the effective control and issue of all currency and credit by the dominion government.

This was a laughing matter perhaps four years ago. As the days pass, however, the danger that this country will be defeated is increasing, because this matter of money is being neglected. It is by no means a laughing matter to-day, nor can it be taken in any degree lightly. This bill should be redrafted so as to indicate the limit of its life, and to provide for adequate education; and the plebiscite should be revised so as to make its meaning and significance explicit. It should also contain facilities to enable the people to express their opinions on monetary systems.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, while I have been a member of the House of Commons I have found it to be a place of very much kindness. While I am here I hope I shall never be charged with showing any lack of ordinary Christian charity toward those who sit round me or hon. gentlemen opposite. To-day we are passing through a great battle of nerves, and the affairs of state place a heavy strain on the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the cabinet and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson).

The government, however, should not be afraid to tell the people when they have made a mistake because, as I have said on former occasions, the people do not expect their leaders to be gods. There has never been a question in Canada concerning which all people have ever been united, and that arises because of our population and other matters. The plebiscite question is one on which different views are held.

Before discussing the plebiscite in detail, may I compliment Mr. Speaker, Mr. Deputy Speaker and the splendid Clerk of the House upon the very kind and efficient way in which they have handled the proceedings of the house in these critical times. They have done their duty as they have seen it, and I believe they have won the admiration and respect of the members and the people of Canada. True it is that sometimes I did not agree with them, but the fact that I say so, does not make it so.

Next December 9 it will have been twenty-one years since I was first elected to this house. As I say I have found that the house has discussed all these questions in a calm way. There is no necessity for anybody getting rattled at the present time over the questions that are before us. I am one of the opposition, but I believe the opposition has given the government pretty good independent support in this war. That is what we were sent here for, to offer criticism, on behalf of the man on the street, on behalf of the people in our constituencies and the people of Canada generally. They may not like the way in which the war is going on, but it is no disparagement of the Prime Minister, of any of his ministers or of the government of the day if criticism is offered. I believe in the parliamentary system. They do not believe in it in Germany and Japan, but in this country we have a parliamentary system in a democracy. There cannot be a democracy without a free press. That is why I have urged the government to abolish the censorship as they have done in England. If that had been done, we would have avoided many of the mistakes which have been made in the giving of news and information to the people.

I think I have known the Prime Minister longer than anyone else in this house, and I have never had anything but respect for him while he has held his present position. I also have a great deal of admiration for the leader of the opposition. This party was not disgraced in the last election because it polled nearly one-half of the total vote in the country. Our leader was defeated, and the hon. member for York-Sunbury took up this work and has done well. He has not been very well, and his conduct of this job has won him the respect and admiration, not only of his colleagues over here but, I believe, on all sides of the house. He has won considerable public estimation in the country. He is not here at present this evening. Probably if he were, I would not be saying this, but it is true.

As I said in the first speech I made when this present parliament was opened in 1940, and when the government were being criticized, after all is said and done the people have elected them. They won 178 seats and they are the government of the day in a democracy. The people put them there. As I said at that time, they were a government of Canadians in Canada. Aside from the question of man-power, which they have misjudged, I think they have done a great deal of good useful work. Their efforts so far have been considerable, and Canada's war effort is very creditable in many ways, but they have not done one-half of what they should have done nor enough for a total war effort. They misjudged things in connection with man-power, in connection with the European and Pacific situation, in connection with the disarmament movement before the war. The members of the opposition have endeavoured to give the government good and independent support on the whole, for a total effort. The government has very little about which to complain except on this one question of the plebiscite, which never should have been started.

This is an involved question and one cannot expect everybody to agree. We are not all constituted the same. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I am a little shortsighted. I can speak without notes for forty mintues, but I have a few short quotations I should like to make. I did not want to bring in a lot of books, so I have these quotations typewritten in my notes.

One thing has been shown since the start of the war—the tremendous popularity of the monarchy. We had evidence of this during the visit of the king and queen in May, 1939, and again last December on the king's birthday. The king and queen have been most magnificent in giving leadership in these critical war days. As I say, one of the cardinal things we have noticed in Canada is the popularity of the monarchy, but with that we have seen the decay of parliament and the decline of the House of Commons. This is evidenced by the mistakes that have been made in allowing our functions to be usurped. We come here for a few days; then the doors are locked and we go home. Our colleagues in another place have been here for four or five hours since last June. Why can we not follow the example of London and Washington and have a joint session of the two houses, as I urged here in 1939 and 1940? This is what should be done during the course of this greatest war in the history of the world. But nothing has been done. Some very good talent is to be found in the other part of this building, men of great experience and ability, but no use has been made of their services in connection with war work. That is one of the mistakes which have been made.

I do not mean any disparagement when I say that the Prime Minister has been conducting this war as a Liberal war. The Asquith government went out of office in England during the last war for the same reason. The conduct of this war is much more difficult than was the conduct of the great war, and I think the Prime Minister would have been well advised to have hearkened to the hand-writing on the wall. Instead of conducting the war in the way in which it has been conducted, we should have had a man like Lord Beaverbrook or used the great talents and ability of Viscount Bennett in the war cabinet in London. We all know the wonderful work that Lord Beaverbrook has done in production in the old land. He was born at Maple in York, although he is considered to be a Nova Scotian. I was sorry that he did not accompany the Prime Minister of Great Britain when he came here. Lord Beaverbrook is a remarkable man and a great Canadian. Considerable could be done in London by way of better managing of our part of this war. This is not the battle of the Atlantic; it is the battle of the seven seas, and there must be a new management of our own war effort. This has been shown by results in the Pacific. When the Right Hon. Mr. Menzies addressed this chamber last June he pointed this out. The government knew about it; they could see the hand-writing on the wall, but nothing was done till too late, and the disaster there shocked the world.

The government are a board of directors appointed by the people to conduct the war. The responsibility is theirs. It is a difficult job, and I sometimes fear for the health of some of the leaders. The strain they undergo is one of the tragedies of this game, and I hope it will not injure their health.

On the second reading the principle of the bill is considered. This is set out in the splendid textbook I hold in my hand, Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms. I remember reading what the assistant clerk, now the clerk of the British House of Commons said about this textbook. Standing order 75, at page 216, deals with the second reading. I should like to quote citation 753, which reads:

> The second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure.

Citation 755 reads:

> It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

For that reason I oppose the principle of this bill. I should like to point out the cause and effect of this bill. What has been the cause for this sudden departure from parliamentary institutions and all we have had here for over one hundred years? As I said the other day, a civil war was fought in England over the very principle involved in this plebiscite, the control of the executive by parliament. In my opinion the cause for this plebiscite was simply a smoke-screen, a bit of shadow-boxing to cover up the mistakes which have been made about man-power since the war started and the disaster in the Pacific. It is simply a smoke-screen to cover the Pacific and Singapore. Who proposed this plebiscite? Who asked for it? What will it cost? It will do nothing whatever to beat Hitler.

I was very much disappointed with the speech which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who is not here to-night, made in this house on February 4. The government can spend all this money like water on a useless plebiscite and on the league but has not a dollar to pay the poor dependents, the wives and children of the soldiers, many of whom are suffering from lack of a bonus, from lack of fuel and all that kind of thing. Yet the Minister of Finance brings down a page and a half of an order in council to give a cost of living bonus to civil servants who are staying at home and not going to the war. In addition to their $175 a month, they are being given a war bonus, and we cannot get a dollar for the dependents of the soldiers, or free fares for the soldiers on the railways, or a national insurance scheme. History will score this disgraceful treatment of our forces.

This plebiscite will not amount to a thing in beating Hitler. The effect of it will be like the effect of all commissions and committees in this country—to kill a lot of time, and delay and hinder and prevent this House of Commons from fulfilling the function for which it was created and urging upon the government an increased war effort. This is no time for such a reference to the people, and the plebiscite has already done a lot of harm in this country. I was sorry to hear some of the language used in this house to-night by two most honoured and respected leaders. I know that it was done in the heat of debate and that the battle of nerves is pretty hard on both of them, but I was sorry to see it.

If Hitler comes here—and he is not far from our shores now—he will take no plebiscite. What he will do will be to hang the plebiscite and all connected with it on a sour apple tree, like John Brown's body. That is what he will do with it, and Hitler and Japan are not, I repeat, far from our shores now. When the members representing British Columbia constituencies urged the government to do something to solve the Japanese question out there, why, on the same plebiscite reasoning, did the government not hold a plebiscite on the question of moving these Japanese—twenty-eight or thirty thousand at the maximum and twenty thousand at the minimum—away from the coast province? It did not hold a plebiscite on that because the members would not stand for it.

This vote will probably be taken in May or June, which are going to be two of the most fateful months the world has ever seen. In those months will be decided the fate of civilization, perhaps for the next two hundred years. It will not be home defence that will count then. The decisive battles will be fought in the Atlantic and the Pacific, in Asia, and Europe, and the Mediterranean. In the Pacific we have lost the command of the sea and you cannot keep up with the Japanese who are moving around to these various islands in the Pacific—no, not if you had one million men, as I quoted Mr. Churchill early in the session. They have command of the air, aeroplane carriers, all the deadly instruments of war and have battered the fleets of Britain and the United States in the Pacific. The danger to the people of this country is great. Our fate will be decided, not by home defence, but in the Pacific; in the battle of the Atlantic, which is really a misnomer because it should be called the battle of the seven seas; and in the Mediterranean and on the Russo-German front, whether we like it or not. They can go like a circus from place to place with sea and air supremacy.

You cannot conduct this war with a plebiscite. It must be conducted by the House of Commons. Under the constitution you must either support the government or oppose it, and you cannot change the constitution by a plebiscite. The members of the House of Commons have not only the right but the duty to come here and report what they find wrong with our war effort and in connection with our armed forces and economic effort, and I say the critics have been right. It is their duty to point out what is wrong.

On the second reading of the bill you can discuss the principle, but you cannot discuss the bill in detail clause by clause. The interpretation clause provides that "during a plebiscite" means the period between the date of the proclamation ordering the plebiscite issued under section 3 of this act, and the close of the poll on polling day. That is what the definition says about the time of the plebiscite. But if Hitler comes to this country first, what are you going to do about it? He will not hold any plebiscite. He did not hold one in Belgium or Holland or France and these other countries he has conquered.

By clause 3 of the bill it is provided that the governor-in-council "may" by proclamation order the taking of a plebiscite. The "may" is enabling, permissive; it is not mandatory. The governor in council has control of the plebiscite election. But if Hitler or the Japanese come here, there will be no vote at all, because the governor-in-council can call it off then, or at any time.

Section 5 of the bill provides that any person who shall have voted at the plebiscite shall not be exempted from military training. That smacks of conscription, and it is conscription. There is no such provision in the statute which Attorney-General Conant brought down in the Ontario legislature for soldier votes abroad and at home. He has given a free and untrammelled right of way to all the soldiers overseas and all those wearing the service uniform to vote at the next election. He is not taking away from them by conscriptive methods anything at all as we are, their right to apply for exemption, postponement of training, and all that kind of thing.

Another section of the bill provides that members of the forces, irrespective of age, shall be entitled to vote on the plebiscite. Another section deals with the manner of voting by a qualfied voter whose name is not on the official list of voters. Anybody who knows anything about elections, especially in districts where there is a foreign-born population, knows that this will lead to a lot of telegraphing of votes. Persons will be going round to various booths and voting if their names are not on the lists. I remember an election once where the candidate got 178 votes at one poll, but the "8" was struck off, so that this candidate got only 17 votes. I do not like to see that kind of thing, and voting by those not on the lists.

When the seed planted by this plebiscite has reached its maturity, what will the harvest be? It will not fill the farmers' barns with crops. It will empty their pockets of their money, and their taxes will pay for it. All the harvest will be that the people will not know what they are voting on, and when the votes are counted up, half the ballots will be spoiled because the people did not know what they were voting on. It puts me in mind of the battle of Dundee. I see the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) sitting over there with his colleague. They know about the battle of Dundee where no one knew who won it. Some say we won; some say they won; some say nobody won—and that is how it will be when the plebiscite ballots are counted.

It is not right to place private government members of parliament in the position in which this plebiscite places them, against their own convictions. We are being asked to relieve the government of responsibility for policy by submitting to the people a plebiscite asking them to vote "yes" or "no." It is parliament's duty to frame policy; and if we are not here for that, the government had better lock the doors of this house and send the members home for good.

A "yes" vote is simply a vote of entire confidence in the government. I do not know whether I shall vote or not. My constituents have the right to vote the way they see fit, and it is not for me to advise or interfere with them. I am not going to be a party to any snap or humbug vote or anything in the nature of a vote when the people do not know what they are voting for. They do not know what will happen if they vote "yes", or what will happen if they vote "no"; they are bewildered. To the average voter the thing is a genuine Chinese puzzle without any issue or sense. What is going to be the result of it? What was the cause of it?

Yesterday the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said that conscription is not an issue in this vote, that the issue is a pledge of the government. Let me remind him that Mr. Roosevelt, the President of the United States, gave a pledge in the last election that there would never be a contingent of troops sent out of the country if he were returned; he would stop at measures just short of war and they would keep out of war. What happened? Last June he carried the army vote by a majority of only one. The isolationists were so strong that the majority for the repeal of the Neutrality Act was only fourteen votes. Things looked pretty dark for the administration until Pearl Harbour changed the whole situation and the whole nation was united. Are we going to wait to take a plebiscite until we have a second Pearl Harbour in Victoria or Vancouver; because, as Prime Minister Churchill told the House of Commons in London publicly the other day—it was reported in Hansard of January 28 there—for the next year or two, until the allies get command of the sea in the Pacific again, we must expect these visits from the enemy in the Pacific, and for Japan to roam all over. Are we to wait until then before we do anything?

So much for the bill. My leader is quite correct in what he says about the plebiscite as being contrary to the constitution. I have here an authority for my statement—and I shall quote it in a moment—because this matter has been up in the house before. This particular plebiscite method of doing business is subversive of our constitution, which is derived from that of Great Britain. It takes away the collective responsibility of the cabinet of the day and cabinet solidarity. Instead of the public being approached through a plebiscite, the issue should have been embodied in a government measure in the house here, and if rejected, the government falls. I believe the house would have released the government from any pledge in this connection. Why are they worrying about pledges? I do not know. As the late J. Israel Tarte said, elections are not won with prayers, and platforms are made to get in on, not to stand on—and so are pledges.

I might point out that the Prime Minister, when replying to me in 1937 concerning a national register, gave a pledge in this house that the government would never again send overseas an expeditionary force; he said that the danger to Canada was minor in degree and secondary in origin—which statement is shown to have been incorrect. In addition, what did he do in the Atlantic conference, which binds Canada whether we like it or not? At the last imperial conference, in 1937, when we refused to give anything to the Singapore base, or support an empire shipping policy, although it meant more to Canada than almost any other country in the way of protection in the Pacific, he said, "We have no commitments. Parliament will decide." How was the pledge carried out?

Take the Hyde Park and Ogdensburg agreements. We have a so-called joint board of defence, which is more board than defence; in fact, it seems to be all board. That body has made recommendations of expenditures running to two or three hundred million dollars—all over the head of parliament, although we are in session. In the Hyde Park agreement are pledges binding on Canada, also the giving away of bases from Newfoundland to British Guiana and elsewhere. In return for fifty ships, some of which have been returned, and others of which are very little use, we gave away parts of our empire. This binds Canada, although it was not a party to it.

At the Atlantic conference they decided that we would be at war if war came to the United States and Japan; Britain would join the United States, and that bound Canada. We have never yet had a defence or foreign policy. We have never yet had a foreign policy except a policy of day to day and hand to mouth. These commitments which are being made between the governments of Great Britain and the United States bind Canada, because when Britain is at war, Canada is at war.

I do not agree with the head of that high-sounding Department of National War Services, which with all its circuitous ways should have been abolished long ago, when he allows Mr. Brockington to make such statements in literature as these: "King George did not declare war for us; we declared war for him."

When war broke out on September 3, 1939, although it took ten days for this parliament to declare war, Hitler did not wait for our declaration of war of September 10; he sank the Athenia on September 3, with a hundred and thirty Canadians and other Britishers on board. It needed no declaration from us to become involved, because when Britain is at war, Canada is at war also. Another instance of a pledge which has not been carried out is the Ogdensburg agreement.

Then, more recently, how was war declared on Japan? I had asked the Prime Minister on June 12 last whether, during the parliamentary recess, there was to be any further appeasement of Japan. He said he was not an appeaser, he was a conciliator. Under the appeasement policy Japan received from us five million bushels of grain. One of those who spoke in connection with that particular subject when Japan declared war on December 7 was the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), who for many years supported pacifist doctrines and resisted even the moderate votes which were proposed for armaments in 1937 and 1938. He gave a long interview last December to the press about Japan, in which, according to him, Japan could not last any time at all. His prediction has proved to be incorrect and his facts out of date or judgment.

I come to this point. During the time we were giving away the Ottawa valley and other power rights, allowing increases in telephone rates, and when large vested interests were threatening municipal control over streets, it was proposed to adopt in Canada the municipal policy of submitting to the ratepayers at every general election great national questions in peace time. In this connection I would refer to what was said by the late honoured Secretary of State, Mr. Rinfret, in corroboration of what our leader has said. A report of the discussion will be found in Hansard of March 17, 1939, page 2186. The constitutional aspects of the matter were debated; and it was pointed out, in relation to an act of June 13, 1898, respecting the prohibition of importation and manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, that a vote was all right; but there was no legislation, although Sir Wilfrid Laurier had pledged legislation.

I recall an occasion when Sir Wilfrid, who was very popular with those who came to interview him, saw that one member of a delegation did not have a chair, and he would not sit down himself but got the delegate a chair. His name was the Reverend Mr. Huxtable, who addressed him as "Sir Wilfrid." Sir Wilfrid said, "Don't call me Sir Wilfrid; I am plain Mr. Laurier, a democrat to the hilt." But a few months afterwards Sir Wilfrid forgot his pledge and took a knighthood—quite rightly and quite properly; he was held in very affectionate regard and respect by the people not only of his own province but of others.

The Secretary of State pointed out what the government did after the vote to which I have referred was held. What they did was to place the Canada Temperance Act on the statute books of a later day. It provided for local referendums, and under that act the Secretary of State of that day said that some two hundred separate local votes were held throughout the country and in Ontario and Manitoba. The late Minister of Justice, the very able and respected minister whom we all miss so much this session, opposed plebiscites on March 17, 1939, and he gave some reasons for not applying it to federal matters at general elections. He said it could not be applied in an emergency. I told my leader some years ago on referendums that if war came, I would never see Mr. General Election become commander in chief of the British forces; I would never with my vote allow Mr. General Election to become admiral of the British fleet, because before Mr. General Election could open his ballot boxes, the enemy would sail and fly up the St. Lawrence and bomb the citadel at Quebec and this building and the Chateau Laurier hotel. I am still of that opinion. My present leader is absolutely correct in saying that the plebiscite is contrary to the constitution and that the matter should be dealt with by way of a special act and not a general act, because under the Dominion Elections Act you cannot submit a question, and that is why they have to bring in this bill. It will have to go to the senate, and I shall be very much surprised if it does not get a rough reception in another place.

In 1939 the then Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret), pointed out the time this referendum will take. There are no standing lists in Ottawa; it will take seven or eight weeks to prepare them. I think it was Mr. Devlin in the home rule debate who said the House of Commons was at its best when it was frank. We want some frankness from the government as to the management of this war—the better management. It is the duty of this house to be frank and to criticize the measures placed before it, because criticism is a tonic to government action. This government has refused to do anything in regard to some of the main measures but was urged on by public opinion. It was so in regard to man-power and many articles of munitions and in many other ways.

I believe that the man on the street has a right to be heard here in criticism. In my opinion the criticism by the opposition has been very moderate. The man in the street has a right to be heard and the only way he can be heard is through a member of parliament, because the private member is the connecting link between the government of the day and the electorate; if he ceases to function, parliamentary government is at an end. If the press is to be muzzled by censors on this plebiscite then the public is not going to learn the facts.

I for one do not intend to fall into this plebiscite trap. I know something about the conduct of elections and the mysterious and devious ways sometimes used to win them, and I am opposed to it. I am not going to be manoeuvred into a wrong position by the jokers in this bill, and there are many of them. I am not going to be told to put a cross "yes" or "no" to any such question, or to be a party to such tomfoolery. I have seen too much manipulation of ballot boxes in my day, and I never had much organization, no more than any of the other Toronto members; we have had very little organization except in a voluntary way.

The people do not believe in this plebiscite. The Prime Minister evidently looks on it as a straight vote of confidence; if you vote "yes," you vote confidence. Mr. Churchill asked for a vote of confidence, but he asked for it in the right way, in the House of Commons under the constitution, and that is the way it should be done here.

The government may get a surprise in the ballot boxes. With regard to the referendum or plebiscite—it is a distinction without a difference, a play on words—I believe the people are not going to be fooled. You can fool some of the people some of the time, but you cannot fool all the people all the time as to an important matter like this, especially when it means life or death with the enemy close to our shores.

In 1937 I predicted the war over Japan on a vote for the Tokyo legation, and my late leader Viscount Bennett said I represented a large body of public opinion in this country that did not like the way in which Canada had been for many years a drag on the mother country. As I said in that debate, one of our chief errors was the refusal to cooperate with the motherland in connection with Singapore and the shipping conference. Britain at that time had two thousand fewer ships than in 1914 and five million more mouths to feed.

Conscription was not an issue in the last election. I never heard of it; in fact I had a difference of opinion with one of our leaders about this question. I did not speak in the last election except in my own constituency, and no leader is going to tie me down. I am not a yes-man or a nodder, or a follow your leader; your leader is your policy; I never have been and do not intend to be now. It is a great mistake for the present Prime Minister to ask his followers to agree with him on this and no government member should be placed in this position.

The Prime Minister asked the question and gave the answer. I have the answer here. The question was "to release the government" from its pledge. I am in favour of striking out all the words after "release the government". If he will have the question read: "Are you in favour of releasing the government?" to be answered by a straight "yes" or "no", the people would understand. If the Prime Minister is appealing to Caesar, let him appeal and be bound by the answer.

If there were a little more humour in the house, tempers would not be so frayed or rattled. I think this plebiscite is unsportsmanlike. I was at a rugby game not long ago, where there were some five thousand people; one side began to yell, "We don't like the ref, we don't like the ref", meaning the referee. We do not like the referendum. The men are all right. I look on this vote as war according to Hollywood and not war according to Hitler. The people are not going to be fooled by any such farce. I have seen voters in the voting booths decline to vote on such similar questions because they do not like to be humbugged and did not understand them. The average voter knows as much as members of the House of Commons and the cabinet; he does not need any meetings to tell him how to vote. I think it is an insult to ask members of parliament to go to the constituencies and pull the chestnuts out of the fire for the government on such a proposal. I do not intend to do it; my constituents can vote themselves as they see fit. I do not know whether I am going to vote myself on the question, because I took a stand in this house for rearmament all along the line when it was very unpopular and not fashionable, and it is very unwise now for some hon. members to throw cheap sneers at those who in season and out of season, for years before the war, urged a larger army, navy and air force.

The German barbarians with their mechanized hordes have destroyed the whole of Europe, and they are not far from our shores now. I do not think you are going to fool any of the people at the ballot box by this sort of thing. Before the ballot boxes can be opened the enemy may arrive on the Pacific or the Atlantic coast, with the tramping of feet, the loud speaker, the cracking of the whip, the sergeant-major, the gestapo, and all that sort of thing. He may decide the matter long before the ballot boxes are opened. I like the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght); he has been very kind to everyone, but I do not like some of his arguments about the ballot on the plebiscite. Neither do I like those of his young friend, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford), who sits beside him. I think it would be far better if in future he used a little more temperate language with regard to those who do not agree with him. I hope it may never be said of me that in my twenty-one years in this house I ever failed to show a lack of ordinary Christian charity toward my political opponents.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have not so far availed myself of the opportunity to speak on this plebiscite issue. Much has been said about it since the opening of parliament some weeks ago. I think I can agree with some of those who have already eulogized the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on his speech yesterday. I believe he is a past master at saying a great deal, yet so speaking as to avoid any possibility of being pinned down. Sometimes I think he is rather like a jack rabbit; just when you think you have him, he is not there. I quite agree with those who have expressed the opinion that yesterday he excelled himself in oratory and forcefulness, and as he was speaking I felt that if only he had made that speech during the early part of this session, instead of waiting until yesterday, he might have saved a great deal of time. Sometimes, however, first impressions are best, and I believe that as we seriously analyse the Prime Minister's speech of yesterday we may discover some things that perhaps he overlooked or some things that perhaps he did not very brilliantly cover up.

Yesterday the right hon. gentleman said that the question he was going to ask the public to answer in this plebiscite was as follows:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

Personally, Mr. Speaker, I think this question is so ambiguous that it is not capable of even one interpretation. Some hon. members have said that it is capable of many interpretations, but I cannot interpret it at all. Already under the mobilization act the government has perfect freedom; it is not restricted at all in its method of raising men for military service. That has nothing at all to do with the restriction. Where the government is restricted is in respect of where the men who are raised should fight the war. I want to point that out, because we have been told here, and the Prime Minister made the statement himself, that this plebiscite has nothing whatever to do with conscription. Yet all our arguments have centred around whether or not the government could conscript men for overseas service. Therefore the government is not restricted as to the methods of raising men for military service, but rather as to the purpose for which the men who are raised for military service should be used. Are they going to be raised to serve at home, or are they going to be raised to serve abroad? But that is not contained in the question which is to be submitted to the people. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that the question is so very ambiguous that personally I do not know what it does mean. I should like to ask the Prime Minister what it means. He says that it does not mean the conscription of men for overseas service; yet throughout his speech yesterday he continually mentioned the matter of overseas service.

When the Prime Minister mentioned yesterday the question that was to be submitted to the people, he went on to say this, as it appears at page 823 of Hansard:

> As I said, at the time of speaking on the address, the question is very simple in its language and meaning and is a straightforward one.

Yet a few lines further down, in almost the next breath, he went on to say:

> My purpose this afternoon is not so much to attempt to add to what has been said but rather, if possible, to clear away some of the confusion that has arisen out of the discussion that has already taken place.

If the question we have been debating is couched in language so straightforward that there can be no doubt about it, how is it that confusion exists? That is one point at least on which the Prime Minister did not cover up so brilliantly as he is accustomed to do.

Let me go a step further. Yesterday the Prime Minister took time out to mention specifically that there is a tremendous difference between a legal obligation and a moral obligation. I wonder whether there was any moral obligation in 1940, in going to the people with a promise of restriction. I wonder whether there was any moral obligation in going to the country and saying, "We want you to return us to power so that we can prosecute the war so far but no farther." If ever there was a moral obligation, it was in 1940, when the Prime Minister went to the country; and the moral obligation was to tell the people that he was going to do anything under God's heaven to win the war. But I think he went to the country with only one moral obligation in mind, and that was to win the election.

Later on in the Prime Minister's speech he makes special reference to the fact that both Conservative and Liberal parties, the two major parties of Canada, going to the country in 1940, were in agreement on the matter of voluntary enlistment and compulsory enlistment; that is, the matter of conscription.

Then he deals with the pledge that was made to the country. Let me read the Prime Minister's words:

> The pledge was given later, direct to the people, to the electorate themselves. It was a pledge made between the leaders of two great political parties in Canada and the electorate of this country in regard to the most solemn question that could have been put before them at that particular time.

The Prime Minister specifically states that this was the most solemn pledge that could be given the country. I repeat—the most solemn pledge. The most solemn pledge any man could give the country in a time of war is the pledge to win the war at all costs. That is the most solemn pledge which could be given.

But what was the pledge that was considered so solemn? It was: We will prosecute this war in order to win the war at home; but we will not prosecute the war to the very limit of our capacity to win it abroad. That is the sort of pledge the Prime Minister regards as a solemn one.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Shame on him!

Mr. HANSELL: Some of us could say a few things about solemn pledges. Here again, talking about public men in public positions, and how they must regard their pledges as solemn and irrevocable, the Prime Minister goes on to say:

> We intend to be ever mindful of this, and that if we have given a solemn pledge to them we intend to carry out that pledge.

That sounds good; it sounds beautiful. But might I ask the Prime Minister about the solemn pledge he made a few years ago to end unemployment?

Mr. POULIOT: Bennett made that pledge.

Mr. HANSELL: Perhaps he did. That was a solemn pledge. Did the Prime Minister keep it?

Mr. POULIOT: Bennett did not.

Mr. HANSELL: When the Prime Minister found, as year after year went by, that he could not keep that solemn pledge, did he go to the country and ask to be released from it?

An hon. MEMBER: He never made it.

Mr. HANSELL: I believe I remember reading in Maclean's magazine about October, 1935, where the Prime Minister was going to ease the burden of debt on agriculture. Did he ease the burden of debt? Did he go to the country and ask to be released from that solemn promise? In this house in the last year or two we have been reminded that the farmers in Saskatchewan were promised dollar wheat. The government was not able to give the farmers dollar wheat. Was that a solemn pledge? Has the government asked release from that pledge?

Then I would remind the house once again of that most solemn pledge respecting the issue of currency and credit in terms of public need. We know what the Prime Minister said in 1935; these words have almost been worn threadbare:

> Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury once in control will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government, and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament is idle and futile.

The Prime Minister talks about keeping solemn pledges. Here is one he has described as a sacred responsibility. I do not know what the broad meaning of the word "sacred" is, but I have before me the meaning as it appears in a dictionary I secured in the parliamentary library. The meaning of "sacred" as outlined here is "consecrated, or held dear to a deity; dedicated or reserved or appropriated to some person or purpose; made holy by religious issue; hallowed."

Let us think of that. Here is a sacred responsibility, one which is consecrated or held dear to a deity. Did the Prime Minister keep that most sacred obligation? Has he restored to the government the right to issue currency and credit in terms of public need?

I should like to read something he said on the night of the election, when Mr. Bennett's government was swept out and Mr. King's government was swept in. In the light of what has gone on since, in the light of the fact that millions of people have been on relief, let me read what the Prime Minister said:

In the new era which dawns to-day the struggle for the rights of the people will, in the realm of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Amen!

Mr. HANSELL: I continue to quote:

Poverty and adversity, want and misery are the enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from our land. They have lain in wait at the gate of every Canadian home during the past five years, and their menacing mien has served to destroy the souls as well as the minds and bodies of an ever-increasing number of men, women and children in our land. We take up at once—

No time must be lost.

—as our supreme task the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in the land of abundance, discontent and distress in a country more blessed by Providence than any other on the face of the globe, and to gain for individual lives and for the nation as a whole that health and peace and sweet content which is the rightful heritage of all.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I am trying to find some link between the hon. member's speech, the extracts he has been reading, and the bill before the house. I do not believe he is speaking to the question now before us.

Mr. HANSELL: I have been talking about the most solemn pledges concerning which the Prime Minister spoke yesterday.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The question before the house has to do with a plebiscite.

Mr. HANSELL: I am the last one who would want to break any of the rules of this house. If, however, you had been in the chair this afternoon you would have heard members here and members there talk their way around the world and half way to the moon and still be permitted to go on and speak. I want you to rule, Mr. Speaker, but I am saying that if there ever was a sacred obligation or pledge which the Prime Minister has ever made and which should have been kept—if it could not be kept, he should have submitted the matter to the people by way of a plebiscite—it was the pledge to end suffering and want in the midst of plenty.

Mr. FAIR: He did not want to do it.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) says that he did not want to do it; it did not suit his political convenience. Imagine the Prime Minister going to the country in those days with a plebiscite asking that he be released from his obligation to end poverty when he found he could not do it. That would not have suited his political convenience, but this plebiscite does. May I go on with the Prime Minister's speech of yesterday. He is reported on page 826 of Hansard as follows:

It is because of this we want to have perfect freedom of action as an administration, to have all the right to do what is in the public interest at the time the situation may demand it, and we feel we ought to be given this freedom as quickly as possible. The reason we want it, as I have stated already, is to be free to act in the manner which will best serve the interests of the people of Canada to serve in the manner that will make Canada's war effort the most effective.

That is self-admission that in 1940, when he made the commitment, it was a commitment which restricted him from putting forth Canada's greatest possible war effort. Are we to understand that the government went to this country in a time of war, in 1940, with the attitude that they did not want to be free to prosecute this war to the limit of their ability? In effect the Prime Minister says that they went to the country in 1940 with no desire to be free to carry on the war in the most effective manner. The only conclusion one can come to for the government permitting its hands to be tied is that it considered it was a very good piece of political expediency. I cannot comprehend it; it is beyond imagination, beyond all reason to believe that the government should consult the people as to whether they desire it to take such action as will win the war. That is the line of argument the Prime Minister used. He goes on:

Hon. members have been talking about conscription, about no conscription and the like. That is not the issue in this plebiscite. This is the issue: Is the government of Canada, in time of war, to have freedom to take whatever action it thinks most advisable with respect to the furtherance of Canada's war effort?

The Prime Minister informed the house that the question to be submitted to the people is not whether or not they want conscription, but whether or not they want the government to do all they can do to win the war. I am not going through my constituency doffing a cap with bells on, looking like a fool, asking my constituents to vote whether or not they want to win the war. Then the Prime Minister goes on to talk about the position in which the government finds itself in the eyes of the world.

He said:

First of all, the government is being put in an entirely wrong position before the people of this country and before the world just because we have not that full power.

Who put them in that position except he himself in 1940? Again on page 827:

. . . but it is also putting Canada in a false position, before all countries of the world, including her allies in the war.

Who put Canada in that position but themselves in 1940? I quote from page 826:

Nevertheless as long as that commitment is there we are being represented to the people of our own and other countries as a government unwilling to go the lengths other countries are willing to go, even should necessity for so doing become clearly manifest. That is a false position and a very wrong one in which to have the government placed.

Moreover, the present position in regard to the one commitment places the parliament of Canada, as well, in a false position.

Who put the government in that position but they themselves in 1940? If I have not misjudged what the Prime Minister says, it is that parliament is being put in a false position. I quote from page 827:

The very minute the subject were brought up, one hon. member after another, if it suited his purpose, would rise in his place in the house and say, "I cannot discuss this question, because the government is committed not even to raise it." So long as that commitment is there, no matter how the war may develop, there can be no discussion of the merits of the question of compulsory service for overseas. I say that that is putting parliament in a wrong position before the people of Canada.

It seems to me that the Prime Minister must think it is a Liberal parliament. Is he going to say that nobody in the house can talk about conscription until the government raises the issue? That is the way it reads here. I have thought for some time that this is a Liberal parliament. That is the position. Then he says:

. . . the enemy will construe this commitment as a limitation on the war effort of Canada.

What is responsible for that? I wonder how they interpreted that commitment in Germany in 1940?

An hon. MEMBER: They never thought of that.

Mr. HANSELL: Surely they must have thought of it. The Prime Minister is a brilliant enough man; no one will deny that. No one will say that the Prime Minister did not foresee how people would regard this, even in years to come.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): His party came first; that is all.

Mr. HANSELL: That is exactly the argument I am making, that it was political expediency. On page 828, the Prime Minister is reported as having said:

Talk about being courageous, I do not see anything courageous about that. Courage comes when you face the people, not when you run away from them.

A little more courage in 1940 would have been wise. It would have been better if he had faced the country with the statement, not "I will not put in conscription," but modified a little to read, "I see no need for conscription now, but if the need ever comes, I shall be the first to put it in." That would have been courageous indeed.

The Prime Minister answered the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to the effect that he could not state what he would do in respect of conscription as a result of the plebiscite vote, and he could not state what he would do several months hence. But he did state in 1940 what he could not do and would not do—and that condition has lasted for two years. The Prime Minister said, as reported at page 831 of Hansard of yesterday:

I mention these things because they help to illustrate how impossible it is for the government to give a decision here and now as to what it is going to do next September or October or November or December, or in 1943 or 1944.

I am not pressing that he should tell us that. I am simply pointing out that he did tell the country in 1940 what he could not do and would not do. He went to the country then on a negative commitment, and I say and have always thought that it was one of the most foolish things for a statesman to do to go to the country and say: I am promising you that if you elect me I will not do something, but will go into office with my hands tied. That may have been a shrewd piece of political expediency, but I do not think I will apologize to the Prime Minister when I say that it was not statesmanlike.

The Prime Minister went on in his speech to talk about the New Order. It is true that he wound up his speech with a great finale. It is worth putting on Hansard twice. The Prime Minister said, as reported at page 833 of Hansard:

A great deal has been said in different parts of the world and in our own country, about the New Order that is to come when this war is over. I have said on two or three occasions, I feel it very deeply, that unless that New Order emerges and asserts itself before the war is over we shall see very litle of New Order when the war is over.

Might I just make some reference to that? The Prime Minister makes that statement in the sense that he wants to preserve democracy, wants the people's will to govern. He says so here, as reported at page 834 of yesterday's Hansard:

They will insist on public honour in the transaction of public business, and they will insist above everything else that the government that is carrying on the affairs of their country shall be responsive to the will of the people and see that it is administering that will and no other.

Will the Prime Minister tell me to-night if it is the will of the Canadian people to pay an old age pension of only $20 a month? Will he tell me that it is the will of the people that agriculture should get the deal it is getting and that soldiers' widows should get the deal they are getting? The government knows the will of the people on these things.

The Prime Minister goes on to say, as reported at page 834 of yesterday's Hansard:

> There has been very little said in the recent past about moral obligations on the part of nations, but unless I am greatly mistaken there is nothing that is going to mean as much in the future of mankind. If we are going to rule out of our public life the honour of public men and of parliament—

And so forth, and so on, and so on, and so on. Yes, there are sacred obligations, and statesmen should keep their commitments. I believe in that. But there are sacred obligations to feed and clothe and make our people happy and comfortable. That is the will of the people. but that is not being done to-day.

Speaking of the post-war period, the Prime Minister goes on to say, as reported at page 835 of Hansard:

> We are going to honour their rights as we seek to honour our own conscience, so we shall be laying the foundation of the kind of order that will be enduring through the years to come.

Then I say, let us start with the building of that foundation now by looking after these war widows and dependents, and let us look after the aged now, for these are sacred and solemn obligations.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the arguments that have been made in the debate on the address and in this debate with respect to the plebiscite, pro and con, and also to the arguments for and against conscription. I am firmly convinced that before the plebiscite is put to the people, the first step we should take is this: We should have a resolution moved in this House of Commons by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) asking the members of this house to relieve the Prime Minister of his pledge. Most of the members who have spoken said that they were in favour of the plebiscite, but they have not said what they are going to do. They have not said whether they will back it up, whether they will ask their people to vote for it or whether they themselves will actually vote for it or not. To ask the people first, instead of this House of Commons, is putting the cart before the horse. I am not in favour of the plebiscite; I think the Prime Minister can get the release he requires from the members of this House of Commons; and before he submits the plebiscite to the people of the country, he should secure his release from the members of the House of Commons. If he gets release there, he certainly will be much freer to act than he is now; and if some unforeseen terrible thing should happen to prevent the taking of the plebiscite, he will at least have the consent of the members of the House of Commons to relieve him of his obligations and permit him to act. If the Prime Minister will take this course and ask the members of the House of Commons to give him the release he seeks, I for one will vote and call on my fellow members to vote to relieve him of his obligation with respect to that one specific thing.

Motion (Mr. McLarty) agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With the consent of the house, Mr. Speaker, I would move that we return to government notices of motion so that the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) may introduce his motion for the special committee to which this bill is to be referred.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house having reverted to the order for government notices of motions.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved the following resolution:

> That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Brunelle, Castleden, Black (Yukon), Emmerson, Fair, Hazen, Jean, White, McCuaig, McLarty, McNiven, Pottier, Ross (Calgary East), Turgeon and Weir be appointed to consider Bill No. 10, "An Act respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes of such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada," and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Speaker, I draw your attention to the fact that the motion as moved is not the same as the wording which appears on the order paper.

Mr. McLARTY: There are two names amended, I believe, by consent. Both of them happen to be members of my hon. friend's party. The name of Mr. Black (Yukon) was inserted in the place of Mr. Diefenbaker and that of Mr. White in place of Mr. Graydon. I understood that that was definitely by arrangement.

Mr. STIRLING: Being consented to by whom?

Mr. McLARTY: By consent of the whip of the Conservative party.

Mr. POULIOT: I have something to say on this. I can start now, or we may call it eleven o'clock, if you wish, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The motion is to create a committee to which the bill will be referred.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, and I have just a few words to say on it. Will you please call it eleven o'clock?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that the government is anxious, as I believe all hon. members are, that we should proceed as rapidly as possible with this legislation. The second reading of the bill has passed; a committee has been now named as a special committee to consider it; it has been agreed upon by all parties; and if this resolution could be passed to-night, the bill will be referred to-night to the special committee, which will have to-morrow and Saturday to go over the various clauses of the bill, and may be able to report to the house on Monday. In that event the bill could be through on Monday, and pass its third reading here. It would be unfortunate, I think, if we lost the advantage of the extra day to the committee to consider the matter.

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot refuse anything to my leader except in a matter of this importance. I was about to speak on the second reading, but a colleague was talking to me, and I had thought that the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) was to speak longer than he did. But I do not intend to speak at length, and if I am the only speaker on this matter the bill could be referred to-morrow afternoon to the committee.

May I say further that this is the most important bill which has been brought before the house for a long time. I appreciate what has been done, but it is impossible for me to refrain from saying what I have to say. I shall try to be just as brief as possible. It is not ill-will, it is not a bad disposition, but the matter is so serious that I cannot do otherwise. Besides this, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said that his intention was not to take advantage of the plebiscite right away to impose conscription, that it might be a matter of a few months, even a year, or more than that. I do not wish to be disobliging, but I should be remiss in my duty if I did not say what I have to say upon the matter. I usually refuse nothing, either to my colleagues here or to my confrères at the bar. But this matter is of the utmost importance; we must think deeply upon it, and we have the right to express our views. I do not wish to stand in the way, but since the bill is to be referred in the first place not to the committee of the whole house, but to a special committee which will report to the committee of the whole, it is my intention to say what I have to say in order that the members of the special committee which will study the bill will consider it, or throw it in the wastepaper basket. Mr. Speaker, will you please call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The question is not on the merits of the bill; the question is on the expediency of creating a committee to which the bill may be referred. Therefore, if any hon. member desires to speak on the motion which is now before the house, namely the expediency of creating a committee to which the bill may be referred, now is the time. Or, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. POULIOT: It is one minute to eleven o'clock, but I will continue. I started at five minutes to eleven. Sir, this is exactly the same case as when the motion was made for the reference of certain matters to the civil service committee. There was a debate on that, and hon. members expressed their views. This is not a long bill, it is a short bill. But it is based—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, may I rise to a point of order. Perhaps my hon. friend will excuse me. I should like to ask Your Honour whether a motion to refer a bill to committee is debatable under the rules of the house. I would cite standing order 38.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does any hon. member desire to speak on the point of order?

Mr. POULIOT: Sir, it is now eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not yet.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Standing order 38 enumerates the debatable questions. The motion to refer a bill to a committee is not therein enumerated. Therefore I declare that the motion is not debatable.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Speaker, I move that Bill No. 10 be referred to the special committee which is now created.

Motion agreed to.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, February 27, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

BRUCE COAL COMPANY—EMPLOYMENT OF A. E. BRADFIELD

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted once more to use the traditional parliamentary language of other days and rise to a question of privilege, as a private Liberal member of this honourable house, I would bring to your attention the wording I used yesterday as reported at page 846 of Hansard:

My second question is whether the secretary of that company is at present in the employ of the government, in the Department of Munitions and Supply.

I was not stating, sir, that the man in question was in the Department of Munitions and Supply; I was asking if he was in the employ of the government in that department, which is altogether different. Then in yesterday's Evening Citizen, five o'clock edition, under the headline, "Pouliot Declares Bruce Company Official is Government Employee," I find this paragraph:

So and so—

I need not repeat the man's name.

—reported by Mr. Pouliot to be secretary of the Bruce Coal Company, is not now and never had been an employee of the department, Mr. Howe told the press this afternoon.

My reason for rising to-day, sir, is that private members, whether Liberal, Conservative, C.C.F. or Social Credit, are handicapped by the fact that the public accounts are lacking in detail. Therefore when some information is asked from any minister of the crown, the answer should not be misleading, and no minister has the right to split hairs in answering any question put by any member with regard to the expenditure of public funds, in salaries or otherwise. I took the trouble to write the civil service commission in order to obtain further information. My letter was written yesterday afternoon, immediately after I saw the item in the Citizen. The reply is as follows:

Civil Service Commission
Office of the Secretary

File No. FT-MS-3206

Ottawa, February 27, 1942.

Dear Mr. Pouliot,

Replying to your inquiry of the 26th instant, I beg to advise you that the civil service commission has been notified by the comptroller of the treasury that Mr. Albert Edward Bradfield reported for duty on January 8, 1942, in the capacity of departmental accountant, grade 3, munitions and supply cost accounting office at Ottawa, at a salary of $2,700 per annum.

The duties of the position are set out in the requisition: "To investigate costs in connection with contracts for the Department of Munitions and Supply."

The civil service commission has not issued a certificate for Mr. Bradfield's employment.

Yours very truly,

E. Saunders,
Secretary.

I want you, sir, to understand my point, as I am sure you do. Technically perhaps the man was not in the Department of Munitions and Supply, but he was there in person, just the same as the accountant of the House of Commons is in this building, though he comes under the Minister of Finance. Therefore, sir, summarizing all that I have said, I do not speak very often—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: —if hon. members think I do speak often, at least my remarks are very brief, but I try to do my work just as conscientiously as I can, and I am not a conscientious objector. I want exact answers, and I do not want any more misleading answers of this kind from any minister of the crown.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) asked his question when the orders of the day were called at the last sitting of the house. This is the first opportunity I have had to answer his question. An answer has been prepared, and I shall now read it.

Whilst A. E. Bradfield is not now and never has been an employee of the Department of Munitions and Supply, he was employed in January of 1942 by the Department of Finance, treasury branch, and is now working under Mr. F. E. Wood in the accounting section of that department.

This is the first opportunity I have had to give this answer. I think it answers everything my hon. friend mentioned in his speech. I do not know the purpose of the speech, but I wish to say that I try to treat hon. members as courteously as I can, and to give them the information asked for as quickly as possible.

Mr. POULIOT: My information was more complete than the minister's.

PLEBISCITE ACT

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) presented the first report of the special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 10, respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes of such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CHILE, BRAZIL, AND THE ARGENTINE—MOTIONS FOR APPROVAL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That it is expedient that the Senate and House of Commons do approve the trade agreement between Canada and Chile signed September 10, 1941, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that standing in my name as Secretary of State for External Affairs there are three resolutions similar in terms appearing under government notices of motion to-day. They relate to three countries, namely, Chile, Brazil and the Argentine. The agreements are between those three countries and Canada.

If the house will give its consent, it might be understood that the discussion on all three resolutions could take place at one and the same time. I do not believe that would confuse matters in any particular; on the contrary in my opinion it would, if anything, clarify them. If necessary I shall ask permission to introduce a special resolution for the purpose, but if it were now understood that consent had been given for discussion of the three resolutions at one and the same time I would waive that formality.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the request is a reasonable one, to which I believe the house might properly consent. At the moment I see no objection to the procedure suggested. I should like to see a fairly general discussion, because these resolutions involve an important question, despite the fact that the trade in actual dollars and cents may not be relatively large. We are about to consider an important problem, especially in its relation to the post-war period, and, I hope that hon. members will take part in the discussions. It is my intention to speak briefly myself, after hearing the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am prepared personally to give consent to the Prime Minister's suggestion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thank the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and other leaders of groups in the house for giving consent to the discussion taking place as indicated.

The other two resolutions are similar in form to the one with reference to Chile. They are as follows:

Resolved that it is expedient that the Senate and House of Commons do approve the trade agreement between Canada and Brazil signed October 17, 1941, and that this house do approve the same.

Resolved that it is expedient that the Senate and House of Commons do approve the trade agreement between Canada and the Argentine Republic signed October 2, 1941, and that this house do approve the same.

The first agreement, namely the one between Canada and Chile, was signed in Chile on September 10, 1941, and has been provisionally in force since October 15, 1941. The trade agreement between Canada and the Argentine Republic was signed at Buenos Aires on October 2, 1941, and has been provisionally in force since November 15 of that year. The trade agreement between Canada and Brazil was signed at Rio de Janiero on October 17, 1941, and has been in force provisionally since October 17, 1941.

The three agreements were tabled in the house at the close of the last session, and the agreements themselves appear in printed form in the Votes and Proceedings of the house for November 3, 1941. It was thought that the latter part of the last session would not be a convenient time to discuss these measures, and for that reason they were left for the approval of parliament until the present time.

Except for the purpose of enabling me to explain the formalities of procedure, it might have been preferable to have the resolutions stand in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because he is the one who was responsible for their negotiation, and the member of the administration who will explain their terms to the house. However, as the Department of External Affairs is specially charged with matters respecting treaties and agreements, and as it is in that department, that formalities of signing, ratification and the like have to be arranged and completed, it seemed appropriate that I should be the one to present the resolutions.

While the trade agreements have been in force provisionally since the dates I have mentioned, the continuance of their operation requires the approval of both houses of parliament by joint resolution, and subsequent ratification by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. That is the position so far as Canada is concerned. The same would apply in corresponding manner to the administrations in the other countries concerned.

The first question which I know will arise in the minds of some hon. members is as to how it has come about that an agreement has been signed, and is even provisionally in operation, without parliament having had an opportunity of passing upon it in the first instance. That question invariably arises in respect to agreements and treaties that have been entered into before being presented to parliament. The explanation, of course, is that the making of treaties and agreements are executive acts. In the making of treaties and agreements the government must take into account its responsibility to parliament. It must realize that if it is not in a position to obtain the approval of parliament, then it would incur defeat and the penalty of retirement from office.

It would be impossible for public assemblies to discuss agreements between different nations before they were actually signed. Hon. members will appreciate the many questions which develop in connection with the negotiation of any agreement. Negotiations of necessity are carried on among persons appointed for that purpose. This present stage of proceedings therefore is one wherein we seek to receive the approval of the house and, later, that of the other house, to the three trade agreements as negotiated.

The agreements themselves are all of the nature of agreements affording most-favoured-nation reciprocal treatment between the countries which have entered into them. They are similar to other agreements of the most-favoured-nation type which have been entered into in recent years. Four such agreements have been signed recently. One between Canada and Uruguay was approved in the session of 1937. One between Canada and Guatemala was approved in the session of 1938. One with Haiti received approval in the 1938 session, and an agreement with the Dominican republic was approved in the session of 1940. I believe in the case of the first three agreements mentioned this House of Commons proceeded by way of bills. However, with respect to the Dominican republic agreement, the procedure was simply by way of resolution approving the agreement. The reason that no bill is required is that no statute is being amended in any way. All the agreement does is to give most-favoured-nation treatment by one country on its part to the other, and to ensure that the most-favoured attitude will be reciprocated by the other country. If the agreement did in any way change a statute, of course it would be necessary to proceed by way of a bill. However, in the form in which these agreements are, and having regard to their contents, approval by resolution is all that is necessary.

I had one particular object in mind in taking upon myself the introduction of the resolutions. It was that I felt that I should like in the name of the government of Canada to express our thanks for their many courtesies to the governments of the several countries in South and Central America which were visited in the fall of last year by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the trade mission of which he was the head. Hon. members will recall that among the countries which received my hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and his mission, were Ecuador, Peru, Chile, the Argentine, Uruguay and Brazil. In each of these countries the minister and the members of his party were extended exceptional hospitality and received the utmost in the way of cooperation in the furtherance of the object of the mission itself.

In the case of the three republics with which agreements with Canada have been entered into, a definite step forward has been taken in securing the advantages of improved trade relations. At this time of war the actual value in terms of trade may not be considerable, in fact may amount to very little, but there is great value in the fact that the treaties themselves serve to express friendship and goodwill between these particular republics in another part of the western hemisphere and the Dominion of Canada. I have received word from our ministers in the Argentine and Brazil since the establishment of our legations in South America that the trade mission which visited those countries has been greatly appreciated by the citizens. They felt that the mission itself had done a great deal to make Canada and its resources better known, had brought our country more to the fore than it had been at any time in the past. I might add that I have been told the same thing by the Hon. Doctor Pablo Santos Munoz, minister of the Argentine republic and the Hon. J. A. Lins de Barros, minister for Brazil, whom we are pleased to have at Ottawa as the representatives of these countries.

Hon. members will have noticed that the name of the Argentine republic has come before us recently in connection with the protection which is being given Canada's interest in Japan at the present time by that country. I mention this as indicative of the closer relations and cooperation which our country in the last year has come to enjoy with South America.

To-day, when conditions have become so much more serious in all parts of the world and where North and South America have been drawn together to a degree that has never obtained heretofore, it is particularly fortunate that we should have established diplomatic relations with these countries through the legations which they have opened in Ottawa and which we have opened in Brazil, the Argentine and Chile. It is also fortunate that we should have established with these countries at this time of war the foundations for closer trade relations in the post-war era. When the war is over the way will already have been paved for the immediate development of trade on as large a scale as may be possible. This service will be due in no small measure to the trade mission which my hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, headed last fall. The house will, I feel sure, permit me to extend to him the congratulations of its members upon the success of the mission and his leadership of it. If I am not going too far, and from the response apparently I am not, I should also like to extend these congratulations to him on behalf of the government.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has suggested that if the Minister of Trade and Commerce were at this moment to make his statement, which I have no doubt will be complete, it would lay the foundation for a further discussion of the matter.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the Prime Minister what is the situation with regard to the other countries which were visited but with which apparently no treaties have been made?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am going to leave that to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At some stage would it not be desirable if the house could go into committee so that hon. members might ask questions? I would not suggest that that be done at this stage, because the minister ought to have a chance to make his statement uninterrupted by questions. But it may be desirable at some stage after those who wish to do so have made extended remarks—I hope they will not be too extended—to have the house go into committee so that there may be opportunity for questions and answers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend is aware, it is not necessary for the house to go into committee of the whole to discuss the resolution, but the house may so decide of its own accord. If it is thought to be opportune, after the minister and other hon. members have spoken in a formal manner, to have discussion in committee of the whole, I am sure that consent will immediately be given for that purpose.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): In officially submitting my report on the first government-sponsored Canadian trade mission to South America, I desire not only to give to the house the actual accomplishments of the mission but to be permitted to go beyond this, and touch briefly on our visit to each country, how and by whom we were received, something of our reception, and a few highlights regarding each country visited. I should like to have gone into these matters more fully than my time will allow, because I am sure that it is tremendously important that Canada discovers South America and learns about the great countries there and the developments that are there taking place.

The success of our trade mission was unique inasmuch as we accomplished our objective in each country visited. The timing of the visit was fortunate, and for this good judgment the credit goes entirely to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

A word about the personnel of our party. Outstanding, of course, was the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. L. D. Wilgress, whose reputation for fairness, sincerity and practical knowledge had preceded us. Of Mr. Wilgress I cannot speak too highly. Mr. Yves Lamontagne, Director of Commercial Relations in my department, was of great strength to the mission, and his inclusion in it, with his bilingualism, made a definite appeal wherever we went. Mr. Escott Reid, of the Department of External Affairs, not only ably represented that department in familiarizing himself with conditions in the various countries visited, but by his tact and courtesy made a definite contribution. The very important and exacting work of secretary of the mission was most capably handled by Mr. A. C. L. Adams.

The objective of the mission was not immediate results, although we hoped to get and are getting these, but rather the laying of the best possible foundations upon which after-the-war trade can be effectively built. It is well known that we could be shipping huge South American requirements now were it not that, most properly of course, the munitions and supplies requirements of our war programme take first place. The matter of shipping also mitigates against our exports to and our imports from South American countries at this time.

The Canadian trade mission which left Ottawa on August 14 last and returned on October 28 was a resumption of the mission commenced in November, 1940, and abandoned because of my illness. Countries visited included Ecuador, Peru, Chile, Argentina, Uruguay and Brazil, all south of the equator.

A short stop was made at Port of Spain, Trinidad, on the return trip following an invitation to the mission from the governor of Trinidad to visit that colony for the purpose of discussing matters pertaining to trade between Canada and several of the West Indian colonies.

The mission's visit had several aims. The general objective was exploratory. We desired to investigate opportunties for the development of reciprocal trade between Canada and the countries visited and, when and where possible, remove obstacles which hindered progress in commercial relations. Powers were conferred upon me by the governor in council enabling me to conclude most-favoured-nation trade agreements, thereby removing or preventing discrimination against Canadian products in respect to tariff matters and exchange control.

An important aspect of the visit was the furtherance of goodwill. The mission found during its tour that in all the countries visited there was the highest regard for Canada and a general desire to strengthen trade relations.

The mission was received with the utmost courtesy on its arrival in each country. We were accorded the greatest hospitality and every possible facility was extended to us.

In each country visited the press devoted very considerable space to the activities of the mission and stressed the character and importance of the visit.

We first visited the countries on the Pacific coast, Ecuador, Peru and Chile, in the order given.

Up to the time of our visit Canada possessed no trade agreements with these countries. A feature of Canada's trade common to all three countries is the fact that over the last decade their balance of trade has been favourable to Canada. The favourable balance for 1940 with the three countries was $2,181,000, and for 1941, $654,000.

Compared with Canada's trade with the world, our trade with the countries on the western coast of South America is small, but the figures assume greater significance to them because their export and import trade is on a considerably smaller scale than ours.

Trade is an exchange of goods, a two-way process, and if we are to continue to sell our products abroad we must be ready to reciprocate. To the extent at least that we can increase our purchases from all the Latin-American countries we shall make it possible for them to increase their purchases from Canada.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

It is interesting to note that while the balance of trade between Canada and Argentina and Brazil was favourable to Canada in 1938, it became favourable to these two countries in 1940. The volume of trade in both directions has in fact expanded, which is a satisfactory development. In 1941 Brazil increased its favourable balance but the balance became favourable to Canada in regard to Argentina.

With respect to Uruguay, we find that taking 1939 and 1940 together, our exports and imports from that country are about balanced, whereas in years prior to 1939 the balance of trade has been in Canada's favour. In 1941 the balance was again substantially favourable to this country.

The six countries of South America visited by the mission are inhabited by 75 million people. Brazil has about 45 million inhabitants, Argentina about 13 million, and Chile a population of 5 million. The total population of this group of countries, therefore, is 63 millions or approximately 84 per cent of the total population of the six countries visited.

The total imports of these six countries amounted to an aggregate value of $956,800,000 in United States dollars in 1938, Argentina, Brazil and Chile together accounting for 88 per cent of this total (United States, $838,500,000). This gives an idea of the purchasing power available in these three countries alone.

The aggregate exports of these six countries were approximately $1,020,000,000 in United States dollars in 1938, the share of Argentina, Brazil and Chile being 86 per cent of this total (United States, $872,400,000).

In 1938 Canada's exports to the six countries totalled $9,961,000 (in each case United States dollars), of which $8,801,000 or 87 per cent were consigned to Argentina, Brazil and Chile. In 1940 our total exports to the six countries amounted to $14,874,000, of which Canadian exports to Argentina were $6,107,000; to Brazil $5,063,000 and to Chile $1,436,000 or 85 per cent of the total. In 1941 the total was $20,092,000—$7,172,000 to Argentina; $8,097,000 to Brazil and $1,788,000 to Chile, these three countries again taking 85 per cent of the total.

Canada's total imports from the six countries in 1940 amounted to $14,129,000 ($12,960,000 or 92 per cent from Argentina, Brazil and Chile), and in 1941 the total was $28,134,000 of which 87 per cent came from these three countries.

As a matter of reference I would like to put these figures on Hansard in tabular form, if I may have the consent of the house so to do.

It is only necessary that the three agreements negotiated with the countries of Chile, Argentina and Brazil be ratified by this house. The arrangement made with Ecuador was what is known as a modus vivendi and is a temporary agreement pending formal treaty. I wish, however, to give this house information in regard to our visit to Ecuador, Peru and Uruguay in addition to particulars of the three countries with which formal trade agreements were completed.

Having given a summary of the trade position with the South American countries which we visited, I intend now to deal particularly with the situation in each country. En route to Ecuador, sailing from New York and on through the Panama canal, we touched at the Colombian port of Bonaventura but our first formal call was at Guayaquil, the main port of Ecuador. So as to enable us to see something of the country we travelled by rail and motor car from Guayaquil sea level to Quito, the capital, which is at an altitude of some 10,500 feet.

The trip was exceedingly interesting—plantations of pineapples, bananas, coffee and cocoa—and on the higher uplands at altitudes of eight and eleven thousand feet, grain and vegetables.

In our Rockies at this elevation there is of course perpetual ice and snow, but we were almost on the equator and in the territory of the great Inca empire of pre-Columbus days. Thousands and thousands of Indians in their colourful costumes tended the crops of, in many cases, the absentee landlords. Quito for the tourist with its ancient civilization is most interesting. Churches and other buildings erected shortly after Columbus' discovery are still giving service.

The morning after our arrival we paid our official call on the president and met the Minister for Foreign Affairs, Doctor Julio Tobar Conoso, and the Ministers of Agriculture and Finance, with their officials. Arrangements were made for us to have immediate conversations in regard to a possible trade treaty.

Because Ecuador's balance of trade with Canada was unfavourable to Ecuador, that country had imposed, in 1936, a surtax of 50 per cent on imports from Canada. This had the effect of immediately reducing the value of Canada's exports to Ecuador by one-half, and we were anxious to rectify this position.

The itinerary allowed the mission but one day in Quito, the capital, but negotiations resulted in an arrangement being made under an exchange of notes which not only removed the existing surtax, but, by placing the trade between Canada and Ecuador on the basis of most-favoured-nation treatment, extended to Canada the benefit of reductions of duties on Ecuador's minimum tariff which had been granted to the United States, under a trade agreement signed in 1938 and which affected thirty-three tariff items, the most important of which was flour.

Ecuador imports about 250,000 barrels of flour annually. In 1936, Canadian flour exports to Ecuador amounted to 18,452 barrels valued at $98,723, and since that year, because of the surtax, there have been no exports of Canadian flour to Ecuador up to October, 1941. In November and December, immediately after our visit, over one thousand barrels of flour have been exported to Ecuador. Our flour trade is in this way now being reestablished.

In 1940 Canada exported to Ecuador goods valued at $130,721 while our imports from Ecuador amounted to $25,676 only.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Relatively very small.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Relatively very small, yes. That was in 1940.

In 1941 Canadian exports were $162,147 and imports $169,713.

Canada's main exports to Ecuador, at the present time, are newsprint, paper bags, farm implements, calcium carbide and sodium compounds. Other exports which stand to benefit as a result of the modus vivendi include patent leather, wallpaper and electrical apparatus.

The chief products imported into Canada from Ecuador are petroleum, cocoa beans, crude rubber, coffee, bananas and hard woods.

As will be readily understood from the way in which the exchange of notes was facilitated, we found a most friendly attitude on the part of all.

In the evening we met a great many of the business men of Quito at a reception given by the British minister, Mr. G. H. Bulock.

We flew from Quito to Lima, Peru, 1100 miles and had a most interesting view of the coastal district. An interesting pause in our flight was at Talara, Peru, the headquarters of the great International Petroleum development. Canadians, who gathered at the airport to meet us, regretted our inability to stay over and see this great Canadian development.

May I digress here, Mr. Speaker, to mention the ambassadors of Canada we have in our representatives in South America of Canadian enterprise. I refer among others, to our banks, our life insurance companies, our oil companies and Brazilian Traction.

The district of heavy tropical rains ended shortly after leaving Guayaquil, and from that point to Lima the country is barren and cultivation is only possible in comparatively small areas in the valleys, by irrigation. In Lima we found the Minister of Finance and Commerce, Mr. David Dasso, particularly friendly and cooperative. Mr. Dasso, when called to government service by the President of Peru, had for six or eight years been an active vice-president of the American Locomotive Works Incorporated, New York. Discussions had been arranged with us and for us with a permanent commission of very high standing known as the Foreign Political Economic Commission, which deals with matters pertaining to the commercial and economic life of Peru. This commission included Dr. Tudela as president, a former ambassador in the diplomatic service; Mr. Benjamin Roca, director of the Guano Administrative Company and recognized as one of the outstanding economic advisors in South America; Mr. de Althaus, president of the Central Reserve bank, and Messrs. Miranda, president of the National Agricultural Society, and Alayza Roel, president of the Unemployment Funds Commission.

As Peru was at that time engaged in trade negotiations with another country, they thought it inadvisable to conclude a formal treaty with Canada until finality had been reached in their other negotiations.

Before the mission left Peru, however, notes were exchanged between the mission and the Peruvian Economic Commission expressing the desirability and definite intention of the two countries to conclude an agreement on a most-favoured-nation basis at the earliest possible opportunity. I have just had, informally, personal word from the Peruvian government, through their foreign minister, Mr. Dasso, that it is anticipated that their trade negotiations to which I have referred will likely be completed within a few days and that correspondence looking to a formal ratification of the understanding between our countries will then be undertaken.

Canada's exports to Peru have increased considerably since the pre-war year of 1938, when they amounted to $892,089. In 1940 they totalled $1,527,210, an increase of 70 per cent, and in 1941 our exports increased to $1,941,909.

In 1938 Canada's imports from Peru amounted to $3,004,743, and Canada had an adverse balance of trade with Peru of about $2,113,000. In 1939 the position was reversed; our imports from Peru dropped to $601,224 due to decreased shipments of Peruvian petroleum to Canada, while Canadian exports rose to $1,244,776, leaving a balance, favourable to Canada, of about $643,000. In 1940 the further rise in Canadian exports to Peru to $1,527,210 was also accompanied by a rise in our favourable balance with that country to $815,000. In 1941 the situation was reversed and the balance of trade was adverse to Canada by $891,000.

I might add that the entertainment arranged for us while at Lima included an official dinner by the president of the republic, Doctor Manuel Prado, at the palace. We had a most interesting trip on the Central Railway, which serves the great copper mining area to the east of Lima. We were given the opportunity to see something of the agricultural activities through a week-end visit to the hacienda of a Mr. Beltran, a very prominent resident of Lima. Other social activities included luncheons by finance minister Dasso and the British Chamber of Commerce; a reception by the British Commonwealth society; a dinner by the local manager of the Royal Bank of Canada and a luncheon by H. M. Minister, Mr. V. Courtenay Forbes.

I mention this entertainment here and in connection with all the other countries visited to show the warmth of the welcome extended to us as Canadians—not personally but as representatives of a country that has to them suddenly assumed great importance. We found a very definite interest in our country and a great new-found respect for us arising out of the seeping into South America of reports of what Canada was planning and accomplishing in its great war effort. They, in general, had known of us vaguely as a country lying between the United States and the North Pole, but now they are seeing us as a great new country, destined to take an even more important part in world trade.

May I just mention here, Mr. Speaker, what an eye-opener and what a liberal education our South America tour was to me and to my colleagues of the trade mission. When opportunity offers and circumstances make it possible, I hope Canadians will turn southward and learn about these great developing countries of South America and their great peoples.

From Lima we proceeded to Santiago, Chile, again travelling by air a distance of roughly fifteen hundred miles. Apart from the views of the Andes which rose to great heights above the clouds, it was not possible to see much of the country as we were flying at a height of about 12,000 feet, well above a blanket of clouds.

When we arrived at Santiago on September 3 it was their springtime and the district in the vicinity of Santiago was very attractive with the fruit trees in blossom, beautiful stretches of green country-side, and the snow-capped Andes in the near distance. Our welcome was most cordial.

We paid our official call on the Minister of Foreign Affairs and Commerce, H. E. don Juan Rosetti, the day after our arrival and again we found that arrangements had been made for the immediate commencement of trade discussions.

Previous to our visit Canada had no direct trade treaty with Chile.

In 1931 Chile and the United Kingdom concluded a trade arrangement on the basis of most-favoured-nation treatment, and in the past certain countries had been granted special concessions by Chile in trade agreements but these advantages had not been extended to Canada.

Negotiations between Canada and Chile had been undertaken early in 1936 on the basis of most-favoured-nation treatment but little progress was made, one of the main reasons being that the balance of trade between the two countries was unfavourable to Chile. Another problem was the granting of foreign exchange by Chile for the purchasing of Canadian goods. Chile, however, was anxious to obtain the advantages of the Canadian intermediate tariff as regards one of its most important exports—nitrates.

A trade agreement between Canada and Chile was signed at Santiago on September 10, 1941. Subsequently an order in council passed in Ottawa on October 1 extended most-favoured-nation treatment to imports into Canada from Chile provisionally as from October 15, 1941, and a decree No. 3,428 dated October 17, published in the Chilian Official Journal of November 4, 1941, provided for unconditional and unlimited most-favoured-nation treatment for Canadian goods entering Chile.

Based upon mutual concession of most-favoured-nation treatment in matters pertaining to tariffs, import quotas and foreign exchange control, the treaty provides:

(a) For the extension to Chile of the benefits granted under Canada's intermediate tariff as regards imports into Canada from that country. In return, Canadian goods exported to Chile enjoy the rates of duty under the minimum tariff.

(b) On the basis of most-favoured-nation treatment, Canada enjoys the benefits of any reductions which may be granted to other countries by Chile, and, conversely, Chile is granted any reductions under the intermediate tariff which Canada may grant as a result of tariff negotiations with other countries or otherwise.

(c) The tariff advantages which Canada may grant to imports from empire countries are excluded under the provisions of the agreements, as well as the treatment which Chile may reserve to imports from contiguous countries.

Where governments have established monopolies which affect the production, sale or importation of certain products, provision is made for fair and non-discriminatory treatment by the respective signatories of the trade agreement.

The agreement also provides against discrimination with respect to internal taxes and charges on imports.

Provision is made for consultation between Canada and Chile on the various matters covered by the agreement so that mutually satisfactory adjustments may be effected when measures are taken which may impair any of the objects of the agreement.

Exemption from the provisions of the agreement is made with respect to measures relating to public security, the enforcement of police or revenue laws and regulations, and the measures affecting imports and exports of gold and silver, and of war materials.

Special advantages granted to adjacent countries in order to facilitate frontier traffic and any advantages accorded to a third country resulting from a customs union are also exempted from the provisions of the agreement.

The agreement is for a period of two years.

I am outlining the agreement with Chile in detail as the agreements signed with Argentina and Brazil are practically identical, except that in the agreement with Argentina the special situation existing between that country and Peru as regards matters pertaining to foreign exchange is recognized. This agreement also recognizes the situation which exists as regards the conditions which govern trade between Argentina and the United Kingdom at the present time, although this matter is not referred to in the text of the agreement.

In brief Canada and Chile extend to each other most-favoured-nation treatment as regards tariff and all matters relating to control of foreign exchange and imports, with certain derogations relating to advantages granted by Canada to the British empire on the one hand and, on the other, by Chile to its contiguous countries.

The agreement also provides that products of Canada and Chile imported into the other country are not to be subject, with certain specified exceptions, to internal taxes, fees, charges or exactions higher than those payable on like articles of national origin or any other foreign origin.

Provision is also made that nitrate of soda and iodine, two important natural products of Chile, shall not be subject on importation into Canada to any form of quantitative control of imports less favourable, nor to duties or charges higher than, like products, natural or synthetic, originating in any other foreign country.

The trade agreement provides that it is to come into force thirty days after exchange of ratifications and provides that it is to remain in force for two years. It is to be renewed automatically thereafter for further periods of one year, subject to termination by either party on six months' notice. Pending the definite coming into force of the agreement it was put into force provisionally by both governments for a period of one year as from October 15, 1941.

Advantages to Canada. By assuring reciprocal most-favoured-nation treatment in respect to tariffs and exchange control, the trade agreement signed between Canada and Chile guarantees Canadian exports against discrimination in the event that Chile should conclude agreements with other countries providing for reductions below Chile's minimum tariff.

There are in force in Chile some conventional rates of duty, lower than the normal tariff, which will be accorded to imports from Canada under the agreement. These arise mainly from a trade agreement between Chile and France signed January 16, 1936. Among the products to which these reduced duties apply are preserved meats and vegetables, certain cotton yarn and cloth, medicinal preparations, gloves and certain other leather manufactures, wool and silk clothing, certain chemicals, structural iron and steel, toilet preparations, wallpaper and some other paper manufactures.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the course of his statement has the minister taken occasion to give information with respect to the Chilean tariffs? It will be interesting to know. I have no means of access to them at the moment and I should like to know whether they are high or low, or what they are, generally speaking.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): They vary according to the commodity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would assume that.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): They vary very definitely according to the commodity, on account of the foreign exchange situation at the present time. I have not gone into that aspect definitely, but if and when we are able to discuss this matter, in committee or on my estimates, I shall be glad to give the leader of the opposition that information.

Advantages to Chile. The trade agreement assures Chile of the benefits accruing from Canada's intermediate tariff and removes the 3 per cent special excise tax on the duty paid value of imports when such imports are dutiable under Canada's general tariff, Canada's imports from Chile have consisted mostly of sodium nitrate, manila fibre, field seed and fresh onions, manganese oxide and undressed furs.

In 1940 Canada's total imports from Chile amounted to $174,688 and in 1941 $233,471, as against $226,158 in 1939. The main feature of Canada's trade with Chile is that we have had a favourable balance of trade with that country for many years. In 1933 that favourable balance amounted to $222,000. In 1939 it amounted to over $730,000; in 1940 to over $1,261,000 and in 1941 it rose to $1,554,955.

The total trade between Canada and Chile, as shown in Canadian trade statistics, has increased yearly from about $234,000 in 1933, at the end of the depression, to about $1,611,000. In both these years and in the intervening period, the balance of trade has been considerably in Canada's favour, as the following table shows:

Calendar year	Total exports to Chile	Total imports from Chile	Balance of trade
1933.....	227,922	5,877	222,045
1934.....	538,015	26,283	511,732
1935.....	856,348	53,953	802,395
1936.....	893,598	97,314	796,284
1937.....	928,176	67,744	860,432
1938.....	604,373	178,522	425,751
1939.....	956,592	226,158	730,434
1940.....	1,436,333	174,688	1,261,645
1941.....	1,788,426	233,471	1,554,955

The policy of the government is, during the war, not to make public details of Canada's foreign trade in respect to the value of specific commodities exported or imported. However, Canada's exports to Chile in 1940 rose to well over twice our exports in 1938 and almost seven times our exports in 1933. Our exports to Chile in 1941 exceeded the figures for 1940 by over $350,000.

The principal commodities which Canada exports to Chile are: Newsprint, rubber tires, farm implements, asbestos, rubber, boots and shoes, electric apparatus, iron pipes and fittings, rubber belting, wood pulp, soda and sodium compounds. Sawn lumber has recently been added to this list. Among the minor items are herrings, dry-salted; whiskey; canvas shoes with rubber soles; artificial silk manufactures; veneers and plywood; wallpaper; needles; hardware; storage batteries; telephone and telegraph apparatus; medicinal preparations and brushes.

I have mentioned rubber tires and rubber belting. These were taken from the trade figures of recent years, but of course shipments of these commodities, which are required so badly at home, now are being held in Canada.

We have instituted an intensive study of what additional purchases can be made from Chile, for an unbalanced trade can not be continued with satisfactory results indefinitely. With European wine supplies cut off indefinitely there might be a market in Canada for the excellent Chilean wines which are held in high favour wherever used.

Our very warm reception and the great hospitality extended to our mission was evidence of the interest in Canada at this time. The late president of Chile, although in failing health at the time, officially and informally received us. The foreign minister, Mr. Rosetti, gave a large luncheon in our honour following the conclusion of treaty discussions. Among others who entertained us at dinner, luncheon or reception were the Chilean chamber of commerce, the British chamber of commerce, the British embassy, the Central Bank of Chile, the British Legion and the Free French organization.

We broke our stay at Santiago to spend two days at Vina del Mar and at Valparaiso, the main port of Chile, where many old established British firms are operating.

We chose what is known as the lake route to go from Santiago to Buenos Aires, going by rail some 550 miles south from Santiago, then by steamer and bus across a chain of lakes connected by short stretches of road to Bariloche and from there by rail to Buenos Aires.

This gave us an opportunity to see something of the Chilean farming districts in the central south which very closely resemble the central Alberta country. The lake region itself is most attractive and reminded us of our own mountain lakes—Louise, Emerald and Maligne, but in Chile and the Argentine these lakes are bordered with cultivation and these lakes, small and large, form part of a transportation route—with splendid boats and connecting bus lines. This, apart from flying, is at the moment the most dependable route over the Andes.

As we crossed the border from Chile to Argentina an officer in charge of a detachment of troops presented the compliments of the Argentine government and at Puerto Blest where we took the boat for Bariloche we met the Argentine minister of war and senior officers of the army on their way to Santiago to participate in celebrations marking the 125th aniversary of Chilean independence. The minister of war brought greetings to us from the president and his colleagues of the Argentine government. We found too that the foreign office had sent a special representative, Doctor Alexander Marshall, to look after us on the thousand mile trip from Bariloche to Buenos Aires. I mention these things to show how the Argentine government extended to us every courtesy—and I mention this to point a moral and to draw attention to this example for Canadian guidance.

The mid-southern part of Argentina through which we travelled from Bariloche is a fairly dry level plain given over partially to sheep raising but after about 18 hours' run we entered the beautiful pampas country and for the full morning before we arrived in Buenos Aires we saw great stretches of the finest cattle country which reminded me of the plains area in the southwestern part of my own province of Alberta.

The reception at Buenos Aires was warmth itself. A special railway car had been sent to bring us from Bariloche to Buenos Aires and on arrival we found at the station to meet us, members of the Argentine cabinet and senior government officials together with representatives of the various chambers of commerce, manufacturers' associations and other business organizations, and members of the British embassy. The station was bedecked with Canadian and Argentina flags and our cortege of cars was escorted to our hotel by motorcycle police. As a matter of fact two policemen were detailed to escort us everywhere we went throughout our stay in Buenos Aires and we were guests in every respect of the Argentine government. Trade negotiations commenced immediately and an agreement was reached and signed at Buenos Aires on October 2.

The trade agreement with Argentina is the first direct arrangement concluded between the two countries, and in many respects it is a most important agreement. It places our trade relations with Argentina on a secure basis.

Up till November 15 last, Canada's trade with Argentina had been regulated under the provisions of a treaty of amity, commerce and navigation signed by Argentina and Great Britain in 1825, or 42 years before confederation. This treaty placed trade between Argentina and the British empire on a reciprocal most-favoured-nation basis, but there had arisen doubts as to the rights which Canada enjoyed under the treaty. There was uncertainty, for instance, that Canada would be assured of the benefits of the reductions in rates of duty which Argentina was to grant the United States as a result of the trade negotiations which had just been carried on between Argentina and the United States. These were nearing conclusion when the Canadian trade mission arrived in Argentina. There were also uncertainties resulting from Argentina's foreign exchange control system.

As a result of the new trade agreement, the situation as regards foreign exchange control has been clarified. The agreement came into effect provisionally on November 15 and is to come definitely into force thirty days after the exchange of ratifications. It is to remain in force for a period of two years, and thereafter until termination by either government.

As Argentina was already enjoying the advantages of the intermediate tariff of Canada, it was not necessary to pass an order in council to implement the agreement.

The trade agreement contains an article (Article II) dealing with foreign exchange control which recognizes the special situation whereby the trade between Argentina and the United Kingdom is regulated under a payments agreement.

Argentina agrees to grant Canada treatment not less favourable than it accords to other countries in matters pertaining to the rates and the allocation of foreign exchange which Argentina makes available for commercial transactions, excluding, however, the special advantages which Argentina extends to imports from countries contiguous to Argentina, and to Peru.

This means that Canada is assured of as favourable treatment in the granting of exchange as that which Argentina may accord to the United States and other countries not excepted under the provisions of Article II.

It may be added that the United States, under a treaty signed with Argentina on October 14 last, also made substantially the same reservations that are provided for under Canada's trade agreement with Argentina.

Under the new agreement, Canadian exporters are assured against discrimination during the life-time of the agreement.

Canada will also enjoy, under the most-favoured-nation clause, the benefits of certain reductions in duties granted by Argentina to the United States under a treaty between the two countries which was signed at Buenos Aires on October 14 and which was applied provisionally on November 15 last, which by coincidence, is also the date on which our agreement with Argentina also, provisionally, came into force.

The main commodities of interest to Canada and the percentage reductions from the existing net duties in Argentina's customs tariff are shown below:

Commodities	Reduction Per cent
Canned salmon and canned mackerel...	40
Apples (October 1 to January 31).....	50
Pears (October 1 to December 31).....	50
Sardines, canned, in tomato sauce, mustard or cottonseed oil.....	30
Asbestos linings.....	25
Containers for storage batteries.....	12·5
Insulating board.....	20

Canada's total trade with Argentina during 1932 and 1933, at the bottom of the world economic depression, averaged $4,096,000 yearly. In 1941 the value of the total trade between the two countries amounted to $11,935,856, imports from Argentina being $2,408,000 less than Canadian exports to that country. Statistics for the period 1932 to 1941 are shown in the following table:

	Canadian exports	Imports from Argentina
1932.....	$2,961,854	$ 992,323
1933.....	2,653,386	1,584,598
1934.....	4,248,609	3,082,522
1935.....	3,968,421	3,286,791
1936.....	3,426,051	10,787,360
1937.....	7,294,191	6,242,263
1938.....	4,675,489	2,149,160
1939.....	4,116,923	4,406,456
1940.....	6,107,215	6,541,862
1941.....	7,172,104	4,763,752

(Note.—Imports from Argentina reached a high level in 1936 because of large imports of maize.)

Canada's main exports to Argentina in recent years have been newsprint, farm implements, seed potatoes, electric apparatus. Other exports include apples, lumber, asbestos, calcium carbide, manufactures of iron and steel, wrapping paper, woodpulp, wallboards, fox skins, paints, dried cod and other fish products.

Canada's chief imports from Argentina are: Hides and skins, flax seed, maize, canned beef, quebracho (tanning extract), raw wool, horse hair, casein and gylcerine for refining.

Under the new trade agreement, Argentina is assured of continuation of most-favoured-nation treatment, whereby goods imported into Canada from Argentina are subject to the rates under Canada's intermediate tariff, and to the benefit of reductions which may be granted to other countries.

Buenos Aires is a great and beautiful city with a population of nearly 4 million people. It is fully modern in every respect with underground railway systems as well as very efficient bus and street railway transportation. There are magnificent boulevards, parks and squares, splendid modern business blocks, most attractive shopping districts reminding one of Oxford and Bond streets of old London with a number of the same establishments—great manufacturing plants—packing plants—race courses—great clubs and above all a great and most hospitable people.

I can give those of you who have not visited Buenos Aires an idea of the city and its people by briefly referring to some of the items on our official programme there.

There was dinner by the British ambassador, Sir Esmond Ovey, on the night of our arrival and a large reception at the embassy the following evening.

An official luncheon was given by the Argentina Minister of Agriculture at the magnificent Jockey Club, and another official luncheon by the foreign minister, Doctor Ruis Guinazu. There was dinner by Mr. E. C. Groening, manager of the Royal Bank of Canada.

Visit to La Martona. This is a ranch or Estancia in the Argentine language. It has been in one family for well over fifty years. On the ranch are 24,000 cows, and they are milking 12,000 daily and taking milk from 6,000 outside their property daily. They are marketing their produce in dozens of retail stores in the city.

The reception at the club, The Gimnasia. This is a great club under the presidency of Doctor Aldao. It represents a great life work of the doctor and has a membership of some twenty-two thousand. Supervised sports of all kinds are conducted, both at the downtown club headquarters and at their more extensive establishment in a suburban area.

Luncheon by the British Chamber of Commerce.

Dinner by the American ambassador, the Honourable Norman Armour, at their beautiful and pretentious embassy.

Attendance at the ballet at the Colon Opera House, guests of the President of Argentina. A German opera had been on the programme for that evening, but those in charge had, out of regard to what they thought our sensibilities might be, staged a special ballet dedicated to the Canadian mission.

Dinner by Doctor Leguizamon at the Circulo de Armas, a most beautiful and exclusive club. This was for Argentinians only. Doctor Leguizamon is the Argentine chairman of the Argentine British railroads and has a son in the Argentine Legation in this city.

We visited:

The Argentine Stock and Grain Exchange, where not only stocks but all bond transactions are handled. We were formally received here and trading stopped for the few minutes' ceremony.

Anglo (Vesty's) Packing Plant: daily capacity 5,000 cattle, 15,000 sheep and lambs, and 1,500 hogs per eight-hour day. The plant covers 65 acres and employs between seven and eight thousand people.

The Alpargatas Factory which we saw has been in one family, the Fraser family, since its commencement by this Scottish immigrant family about sixty or seventy years ago. The Alpargatas is a cheap shoe, widely used in South America by working people and agriculturalists. The daily production of the plant is—Alpargatas shoes 120,000 pair, rubber shoes 18,500 pair, welt shoes 2,000 pair, stitchdowns 4,000 pair, women's 2,000 pair.

At the great river port of Rosario, we were cordially entertained. Here we visited the Yerbe Matte factory. Yerbe Matte resembles green tea. This industry was taken in hand by the earliest Jesuit missionaries. They started the domestic cultivation of this plant.

We visited a large straw pulp mill. Paper is made from straw, but my interest greatly modified when I was told that the factory secures its straw without payment, from the farmers.

From Buenos Aires we journeyed to Montevideo, the capital of Uruguay, some 135 miles down the Rio de la Plata, on which Buenos Aires, Argentina, and Montevideo, Uruguay, are situated. Here again there was the same great hospitality. Among those welcoming us was Doctor Guani, the Minister of Foreign Affairs and an old friend of Right Hon. Senator Dandurand and of Commissioner Roy, Canada's former representative in France.

A commission had been appointed by the Uruguayan government by official proclamation to "maintain conversations" with us. This commission included very senior officials of the Department of Foreign Affairs, Ministry of Agriculture, Department of Commerce, and the Bank of the Republic. As I mentioned earlier, Canada had concluded a most-favoured-nation trade agreement with Uruguay in 1936. The provisions of this treaty, however, had not been fully implemented, as certain difficulties had arisen regarding the granting of foreign exchange for the payment of imports of Canadian goods into Uruguay.

The discussions, therefore, had as their objective the removal of the difficulties which existed. A very satisfactory understanding with the government of Uruguay was arrived at, which was embodied in a signed memorandum. The effect of this agreement should be reflected by an increase in our exports to Uruguay, our trade in seed-potatoes and agricultural implements standing to benefit most.

Uruguay is a most progressive republic and Montevideo a most beautiful city of over 800,000 people. Its people are very pro-democratic. We spent four days in all in Uruguay, returning to Buenos Aires before leaving for Brazil.

We landed in Brazil at Santos on October 6, the port for the tremendously rich Sao Paulo province, travelling the fifty miles from Santos to Sao Paulo city by a railway which carries trains up from the coast valley by a series of cables, some 2,500 feet in ten miles. The city of Sao Paulo is one of the most rapidly growing cities, I believe, of the western hemisphere. The city has a population of one million and a quarter and is fully modern and well planned. While at Sao Paulo we were entertained by the chamber of commerce and commodity exchange and every opportunity was given to us to learn of their coffee and cotton production. After four days at Sao Paulo and vicinity we reached the beautiful city of Rio de Janeiro and were again most hospitably received by members of the cabinet and government and business officials. May I add here that while the Canadian trade mission was in Brazil we were at all times the guests of the government.

Sr. Aranha, Brazilian foreign minister, and Sr. Machado, the minister for labour, industry and commerce, met our early morning train and immediately arranged for trade negotiations which lasted throughout the ten days we were in Rio. A most-favoured-nation trade treaty was signed in that capital on October 17. The trade agreement was applied provisionally as from that date, as it extended the provisions whereby reciprocal most-favoured-nation treatment between the two countries had been ensured under an exchange of notes effective on June 12, 1937.

Whereas the previous arrangement was subject to termination at any time on thirty days' notice, the new agreement is effective for a period of two years and is continuing subject to cancellation by notice. Canadian exports to Brazil are thus assured against discrimination in respect to tariffs and exchange control.

The Brazilian tariff consists mainly of a minimum tariff and a general tariff under which the rates are approximately one-quarter higher than the minimum tariff. Some rates, lower than the minimum, granted to the United States under an agreement with Brazil in February, 1935, are also extended to imports from countries enjoying most-favoured-nation treatment.

Prior to the war, Brazil was second to Argentina among the Latin-American markets for Canadian products but an increase in Canada's exports to Brazil since 1938 made Brazil our most important Latin-American customer in 1941. Concurrently with an increase in Canadian exports to Brazil since the war began, there has been a substantial rise in Canadian imports from that country, mainly due to our purchases of Brazilian cotton.

	Total exports to Brazil	Total imports from Brazil	Balance of trade
1932.....	1,136,043	754,227	381,816
1933.....	1,897,688	543,090	1,354,598
1934.....	2,606,702	806,548	1,800,154
1935.....	3,500,440	996,339	2,504,101
1936.....	3,627,931	874,613	2,753,318
1937.....	5,002,552	847,805	4,154,747
1938.....	3,521,766	768,915	2,752,851
1939.....	4,406,789	1,111,291	3,295,498
1940.....	5,062,829	6,243,344	— 1,180,515
1941.....	8,097,143	19,443,946	—11,346,803

Canada's most important exports to Brazil in recent years have included sewing machines, newsprint, lead in pigs, wood pulp, dressed furs, asbestos, malt, manufactures of felt, upper leather, iron pipes and fittings, rubber tires, rubber belting, electrical apparatus, farm implements, machinery, apples and dried fish.

Among the items of lesser importance the following may be mentioned: Whiskey, rubber goods, textile products, wall-board, hardware, lamps and lanterns, abrasives, fertilizers, mineral pigments, paints and calcium carbide.

Brazil's main exports to Canada include cotton, cotton seed oil, coffee, rice, iron ore, castor oil, and cattle hides. Under the agreement, Brazil enjoys the benefits of the Canadian intermediate tariff and any reductions in rates which may be granted under the tariff to other countries.

We were honoured in Rio de Janeiro by being entertained at a luncheon by President Vargas. We were also guests of the minister of finance, Dr. de Souza Costa, at a luncheon at the jockey club; of Dr. Aranha, the foreign minister, at the beautiful Itamaraty palace, and at a reception by Dr. Machado in the very palatial offices of the ministry of labour and commerce.

The officials of Brazilian Traction both at Rio and at Sao Paulo arranged that we inspect their huge projects at these points, and at all times during our Brazilian stay the officers of these great Canadian developments did everything to make our visit interesting and profitable. Time does not permit of an extended account of the kindnesses and hospitality extended to the Canadian mission in this entrancingly beautiful and interesting city of Rio de Janeiro and at Therezopolis and Petropolis.

Canada's new minister to Brazil had arrived shortly before us and the result of this was that we participated in the great reception that Brazil extended to Mr. Desy. Brazil has welcomed Mr. Desy with open arms, and Canada is very happily represented in this great country larger in extent than the United States. Our minister to the Argentine and Chile, the Honourable Mr. Justice Turgeon, passed us on his way to these countries while we were leaving Brazil.

We flew on the last leg of our journey from Brazil to Trinidad, some 3,200 miles, stopping at Belem or Para, a large port at one of the mouths of the Amazon river, en route.

Discussions regarding our trade relations with Trinidad and other West Indian islands were informal but extremely valuable and we were able during our visit to meet a number of very influential men who have trading connections all through the West Indies and were able to iron out a lot of difficulties and explain actions which had been a source of irritation to many of the importers in the West Indies.

The Latin-American countries are among the few markets which have remained open to us since the outbreak of the war in Europe over two years ago. They constitute markets which we did not cultivate sufficiently before the war.

It is necessary of course that our war effort must come first, that the supply of war materials which we require for our own needs and those of our allies must be assured before everything else. But there are a number of commodities which we can and should export, particularly when they bring back much-needed United States dollars as in the case of our exports to Latin America

Our trade statistics show that we can, and have been able to, increase Canadian exports to Latin America. In 1938 the value of our aggregate exports to the 20 Latin-American republics totalled $17,739,000. In 1940 these exports had risen to $26,190,000 in value, an increase of approximately 50 per cent. For the first ten months of 1941 the value of our total exports to the Latin-American republics exceeded by about $850,000 our exports during the twelve months of 1940, so that the figures for the twelve months of 1941 will show a considerable increase over 1940.

The three trade agreements signed in the course of the mission's tour in South America, the modus vivendi concluded with Ecuador, the arrangement effected with Uruguay as regards foreign exchange, the goodwill created and the publicity accorded to Canada in these countries and in Peru as a result of the tour constitute, we believe, very modestly, much progress in the right direction. These trade agreements were concluded with a view to improving reciprocal trade relations between Canada and the countries concerned, and the necessity of that trade being reasonably reciprocal must be borne in mind by our importers and exporters and by Canadians generally.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I have listened with the utmost interest to the statement the minister has presented to the house. I think he did well to go to South America. I recall that in the session of 1940 I urged that the avenues of trade with the British West Indies, Cuba and the South American countries be explored to their uttermost, having regard of course to the fact that the war was then on and that a very large amount of our commerce with continental Europe had been cut off.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

Latin America, to which the minister has referred in great detail, is a very important part of the western hemisphere. While our trade with Latin America in the past has been small, nevertheless $26,000,000 worth of exports represents a substantial amount of money, and I believe that that trade is capable of great expansion. There are, however, difficulties in the way of extending our trade. There is the question of exchange, and there is the question of transportation, which at all times has been difficult due to the fact that we have had little or no direct connection with those countries. My province is particularly interested in this question of transportation because we grow seed potatoes, in which we have been endeavouring to build up a substantial trade with Argentina. That position has been explored. The minister was good enough a year or so ago, at the request of those interested, in which I had some little part, to send a trade commissioner there. He is supposed to be and I think is, especially qualified to explore the market for seed potatoes and, I hope, bring about results. The young gentleman comes from my own constituency. He is an agronomist by profession. Personally I had not thought of a professional agronomist being sent. The appointment was made by the civil service commission, upon a requisition being made by the department, and apparently the qualifications which the department thought were necessary were those which could be filled only by a professional agriculturist. I am not quarrelling with that decision at all. If the gentleman who was appointed is practical, he can do good work, although there was another man in the employment of the government of New Brunswick who had already been in South America and explored the whole position in previous years, and had intimate personal connections there. I thought possibly some arrangement could have been made to send him. But that is merely in passing.

I referred a moment ago to the question of transportation, and I shall have something to say about that later on. The minister himself also referred to the difficulties of transportation. For the most part cargo space for shipment of our goods to South American countries has to be arranged through New York. I do not assume that there is a great deal of difficulty with regard to package freight; but with regard to large shipments, we will say of potatoes, shippers from my province have found extreme difficulty in getting a substantial amount of cargo space on the New York boats, those of the Grace line and boats of other regular lines sailing to those countries.

That has not been satisfactory, and the result has been that shippers have had to charter ships themselves and arrange for full cargo shipments. With the restrictions on shipping to-day the situation is becoming increasingly difficult.

My colleague from the constituency of Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) is personally very much interested in that trade, because he himself is a shipper and knows a great deal more about the whole position than I do. I invite him now to have something to say on this problem of shipping to Latin America, especially Argentina, and to give the house and especially the minister the benefit of his views as to what changes, if any, ought to take place and what can conveniently be done.

Mr. REID: Is there any direct shipping line from the maritimes?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no direct shipping line from the maritimes to South America. I say that subject to some little reservation because the Canadian National Steamships on the outer service did go as far as Demerara and carried freight to Demerara, but that is in British Guiana. There was a side service to Central America in days gone by, but just what the position is now with respect to that I do not know. It was the only direct service of which I am aware. What effect the loss of one of our ships since the war began has had on our power to transport goods down there, I do not know, but I do understand that one of the difficulties of exporting from the maritimes, at all events, has been lack of shipping. That is a question to which I hope the minister will give his attention as the days go by, in order that we may have more direct communication in the matter of export trade than we have had in the past. I commend that suggestion to him.

The minister evidently had a good time in South America. I almost envied him as I heard his narration of the social events which he attended, but then I reflected that perhaps I did not have, shall I say, the capacity of some people for enjoyment. Perhaps I was better off for not being in the party, although I had thought of reproaching the minister for not having asked me to go along with him. But after hearing from him the details of the lavish and, I am sure, genteel entertainment which he and his party enjoyed there, I am almost glad now that he did not invite me, and I hope that he himself did not find the entertainment too exacting.

I should like to corroborate what the minister said about the capacity and the ability of his deputy minister. I do not want to flatter anyone, but I have an idea that there is no better servant of the crown in the public service than the minister's deputy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very good.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sure we all appreciate that fact, and I am glad the minister, in the course of his remarks, paid tribute to his deputy. I do so myself. I have done so before, and I reaffirm now my faith not only in his integrity—of course that goes without saying—but in his ability and his immense knowledge of Canada's trade. The fact that he is also bilingual—I was almost going to say multilingual—is another great advantage, and I am very glad the minister paid the tribute to his deputy which he did.

Missions of this kind, if properly conducted, as I have no doubt this one was, should always produce good results. The interchange of contacts in international trade visits of this nature should be of inestimable value not only to us but to the nationals of the countries visited. We in Canada know altogether too little about Latin America. Canada, of course, is not unknown in certain portions of Latin America. For years the Royal Bank of Canada have had a chain of branches in Latin America; it began twenty-five years or more ago. At Bogota, in the republic of Colombia, is located the supervisor of the Royal bank for that area. He is a gentleman from my own city, whom I know very well; he is a keen Canadian and has done a great deal to advertise Canada. I do not believe that the minister in the course of his travels reached the capital of Colombia, although he referred to visits to one or more of the coastal cities on the Pacific side. I make no complaint of that, because the capital of Colombia is a very difficult city to reach. The only reasonable way is to fly in from the coast. A journey partly by land and partly by water is a matter of days; by air it is a matter of hours.

At Caracas, capital of the republic of Venezuela, is located a branch of this great Canadian institution, whose manager is also from my city. I had the pleasure of visiting him in days gone by, and I know he has been an agent of good relations between that country and this.

Although it may take a little time, I should like to mention an incident which occurred there that shows the respect in which Canada and Britain are held in Venezuela. We had spent the day in Caracas—this was back in 1929—and we had had a survey of the whole political position and learned something of the situation which subsisted there, and the marked difference between democratic governments here and in that republic. I will go no further than that. But I remarked to Mr. Coburn, who is the agent there, that, having regard to the situation which the students and other elements of the population found themselves in, I thought that some day, when the dictator then in power died, there would be a revolution in the country, and I asked, "Just what would you do with all this American currency and all this gold which you have in this branch?" It was a big branch with a staff of one hundred. We were sitting in his private office, and on the rear wall was a large union jack. I said, "What would you do if the revolution should come?" He said, "I would take that flag and I would drape it over the front door; I would turn the key in the front door and I would go away; and when I came back everything would be all right." He said the people had a great respect for the Canadian business man and for the British business man. I commend that incident of the flag to hon. gentlemen who may be thinking of discarding the union jack as our national flag —the flag which is a protection of Canadian as well as of British interests in Venezuela. I do not intend to make any further observations on that matter.

Another agency there which has made Canada very well known in Brazil is the activity of some of our financial men, especially that relating to the Brazilian Traction company, which, as everybody knows, is controlled in Canada, and which has done a great deal to make the dominion known in the republic of Brazil. The same in a lesser degree is true of Argentina.

I have nothing but praise for the efforts made by the minister and his mission to spread the gospel of good will as well as good trading among the Latin-American republics. Good will is an enormous factor, and the personal touch exemplified in the sending of a cabinet minister and high government officials to the nations of that great sub-continent can have nothing but good results if the matter is properly followed up.

I could not follow the minister in all the intricacies of his explanations respecting the various trade agreements. Some of them are very technical, and unless one had the text in front of him one could not follow with precision the operations of the minister and his party with respect to the agreements with these various countries. But I desire to offer a few comments of a general nature upon our trade relations with South America. They fall naturally under two headings: first, the procurement of essential war supplies from South American countries—which I believe is quite possible; second, the extension of our trade with South America in the post-war period. With regard to the latter, I hope we shall have a forward-looking policy, because when the war is over we shall find an impoverished Europe which will not be able to take much from us in the way of actual purchases. I think there is no doubt that we shall have to supply Europe with many things in order to rehabilitate its peoples, but we cannot look forward to any great trade in that direction until rehabilitation is accomplished. In the meantime we shall be losing a tremendous amount of foreign trade—trade which has been and, I hope, always will be important to Canada. It is not quite as important as the internal trade, which constitutes ninety per cent of our commercial transactions. But any country which has an exportable surplus must keep constantly in mind its foreign trade; and Canada, in some lines, is in that position.

Mr. MARTIN: I would almost say that it was our lifeblood.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should not like to say that—"our lifeblood." It is important, so long as we have an exportable surplus, to the extent that we have an exportable surplus, and in relation to those commodities in which we have an exportable surplus. My hon. friend may have in mind the wheat problem and questions of that kind. Today, of course, our most important, or rather our only outlet across the water is Great Britain.

May I for a moment turn aside to deplore a speech made by a member of the administration during the recent by-election in Quebec East—I refer to my hon. friend the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), who sits for a New Brunswick constituency—in which he stated that sooner or later we should not have to sell anything to Great Britain. I am not attempting to epitomize precisely what he said, but it is something which had better have been left unsaid, even on the hustings in a by-election. Where would this country be if we did not have some outlet to Great Britain? I am not going to say anything more about that. I had intended to say something about it on a previous occasion, and I refer to it now only in passing.

But to return to what I did want to say: It is an accepted fact that up to the outbreak of war at all events the traditional South American trade had been with Europe rather than with North America. Europe required raw materials which South America could produce and paid for those raw materials by the export of manufactured goods. That is why you will find entrenched in Chile, the Argentine, Brazil and other South American countries huge commercial concerns dealing in the export and import trade of those countries with Britain, particularly with Germany, and to a lesser degree with Italy in the latter years. Germany was and still is, I think, very strongly entrenched in the commercial life of some of these Latin-American republics. That has been true in recent years. Germany and Italy have developed an extensive export businss chiefly in the heavy-manufacture lines and in a marked degree have cut into British exports of these lines. To-day, of course, that situation is entirely suspended—at least I believe it is suspended—and the result is that many of these Latin-American countries face very difficult economic circumstances. They are not able to import from and certainly are not able to export to continental Europe, and for that very reason I should think they would welcome the chance to export to Canada if, as and when that can be arranged. They have very large surpluses of raw materials and are unable to secure the required quantities of manufactured goods except from the United States. Of course, our friends in the United States are very keen traders. They have become a great country because of their business acumen and their ability to manufacture and export. The minister will find that there will be the keenest kind of competition with the United States for the Latin-American trade. That is to be expected, and our exporters will, I think, have to accommodate themselves to that situation and endeavour, if they want a part of this trade, to meet the competition that will inevitably arise.

There is this further factor. The United States have been helping financially some of these countries in their economic distress.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Substantially.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, substantially. I believe the aggregate amounts are enormous, relatively at all events, and of course that certainly gives them an inside position which it is going to be very difficult for Canada to meet. We simply cannot meet it if that is to be used as a lever for exports to those countries—purchases by the Latin-American countries.

I wonder how many hon. gentlemen have read Mr. John Gunther's book recently published entitled, "Inside Latin America". I recommend that book to them. They will find it most interesting reading, and most instructive as well. Those who have read it will have been impressed by the importance placed on trade relationships with the Latin-American countries. Mr. Gunther gives a list of fourteen strategic war materials, indispensable to the conduct of the war, which are not produced in the United States. It may be of interest to list these commodities, only two of which, as I understand, are produced in Canada:

Antimony, chromium, coconut shell char (for gas masks), ferrograde manganese, manila fibre, mercury, mica, nickel, quartz crystal, quinine, rubber, silk, tin, tungsten.

Mr. Gunther further states that Latin America has surpluses in several of these commodities, and that, with proper development, they could produce them all except silk. Antimony, he states, could be furnished by Mexico and Peru; manganese by Brazil and Cuba; mercury by Mexico; quartz crystal by Brazil; chromium by Cuba; mica by Peru and Chile; tin and tungsten by Bolivia. Coconut shell char could be produced; manila fibre is now being made experimentally in Costa Rica.

I commend that list to the minister; he will read it in Hansard. It may be that some arrangements can be made to increase our imports of these items. He gave a list himself, but I commend this one to him as having been taken from a source which, I believe, is well informed. It may be of interest to observe that Brazil was once the world's largest producer of rubber, and rubber is, at the moment, a very important element. Indeed, up to fifty or sixty years ago Brazil was, I am informed, the only rubber producing country in the world. It may be that it will become once more a great producer, having regard to the fact that the East Indies plantations are now destroyed or being destroyed. To-day, while rubber trees grow wild over immense areas, I am afraid that production in Brazil has sunk to a low ebb. That, I am told, is because of the competition of the East Indies. With that competition eliminated, it may be possible to revive that production and that export trade. It is said that the President of Brazil is profoundly interested in the resuscitation of the rubber industry and wants to see it developed. There will have to be assistance from the United States and Canada, and with appropriate assistance it might be possible, through such development, to offset any future rubber shortage resulting from the fall of Malaya I offer that, as a constructive suggestion to the minister and the officials of his department, for what it is worth.

I direct attention to the productive capacity of the Latin-American countries in these strategic war materials for the reason that it may be possible to secure from Latin America substitutes for those important raw materials which we can no longer import from the far east. In the meantime one should not forget as well that in Latin America there are other materials produced in which shortages may occur, such as wool, copper and petroleum; and then, of course, Argentina is and has for many years been a great source of supply for the best beef hides in the world, Alberta notwithstanding. The best beef hides come, I am told, from the Argentine.

Mr. REID: There is neither barbed wire nor the warble-fly there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not pretend to give the reason, but that is what tanners and importers have told me. There was a time when these hides were imported direct into Fredericton and turned into sole leather, but like many other maritime industries it has been absorbed by central Canada. We buy our sole leather pretty largely from Ontario, and that is a pity, because we should be able to manufacture it ourselves, though they tell me that they cannot profitably compete because consumption is so low. However, that is just a matter in passing. I commend these suggestions to the minister; and I hope the officials of the government, if they do me the honour of reading them, will explore—perhaps in consultation with officials of the United States government—the possibility of increasing the productive capacity of South American countries in these essential war supplies.

I wish to turn now to a brief consideration of the extension of our trade with South America both now and in the post-war period. As I mentioned earlier, the former trade relations of South America were largely with Europe. These have now ceased. I believe that in the post-war period Canada should make a most aggressive attempt to sell manufactured goods as well as raw materials and the products of agriculture, particularly flour, seed potatoes and other things we can produce in quantities for export. No better seed potatoes are grown anywhere in this northern hemisphere than those produced in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. Our farmers are restricted in a degree in their exports to the United States, and they have to meet the competition of the seed potatoes produced in Aroostook county, which, as everyone knows, is a very large producer. But quality counts, and our producers have the quality; there is no doubt about that. The cleanest seed potato fields on this continent are found first, I think, in Prince Edward Island, and second in New Brunswick. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) shakes his head. I suppose he would reverse the order, and perhaps I should place them at least on an equal plane. But the question of plant disease is important in that regard, and of course we must send out the very best quality that can be obtained. There is a very large market for seed potatoes in South America if the proper transportation and exchange facilities can be arranged.

I should like to say to the Minister that within the last few weeks the whole thing has been hampered by the controls that now exist. Export licences and all that sort of thing have a hampering effect on that trade, which is a very desirable trade indeed. The minister said it was paid for in United States dollars, which is correct. That is important from another standpoint; and I hope that officialdom—I am not using that word in any derogatory sense at all—will make it as easy as possible to send these things to South America. I recommend to the minister that his department give some attention to this question of cramping regulations and restrictions on a trade that ought to be as free as it is possible to make it, for the good not only of our producers but of trade relationships generally between this country and South America. I am not going to particularize further.

Prior to the war, all the Latin-American countries imported large quantities of manufactured goods from Europe. That resulted more or less from very intelligent trade direction, especially on the part of Germany. I believe it should be possible for us, pursuing the good neighbour policy, to gain at least a portion of this market for Canadian manufacturers in the post-war period. There is the difficulty of United States competition, of course. If we could accomplish this, together with the export of natural products, we would be taking a long step toward providing for the readjustment of war industries to a peace-time basis, thereby providing employment for our workmen. I am speaking now of the post-war period. These are the things to which we ought to be looking forward, trying to get as many new markets as we can to take up the slack which will be created when we change back from a war-time activity to a peace-time economy. We cannot afford to forget for a moment that this transition is coming. There need not be a depression if officialdom and business will get together and plan ahead, and I recommend constant study in that regard.

I have referred already to the difficulties in connection with trading with South America resulting from the fact that we have no direct trade routes. Has the minister given any attention or thought to this point? It is not possible at the moment to establish direct trade routes; I am quite sure the shipping is not available. Any shipping that we are building will have to go to replace the shipping being lost in the Atlantic, and for transatlantic trade; but some of that shipping might be diverted to the South American trade. Certainly some of the cargo ships that Canada is building can be diverted to the South American trade after the war is over, and I commend that suggestion to the minister. Perhaps as the result of our merchant shipping programme and our great naval expansion we may become once more in the post-war period what we were a generation or more ago, a great mercantile marine nation. I am sure that is what the people of the maritime provinces would like to see happen. Then we may be able to establish for ourselves direct shipping routes to all the important countries in the world, including those of South America.

Unless in future we are able to establish direct trade routes I fear that it will not be possible to extend our trade with the Latin-American countries in the manner we would all like, particularly because of the competition with the United States. These particular trade agreements to which the minister has alluded, especially the three that are before us, the result of the visit to South America by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his party last autumn, constitute a step in the right direction. By securing for ourselves most-favoured-nation treatment in the markets of Argentina, Brazil and Chile, subject to certain small limitations, as I understood from the minister's statement, I am hopeful that at last an initial step has been taken to extend our trade with these countries.

I should like to have some enlightenment from the minister on one particular matter in connection with the most-favoured-nation treatment. I note that the advantages accorded to Canada do not carry with them the advantages which in one instance Chile accords to Argentina, Bolivia and Peru, and which in another instance Argentina accords to Bolivia, Chile, Paraguay and Uruguay, and again which Brazil accords to contiguous countries. The minister may have covered that point fully; I was not able to follow him. I think he did refer to these matters, but perhaps at a later stage he would be good enough to state succinctly just what the effect of these exceptions from most-favoured-nation treatment will be upon our trade.

I would ask the minister, also, to tell us in what particular lines it is anticipated that our trade with the three countries will be extended as a result of these agreements. In what particular lines does the according of the most-favoured-nation treatment give to Canadian products favourable tariff status, so that increased exports are likely to result? I believe he might also give us a statement as to what tariff barriers are to be surmounted.

In the agreements with Argentina and Brazil I note that certain articles provide that prohibition or restriction may be imposed for the protection of plants and animals, and that measures for protection against disease, degeneration or extinction, as well as measures taken against harmful seeds, plants or animals are not to be affected. Presumably this provision is directed against certain Canadian commodities which might be exported to these countries. I should like to have that position elucidated.

I should hope that these countries will not use these provisions to declare prohibitions. We have a classic illustration of that in connection with the export of potatoes from Canada to Great Britain. They are adamant against importing any of our potatoes in a commercial way because of the presence in Canada, they allege, of the Colorado beetle. Of course that is a terrible pest, and costs the farmers of this country vast sums of money each year. Not only do they lose a large sum of money, but the presence of the beetle causes a great deal of labour.

I am afraid, however, that agricultural communities in the old country have used the beetle as—I shall not say a pretext, but as a means of excluding our potatoes from Great Britain. I have never thought that that was cricket.

I have very little more to say to the minister. I was interested, however, to learn that he spent some time in Chile. I suppose it was not within the ambit of his mission to inquire what Chile was going to do about the service of her external debt. There are many Canadian nationals who bought Chile bonds in days gone by, and who would like to have some interest on those bonds.

Mr. REID: The same as German marks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Probably so. I am not in that class, but I have some Chile bonds. Perhaps I should not have said that; I shall add that I have not many of them. The fact is, however, that large quantities of these bonds are held in Canada, and it will be most reassuring and a mark of the best of bona fides if those countries were to resume payments on their foreign obligations.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I have neither the qualifications nor the background of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) or the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to take part in this debate. I have, however, given some attention to these matters for a number of years, and I accept the invitation of the leader of the opposition to offer some comment.

When the minister began his mission in 1940, as he related to the house he took ill, and there was considerable criticism in various parts of the country to the effect that the minister's illness ought not to have precluded the progress of the mission. I believe it should be said here—and I suggest anyone who knows Latin America will agree—that to have sent anyone other than a minister, and particularly the minister of this department, as head of the delegation, would have been a great mistake.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree.

Mr. MARTIN: The minister has paid appropriate tributes to certain officials in his department. I should like to pay my tribute to a friend of mine who did considerable work, not under governmental but under private auspices. I refer to Mr. Ronald McEachren of the Financial Post in Toronto, a paper with which I cannot always say I am in full accord. I feel, however, that special reference should be made to Mr. McEachren's work. He went to the various Latin-American countries, and did a great deal af advance work of his own which has proved to be of incalculable value. That fact is apparent to anyone who reads business journals, and particularly those in the South American countries.

The discussion thus far has been largely confined to the economic aspect of the problem which, I venture to suggest to the minister, is by no means the important one. To illustrate my meaning in that connection I purpose bringing out into relief, but with a different emphasis and consideration in mind, some of the figures the minister and the leader of the opposition have discussed.

The minister's figures dealt essentially with six countries. There are at least ten countries which, I suggest, should be characterized as being among the most important ones, and whose trade figures must be related, if this discussion is to receive the complete coverage it deserves. The two important countries, per se and in respect of our relations with them are, first Brazil, and then Argentina.

In 1939 Brazil imported from Canada goods to the value of about $4,406,789. That importation made Brazil in that year our chief Latin-American customer. Argentina was next with an importation of about $4,116,923. In 1940—and I am taking these three years because I believe they tell a very interesting story—Argentina took first position, with purchases from Canada amounting to some $6,000,215, representing a 40 per cent increase over the previous year, made up chiefly of imports of newsprint. In the same year Brazil increased her imports to a sum of $5,062,000. In 1941 Brazil continued to increase her imports. In that year they reached a total value of about $8,097,143, while those of Argentina fell back into second position, with a total importation from us of about $7,172,104.

Our imports during these three years from the two countries named are significant. In 1939 we purchased goods to the value of $1,111,291 from Brazil, and from Argentina $4,406,456. In 1940 we bought from Argentina $6,541,862, and from Brazil about $6,243,342, a slightly smaller amount.

In 1941 we bought from Argentina goods valued at $4,763,752, and from Brazil we almost doubled our imports. In that year we imported a value of $19,443,946.

These figures yield but one conclusion—and I do not say this by way of any criticism of our trade commissioners—but the fact remains that two years of war have brought more for us by way of increased trade from Latin America to us, and from us to Latin America, than did fifteen years of good, energetic and efficient work by our trade commissioners. I do not want to criticize what the minister has done because his work in this particular has been of tremendous advantage to our country, particularly in respect of the political relations of this part of North America with Latin America, but the fact is that the trade figures are not impressive. For instance, in 1939 our exports to South America were only 1·8 per cent of our total exports, and our imports from South America in the same year were but 2·8 per cent of our total imports. When you compare that with our trade with all of North America, excluding the United States, where our exports amounted to 2·9 per cent of our total exports and our imports to 2·3 per cent of our total imports, you will realize that trade between Canada and the United States is more important to the United States than the whole Latin-American trade carried on by that country. There are reasons for these relatively unimportant trade balances, reasons which in former days parliament has not frankly considered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I suggest one reason? It has always been an astonishing thing to me that our trade commissioners are not and never have been what I heard one Minister of Trade and Commerce indignantly deny that they were, commercial travellers.

Mr. MARTIN: The leader of the opposition, having been Minister of Trade and Commerce, is more expert in that particular than I am. I was glad to hear his speech to-day, particularly bearing in mind that he spoke on behalf of the Conservative party. I know something about Latin America. I well remember a speech delivered in this house by the former able member for St. Lawrence-St. George. That gentleman had had considerable experience with Latin Americans and he characterized them as people who were hardly civilized, as people with whom we should not try to cultivate any relations. That has been the impression which many Canadians, generally and officially, have had about Latin America, and perhaps the Latin Americans have had somewhat the same impression about us. The time has come, with the world in its present dire straits, when we can no longer take that view of these other twenty-one countries who share our American continental interest.

I would not for a moment suggest that we cannot find increasing opportunities for trade with Latin America, but I do believe that we are overemphasizing and have overemphasized the importance of our trade in the past and the possibilities of our trade in the future, for various reasons, some of which were set out by the leader of the opposition. It is possible that we may increase Canada's imports of linseed, fruits, hides and wool from Latin America, and we may sell them more lumber, newsprint, machinery, textiles, fish and perhaps some wheat to Peru. But the fact is, as the leader of the opposition has mentioned, we must compete in the Latin-American countries with the United States with its lower costs because of mass production and its added advantage because of having been in these markets long before we thought of getting into them. There have also been huge extensions of credits by the United States to Latin America. Then there is the further fact that our economy is competitive with Latin-American countries, rather than complementary. Some of the things that are basic in their national income are basic in ours, and this presents additional difficulties.

As far as tropical products are concerned, a large part of our supplies come to us under preferential agreements from the British West Indies and British Guiana. Even though a movement has been set on foot in the course of the last few days, particularly in Washington, for the general lowering of tariff barriers, I venture to suggest by way of qualification of what the leader of the opposition has said that in the post-war period we shall find it to our essential interest to recover established channels of exchange with Europe; not that we should not try to increase our trade opportunities in Latin America, but because we are an exporting nation, because thirty per cent of our income is based upon what we sell to other nations of the world. Because of our competitive position with the United States we should not forget our normal channels of exchange.

It is true, and I should have said this earlier, that the future may have great opportunities for this country in the Caribbean and in South America, particularly as a result of recent capital expansion on the part of the United States. The anticipated increases in the nutritional standards of many Latin-American countries, together with the consequential increase in the standards of living, may conceivably change the market potentialities for Canada in Latin America. But I think it is safe to say that the strictest analysis of our trade possibilities by those who are specialists in these matters indicates the impossibility of our ever getting into the position of hemispheric self-sufficiency in the economic sense.

I said a moment ago that one of the reasons for our relatively unimportant trade increases in Latin America was our lack of appreciation of Latin America itself. As the leader of the opposition has said, one of our most important contacts with Latin America is the mining, power and traction enterprises which are financed by Canadian capital in Mexico, Brazil, Peru and Colombia. Yet the most serious criticisms of Latin Americans and their ways have come from Canadians who draw dividends from these companies.

I do not wish to emphasize the economic aspects so much, although they are important, as to suggest that we should give attention to the penetration of nazi influence into almost every country of Latin America. This penetration has been by way of subventions to industry and subsidies to air companies, and a situation was created which caused the greatest alarm on the part of the United States and Great Britain. One might well ask where we who are fighting Germany to-day would be were it not for the good-neighbour policy of the United States and Latin America, to which policy we as a nation have made very little contribution. Consequently in analysing our opportunities in this respect we must bear in mind not only our economic position but particularly our political opportunities with Latin America. I do not think I am expressing far-fetched views or stretching the bounds of relevancy when I suggest that the conclusions reached at Ogdensburg by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) can be considered to be related to this whole problem; for the report given out jointly by the President of the United States and our Prime Minister on the Ogdensubrg agreement included this phraseology, that the permanent board was to:

—commence immediate studies relating to sea, land and air problems including personnel and material, and to consider in a broad sense the defence of the north half of the western hemisphere.

The north half of the western hemisphere may include the south side of the Panama canal or it may merely embrace the north side, but I do submit that this important statement made on behalf of our two countries has a definite relation to the problem under discussion. The area covered by the understandings or conclusions reached at Ogdensburg includes the north American Republics of Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica and Panama; the republics and colonies in the Caribbean, and Colombia, Venezuela, the Guianas and parts of Brazil and Ecuador in South America. Thus it includes the whole of the greater Panama canal zone, which according to the very text referred to by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), namely, Mr. Gunther's work, would be that part of America where the nazis would be more likely than not to exercise mischief.

Our interest in the defence of the canal is not less than that of the United States, although we traditionally seem to regard it as out of our sphere; for the canal is the shortest ocean route between our eastern and western provinces. The canal also affords the quickest means of ocean communication from our western ports to the European market, upon which we are more dependent than even the United States.

I am not suggesting or trying to read into these treaties or into the Ogdensburg conversations something that was not contemplated, but it may be that we are unconsciously, and I think properly, drifting into an orbit where there are at stake economic interests for this country, and more particularly that there lies an opportunity of recognizing that in Latin America exists the only contemporary collectivity of nations outside of the British commonwealth whereby there can be some guarantee of peaceful relations between states. There has been great difficulty in the past in discussing this subject in the house. Closer relations with Latin America have always been construed by many as an attempt to weaken the ties we have with the United Kingdom and the British empire, just as attempts to bring about closer relationship between Canada and the United States have often been similarly construed. Surely the fact that to-day twenty-one of the South American and Central American republics have recently severed connections with the axis powers, in spite of nazi influence in those countries during the past six years, indicates that it is up to us, not only unconsciously but consciously, to go about to identify our position in Latin America—not thereby weakening our relationships with Great Britain or the British commonwealth, but just as our friendship with the United States has brought Britain and the United States closer together, we might as a result of our more active participation in the whole matter of hemispheric defence, viewed economically and politically, bring Britain, the United States and ourselves and the Latin-American countries closer and closer together in respect of the period of post-war reconstruction.

Why should this not be done? While there is some denial in pan-American countries of the democratic process and of the principle of due process of law, there is nevertheless a general sympathy with the democratic method. In the whole system of collective organization as we have it in the pan-American system there is a recognition of racial equality, an acknowledgment of the desirability of preserving the democratic processes. We find there in almost every national instance a respect for religious beliefs. Is there not there an indication such as we have had recently at Rio de Janeiro that there can be cooperation, and effective cooperation, between one nation and another? Do these nations not have respect for treaties?

It seems to me therefore, Mr. Speaker, that we have every bond with these peoples. We want not only to increase our trade with them but to go along generally with them and, as the leader of the opposition said, build a stronger world politically in the interests of civilization and decency. To the extent that these treaties are a step in that direction, I compliment the minister and the government upon their efforts. I am sure that the house, if given the opportunity, would want this discussion to go down as indicating to the people in what I might call the unknown countries south of the Rio Grande that we regard them to be civilized men and women and members of nations with whom we would like to enjoy the most friendly relations, and that we propose in the future to perpetuate our economic and political relations with them to our mutual advantage.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed greatly the speeches which have been delivered thus far. I feel that it is in order to congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and his party on what I believe was a fine piece of work. Inasmuch as the minister himself accorded to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a good deal of the credit in this connection, I should like to pass along a similar tribute to him too. I enjoyed the contribution of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the contribution of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who always speaks in this chamber with moderation and with evidence of scholarship and good judgment.

With respect to the measures now before us, I believe that they deserve our hearty approval. It seems to me that judged from almost every point of view, these agreements are highly commendable. It is true that we need particularly at this time good-will in the hearts of as many peoples as possible, and it surely does seem difficult to conceive why good-will should not be engendered first in the hearts of our neighbours, and our nearest neighbours. The Latin-American people are surely our neighbours.

It is well, I think, that all the goods listed as being contemplated for exchange between Canada and the South American countries named are goods, first of all, which we need from them, and second, goods which do not compete with our own. I consider it an unwise tendency in any state to endeavour to leave its own industries unprotected, to throw them open to competition with goods coming from abroad. It therefore is an important matter that these goods do not, as it appears, compete with Canadian goods.

Now, the goods which we are to export are goods which we can spare. I believe that for many years we have been neglectful of our own people. The first duty of Canada with respect to her production is to see to it that her own people have their needs supplied. Many times in the past we have thought first of all of the goods which we could sell abroad, not bothering much about the people at home—very much as our fathers on the farms used to sell the marketable eggs and keep the poor ones for the family to eat. That was good management in those trying times, but I am not sure that it is good management nationally.

Another thing which appeals to me in connection with this treaty is that very few other nations wish to export the particular goods which we propose to export. I believe that long before this parliament finishes we shall be engaged in earnest discussions of the causes of war. It ought to be borne in on every hon. member that one of the greatest causes of war is the attempt on the part of one nation to force its goods into markets which it does not need in order to live, thereby excluding from those markets similar goods from other nations that need to sell in those markets to live. No offence is committed in this treaty in relation to that important matter. Therefore we can say that Canada, in enjoying these treaties, will not be excluding others from needed markets, will not be depriving others of enjoyment.

Another aspect of these agreements which commends itself to members of my group is the tendency to give favoured nation treatment in so far as that means a lowering of tariffs. It may be difficult for people who think along lines which Conservatives habitually follow to conceive of lowering tariffs and at the same time protecting home industry. It must be understood—it must come to be understood—that there are ways of protecting the home industry other than the raising of a tariff barrier, which increases the price to everyone in the country. It is completely possible to protect our own industry by special favours conferred upon our industry. For example, by using the national credit of a country it is completely possible—has been proved so in the world time and again during the last ten years—to lower the costs of production, to decrease the costs of freight, and to discount the price of the commodity as it comes to the consumer. If such a series of devices be used within the state it is completely possible to lower the tariff and still protect home industries. Since that is so I commend this tendency toward lower tariffs.

I believe I have said all that at this time we feel disposed to say. We commend the treaties.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): These treaties have had a sufficiently long discussion this afternoon and little more needs to be said. I rise simply to say that we of this group are in favour of every treaty and every move that can be made to bring about better relations, both commercial and social, across the world.

I should like to emphasize one point. In our relationships with our South American neighbours the time has come when we ought to join with them in the pan-American conference. I am British-born and therefore I have naturally a great regard and love for the old land. But I can see no reason in the world why this country should not realize its geographical, economic and commercial position and enter into the closest relationships possible with our neighbours across the line, and with our neighbours, rather more remote, in South America. It would be good for the world, for Britain, for Canada, for all of us; and I hope that as these trading relationships are promoted, as these treaties go into effect, the government will fill that vacant seat at the pan-American conference and assist our good neighbour to the south in bringing about still better relationships between the Anglo-Saxon and Latin-American peoples.

After all that has been said in praise of the treaties, nothing much remains for me to say. We approve them. We hope they are a forerunner of future trade relationships in ever-widening fields; and we give the adoption of these treaties our whole-hearted support.

On motion of Mr. Stirling the debate was adjourned.

FARM CREDIT

ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS IN SPRING OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Has the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the government made any provision for seeing to it that the farmers of Canada are granted the credit they need for their spring farming operations?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member was kind enough to send me a copy of the question just before the house convened this afternoon, and I passed it on to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who I thought would properly answer it. I can only say what was said at the time we discussed it, that the only provision made by the federal government to provide credit for the farmers is through the farm loan board. No other provision is made.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What I had in mind was this. Has the government made any representations to the banks urging them to be a little more generous in granting credit to farmers in view of the fact that we need production just now?

Mr. GARDINER: Some representations were made by the Department of Agriculture, on behalf of the farmers of Alberta, to the banks in connection with the purchase of feed for the finishing of hogs, and I understood the banks did make that provision at that time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

KIRKLAND LAKE STRIKE—PROTECTION OF UNIONISTS—SUPPRESSION OF PRESS REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): During the present week a brutal attack was made upon certain trade union organizers and on certain trade union premises at Sudbury, Ontario. The question was raised in this house a few days ago. This incident has been completely suppressed so far as the press of Canada is concerned, and I should like to know if the government will investigate to ascertain the reason for that suppression.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): It strikes me that it was suppressed at the instance of the parties concerned. There was no suppression on the part of this government. No knowledge has come to the government of anything that has happened at Sudbury, and it does seem to me that with regard to any question of this kind raised in the house, when people wire to private members they should in all fairness wire to the government as well. Let me say frankly and honestly that we have no knowledge whatever of this matter from any source except the telegram read by the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen).

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the minister misunderstood me. I am not finding fault with the government. I am asking if this incident was suppressed by the censor, or is there some other reason for its suppression. The Prime Minister will understand the seriousness of such a thing.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should be greatly surprised if it was suppressed in any way by the censor. I will look into the matter, but I see no reason why the censor would suppress it, and, as I have said, I should be surprised if it had been suppressed.

Mr. MacINNIS: It has been suppressed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Some of the papers never pay any attention to some things I do, and the censor has nothing to do with it.

Mr. SLAGHT: May I say a word of information for my hon. friend's benefit? I am advised that those who are alleged to have been mistreated have refrained from laying any charges whatever before any authorities ready at hand. There is a suggestion that the whole matter was a show.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

REFERENCE TO ADVERTISEMENTS IN TORONTO "SATURDAY NIGHT"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to call the attention of the government to an advertisement appearing in to-day's Toronto Saturday Night entitled "Let's quit kidding ourselves about our big war effort". I refer particularly to the last paragraph:

The fault is not all industry's, of course. There are fat-headed bottlenecks in political ranks at Ottawa to be reckoned with. But even those barnacles on the nation's war effort can't stop us if we won't let them. Fortunately, we have in the Department of Munitions and Supply, men recruited from industry—men who know production. Let us give those men all the help and support we can. Don't wait for leadership. Provide it!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By whom is that signed?

Mr. COLDWELL: "Manufacturing and Industrial Engineering", published by Consolidated Press Limited. I wish to ask this question of the government. In what respects has political interference militated against industrialists who are in charge of our war effort? The only real interference I know of was at the beginning of the war when these gentlemen refused to accept contracts from the government on a limitation of five per cent profit. It is about time that these people should understand that, so far as this house is concerned at least, we are giving them all the money and support that we are asked to give.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the hon. member expects me to answer him.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

BRITISH COLUMBIA SECURITY COMMISSION—EVACUATION FROM PROTECTED AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I thought I ought to bring at once to the attention of the house a decision which the government made to-day with reference to the situation in British Columbia and the evacuation of persons of Japanese origin in that province.

All hon. members, I am sure, realize what an enormous undertaking the moving of large numbers of persons from their homes to other parts of the country really is, and how many are the considerations of which account must be taken in a transaction of great magnitude, particularly where it has to be carried out expeditiously. We have felt that it would be helpful in every way to the province of British Columbia, in meeting the situation, if we were to associate with the government's effort prominent citizens of the province itself so that they might bring their combined knowledge of affairs in the province to bear on the carrying out of the various projects which it will be necessary to undertake in evacuating this large number of people. The government therefore has decided to appoint what will be designated the British Columbia security commission. The present intention is to have three members, all of whom will be persons outstanding in the province. The government has asked Mr. Austin Taylor if he would act as chairman of the commission and he has expressed his willingness to accept the position. The commission will be for the purpose of directing and supervising the evacuation of persons of Japanese origin from protected areas to the particular localities to which they will be sent. The commission will have to do with the transportation, placement, accommodation and so on of the different persons who are to be evacuated. The government itself will continue to do all that it is doing and had planned to do, but the work will be carried out in association with, and more particularly under the direction of the commission. Every agency of government that can be of service to that body will be asked to assist in helping to perform this large undertaking in a manner that will serve to occasion the least irritation among those who are being transferred, and in a manner which will help to give the citizens of British Columbia the most in the way of essential security. All that can be done by government departments will be carried out through that agency.

I thought it advisable to make this statement at once in order that the citizens of British Columbia may know of the government's purpose in the matter. The order in council appointing the commission has not yet been passed, but in all probability will be passed to-morrow.

Mr. GREEN: In that connection may I ask whether this security commission will have any power to settle evacuees outside the province, or is it the intention that they shall simply be moved from one part of the province to another? There is also another question. In this evening's Ottawa newspapers there is a news dispatch to the effect that there has been an amendment made to the defence of Canada regulations providing that the Japanese may not possess motor vehicles and other articles. Has that order been passed within the last day or two and, if so, could we have the details?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was going on to tell the house that my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) has a copy of the recent order just referred to, and I believe he intends to table it before adjournment. I have no doubt that the minister will also wish to reply to my hon. friend's question. As to the scope of the powers of the commission, the commission will not be restricted in the matter of the localities to which members of the Japanese population are to be moved. The powers of the commission will be broad, and the cooperation of the government will be as extensive as government cooperation can be made.

Mr. GREEN: The powers will extend beyond the boundaries of the province?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is rather an important announcement. As I understand the Prime Minister's statement, the commission is set up with full plenary powers, both administrative and executive, and, I suppose, responsible to the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is certainly a new departure. I understood this matter was going to be dealt with under the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), who spoke the other day as though he were taking complete charge of it. This is a complete change of policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Labour will be the minister responsible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But this commission will have full plenary powers, both in administration and in an executive capacity, under the terms of the order in council which is passed, I assume, under the War Measures Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should not like to specify at this moment in exact terms either the powers of the commission or the extent of the government's administration of the phases of the work which will have to be carried out. My hon. friend will realize that an order in council making provision for a body of this kind will have to be prepared with great care; and until it is prepared I prefer not to say more than I have said about the scope or purpose of the commission's work. I have thought it advisable, however, to make known immediately that the government has this step in contemplation.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In view of the authority given this commission or advisory board—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not an advisory board, according to the statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not an advisory board.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: All right; this committee or commission is to have rather wide powers. I understand the chairman is to be Mr. Austin Taylor, for whose appointment I commend the Prime Minister. Apparently, from what the Prime Minister has said, the advice of this committee is to have a great deal to do with what action is taken in connection with the Japanese; and as a British Columbia member vitally interested in the matter I am particularly interested in knowing who will make up the remainder of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot give my hon. friend the names at the moment, because I am not in a position to do so. Mr. Taylor has been advised to confer with the government of British Columbia and will of course have further conference with our own government with respect to the selection of the further personnel of the commission. Beyond that I cannot say.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I thank the Prime Minister for the information that Mr. Taylor has been requested to confer with the government of British Columbia as to the personnel of the committee. In all seriousness might I ask the government to suggest to Mr. Taylor that he also consult with the elected federal members from that province.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Naturally the government here has to take the responsibility for the entire personnel of the commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Responsibility for the whole thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly; but I want to make clear to my hon. friend that in this matter the government is most anxious to enlist the cooperation of every agency in meeting the situation that has arisen on the coast, and in meeting any other situations which may arise, and we would wish particularly to work in complete cooperation with the government of British Columbia, as well as with the citizens of the province in so far as their cooperation can be helpfully secured.

Mr. SLAGHT: As I understand it, the powers of the commission have not yet been defined conclusively; the matter is still in the making. The selection of Mr. Austin Taylor is a most happy one, and the appointment of this commission, in this most extraordinary situation which has ever developed in our country, is an excellent move. But in all deference may I suggest that the powers of the commission should not override any of the powers contained in the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They will not.

Mr. SLAGHT: They can walk along hand in hand, but I suggest that there might be an individual case, or ten individual cases, in which it would be desirable to act more drastically than the commission might see fit to act, and that our defence of Canada regulations should not be interfered with in any way by the powers given to the commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is absolutely certain.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think they could exercise any powers under the defence of Canada regulations. I do not think you could delegate such powers to a commission.

Mr. SLAGHT: Under the War Measures Act you might.

Hon. L. S. St. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the defence of Canada regulations were amended to empower the Minister of Justice to make certain orders with respect to all persons ordinarily resident in a protected area. That order in council was tabled here on Wednesday of this week. There has been an amendment to the defence of Canada regulations to authorize the enforcement of such orders as may be made by the Minister of Justice, not only by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police but by any police officer, provincial or municipal, in the area affected. I should like to table a copy of that order and to suggest that perhaps it might be printed, as were the others, in the Votes and Proceedings.

Following that, there was made by the Minister of Justice an order dated February 26, 1942, which I also table and suggest that it be included in the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To what does that relate?

Mr. St. LAURENT: That is the order dealing first of all with the curfew imposed upon all persons of Japanese origin; an order that all persons of Japanese origin give up all motor vehicles, cameras, radio transmission or receiving sets, firearms, ammunition and so forth; that they be required forthwith to deliver up these articles to the nearest justice of the peace or peace officer, and that he be required to give a receipt for the article delivered to him and immediately notify the Royal Canadian Mounted Police of the receipt of such article by him. The order also provides that every person of the Japanese race shall leave a protected area forthwith. That is completed by the terms of the regulation itself, which provide that any person in any protected area reasonably believed by any peace officer or by any person acting on behalf of his majesty to be contravening the regulation may, without prejudice to other proceedings, be removed from the protected area or detained therein by any peace officer or person acting on behalf of his majesty as aforesaid. Therefore the order made by the Minister of Justice, and the regulations, provide that from now on it is an offence against the regulation for any person of Japanese origin to be outside his premises between dusk and dawn. It is an offence for him to retain possession of a motor car, explosives, or one of the other objects enumerated. It is an offence for him to be within a protected area, and for any such offence he may be removed from the area, or detained by any peace officer. Instructions were immediately given for carrying out these provisions, through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and in cooperation with provincial and municipal police in British Columbia.

The instructions provide, of course, that with respect to the removal of persons of Japanese origin there will have to be priorities. They cannot all be moved at the same moment, and for that purpose instructions are to be taken from the chiefs of the army, navy and air services, as to which are the most urgent cases. Males of sixteen years and upward will be and are being dealt with just as quickly as provision can be made to house them.

The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) has been kind enough to call my attention to what was regarded as some conflict respecting the orders of February 24, as reported in Votes and Proceedings. I think the hon. member will agree, upon looking at them, that there is no real conflict. The one order which is generally applicable to the whole of Canada prevents the acquisition of land or crops by a person of Japanese origin. That contains provision that it does not apply to the taking by lease of buildings for a period of not more than one year.

It was believed that when these people had to leave protected areas it might be possible for them to take short-term leases of buildings for their own accommodation, pending some other arrangement. It is now represented that there may be areas outside the protected areas where they should not be allowed even to do that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where they are not wanted.

Mr. St. LAURENT: Yes, and where there would be unusual reasons for not wanting them. I should not imagine there would be many areas in Canada where there would be an active desire to acquire them.

On that point I wish to assure the hon. member that we shall welcome any suggestion, and that these orders may have to be further extended. Any suggestion made will receive very careful consideration, because it is the desire of the department to have these orders in form such as adequately to cope with the situation.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted, under these unusual circumstances, I should like to make one or two comments. The minister has been good enough to explain to me some of the conditions under which this new order is being issued. I note that it applies not only to nationals, as did the previous order, but to those of Japanese origin. They are to move forthwith.

It appears to me not improbable that this may start something in the nature of a flood. I want to warn the government once more that if the representations and protests from the part of British Columbia which I represent are not heeded, and these people are allowed to filter in and to settle for a temporary period, even under lease, I am very much afraid there will be grave trouble.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the minister. I understood him to say that those Japanese in areas considered most vital are to be moved. My understanding is that the first Japanese to be moved are the Japanese nationals. My question is: Will Japanese be moved from vital areas, such as power plants, irrespective of their nationality?

Mr. St. LAURENT: Yes; those to be first moved will be moved having respect to the area. The various departments of national defence are to indicate which areas they consider specially vulnerable, and all persons of Japanese origin are to be moved from those areas as quickly as possible.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They will be the first moved?

Mr. St. LAURENT: Yes; they will be the first ones moved.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make some comment respecting the point raised by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), and would suggest that we have to be reasonable. If we are going to put the onus on the government—and it will have to be put on the government—of removing these people from areas in which it is dangerous to leave them, we must remember that they must be settled somewhere. There is an obligation upon the government to find a place to put them. There is also an obligation upon hon. members to assist the government in finding that place. Otherwise there is no rhyme or reason to the attitude we take.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We have done that.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 6.20 p.m.

Monday, March 2, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

REFERENCE TO LETTER IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN" FROM JAMES E. BROOKS

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, as a private Liberal member and a French Canadian from the province of Quebec it is my duty to rise to a question of privilege in respect of a letter published by the Ottawa Citizen in its issue of February 18. The letter is headed "Shadow of Vichy in Canada," and is addressed to the editor of the Citizen in these words:

> Winston Churchill says that the lowest point in the war was when the French folded up. French politicians were responsible. Can it happen in Canada that the representatives of French-Canadian political remote control can cause the same thing here?
> Think it over. Vichy is still represented at Ottawa. French Canada controls 65 seats in the House of Commons. There are only 245. 'Nuff said.
> James E. Brooks
> Montreal, February 16, 1942.

This James E. Brooks is the president of the James E. Brooks Cotton company, of Montreal. His business address is 614 St. James street, Montreal; his home address is Sea Island Beach, Georgia. The records of the customs offices will show that he deals in cotton imported from United States and Brazilian firms which are enemy controlled.

Does he not know the names Esteve Brothers, or J. Kahn and Company, of Campanera? The money he pays for this cotton goes to Italy or Germany, because it is cotton that was originally bought for and on account of German and Italian principals. He gets it cheap and sells it to well-known Canadian textile firms, who are not averse to exploiting their French-Canadian employees.

The proof of this could be found in the files of the customs department. If a return were tabled of Canadian firms which trade with the enemy, no French-Canadian firm would be found in that list; only good "patriots" who are shouting for conscription. And no French Canadian is on the board of directors of any such company.

Brooks purchased time over American radio stations, as an American of the south, and probably a member of the Ku Klux Klan, to carry on a political campaign during the last by-election in Welland and York South, in favour of Arthur Meighen. It is time that these "patriots"—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: —who trade with the enemy for profit, should be shown up when they want to conscript the good farmers' sons. I wonder if that dirty Brooks is not well acquainted with the fellow who sent an electoral death threat and an electoral silver bullet to Arthur Meighen during the last by-election.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have we to listen to tirades like that?

PLEBISCITE ACT

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) presented the second report of the special committee appointed to consider Bill No. 10, respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes of such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada, as follows:

Your committee has held four sittings. Representations were made to it on behalf of the residents of the Yellowknife administrative district in the Northwest Territories. Careful consideration was given to Bill No. 10, "The Dominion Plebiscite Act 1942" and your committee have agreed to report the said bill with amendments.

A reprint of the bill, as amended, has been ordered.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 21 TO PROCEED WITH BILL THIS DAY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in announcing on Friday evening the business for to-day, I did not mention the possibility of the house considering the plebiscite bill. I did refer to the matter on the previous evening. I then stated that if the bill were given its second reading that evening it was possible that we might be in a position to consider it on Monday when it would have been reported back to committee of the whole.

The bill has just been reported back to committee of the whole and, as the leader of the opposition and all hon. members are aware, the government is anxious to proceed with it as quickly as possible. Under the circumstances I was going to ask if hon. members would give their consent to proceeding with discussion of the bill in committee of the whole to-day. If we are to proceed a motion will, of course, be required, because the rule is that there must be forty-eight hours' notice after a bill is reported back from any standing or special committee before it can be considered. There is another rule, however, which provides that in respect of an important matter consent may be obtained and a measure proceeded with.

If the house would give its consent I should like to move:

That bill No. 10, an act respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes at such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada, be considered in committee of the whole this day and that standing order 21 be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to delay the passage of the bill. I believe everything that could be said against it has been said more than once. I am content therefore to accede to this order of business, if there is an understanding that we will not hurry over the bill and the regulations. Frankly I have not been able to read all the regulations. They are most voluminous, and there are at least one or two which to my mind are contentious. If there is an undertaking that it will not be forced through to-day I should be quite agreeable. What would be the alternative? What other business would we go on with if we did not take up this bill? Would we take the agriculture resolutions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not the agriculture resolutions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not to-day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, not to-day. There are two resolutions with respect to trade with south American republics; in fact there are three. I doubt if they would take very long. There is also a resolution to be moved by the Minister of Pensions and National Health which might possibly come up this evening. I mentioned that we might wish to move into committee of supply to call one or two items. I have no hesitation in giving my hon. friend the assurance he has asked for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With respect to the trade agreements, my colleague, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield), probably knows more about these from the standpoint of business than anyone in this house. He was desirous of speaking but he has gone to bed with a bad cold and cannot be in the chamber to-day. If some means could be afforded whereby this could be held over, say until to-morrow or the next day, we would be most grateful. In the meantime I shall be glad to facilitate matters as much as I can.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no immediate haste with regard to the trade agreements.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I would ask the Prime Minister not to proceed with this bill to-day, because many hon. members who are interested in it are not here. They were under the impression that we were not going to proceed with this measure to-day. Besides, I should like to have time to read the provisions of the bill, which are voluminous.

Mr. BRADETTE: The members should be here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that the bill may take some little time in committee and I think there will be ample opportunity for hon. members to discuss the matters they would wish to discuss on the bill. If we proceeded with it this afternoon there would be an opportunity afforded also this evening for discussion. As to having discussion begin now in committee of the whole, I hope my hon. friend will not press his objection. If we find as we proceed that we are going too rapidly, the committee will I am sure agree not to conclude discussion at the present time but to permit a general discussion later on.

Mr. RAYMOND: If the Prime Minister will agree that section 4 will not be passed I am agreeable.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, speaking on this motion, it was stated by the right hon. the Prime Minister that a certain entente had been arrived at between the allied countries regarding the conduct of this war. My privilege to-day is to offer a primeur to the house. I am sorry I have not the English translation of that word for the benefit of my hon. friends. What I have to offer is a magnificent letter which is a worthy preface to any discussion or debate on a bill like this. This letter was sent by ferry command by a prominent citizen of the metropolis of Canada, the city of Montreal, and it was received this morning in London by no less a person that the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Right Hon. Winston Churchill. Here is the letter which I hold in my hand and which I have the privilege to read to this hon. chamber:

Montreal, February 25, 1942.

Mr. Prime Minister:

A citizen of the commonwealth, no matter how humble, always enjoys the right to communicate with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, to give him his reflections and make known to him his thoughts. There are moments, rare it is true, when the right becomes a duty. I think that, for the writer, that moment has arrived, sir.

Mr. Prime Minister, the citizen who writes is a Canadian of the French language, a loyal subject of the king of Canada faithful to the culture of his forebears devoted to the Franco-British union in Canada,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The motion before the house is that Bill No. 10 be considered in committee of the whole this day and that standing order 21 be suspended in relation thereto. I take it that the hon. member is speaking to the merits of the bill, and this could more properly be discussed in committee of the whole rather than at this time.

Mr. POULIOT: If I may be allowed to read the letter as soon as the house goes into committee of the whole, then I have no objection. What I want to read pertains to the conduct of the war, and it is drafted in the finest English language. This is precisely the matter before us now.

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be in order for the hon. member to take that up when we get into committee of the whole. At the moment we are dealing with a motion for the suspension of standing order 21 in order that the plebiscite bill may be considered in committee of the whole this day. Perhaps the hon. member will wait until the bill gets into committee of the whole.

Mr. POULIOT: It was not a matter of obstruction. I just wanted to place it before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I was not able to hear distinctly whether the Prime Minister gave a commitment that this discussion would take place to-night rather than this afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said that I thought we would be all afternoon on the bill as well as to-night. We could hold over any clauses which it was thought desirable to discuss later. I have already agreed to holding over clause 4 till to-night. We will not try to rush the bill through but would like to make what progress we can with the general consent of the house.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PRAIRIE FARM INCOME REGULATIONS

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. What is the total amount paid under the prairie farm income regulations?
2. What has been the total cost of administration?
3. What are the names and addresses of any additional persons hired as inspectors and supervisors for the administration of this bonus, and what was paid to each in (a) salary, (b) expenses?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. $6,668,909.14.
2. $44,529.44.

3. No additional persons hired. This work was carried out by the inspectors engaged in connection with the wheat acreage reduction and Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

UNPRODUCTIVE GAS AND OIL WELLS—STEEL PIPE

Mr. WINKLER:

Is there any regulation of any department of the government requiring that steel pipe in unproductive oil and gas wells be drawn for use in war purposes?

Mr. MICHAUD: No.

GASOLINE RATIONING—DISABLED WAR VETERANS

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

Will the regulations rationing or limiting the use of gasoline give preference to crippled or partly disabled war veterans using for transportation vehicles requiring gasoline for motive power?

Mr. MICHAUD: Incapacitated citizens requiring the use of an automobile for the normal conduct of their business have been given special consideration and have been placed in category "C" of the gasoline rationing regulations. No special consideration has been given for incapacitated citizens using a car for other than business purposes. Such cases will be dealt with on their merits.

ONTARIO HOG BONUS

Mr. STOKES:

1. How many hogs entitled to the bonus offered by the government of Ontario were marketed during the year 1941?

2. What amount of money was paid to hog producers in Ontario by the provincial government as bonus during the year 1941?

Mr. GARDINER: Information not available.

HIGHWAY ROUTES TO THE NORTH*

Mr. HANSELL:

1. Has the government considered the setting up of a commission to study an inland route, north from Edmonton to the Yukon and Alaska?

2. If so, when will the government make some announcement in respect thereto?

3. Has the government had any communications either by correspondence or otherwise, or representation, with the United States government, since May, 1940, in respect to a highway through Canada to Alaska?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might answer this question orally. Answering the first question, as the house has been informed, the appropriate defence agencies of Canada and the United States have been and are giving close consideration to the problems of communication with Alaska. As to the second question, I may say that the reason I am answering the question orally is to say that the report that is made on the matter will likely be a military report and it is doubtful if publicity can be given to it. I cannot give any assurance at the present time that publicity will be given to it; I would first have to see the report. The answer to the third question is yes.

NATIONAL RAILWAYS DINING CAR SERVICE—FRESH SEA FOODS

Mr. WHITE:

1. Are fresh sea foods always served on government-owned trains operating out of Halifax?

2. If not, why?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Yes; as available and according to season.

2. See answer to question No. 1.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. CASSELMAN:

1. Who are the present members of the Canadian section joint international board of engineers for the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence power and navigation scheme?

2. When were they appointed and what have each received each year since 1938 in, (a) remuneration; (b) travelling expenses?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. It is presumed that the reference is to the "Canadian Temporary Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Basin Committee", presently dealing with the engineering features of the project, the members of which are: G. A. Lindsay, Department of Transport; T. H. Hogg, chairman, Ontario, Hydro-Electric Power Commission; O. O. Lefebvre, vice-president, Quebec Streams Commission; J. E. Read, Department of External Affairs.

2. The members of the committee were appointed by order in council October 23, 1940.

(a) Remuneration: T. H. Hogg and O. O. Lefebvre received no remuneration for their services on this committee. Messrs. Lindsay and Read received no additional remuneration over and above their regular salaries.

(b) Travelling expenses: The following travelling expenses were paid in connection with the work of the committee:

Name	1940-41	*1941-42
G. A. Lindsay	$312 76	$1,174 33
T. H. Hogg	nil	nil
O. O. Lefebvre	218 69	658 18
J. E. Read	11 35	470 38

*Up to February 15, 1942.

COARSE GRAINS

Mr. BRUNELLE:

1. What quantity of coarse grains was brought to Ontario from western Canada last year, under the preferential freight rate?

2. What was the average price of such coarse grains (oats, rye and barley), in Winnipeg and in Toronto, last year?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Quantity of grain which was brought to Ontario from western Canada under freight policy which was carried out co-operatively with the Ontario Department of Agriculture and expired July 15, 1941, was as follows:

	Bushels
Oats	1,717,016
Barley	888,690
Screenings	301,108
Wheat	248,259
Mixed Grain	69,698
Rye	33,599
	3,258,370

2. As the grain was purchased by private transaction no record is available as to the prices paid.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What was the total amount paid up to February 1, 1942, under the national unemployment insurance scheme by, (a) employees; (b) employers?

2. What was the total amount of benefits paid up to the aforesaid date to employees entitled to same?

3. How many employees were paid the said benefits up to the aforesaid date?

4. How many employees in Canada were contributing under the scheme as of February 1, 1942?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Contribution and revenue figures covering contributions by employers and employees including remittances from Post Office in February, 1942, covering January purchases of stamps are: (a) Employees (50·37%), $13,972,636.26; (b) Employers (49·63%) $13,767,360.29; total $27,739,996.55; contributions from government, $5,547,999.31; interest earned to December 31, 1941, $105,890.48; grand total, $33,393,886.34.

2. Nil.

3. Nil.

4. Up to February 1, 1942, approximately 2,300,000 books had been issued to persons working in insured employment.

ALASKA HIGHWAY COMMISSION

Mr. HANSELL:

1. What was the total cost of the British Columbia-Yukon-Alaska highway commission created by order in council P.C. 3252?

2. What are the names and occupations of each of the members of the commission?

[Mr. Brunelle.]

3. What did each of these members receive by way of (a) salary and emoluments, (b) travelling and other expenses?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. $18,287.67.

2. Honourable Charles Stewart, Chairman, International Joint Commission; Brigadier-General T. L. Tremblay, Department of National Defence; J. M. Wardle, Esq., Director, Surveys and Engineering Branch, Department of Mines and Resources; Arthur Dixon, Esq., Deputy Minister, Department of Public Works, province of British Columbia; J. W. Spencer, Esq., David Spencer Limited, Victoria, B.C.

3. (a) Nil; (b) Hon. Charles Stewart, $1,864.85; Brigadier-General T. L. Tremblay, $782.20; J. M. Wardle, Esq., $1,336.48; Arthur Dixon, Esq., $1,026.45; J. W. Spencer, Esq., $1,087.30.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. What was the total amount of bonuses paid in 1940 to each of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act?

2. What was the total amount of collections under that act in each of the three prairie provinces?

3. What was the total number of townships eligible for bonus under the act in each of these provinces?

4. What was the total number of townships ineligible for bonus under the act in the said provinces?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Alberta, $1,600,934.39; Saskatchewan, $7,434,424.27; Manitoba $868,942.11.

2. Alberta, $743,115.16; Saskatchewan, $1,344,208.23; Manitoba, $333,453.13.

3. Townships which applied for bonus and were eligible:—

Alberta 584; Saskatchewan, 1,183; Manitoba, 156.

4. Townships which applied for bonus and were ineligible:—

Alberta, 218; Saskatchewan, 846, Manitoba, 144.

RURAL AND URBAN POPULATION

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. What were the respective percentages of the rural and urban population in Canada as shown in the census of 1901, 1911, 1921, 1931 and 1941?

2. What is Canada's rural population as shown in the census of 1941?

3. What number are shown as urban in the said census?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

The following table answers questions 1, 2 and 3.

Canada Classified as to Rural and Urban, 1901, 1911, 1921, 1931

Census Year	Total	Rural	Urban
1901	5,371,315	3,357,093	2,014,222
1911	7,206,643	3,933,696	3,272,947
1921	8,787,949	4,435,827	4,352,122
1931	10,376,786	4,804,728	5,572,058
1941	11,419,896*	Not yet available

PAN-AMERICAN CONFERENCE

Mr. HANSELL:

1. Was Canada officially represented at the Pan-American conference held in Rio de Janeiro in January of this year?
2. If so, what was the name or names of the official representative or representatives?
3. If Canada was represented, were any commitments made?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PRINTING CONTRACTS

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. With what corporations, firms or individuals did the government enter into contracts for printing during the calendar year 1941?
2. Were such contracts let by tender in each case?
3. If not, upon what basis was the contract in each instance given?
4. For what did each contract call, and what was the price?

DOLLAR-A-YEAR MEN

Mr. WHITE:

1. How many dollar-a-year men are serving the government of Canada?
2. What are their names and addresses?
3. What are their duties?
4. What living allowance and other expenses do they receive in addition to the $1 a year?
5. On what basis is such living allowance paid?

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE—GASOLINE

Mr. WINKLER:

1. From what companies are oil and aviation gasoline for Royal Canadian Air Force training schools purchased?
2. What is the general practice in fuelling the gasoline tanks in planes?
3. Is it customary to overflow tanks and run gasoline on the ground?
4. Is it customary to drain tanks after the plane has been used?
5. Is gasoline below standard ever accepted?
6. Is gasoline of any kind ever destroyed? If so, how?

PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE AIRPORT

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. What was the total cost of the airport at Portage la Prairie, Manitoba?
2. How much land was purchased in connection with this airport?
3. From whom was this land purchased and at what price?
4. What was the total cost of buildings and equipment?

ANCIENNE LORETTE AND ST. JOHN'S, QUE., AIRPORTS

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. How much land was purchased in connection with the development of airports at (a) Ancienne Lorette, Quebec; (b) St. John's, Quebec?
2. From whom was the land purchased in each case, and at what price per acre?
3. What was the total cost of each of these airports?
4. What was the total cost of buildings and equipment at each of such airports?

WHEAT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ACREAGE REDUCTION AND CERTAIN PAYMENTS TO FARMERS

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure respecting wheat acreage reduction, to provide for the payment of certain sums to farmers in connection therewith, and for the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

AMENDMENTS MADE BY ORDER IN COUNCIL UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I have frequently had occasion to call the attention of the government to the fact that while parliament was in session orders in council have been passed changing the statute laws of this country but I have never had an instance that was so coincident in point of time as the one to which I now desire to call attention, namely, the order in council P.C. 1372 passed on February 23, 1942. This order in council was passed under the War Measures Act and suspends the operation of subsection 4 of section 11A of the Precious Metals Marking Act for the duration of the war and six months thereafter.

Hon. members will recall that on the very day this order in council was passed under the War Measures Act this house gave second reading to a bill to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act, considered it in committee and then gave it third reading, and we were never told for a moment that a very much more important change in the law was being made under the authority of the War Measures Act by order in council.

I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce why as a matter of principle the government did not in these circumstances seek to suspend section 11A by act of parliament, which could have been passed on February 23, rather than by order in council passed on that day. The provisions of section 11A, suspended, were not important, but they are very much more important than the provisions of the bill which will shortly become an act of parliament. I think this is treating parliament with contempt.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REPORTED TRANSFER OF ONTARIO HARD ROCK MINERS TO NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. According to press reports, hard rock miners are to be brought from Ontario gold mines to work in the Nova Scotia coal mines. Does the minister know that owing to the contemplated closing of No. 4 mine at Inverness many coal miners employed there will soon be thrown out of work?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. member was good enough to give me notice of this question, and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) gave me notice of a similar one. The Department of Labour has no knowledge whatsoever of the contemplated transfer of hard rock miners from northern Ontario to Cape Breton, but further inquiries will be made.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I wish to address a further question to the Minister of Labour. In reply to the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. McGarry) with reference to the transfer of men from Kirkland Lake to Nova Scotia, the minister indicated that inquiries would be made. I am not entirely satisfied with that answer, because the press dispatch referred to by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond definitely sets out that five hundred men are being recruited in Kirkland Lake now to be shipped to Nova Scotia, presumably because there are vacancies in the coal mines of Nova Scotia. If this is allowed to continue for a few days the chances are that we shall have the Kirkland Lake problem transferred to a section of the country where there already exists a problem.

Mr. SLAGHT: They would not stand the committee for industrial organization down there.

Mr. GILLIS: There is no committee for industrial organization in Canada. My hon. friend merely demonstrates his ignorance of that question; that is all.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. member doesn't know what he is talking about.

Mr. GILLIS: The labour supply board is definitely set up for the purpose of regulating the labour supply for Canada, and I am wondering who has the authority to institute a transfer of men from one section of the country to the other without the sanction of the labour supply board.

Mr. MITCHELL: I myself would like to ask the hon. member a question. What is the labour supply board he is speaking of?

Mr. GILLIS: The Minister of Labour is supposed to be chairman of the labour supply board, upon which are representatives of industry, the manufacturers' association, and labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say this to my hon. friend: Don't believe all you read in the newspapers. When I made the statement that I had no knowledge of the organization of which the hon. member speaks, I meant that the Labour department has no knowledge of any contemplated transfer of miners from Kirkland Lake to Cape Breton—none whatsoever.

Mr. GILLIS: Has the Labour department any jurisdiction?

UNEMPLOYED MINERS AT KIRKLAND LAKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Labour whether he has taken cognizance of a communication from the miners at Kirkland Lake who have not yet been taken back to work, asking to be transferred to other scenes of labour in Canada? What is the government going to do about these miners who cannot find work in their own area? It seems to me that their position is almost hopeless if they cannot get back to their old jobs.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have received no notice of my hon. friend's question—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the minister is familiar with the subject.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am familiar with it, too, more so probably, in some respects. Transfers could be arranged to other industries by the employment service of Canada, but as hon. members know, the position taken by the miners primarily is that they should be returned to the mines.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree that that is what they would like.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member for Cape Breton South on February 23 asked me with respect to the miners returning to work at Kirkland Lake. I made inquiries and to-day received this reply from the chairman of the Kirkland Lake committee of operators:

> We are taking the men back as quickly as possible with due regard to balancing our operations, but it is slower than we anticipated, and we are giving preference to the older and the married men first and I am sure that when the matter is finally cleared up you will be satisfied that we have done a good job on it.

Mr MacINNIS: May I ask the minister if he got in touch with the miners' organization to see whether their reply would agree with the operators' reply?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, I have no objection to answering that; it is a proper question. That information came to my desk just as I was leaving for the house. The hon. member for Cape Breton South asked me a direct question, and I answered it as best I knew how, based on the question asked by the particular hon. member interested; and as the matter was raised by the leader of the opposition I thought I might combine the two.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): I should like to address one more question to the Minister of Labour, and to have a definite assurance from him. Is he going to solicit from the union in Kirkland Lake an account of the proceedings in that town with regard to the taking back of men to work in the mines? I ask this question specifically because I was in the town of Kirkland Lake yesterday, and as regards the report of the operators' case which was read by the minister to-day, I would say it is an absolute falsification of what is going on.

Mr. MITCHELL: Answering the last statement of my hon. friend, of course that is a matter of opinion; she is entitled to her opinion and other people are entitled to theirs. I have always taken the position that one should not convict until all the evidence is in; that is sound British practice. But this can be fairly stated to my hon. friend, that the files of the Department of Labour are fairly complete as regards the case both of the operators and of the miners in connection with the Kirkland Lake dispute. As to the particular question raised by her, if she wishes to receive these files I shall be glad to have them placed at her disposal.

RADIO BROADCASTING

ANNUAL REPORT OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson). Is it the intention of the government to refer the last annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to a standing or special committee of the house in order that the report may be considered and the operations and policies of the corporation fully reviewed at this time?

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): As yet there has been no definite consideration of the matter by the government. I would be glad if the hon. member would let the matter stand. An announcement of the intention of the government in this regard will be made in the course of a few days.

Mr. GRAYDON: I may mention that last year a similar question was raised. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), under whose department this corporation was at that time, said then that we need not assume that there would be any reference to a committee during the war. That is the reason I asked the question.

ADDRESSES OF MR. LITVINOV AND LORD HALIFAX OVER UNITED STATES STATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to address a question, of which I gave notice on Friday, to the Minister of National War Services. Was Mr. Maxim Litvinov's first public address as ambassador to the United States, and which, according to news reports, was broadcast last Thursday night over one hundred and eighty United States stations and translated for transmission to south America and the world, carried by Canadian Broadcasting Corporation stations in Canada? If not, why not?

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): I have had some inquiries made regarding this question, and have been informed that speeches by ambassadors particularly addressed to the United States public are not normally carried by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. There is however an agreement with the United States broadcasters for an exchange of information and facilities in the case of addresses which would appear to be of special interest in Canada. In this advance information service, Mr. Litvinov's speech of Thursday was not included—

Mr. COLDWELL: And that of Lord Halifax?

Mr. THORSON: —nor was that of Lord Halifax. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation believes, however, that a speech by Mr. Litvinov would be of great interest to a large number of people in Canada. It has been seeking to make arrangements for a broadcast of that sort, but as yet it has not been possible to make the necessary arrangements.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister not think that a broadcast such as Lord Halifax's statement would be a very fine thing for the Canadian people, stating as he did what sacrifices Britain has made to help Russia?

Mr. THORSON: No doubt it would be.

HUDSON BAY ROUTE

QUESTION AS TO USE BY CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES SHIPPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Press items to-day report an apparently increased intensification of submarine attacks on Canadian, British and American shipping on the Atlantic. Coupled with that is the apparent danger of congestion on our railroads of east coast bound freight traffic. I would therefore ask the Prime Minister whether the government has given consideration to an increased use this summer of the Hudson bay route for the shipment of grain and other materials required overseas, thereby reducing the danger of submarine attacks to a considerable extent as well as relieving probable congestion on the railroads; also whether consideration has been given to granting to the United States of America free use of the Hudson Bay railway and the harbour facilities at Churchill for the remainder of the war?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If I were anxious to advise the enemy as to what he should take notice of with respect to his possible avenues of attack in the course of the next few months, I would answer my hon. friend's question in full detail, provided that, in answering it, I were able to give him the kind of assurance which I think he wishes to have. I must say to him that if he will look at his own questions to-morrow he will see that it is not in the public interest that they should be answered publicly. I believe that answer applies to both questions.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

REPORT OF UNITED STATES ARMY ENGINEERS ROUTE THROUGH CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): The Prime Minister answered a question of mine appearing on the order paper with respect to the Alaska highway. I should like to ask him a question now. According to news dispatches, the commission of the United States army engineers recently travelling from Edmonton to Alaska in respect to the United States-Alaska highway have reported to the joint international defence board. May I ask if the government has knowledge of such a report? If so, will it lay the report on the table or make some announcement in respect to the matter? I have no desire to elicit military secrets from the Prime Minister, but I believe the country is waiting to know whether the Alaska highway is going to be built this year and what route it is going to follow.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would not be able to satisfy my hon. friend or others with respect to the point which he has just raised. The matter, as he himself has indicated, is under consideration, but what the final decision will be I am not in a position to say until it is made. As soon as the government is in a position to make a public announcement on the matter it will be made, but meanwhile reports on the subject are necessarily confidential.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): The Prime Minister has already answered several questions with regard to the Alaska highway. I wish to ask either himself or the appropriate minister—possibly the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar)—whether, before the agreement is made with the United States that a highway shall be built from the United States through any part of Canada to Alaska, the route that will be followed, and so on—before these questions are definitely decided and an agreement reached, and the route selected—the matter will be submitted to the house. I happen to know a good deal about the terrain over which the route will go and I have my own opinions after a study of a good many years as to where it ought to go, where the interests of the country can best be served in this war emergency, where freight and other materials should be moved, to and fro, and I should like to be able to give the government the benefit of these opinions and at the same time ascertain what their plans are before they have gone too far to be rectified, if they need rectification. I should like to be assured that the house will be acquainted with what is going to be done before it is finally done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's question is one of those to which it is rather embarrassing to answer either yes or no. I should not wish to give him either answer at the moment, but I do appreciate what he has just said about the knowledge which he has on matters pertaining to the Yukon and the approaches thereto. This knowledge, I know, the government would be glad to avail itself of. The same may be said of special knowledge possessed by many other hon. members especially those with constituencies in British Columbia. I shall see that what my hon. friend has in mind is brought to the attention of my colleagues and also to the attention of the members of the joint defence committee who are dealing with the subject. We shall perhaps be able to decide, later on, on the course which in the public interest should be taken.

ENEMY PROPERTY

SALE OF JAPANESE FISHING BOATS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty). May I say that I thought when I came here that the question should be directed to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), but in these days the departments overlap to such an extent that one hardly knows to whom to direct a question, as instanced by the return brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) regarding the handling of fish oils. My question has reference to an advertisement which appears in the local paper, British Columbian, of New Westminster, having to do with the sale of fishing boats. The second last paragraph of the advertisement I shall read, and on it I am going to base a question to the Secretary of State:

Offers for fishing boats, if accepted, will be those from bona fide fishermen of fishing companies who are entitled to own vessels of Canadian registry.

My question is: Are these fishing vessels being offered only to those fishermen connected with fishing companies, or are vessels for sale being offered to all fishermen? As one reads this advertisement, it would appear that fishermen must be attached to fishing companies before they can make an offer for these vessels.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I take it that the hon. member's question is directed to me, not so much as Secretary of State but as custodian of enemy property. I believe a certain limited number of boats were taken possession of, having been formerly owned by Japanese nationals in British Columbia. With regard to the particular question of the advertisement to which my hon. friend refers, I have had no notice of the question, and should appreciate it if he would allow it to stand until I have had an opportunity to obtain the necessary information.

HOUSING

CONDITIONS IN OTTAWA—ADVISABILITY OF MOVING GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS TO OTHER CENTRES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): May I ask the Prime Minister if the government proposes to take immediate steps to deal with the serious housing situation in the city of Ottawa brought about by the necessity of providing shelter for the multitude of employees engaged on the staffs of the new departments which it has created; or, alternatively, has it considered the advisability of moving some of these departments to other centres where sufficient accommodation is available, as has been done by the Washington administration?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend was kind enough to give me notice of his question. Since I received his note I have tried to secure information additional to what I already had in a general way, but the wartime housing officials have their office in Toronto and it has not been possible for me to get any additional information from them thus far. I would say with respect to the question of the housing of government employees in Ottawa that the government has been giving a great deal of consideration to the matter. The difficulty here has been that some of the controllers of war materials and building supplies have found it very difficult if not impossible to release certain supplies at this time which are required for war purposes. That has created one difficulty with respect to going ahead with some work of construction which might otherwise have been proceeded with.

In regard to decentralization, there is the difficulty that the government departments are much interrelated and it is going to make administration more difficult if decentralization has to be resorted to to any extent. That aspect, however, has been and is being considered. I do not think I can say more than that at the present time.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if the attitude of the treasury board has not something to do with this? The suggestion has been made in an Ottawa paper—I would not have brought up the question if it had not been raised otherwise—that the treasury board has frowned on the expenditure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think that is correct. My recollection is that the treasury board has been if anything benevolent in regard to most expenses that are being called for.

Mr. CRERAR: Too benevolent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may be giving the minister more credit than I should, but in this matter I think he has been ready to go ahead if matters could have gotten under way from other sources.

Mr. BRUCE: Would not the unemployment insurance commission's activities be just as well housed elsewhere as in Ottawa?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Again it is a matter of administration I think.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

QUESTION AS TO COMPLETION TO SERVE MILITARY PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like to ask the government what is being done to complete the trans-Canada highway in case such highway is required as a military road, and when will it be completed?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I heard only part of the hon. member's question. It had reference to something being used as a military road.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I asked, when will the trans-Canada highway be completed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say, and I do not believe anyone else can.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

WAR INDUSTRIES

WORKING HOURS IN PLANTS PRODUCING WAR SUPPLIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I now have an answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) on February 23 as recorded on page 782 of Hansard:

It is impossible to state how many factories producing war supplies are working full time and how many are working only part time. Many plants producing war supplies have only a portion of their employees so engaged. The rest of their employees are working on civilian production.

On inquiry I find that orders placed with aircraft plants in Canada are sufficient to keep each plant operating at full capacity at least until 1943. Lay-offs will take place for some time to come for such reasons as the following:

1. Orders on certain types of planes are tapering off, and persons engaged in certain occupations are being temporarily laid off until suitable work becomes available on the new models.
2. The tooling-up process for new models requires much fewer workers than will be required for production.
3. In some cases lack of materials and delays in securing certain supplies have caused temporary lay-offs.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I did not hear what the minister said at first. Does he say it is impossible to find out how many factories are working full time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

GOVERNMENT NOTICES OF MOTION ON MATTERS AFFECTING AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that he allowed his motion on to-day's order paper to stand, and that in other years the subject matter of his motion and the resolution of the Minister of Agriculture in relation to wheat have always been discussed together, would it be possible to get copies of his bill? It will be impossible to assess the value of either one unless the complementary matter of the other is available.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Attention will be given to the suggestion of the hon. member. The question relates to government policy. I do not know that there is anything further I can say at the moment.

PLEBISCITE ACT

PROVISION FOR TAKING OF VOTE ON ANY QUESTION SUBMITTED BY WAY OF PLEBISCITE

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 10, respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes at such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. McLARTY: I think it might be appropriate, before we proceed too rapidly with the bill, that I should make a few observations in connection with the work of the special committee that was appointed to consider it. I do not think it necessary to make them at any length.

In the first place the committee met and gave intensive study to the measure, even though in point of days consumed the time was short. It will, I think, be a matter of gratification that the report is unanimous, that all shades of opinion were able to agree on the particular enactment that the committee had to consider.

The committee not only considered the particular clauses of the bill, but as the bill provides and as was announced at the time the motion was introduced and upon second reading, regulations to implement the provisions of the bill were also considered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will they be before this committee?

Mr. McLARTY: I would say not. I think any matter relating to them, any question as to procedure, questions as to scrutineers and things of the kind might properly receive the attention of this committee, but the regulations are not part of the bill. Three provisions were applied, however, which should make the regulations fair in their application.

First, it is provided in the bill itself that these regulations shall as far as possible comply with the sections of the Dominion Elections Act. That would apply largely to the case of the ordinary voter. In the case of the service voter, however, the regulations, which are under separate cover and form a section by themselves, comply with the regulations that were used in the last dominion election in 1940 to take the vote of service voters.

A third point which I might suggest is that while it is undoubtedly undesirable to impose penalties by way of regulations, no penalty is provided under the existing regulations which the committee approved, so far as it had any authority to approve them, that is not contained in the Dominion Elections Act, save one. That is the provision of the bill as to vouching and illegal voting by way of the vouching provisions, so that every penalty clause included in the regulations has received the consideration of the parliament of Canada. In other words the specific regulations relating to ordinary voters are an adaptation as closely as possible of the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act. So far as they relate to service voters they are an adaptation of the regulations used in the last dominion election, which apparently worked successfully. I believe the regulations have been distributed to hon. members, as was the bill, after consideration by the special committee. Consequently, I suggest that there can be no possible objection to giving to the committee any information that may be required as to specific points covered by the regulations, but to go over the regulations clause by clause as we undoubtedly shall on the bill, in the case of both ordinary voters and service voters, would probably be an undue waste of time of this committee and of the house.

With these few general remarks I should like to deal with the amendments, because the committee did make some amendments to the bill. The principle of the bill has been debated at length, but despite that fact the special committee gave careful and considered attention to the respective sections. In general, it may be said three principal amendments have been made. The first of these is to ensure that the bill is not general, but specific in application. That is done by a definite amendment to section 3 by setting out therein the form and terms of the ballot, and by making other necessary minor changes, such as changing "a" to "the" when it is necessary to prescribe a particular limitation in respect of the plebiscite. That is the first important amendment.

The second amendment extends the coverage of the bill to include a situation which arose in connection with the Yellowknife administration district. The bill itself refers to electoral districts. This was a district which had grown up within the last few years, but which was not included within the definition of the term "electoral district". Representations were made by representatives of the council of the northwest territories to the effect that the people who had settled in the Yellowknife administration district within the last few years should not be disfranchised. The committee saw fit to accede to the representations thus made, by adding a new paragraph (d), the wording of which includes the administration district of Yellowknife.

This is a compact district, having something like 1,400 voters all within a radius of three and a half miles. Although it is a new district, the act of disfranchising them appeared to the special committee both unjustified and unjustifiable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are they at present in any electoral district?

Mr. McLARTY: No, they are not, and that is why we have had to have a specific paragraph (d); otherwise they would not be included. It is true that there are others in the northwest territories who might have been considered, but it was thought to be impracticable to include them because of the vast area and the tremendous expense which might be involved. The committee sought to extend the bill as far as possible without involving any great measure of expense in connection with the vote.

The third major amendment is that found in paragraph (c) of subsection 2, section 4. During his observations the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) pointed out that in that paragraph we were leaving with the provinces the possibility of regulating as to those who might vote in the plebiscite. It is remarkable, I believe, that in the plebiscite of 1898 provincial lists were used exclusively.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We had no federal lists then.

Mr. McLARTY: No, as the leader of the opposition has said, we had no dominion lists. Prohibitions were made in the elections act of 1938; but in order that there might be no misapprehensions in the matter we have provided in paragraph (c) that the provincial enactment shall be operative only at the time of the coming into force of this act. It precludes any possibility, as suggested by the hon. member for Rosthern, that between now and the taking of the plebiscite provincial legislation could be extended to disfrancise other voters in Canada.

I believe those are the main amendments recommended by the special committee. A perusal of the bill will indicate the minor changes. I might explain that the words inserted in paragraph (c) of subsection 2, section 4, are "at the time of the coming into force of this act." The leader of the opposition will recognize the change. It merely limits any change in the provincial right to amend an election list to the time when the act comes into force.

I believe I have dealt with all the important amendments. Minor changes must necessarily be made in order to give effect to the chief amendments. Then, some other matters were considered by the special committee. In the debate on the resolution and on the second reading of the bill there was some discussion as to the break-down of cost. It was suggested by the leader of the opposition that the break-down might be examined by the special committee, and then placed on Hansard. That break-down was given to the special committee, and I believe the purposes of this committee would be served if I were to have leave to place the break-down on Hansard. It is as follows:

The following is the estimated detailed cost of the holding of a plebiscite, subject to the adoption of the proposed procedure for compiling lists of voters, and subject also to approval by the governor in council of a tariff of fees providing lower allowances than those paid at the last general election.

1.	Plebiscite supplies consisting of ballot papers, books of instructions, index books, poll books, record books, and various blank forms required to be ordered by the chief electoral officer.....		$ 80,000
2.	Temporary assistance in the office of the chief electoral officer.....		7,500
3.	Sundry expenditure in office of the chief electoral officer, such as stationery, telegrams, etc.		3,000
4.	Returning officers' personal services, 32,000 polls at $4.....		128,000
5.	Clerical assistance to returning officers, 32,000 polls at $1.50.....		48,000
6.	Sundry expenditure by returning officers, 243 estimated to average at $50		12,150
7.	Rental of offices by returning officers, 80 at $75.....	$ 6,000
	163 at $50.....	8,150
			14,150
8.	Election clerks, 123 at $25.....	$ 3,075
	120 at $10.....	1,200
			4,275
9.	Printing ordered by returning officers		17,000
10.	Urban enumerators, 3,500,000 names at 7 cents....		245,000
11.	Rural enumerators, 3,500,000 names at 7 cents....		245,000
12.	Deputy returning officers, 32,000 at $6.....		192,000
13.	Poll clerks, 32,000 at $3.....		96,000
14.	Polling stations, urban, 12,000 at $8.....	$96,000
	2,000 at $4.....	8,000
			104,000
15.	Polling stations, rural, 16,000 at $5.....	$80,000
	2,000 at $3.....	6,000
			86,000
16.	Advance polling stations, 200 at $41.....		8,200
17.	Constables, 10,000 at $2.50.....		25,000
18.	Travelling by plebiscite officers..		50,000
19.	Allowances and expenses of special returning officers, chief assistants, scrutineers, and clerical assistants re Canadian service voters.....		50,000
20.	Sundries		85,000

A question was asked by the leader of the opposition as to the specific date on which the plebiscite will be held. I believe it is the unanimous opinion of the committee that the earlier the date selected, the better it will be. When introducing the resolution I suggested it was difficult to have it in a shorter time than ten weeks. Just when the bill will become law is a matter which will depend not only on this committee but on the action taken in another place. Royal assent will have to be given. I believe, however, that assurance can be given the committee that the plebiscite will be held at the earliest possible moment. Of course the bill itself provides that the vote must be held on a Monday, and to some extent when determining the date we are in the hands of the electoral officer.

Another point that was raised by the leader of the opposition had to do with the actual procedure to be followed in taking the vote of the active service voters. This was placed before the special committee and I think it was a matter of some interest. I do not believe it would be outside the interest of this committee if I outlined the exact procedure which it is proposed to follow.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is all in this pamphlet.

Mr. McLARTY: Has that been circularized to every member of the committee?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think it has.

Mr. McLARTY: That is what I had in mind when I proposed taking up the time of the committee by reading it. This is a memorandum prepared by the chief electoral officer and it gives the clear and definite procedure which was followed in 1940 in taking the overseas vote.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I do not think the minister is quite correct in referring to it as the overseas vote; it applies to Canada as well.

Mr. McLARTY: Service voters. There are two classes of voters, ordinary and service, and this refers to the method of taking a vote of the service voters.

The vote of the Canadian members of His Majesty's forces and corps on active service and in training within and without Canada will be taken in much the same manner as the vote of active service electors was taken at the last general election.

Special returning officers will be appointed and will establish offices in London, England, in Newfoundland, and in various places in Canada.

To some extent we will be in the hands of the Department of National Defence as to the exact points at which troops are concentrated and at which it would be practicable to take a vote. In so far as it can be done, the vote will be taken on the widest possible basis, but there are some who will necessarily be overlooked. For example, there are men serving in the imperial forces or in parts of the world where it would be impracticable to take a complete vote. The only assurance that this committee can be given is that in so far as the Department of National Defence feels that a vote can be taken practicably, it will be taken.

Mr. LOCKHART: Guards serving in outlying districts could be brought in?

Mr. McLARTY: That is too broad a question for me to answer. I think the question would have to relate to a specific district before it could be dealt with. I suggest that there are probably no outlying districts in Canada that could not be reached, but that would be subject to the advice of the Department of National Defence. I continue with the memorandum:

These special returning officers will distribute ballot papers, envelopes and other plebiscite supplies to commanding officers named by the Department of National Defence and stationed in the territory under their jurisdiction. Such commanding officers will designate a commissioned officer attached to his unit to take the votes of the members of such unit. As at the last dominion election, what is termed postal voting will be resorted to in the recording of such votes. The voting will be held on nine week days immediately preceding polling day. The hours of voting will be fixed by the commanding officer, but shall be not less than three each day.

When a Canadian service voter seeks to vote at the polling place, he will first be required to complete a declaration giving his full name, his regimental number, that he is a British subject, that he has not voted before at the plebiscite, that he ordinarily resided in Canada prior to his enlistment, and giving the name of the place, with street address, of such ordinary residence in Canada.

When this declaration has been duly completed and signed by both the voter and the commissioned officer, the voter will be handed a ballot paper in practically the same form as that used in Canada, and an inner envelope, and will go to a compartment and there secretly mark his ballot paper. The ballot paper will then be folded, and, in full view of the commissioned officer, placed in the inner envelope. The inner envelope will then be placed into an outer envelope addressed to the special returning officer, and upon which the postage is paid. The voter will then himself mail the envelope at the nearest post office or mail box.

Upon receipt of the outer envelopes in the office of the special returning officer, they will be examined and parcelled in lots of 500. Each parcel being labelled with a consecutive number and stored in a safe place until the counting of the vote begins.

At six o'clock on polling day the special returning officer and his staff will count the ballot papers included in each lot of 500 and a special statement of the count will be completed in the case of each lot. A period of one week is allowed for the counting of the votes of Canadian service voters.

The special returning officer will then be required to send to the chief plebiscite officer by telegraph, or otherwise, a statement of the number of votes cast in the affirmative and in the negative, respectively, at the plebiscite in the territory under his jurisdiction. As soon as this is done, the special returning officer will transmit to the chief plebiscite officer a statement giving the number of votes cast in the affirmative and in the negative, respectively, in each of the lots of 500 outer envelopes parcelled as above referred to.

Mr. STIRLING: It would look as though a large proportion of the 27,000 sailors will be unable to vote.

Mr. McLARTY: That is a matter which the chief electoral officer is taking up with the Department of National Defence for Naval Services. Of course it will be quite difficult for some of those who are actually on the high seas to vote. The chief electoral officer explained to the special committee that in so far as the Department of National Defence for Naval Services could advise him, arrangements would be made to take the vote as widely as possible. I know the hon. member will appreciate that there will be no intentional desire to miss anyone, but inevitably there will be some votes that cannot be taken.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The naval department could make it possible to take the greater majority, if they wished.

Mr. McLARTY: That is the desire, and I think I can assure the committee that no steps will be left untaken to see that every man, whether in the navy, the air force or the army who can be reached, is given an opportunity to cast his vote. It is a matter of the mechanics of the thing. The committee instructed the chief electoral officer in no uncertain terms that they wished the coverage to be as broad as possible, and with that he agreed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In totalling up the votes of the service voters will it be done en masse, by constituencies or by provinces?

Mr. McLARTY: It will be en masse; there will be no attempt made to relate the total to a particular riding or constituency.

Other suggestions were made when the resolution was being considered, one by the leader of the opposition being that as a condition precedent to obtaining a ballot the registration card of any voter should be required to be presented. The committee gave that careful consideration and the conclusion arrived at was that since it was desired to get the widest possible vote, the least possible number of obstacles should be placed in the way of those who are anxious to vote. It was thought that the benefit to be derived from insisting as a condition precedent upon the production of registration cards would be more than offset by the fact that a good many of those who wished to vote, admitting it is the law, might inadvertently—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is the law.

Mr. McLARTY: Of course it is, but inadvertently they might lack them. For the purposes of identification the registration card would have only one value, as to the name. While a registrant is supposed to advise the department of any change of address, the card itself would not contain any record of that. For this reason, while careful consideration was given to it, it was thought that the disadvantages outweighed the advantages.

In the next place, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) made the suggestion on Thursday last that it might be possible to acquire a new registration by virtue of making registration compulsory in order to vote. The committee gave that consideration, but there again, bearing in mind the different ages of registrants as compared with voters, and that there would be a large class of active service voters which the registration would not in any event affect, it was thought better to allow the polling to be more wide open and not have it compulsory to have registration, which would not be compulsory, on the one hand, but might be inducive to voting on the other.

Another matter which was considered by the committee was that discussed by the hon. leader of the opposition, with respect to the section of the act allowing for vouching and declaration by a proposed voter who had been left off the enumeration list. The committee considered that carefully. They had the experience of the chief electoral officer and of counsel for the chief electoral officer, and the conclusion to which they came was this: In the rural sections there is no doubt that the open vote works out satisfactorily. In the urban centres on such a wide scale it might fairly be said that the open vote has not been taken advantage of. It has, however, been used in a number of the provinces, in Saskatchewan, for example, and it has been used in urban municipalities with a population up to 10,000. The evidence presented to the committee, which undoubtedly determined the committee's decision on the matter, was that wherever this system of voting has been used it has been proven satisfactory.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has it ever been tried in Montreal?

Mr. McLARTY: No, it has not been tried in Montreal, or in any urban centre with a population over 10,000. But the fact that wherever it has been tried it has worked out satisfactorily led the committee to believe that perhaps a wider experiment would not be disadvantageous and would not prove to be disastrous to the vote itself, in any way, shape or form. In other words, merely because it has not been tried out on a wider scale is scarcely any justification for saying that while it has worked out well wherever it has been we should not extend the field where it operates. Consequently, the committee felt that for the purpose of this plebiscite the system of vouching and swearing could with advantage be tried, and the thought was expressed that it would work out in a satisfactory manner.

Mr. HOMUTH: Could the clerk or the deputy returning officer vouch for a voter who came in?

Mr. McLARTY: The answer to that is no. When I say the answer is no, I believe the answer is no. The one who vouches has to be a qualified voter in the same subdivision.

Mr. HOMUTH: May I follow that up. I think the point is important. People will go to the polls to vote, thinking they are on the list and then find they are not on the list. In order to vote they would have to find someone to vouch for them. But once in the booth they cannot go out. Then they would be deprived of their vote.

Mr. McLARTY: That is a matter of regulation into which I should like to inquire further. But I suggest this: it is the intention to post a list of voters, and anyone wishing to vote can go to the trouble, if he wishes, of seeing whether his name is on the list. My impression is that the man who leaves the booth is not thereby disqualified from voting. My impression is that he is disqualified if he refuses to take the oath.

Mr. HOMUTH: Under the act, if he goes out, he cannot come in again to vote.

Mr. McLARTY: I am not going to question the hon. member's judgment on that, because I know he has had a wider experience than I have.

Mr. HOMUTH: I have had plenty of experience with it.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is how many voters were disqualified in 1917.

Mr. McLARTY: A voter could not return to vote if he refused to take the oath, but if he merely went into the booth and then came out he was not excluded from returning. That is a point on which I should be very glad to get information.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are we not confusing two things, the booth and the polling place? Once a man has gone into the booth he certainly cannot vote again.

Mr. McLARTY: I simply followed the wording used by the hon. member for Waterloo South. It should be "polling place."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no limitation on the number of voters for whom one elector can vouch; that is to say, no limitation on wholesale vouching? The minister sees my point; there may be a racket.

Mr. McLARTY: The only limitation that is placed on the person vouching is that section of the act which provides severe penalties for vouching for an unqualified voter. Otherwise there is no limitation placed on the number of voters for whom one person can vouch. The limitation is purely a matter of the penalties which are prescribed against illegal vouching.

There are other matters which the committee considered, but I believe I have dealt with the principal ones, and I suggest that the others might await consideration of the bill, clause by clause.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, as I said a moment ago, it is my intention now to read a very important and magnificent letter which has been sent by a great Canadian citizen to the Prime Minister of Great Britain. It was received by Mr. Churchill this morning, having been sent across via ferry command. The letter is dated Montreal, February 25, 1942, and reads:

The Right Honourable
Winston Spencer Churchill,
Prime Minister,
10 Downing Street, London, England.

Mr. Prime Minister:

A citizen of the commonwealth, no matter how humble, always enjoys the right to communicate with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, to give him his reflections and make known to him his thoughts. There are moments, rare it is true, when the right becomes a duty. I think that, for the writer, that moment has arrived, sir.

Mr. Prime Minister, the citizen who writes is a Canadian of the French language, a loyal subject of the King of Canada, faithful to the culture of his forebears, devoted to the Franco-British union in Canada, who prays with all his power for a total war effort. He believes that the future of the world rests in the victory of the united nations and their defence of free institutions.

He is one of your admirers, for you are the great heroic figure of the war. Victorious over the treachery of the appeasers you have, in an hour of tragic responsibility become the spirit incarnate of British resistance, the spirit of the Commonwealth's sacrifice, the spirit of victory itself. With that spirit you have inspired the whole coalition. After the abandonment of Czechoslovakia, stupid and dishonourable as it was; after the destruction of Poland; after the disaster of Norway; after the defeat of Holland and Belgium; after the fall of France; Britain stood alone with the commonwealth nations against the nazi monster. The position of Russia was uncertain and ambiguous; the United States, far away in distance and in its own state of mind, disarmed, its people devoted to the ways of peace, believed itself safe behind the two oceans which lave its shores. In this desperate plight you alone were not desperate, did not despair. You communicated your hope and courage to all men. Led by you, Britain faced with high hope whatever sacrifice might be met, faced it alone with her sister nations of the commonwealth, engaging her very existence and that of her empire. Because your magnificent words have spurred men to new hope, because Britain made it known that she would perish before she would yield, you have brought home to men everywhere the prime condition of victory . . . the will to win.

To-day you are faced by a new task, one more difficult and which will call for the exercise of new virtues in you. Victory will not adorn your standards until you accept the new task with all the tenacity which marks your very appearance. You have united the will and the conscience of all men of good will to fight for freedom, have done it with brave heart and brave words. Now we must go on and win.

Now we must win . . . It is no longer a question of eloquence.

Now it is a question of eternal vigilance, of intelligent imagination, of sternness in criticism, of passionate devotion of the services, who certainly yearn for victory but which, in all truth, are overburdened by a stiff-necked bureaucracy at the top. The duty of our political leaders is undoubtedly to protect the fair name of the services, if only for the sake of the dignity of the homeland, and there are times when, for this very reason, the statesman must suffer attack in silence. But the duty of the political leader is, above all, to control, to criticize, to inspire, to discipline the services of the state, both civil and military, to eliminate from them all uselessness and paralysis and to imbue them with fighting spirit, imagination, realism and the will to action. Never believe, sir, that the services will reform themselves from within; every biological organism, or social organism, always attempts by natural law to retain its existing form and being. It is only possible to change it from without. We cannot change the natures of men. But we can change men.

I do not think, Mr. Prime Minister, that I am unduly pessimistic. I believe with all my heart in the possibility, the hope, of victory. But we shall have to change methods and we shall have to change men. The democracies always seem to believe that it is sufficient to change ministers. That is only a beginning. Changes are urgently needed, at the top, in all the services of the state. Unless the series of disastrous events is to continue we must find men of initiative to undertake command of our forces, our technical departments and the services of the state as a whole. The cry of the ostrich: "The British only win one battle in any war; the last one!" still seems to be our slogan. The Lords of the Admiralty still think, no doubt, that it is enough to be British to be invincible and to them the column which commemorates Trafalgar and the spirit of Nelson in itself constitutes a definite promise of victory. Was it not Kipling who said: "If blood be the price of Admiralty, Lord God we have paid in full!"?

I do not wish to make a dolorous inventory of the series of disasters which have attended us on the seas. They provide a stern indictment against Britain's senior services. These continuous disasters have seriously impaired the spirit of all men, sir. Bring into your mind's eye, before your coldest and most lucid judgment, the effects of just the most recent on even the most resolute hearts . . . The Prince of Wales and the Repulse, redoubtable and magnificent instruments of naval science, yet sent to the bottom almost instantly, for lack of aerial defence. Think of the Scharnhorst, Gneisenau and Prinz Eugen, bombarded for months in the harbour of Brest, yet with an insolent defiance which commands respect, braving Britain's power as they forced the Channel and the straits of Dover, despite the Royal Navy, the Royal Air Force and the guns of Dover.

What food for thought such occasions create! Do not tell us, as the services would like us to believe, that the escape of these three ships from Brest is a victory, or at least an amelioration of sea-problems, almost as though the great ships of the Royal Navy had let them through the Straits for that reason. You have courageously offered the people blood, sweat and tears. They accept this new defeat with grim resolution. They will accept more. But your duty and your policy must be to limit to the smallest inevitable amount this expenditure of blood, sweat and tears of a determined people.

It is no longer a question of heart or of eloquence. To-day the problem is one for the intelligence, one of implacable reform in high places. It is not possible for men to work 24 hours a day. But the departments of war must work without respite and with true intelligence if we are to win. Rejuvenate your Admiralty, sir. Do not judge all men by yourself, Mr. Prime Minister; not all the old men enjoy your physical and mental youth. Cut down by ten and twenty years the ages of all the men at the top. Forget peace-time rules of advancement. Let the young generals who win successes on the field receive without delay, not medals, but immediate increase in the importance of their commands. Surround yourself with twenty or a hundred young men . . . military men, naval men, aviators, men of science, engineers, business men . . . whose function it will be to think, and plan. Let it be their mission to exercise a passionate, endless, zealous watch over all the services of the state, military, naval, air force, foreign affairs, whatever these may be. Inspire these young men with your own spirit, as young men in other countries have been inspired to leadership by another passion, the nazi doctrine.

Our combatants are pledged resolutely to the supreme sacrifice. Our material of war reaches immense proportions and it grows from day to day with prodigious speed. With such great resources at your command, in men and munitions, do not permit the victory of our cause to be delayed forever by the ingrained bureaucracy of old men of old mind.

We cannot lose the war. You have said so with moving eloquence which has stirred the whole world, rekindling its hope and its determination. But, Mr. Prime Minister, I put it to you that we cannot make the right moves on the chessboard of war if we leave the responsibility for decision to fossilized old men in uniforms.

Think, as often men did during the course of the last war, of the magnificent statue of the Victory of Samothrace, which was intended to crown the prow of a victorious battleship. It was clad in the wind. Its wings were spread for flight. But the Victory had no head! We cannot fight in such terms to-day. The true direction of this war depends upon creative minds, on organization, on skilled and determined leadership. What we need is not committees of old men in uniforms who come together occasionally to discuss the problems of the war as a matter of course, or duty, but who leave all initiative to the enemy. We need a brain trust, young and energetic, of whom constructive thinking, imagination, determination and daring will be expected daily . . . men who are not afraid to act, men who are not still fighting the last war . . . men who will brush aside all obstacles, permanent officials of alert and innovating mind. This is the urgent need in the armed forces and in all branches of administration of the war.

This is the price of victory.

Mr. Churchill, your back is against the wall, face to face with this task. Discharge it well and men will follow you to the ends of the earth.

I have the honour to be,
Mr. Prime Minister,
Respectfully yours,
Emile Vaillancourt.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no idea in the world why that letter has been embalmed in Hansard. I was not able to follow it carefully but I shall read it. In the meantime, if the government had any knowledge of what was in the letter I think the Prime Minister ought to have taken a point of order so that it should not be in Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had no knowledge of the letter, but I think it is a very good one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Maybe it is; I do not know whether it is or it isn't.

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. gentleman does not know, he has only one thing to do—say nothing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that ought to be struck out of the record. It is an impertinent observation on the part of the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: It is pertinent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think it should be in the record. He has no right to interject anything of that kind.

Whatever observations I have to make to-day will be confined to the bill immediately before us. I regret to have observed, as the minister proceeded, that certain recommendations which I made—I believe it was in the committee stage on the resolution—have been rejected by the committee. I shall deal with these briefly as I come to them, but I want to register immediately a vigorous protest against the statement made by the minister near the conclusion of his remarks, that the service votes are to be counted en masse. I think the soldiers, sailors and airmen will want it to be known how they voted in relation to their constituencies, and, if that is not possible, at least in relation to their provinces. To allocate the votes in the general amount as pro and con will not, I think, be satisfactory to the men themsleves, and certainly it will not be satisfactory to us.

The bill which is now before the committee, the reprint as a result of the committee's report, differs entirely in principle, although not in form, with certain exceptions, from the bill to which second reading was given last week. I think it is the most awkward kind of drafting I have ever seen, to take a general bill of this kind and superimpose limitations upon it and make it a special bill applicable to one particular situation. From the standpoint of draftsmanship it could not be worse. I do not know why the bill was ever introduced in the form in which it was brought down unless it was the policy of the government to have the principle of the plebiscite in our system. I do not think for a moment that that was ever the intention of the Prime Minister. Certainly there was no utterance of his or of the Secretary of State which would give justification for that principle. The bill should have been withdrawn and brought down as a special bill designed to take this plebiscite. Instead of that, we have superimposed on the bill special limitations, including the ballot itself, as promised by the Prime Minister; but the rest of the bill is general in its character.

I do not suppose the government will at this late stage accept the suggestion which I made last week and withdraw the bill and bring it back in the form which good draftsmanship would dictate. With the limitations imposed by the amendments, that is to say, the limitation with respect to the ballot, and with the limitation that the ballot shall only be applicable to this plebiscite and no other plebiscite, I am in agreement. I am objecting just at the moment to the method by which that position has been arrived at. As a lawyer, I say it offends my sense of good draftsmanship, and I am sure that will appeal to the Secretary of State as well. Whoever drafted the bill proceeded on a certain principle when it was the intention of the government, as I gather, that it should have been on another principle. That is all I am going to say about the form of the bill.

The changes as indicated by the minister were three. In section 2(d) a new definition of electoral district has been given so as to provide for including the Yellowknife administration district. That is all right. Where there are fourteen hundred people living in a contiguous settlement, in a territory which is not within an electoral district, they should have the right to vote. I have not the slightest objection to that. Section 3(1) provides for limitation to the taking of the ballot on the question set out in the ballot paper. I wish to make some brief observations with respect to the ballot. The question is the one which the Prime Minister stated in his speech on February 25. I have not compared it but I take it for granted that the very words are used.

Mr. McLARTY: It is identical.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am wondering why it was put in this form, the same question repeated twice. However, I am not raising any great objection to that, although it does seem to me to be a rather awkward way of doing it. Why should not the voter be asked to vote yes or no? Here we have two questions put to the voter and he is asked to put a cross after yes or after no as the case may be.

Mr. McLARTY: I intended to deal with that point in my remarks, and I wonder if the hon. member would object to my interjecting an observation here, because that was a matter that received very serious consideration by the committee. A number thought that perhaps one question could do, being answered yes or no. The point that swayed the committee in its decision was the evidence given by the chief electoral officer that this is a form of ballot that has been used repeatedly under the dominion temperance act, and the experience has been very satisfactory. A number of members of the committee, before they heard that evidence, thought that one question, to be answered yes or no, would be desirable; but after hearing the explanation it was decided otherwise. It looks like a double-barrelled proceeding, but that was the view of the committee.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am obliged to the minister for the explanation, and there may be a good deal of reason in what he says. I should never have thought of repeating the question. I hope, however, it will work out all right. When we get to the committee stage I want to ask the minister certain specific questions with respect to some of the sections, but I shall not pause to deal with that now.

I wonder whether this parliament ever before consented to the imposition of penalties by regulations that never came before parliament. I may be all wrong, but I think that is a terrible principle, to impose penalties in regulations that under this bill have the force of law, that may be changed overnight by the governor in council and never come before parliament, and under which a man can be put in gaol.

Mr. McLARTY: I might remind my hon. friend that there is not a single penalty in the regulations that the parliament of Canada has not passed on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think in his previous statement the minister made one exception.

Mr. McLARTY: That is included in this bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This parliament has not passed on those regulations. For a government to bring down a measure imposing penalties by regulation which might land a man in gaol without the people's representatives having anything to say about the matter savours at least of dictatorship, if nothing worse. I do object to that. In a democratic country to impose penalties involving the liberty of the subject without the people's representatives having anything to say is an absolute negation of liberalism, of democracy.

I do not want to discuss the penalties. The minister has said that the regulations follow, as nearly as may be, those in the elections act. I would point out one exception. In this country we have been against the idea of the numbered ballot, because without doubt it is a method whereby the secrecy of the ballot is destroyed. If the minister will turn to section 28 of the Dominion Elections Act, chapter 46 of 1938, subsection 5 reads:

(5) The ballot papers shall be numbered on the back of the stub and the counterfoil, the same number being printed or written on the stub as on the counterfoil; each ballot paper shall bear on the back thereof an impression of the stereotype block supplied by the chief electoral officer pursuant to subsection 2 of section 13 of this act.

Then it goes on to say that the ballot paper shall be bound up. Section 15 of the ordinary voter plebiscite regulations reads:

15. (1) Immediately after the issue of the proclamation, the chief plebiscite officer shall cause the ballot papers to be used at the plebiscite held under the Dominion Plebiscite Act, 1942, and these regulations, to be printed on both sides, consecutively numbered, perforated and bound in books of twenty-five. . . .

If that clause is left in the regulations, every deputy returning officer and any man in the voting booth will be enabled, if he so desires, to learn how every voter voted. I do not think the minister intended that. I do not understand how that escaped the eagle eyes of the members of this committee, unless they are going to adopt a new principle and hereafter we are going to have numbered ballots. If that is going to be the case in Canada, look out. I do not know any better chance for tracing a voter's ballot and finding out how he voted. The numbered counterfoil I understand. That is a safeguard against fraud from the time the ballot leaves the hands of the deputy returning officer and is taken into the secret compartment until it is brought back and delivered to him. That is quite proper. But that is detached before the ballot is deposited in the box. I hope the Prime Minister, who is following me closely, will get my point. To have the ballot numbered as provided by clause 15 of these regulations is to provide a method whereby the secrecy of the ballot is destroyed. I ask hon. members to study this thing and test it. I ask that that regulation be changed, and I do not think I ought to have to elaborate the reasons why. There is no doubt that this is not in conformity with the elections act. I have demonstrated that. It is not a real adaptation of subsection 5 of section 28 of the act to which I have referred. If this is kept in the regulations, it is a violation of every principle of the secrecy of the ballot, enabling identification of voters, and it opens the door to abuses of the most glaring kind. I appeal to the government to have that changed. A very simple wording in the regulations following the provisions of subsection 5 of section 28 of the act will bring about the cure I am seeking. I think I should not have to argue that any further. Everybody will agree that we ought to preserve the secrecy of the ballot. I do not understand how the chief electoral officer, having regard to the provisions of subsection 5 of section 28, ever put that in the regulations, or what he had in mind. Certainly I would not for a moment think the government instructed him to do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not at all. I would not think the government would have any ulterior purpose like that, and if the minister is now cognizant of what I am endeavouring to substantiate, I think he will rise in his place immediately and say that should be changed.

Unless these regulations have been checked with the greatest care, there may be other instances where there has not been a proper adaptation of the provisions of the elections act. I pointed out to the house in the committee stage that the regulations should be instructive and interpretative, but that they should not be enacting or legislating.

That is a very sound principle, but it has not been followed. Apparently it never was the intention of the government to follow it. I admit it would take time but, after all, this is an important matter, even though it is now limited to one plebiscite. We ought not to do by regulation that which heretofore and under the general law of the country is done by legislative enactment. There is no doubt in the world about the power of the government to change any of these regulations. Just let us look at section 9:

9. (1) The governor in council may, for the purposes of this act, make such regulations as are expedient for the effectual taking of the plebiscite and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, for the printing, distribution and publication of the act and instructions issued thereunder, the preparation of voters' lists and other documents.

I refer particularly to subsection 3:

(3) Any regulations made under this act shall have the same force and effect as if enacted in this act.

I protest against legislation by regulation, even though the necessity for speed, from the government's point of view exists. This is wrong in principle, and it ought not to be followed in practice. I can just hear the welkins ring if my right hon. friend were in my place, and I were over there! He would object to this—make no mistake about it—and he would be right. I have thrown out in a gentlemanly manner the suggestion that the government ought not to do this sort of thing. My suggestion has been entirely ignored. This is not right; it is not good legislation, and it is not democracy.

In the course of my previous observations I made reference to the production of registration certificates. The committee did me the honour of investigating the matter but, according to the Secretary of State they were unanimous against my suggestion. I tell the minister and the committee that there are a large number of people in Canada who never registered under the national registration scheme. How great that number is I do not know. But I would point out the law of the country states that everybody shall carry his registration certificate. Those people who did not register are shirkers, and ought not to be allowed to vote in a plebiscite which may, or may not, mean a great deal.

Any man who has not registered should not be permitted to vote. Every good citizen will have his registration certificate. I have carried mine, although I have never been asked to show it. I am sure, however, that each hon. member carries his registration certificate. The present bill allows a man who never intended to register, a man who may be a shirker, and everything else, to exercise his franchise. Is that a proper principle to encourage? The carrying of a registration certificate is no hardship. The Secretary of State has said it was the opinion of the committee that some people from rural areas might have forgotten their registration certificates. I heard about a man who died, and in whose safety deposit vault was found his registration certificate. That is the last place I should think it ought to have been. I know of no place where a man could get it less quickly.

There is no real reason in the world why a man should not produce his registration certificate, if he wishes to vote. This is a time of war, and it was my understanding that national registration was primarily intended to line up the man-power and woman-power of a nation. There have been cases of prosecutions for non-registration; there have been other cases of prosecutions for fraudulent connection with registration, and there have been other prosecutions with respect to the issuing of floating registration certificates. I cannot, however, conceive of any good reason why the government should give a vote to the man who for safety's sake, shall I say, did not register. I suppose it is now too late to make the necessary change. I would point out, however, that it is the law of the country that every man shall carry his registration certificate. If the government does not place in these regulations or in the bill something such as I have suggested, it will be saying in effect to the man who did not register, "Well, it is the law of the country, but we are not going to enforce that law."

May I now turn to the question of the open vote in urban municipalities. I said on an earlier occasion that open voting in rural districts, where a man could be vouched for by another elector, was a safe and proper procedure, because everybody knows everybody else. There would always be someone who could properly vouch for a prospective voter, and subscribe to the terms of the oath. But I tell the Secretary of State that in large urban centres the open vote will be subject to great abuse; it will be an instrument of fraud. Why, there is not anything in certain constituencies of the city of Montreal which is not resorted to at election time. It is well known that elections in Montreal are—I cannot summon language adequate to describe the fraud practised. They had nothing in Tammany Hall on election methods in Montreal.

I have heard of cases in smaller areas, under 10,000 persons where one man vouched for dozens of electors. My colleague will speak about that, later in the debate. You see, it becomes a racket, and I say this practice of open voting ought not to apply to the big urban centres. I have had no experience in other large urban areas, such as Toronto, but I have heard stories about what obtained at some points, and my information leads me firmly to the conviction that we cannot be too careful in our provisions to ensure honest voting in some of the big cities. There are all kinds of frauds. This measure lends itself to that type of fraud, when nobody knows anybody else, and it will become a racket. I suggest to the Secretary of State that the fact that certain members feel that the system of open voting has worked well in certain rural areas is no argument with respect to urban areas, because conditions are entirely different. The premise upon which one reaches the conclusion that a system may work well in one given situation, does not exist in the other situation.

Mr. McLARTY: I think I went a little farther than suggesting rural areas; I suggested urban areas up to 10,000 population.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is about the size of my own city. When I was a young man I knew practically every man and woman in my city. Most younger people would. I cannot say that that applies to-day because I do not live in my city six months in the year. Generally speaking, in cities of 10,000 or under, most people know all the adults either by sight or personally. If it is not too late, I would suggest that this be reconsidered.

On the matter of taking the active service votes, I see no reason why a very large proportion of the army vote should not be taken. As a rule, these men are concentrated fairly well, although there may be a few isolated cases. I am thinking of the men overseas who are all in Great Britain. But what about Canadians who are operating with the Royal Air Force? What about the several hundred Canadians who are with the Royal Navy? These boys would like to vote. My colleague has a son in that position and he would like to vote. What arrangements are going to be made to take care of these boys? As I said, there are a great many Canadians in the Royal Canadian Air Force who are operating with the Royal Air Force, and they are not segregated by any means. I saw them working under Royal Air Force direction in certain parts of the old country. Are they to have a chance to vote? I am afraid, unless we get some assurance, they will not be given a chance to vote.

I do not see much difficulty about the army except where they may be isolated. I understand there are Canadian engineers in Gibraltar, and there may be some Canadians acting as observers in Libya and that sort of thing. I would think it would be almost an impossibility to get their votes, but what about the men at Gibraltar? I think it is most important that every service vote should be polled at this plebiscite. Certainly these men will have opinions on this question, and they are at a disadvantage as compared with the men at home. The greatest care will have to be exercised to get the service vote out.

I regret I have not had time to do more than read the memorandum which the minister quoted this afternoon and which outlines what is proposed to be done. I have not had time to read the regulations under which the service vote is to be taken. I should like to point out to the minister that in the last election a substantial proportion of the service votes was not polled. I have not a memorandum in front of me from which I could give the exact figure, but no doubt the authorities will know just what proportion was not polled. There was a substantial proportion polled in Canada, but in England all the service vote was not polled.

To sum up briefly, because I do not want to keep the committee too long, I object to the draftsmanship of the bill, but I am bound to admit as a lawyer that, awkward as it may be, it meets the objection which I have. This bill will die in law at the conclusion of the plebiscite. It is fairly good draftsmanship with respect to the general bill, but when you have superimposed these limitations and restrictions, from the point of view of legal draftsmanship it is just a botch. I still think the suggestion I made as to the production of registration certificates is sound for the reasons I gave. No man who has not registered should be allowed to vote in this or any other election.

I am going to deal with certain sections in the bill when we reach them, and I shall ask the minister for definite information. He has announced an amendment to section 4 which deals with the disqualification of voters to make this relate to the time of the coming into force of the measure. This will be quite definite if the principle involved in this section is adhered to. I assume that that will be the case and this, of course, remedies certain objections which were raised in the committee. I shall ask the minister certain questions about this matter of disqualification.

I intend to refer particularly to the Doukhobors. When we were in the west we saw some of these gentry, and we were told that the women worked the farms while the men hired out. The young men did not register under the mobilization act, and they were waiting around to take the jobs of other young men who enlisted in the active service forces. As labour gets scarcer, no doubt many of these Doukhobors will be able to get positions. I do not think that is a situation which ought to obtain in Canada. I do not know just what the provincial law is in British Columbia, but perhaps the minister will be prepared to give us details of the provincial laws that bar certain people from voting. We shall want to know about the Japanese and how many soldier Japanese will be permitted to vote. There will be other questions of a similar nature.

I mentioned the Doukhobors. A young man who comes forward to vote, certain other conditions prevailing, will lose his right to postponement of military service. Therefore he is not apt to come forward to vote. What about his father and mother, his cousins, his sisters and his aunts? Are they to be allowed to vote in Saskatchewan, we shall say? I raise the question and I want some information. A young man will not fight; he will not come forward to register, but his whole family will vote. I know it is a difficult matter to deal with, but this has been the position ever since these people came here. Then there are the Mennonites. Personally I do not know much about them.

I read with a great deal of interest the orders in council which relate to these conscientious objectors. I must say that the legal interpretation which I put upon these is not the same as has been put upon them heretofore by both parties, but it may be that that has been done for the purpose of avoiding trouble. You can lead a horse to water, but you cannot make him drink. There is a good deal of truth in that old saying. You can say that a man must work, but it is pretty hard to make him work. There is the celebrated case in the English law reports dealing with the opera singer, about which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) spoke. You can restrain her from singing for somebody else, but you just cannot make her sing for you. There are physical limitations about these things, and it may be that the interpretation that has been given in days gone by to some of these orders in council with respect to conscientious objectors has been given for the purpose of saving trouble to those in authority. I am not urging anything; I am just looking for information. If we have to have this plebiscite bill, let us have it and get it over with and get on with the war.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on this plebiscite bill at this stage I find myself still tremendously confused as to why we are now facing the responsibility of passing such a bill as this seems to be. I am still confused over whether the people realize what they are voting for. I have tried to think my way through it. I have read many statements that have been made, particularly by the Prime Minister; I have studied not only the statements he made in the past few days but statements he made some time ago, and I am still confused. Perhaps I am not very brilliant, but I maintain that if I am confused over the issue, there are a lot of other people in Canada who are confused over it too.

I recall that last fall the Prime Minister, speaking on the issue of military service for overseas, made this statement in the house on November 12, 1941, rising to a question of privilege. I believe the press at that time were pressing him in respect to an all-out war effort, and as reported at page 4321 of Hansard of November 12, 1941, the Prime Minister used these words:

> I want it to be distinctly understood that so far as the principle of compulsory selective national service is concerned for Canada, in Canada, I stand for that principle. I have never taken any other stand. It is the position that I have held all along. It has been applied in connection with military training and applied in a number of other directions I might mention. How much further it will be applied the house will learn as the government takes its decisions on that matter.
> But so far as conscription for service overseas is concerned in the armed forces of Canada, that question was submitted to the people of Canada at the last general election, an election which was held in war time, and in which the leaders of all political parties made their statements to the electorate, and the people of Canada decided against conscription for overseas service. So far as I am concerned, without any consultation of the people on that subject, I do not intend to take the responsibility of supporting any policy of conscription for service overseas.

That is a clear and definite statement. I have nothing to say against it. It is bold; it is open; it cannot be misunderstood.

The question that is confusing me to-day is whether the people of Canada are now to be asked to vote on that issue which the Prime Minister said he would submit to the country. The reason why I am confused is this, that when the Prime Minister was speaking in the house the other day on the same subject he said, as reported at page 908 of Hansard of February 25:

> Hon. members have been talking about conscription, about no conscription and the like. That is not the issue in this plebiscite.

If that is not the issue in this plebiscite, in view of the Prime Minister's statement last fall that he would not bring in conscription for overseas service until he had consulted the people, I would ask this question: After this plebiscite is disposed of, when the government decides to bring in conscription for overseas service, are we to have another plebiscite? Is the Prime Minister then to go to the country on that issue? I believe that is a fair question based upon these two statements of the Prime Minister which I find confusing, with the plebiscite bill in its present form and the question framed as it appears in the bill. I think the minister or the Prime Minister should answer that question while we are in committee, and answer it definitely so that the people will understand.

Another reason for my confusion is the statement that was made by the Prime Minister, in that same speech, on February 25, as reported at page 914 of Hansard:

> We are simply asking to be given freedom to make an untrammeled decision and to come to parliament with that decision. Let my hon. friends keep that in mind, that before any measure can be passed in this parliament, no matter what it relates to, conscription or anything else, it has to get the support of a majority of the House of Commons and the ministry has to consider very carefully every aspect of the question which will bear upon the situation in presenting any measure to parliament.

After this plebiscite is disposed of, the government has not even then received from the people an expression of their feeling with respect to conscription for overseas service, and I ask this further question: Suppose another plebiscite is submitted to the country and the Prime Minister desires to bring in conscription for overseas service; am I to understand from this statement by the Prime Minister—and if language means anything it must mean this—that a measure will still be submitted to parliament to be accepted or rejected by this house?

I rose while the house was in committee to ask this one specific question: Are we to understand that irrespective of this plebiscite the people are still to be consulted with respect to compulsory military service for overseas and that a special measure will be brought down to this house for that purpose? I should like an answer. I know I made a speech, but I asked a question, and it is a question the whole country is asking.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think there is any mystery about the government's position in the matter. At the present time the government is restricted with respect to recommending to the house, should it so desire, a course of action with regard to conscription, in virtue of commitments which have been previously made. If release from those commitments is given by the electorate of Canada, the government will feel itself entirely free to consider the question of conscription on its merits in the light of all the circumstatnces existing at the time, to recommend its course to parliament, and to have parliament deal with the matter as it does with any other matter brought before it. There is no different attitude assumed with respect to this one question from that with regard to any other.

Mr. HANSELL: Shall we need another plebiscite then to find out whether we are to have conscription?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope to heaven not.

Mr. HANSELL: I did not hear the Prime Minister's answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say I hope not. And I say that I cannot imagine any circumstances under which it would be thought of.

Mr. HANSELL: My contention is that the present bill does not ask the people whether they want conscription for overseas service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are a lot of things which the present bill does not ask the people, because we want to ask them one question and one question only. If we had wished to ask twenty questions, we would have inserted twenty questions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not a fact that under the terms of the War Measures Act the government can bring in total conscription at any time if it so desires?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it is a fact. I made that very clear the other day. The legal power is there, but the government in this matter feels, and feels rightly, that it is under a moral obligation because of certain pledges which were made in the past and during the last general election not to use its legal power to enlist men compulsorily for service overseas.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: When the bill came down in its original form, the house raised serious objection to the generality of the bill in the form that it was in, and I think those who raised this objection were quite right. As the bill then was, it was possible to take a plebiscite in this country merely by the issue of a proclamation; and our committee was instructed, I believe from both sides of the house, to alter this particular phase. I think the committee will agree that this bill has now been made a particular one, since clause 3 now provides:

> This act shall be limited to the taking of a plebiscite on a question to be set out in the ballot papers in the following words and form.

The matter of the wording of the question in the plebiscite ballot also came up during the discussion, and the committee was informed, and I believe the majority agreed, that we had no power to deal in committee with the matter of the question. Since the question was presented to us in that form, the committee was not allowed to alter that, and we had to abide by the decision of the majority.

I must say that I, too, am still somewhat confused by the wording. I would certainly like to have it changed, and the direct question put to the people, whether they are willing to have a complete conscription of the accumulated wealth, the natural resources and the industry of Canada along with complete conscription of man-power.

I was surprised to find the regulations so copious. About sixty pages of them, for the most part adapted from the Dominion Elections Act, were considered. As regards the objection to section 15 of the regulations, I believe the regulation states:

> Immediately after the issue of the proclamation, the chief plebiscite officer shall cause the ballot papers to be issued at the plebiscite held under the Dominion Plebiscite Act, 1942, and these regulations, to be printed on both sides, consecutively numbered, perforated, and bound in books of twenty-five, and furnished in sufficient quantities to each returning officer.

It is a matter of doubt whether the term "ballot papers" includes the counterfoil or not. I do not believe there was any intention at any time that the ballot should be numbered, and I feel quite sure that, had that been the impression of the committee, such regulation would have been immediately amended.

Mr. McLARTY: Would my hon. friend allow me to interject a remark? It is not to differ with him; it is to agree with him. If he will refer to the ballot papers under the elections act and also the regulations under the plebiscite act, he will find the numbering is identical, which, as he suggested himself, was the case as it was presented to the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not a fact, though, that the form of the ballot paper is merely directory, while the regulation is mandatory, as a matter of law?

Mr. McLARTY: Probably the form following the regulation must comply with the regulation to be a proper form; and if the forms under the election act and under the regulations under the plebiscite bill are compared, it will be found that they are identical. There is no difference at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Thank you. There were one or two minor changes. One to which I would refer, is the matter of leaving the polling stations open. According to the Dominion Elections Act, polling stations are to be open from eight in the morning until six in the evening. I should like to have seen them kept open for the plebiscite from eight in the morning to eight in the evening, so that many thousands of workers in the factories and elsewhere can exercise their right to vote. An amendment was adopted providing that polling stations should be open until seven o'clock in the evening, which is a step in the right direction.

We have spent far too long on this matter of the plebiscite. However, now that this administration and this parliament have decided to go ahead with it, I hope it will be proceeded with speedily and the matter disposed of without delay. The people of Canada are looking askance at what is happening here, particularly at the time which is being spent. They must feel pretty much like soldiers who have been watching the enemy arm, seeing him approach, and about to attack. Then they are told by some brass-hat to go and polish their shoes. I hope we shall get through rapidly with this bill and have the plebiscite over and done with.

Mr. GRAYDON: Supplementing the remarks of the hon. member for Yorkton, may I ask the minister whether there is any good reason why the time for polling could not be extended to a little later in the evening. It seems to me that many of these sections were drawn by those who do not fully understand what the working man has to contend with as regards his hours of leisure. Do hon. members realize that many working people have difficulty, because of the limited number of hours that stores and offices are open, in finding time to attend to their outside business affairs? I think this is one place where we might well make a concession to the wage-earning section of our population, by extending a little the time for voting. In some sections where, perhaps, in a general election the results of the polling are of great importance, there may be some reason for restricting the number of hours, but with all possible emphasis I urge the government to reconsider the period for voting, particularly with a view to its further extension in the evening. I should like to see it so arranged that our working men will not have to line up at the booths during the last part of the day in order to vote. These are some of the busiest people in the country and they should be given proper consideration. I make that suggestion in a friendly and constructive spirit.

Mr. McLARTY: There is one section of the elections act which is incorporated in the regulations under the plebiscite act. The hon. member for Yorkton referred to the discussion we had in the committee. We did extend the hours from eight to six to the hours from eight to seven. In addition, I might point out that one matter which was impressed upon the committee was that each working man had two hours off with pay in order to be able to vote at any time during the election, and that will be incorporated in the regulations under the plebiscite act. It is in the elections act. That was one of the factors which were impressed upon the committee, and it will avoid the unfortunate situation of all having to vote at one time, as the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not so sure that is a complete answer to the problem. If I recollect —it is only an offhand recollection—a man working in a factory must make application to his employer to get time off. Arrangements must be made on that basis, and my suggestion would avoid the difficulties which might arise between employer and employee with respect to that request. I cannot see what great damage would result from keeping the polls open another hour, because, after all, some of these workers, particularly in war works, and in places far distant from their homes, have much difficulty in taking the two hours off. Most hon. members realize that. If the workers are a long piece away they must get transportation, and it is much easier for them to vote at the latter part of the day either after supper or when they are coming home. Moreover, it would be more convenient for them. I wish the minister would consider that point. I may be entirely wrong in my contention, but I am quite honest in urging it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Let me point out the difficulty that will arise in rural Canada, especially if the vote is taken early in May. The farmers will be labouring under tremendous handicaps this year. There will be a great shortage of help, and there are very few farmers who can take the two hours off to vote in the busy season, in the seeding month of the year. If another hour were added, extending the time to eight o'clock, it would help to get out a greater number of farmers to vote, especially in the rural sections of western Canada. Most people do not quit work until late in the evening and if they had the extra hour many more people could go to vote.

Mr. FAIR: I am sorry that the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), the prospective Minister of Agriculture when the Conservatives get into office, forgot about the farming population. Perhaps, when he becomes minister, he will forget the farmers just as much then as he does to-day, but that will only be in keeping with the practice of the present Minister of Agriculture. I rise to protest, as I protested as far back as 1938, against the discrimination that is being carried out in certain provinces—in four of them—against a particular class of citizens who find themselves in very unfortunate circumstances. I refer to section 10(k) of the regulations covering ordinary voters:

> in any province, every person who is an inmate of an institution which is maintained by any government or municipality for the housing and maintenance of the poor, if such person is by the law of that province disqualified from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of that province, and did not serve in the military, naval or air forces of Canada in the war of 1914-1918 or in the war that began in September, 1939.

I am very sorry that this is in effect in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and British Columbia. Those hon. members who were on the elections and franchise committee when we revised the present election act in 1936, 1937 and 1938 will remember that we had a heated discussion on that problem, and in 1939 I brought in an amendment to the elections act which was defeated. We are living in a democratic country, at least under the forms of democracy, and I regret that the people of those provinces, and this parliament, have not seen fit to change those regulations so that we might have the benefits of democracy extended to people who are in our poor institutions. As I have pointed out on other occasions, the old age pensioners are demanding pensions because they have been legally robbed during their years of productive activity, and I believe that if we investigated the cases of a number of those who are in the institutions to which I have referred, we should find exactly the same position existing. To-day I am asking again, before this bill proceeds much further, that parliament take into consideration the plight of those who are in these institutions and give them the right to vote. There is no reason why that right should be denied them. These regulations are man-made, and surely we who are boasting of and fighting for democracy should put enough of our democratic speeches into practice and give these people the right to vote on this and other questions hereafter.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): As a member of the special committee I quite agree with the hon. member for Yorkton that it was never the intention of the committee that the ballot papers should be numbered. It is true that in section 15 of the regulations it is provided that the plebiscite officers shall cause the ballot papers to be used at the plebiscite to be printed on both sides, consecutively numbered, perforated and bound, and so on. But if you will look at subsection 2 of section 15 you will find it stated that such ballot papers shall be according to form number 15 and shall bear the question to be submitted at the plebiscite in the form set out in the said proclamation. Turning to form 15, there is no numbering on the ballot, but there is on the form a replica of the back of the ballot—this is on page 76 of the regulations—and the stub and counterfoil are properly numbered. But the ballot is not numbered and it was never the intention of the committee to have it numbered. Nor was it by any oversight that section 15 of the regulations was passed by the committee, because the voter is protected by the form of ballot as shown in form 15.

The minister, who was chairman of the committee, has made a general statement. He gave us a memorandum of the method of taking the votes of service voters, and under the terms of that memorandum an officer is designated to take the votes of the members of each unit. It is provided that a ballot paper shall be handed to the voter in the same form as that used in Canada, in an inner envelope, and he will go to a compartment and mark his ballot and so on. There is no provision whereby the returning officer, or the commissioned officer as the case may be, will initial the counterfoil on the ballot or that the counterfoil will be removed before the ballot is put in the envelope. I expect regulations will be passed to cover that, but this does not cover it.

Mr. McLARTY: I think my hon. friend will recall that that was explained by the chief electoral officer. The secrecy of the ballot is being retained in the case of both the service voter and the ordinary voter. I think my hon. friend will recollect that what happens is that the outer envelope is torn off when it is forwarded in groups of one hundred, and the inner envelope is put in the ballot box. I agree with my hon. friend on the other point, namely, that the only number appearing on the ballot paper is on the counterfoil, and as explained by the chief electoral officer, that portion of the ballot paper placed in the box will have no number on it. That, I agree, is the reason why it passed the committee.

Mr. MacINNIS: I rise to a point of order rather than to say anything on this bill. Is it not customary, when a bill is in committee after second reading, that we deal with it section by section? Otherwise I do not think we shall ever be able to give this bill the kind of scrutiny it should get.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the point of order, as a rule we are all supposed to keep our discussion within the section that is before the committee. If, for example, there is a question of the qualification of a Canadian service voter, it is not permissible to talk about it on a section dealing with another matter. But we are now on section 1, short title, and it has always been the practice in this committee of the whole to discuss under that section any matter pertaining to the bill.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I understand that on section 1 hon. members are given considerable latitude. When we come to the following sections I shall expect them to keep within the rules.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The leader of the opposition urged the necessity of having those who vote on this plebiscite produce their national registration certificate. The minister has taken the stand, and the committee agreed with the view, that to do so might deprive some people of their vote. As an alternative I suggest to the minister that as to those voters whose right to vote depends upon their being vouched for, in order to guard against the possibility of wrongdoing, the production by such persons of their national registration certificate be made a condition precedent. In that way any suggestion of the possibility of a racket being perpetrated would be entirely obviated. I can see no reason why those whose names are not on the voters' list should not be required to produce their registration certificate as an additional safeguard to those set out in section 7 of the bill.

Mr. POULIOT: The other day the minister who is piloting this legislation said that he was open-minded—something everyone knows; we appreciate him for it—and that this bill is not like the laws of the Medes and Persians.

[Mr. McLarty.]

I am not yet convinced that this legislation is opportune. I have listened to everything that has been said about it, or what I did not hear have read in Hansard. Fine speeches have been made since this legislation was introduced, but I have not found a single argument that convinces me in its favour. The question is not to submit a plebiscite to the people of Canada. It is to assure and complete home defence.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, on January 24, a journalist came to me requesting an interview with respect to the plebiscite. I told him that it was impossible to give any definite opinion until the wording was made known, and that I was opposed to any high-pressure or uncalled-for publicity. I said that I favoured free public comprehension and expression, and that I expected the plebiscite would not be after the pattern of Hitler's plebiscite in Austria. I said that the defence of Canada should be completed and assured before our men were conscripted for overseas.

On February 22, the day after the last black-out in the province of Quebec, Miss M. V. Cummings, secretary of the civil protection committee of Quebec city, was interviewed by the press. The following is a report:

> Throughout the province, Miss Cummings said, especially in the northern Quebec area of Lake St. John and the lower St. Lawrence district, officials reported that everything had run off smoothly. Miss Cummings added that "it is particularly gratifying to see that the most vulnerable points of the province have had such a marked success."

Speaking with respect to the victory loan on Friday, February 20, Premier Godbout of Quebec is reported in La Presse to have said that the province of Quebec is in imminent peril.

One of the most interesting dailies published on this continent is undoubtedly the New York Times. On the front page of the magazine section of the issue of yesterday, March 1, I read this:

> But among many prominent officials a number of illusions still exist. They are dangerous illusions, almost as dangerous as those mentioned above, and nowhere are they more evident than in Washington.
> The first of these illusions is that since we are the richest and potentially the strongest people in the world we cannot lose the war.

This, of course, is said of the United States.

The second is that we can win the war without using our very best men in government, regardless of party.

The third is that we can win the war without scrapping a number of high military officers and naval commanders who are still thinking in terms of classic defence rather than of modern offence.

The fourth is that the nation will fight its best on a diet of optimistic news and that it is necessary for our government, in order to confuse its enemies, to confuse its own people and its friends.

The fifth is that we can beat the axis on the forty-hour week.

Nothing is more fallacious in time of war than the illusion that money is power. We may be able to solve most of our difficulties with it in peace time, but one cannot stop a tank with a hundred-thousand dollar bill. Even the official dollars-and-cents war production figures dispel this illusion.

The article is headed, "Are We Awake?" and was written by James B. Reston.

On the first page of the editorial section in the same issue there is a map of Asia and the Pacific ocean. Below the map twelve strategic places in the Japanese drive are mentioned. They are as follows:

1. Thailand submits to the Japanese, December 8.
2. After siege Hong Kong surrenders, December 25.
3. British-controlled Sarawak falls, January 1.
4. Japanese troops march into Manila, January 2.
5. Celebes invaded by the Japanese, January 12.
6. New Britain attacked by Japanese, January 23.
7. Conquest of Malaya is completed, January 31.
8. Japanese occupy Amboina naval base, February 7.
9. Sumatra, flanking Java, invaded, February 14.
10. Fortress of Singapore surrenders, February 15.
11. Japanese open struggle for Bali, February 20.
12. Rangoon is menaced by Japanese, February 27.

On the front page of the issue of Le Soleil of Quebec for February 26 there is a picture of Mr. Dies, the well-known United States congressman, who has discovered Japanese maps showing an invasion plan of the United States through Alaska and northwestern Canada. He states as a fact that those maps were found in the possession of a Japanese spy in the United States. Mr. Dies is photographed with those maps in his hand.

I do not wish to say anything of a secret nature. I wish merely to refresh the memories of hon. members by using clippings which, with few exceptions, have appeared in our own newspapers.

This I have taken from the Ottawa Citizen of February 24:

Canada within range of bombers from Norway. Young Belgian artillery officer declares nazi four-motored machines could make trip easily.

The Ottawa Journal of December 10 contained a dispatch to the effect that Canada was only twelve hours from German air bases. These are the words appearing in the article:

Air Commodore Albert de Niverville addressing a luncheon here to-day—

This was in Montreal.

—said Canada was about twelve hours from German air bases. While Halifax is half a day from Brest, Bordeaux and German air bases, our Pacific coast itself must face a new danger resulting from Japan's entry into the conflict.

Several hon. members have mentioned the worry which exists to-day in Australia because of the Japanese coming closer and closer. But that is not all. I hold in my hand a Canadian Press dispatch dated at Wellington, New Zealand, January 25:

British-United States reply heartens Antipodes.

Prime Minister Peter Fraser said to-day that New Zealand had received a heartening response to pleas to the United States and Britain for aid in the Pacific war. This was the first official disclosure that New Zealand had joined Australia in such appeals.

On June 18 of last year—and I mentioned this fact the other day in the house—at a meeting here in Ottawa the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said that the need for men was immediate and urgent. He was referring to men for overseas. He asked for volunteers on two grounds, first that Canada could do no less than the British people who stood so bravely on the front line and, second, that men had been pledged to Great Britain. When I asked him for supplementary information, as always he was vague.

During last summer I took the trouble to make a scrap book of news items. I did this for a little over two months, from the end of June to the beginning of September, during which time many important events occurred. One of them was the quick about-turn of Russia. At that time, because of a statement by the Minister of National Defence which appeared in the press, it was stated that the number of men required overseas from Canada was approximately 100,000. According to the papers of February 11 there has been a big jump. I have here the headlines of an article which was published in our contemporaries here in Ottawa. The Minister of National Defence may have made some arrangement with Sir John Dill while he was here or with

Mr. Churchill, because this article states, "Ralston says forces require 193,000 men during present year." That is twice as many as were contemplated during last summer.

There are some people who may be termed armchair strategists because they contend that Canada is menaced. There is a gentleman familiar to all members of parliament who are war veterans. I refer to Mr. Walker, the head of the legion. The Montreal Gazette of February 27 had this to say:

Coasts of Canada fronting danger.
Head of legion, Alex Walker, compares situation to Australia.
Denies scare mongering.
Tragedy facing antipodes real for this dominion unless it prepares itself.

We have been told that submarines have been off the coast of Nova Scotia, and we know that Jap submarines have shelled the coast of California. There is one thing that I cannot understand. If England, which is smaller than a handkerchief on the map when compared with Canada, considers that 4,000,000 men are not enough for her defence, who will say that half a million men would be too many for the defence of Canada? Many times I had occasion to discuss this matter with my very dear and lamented friend, the former Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe. One time when he was away one of the acting ministers decided to send men of the mounted police overseas. More than that, applicants for positions in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had to consent to serving overseas before they were accepted in the force. When I brought Mr. Lapointe's attention to the matter he wrote me the following letter which has been made public and which is on record:

I have your letter of the 3rd August enclosing copy of a page of Hansard and of a communication addressed by you on July 31 to Mr. S. T. Wood, Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I have given consideration to your representations regarding certain questions appearing on the form of enlistment in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and concerning the applicants' consent to serve overseas. As you are aware, the question has been settled in the way you wished, and consent to serve overseas is no longer required of applicants for enlistment in the R.C.M.P.

Believe me, dear Mr. Pouliot,

Yours sincerely,

Ernest Lapointe.

That letter was marked "personal", as were all his letters. When I saw Mr. Lapointe about it I told him that that must have been a clerical error, and he gave me permission to publish the letter.

Le Canada, is a strong government paper, and a brilliant one too. It is published in Montreal, and I should like to quote an editorial which appeared in the issue of February 23, as follows:

The out-and-out advocates of conscription for overseas service should awaken to reality and understand that it would be unwise to deprive ourselves of our defenders at the very moment when we are more exposed to attack than ever before. So long as Canada could be considered secure from any attempt at invasion, it was natural that we should contribute to strengthen the United Kingdom, our strongest bulwark against the undertakings of Germany. But it is no longer so. The western part of our country is to-day an area of war. Further striking successes by the Japanese would place us in still graver peril. It must therefore be expected that the government wishes to guard against this danger and will inform members of parliament of the measures it has taken. The secrecy of the proceedings will prevent any advantage accruing to the enemy. On the other hand, our representatives will know exactly what is being done and will be able, if necessary, to advise the government regarding the nature of our defence preparations.

In the New York Times of March 1 there is a dispatch from Mr. P. J. Philip of Ottawa, dated February 28. This is quite interesting, and it reads as follows:

Coast peril shifts policy in Canada.
Idea that war must be won in Europe is shelved—Pacific strategy role forecast.
Japanese transfer plan.
Board set up to move British Columbia's aliens.

This progress is only on paper. When I first read it I was surprised to see that the government still intended to proceed with the bill. "Joint defence is relevant." Surely my chief, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), remembers what was said by the member for Témiscouata at one of the last sittings of the session that ended in August, 1940. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) and I were the first to speak about the need for signing a war treaty with the United States, but at that time we were told that it was not an opportune time to mention matters like that. Not long afterward the Prime Minister had an interview with the President of the United States, and matters were arranged for mutual defence. In the Gazette of February 27 there is a front-page item which reads:

Canada to aid U.S.
Fight any invader on Pacific coasts.
Trainees would go.
Prime Minister says he would amend law if necessary.
Answers Hanson query.
Opposition leader poses case of attack on Seattle or Alaska.

Then follows a summary of what was said in the house. Everyone will admit that there is a threat to our country. I have never been fearful; fear is a feeling that I ignore completely; it is unknown to me. But I am much worried and concerned about the future of this country so long as we forget that this Canada of ours is on mother earth rather than on the planet Mars. Some people seem to be just as indifferent to the fate of this country as though Canada were on the planet Mars. We are surrounded by fearful enemies and we need some protection in this country. The Department of National Defence is nil with the exception of the deputy minister of militia and his secretary who are two good men. There may be a few others such as Brigadier Pope. He is a brass hat, but he is a good man. These were really good men; and capable, efficient military men are very few. The Montreal Gazette of Monday, January 26, contained an editorial about Hong Kong, in which there were some learned remarks about it, some of them good. The New York Times of March 1 said:

Hawaii's defences held inadequate.
Situation not improved since December 7, but more forces are declared required.
It cannot happen again.
Pacific war seen reaching stage where foe might move on islands.

Here again is the Toronto Telegram, from which I have already quoted. In its editorial of January 23 it mentions that I had asked for the resignation of the Minister of National Defence on account of the unfortunate Hong Kong affair. Then we have Mr. Drew—what is his first name? I do not remember.

An hon. MEMBER: George.

Mr. POULIOT: There is always an honest George in Ontario. George Drew was chosen as counsel for the leader of the opposition in the Hong Kong probe, and speaking of that probe the Montreal Gazette says:

There remains the inescapable feeling that secrecy must always beget the feeling that this inquiry was a "government affair". No better means could be found of dissipating this faint distrust than the appointment of Colonel Drew as opposition counsel. Not only was he the initiator, one might even say the source, of the opposition's stand on this issue, but he is of all Canadians now in civil life, one of the best qualified to judge a military question.

I come now to a good Liberal paper, Le Soleil of Quebec. In its editorial of February 23 it complains of the fact that the probe will not be public and goes on to say that it does not see the usefulness of such a procedure unless the investigation is to be based on new facts as well as on charges and admissions heard in the House of Commons. Le Soleil adds that it is necessary to have a declaration from the government on the matter and asks:

Is it left to the discretion of the tribunal to limit the scope of the inquiry and information promised to parliament and the nation?

I come now to a very fanatical paper, the Ottawa Journal. I shall read only the first paragraph of two articles, one on George Drew and one on my humble self, and members will see how blind are these nasty Tories. I quote first from the Ottawa Journal of Thursday, January 22, 1942, from an editorial entitled "The Rights of a Critic," which says in part.

Col. George Drew, Conservative leader in Ontario, states a truism when he reasserts his right to criticize government activities even in war. It is necessary, however, to maintain this unquestioned democratic right against some who feel, quite honestly, that even well-founded and constructive criticism is "subversive" and to be deplored.

There would be nothing wrong with that. But here is the first paragraph of an article dedicated to the Liberal member for Témiscouata, who had asked for the resignation of the Minister of National Defence, who probably leases some floor space in the Ottawa Journal's building. This article in the Journal's issue of February 20, headed, "Sort of thing that hurts parliament," reads in part:

On the principle that one cannot argue from the particular to the general it would be wrong to condemn parliament for the antics of Mr. Jean-François Pouliot. Yet Mr. Pouliot's silly sub-amendment to the speech from the throne, asking the house to condemn the government for "contemplating" conscription, is precisely the sort of thing which leaves many people contemptuous of parliament. What is wrong, it is asked—what is wrong with a democratic institution which, at this time, seems powerless to put a stop to such palpable tomfoolery?

I take great comfort in the thought that in every province, particularly in Ontario, provincial governments are enlarging their lunatic asylums, and I have no doubt that there will be room in one of the new wards for the fellow who wrote that.

The fall of Hong Kong was deeply felt by all. There is one thing that happened there, and that is that our soldiers were sent without equipment and without ammunition. Of course, some responsibility might rest with the Minister of National Defence. But he was not alone. There was a very high officer, there is now, who was inspector-general of the western command, and he is no less than Tory Senator Griesbach. How could our men have left for Hong Kong without the approval of the inspector-general of the army? My fear is that the appointment of George Drew on the Hong Kong probe is precisely to give a whitewash to Senator Griesbach. I see the leader of the opposition laughing. I would not have expected him to do it because what I say is the truth. He knows I am not afraid to tell the truth, and I say that the man who is responsible must be held guilty for such a thing occurring. It is not the quartermaster-general who should be punished for that. It is the inspector-general of the western command, who is a Tory senator, and he should be fired at once, and moreover, should be court-martialed.

I have another clipping here headed, "Bennett explains fall of Singapore." This was the commander of the Australian imperial force in Malaya, and he blames the fall of Singapore on the lack of water, heavy bombing, and greatly superior numbers. The British had no means of flying from Singapore.

Then here is a caricature by Low, the celebrated cartoonist. This cartoon was published in the Ottawa Citizen of February 11. It shows a silk-hatted politician with a book in his hand, and beside him in the jungle handling a machine gun are two Australian soldiers. The cartoon has the politician saying:

No reinforcements yet—but I'm sent to read you this parliamentary debate proving:

(1) That Air-Chief-Marshal Blimp is a great statesman;

(2) That there are no lessons to be learned from all this;

(3) That Blimpapore will be defended to the last.

Here is another article which I find in that Tory paper, the Ottawa Journal, on page 3 of its issue of February 27. The article is headed "Lady Brooke-Popham blames inertia for Singapore fall."

Here is a gentleman from New Brunswick, not Viscount Bennett, but Lord Beaverbrook himself, who is quoted in the New York Herald-Tribune of June 9, 1941, as saying:

Adolf Hitler had "given youth its head" in his plans and preparations, and Britain now found itself confronted "with a mentality which makes rings around many of our old ideas", he said.

Mr. Malcolm MacDonald, High Commissioner for Great Britain in Canada, made an appeal in Toronto the other day to send Canadians overseas. Here is what this gentleman said when he set foot on Canadian shores, according to a dispatch by Mr. John Marshall, a very able journalist and president of the press gallery. This article appeared in the Windsor Daily Star of April 4, 1941. Speaking of the British people, for whom I have a deep admiration because I know them well—the only ones who do not deserve admiration are the British politicians with the exception of Mr. Churchill—Mr. MacDonald said:

Even if they were fighting alone, they couldn't be beaten. But, they are not alone.

Et cetera. And he said that our help was superfluous. But I have something still better in my hand, and it is—again—that Tory paper, the Ottawa Journal. Some interesting news is contained in its five o'clock edition, July 3, 1940:

Want Canadians to halt nazis if they land.

Dominion troops have "more novel conception of warfare".

London, July 3—(CP)—Lord Mottistone, who as "Jack" Seely commanded the Canadian cavalry in the first great war, suggested in the House of Lords to-day that Canadian troops should be chosen to engage the enemy if he lands in Britain because of their "more novel conception of warfare".

He recommended the Canuck soldiers not because he served with them in the last war for 3½ years "and so knew their value", but because amongst these Canadian divisions—and this also applies to other divisions overseas where there are wider spaces—there are people with more novel conceptions of warfare.

Lord Mottistone said he had made the suggestion to a Canadian officer with a distinguished record, who had replied "that just suits me".

What did Sir Stafford Cripps, the present Lord Privy Seal, say the other day? Coming from Russia, he told us many things which are very interesting; he endorsed our victory loan, and he complained that a full effort was not being made at the present time in Great Britain. Mr. Eden, and also many labour leaders, spoke along the same line.

Some years ago, in this honourable house, sitting in committee of the whole, I objected strongly to red tape. Here is what the member for Témiscouata said about red tape, Hansard, February 22, 1937, page 1124:

Red tape must disappear from the Department of National Defence. I am in favour of a good army to defend our country, but I want no red tape and I want no other people than good Canadians to defend our own country.

And then:

I blame the bureaucracy that has been established there—

In the Department of National Defence.

—a long time. . . . There are some in the department who were hiding themselves when the others were fighting—

In the last war.

—and now they are the bosses and try to run the whole show. Enough of that; it must stop. Representatives of the people must bring them to their senses.

Previously I had said, at page 1120:

Some people are fond of brass hats and so on; I do not care for them. . . .

Here is the definition which the member for Témiscouata gave at that time, as quoted in the Windsor Star:

These people in the Department of National Defence cannot learn warfare. They must be trying out their penmanship all the time. Everybody in that department, from the chief of staff to the last appointed stenographer, must also be a typist. We hear a lot about that—most foolish; most stupid—and it continues like that.

This we call red tape. What is red tape? Red tape consists of a lot of formalities carried out just to show the importance of the one who performs them. Red tape is useless, but it is made use of for a purpose. It is carried out to show that the man who executes the formalities is the only man who could do this well. In the civil service my experience has been that the simplest things, the easiest to understand, are made the most difficult in order to show the ability and the wonderful genius of an ass. Hon. members laugh, but that is the case. Let us take the fellow who is stupid, and who cannot do anything well. He says, "I will make myself important." Then he assumes a solemn air, and attempts to convince his minister that he is the only being on earth who can do a certain thing. Sometimes he is believed; sometimes the officials do not see the ears of the ass. There is a lot of that, but I shall not insist upon it.

This is enough for the moment. I want to put this on record as a preface to what I am going to say and to move afterwards.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would point out to hon. members, that this section of the bill provides the only opportunity for discussing the regulations. On the point of regulation 15—

Mr. McLARTY: May I, Mr. Chairman, differ on this with the leader of the opposition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is my understanding of the rules.

Mr. McLARTY: I believe that under subsection 2 of section 9 the regulations can be discussed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Possibly.

Mr. McLARTY: The clause which refers specifically to the regulations being in accordance with the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Referring now to the question which I raised this afternoon with regard to the numbering of the ballots, I desire again to make my position clear on that point. It will be recalled, sir, that the minister took refuge in the form of the ballot, which appears as form number 15 of the regulations, in which the numbering is on the stub and the counterfoil only. As I said this afternoon, however, anything relating to the form of the ballot is directive only and not mandatory. I refer the committee to section 28 of the Dominion Elections Act, to which I believe I referred this afternoon. Subsection 1 is as follows:

All ballots shall be of the same description and as nearly alike as possible. The ballot of each voter shall be a printed paper, in this act called a ballot paper, on which the names, addresses and occupations of the candidates alphabetically arranged in the order of their surnames, shall, subject as hereafter in this section provided, be printed exactly as they are set out in the nomination paper; the ballot paper shall have a counterfoil and a stub—

This is the part which I think is pertinent.

—and there shall be a line of perforations between the ballot and the counterfoil and between the counterfoil and the stub, the whole as in form No. 32.

Then, referring to subsection 5:

The ballot papers shall be numbered on the back of the stub and the counterfoil, the same number being printed or written on the stub as on the counterfoil—

It will be observed that in section 15 of the regulations it is provided, by subsection 1, that:

Immediately after the issue of the proclamation, the chief plebiscite officer shall cause the ballot papers to be used at the plebiscite held under the Dominion Plebiscite Act, 1942, and these regulations, to be printed on both sides, consecutively numbered, perforated, and bound in books of twenty-five, and furnished in sufficient quantities to each returning officer.

I suggest that after the words "consecutively numbered" in line 35 these words be inserted:

on the back of the stub and counterfoil only.

Then, I believe, it will be in conformity with the Dominion Elections Act. I urge the minister to adopt that amendment.

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Chairman, there is not the slightest objection to doing so. I would have mentioned the matter before, but I thought that perhaps opportunity would be taken under subsection (2) of section 9, of discussing the regulations. The suggestion I have to make to meet the criticism—it was not a severe one—of the leader of the opposition was to insert in the regulations the necessary amendment. I do not think we can move it here as an amendment, because the regulations are not before the committee. But I would undertake that the amendment will be made to the regulations when they are passed. It is practically the same as the wording suggested by the leader of the opposition, but perhaps it makes it even more specific and removes it entirely from the realm of controversy. It is proposed that after the word "numbered" on page 19 of the regulations, to which the leader of the opposition has referred, we insert the following: "on the back of the stub and counterfoil, the same number to be printed on the stub as on the counterfoil." I think that is identical with what the leader of the opposition suggested, except for the last few words.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is rather redundant. Mine is a good deal better drafting.

Mr. McLARTY: I think the hon. gentleman's is briefer, but perhaps this will meet the situation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We will leave it to the two draftsmen who are in the gallery and let them decide.

Mr. GRAHAM: May I call attention to a principle set out in section 5 of the bill—

Mr. McLARTY: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member for Swift Current, but we are in committee of the whole, and seeing that we have extended the discussion I wonder whether the hon. member would feel that it might be in order to wait until we come to that section so that we may get on with some of the intervening ones. So far we have not covered a single section. Perhaps I must bear some measure of responsibility for that, but if we adopt the ordinary procedure in committee of the whole and deal with each section as we come to it, it will afford a more concentrated discussion of the merits of each section.

Mr. GRAHAM: I agree with the minister, but almost every other principle involved in the bill has been discussed under section 1.

Mr. POULIOT: Just a word, and this time my intention is not to speak at great length.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I always appreciate very deeply the generous response I have from all corners of the house, and I may tell you, Mr. Chairman, I find it inspiring. When I look at the good faces of my colleagues I feel like speaking at great length; I want to tell them all the good I think of them; but as time is precious, I shall have to consider only the matter that is before us.

A matter that has interested me deeply is the French-Canadian war effort. Early in the summer some reports were sent by some people who knew, in the Department of National Defence, and two months after these reports had been forwarded no action was taken. I had an opportunity of perusing them, and I wrote an article in the best weekly in Canada Le St. Laurent of Riviére du Loup. That article was translated into English and a part of it was published in the Citizen of Ottawa.

There were many complaints about the French-Canadian war effort. It was said in many quarters that French Canadians did not consider this war as their own and were not ready to do their share. This is absolutely false. What French Canadians have done since the beginning of the war in the matter of enlistment, war production, and so on, and contributions to the victory loan, can be favourably compared with what has been done in any other part of the country.

The article to which I refer was written some time last summer and appeared in the Citizen of September 3. I quote:

> The number of voluntary enlistments in our province is already at the present time greater by 15,000 than the total for the whole duration of the last war. Quebec military district has the honour of ranking fourth in the recent volunteer recruiting campaign, being surpassed only by Saint John, N.B.; Halifax, N.S., and Winnipeg. It made a better showing than the three military districts of Ontario and those of Saskatchewan and Alberta, even of British Columbia. Quebec's percentage of the quota allotted was 122 per cent; at London, Ontario, the rating was 73 per cent, and at Victoria, B.C., 61 per cent.
> Small wonder, then, that after a rapid inspection of the military camps, air fields and war industries of Quebec province, the British high commissioner to Canada, Right Hon. Malcolm MacDonald, should have said: "In the first place I congratulate Quebec in going over the top in the recruitment of men for the active service."

He had changed his views by then. He came here and saw that Canada was doing a great deal to help Great Britain.

Over the signature of Emile Benoist, a former president of the press gallery, Le Devoir commented as follows on this intolerable situation:

> For month after month, ever since the war began, French newspapers, not only in Quebec but in the other provinces, too, have called for the recruiting of French-Canadian regiments outside Quebec province. Nothing was done about it. On the contrary, we have seen Quebec regiments, which we have always considered to be French-Canadian regiments, become mixed units to which Anglo Canadian as well as French-Canadian officers are posted. This was the case, notably, for the Sherbrooke regiment and for the tank regiment of Three Rivers. We have even seen a Jew appointed to the command of one of these regiments, that of Sherbrooke. This same Jewish officer is to-day in command of one of the military camps in the Montreal district. Did the same thing happen in Ontario, for instance? Certainly not. Can you hear, not the noise, but the riotous uproar that would lift the roof in the Toronto hamlet if a Jew were appointed to the command of the Highlanders in that city?
> In the first place, the evidence of true history is there to prove that in 1914-1918 there was not a single unit without French-Canadians. They numbered 3,000 in the first contingent; but at that time General Sam Hughes refused to allow them to form a regiment.

It is true that the second contingent contained the immortal 22nd Regiment, made up exclusively of French-Canadians; but there were also a great many French-Canadians in the English regiments of Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, particularly in the Tenth of Calgary (now the Calgary Highlanders), of which R. B. Bennett was the honorary colonel. Our compatriots, however, were given no credit for this because there were no French-Canadian officers in those regiments.

In two English regiments, the R.M.R. (Royal Montreal Regiment) and the 87th (Canadian Grenadier Guards), there was respectively a company composed of French-Canadian officers and men. In two other regiments of our province the proportion of French-Canadians was very high, but they were all rankers. There were no French-Canadian officers in the Royal Highlanders of Canada or the Victora Rifles.

In the latter regiment French Canadians formed at least one-half of the strength, and it was, apparently, as a posthumous homage to a considerable number of them that the regiment's flags were lodged in the church of Notre Dame in Montreal.

We must hope that the errors of the past will not be repeated indefinitely. . . .

The conclusion is inescapable; it is high time to publish bilingual military manuals, to train French-Canadian officers in numbers commensurate with the proportion of French-Canadian soldiers, to open wide to them the doors of the military schools instead of merely leaving them slightly ajar, to entrust them with positions of command at the head of their compatriots even outside our own province, to preserve for French-Canadian regiments their French-Canadian character, to acknowledge the patriotism of all those French Canadians who have enlisted in regiments other than those of Quebec province by giving them besides officers of their own race, the legitimate hope of deserved promotion, of forming a French-Canadian brigade, instead of trying to break up French-Canadian regiments, finally to allow to every French-Canadian fighter, in the army, the air force or the navy, the satisfaction of being treated as an equal by his English-speaking comrades in the three services, so that there will be no inferior race that is shouldered with all the risks and no superior race to garner all the benefits, all the gold braid and all the glory.

French Canadians are often handicapped in the army. Here is a letter that I will read. It is unfortunately in French, but hon. members will be able to read it in the morning. The letter itself I shall send to the minister concerned.

(Translation)

Brantford, Ont., February 4, 1942.

Mr. J. F. Pouliot, M.P.,
Ottawa.

Sir,

I appeal to you on a question of the highest importance—freedom of speech.

I feel sure that you will bring the matter before the house, because I know that you are above all a French Canadian and that nothing can hold you back on questions of race or liberty. The circumstances are as follows:

There are here at Brantford several French Canadians, some of whom are unable to speak a word of English. Almost every day disputes break out because we are not allowed to speak our language, which is dear to us as it is to you. Last week I was charged twice with having had arguments about my language.

I also, Mr. Member, am a strong defender of the French tongue, that beautiful language so pleasant to hear. But the reason why I write to you is that last Sunday, February 1, at 8.30 p.m., I and three companions were conversing together in French when an Englishman told us to shut up, calling us "d——d Frenchmen", etc., etc. You can imagine the words he used. I replied that we were in a free country and could speak any language we wished. I told him it was none of his business if I spoke French. Then three men assaulted me. The corporal in charge had me arrested and thrown into prison. He said nothing to my assailants.

The following day I was paraded before Lieut. M. Wisseman who, when I explained the matter, said that I was in Ontario and had to speak English. He then condemned me.

Mr. LACOMBE: What is the name of the writer?

Mr. POULIOT: I shall give it to the minister.

Mr. LACOMBE: What is the name of the camp?

Mr. POULIOT: Brantford.

Mr. LACOMBE: What is the name of the commanding officer?

Mr. POULIOT: I shall give all that to my hon. friend later. An official of the Department of National Defence, Mr. Leon Trépanier, a former leader of the Montreal municipal council, complained on February 4th of the lack of system in the recruiting carried on in the province of Quebec. He declared that the rural districts were being stripped bare of young men and, in short, that the recruiting methods used were all wrong. I have noticed that in the county of Témiscouata. Still a large number of young men have enlisted in the army.

(Text) On January 14 last, I wrote to the Prime Minister as follows:

My dear Chief,—

I wish to draw your attention to attached marked copy of Hansard of November 12, 1941, page 4344, in which appears a statement from your colleague, the hon. Mr. Power, that he believed that information concerning the number of French Canadians who are serving in regiments that are not wholly French could be obtained.

I have sent you a copy of an article that I have published last summer about the war effort of the French Canadians and the number of enlistments in the three branches of the army.

It is of the utmost importance to get that information at the earliest possible opportunity. Our mutual and very dear friend, the late Mr.

Lapointe had also asked for that information which he found most important to get under the present circumstances, especially when the Tories intend to divide the country by making a campaign against the French Canadians.

At the same time, I take the liberty to send you a copy of a letter from Mr. Adrian Pouliot, Dean of the Faculty of Science of Laval university and President of the Permanent Committee of French Survival in America.

I hope that you will have no objection to give your kind attention to the matter and give definite instructions in order that such information is available at the earliest possible opportunity.

Unfortunately I have not the figures now, but I hope I shall get them in the near future.

Many things are said about the people from my province, and I will show how some people act with regard to Canadian unity. I have here an advertisement from the Windsor Star of February 21 last. It is over the name of a man named Wilkinson who is a shoe dealer. It reads:

It has been said through all the ages, that Nero fiddled while Rome burned, but some Canadians (so-called, only some of them) don't even fiddle.

This space contributed by Geo. H. Wilkinson, Ltd. in the interest of Canada's war loan.

Think how stupid it is.

Friends of mine in Windsor gave me some information about the enlistment of French Canadians in that district. According to the census of 1931, which is the latest available, in the three counties of Lambton, Kent and Essex the population was 268,319 and the number of French Canadians, 41,887. At the time that the Wilkinson advertisement was published in the Windsor Star a local regiment left for overseas, of which the French Canadians formed 35 per cent of the effective strength. Putting aside the United States citizens enlisted in that regiment, the French Canadians were at least 42 per cent of the total number. They are only 15½ per cent of the population of the three counties. It seemed that those good fellow citizens should be treated better than that.

Some time I shall have an opportunity to discuss matters in connection with the navy. I sent a memorandum last year to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), but I have received no definite information about the matter.

At six o'clock I was saying I did not see any argument in favour of the plebiscite. All hon. members have been saying that we have made a promise to the people not to impose conscription. I admit that that promise was made, and that it was made in high quarters. But the point is not as to whether a promise was made to the Canadian people. The question is: What is our duty to-day?

Mr. DUPUIS: To win the war.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, and we are all for it. But we do not want to be caught napping if the enemies invade our country, just as has happened in so many parts of the world. We must have some kind of defence; we must have some kind of protection. I do not wish to frighten anybody, but I have quoted what is being said in many quarters. What I cannot understand is that nobody is paying any attention to this country; everything is being done for other countries. I cannot conceive it, and I regret it deeply. At any time this country can be invaded.

Hon. members from British Columbia have spoken along those lines, and rightly so. There were occasions when they spoke alone. I did not wish to interfere with them when they were arguing on behalf of British Columbia, but I could have argued for the shores of the St. Lawrence river, for the shores of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and, in fact, for the whole country.

I am astounded that the most simple things, things that are based on common sense, are so hard to put into the heads of those in power. I cannot understand it. The more simple a thing is, the more difficult it is to have it accepted.

It is said that we shall have a plebiscite to decide whether we shall send men overseas by conscription, or whether we shall not. We are to decide whether or not the government is to be relieved from a promise made in the past. Why were those promises made? They were made on account of the deep patriotic feeling of the population of Canada, who wanted some protection provided by the Department of National Defence. At the present time what we have is very small, if it exists at all.

We are going on with the plebiscite; we are asking the people if they are willing to relieve the government from what is called the prosecution of the war. What reason does the government give for being relieved of its commitment given during the past year? None at all. Not a single reason has been given by any minister or any hon. member to justify the plebiscite. So much is that so that the Prime Minister said, "I do not know if I need it now, but I may need it later. But, trust me." I trust the Prime Minister; I have supported him for a great many years. But we have reached the time when I am ready to support anybody who will inculcate a system of defence in this country so that our people may be protected.

Mr. DUPUIS: Where is he?

Mr. POULIOT: He is surely not my hon. friend.

Mr. DUPUIS: No. I want to keep the actual Prime Minister in office.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask my hon. friend to keep quiet. I do not want any interruptions. Let him remember that he spoke no words during the debate, and I am not supposed to receive instructions from him now—and he must know it. If he has anything to say he must explain it to his electors.

Mr. DUPUIS: Where is he?

Mr. POULIOT: I told my hon. friend it was not he.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is not an answer at all.

Mr. POULIOT: And I was most gracious in saying that. I could have abstained from saying it, and asked that you, Mr. Chairman, call the hon. member to order.

Mr. DUPUIS: Where is he?

Mr. POULIOT: If I continue for five minutes I may convert the hon. member—

Mr. DUPUIS: You will do well.

Mr. POULIOT: —so as to make his views coincide with those of his constituents. I would not have said anything unpleasant—in fact I never do so unless I am interrupted. But when I am interrupted I am like a tiger, because I defend my own people. At the same time, I defend not only my own people, but I defend the people from the constituency of my hon. friend.

I wonder if another question could not be asked in the plebiscite. Could the people not be asked if they approve the gift of a billion dollars to Great Britain? That will be a fine question to put alongside the first one. I believe the question in its present form is not complete; it should be double. The Canadian people should be asked if they are ready to relieve the government from any pledge made in connection with establishing conscription and, in the second place, they should be asked if they are in favour of a gift of a billion dollars to the British exchequer. That would be a fine question.

I can see no reason why the question with respect to conscription should be submitted alone, and the question in connection with the billion dollar gift be left out. The people will have to strive and sweat; they will have to empty their pocket-books to pay taxes to meet that billion dollars. And that was imposed on us. No hon. member was consulted about it; we were faced with the accomplished fact. If we are to have a plebiscite, then let it be complete, and have the two questions.

Mr. DUPUIS: Which ones? There is no question of conscription in the plebiscite.

Mr. POULIOT: And besides that, the bill says nothing about the priority of the defence of Canada. There was an amendment on that point, but it will be recalled that the hon. member who has been interrupting me voted against it. That was his right. There was an amendment, too, with respect to farmers whose work is necessary in a time of war as well as in a time of peace. Theirs is essential work. The hon. member who has been interrupting voted against that amendment—as was his right.

Then, would it not be wise to ask a third question of the Canadian people: Do you not believe that Canadian defence should have priority over any commitments with or in favour of any other nation? Then there could be a fourth question: Are you in favour of exempting farmers' sons?

Mr. DUPUIS: The government is actually endeavouring to settle that question.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask the hon. minister in petto to let me continue.

Those are the four questions that I would ask, that I should like to see asked. If they are asked in the plebiscite I will vote for it. If they are not asked, I will vote against it. And, again, I shall vote against the plebiscite itself when it goes to the people.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I have risen several times to speak for a few minutes, and I shall detain the committee for only three or four minutes. There is a rule in the house that in committee an hon. member may speak as often as he wishes. He may speak in English and in French, or both, if he chooses.

I have no objection to the minister now making headway with his bill clause by clause, but I should like to point out three or four facts—because facts are facts. I am opposed to the principle of "follow your leader" and "your leader is your policy" on an important measure like this. Every day the bill is before the house the government shift their position with respect to the principle and policy of this bill. They began by telling the country, before parliament met, that owing to the scarcity of man-power the government were going to take some steps at the coming session of parliament, and announced a plebiscite. The reason for it and the cause and effect of the vote have been changed.

The government did announce a policy in the speech from the throne. Now they are shifting their position. They shifted it in the house, and they shifted it again in the committee the other day and now in this committee, and in all the debates we have had so far. It was said there was great difficulty in getting sufficient man-power and the government were going to lay down a new policy. Then they come along before the house met and propose a plebiscite or a referendum. This has never been done before except that one was held in 1898 in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In that referendum there were 200 local votes off it taken all over Ontario and Manitoba. The Prime Minister made a speech last Wednesday of a different nature. What is the cause and effect of this plebiscite bill, the first we have ever had in Canada, now under the title of the Dominion Plebiscite Act, 1942? The cause is the failure to get man-power or to do anything for a total war. Last Wednesday the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 826 of Hansard:

> Hon. members have been talking about conscription, about no conscription and the like. That is not the issue in this plebiscite. This is the issue: Is the government of Canada, in time of war, to have freedom to take whatever action it thinks most advisable with respect to the furtherance of Canada's war effort?

If that is the question, then what is the plebiscite for and why is it at all necessary? Have the government of Canada no courage to act and govern, and do their duty when the enemy is at our very gates? The Japs have submarines that can cross the Pacific without refuelling. As the Prime Minister of Great Britain told the House of Commons the other day, we shall have to expect the enemy who now have captured the command of the sea in the Pacific and will appear on many islands and shores of many countries in the Pacific, and in many other places. If you had a million men, he said, you would not be able to stop them because they move from one island and place to another like a circus from place to place. If the enemy appear in time in the inlets and harbours of British Columbia, will the commanding officer there have to wire Ottawa and say that the enemy is there and will he have to hold a plebiscite before firing a gun, or before sending up an aeroplane?

That is what they would have had to do under the Laurier naval bill in 1909. The same principle applies or may apply with this plebiscite bill to-day. If the enemy in 1909 had approached on the ocean, before the then Canadian navy could have fired off a pin-wheel, a fire-cracker or a sky-rocket, they would have had to have an order in council passed here in Ottawa first, under the naval bill of 1909. That was the principle of the navy bill. Are we going to have the same principle in this bill? The people of the country are awake to what is going on. They know more than we do about this plebiscite. They look upon it as being absolutely unnecessary. They consider that with the enemy at our doors, it is no time for it or for playing so at war. The situation is too grave for such by-play.

What will happen when the vote is taken? The ballot in this bill has black all round it and we may have a black-out here with Hitler and Japan arriving first before we can vote yes or no. The enemy may arrive before we can go into the polling booth and mark yes or no. The ballot reads:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

I would strike out all the words after the word "government" and have the ballot read, "Are you in favour of releasing the government?" It is the government that is asking for a release and that is the question to submit, if any. Some pledges were given, but we do not know to whom they were given and conscription was not an issue. I tell you what will happen. Instead of government of the people, by the people and for the people, what have we in this country to-day? We have government by order in council—twenty to twenty-five thousand of them—government by plebiscite and, in addition, government by dollar-a-year men. Is it any wonder that the people are losing confidence in this parliament? Is it any wonder that the electors are asking if there is any parliamentary government or any semblance of it left in this country, or if we are trying to imitate the methods of a mock parliament by this bill? That is what I think we are trying to do, and just playing at war.

When the vote is counted, what will happen? This is going to tie up our war effort for three months; it is going to throttle our effort in the most critical months of the year, April, May and June. We may not know to whom this country belongs by June the way things are going on with the Japs in the Pacific. I tell you what will happen to your vote. The minute the ballots are counted, they will simply be taken to the archives for decent burial of it all in that big new building, where it will be a case of "earth to earth, ashes to ashes and dust to dust" for this plebiscite; in the sure, certain hope, so far as this plebiscite on conscription is concerned, it will never be mentioned by the government again. That will be the end of it.

The Prime Minister made a magnificent speech the other day. I have never heard such a magnificent speech since the old days when he was a student going to university and when the temperance orators of the world used to speak each week-end in the city of Toronto. We heard a lot of oratory in those days in Massey hall, which was a new building then. The oratory in Massey hall was no better than what we heard here the other day. If it was simply a matter of taking a vote on who was to sign the pledge, it would be a different matter. But it is more than that. The voters know more than we do. They are not going to be humbugged or fooled or consent to be blindfolded by members of parliament or anybody else. A lot of them will not vote. A lot of ballots will be spoiled. No one understands it. Many of them think it is an insult to the electors of this country that this house should sit here day after day discussing academic matters and that kind of thing when the enemy in the Pacific have command of the sea, and when they may get it in the Atlantic as well.

If it were not for Russia, I do not know where we would be. The greatest friends the allies have had are General January and General February. If it had not been for General January and General February in the war between Germany and Russia, we would not know where the British empire would be. General January and General February, this year also are the best friends that British Columbia ever had. They saved the coast province after Pearl Harbour. They have given them a chance in British Columbia to get started and try to arm.

I protest against this bill, and if I can get a seconder I shall move the six months' hoist on the third reading. I believe the rank and file of the members of this house should have an opportunity of placing the blame where it belongs, on the government.

Hon. members opposite have brought in this bill just as a smoke-screen to cover up the mistakes made in the Pacific, Singapore, Hong Kong and other places. We had the Prime Minister rising the other night and wanting to have a dozen more Hong Kongs without consulting the military authorities in the sending of troops to adjacent territory, to Seattle, the Aleutian islands and other places where there are no military objectives. This was to be done over the heads of the military authorities by politicians, against the strategy and priorities set out by the Prime Minister of Great Britain. I protest against this.

My constituents can vote the way they want to. They know better than I how to vote. We had two governments in my riding in 1934. We had the whole dominion cabinet down there in 1934 in the by-election and we had the cabinet of the province of Ontario also. They all appeared there and I was glad to see them. The people of Toronto know how to vote without my telling them. I believe I know how they will vote. They will throw the ballot back in the faces of the government and say, "You have been elected to run the war, not us; go and carry on the work; as long as you are the government of the day, the responsibility is on your shoulders to see to it that we have a magnificent new war effort and a new war management."

Mr. CRERAR: I should like to make a suggestion to the committee. The discussion since eight o'clock has been of a general nature which would have been wholly appropriate on the second reading of the bill. We are now in committee considering the bill section by section. If we were to continue on the basis of the discussions of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), we might continue indefinitely. May I suggest that a good deal of the discussion is out of order. I think we would make better progress if we were to confine the discussion to each section of the bill as we come to it.

Mr. CHURCH: A private member shouldn't be a yes man or a nodder either.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): The understanding this afternoon, if I gathered it aright, was that on section 1 the discussion was to be general, but that when we came to the other sections the discussion had to be relevant to the section under discussion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are quite correct, Mr. Chairman. That was the agreement, and the hon. gentleman who is leading the house is quite out of date. Moreover, if he had the remarks to make which he has just made, he should have made them before.

Mr. CRERAR: May I say in reply to the rebuke of the leader of the opposition that my duties required me to be out of the chamber for a great part of the afternoon, and I was not aware of the point which he has just raised. Even so, we have had quite a lengthy discussion and we are anxious to make as much progress as possible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the discussion is not out of order in any event. I admit that on the part of one of the minister's followers there has been what I would term obstruction. I will withdraw that term if it is not parliamentary, but it was so apparent that I think everybody agrees with me. But the discussion per se is not out of order.

Mr. HOMUTH: I rise to a question of privilege. As one of the members of the opposition I resent the raising of this point of order by the hon. gentleman who is leading the house after one of our members had spoken for only eight or ten minutes while one of his own followers had wandered all over the face of the globe for seventy minutes with no protest whatever from the other side of the house. I am beginning to think they are afraid to call the member for Témiscouata to order.

Mr. CRERAR: A very courageous remark, that!

Mr. POULIOT: I am in your hands, Mr. Chairman. I hope that the issue of this war will be victory for us and that—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Will the hon. gentleman say on what section he is speaking?

Mr. POULIOT: I am answering what has been said by the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Waterloo South. The leader of the opposition was referring to me because I was the only Liberal member who had spoken, and he said that I was guilty of obstruction. I know that he has too much parliamentary experience to make that remark seriously. I noticed that he was listening to me and that for the first time in his life he seemed interested in what I was saying. If I was guilty of obstruction, the thing should not have occurred. As for the hon. member for Waterloo South, who is a strong partisan with his own views, I do not care a bit.

Mr. McIVOR: I have waited most of this afternoon and listened as best I could until I might have an opportunity to ask a question. As I listened I could not help thinking of the words of Carlyle:

> There was an owl sat on an oak,
> The more he heard the less he spoke,
> The less he spoke the more he heard,
> I wish there were more like that old bird.

I intend to go out and get every vote I can in favour of the plebiscite because I think that is the right thing to do. I think that is the duty of every man in Canada at the present time, whether he be Irish, Scotch, English, French or anything else.

A question that I have been repeatedly asked, and one that I want to ask of the government is this: Will there be a time and place when the government will consider and act on this suggestion, that a soldier who leaves a job will get better pay than the man who takes it. I know that the soldier gets $1.30 a day, which, with board, would amount to about $69 a month, but the man who steps in and takes his job or perhaps sweeps up crumbs in a factory gets fifty cents an hour. which means, with overtime, $100 a month. I say that the man who dons the uniform, no matter where he serves, is the man who should get the raise of pay. I think we are past the time when a man should be asked or encouraged to volunteer for less pay than the man who stays at home, while the fighting man goes out to protect him. I hope, before this session closes, whether before or after the budget, soldiers will get a raise of pay rather than a deduction of former earnings.

Mr. HAZEN: Mr. Chairman, I was one of the members of the special committee to which this bill was referred. The members of that committee gave careful consideration to each section of the bill, and while they did not all see eye to eye in every particular, they were all agreed on this, that the bill as it came before the committee was too wide in its scope. I am glad to say they all agreed on that, and as a consequence the bill that comes before this committee to-day varies in its most essential provision from the bill as originally drafted and presented to the house. As originally drafted, the bill contained a principle—the Speaker may not agree with me, but I say that it was a principle—that is not to be found in the bill as it is now before this committee. The underlying principle of the bill as first presented to the house was that the government could by proclamation order the taking of a plebiscite at any time it saw fit. That provision was contained in section 3, subsection 1 of the bill as drafted, which read as follows:

> The governor in council may by proclamation order the taking of a plebiscite under the provisions of this act.

That was a most dangerous provision. If it had become law it would have made a radical change in the constitution of this country. It would have led the way to government by plebiscite—something which we should endeavour to avoid in Canada. Under our constitution—I may not be speaking accurately but this is as I understand it—the decision of the people on any matter of public policy is given and given only through their elected representatives. Within its legislative jurisdiction the power of parliament is supreme. If the government wants to change its policy or adopt a new policy, it must submit it to parliament for its approval, and if approval is not given, the government must dismiss parliament and appeal to the electors.

Our system of parliamentary government does not provide for any other procedure. It does not provide for procedure by plebiscite.

The two courses open to a government if it wants to change its policy are (1) to have parliament approve the change, or (2) to dissolve parliament and have a new parliament deal with the matter after an election has been held.

To have an important change made in our constitution by the passing of this bill as originally drafted and presented to the house would have been most undesirable and was to be avoided at all costs. It was, I think, with that thought in mind that the members of the special committee limited the provisions of the bill.

The reason why the government introduces this bill is to ask the voters of this country to release it from a promise which it made. That promise was, that there would be no conscription of our man-power for service overseas. The bill as it has been amended by the special committee limits or circumscribes the legislation to that particular question.

I do not think this legislation should be regarded as a precedent, or as changing in any way our constitution. It should be regarded—and I think the special committee looked at it in that light—as extraordinary legislation arising under special conditions brought about in war time. If it is so regarded, I do not believe that, speaking from a constitutional point of view, it can do any harm. But that is the way it should be looked at, and some emphasis should be put upon that phase of the matter by the members of the government who are interested in the bill.

I was impressed with the point made this afternoon by the leader of the opposition, that the regulations impose certain penalties, but that those regulations do not come before parliament but are made by order in council. It seems to me that we are neglecting our duties as members of the House of Commons in not paying more attention to that particular matter.

I would refer also briefly to the suggestion of the hon. member for Lake Centre this afternoon, that any person whose name was omitted from the voters' list, and wanted it added thereto should, in addition to making the affidavits for which the regulations provide, produce his registration certificate. That is a very wise proposal; it would provide an effective safeguard.

Mr. WHITE: As another member of the special committee to which the bill was submitted, I have one or two observations to make before we leave this stage. The hon. member who was chairman has already dealt with a matter raised by the leader of the opposition, as to the numbering of the ballots. I associate myself with what other members of the committee have stated, that when this particular section was before the committee their distinct understanding was that the ballots would be in the same form as those used at a general election.

Although the minister has suggested that we leave certain sections to be dealt with when we come to them, I ask the indulgence of the committee for a few minutes to indicate certain sections which were discussed in committee and to mention what the comments in the committee were. The first was in connection with the form of ballot to be used on the plebiscite, which is set out under section 3. When this section was before the committee I suggested that another form of ballot be used, whereby the question would be set out at the top of the ballot, and there would follow one, two or three lines of instructions to the voter as to how to mark his ballot; then there would be a space for the word "yes" and underneath that a space for the word "no." My reason was that, as the ballot now appears in section 3, with the question set out twice, I fear that the ballot will be confusing to many people, particularly those who live in rural sections, and perhaps those who wish to vote "yes" may feel that they have to strike or cross out the words which repeat the question followed by the word "no."

Mr. REID: Why in rural constituencies?

Mr. WHITE: The hon. member for New Westminster knows that in rural constituencies on election day there are many things which confuse voters. If you look over the number of spoiled ballots, you will notice that it does not take very much to confuse some of them.

Mr. REID: My point was that it might affect urban as well as rural voters.

Mr. WHITE: Well, being just one of these rural fellows, I should not like to express an opinion as to the people who come from the cities.

Mr. REID: I have some regard for the intelligence of the rural people.

Mr. WHITE: I have too, but I think the hon. member will agree that the ballot should be set out in such a simple manner that there will be no possibility of doubt about how it should be marked.

Mr. REID: I agree with the hon. member.

Mr. WHITE: I submit that as the ballot is prepared, with the question repeated, appearing once before the word "yes" and then again before the word "no", it has a tendency to confuse certain voters. I suggested that the question should be printed at the top of the ballot with two or three lines of simple instructions. But, as the minister pointed out, the majority of the committee were not in favour of that suggestion, and the ballot has come before the committee in its present form.

There was further a question—

The CHAIRMAN: May I point out to the hon. member that he is now discussing the bill clause by clause.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I take this point of order, that the minister himself opened the debate with a general discussion of all these points, after reviewing the work of the committee, and it was agreed that a general discussion could be held on the first section of the bill and that, after that was over, speakers would be confined to the section.

The CHAIRMAN: It was to be a general discussion of the principle, if I mistake not, and then the bill would be taken section by section. To continue as we are going now, means that the discussion will be repeated on each section of the bill.

Mr. WHITE: With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that from six to ten hon. members who have served on the special committee have already spoken; they have ranged throughout the bill and made various comments. I think it is only fair that those who served on the special committee should have an opportunity to express in a general way their views and, more or less, what went on in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: That is what I understood—"in a general way", but the hon. gentleman is now discussing the bill section by section.

Mr. WHITE: I am taking just one or two special clauses.

The CHAIRMAN: That is not "in a general way". Discussing the bill in a general way means discussing the general principles underlying the bill. But if you take in a general way each section, section by section, it is a repetition of what is going to take place on the motion to adopt each section.

Mr. WHITE: If, Mr. Chairman, it is your opinion that I must sit down I will do so, but I would point out—

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. gentleman would confine himself to a few minutes I would—as a concession—allow him to go on. I should like to point out that I am in the hands of the committee. If we must expedite the work of the committee it is impossible, first, to discuss on the principle of the bill all of the sections, and then take them up seriatim.

Mr. WHITE: If you wish to expedite the matter, why was no objection taken when the distinguished member for Témiscouata took up about two hours? I did not hear anyone voice any objection then, but if you say that I must sit down I will sit down.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not say that.

Mr. McLARTY: We have allowed considerable latitude, and perhaps I am more responsible than anyone else for the course the debate has taken. The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) was a member of the special committee, and inasmuch as I had the privilege of dealing with the work of the committee I would not want to see that right denied to him. If, however, we could understand that there should be some limitation of the breadth of the debate, it would help matters materially. I cannot throw stones at anyone because I probably started it, but at some time we have to come down to the particular section of the bill, and I would suggest that if hon. members could bring themselves to discuss a particular clause when we come to it, it would be much more expeditious and satisfactory.

Mr. WHITE: In view of what the minister says I will finish my remarks and, as the different clauses come up, deal with them. After all, the bill is such an utter farce that it does not make much difference.

Mr. LOCKHART: When we are not permitted to discuss the regulations in this committee—

Mr. MacINNIS: Oh, yes. I think the minister said that the regulations could be discussed on subsection 2 of section 9. That is what I understood.

Mr. McLARTY: The leader of the opposition pointed out that this was the only clause under which the regulations could be discussed. I believe it was the original intention when the bill was introduced that the regulation should not be gone over clause by clause in committee. If there are any particular points in the regulations which do not conform to subsection 2 of section 9 they can be discussed under that, but I suggest that it be taken as an undertaking that we shall not go over the regulations clause by clause, the principal reason being the matter of time.

Mr. LOCKHART: Notwithstanding any points that have been raised, the minister did make it explicit that there would not be a general discussion of the regulations. He also.

in his enlargement on the general outline of the bill, raised the question of the registration certificate not being used. It is not my desire to detain the committee at any length, but I wish to recite an experience that occurred over the week-end and also to protest most vehemently against the deletion of the use of the registration certificate.

The CHAIRMAN: Deletion of what?

Mr. LOCKHART: The use of the registration certificate. The minister referred to it in his general remarks. My understanding was and still is that no employer of labour can employ anyone without first requiring him to produce the certificate. I understand also that not long ago there was licensing in connection with every transaction of business by wholesalers and retailers. That requirement in regard to licensing appears to have gone with the wind. Men are now shipping goods without a licence number and are doing just about what they like, although we were told at first that shipments must be held up if the licence number did not appear on the invoice. Unless there has been a change in the hiring of men throughout Canada, whereby they are required first to produce their registration certificates—

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. gentleman tell me under what item he is speaking?

Mr. LOCKHART: I am speaking in connection with the general discussion. The minister also referred to the registration certificate under the short title of the bill. I am not going to detain the committee very long, but on Saturday last two different firms who are desperately in need of men to carry on their business informed me that men had come into their place of business and were unable to produce their registration certificates. The minister explained why it was not required, in connection with men voting, to produce the registration certificate. I claim that unless the registration certificate has lost its value and if a man cannot get employment without producing his certificate, such persons wandering around the country should not vote on a question such as this. I do urge that consideration be given this point, notwithstanding that the committee may have compromised on the matter. If the cost of the registration of people throughout Canada is worth anything, if it is sufficiently valuable to make it the law of this country, that before a man can be employed he must produce his registration certificate, then surely the certificate ought to be used when it comes to restricting people in casting their ballot. Any further remarks I have to make I shall confine to the different sections of the bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. McLARTY: There are some amendments which I would ask the Minister of National Revenue to move. In subsection (a) in line 9 the last three words "at a plebiscite" should be deleted. Perhaps the leader of the opposition is looking at the new bill, but I am dealing with the bill as the committee had it before them.

The CHAIRMAN: The other is a reprint.

Mr. McLARTY: Yes, but I am dealing with the bill as it went to the committee, and I am seeing that the appropriate amendments are moved so that it will correspond with the reprint.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): "At a plebiscite" came out.

Mr. McLARTY: Yes. In subclause (c) the words "during a plebiscite" should read "during the plebiscite".

The CHAIRMAN: I do not believe it is necessary to amend the bill in each particular in which the committee has amended it. We have the bill as reported from the committee and as reprinted.

Mr. McLARTY: I thought possibly a motion had to be made.

The CHAIRMAN: I am not aware of that.

Mr. McLARTY: If it is understood that the amendments in the bill as it came from the committee do not need to be moved, I will not press the motion.

The CHAIRMAN: The bill has been reprinted, and we are reading from the reprint as amended by the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The reprint is for the convenience of the committee. I think the amendments have to be moved. I do not agree with the Chairman.

Mr. McLARTY: I remember at the time we were considering the Unemployment Insurance Act the question was raised, and at that time it seemed to be demanded that each particular amendment be moved.

Mr. HOMUTH: Was it not the report of the committee—the bill as reprinted—which has been turned over to the committee of the whole house?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, but the special committee report has not been adopted; therefore the recommendations of that committee have not been approved by this committee. Consequently the bill as submitted to the special committee has only been amended by that committee, and we have to amend the original bill here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There has been no motion for concurrence.

Mr. McLARTY: The amendments are as follows:

In line 15, following the word "plebiscite" the words "issued under section 3 of this act" are deleted. Then a new clause is inserted dealing with the electoral district definition to include the Yellowknife administration district as it appears in the bill as printed. As a result subparagraphs (d), (e), (f) and (g) are changed to (e), (f), (g) and (h) by the insertion of clause (d) as it now appears in the bill.

Under clause (e) the words "ordering a plebiscite to be taken, issued under section 3 of this act" are changed to read "issued under this act, ordering the plebiscite to be taken".

In clause (g) which is now clause (h) the word "a" is changed to "the" before the word "plebiscite" in line one of page 2.

Mr. GIBSON moved:

That section 2 be amended in subsection (a), line 9, by striking out the words "at a plebiscite".

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON moved:

That section 2 be amended in subsection (c), line 14, by striking out the word "A" and substituting in lieu thereof the word "the".

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON moved:

That section 2 be further amended in subsection (c), lines 15 and 16, by deleting the words "issued under section 3 of this act".

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON moved:

That section 2 be further amended by adding after subsection (c) another subsection to be subsection (d) of section 2 reading "electoral district" means any territorial area entitled to elect a member or members to serve in the House of Commons of Canada, and, notwithstanding anything contained in The Representation Act, 1933, for the purpose of this act, shall include the Yellowknife administration district under the name Yellowknife as established on 1st October, 1939, under the provisions of the local administration district ordinance.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON moved:

That section 2 be further amended by making the present subsection (d) become subsection (e).

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a change there, isn't there?

The CHAIRMAN: It is making subsection (d) become (e).

Mr. McLARTY: In addition to changing the lettering of the subsection there is an amendment deleting the words "a proclamation of the governor in council issued under section 3 of this act." Those words must be deleted.

The CHAIRMAN: The lettering of the paragraphs (e), (f) and (g) becomes (e), (f), (g) and (h), and then that the new subsection (e) is further amended in lines 19, 20, and 21, by deleting the words "a proclamation of the governor in council issued under section 3 of".

Mr. GIBSON: I so move.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON moved:

That section 2 subsection (f) be further amended by deleting in lines 23 and 24 the words "ordering a plebiscite to be taken issued under section 3 of this act" and substituting in lieu thereof the words "issued under this act, ordering the plebiscite to be taken".

Motion agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON moved:

That section 2 subsection (h) be amended on the first line of page 2 by striking out the word "a" and substituting in lieu thereof the word "the".

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MacINNIS: There is a typographical error in subsection (h), line 8.

Mr. McLARTY: Yes, the word "the" is inserted incorrectly and should be deleted.

Section 2 as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Limitation.

Mr. GIBSON moved:

That section 3 subsection 1 be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

Limitation.

3. (1) This act shall be limited to the taking of a plebiscite on a question to be set out in the ballot papers in the following words and form:

Every person qualified to vote at the plebiscite shall do so by making a cross within one of the spaces herein provided after the word 'yes' or after the word 'no' according to the manner in which such person desires to vote.

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?	YES
Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?	NO

Proclamation ordering taking of plebiscite.

(2) The governor in council may by proclamation order the taking of a plebiscite for the purpose of submitting to the ordinary voters and to the Canadian service voters the question set out in subsection one of this section.

Contents of proclamation.

(3) The proclamation shall state fully the question to be submitted at the plebiscite in the same words and form as it will appear on the ballot paper pursuant to the provisions of subsection one of this section.

Idem.

(4) The proclamation shall also state the date fixed as polling day for such plebiscite, which shall be a Monday and the same in all electoral districts. Such proclamation shall further state the respective days and dates upon which Canadian service voters, as defined in this act, stationed within or without Canada, may cast their votes at such plebiscite.

Publication.

(5) The proclamation shall be published forthwith in a special issue and in at least two ordinary issues of the Canada Gazette.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I am going to take exception to the form of the ballot. I agree with the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough that this ballot is confusing. I have voted on a number of plebiscites—we call them by-laws—in municipal elections. The question asked on such occasions is whether one is in favour of or against a certain proposal. I have never seen a question appearing twice on the ballot.

On this ballot there are two questions, although it is the same question stated twice. In my opinion this is bound to cause confusion. People do not vote on questions like this every day; they are not accustomed to dealing with the written word, as are members of parliament. They have not had the training in these matters that lawyers have had. They will come in and read the first part of the ballot, and become confused. The whole thing is stacked against the voter, at the very beginning. For instance, a voter will read the question opposite which the word "yes" appears. Then, he may scratch out the "yes" and put down a big "no," with the result that a spoiled ballot has been cast.

I spoke to the representative of this group on the special committee, and pointed out to him my objection, while the committee was sitting. In my opinion the question should appear only once, and the words "yes" and "no" should be enclosed in brackets or in divisions at the end. Then the voter could make a cross either for or against in the "yes" or "no" division. In that way the ballot would not have to be repeated.

Mr. REID: Was this possibility discussed in the special committee? I agree with what other hon. members have said, namely that this ballot will confuse the voter. I believe the whole thing could be simplified by having the question appear only once, and then by providing places for "yes" or "no" votes.

Mr. McLARTY: This matter was discussed in committee. I have no violent feeling as to the form in which the question should appear. When the matter was first considered I was somewhat of the opinion that one question would be appropriate, and that spaces for "yes" and "no" could be provided. I believe, however, that the action of the committee was governed entirely by the experience of the chief electoral officer, who has suggested this form of ballot. My recollection is that it has been used extensively in practically all the provinces, in connection with the Canada Temperance Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not very often.

Mr. McLARTY: Members of the special committee were surprised to learn the number of times it had been used.

Mr. LOCKHART: How long ago was that?

Mr. McLARTY: Between 1920 and 1925, if I remember correctly the dates the chief electoral officer gave us.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is sixteen years ago; we have a new generation now.

Mr. McLARTY: I would suppose that a change of ballot is not something which would change with the generation. However, according to the report given to the special committee, which was after some argument adopted by it, it was decided that this was the form which was most appropriate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There must be a large number of members of the legal profession in Ontario who are familiar with the provisions of the municipal act of that province whereby at annual elections what are known as money by-laws are submitted to the voters. They have them right here in Ottawa. I have never voted on one, but I know that the people are simply asked: Are you in favour of a bond issue for so-and-so?—and they are usually asked to answer "yes" or "no."

Mr. REID: They write "yes" or "no" on the ballot.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That seems to be a most simple method. In this instance the question would be asked: Are you in favour of releasing the government?—and the answer would be "yes" or "no." That procedure is familiar to the voters of Ontario, although we do not have that type of legislation in New Brunswick. In that province a municipality wishing to make a capital expenditure takes the necessary steps, and the matter is referred to the legislature. That would apply to a town council or a county council, as the case may be. Such by-law would be reviewed by the Department of Municipal Affairs, and the government of the day accepts some responsibility in the matter.

I do not say the government accepts full responsibility, but it follows some policy, and either accepts or rejects. However, our by-laws are not submitted to the people—I believe it would be much better if they were, because such submission is an added control over councils.

In Ontario, however, the submission of by-laws to the people is universal practice. I am told that in British Columbia it is a procedure stipulated by law. I believe most provinces in Canada must have something analogous, where the voter writes his "yes" or "no". That is the simplest possible form of ballot. I am convinced that this one would be confusing.

Mr. McLARTY: I believe the voter simply makes a cross.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; he does not write at all.

Mr. McCANN: I cannot see that there is any particular advantage or disadvantage in having the question repeated on the ballot paper. I have voted several times in reference to municipal by-laws in Ontario, and if I remember correctly, it is the practice to have the question appear only once. But I believe the minister will recall that in an ordinary election it is customary to put the names of those for whom the ballot is to be cast in alphabetical order. There is some advantage, especially when there are three names, in being either at the top or the bottom. There are many people who are inclined to vote for names at the top or the bottom. If the committee wishes to carry out that idea, then this would be reversed; it would be "no" and "yes", not the other way round.

Mr. McLARTY: Would the hon. member make it affirmative or negative?

Mr. McCANN: I do not know whether the "yes" being first reflects the wish of the government or not. If it does, then perhaps there is an advantage in having it at the top. But if you are going to follow the practice usually followed in electoral contests and have it in alphabetical order, then the "no" should be opposite the first question and the "yes" opposite the second.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HOMUTH: I agree with the hon. members who take exception to this form of ballot. I think it will be found that many people will go into the polling booth and instead of putting a cross or writing anything down, they will simply strike out that word which they do not want. If they want to vote "no", they will strike out the word "yes", and spoil the ballot. As the leader of the opposition has said, when we submit ballots to the municipal ratepayers in Ontario we submit the one question and then there is a "yes" and a "no" and they vote accordingly. I think the ballot provided for in the bill is most confusing and is going to cause a lot of difficulty. There is no reason at all why we should not do what has been suggested. In reference to the various plebiscites taken in Ontario, hon. members from this province will recall that the one in 1919 contained four questions. There were four different questions, but each question dealt with a different phase of the liquor act.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What did you get? You got Mitch.

Mr. HOMUTH: No; we never got Mitch; Mitch just happened. There were other votes taken later on. The one taken in 1921 was submitted in such a way that it was simply a question of "yes" or "no". I think we could change this ballot from what it is.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Some time ago in Ontario the voters in most of the municipalities were asked to vote, "Are you in favour of daylight saving—yes or no?" There was no possibility of the voter getting mixed up. If you have this thing the way it is now, I know in my riding you will have half the ballots spoiled.

Mr. BOUCHER: I am altogether too young to remember the vote on the liquor question in Ontario, but I have had considerable experience with people signing forms and answering questions such as on applications to the civil service commission. My opinion is that this ballot is most confusing in many ways. I think the question should be asked just once and then have the word "yes" with a square after it in which the voter could put his mark, and then the word "no" with a square after it. There would be a place in which the voter could signify his intention. The way it is now the people will think they have to strike out that portion which they do not approve. In my humble opinion the ballot in its present form is very confusing. The voter will be led to believe that he is required to do more than is necessary, and there will be an obscurity as to his wish as expressed in the ballot. I would suggest that the question be a great deal simpler than it is now.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): When I said that half the ballots would be spoiled in my riding if the ballot were left as it is now, I meant that as the people there had such definite views, if they wanted to vote "yes" they would mark their ballot that way and then strike out the "no".

Mr. TURGEON: I have no deep opinion as to the particular form the ballot should take, but when I was in the special committee I was convinced by what the chief electoral officer told us was the experience of his branch. The members of the special committee made a change which has not been brought to the attention of this committee of the whole, and the following words were placed at the top of the ballot:

Every person qualified to vote at the plebiscite shall do so by making a cross within one of the spaces herein provided after the word "yes" or after the word "no" according to the manner in which such person desires to vote.

Mr. REID: How many do you think will read that?

Mr. TURGEON: The special committee thought they would read it. I am not arguing in favour of this ballot, but as one of the members of that committee I want to point out what was in the minds of the members of that committee when they were giving consideration to this question. There is no doubt that the members of the special committee felt that persons coming to vote would read that, and my opinion is that they would. When the average person goes into the quiet of the polling booth he will look at the ballot to see what is on it. When he reads what is at the top, the nature of the action he is expected to take will be clarified and he will be able to mark his ballot accordingly. I would not have any fear that there will be many rejected ballots because of the way in which this question is put. I am not saying that because I object to changing the question —that does not matter very much. I would have no fear that the average voter will be able to vote intelligently with this ballot.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would it not be a sound principle to apply to this problem to have the form as simple as possible? I suggest that the question be placed on the form once and once only, and direction given to mark opposite the word "yes" with a cross in a square, or opposite the word "no", as the case may be.

Mr. McLARTY: I think the hon. members of this committee wish to get a ballot form that will be as fair and simple as possible. I suggest that possibly we may let this form stand, and I shall endeavour to have sample ballots prepared overnight and then hon. members will have an ocular demonstration as to whether or not it is simple.

Mr. HOMUTH: When the resolution was introduced I think it was mentioned that there would not be as many polling booths as would be provided in an ordinary election. Therefore, there will be a greater number of people voting at each booth. To a large extent, that will eliminate some of the questions of the cost of taking this plebiscite, but if every voter has to read a chapter of a book before he votes, we can see how it will slow up the voting.

Mr. GREEN: It does seem to me that the words at the top of the ballot could be simplified a great deal. Would it not be more satisfactory to use these words:

Make a cross within the space after the word "yes" or after the word "no" according to the manner in which you desire to vote.

Would that not be simpler than having all this business about "Every person qualified to vote", et cetera?

Mr. McLARTY: I think I shall be able to produce some sample ballots to-morrow, if that is the wish of the committee. I do not think this is a matter in which there is any great difference. It is simply a case of trying to get the ballot in the best form.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. McLarty moves that section 3 stand.

Mr. McLARTY: Just subsection 1.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I should like to say a word before that motion is put. I think the minister is correct when he says that the committee was largely influenced in recommending this form of ballot by the opinion of the chief electoral officer who said that such form had been satisfactory in the past. After listening to the discussion that has taken place to-night, I really think the form of ballot would be simplified by printing the question on it only once.

If hon. members will look at the ballot paper as it appears in the bill, I think they will agree that it would be much simpler to raise the word "yes"—or "no" if you like—further up in the space, and then print "no" below it, drawing a line between "yes" and "no" and leaving a space after each word where the voter could mark his cross. That would be very much simpler, and then you would not need the printed direction above at all.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think we are wasting a lot of time. In the last federal election we solved simple problems such as this very easily so far as my riding is concerned. It was left to the intelligence of the voter.

Mr. HOMUTH: That did not solve it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They put the cross in the right place. Does this committee realize that Japan is still at our doors and that we are wasting time talking a lot of nonsense?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): And holding a plebiscite.

Mr. HANSELL: I know I am of small stature, Mr. Chairman, but some time I may fill the shoes of a Minister of Agriculture, and then perhaps I can be seen and heard. I agree with all that has been said with respect to the confusion that may arise over this form of ballot. The hon. member for Caribou has called attention to the wording of the ballot paper and suggested that when people vote they will read what is at the top of the ballot. I am more concerned as to what the people will read about in respect to what they are voting for. I am more confused about that than I am about the form of the ballot. The question to be asked of the voters is this:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

I have tried to think my way through that, and I can think of only two methods of raising men: One is by conscription and the other is by voluntary enlistment. There may be some regulations governing methods. The government may be confused over whether they should send a postcard when a man is to be called up for military service or whether they should send an officer along to tell him he is required. I would ask the minister what methods of raising men for military service are used now, and what commitments have been made that restrict the government to any particular methods of raising men. I do not believe that the government are restricted in their methods of raising men. Where they are restricted is as to where to send the men after they are raised. But that does not appear on the ballot, and I think people are going to be confused as to what they are voting for when they read the question.

While on the question of the ballot, I appreciate the minister's suggestion that we let the ballot stand until he can reconsider its form. But if he is going to reconsider the ballot at all, there are a few other matters he should consider, and first is the thing I have already mentioned, the question to be asked. I should like at the proper time, Mr. Chairman, to submit an amendment. I do not know whether now is the proper time or not, but I will submit it for consideration, and if this is the time to vote on it, the minister may accept it and embody it in the ballot for our consideration when he comes back. I move that the following words be added to the question appearing on the ballot paper: "in any theatre of war." The question then will read:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service in any theatre of war.

Then the people will know what they are voting upon. I think it is only fair to say that the whole country believes that they are going to vote on whether or not there shall be conscription of men for service. But that is not what the ballot states.

There is another thing about this ballot. I have received a good many letters recently in connection with the plebiscite, and the general contention of the people who have inquired of me is that they are not going to vote for the conscription of men for overseas service if they are not privileged to vote on the conscription of finance. I think that is a reasonable attitude to take because, after all, the man who is conscripted to face shot and shell and who gives his life for his country is giving all he has. Surely there should be some mobilization and conscription of other things too. The government desires to be released from its commitments. I would suggest that another question be added to the ballot paper, and I would suggest that it read this way. I move this as an amendment:

That a second question be placed upon the ballot paper as follows:

Are you in favour of the conscription of the financial institutions of Canada so that the government can fulfil its commitment to issue currency and credit in terms of public need?

I pass these amendments along to you, Mr. Chairman, and I send copies of each of them to the minister. I trust that when the ballot comes back we shall find it amended exactly as I have suggested, and that the questions will be printed accordingly. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I shall gladly support the ballot if it is so amended.

The CHAIRMAN: We can take only one amendment at a time. It is moved by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) that the following words be added to the question appearing on the ballot: "in any theatre of war."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would you be kind enough to read it, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: The question as proposed to be amended would then read:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service in any theatre of war?

Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Mr. PERLEY: No matter what the form of the ballot may be, I can assure the committee that there will be as few spoiled ballots in the constituency of Qu'Appelle as anywhere else in the country. My opinion is that there should be nothing on the ballot but the question itself. There is no need to print the directions on how to vote because the directions will be posted in the polling booth itself. You should have just the question on the ballot paper, without any directions.

I do not believe there are any commitments of the government restricting the method of raising men. That part of the question is outside the issue and quite unnecessary. The restriction is not with respect to the method of raising men; it is as to where you send the men. So I think that should be deleted, to make it more comprehensible, and there should be added to it something as to where you send the men for military service. The question could be made more understandable by deleting that part of the fourth line, also by striking out any instructions as to how to vote; have just the one question, with "yes" or "no", and I think it would be very readily understood.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I feel sure that this ballot is going to be very confusing to a lot of people in my part of the country. The manner of voting in municipal elections as regards the ballots suggests a much simpler form, where you have one question appear, and you can vote "yes" or "no". I am receiving a great many letters from people in my own home riding, irrespective of political affiliation, wanting to know what it means if they vote "yes" and what it means if they vote "no". I have not yet been able to learn from the government what it means. I have taken the trouble to read previous speeches in this chamber by the Prime Minister and members of the government, and after doing so I am unable to see that a vote on this ballot will get us anywhere. I think the hon. member for Macleod made it very plain in his discussion on the resolution as to this plebiscite that this ballot would not release the government from its pledges given in this house some years ago. He presented a very strong argument, and his suggested amendment does something to clarify to the public the meaning of the ballot. "In any theatre of war" makes it at least slightly more explicit. I think it could be improved even more. I suggest in all seriousness that only one question appear on the ballot paper, and I think that the words "in any theatre of war" should be added. The question would not then be so confusing to the general public.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member for Qu'Appelle has, I think, put his finger right on the fallacy of this question. In the mobilization act, in the admissions made by the Prime Minister in this house within a few days, the principle of compulsion is admitted. This government has power to raise men by any method, and it is raising them by all the methods which are now available—the voluntary system and the compulsory system. The only distinction is as to the disposition of the men raised by the government. In the one case, the men raised by compulsion may not be sent beyond the territorial limits of Canada, while men raised by voluntary methods may. So the question which is proposed to be put in this ballot is an untruthful one; it does not bear the essence of truth. There is not any restriction to-day on the method of raising men; it is the matter of the disposal of the men once they are raised; there is the fallacy of the whole thing. I put it to the Prime Minister, is there any restriction of the method of raising men in this country to-day? None whatever. The government can do anything it likes under the War Measures Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. That is not the point.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know what the Prime Minister has to say. I have the floor, for just a few moments.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend asked me a question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I didn't—or I did with a rider attached. I make this assertion, that there is no restriction in law or in fact on the method by which this government may raise men for military service, and I defy a successful answer to the contrary to that question. The only trouble with the situation in Canada to-day is that the government has voluntarily tied itself by a commitment which it made to the public in the last election as to the disposition of the men raised by compulsion. We have the limitation in section 3 of the mobilization act, and this is self-imposed by the government. But by the same token, the government has in its possession to-day an opinion from its own law officers of the crown that, notwithstanding the limitation contained in the third section of the mobilization act, it may disregard that and send men out of Canada who are raised on a compulsory principle. So the whole thing is a hollow sham and a mockery; that is what it is. Analyse it, now.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't get mad.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not mad at all. I am trying to emphasize an argument. You don't get me mad as easily as that. That is a fact. This question as framed by the Prime Minister is clever. I thought so the minute I heard it. It is intended to fool the people.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes. You may not like it. As a matter of fact there is no restriction on the method to-day in law or in fact as to how this country may raise men. The whole point of the discussion, all the controversy, rages round the disposition of these men. There is, of course, also a difference in point of view, but that is not the question. There is no commitment in respect of which the government ought to be released in regard to the method of raising men. We have adopted every known method there is to raise men. Why, we have even resorted in this country to the method of coercion in the training centres to get volunteers for service overseas. I do not say that that practice is universal, but the Department of National Defence put it up to its training centres to get so many men from the draftees to volunteer for service overseas, and it depends very largely on the commanding officers, the men immediately in charge of recruiting, as to the methods to be adopted. Some take one method and some take another.

Mr. HOMUTH: Some of them you would not be very proud of.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I am afraid that is true. But it is put up to them to get the men, and it depends on the temperament of the man who is doing the job as to what method he pursues. But the government—"Oh, we never authorized anything like that!" Of course the department would say that "we never told them to take that course". Last year I saw a questionnaire which was put to trainees, and they were chased "right up into the clearing"; if they were not prepared to volunteer for overseas service, why? Men are supposed to sign on the dotted line after giving their reasons, and they are brought before officers and cross-examined then: "Why don't you sign up for overseas?" In some cases they are browbeaten and coerced into doing it. That is contrary to the principle of the voluntary system. That, of course, is not true universally.

An hon. MEMBER: Almost.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It all depends on the community and the training centre where it happens. I would not say it is universal, but it is true in certain instances.

I ask hon. members to get right down to business and analyse the language of this question. In the light of the law and of the known facts, there is not any commitment; there is not any restriction of the method of raising men. This is just another proverbial red herring drawn across the track to fool the Canadian people—which the Prime Minister has done so many times and so successfully.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, the words of the leader of the opposition are clearly out of order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Which words?

The CHAIRMAN: Citation 297 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms states that it is out of order to charge another with falsehood or deceit. It is also out of order to suggest that any hon. member has deliberately raised a false issue. The words of the leader of the opposition are therefore clearly out of order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not charge the Prime Minister with falsehood.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I did not.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Neither did I charge him with deceit. I did charge him with trying to fool the people, and I have heard that done a thousand times.

The CHAIRMAN: Words are given as examples in citations 297 and 298 under standing order 41, but they are only examples. What the hon. gentleman has said, to the effect that the Prime Minister had fooled the people, is equivalent to many of the expressions which are clearly given in the rule as being out of order, and I so rule.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I appeal with great respect from your ruling, sir.

Mr. POULIOT: The leader of the opposition said it with flowers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is customary in matters of the kind to ask Hansard to give the exact words.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask a question? Has the Chairman ruled that the words "fooling the people" or "seeking to fool the people"—I think those were my words—charged the Prime Minister with deceit? If that is his construction, I certainly never intended to do that.

The CHAIRMAN: The words I have to report are: "The leader of the opposition having stated that the question contained in the ballot form in section 3 of the bill was another attempt of the Prime Minister deliberately to fool the people, as he has done so many times in the past. . . ." Those are the words as I heard them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If that is out of order, I am quite willing to withdraw. I have no intention of being out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Those words are withdrawn, are they?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You heard what I said—if they are out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say first of all to the leader of the opposition that unless my memory fails me entirely, he was the one, the first one in the house, to express his approval of my having given a straightforward question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Having asked the question. I never approved it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am coming back to what was said in the course of the debate on the address. Great emphasis was laid on the importance of having the question that was to be asked before the house when we were discussing the matter, and in speaking on the address I used the following language, as reported in Hansard at page 51:

> I shall not go into detail regarding the procedure to be followed in holding the proposed plebiscite. The question which the government proposes to submit to the people is the simple and straightforward question:
> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

That was informing the house at the earliest possible moment of what the question would be. At a later stage in the debate, and in the debate on this present bill, some question was raised as to the exact wording of the question, and I had occasion then to refer the house or the committee to what I had said on the address. This question has been before the house since the house opened, and until to-night the language of it has not been questioned, with respect to any ulterior motive, at least, that may have been in the mind, or as alleged to-night to have been in the mind, of the ministry in the drafting of it. I submit that there is nothing ulterior about the question at all. It is a straightforward question, and inasmuch as the discussion has taken place up to the present in reference to the question in the form in which it is, I hope that hon. members will not suggest the necessity of making any amendments to it.

May I say further that the reason why the question is before us as a part of the bill is largely due to the fact that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition asked that it should be inserted in the bill in the exact words in which it is. If he thought that the question was wrong, or that there was anything ulterior about it, or that there was any duplicity in the wording of it, and so forth, he should not have been the first to suggest that that identical question should be made a part of the bill. It was on my hon. friend's suggestion, that the question as he understood it should be a part of the bill, that I asked that instructions be given to the special committee to see that the question should be so inserted in the bill. I think that ought to be a sufficient reason why at this stage of the debate at any rate the question should not be altered one way or the other.

As to the question, the leader of the opposition now says that the government has the power under the War Measures Act—that it has the power in law and in fact to send men overseas, and that therefore there is no necessity for the question. I have said from the beginning that parliament is all-powerful. As a matter of fact parliament can at the present time pass any enactment it pleases regardless of any commitment that has been made in the past, or any pledge that has been given; but whether parliament would be prepared to do that or not depends a good deal upon what value a man attaches to his word, or what value parliament attaches to its action, or what value a government attaches to its pledge. As to the power, no one has ever denied that parliament has power to do whatever it pleases. With regard to the actual power it possesses to-day to conscript men to send overseas, we have that power under the War Measures Act.

But what was the nature of the pledge that was given, the pledge given on every platform, not by myself alone? I quoted and placed on Hansard on Wednesday last the strong and emphatic language used by the leader of the Conservative party pledging all his party in exactly the same way as I was pledging mine. It was not as I say in reference to not possessing the power that any pledge was given, but having the power, that the power would not be exercised in one particular; that commitment was made. The pledge admitted the power, if you wish, but the commitment was that that power would not be exercised in one form or particular, namely, raising men for military service overseas by conscription. The commitment was a commitment restricting the methods of raising men for military service. The restriction was as to raising men by conscription for military service overseas.

Now the hon. leader of the opposition seeks to-night to make out that the question as it is worded here is related to the law or to the fact. It is not related to the law or to the fact at all; it is related to a commitment that was made with respect to whatever law there might be or whatever the fact might be. A commitment that no matter whatever power the government had, it would not exercise that power with respect to men to be sent overseas if the method to be employed was to be the method of conscription. In other words, that as far as service overseas was concerned that was to be by voluntary enlistment, not by enlistment under coercion or conscription. That was a commitment. That is the commitment. It is that commitment that the government is asking to be freed from. That commitment does not apply to the use of conscription generally; we have conscription with respect to the raising of men for service in Canada; this parliament itself has enacted a measure which contains the power of the use of compulsion for military service. No exception was taken by the government to that; in fact the government brought forward the measure. The commitment that was made at the time of the general election was not against applying compulsory service for the defence of Canada within Canada; it was only in relation to service overseas. That is why I said the other night that if to-morrow it became necessary to exercise compulsion in the matter of protecting our shores to the extent of our armed forces going out in the Pacific beyond Queen Charlotte island, or to Alaska, or to Labrador or Newfoundland, I would not hesitate one moment in using the War Measures Act to see that conscription was enforced for that purpose were such a step necessary. That would not be violating the commitment made. The commitment was not made with respect to the protection of our own shores; it was made with respect to sending men overseas; everyone so understood it, and it was to that extent that the law and the fact was limited and that the government at the present time is limited.

If we attached no importance whatsoever to a solemn pledge given in relation to this particular war, as respects one aspect and one phase of our war effort, then I might join as my hon. friend is prepared to do now, but was not prepared to do at the time he asked the people to return him to parliament; we might say, as he does, discount all that and pay no further attention to it. But we are not prepared so to do; we are going to stand by the pledge we have made until the people themselves release us from it. But we are going to tell the people that we believe it is in their own interest that the government should be released from that pledge or commitment. That is the simple question we are putting before them, the one and only question:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of—

Not the law, not the fact, but—

—any past commitments—

—and "any past commitments" and "any" covers everything that can be construed as a commitment.

—restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Overseas; that is the point.

An hon. MEMBER: Put the word "overseas" in.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:—"arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service." "Any" covers everything, overseas, and all else. What more could any one wish for? That is the whole purpose. So that there can be no doubt whatsoever with respect to any commitment that has been made, whether it relates to any theatre of war or any part of the world, or any aspect of the war service, it covers everything. That is as clear as it possibly can be, and I am saying it as emphatically as I can.

I agree with those who have spoken to-night as to the form of the ballot and who have said that the simpler it can be made the better. I so expressed myself to the minister when I saw what the committee had recommended, but when I heard that the special committee, composed of members of all parties in the house, were unanimously of the view, after having heard the chief electoral officer, that this form of ballot which is now on the order paper was preferable, I said nothing further about it. And for the same reason I thought I would refrain from saying anything on the matter in the debate to-night. However I think what has been suggested by the hon. member for Yukon, by the hon. member for Carleton, by the leader of the opposition and by several other speakers and what I know the minister himself would prefer would be that there should be but the one simple question, and that at the end of the question there should be a square divided into four with "yes" and "no" above and below each item in the squares nearest the question and two blanks opposite in one or other of which an X could be placed. It would be a very simple ballot, and I would be surprised if the house generally would not agree upon it.

May I say—it may sound a little absurd but I have sometimes thought that if one wanted to get from any group—I am not applying this to this honourable house, but as something to be secured from any group—just the opposite of what might appear to be what is desired, the thing to do would be to suggest the opposite form of question in the first instance, because exception would be bound to be taken to it at the outset. I am as sure as that I am speaking to-night that if the committee had brought in a single question in the form now being proposed we would have had an equal number of speakers asking why we did not put the question into two columns so that there could be no mistake if a person marked his ballot after the "yes" he meant "yes" in regard to that particular question.

I am of the point of view of the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) who said a moment ago that these are terrible times, and I do not think it discloses the truest sense of proportion that we should be spending an entire evening, as we have to-night, listening to one or two hon. members speaking at very great length with the remainder of the time pretty well taken up entirely with a discussion on the wording on a single ballot in respect to which consideration had already been given by a special committee of the house. There are grave issues at stake at the present time, and we may very soon have to consider some of them much more profoundly than we have thus far had occasion to do. I would suggest to hon. members that they try to make all the progress that can be made with the legislation before us, avoiding unnecessarily long speeches and also unnecessary and sometimes trivial objections to what may be before the house.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): With the chairman's permission and the permission of the Prime Minister, in speaking of the election in 1940 he said that the leader of the Conservative party pledged the Conservative party against conscription. I would remind the Prime Minister and the committee that the Conservative party was not in that election, that the Conservative party had been jettisoned, torpedoed, and that the then leader was then leading the National Government party. I am probably the only candidate of that time who ran as a Liberal-Conservative and was elected. I could not stomach the National government party.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was very careful to say that the Conservative party had another name for the purpose of the election, that they did travel under the name of the National Government party. I am prepared not only to admit that but to congratulate my hon. friend on being the only Simon-pure in the party.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I take strong exception to that. I am a Simon-pure and always have been, notwithstanding that I was not consulted by the gentleman.

Mr. COLDWELL: I agree with the Prime Minister that we are spending far too much time on this plebiscite. There are other and graver issues, we should be dealing with them instead of wrangling over the wording of the plebiscite. But I agree with the amendment of the hon. member for Macleod. The Prime Minister himself is a master of English, and if he reads the question carefully he will find that the words "restricting the methods of raising men for military service" modify the word "commitments," and that the commitments were made in relation to sending men overseas. The adding of the four words "in any theatre of war" would clear the matter up, and make the position abundantly clear. I am asking the Prime Minister and the government to consider the matter over night, because it is now eleven o'clock.

WAGE CEILING

ORDER IN COUNCIL AMENDING WARTIME SALARIES ORDER AND CONSOLIDATING AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to lay on the table of the house order in council P.C. 1549, of February 27, 1942, amending the wartime salaries order and consolidating these and former amendments with the original order.

The principal new amendment relates to war industries only, and gives the Minister of National Revenue power to permit, in specific cases and within prescribed limits, the adjustment of the salaries being paid to some individuals engaged in those industries, where there is good cause for such adjustment within the general principle of maintaining unchanged the generally prevailing rate for a given set of duties and responsibilities. There is also a provision for the adjustment of probationary rates of salary being paid to those who have been recently appointed or promoted at less than the normal rate for the work they are doing. The recitals of the order explain the purpose of the new amendments, which I have had marked in the copies to be tabled.

STANDING COMMITTEES

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—BANK OF CANADA—SUGGESTED COMMITTEE ON COMMUNICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of general importance, and I crave the indulgence of the house and ask it to bear with me for a few minutes while I elaborate what I have in mind as briefly as possible.

Yesterday the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) asked the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) if the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would be referred to a special committee which might investigate all questions relating to the policy and management of that corporation and the minister promised that consideration would be given by the government to that suggestion. While the government is giving such consideration, I should like to have an associated but more general situation considered.

Each year the annual report of the Canadian National Railways is referred to a select special committee of this house and the affairs of that railway are investigated, but this house does not give annual consideration to the problems of other government corporations which stand in the same relationship to this house as the Canadian National Railways. My suggestion is that it become the annual and automatic practice that the reports of the Bank of Canada and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be referred to committees of this house in the same manner as the report of the Canadian National Railways. The report of the Bank of Canada falls naturally under the jurisdiction of the standing committee on banking and commerce and I suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King))) and the house that we establish a rule that that report shall each year be automatically referred to that committee, so that the committee may review the policy and management of the bank.

There is no standing committee to which the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is naturally appurtenant. We have a standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, which formerly did a great deal of work, but which to-day has practically nothing to do. In addition, each year we appoint a select special committee on Canadian National Railways accounts. My suggestion is that we abandon the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines and also the select special committee on the Canadian National Railways and create a new standing committee to be called the standing committee on communications and that each year the annual reports of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation be automatically referred to such committee, so that the policy and management of these corporations may be subject to parliamentary review.

The creation of these government corporations in the past few years has raised an important problem of parliamentary control. In the recent past we have not exercised in respect of them the immediate and direct control which we have over government departments whose estimates must come before us. I believe it is time that we assumed that measure of control which is necessary in the public interest and I make these suggestions to the house, that the reports be automatically referred to the committees to which I have alluded, believing that it is the best means of reasserting our right to control of policy and management and the best means of assuring that the public interest is appropriately safeguarded.

These corporations are government-owned and are operated for the government. They operate on the taxpayers' money. The day-to-day management is removed from government control, but the policies of each must of necessity reflect government policy. That I think is true. Therefore it follows that the peoples' elected representatives should be afforded the opportunity of reviewing their operations and policies. I urge the government to conform to this view and refer the annual reports of these corporations to appropriate committees.

There is another aspect of this matter which is worthy of consideration. The reference of these annual reports to the suggested appropriate committees would afford to the membership of this house a useful outlet for their abilities. There is, I think, a sense of frustration in the minds of the members. They are not given under present conditions an opportunity to take the part in the national effort which their position, their abilities and their desires warrant.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I warmly support all that I heard of the statement just made by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). I have suggested during the past few years that we should refer the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation periodically to some committee, but I believe the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition is in every way a better one. As the enterprises of the dominion expand and government ownership of public corporations increases, I think it is more essential than ever that there should be some parliamentary inquiry into the operations of these corporations. Now that we have the national railways, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Bank of Canada, and the Trans-Canada Air Lines, it seems to me that as a safeguard these corporations should be thoroughly looked into by the membership of this house. I am thoroughly of the opinion that such public corporations, while they should be subject to parliament, ought to be as they are now, corporations removed from political interference and control, but subject to parliamentary inquiry. I warmly support the suggestion of the leader of the opposition.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, without wishing to be held too closely to exact approval of all that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has suggested, I find myself in sympathy with the point of view he has expressed, and which has also been expressed by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. It is true that there has been of late an increase in the number of government corporations and government-controlled corporations. There is every reason why parliament should at all times be free to exercise its right of inquiry into matters of public concern and especially matters which affect public expenditure. I would wish to look carefully into the suggestion of my hon. friend and discuss it with my colleagues before making a further statement.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

AMENDMENTS MADE BY ORDER IN COUNCIL UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday on the orders of the day the leader of the opposition referred to an order in council which was passed on February 23 in connection with the Precious Metals Marking Act. The hon. member asked why an amendment to the act was not brought down covering the subject matter of the order in council at the same time as other amendments to the act.

I would point out that the amendments made to the Precious Metals Marking Act by Bill No. 4, passed on February 23, are permanent alterations to the act. The amending act was planned and drawn up weeks ago and was actually given its first reading in the house on January 28. The particular matter dealt with by the order in council is an entirely different matter and was an emergency requirement due to the freezing of supplies of tin as a result of the far eastern situation. Manufacturers of silver plated hollow-ware are in the position of being unable to obtain tin due to the government restriction of this metal, and some provision had to be made immediately.

The order in council is effective only for the duration of the war and six months thereafter, and then automatically lapses. If the act had been amended to provide for this situation, not only would delays have occurred but a further amendment would have been necessary after the war to reenact the section suspended. Enactment by order in council allowed immediate action and avoids further amendment to the act after the war.

The change brought about is purely an emergency measure.

POSTAL CENSORSHIP

REGULATIONS RESPECTING MAIL ADDRESSED TO MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some days ago the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) brought up for a second time the subject of censorship in relation to the censoring of letters of members of parliament and also as to the possible use of excerpts taken from communications which had been censored. I stated at the time that I would have a full inquiry made into the whole subject and report to the house later.

I wish to express my thanks to the leader of the opposition and to other hon. members for not having made inquiries from day to day as to why this report was not being made immediately. I have been amazed at the amount of information which it has been thought necessary to place at my disposal and which I have been obliged to go through in connection with this subject; but having gone through it all, I have come to the conclusion that there are very strong reasons why, on the subject of censorship, too much should not be said in public. I am therefore going to suggest to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group and the leader of the Social Credit group that they meet with me at some convenient time when I would be pleased to place before them different aspects of this question which have come to my attention.

Censorship, it will be recognized, is a phase of war activity, and if it is to serve the purpose for which it is intended, matters connected with it must necessarily be kept very largely secret. However, I wish at once to say to hon. members with respect to the censoring of letters of members of parliament that we in Canada thus far have not begun to go as far as they have in Great Britain. I think it can be shown that the censorship of letters of members of parliament in Canada is at the present time on quite a restricted basis.

I wish to say further that such censorship as there is being or has been exercised with regard to members' letters has related only to matters that are of immediate concern to Canada's war effort or to the war effort of the United States or Great Britain or to that of some of the allied countries. There has been no attempt on the part of the censors, as far as I could ascertain, to seek for any information other than that which had an immediate relationship to some war activity.

With respect to references in letters to political matters I have been informed that the censors have had very explicit instructions. Not only have they been instructed to pay no attention to matters other than matters affecting the war, but I am informed that in fact they have carefully refrained from passing on any information in any letter that related to political matters. Nothing of the kind has come to the government from any source. It has been ignored entirely.

I believe a question was asked by my hon. friend the member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) which brought an answer from the Postmaster-General (Mr. Mulock) which seemed to imply that excerpts generally might be taken from letters and sent to heads of departments concerned. But if the entire question and the entire answer are read together, it will be seen that the only excerpts that could be taken from any letter to be sent to the head of any department were excerpts which related to some matter pertaining to the war. I am assured that such was the intention of the reply, that such in fact has been the case, and that nothing has been taken from any communications and sent to the heads of any departments of the government from censored letters other than what has related to war activities in one form or another.

The question came up in the course of discussion a day or two ago whether a certain locality was included in a defence area. Well, that question helps to illustrate the point which I am making of the necessity of the government being very indefinite about what is said on this subject of censorship. If a defence area were specifically mentioned—as for example, Halifax, a defence area—and it were to be stated that the boundaries of that were at a certain radius, immediately persons interested in sending communications in a manner which would avoid the censor would simply go outside of the area so defined and mail their communications there. That is one of the instances which help to illustrate why it is not possible to give the house full and exact particulars in regard on details of censorship.

My hon. friend also asked that the regulations regarding censorship should, if possible, be tabled. Well, that, I must say, is not possible. If they were tabled they would reveal information which relates to the United States and Britain as well as to Canada, and would certainly give sources of information or knowledge to the enemy which he should not possess.

These are some of the points which have come out of a careful study of the question. But I would add that I do not know of any aspect of the censorship matter which should not be communicated to the leaders of the parties if it will help to give confidence to hon. members as to the method in which the censorship is exercised, and I shall seek to arrange for that when we have our interview.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to the Prime Minister for the statement which he has made, and which, of course, is intended to be reassuring. I would like him and the house to feel that I appreciate that censorship is an essential part of war activity. I have never controverted that principle. I do not see how it would be possible to carry on the war without it. I will reserve any other remarks on this matter until the conference is held; perhaps I shall then have a better appreciation of the whole position. But it is naturally an irritating thing to find that a letter—a political communication, if you will, and rather harmless—had been opened by the censor although it did not come from a defence area. That is all that I have to say on this point at the moment.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask, without anticipating an immediate answer, a question of the Prime Minister which he and the government might be turning over in their minds. It has been represented to me by some hon. members that they would like to know what are the plans of the government with respect to the Easter recess. Especially interested are those members who live a long distance away and who do not get home very frequently; they would like to lay their plans for a return to their constituencies during the Easter vacation. Will the Prime Minister indicate at an appropriate time upon what date it is anticipated this house will adjourn for Easter, and how long the Easter recess will be?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall be pleased to give my hon. friend an answer within a day or two. I might say at once that the government has had in mind an adjournment of at least a fortnight at Easter. It will not be a brief adjournment, but one sufficiently long to enable hon. members who are some distance from Ottawa to return to their homes. In that connection we have been considering what, in connection with the taking of the plebiscite, might also be of advantage. Some little time ago I had a hope that the taking of the plebiscite would come about the time of the Easter recess and that the recess might be made sufficiently long to enable hon. members to speak on the plebiscite, not only in their own constituencies but elsewhere if they felt so inclined. It looks now, I am afraid, as though it would not be possible to have the Easter adjournment sufficiently long to cover the period which will intervene between Easter and the taking of the plebiscite. At any rate I hope that the Easter recess may serve as an opportunity to hon. members to have their constituents informed of their point of view in relation to the plebiscite. I speak of that as being among the reasons why the government has had in mind a somewhat prolonged adjournment at Easter.

MILITARY TRAINING

POSITION OF PERSONS ENGAGED IN MAPLE SUGAR AND VEGETABLE PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): I want to direct a question to the Minister of National War Services. At this time, when the production of maple sugar is about to begin and the production of vegetables is under way in hothouses, will the minister continue to call farmers and farmers' sons for military training?

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): I am afraid it will not be possible to meet the request that the calling of men for military training should be suspended. The divisional boards have power to hear applications for postponements. Each board has jurisdiction to grant a postponement order when it is of the opinion that it is in the national interest to do so; and in the case of certain occupations, such as that of agriculture, the board is required to take into account the supply of labour which is available and the importance of the individual's occupation to the national economy. I am sure that the boards will take into account the matters to which the hon. member has referred when they deal with applications for postponements.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO ALLEGED DELAY IN PAYMENTS OF BONUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): I would like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I have received letters to the effect that certain claims for bonus have been passed at Edmonton and forwarded to the treasury board for payment but that no settlement has yet been made. Could the minister explain the reason for the delay?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The plan which has been followed in connection with the making of wheat acreage reduction payments is that the Department of Agriculture shall have made inspections and rendered reports to the treasury officials, by whom, of course, the cheques are issued. Naturally, before those payments are made, there is a check with other reports which have been rendered by the farmers who have made the applications. This check is made with the prairie farm asistance returns and with the permits which have been issued by the wheat board, on both of which there are statements with regard to acreage. To speak in general terms, I would say that when the first applications came in, about forty per cent—I am speaking now from memory—of the applicants had returns on 1939 and 1940 and 1941 which were all alike.

They stated their acreages as the same for 1939, on returns made in 1941, as they did in 1939 and there was no difficulty about making these payments. Practically all these payments were made in the months of July and August and probably early in September. In about sixty per cent there were some differences. A great deal of checking has been necessary in order to explain why a man put in a different return in 1939 about the 1939 acreage from that which he put in about the same acreage in 1941, or with regard to the 1940 acreage, as the case might be; and it has been in an attempt to justify payment on the basis of the 1941 declarations which were sworn to that there has been some delay. There were 186,000 farmers who made application, and 182,000 of them had been paid about $27,000,000 down to the end of last week. Most of these have been paid their full amount, but at a recent date there were between 20,000 and 35,000 whose claims still had to be adjusted. Some of these adjustments are still being made. I think it will be agreed, however, that even if there are some 20,000 or 35,000 applications still outstanding, in which there is twenty-five per cent unpaid and with regard to which some adjustment must be made before payment, and some four or five thousand cases where no payment has been made at all, a real effort has been made by the organization, both in the treasury and in the Department of Agriculture, to get the payments out as soon as possible.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY—UNION RECOGNITION IN WINDSOR PLANT—REQUEST FOR CONCILIATION BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I wish to address some questions to the Minister of Labour. Over the week-end I was invited to attend a meeting of the automobile workers union at Windsor where they were discussing the question of union recognition in the Motor Products plant. I found a meeting of some 7,000 automobile workers protesting against the treatment which the workers of the Motor Products industry had received. My questions are: 1. What knowledge has the minister of this situation? 2. Why was the request for a conciliation board, made to the Department of Labour on December 6, not granted? 3. What does the Department of Labour propose for the settlement of that difficulty in order to avoid its spreading to other essential war industries in that section?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The strike took place while Mr. Louis Fine of Toronto, who acted as industrial disputes inquiry commissioner to look into the dispute, was at Windsor. It was illegal under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act and under the orders in council establishing the industrial disputes inquiry commission. The employees were so informed. They indicated their willingness to return after the illegal strike. I sent a personal wire to the management suggesting that they be reinstated. The management replied that the employees in question had gone on an illegal strike and they found it was necessary to lay off some people, and they did not require their services at this time. Mr. Louis Fine is in Toronto to-day in connection with the matter in an effort to reach a satisfactory conclusion.

REPORT OF TRANSFER OF ONTARIO HARD ROCK MINERS TO NOVA SCOTIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Following up the question raised yesterday with reference to the proposal to transfer men from Kirkland Lake to Nova Scotia, the minister yesterday stated that he had no knowledge of that situation but would make further inquiries. Has he any further information on the question now?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I had further inquiries made into the question raised by the hon. members for Cape Breton South and Inverness-Richmond. These inquiries have been made through the employment service of Canada, and it is reported by that service to me that no such transfer of miners has been suggested or arranged through the employment office. Judging from the inquiries made this morning, by the official of the department located at Kirkland Lake, the information is quite untrue. No such movement has been suggested by anyone. I hope that answers the question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By anyone?

Mr. MITCHELL: By anyone.

SHIPPING

REPORTED RESTRICTION IN DISPATCH TO ENGLAND OF CERTAIN MATERIALS AND FOODSTUFFS

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I wish to ask a question but I do not know to which minister it should be addressed. In a London newspaper dated about four weeks ago there appeared a statement that owing to shipping losses parcels sent to Great Britain from overseas will be very greatly restricted and foodstuffs will not in future be permitted. I was astonished that I had seen no reference to such an order in the press of Canada and I have been unable to find out whether there is any truth in it at all or whether it is merely a canard.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry I have no personal knowledge of the matter. I am informed by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), who has looked into it, that he has thus far received nothing of a definite character to confirm what has been represented, but I shall speak to my colleagues in the defence departments and to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) in an endeavour to get an exact answer.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

ENEMY PROPERTY—SALE OF JAPANESE FISHING BOATS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Yesterday on the orders of the day the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) asked a question which I advised him at the time I would inquire into, and give an immediate reply. It arises out of an advertisement that appears in the newspaper British Columbian published at New Westminster, which advertisement was signed by the representative of the custodian of enemy property. The particular paragraph to which the hon. gentleman called attention reads:

> Offers for fishing boats, if accepted, will be those from bona fide fishermen of fishing companies who are entitled to own vessels of Canadian registry.

On inquiry I find that the word "of" is a misprint. It should be "or", and instructions have been given to the paper to correct the impression created by the advertisement.

EVACUATION FROM PACIFIC COAST DEFENCE AREAS

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister or to the minister most directly concerned. It has to do with the evacuation of Japanese from Pacific coast defence areas. Have the British Columbia security commission and advisory committee, recently established to handle the evacuation of Japanese from Pacific coast defence areas, been authorized to handle the orderly disposal of Japanese businesses, and if not, is it the intention of the government to set up a special agency for that purpose? Further, what is the government's policy with regard to the handling of Japanese businesses which cannot be conveniently or immediately disposed of?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member asks two questions. One relates to government policy, and with respect to that I can only say that government policy will be made known in due course. With regard to the earlier portion of the question, which relates to the present position and work of the British Columbia security commission, I would say that I intimated to the house a day or two ago that great care had to be taken with respect to the powers given the commission and details relating to its work. The formal order has not yet been passed; it will, I expect, be passed to-morrow. In the meantime government departments are carrying out part of the work, and the proposed members of the commission have been conferring on the matters that the commission has been appointed to administer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the Prime Minister in a position to give the names of the other two members of the commission, and of the advisory committee which I understand is to be set up, and the scope of their duties?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The other commissioners will be the assistant commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Commissioner Mead, and the assistant commissioner of provincial police of British Columbia, Mr. J. Shirras. The chairman is Mr. Austin Taylor. The names of the advisory committee I might give to the house to-morrow.

PLEBISCITE ACT

PROVISION FOR TAKING OF VOTE ON ANY QUESTION SUBMITTED BY WAY OF PLEBISCITE

The house resumed from Monday, March 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 10, respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes at such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada—Mr. McLarty—Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 3—Limitation.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Last evening when the Prime Minister was speaking on this question he stated, as appears on page 969 of Hansard:

> This question has been before the house since the house opened, and until to-night the language of it has not been questioned. . . .

I take exception to that statement, because the wording of the plebiscite was questioned when the resolution was before the house; in fact I questioned the wording of the plebiscite as well as the general ambiguity of the whole thing. I went so far as to offer an amendment which will be found at page 797 of Hansard, the last part of which read:

> —provide that definite direction be sought from the people on all national issues submitted to them under the terms and provisions of this proposed Plebiscite Act.

The intention was to remove the ambiguity of the wording of the question to be submitted to the people. There can be no doubt as to the ambiguity; I think even the Prime Minister himself will admit that now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Let me read the wording:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

In the first place, as I pointed out the other day, the government are not asking to be released from anything; they are asking the people if they, the people, are willing to release the government. The government are not committing themselves to anything whatsoever. It was pointed out as well that the wording of this question refers definitely, as the Prime Minister pointed out last night, to the commitments or obligations restricting the methods of raising men for military service. Both the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister stated yesterday, I believe, that they were agreed that under the National Resources Mobilization Act legal authority is given the government to raise men in any manner they wish.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Pardon me; under the War Measures Act they could raise them by any method.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I thank the hon. member for the correction, but I think they can under the National Resources Mobilization Act also. But the method is not the thing we are worrying about. The method might be that which the government now use, asking men to appear before a medical board for examination. On the other hand they might say they are going to send the mounted police out to take them by the collar and bring them in. That is a method; whether or not it is a right method is not the point. The wording of the plebiscite deals with the method of raising men. Nobody is criticizing the present method.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It deals with commitments as to the method of raising men for military service. There was no commitment with respect to the use of the mounted police.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is the point. There is tremendous ambiguity in the wording of the question proposed to be used in the plebiscite. If hon. members themselves are not clear as to the meaning, how can the public be expected to be clear on it? I suggest to the Prime Minister that in all fairness this question should be put to the people in such manner that there will be no shadow of doubt or possibility of misunderstanding. If the Prime Minister wants to be fair with the people of Canada he should put the question to them in such form that they will know what they are doing. They should know definitely whether they are voting on the commitment or on the methods. A large number of hon. members are satisfied that the wording of this plebiscite deals with the methods.

The Prime Minister has said there are sufficient men offering for the air force and the navy, and that they are going along quite well in regard to men for the army. Therefore there should be no objection as to the method they use. Whether or not the method is a proper one is not the point.

When I was speaking on the resolution I pointed out that the Prime Minister had never in his speech at the beginning of this session made reference so far as the plebiscite is concerned to the conscription of men for overseas service. I went through his speech very carefully in an attempt to find whether there was any connection between this plebiscite and conscription for overseas service. I combed the speech pretty thoroughly, but I failed to find any reference to conscription of men for overseas service. In fact the Prime Minister said that the question which was to be put before the people had nothing to do with conscription. He made that quite definite. Let me read his words as reported on page 826 of Hansard:

> Hon. members have been talking about conscription, about no conscription and the like. That is not the issue in this plebiscite.

There can be no misunderstanding about that. I think the Prime Minister was quite right there. If I can interpret his thoughts I would say he had no desire whatever to bring up the question of conscription for overseas service so far as this plebiscite is concerned. That is what I tried to point out the other day. But now, apparently, the Prime Minister has changed his mind. Let me read what he said on February 2. He was speaking about the commitments made in the election of 1940. There is no question, as he pointed out, that the pledge given to the people was that there would be no conscription for overseas service. I think we are all agreed on that. Certainly in my constituency I was the one who was accused of advocating conscription for overseas service, which was quite untrue. Nevertheless, that was the issue there; that was the commitment that tied the hands of the government. This is what the Prime Minister said in this regard, at page 970 of Hansard:

> The commitment was a commitment restricting the methods of raising men for military service. The restriction was as to raising men by conscription for military service overseas.

I think he is right there, but on the other hand, as I just pointed out, on February 25 the Prime Minister said that conscription was not the issue in this plebiscite. Surely one or the other must be so. On February 25 the Prime Minister said conscription was not the issue; on March 2 he says quite definitely that it is the issue, though he calls it a commitment. Then he goes on to say:

> It is that commitment that the government is asking to be freed from.

That is the commitment in regard to the conscription of men for overseas service. That is what I want to point out to you, Mr. Chairman, as I pointed out to the Secretary of State a moment ago. Then, a little further on in the Prime Minister's speech of yesterday, he said:

> The commitment was not made with respect to the protection of our own shores; it was made with respect to sending men overseas; everyone so understood it, and it was to that extent that the law and the fact was limited and that the government at the present time is limited.

Definitely the government are asking the people to release them from the commitment given in 1940, for political purposes, so that they can and presumably will put in conscription for overseas service. If that is so, then for the life of me I cannot see why the Prime Minister should object to putting in the words, definitely and clearly, so that every voter will understand what he is voting on. The thing about which I am concerned is that the people should know exactly what they are voting on, and I can tell you, sir, and the members of this committee quite plainly that if the question comes up for conscription for overseas service as such, and only such, I shall vote against it. I am definitely of the opinion that we can never prosecute this war with a maximum war effort until we have the conscription of our financial institutions so that we can issue currency and credit in terms of public need. Every minister of the crown who has spoken has laid the blame for the situation on the production end, and as I said the other day I think they are perfectly right. The thing I am concerned about is the manufacturing end of it. What is done with the guns and tanks after they are manufactured I am quite ready to leave to the discretion of the Minister of National Defence, because I think he is better able to direct their use than I could. But the thing we have been discussing and the thing on which we cannot get any information is this all important question of production, which is tied up definitely with finance. I do not want any misunderstanding on the question as far as I am concerned. I am certainly not in favour of the further conscription of manpower until we have a complete mobilization of war industry and finance, and certainly that has not been done yet.

Surely if the Prime Minister wants to be fair on this question, not only to members of this house but to the people of Canada whom he is asking to vote on it, he should not object to the amendment as worded by the hon. member for Macleod, since the Prime Minister himself now says the main issue is for conscription overseas. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Macleod would have the question read:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service in any theatre of war.

There the Prime Minister has what he wants; there is no question about it. The only words to be added are "in any theatre of war." Surely there could be no objection to that. The Prime Minister says the main question is with regard to the commitments. All right; it is there. Surely he cannot object to that; surely he cannot object to putting it into the wording of the plebiscite, upon which the people are going to vote. I cannot possibly see why the Prime Minister or anyone else should object to this amendment, so that everyone may know what he is voting on. I feel sure that since the Prime Minister has reviewed the situation, he has come to the same conclusion.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Chairman, I have tried to keep out of this discussion, because I thought the sooner we got this bill through the better for all concerned. But I cannot understand why the government could not accept the inescapable logic of the position which was placed before them last night by the hon. member for Macleod and others.

I am one of those who have taken the position that the Prime Minister, along with most other hon. members of this house, did give a definite commitment to the Canadian people; and that they, and the Prime Minister and his government in particular, have a right to use whatever method they think fit and proper to be released from that commitment. But I ask the Prime Minister to look at the question again. What was the commitment? Was it with reference to the method of raising men, which is what the plebiscite says? The question as framed says:

—arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

If the commitment was given with respect to the method of raising men, then the government should have taken a plebiscite in June, 1940, because at that time the government embarked upon the policy of compulsion, so that now we have the two methods.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not for overseas.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is the point I am coming to. The method of compulsion was adopted, and this house voted for it almost unanimously. But the Prime Minister himself has just said that the commitment was not with respect to that question. The commitment was with respect to the disposition of the men who might be raised. No commitment was ever given by the Prime Minister or any other member of this house, so far as I know, that conscription would not be introduced in this country for home defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is true.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The commitment was that any men conscripted in this country would not be sent outside Canada or the terrtiorial waters thereof. Therefore the commitment which the government is asking to be relieved of is not concerned with the men but with the disposition of the men raised by a particular method. To me the logic of the position is very simple. The government would make the thing perfectly clear by accepting the amendment and adding the words "in any theatre of war." This would make it plain that the commitment was with respect to conscripting men for overseas service, and that the commitment the government ask to be released from is a particular commitment, namely, the commitment not to raise men for service outside of Canada.

May I say just a word with regard to the second point included in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod. Like many others who have spoken, I am greatly concerned about this plebiscite. I am greatly concerned as to what will be the effect if it is defeated, not only the effect on the morale of the Canadian people but the effect on the other members of the united nations. I think it would be one of the most appalling things that has happened during this war. Personally I will certainly do all in my power to see that it is not defeated in any place where I have any influence.

The government itself can do more than any group of individuals to determine whether or not this plebiscite will pass. It seems to me that there is one very effective step the government can take. The Prime Minister at some time prior to the taking of the plebiscite can say to the people of Canada that he is prepared to give a solemn pledge that if any contingency arises which makes it necessary for the government to bring down to the house legislation to conscript men for service overseas, no such step will be taken unless it is accompanied by a much more drastic policy of conscription of accumulated wealth and the mobilization of the country's industries and financial institutions than has so far been taken by the government. This solemn undertaking on the part of the Prime Minister would do more to get a large affirmative vote than any effort by any group of individuals, no matter how enthusiastic or aggressive they might be.

Mr. ROY: I should like to say a few words on the wording of the question which is to be put by plebiscite to the people of Canada. The Prime Minister last night in the course of discussion of the amendment of the hon. member for Macleod admitted that we have in fact as well as in law all the methods for the recruiting and mobilization of men, but the reason for the plebiscite is to release the government from its commitments in connection with conscription for overseas. He has strongly emphasized this point, and it would seem that now it is a matter of where the men are to serve rather than how we are to proceed with mobilization. Therefore the question on the ballot would surely be more adequate for the purpose and more frankly put to the people if it were in the manner suggested in the amendment. However, as I am opposed to the principle of the bill itself I regret to say that I shall vote against the amendment as well as against the main motion.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Chairman, it would be an easy matter for the government to place on this ballot the following question:

Are you in favour of conscription for service overseas?

The answer could be given yes or no. I shall vote against the principle of this bill and I shall vote also against the amendment moved by the hon. member for Macleod. I have always been opposed to conscription for overseas service, and this measure is a step toward conscription. The hon. member's amendment does not improve the situation. It does not summarize the ballot shown in the bill. In spite of the hon. member's good faith, the amended ballot would still be longer than the one now included in the bill. Once more I object to the government measure and to the amendment. I have always been opposed to conscription, and I remain so with all my might.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that there is an amendment before the committee. Would you read it, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Hansell has moved that the following words be added to the question appearing on the ballot: "in any theatre of war."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First of all, a word as to the question itself. The wording of the question was given the most careful study by the government in order that there might be no possibility of its having any meaning other than the one which appears upon its face. May I say, speaking of questions generally, that if hon. members are anxious to read into a question something other than what really is there, nothing in this world can prevent them from so doing. I venture to say that however differently worded the question might be, some hon. members would find equal objection to the new wording as proposed.

It has been suggested that we add the words "in any theatre of war." I have an objection to this, which I think hon. members will see immediately I express it. It would raise at once in the minds of a number of the people of this country a suspicion with regard to what the government has in mind, a suspicion which so far has not entered their minds. Some of them would begin to say "Oh, yes, we see what the government have in mind; they want to send our people, not merely to Great Britain, but to India, to Asia; they want to send them to other far distant quarters of the globe." No thought of the kind was in the mind of the government at the time the question was framed.

Mr. FAIR: What is in the government's mind now?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will decide what it will do with respect to the disposition of troops when it has full authority to act in the light of all the circumstances.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is admitted that the government has authority.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Full authority; moral authority as well as legal. My hon. friend the leader of the oposition throws back his head when I make mention of the word "moral," as though parliament had no moral obligation, as though the government had no moral obligation of any kind. I am afraid those who take that particular point of view are being unduly influenced by the nazi mentality and by the mentality of other nations that have thrown to the wind every obligation that may have existed between the people and their governments. I speak expressly of the nazi position because the whole nazi policy is one that is based on broken pledges, one that is based on no faith in the pledged or promised word.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I resent that implication.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend may resent it, but he has laid himself open to it. The people of this country are going to view very carefully the attitude of hon. gentlemen who say that the government has no moral obligation to the people in regard to a matter that affects their lives and which only a few weeks ago many of them were claiming was responsible for the return of the government to power. I regard what has been said by the government of this country with respect to commitments for overseas service as something that is an obligation of the most sacred character, and for that reason I intend to stand by it and the government intends to stand by it. We know that in so doing we will at least be helping to keep the confidence which exists in political institutions in Canada between the people of this country and their government, a confidence which has been completely lost in a great many other countries at the present time.

I am anxious to see this plebiscite carried. I am not anxious to add to its wording words that are going to create unwarranted suspicions in the minds of people who may be mostly attracted by certain words and attach to those words an entirely different meaning from that which should be attached to them. In that same connection may I say this? I cannot understand the attitude of hon. gentlemen who say they are anxious to see this plebiscite carried but who at the same time by their utterances—and I refer particularly to the leader of the opposition—are doing the utmost they possibly can to have the people of this country believe that there is some trick in the plebiscite which is being put before the people of this country. The leader of the opposition said last night that I was deliberately trying to fool the people, and yet he says he wants to see this plebiscite carried. Do you think people are going to turn out and support the plebiscite if they have reason to feel that they are being asked to lend themselves to some trick which the administration is seeking to put over them? I cannot understand the attitude of my hon. friend in taking that position, especially in view of what he has said in this house on more than one occasion this session, and for which I thank him. I thought he meant what he was saying when he was speaking as he did about attaching importance to the sincerity and honour of the Prime Minister with respect to a statement which he made in this house. My hon. friend said:

I have never questioned the honour of the Prime Minister, as he knows.

A little later he said:

Certainly I had no intention of questioning the Prime Minister's bona fides. I am glad I raised the question, however, because it is now certain—

The question was the question of the plebiscite, the wording of the question and the insertion of the question in the bill. The government had met him on all these particulars, and then he said he was pleased that the whole matter was now certain, and that he never questioned the meaning I attached to the words. Yet last night, just because a few members of the Social Credit group wanted to have a chance to talk about finance in terms of public need, and to bring their particular hobby into this question, thereby confusing the issue still more, my hon. friend evidently thought the chance of making a little political capital was too good to miss, even in this time of war. Though this question of the plebiscite is a very important one, he evidently says to himself: "I cannot miss this chance; I will have to join with them."

Mr. GRAYDON: The right hon. gentleman is imputing motives to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is telling the exact truth with regard to the situation. Let me read what the leader of the opposition said. I think I have been courteous in my treatment of the leader of the opposition. I have never said to him at one moment that I believed what he was saying, and the next moment that I did not believe it, that I thought he was putting a trick over on the people. In the matter of this plebiscite the value which the people of this country are to attach to the word of the Prime Minister is of some concern. I might not care a rap for anything the leader of the opposition might say about me in a personal way, but when it comes to a public issue of this magnitude it is important that the people should have no reason to doubt the sincerity of the administration in so all-important a question. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition was the one that asked, not that "a" question should be set out in the bill, but that the question which I had set out in the debate on the address should be the question to be put into the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Right, but I never anywhere approved the principle of the question. I never did that.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is quite aside from the point. It is the question and the wording of it that we are discussing now. The whole discussion arose on the amendment of the hon. member for Macleod that we should add certain words to the question, and the leader of the opposition's point was that we should be so certain as to the question to be put to the people, that that particular question should be inserted in the bill. Let me read what he said on the question of the plebiscite. At page 755 of Hansard of February 20, 1942, he said:

On the question of the plebiscite itself, I was astonished to hear the Secretary of State say that the question to be asked would not be in the bill but would be a matter of proclamation.

A little further on he said:

But certainly the Prime Minister gave the categorical undertaking that a certain question would be put to the people of this country.

A categorical undertaking that "a certain question"—that is the question which is now in the bill. It is the only question that has ever been before the house, and I did give, as my hon. friend says, a categorical declaration that that question would be the one that would be put into the bill. My hon. friend went on to say:

Why should it be left to a proclamation which may be twiddled around by the government and we may not have that question put to the people? You might have something entirely different, or something which will have a shaded meaning—

He did not wish a shaded meaning in the question. He wanted my specific question to be inserted in the bill, and this in order to avoid any question that would have a shaded meaning. He went on:

—or something which will be different in principle even, from what was stated not only in the speech from the throne but by the Prime Minister himself.

He attached value to the importance of the wording because it was given by the Prime Minister. I immediately stated that we would have the question inserted in the bill. Then my hon. friend said:

I am glad to have the Prime Minister make that statement, because I want some certainty.

And this certainty was to get that particular question into the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, to get "a" question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not "a" question but "the" question, and I will prove it from my hon. friend's words. He said at page 755 of Hansard:

When I hear the Secretary of State say that it will be the subject of proclamation, over which parliament will have no control but over which the government will have full control—

Mr. Mackenzie King: No, no.

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): —I may be pardoned—

And I ask hon. members to listen to this, as to why my hon. friend wanted this specific question inserted. He said:

—I may be pardoned if I appear a little suspicious that there is some change in plan, or that there may be some change. Of course the Prime Minister—

These are the words I direct attention to:

Of course the Prime Minister now has pledged his word that the question will not be altered.

Still "the" question, that "the" question will not be altered because the Prime Minister has pledged his word with regard to it. In view of the attitude my hon. friend takes in relation to government and parliament with respect to the people, that a pledge does not amount to anything, I am not surprised that he should attach no importance whatever to whether or not I now am to be put in a position where later he can say that I went back on the pledge I gave to the House of Commons. Here are his words:

Of course the Prime Minister now has pledged his word—

Who did I pledge it to? To this house, including my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. And what did I pledge my word to, according to his own statement? That the question will not be altered. Well, I tell him that the question will not be altered because this government attaches importance to its pledged word given in this House of Commons, just as it attaches importance to the pledge that was given to the people of this country. Then my hon. friend says:

—and that, if necessary the question will be put in the bill. So that we have learned something this afternoon.

My hon. friend went further and said, and I ask hon. members if it was not within their hearing that he rose a moment ago and said, "I did not say 'the' question but 'a' question". What did he say? He said "the" exact question. Let me read his words, in the first column of page 756 of Hansard:

I understood that the general scope of the question would be the same, but the Prime Minister categorically placed upon the records of this house the exact question that would be asked.

How does my hon. friend expect myself and my colleagues to change the wording of this question after he has demanded that the exact question which is now a part of the record and has been all through this debate should be the one that would be inserted in the bill? A little further on the leader of the opposition says:

. . . now we certainly have got something definite on that point.

Yes, and we are going to hold to it now that we have got something definite and exact. That I think answers so far as the leader of the opposition is concerned, the necessity of the government holding to this particular question in the bill. We have pledged our word to him and to the house that the exact question which I put forward here at the time of the debate on the address would be presented to the people. We have placed it in the bill at the request of the leader of the opposition and other hon. members, and we are going to hold to that question.

Now let me come to the question itself and ask if it is capable of the kinds of interpretation which have been given to it:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation—

The hon. member for Macleod has said that he does not think that means anything.

Mr. HANSELL: It does not stop there. If it stopped there it would be all right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say that I cannot follow my hon. friends; I do not know what is in their minds when they say that they think there is some cunning back of this question, and that what the government does not want is to be released from the commitment. The hon. member says that when the people have voted we shall not know whether we are released or not.

Mr. HANSELL: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I am mistaken. I said, "the hon. member for Macleod"; I meant the hon. member sitting immediately behind him who spoke a moment ago.

An hon. MEMBER: Bow River.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. I am sorry. It was the hon. member for Bow River who said that when this question was answered it would not have any effect on the government.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): On a point of order, I do not think I ever referred to the Prime Minister as being cunning. I ask the chairman to have the Prime Minister withdraw that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said that my hon. friend seems to think that there is some cunning behind the question as it is framed; and, if I understood him aright, his point was that after the people had voted the government would not be released from anything, but that we were simply asking the people if they were willing to do something.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I used the word "ambiguity", not "cunning".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am afraid that I cannot make the English language any plainer than it is.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am trying to help you.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am trying to assist.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I appreciate my hon. friend's motive, but I cannot say the same about his methods.

Now, "any obligation arising out of any past commitments. . . ." The whole question relates to past commitments. The leader of the opposition sought yesterday to have it refer to power or to fact, to some existing law. I have said over and over again that the government has power, legal power, to pass any enactment which this house is prepared to pass. It has as a matter of fact legislated with respect to raising men by voluntary enlistment and raising men by conscription, for service within Canada itself; so that there is no question about the matter of power or the question of fact.

But now my hon. friends in the far corner who have spoken raise the question that it is a matter of the disposition of troops. I may point out to them that it is not at all a matter of disposition of troops. Or let me put it in this way first so as to be clear as to the matter of methods. There are two methods of enlisting men for service overseas. One is the voluntary method, the other is the method of compulsion or conscription. With respect to the voluntary method, men raised thereby for service overseas can be sent to any quarter of the globe. Hon. members talk about the disposition of troops; the government is free to-day to dispose of these forces anywhere overseas. Those who have enlisted voluntarily may be sent for service overseas or kept at home.

Mr. LOCKHART: Will the Prime Minister permit a question? Will he at this point explain what are the restrictions on the methods of raising men in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, that is the next point. There is one restriction and one only, and that is the restriction upon raising men for service overseas, not voluntarily—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. LOCKHART: The "methods"?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —but by compulsion. Compulsion is a method. That is the whole point.

Mr. QUELCH: The ballot does not say that. It merely says "military service."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There are only two methods—one voluntary, and one compulsory. With regard to raising men compulsorily for service there is no commitment when the service is confined to within Canada. But when resort is to be had to conscription, in other words, to the "method" of conscription, for raising men for service overseas, there is a commitment which binds the government, a commitment made before we entered the war, a commitment made at the time that parliament entered the war, a commitment made at the last general election, a commitment which has been made time and time again.

Now I hope that I have made clear wherein the wording is exactly correct,—"any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service." This commitment not to send men overseas under compulsion restricts the method, namely the compulsory method, of raising men for military service where it applies to overseas. I do not think that anything could be clearer than that.

The hon. member for Weyburn said something a moment ago about "inescapable logic." I would ask him as a logician and a philosopher whether there is any word in the English language which could be more comprehensive when applied to commitments than the word "any" itself? Well, now, "any . . . commitments" covers commitments with respect to sending men to any part of the earth or to any theatres of war, or to anywhere else, if such is to be found. What the government is anxious the people should understand is that we wish a perfectly free hand; we do not wish to be committed in any particular. If the word "any" were not there, it would instantly be said, "Oh yes, you are taking good care to specify a particular commitment, but you don't say anything about some other commitment or what might be construed as a commitment." We wish to make the language so broad that there can be no misgiving as to any commitment from now on, which relates to the method of raising men for service overseas. If this plebiscite carries, neither the government nor any hon. member will be free to argue that we cannot decide upon conscription or any other question with respect to our war effort because of a certain commitment.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Would the Prime Minister be willing to take the committee into his confidence and tell us why he insists on the question being phrased in the general term "any . . . . commitment," instead of asking to be relieved from the specific commitment which he has in mind, which we all have in mind, and which we all know this question has reference to?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I will take the committee into my confidence, and say that the whole is greater than any part; that it includes everything. This precludes the possibility of anyone saying that the government is trying to get away with one thing while keeping back conscription or something else in the nature of a commitment. It is because the government wants to be perfectly straightforward in the matter and to permit of no shadow of doubt with respect to its intentions.

Something has been said about the question of conscription not being an issue. I have pointed out, time and again, that were this house to-day to begin to discuss the question of conscription, hon. members seated on this side of the chamber who are prepared to respect the pledge which was given in the last general election and at different times would rise and say, "We are not in a position to discuss conscription on its merits, because conscription for service overseas was ruled out of consideration by the commitment which was made by the government in the last general election and at other times." So would hon. gentlemen opposite if they were to honour the pledge and the commitment which was made by their leader with respect to conscription. So that the question of conscription is not the issue. The question of conscription may come up, perhaps will come up, after the plebiscite has been passed. If it comes up, then it will become an issue which can be debated in this house, which is the proper place in which to debate it. It is not an issue to be debated by people on the hustings. If conscription were an issue in this plebiscite the government would be placing upon the people of Canada to-day the duty of making a military and political decision. Surely that is clear. That is the thing we have been seeking to avoid; we have been seeking to avoid putting upon the people a responsibility which they are not in a position to exercise. How can the people say whether or not conscription is necessary, whether it should be resorted to or not resorted to, when they do not know all the circumstances that must be taken into account in regard to a matter of the kind? But the government knows them.

Mr. ROWE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says "hear, hear." Certainly the government knows them and will continue to know them as the war progresses; and the government will take such action as it thinks advisable to take in the light of the knowledge which it has. But that knowledge will not be concerned with one single factor only; it will be in regard to every single factor that should be taken into account in making Canada's war effort as effective and complete as it can possibly be made.

Mr. ROWE: I did not wish to interrupt the Prime Minister but I should like to ask him a question. In view of the fact that it is generally recognized that the government has that knowledge, that no other body in the dominion has, and will have knowledge of the ever-darkening hours from now on; in view of the fact, further, that the Prime Minister has so carefully avoided telling the people of the country what he will do if they say yes to this somewhat misleading question, what will the government say?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: What will the government say, if the people say no? Will they virtually take us out of the war by putting a stop to the sending of reinforcements overseas to the boys who are fighting with their backs to the wall now, if the people say no?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friends interrupt, but they will answer another body some day if the people say no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The trouble with my hon. friend is that he identifies Canada's whole war effort with one single thing, namely, conscription for overseas service regardless of how much else there may be or how little needed conscription itself may be to secure the men necessary for service overseas. May I say this to him—and this is one reason why I want to get rid of the commitment that is standing where it is. That commitment stands to-day like a barn door against which my hon. friend and those who talk like him can keep on hammering and making a noise; but once that commitment which precludes the exercise of conscription, if necessary, is taken out of the way, they will be striking at an open door when they discuss what the government may or may not do. I can only say to my hon. friend, with respect to what the government will do after the plebiscite has been decided one way or the other, that the government will make its policy known in due course in the light of all circumstances as they may then exist.

Mr. ROWE: In view of the fact that my question was not answered, and the Prime Minister was kind enough to try to clarify my remarks, I might point out that as regards a barn door against which people are pounding for the sake of the noise alone, the Prime Minister was unfair to my leader in suggesting that he felt there was a trick merely in the wording of this matter. I feel that this whole question is not only a trick on the people in the country but a trick on the boys that are serving overseas.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. When the chairman stands, hon. members must sit down. It is strictly against the rules of the house, as I ruled last night and must rule to-day, to suggest that a measure before the committee is a trick or is something misleading or something deceitful. There are a number of exemplary expressions that are given in the rules of the house, and the hon. gentleman must withdraw what he has just said.

Mr. ROWE: I certainly will withdraw the word "trick", but it has been used so often that I thought probably it might convey what I think. I must withdraw that word, but I am sorry that you, Mr. Chairman, have not observed such expressions as "nazi tactics" as well, because they have been used on different occasions by the Prime Minister and might have been withdrawn also. I do say that so far as the government—

The CHAIRMAN: I admit what the hon. gentleman has said. We very often pass a number of expressions that should be ruled out, but it is only when the limit is reached that we have to apply the rule.

Mr. ROWE: I have listened—

The CHAIRMAN: On that point, may I further point out that if the chairman forgets or omits or does not understand an expression which is against the rules, it is the privilege of every hon. member to raise a point of order. There are a number of expressions that escape the ear and attention of the chairman, and if any hon. member raises a point of order we shall try to apply the rule most impartially.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Chairman, I abide by your ruling; but a doubt not only in the minds of many who are supporting the government, but more in the minds of the people who will vote on the issue, exists nevertheless. The matter is as clear as mud across the country. People are asking every weekend, "What does it mean if we vote yes, or what will the government do if we vote no?" Nobody understands it, and the Prime Minister refuses to throw any light upon it so that people will understand it. We have been passing through the most critical days in the history of the empire, and while I am not going to delay the committee—because I believe this should be passed—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the language my hon. friend is using is calculated to defeat it.

Mr. ROWE: I have not held up the bill as much as the Prime Minister has himself. I think my leader has come out as clearly—and I have as well—as to what we will do on the plebiscite, and many of the right hon. Prime Minister's supporters have not done so, and the men who are opposing the bill to-day are those members of the government party who will oppose it in the country and who have stated their position in the house. I say to the right hon. gentleman that he might look over his own followers before charging us with an attempt to defeat the measure, which every one of us will try to put over in the country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps when my hon. friend is giving me an example of how to proceed he will address the chair instead of me.

Mr. ROWE: I am glad to be reminded of the rules of the house by such an old and experienced parliamentarian as the Prime Minister. I was complimented in having him make over my speech for me, and I thought I might compliment him by addressing him a little. I do say that this question is not a trick, in parliamentary language, but it is so misleading—

The CHAIRMAN: Again, that is out of order.

Mr. ROWE: Well, Mr. Chairman, it is so misunderstood by the people of the country that even a man who has been in parliament for some time cannot find English words to describe it. It is not only a reflection upon the people of the dominion, but it is a shocking surprise and disappointment to every allied force in the war. No one knows what we shall do if the people say yes, and God only knows what may happen if they say no. And when I say this empire, the empire means us as well. Some of my hon. friends may smile or feel light-hearted enough about it even to laugh. But where is Canada's first defence? We have had conscription. I have not heard in the last campaign—and I listened to many speeches; I heard the Prime Minister speak—I never heard him say he was going to have conscription right up and down the highways and byways of the country. I did not hear him say at that time that he would take the boys off the farm even if there was no one left to feed the cattle. I have not heard any of these moral obligations brought up but I have heard minister after minister say that Canada's first line of defence was overseas.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will pardon me, I submit that he is very distinctly out of order. What we are discussing is the form of the ballot and the question that should be asked. What my hon. friend is talking about is the general principle of the whole measure, which was decided upon when it received second reading.

Mr. ROWE: Again I thank the minister for correcting me. I think the Prime Minister also was far afield in many of his statements this afternoon. Some latitude has been given, but I shall endeavour to stick closely to the issue for the few moments I am going to speak.

The CHAIRMAN: We are discussing section 3. I understand that agreement was reached by which on the short title there should be general discussion. That has taken place and now we are on clause 3. Under standing order 58 we must stick to the section of the bill which is before the committee.

Mr. ROWE: I thought in view of the amendment we might have some latitude. However, section 3 deals with the question to be asked:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the amendment makes it wide open.

Mr. ROWE: Even section 3 I believe gives latitude for anything I might offer at this time. All we are trying to do is to help the government by clarifying the question. But there is no assurance, especially when they are so divided themselves on this issue, when some of their followers are the only hon. members who are going to work vigorously against the plebiscite, that it is going to carry. The people of the country should be told what is going to happen. Rather than submit to the people at this time a question worded as this is, the Prime Minister would have been much better advised to carry on without the plebiscite, whether he had compulsory service or not.

So far as moral obligation is concerned, again I refer to these men who are taken and conscripted. True, conscription was not an issue in the last election. Both sides stated there would be no conscription. But much has happened since 1940 and even since this session began. Time after time since the beginning of the session this empire has surrendered ground. We have seen the darkest days in the history of the British empire. We see still darker days threatening, and now we are asked to say to the Prime Minister: We will release you from any past commitments with reference to military service. Can anyone tell me that compulsory military service is not here if there should be an invasion? Have we not conscription for home defence? I am not one of those who says it is not just as much the duty of the farmers' sons as any other class to take part in this war, and our farmers know that. But I have received letters, as I presume every hon. member has, with regard to the position of farmers. I received one to-day with regard to a farmer who was on his back—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. gentleman must know that the question of exempting farmers' sons from military service is clearly outside the scope of section 3. Section 3 does not involve the principle of the measure, but only the form of the question to be put to the voters. Therefore hon. members should limit their remarks to the form of the question to be put in the taking of the plebiscite.

Mr. ROWE: But I notice that the amendment says:

> Are you in favour of the conscripton of the financial institutions of Canada so that the government can fulfil its commitment to issue currency and credit in terms of public need?

The CHAIRMAN: We are not on that. Amendments must be considered seriatim. The only amendment now before the committee is to add at the end of the question which appears in the printed ballot the words "in any theatre of war". The other amendment is not up for consideration now.

Mr. ROWE: Then I shall still not delay the committee any longer than I can help. But I wish to point out that every hon. member when he goes to explain this section to the people will be confronted, as I have been when I have asked people to vote, by the question: What does it mean? It is the first time I have ever been asked to vote when I do not know what "yes" will mean or what "no" will bring forth. If when the answer is given by the greatest jury of all, the people of this country, they say yes, heaven only knows what they may get. If they say no, nobody knows the situation; our boys will be left overseas without reinforcements except to the extent that men are available through the voluntary system. If there is need for compulsory service for home defence to get men to fight for their own country, and we have a negative vote on this plebiscite, Canada will be virtually out of the war so far as reinforcements to the boys overseas are concerned. Words can scarcely describe the uncertainty. A plebiscite is always uncertain, but under this bill the question is put in such a way as to make it the most uncertain question that has ever been put to the Canadian people.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like a little light. I base my question to the Prime Minister on the few words he said in reference to the amendment moved by the hon. member to my left asking that the words "in any theatre of war" be added. I am not sure whether I understood the Prime Minister aright, but I thought he himself then asked the question whether, if the people voted yes he would then be expected to say he would send troops to any theatre of war. My question is whether in the event of the country voting yes the Prime Minister would then feel free to send troops to any theatre of war. If so, I would be disposed to vote for the plebiscite.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My point in reference to the amendment which proposes to add to the question the words "in any theatre of war" was that if those words were added a large number of people would immediately begin to read into them something that had never been in the mind of the government at all. The first thought that would come to many of them is: Oh, well, the government evidently has something further in view than has ever thus far been discussed publicly, and perhaps for that reason we had better be careful before we support this plebiscite. I do not think the words would help to gain support for the question, and for that reason I do not think they should be added. I am anxious to see the question made as simple and direct as possible, and one that will not create suspicion in the mind of anyone as to the intentions of the government. All the government wants as a result of this question is to have a perfectly free hand to deal with situations as they may arise in the light of all the knowledge it possesses, with a view to having done what is most effective with respect to Canada's war effort.

As to where troops should be sent, or when they should be sent, or how many should be sent, all these questions will be dealt with by the government itself in the light of its knowledge of the world situation and of what is likely best to serve the war effort of the country, and of the allied nations, without restriction of any kind. I cannot say that the government might be disposed to send troops here, there or elsewhere. Everything will depend upon how the war develops, and what it may become most advisable to do. What the government wants is to have a free hand to do the thing that is most advisable and most necessary.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I wonder whether I could ask a question with regard to what the Prime Minister said a few moments ago. I know he compared the official opposition with nazis, and I wonder whether in the same way he would compare President Roosevelt with Hitler, having regard to his broken pledges on this point. I listened to several of the Prime Minister's broadcasts during the election campaign of 1940, but I did not hear him in any of those speeches refer to conscription for overseas. I heard him say there would be no conscription if his government were returned to power. So that when he speaks of this moral obligation I should like him to tell us just at what point during the campaign of 1940 he established the distinction between conscription and conscription for overseas service. I believe that moral obligation has been broken to some extent already, having regard to the speeches I heard him deliver. Perhaps he could establish the point during the campaign at which the distinction was made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First of all may I say to my hon. friend that when I spoke of nazi methods I was not reflecting on the opposition. I was setting out the difference between an attitude which takes account of moral obligations and an attitude which says, "We care nothing about moral obligations except to ignore and destroy them." I say that to-day the people are vitally concerned as to whether the former method of viewing obligations is to hold in Canadian affairs or as to whether the other method, which is the nazi method, is going to hold. I was not reflecting upon any individuals; I was speaking about methods in connection with matters of government.

With regard to the question of conscription, I would say to my hon. friend that it has always been understood, and in fact it is embedded in the Militia Act, that in time of war every man may be compulsorily called out to serve his country. That is there; it has been there from the start. Compulsion in regard to the defence of your own country is something that does not need to be referred to, because it is an obligation that the government may require to be fulfilled at any moment it pleases.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I would not think the general public would know much about that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say this to my hon. friend, and I am sure that on reflection he will agree with me. The only point in discussing the question of conscription or no conscription arose out of what took place in the last great war, when men were sent overseas under conscription. The issue then was not a question with regard to conscription for Canada; it had to do with the conscription of men for service overseas. Every time the question has been discussed, on a public platform or in parliament, it has been conscription for service overseas that people have had in mind. That is the only thing people have had in mind, I think, when that question has been discussed. Certainly I have never had any other view than that conscription might be enforced in Canada itself at any time for the defence of Canada, but that whether it should be enforced for overseas service would depend on matters such as we are discussing at the moment.

Mr. CHURCH: Section 3 limits the bill to the taking of a plebiscite on a question to be set out on the ballot, to be answered by yes or no. A person goes into the polling booth; he is handed this ballot and he reads it over. He does not know that our military forces are established by statutes such as the Militia Act, the mobilization act, and other acts. The words "military forces" apply to land forces, sea forces and air forces. Early in January I called for a return respecting military forces. On February 13 a return was brought down which should be read into this ballot. According to this return, all members of the air force have enlisted for service anywhere. That lets them out of the ballot. As to the navy, it is stated that all personnel enlisting for active service in the navy undertake to serve whereever they are required. That silent wing of the service is out. Then you come to the army, which is the only branch of the service left, and according to the return brought down by the minister the army is not under this limitation at all. We have the Army Act, the Militia Act to read into the ballot, and the National War Services Act. The return states that there are about 8,000 enlistments for home defence; that as of December 31 total enlistments for service anywhere numbered 299,375, and that all the army come under the National Resources Mobilization Act. That is the position of the army, the navy and the air force, so that two branches of the service do not come within this ballot.

Then the question contained in the ballot goes on to ask whether the voter is in favour of releasing the government from any obligation or past commitment for war, and so on. What does this bill mean by an obligation or commitment? What is an obligation or commitment? We have entered into a great many obligations and commitments with foreign powers in a military way both before and since this war started. We have entered into pledges, which should be read into this ballot, with a foreign military power, a friend, neighbour and ally of ours, the United States. We entered into an obligation with them by means of two or three notes and boards which will commit this country forever. We did not object to the Atlantic conference; we did not protest the giving away of bases from Newfoundland to British Guiana, although bound by them in a military way immediately. Surely those are obligations and commitments affecting this country, and we have been pledged to them and their consequences, because when Britain is at war Canada is at war. We gave away bases all the way from Newfoundland to British Guiana; and whether or not Canada consented to that agreement, and did not object, but aided, we are bound by it for all time. That is one obligation in a military sense and parliament and the voters of this country who knew not of it are committed to it, notwithstanding the fact that it was not discussed in this parliament though during some of it parliament was sitting.

We have also made commitments in the Pacific. In 1938 a member of the government told us that all the enclosed money $35,000,000, was being spent for two conditional purposes, first for home defence and second to protect our neutrality in case the United States should be attacked. We are bound by it to the United States. That was an obligation and commitment which could entail military service and bring us to the edge of war, and we knew it in 1938; and only the other night the Prime Minister referred to "adjacent territory," after the leader of the opposition had mentioned it. There was another commitment. Will the voters and the press understand that the government is released from all these commitments as well if we vote yes, but we are bound forever, vote or no vote? That is the question I should like to ask, because whether we like it or not we are committed to all these things forever, and also to war.

The ballot goes on to refer to the fact that we are restricted in our methods of raising men for military service. We are not. It is the duty and function alone of the government. This ballot, I am afraid, is going to cause a great deal of confusion and spoiled ballots. After all, the entire onus for these commitments and obligations is upon the government of the day and the whole conduct of the war is theirs. Why should they try to shift that onus to private members and to us in the opposition? I do not know. I ran as a straight Conservative. I was never anything but a straight Conservative. I was never consulted by my late leader; I never saw him during the whole election campaign, and he did not bind me . The voluntary system is the best and only system, and we would have had a million men under it and rendered compulsion unnecessary. I never saw our former leader during the whole election of 1940.

The form of this ballot is limited by section 3, but you have to consider the background of the thing and the cause and effect it will have upon the average voter. When he comes to mark his ballot he will be confused. First we had the statement before the house met, and in the speech from the throne that it was all about conscription and nothing else. Then we had the statement by the Prime Minister last Thursday about adjacent territory. The voter will be confused because there is no clarity about it. So far as asking members of parliament to go out in their constituencies to advocate this ballot is concerned, I can say that I shall not advocate it or go out or have anything to do with it. I supported rearmament in 1936. I shall not give my constituents any advice as to how to vote. It is none of my business, duty or function. That is not the duty of a private member. That responsibility is upon the government of the day as long as they are the government of the day. It is none of my duty, business or function. It is their obligation to save this country, and look after the defence of the realm. There has never yet been a proper and adequate defence of the realm of this country, and the government is now trying to shift this off on to the private members and the electors by side-stepping their own responsibilities, duty and functions under the constitution of this country.

Mr. DUPUIS: I crave the indulgence of the committee to make a few remarks following what has been said by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). They seem to think that if the question proposed in section 3 is answered in the negative the Canadian nation will go out of the war. I obtained from the bureau of statistics certain returns obtained in the census. These show that there are about 1,200,000 single men between the ages of 18 and 45 years, and approximately 1,000,000 married men between the same ages, or a total of 2,200,000 men of military age. If we deduct the twenty per cent that would be medically unfit, we have left 1,800,000 men who would be fit for military service.

[Mr. Church.]

Hon. gentlemen know that these 1,800,000 men of military age would have to be placed into the three categories of national defence, war industries and the production of foodstuffs.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry, but I must direct the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that we are dealing with section 3 which is concerned exclusively with the form of the question to be put to the voters.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am sure that you are right, but I ask the indulgence of the committee in order that I may answer hon. gentlemen opposite. I hope I shall be allowed to put on record the statistics I have. I shall not be long. As I say, these 1,800,000 men of military age must be divided into the three categories of national defence, war industry and agriculture. We thus have 600,000 for national defence. National defence must be divided into home service and overseas service; dividing 600,000 by two gives us 300,000 for overseas service. We already have compulsory service for home defence. The 300,000 men must again be divided into three branches: the army, the navy and the air force. I think in the long run we shall have an equal number of men in each branch of national defence. By dividing these 300,000 men into three, we have 100,000 for the army. It will be recalled that men who enlist in the navy or the air force are bound to go anywhere in the world. Compulsory service is limited to the army.

Suppose that the government on some future date should see, as the people may see themselves, that danger is getting nearer to our shores. I submit that at that time the people of Canada will be the first ones to ask the government to adopt any measure to protect this country and help our allies. We have only 100,000 men who would be available for compulsory enlistment in the army. Look at the results we have already. A total of 410,000 men have enlisted voluntarily to go anywhere in the world. I would tell the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe and the hon. member for Broadview that the empire will not be in danger if the people of this country should answer no to this question. The war will go on just the same. With compulsory service the results will be much less than they are now. That is the way I understand the question.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry, but I cannot permit the hon. gentleman to continue.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am finished, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman has been too long already. The rules of the house cannot be enforced unless hon. members are ready to abide by them. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not going into a long dissertation in this connection, but the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has spoken on my amendment and I feel I should say a few words. I said yesterday that I was confused with respect to the question, but I think it would have been better if the Prime Minister had not spoken. I am worse off now than ever. I am not only confused; I am befooled, befuddled, bemused, bewildered, perplexed and confounded. I do not know what explanation can be given to the question now. I am so confused I won't attempt to answer the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has said that the proposed amendment will give rise to unwarranted suspicion. That is the term used. I contend that the question as it now appears on the ballot paper is bound to give rise to unwarranted suspicion. The amendment clarifies the situation so that the people will know exactly what they are voting for.

The Prime Minister also made the charge—perhaps I should not say it was a charge, but he said that in the discussion of this matter some of us wanted to make out that there was some trick or trickery in the question. I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is the question as it is now worded that gives rise to suspicions that there might be some trickery. We are not claiming that. We simply want to relieve the minds of the people of Canada from that very thing by having them vote on a definite question. The Prime Minister has talked a good deal about being released from any past commitments, any past commitments, "any" past commitments. If he said that once, he said it a dozen times. Then why not simply put a period after the word "commitments" and strike out the rest of the question?

I believe that the government should be given a free hand in time of war, subject of course to parliament and to proper legislation. We do not desire the government's hands to be tied. We simply want to clarify the question that is to be submitted in the plebiscite.

I did not quite catch the implication of the Prime Minister's remarks with regard to what he termed a nazi mentality. I am not going to speak of that now, but I shall read Hansard to-morrow to see just exactly what was meant by it. He was looking at me when he said it. I do believe this, that there was no reason for the Prime Minister bringing any such thing into the discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say that my hon. friend flatters himself when he says I was looking at him when I said that. I was not even thinking of my hon. friend or of his mentality. I was thinking of the methods.

Mr. HANSELL: Thank you. I could really see no reason for bringing such a thing into the debate. I do not want to capitalize on this but I have two sons in the air force. I said that the other day. I have only three sons, and I have a letter now saying that the third son has enlisted. That is more than the Prime Minister can say.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question, question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have not taken up very much time on this question, and perhaps those who are calling "question" will bear with me for a few minutes.

This afternoon the Prime Minister gave a lecture to the leader of the opposition. I think that at a time like this personalities are altogether out of place. The leader of the opposition, throughout the last two years that he has occupied this position, has not desired any of us to give eulogies to him, nor does he now. But let me say to the Prime Minister that the leadership which the leader of the opposition has given has been of material benefit to the war effort of this dominion, and his record has been one of cooperation with the government to improve the war effort in an earnest desire to give patriotic service, and I think the time has come for us on this side of the house to pay a tribute to the work he has done.

This afternoon the Prime Minister defined the meaning of the question to be submitted in the plebiscite. As the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) said, where is the logic in this question? What does it mean? The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) asked the Prime Minister the question as to when he ever made a commitment to the people of Canada during the last election campaign that distinguished between conscription in Canada and conscription beyond the confines of Canada. The answer of the Prime Minister was not a categorical one. His answer was, in effect, that everybody was thinking about conscription as it existed in 1917. I have looked over the speeches of the Prime Minister, and while I am not saying that they have been read sufficiently carefully for me to be able to say definitely that he never distinguished between conscription for service within Canada and conscription for service beyond Canada, I have not been able to find any such distinction. Certainly there was a pledge made before parliament, but the Prime Minister pointed out the other day that so far as the pledge made before parliament was concerned, parliament could release him from that pledge, but that he could only get release from a pledge made to the people of Canada during an election campaign by asking the people to release the government from the moral obligation created thereby. Then I ask the Prime Minister, why not ask the people a direct, unequivocal question? Why make things even more confusing by asking a question that is capable of interpretation according to the feelings of the individual voter?

The Prime Minister claims that to change the wording of the plebiscite would create unwarranted suspicions. I wonder in whose minds would there be suspicion. If you are going to ask a person, "Will you do this or that?" you ask that very question. You do not clothe it in words that permit of equivocation in the interpretation placed thereon by the person being questioned or the one who asks the question.

So far as the last election campaign is concerned—I am speaking of western Canada —a minister of the crown who spoke there, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), throughout the campaign pointed out that the difference between the three political parties in the field, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the Conservatives and the Liberals, was this:

> . . . the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, from whose platform he (the Minister of Agriculture) read a number of clauses, referred particularly to the call for the conscription of wealth for war. In the second group was the party headed by Hon. R. J. Manion that opposed the conscription of men to be sent out of Canada; they did not mind conscripting men for the defence of Canada.
> The Liberals, through their leader, Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, had already taken their stand, no conscription of men, and no direct conscription of wealth, but men and money for the prosecution of the war.

In other words the Minister of Agriculture meant to convey to the people that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party stood for the conscription of wealth; the Conservative party did not stand for the conscription of man-power for overseas service but for conscription of man-power for service within Canada; and the Liberal party stood for neither. But in June, 1940, when conditions made necessary the raising of men, that pledge given by a minister of the Prime Minister's own government was departed from and conscription was brought in of man-power for service within Canada because of the need for men and the then prevailing war exigencies. Who was then asked to decide on that matter? It was parliament. The pledge that was given to the people of Canada in the words quoted above was that no conscription whether for service within Canada or beyond Canada would be introduced by the government. But in June, 1940, the government in effect secured a release from its pledge not to bring in conscription for service in Canada by introducing and securing the passage through parliament of the National Resources Mobilization Act. Why cannot the same course be followed to-day?

If, however, the government is going on with the submission of the plebiscite, I ask the Prime Minister to change the wording of the question, so that there will be no possible misunderstanding as to the meaning of the question. As it stands to-day, it reads:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

I urge the government to make this question clear. We on this side of the house are not trying to hold up the matter. We want action too, and to secure that, all we ask is that the people of Canada be given an opportunity of voting on something regarding which they will know what question they are voting on, and that they will have some idea of the responsibility for action which will rest on this government and on parliament in the event that there is an affirmative vote.

Mr. BRUCE: I do not intend to delay the committee for more than a moment or two, but I think it will be very apparent to those who have listened to the speeches in this chamber and have read the press of the country that there is much confusion as to what is meant by the question which is to be submitted to the people in the plebiscite. The hon. member for Macleod has used a great many adjectives to indicate the extent of the confusion. I would say it is "confusion worse confounded". Nobody seems to know exactly what is meant by this question, in spite of the explanations given by the Prime Minister in a considerable speech a week ago, again yesterday, and to-day. I believe that if we adopted the amendment of the hon. member for Macleod and clarified the situation by the addition of the five words, "in any theatre of war," everybody would be satisfied, at least with the question which is being submitted.

I wonder whether this plebiscite would be gone on with if the Japanese landed on Vancouver island, or if the city of Quebec or some of the cities of the maritime provinces were subjected to bombing or shelling. It is not beyond the realm of possibility that, before there is a chance of submitting this question to the people, we in Canada shall be in a very serious and dangerous position.

I wonder also whether the Prime Minister would suggest that his moral obligation is greater than that of his friend, Mr. Roosevelt. This is what Mr. Roosevelt said during the 1940 election campaign to the people of the United States—giving them quite as definite a pledge as was made by the Prime Minister of Canada:

> While I am talking to you fathers and mothers, I will say it again and again and again, your boys are not going to be sent to fight in foreign wars.

This pledge was not only made by Mr. Roosevelt but supported by every member of congress. After the treacherous attack of Japan Mr. Roosevelt and congress had no hesitation in breaking the election pledge and legislating to send American boys to every part of the globe.

I should like to submit this question to the Prime Minister: Will he and his government put forth the same effort to ensure a favourable vote on the plebiscite as they did to ensure the success of the victory loan?

May I add just a word as to my own position in respect of this plebiscite. While I think it is very improper to shift to the electorate the responsibility which belongs to parliament, I shall vote yes on the plebiscite, and do my utmost to secure as many votes in the affirmative as I can, my reason being that it will relieve the government from what it considers to be a commitment; and because I greatly fear what will result if this plebiscite is defeated, as it very well may be.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, just one word. I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Parkdale upon the statement he has just made about the possibility of the invasion of Canada. It shows the necessity of doing all we can for the defence of this country.

I have been a supporter of the government for seventeen years, and I am still a supporter of the government. On the other hand I find it pretty hard to give them a blank cheque by releasing them from all pledges which may have been made to the Canadian people. Not only was there a pledge regarding compulsory military service overseas, but there was also a pledge that there would be no amalgamation of railways.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, please. The question is on section 3, which determines the form of the question to be put to the voters. The remarks of the hon. gentleman are irrelevant.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to argue my case, and I will point out to you only one thing. The obligation is not specified; the word "obligation" is preceded by the word "any", which means that to answer yes to the question implies that in the opinion of the voter the government is released from any pledge which has been made to the people.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, please. The wording of the question is, "obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service".

Mr. POULIOT: Well, I will not insist upon it. But there is another point: to whom has this pledge been made? In the first place it was made to those who were in favour of the neutrality of Canada. When Canada entered into war some Canadians were opposed to that and favoured the neutrality of Canada, and a certain pledge was then made to them, that there would be no compulsory military service. Afterwards, when conscription for home defence was established, there was a second pledge given to those who were against conscription of any kind. Then at the last election the pledge was made; it was made in the house and also by leading politicians when they travelled throughout the country. Now, suppose that in a constituency forty per cent of the people were against conscription and sixty per cent were for conscription. The pledge was not made to those who were for conscription; it was made to those who were against conscription. It is therefore up to the latter to release the government from any obligation incurred thereby. Take a constituency in which the proportion is forty per cent against conscription and sixty per cent for conscription. For one reason or another some of the sixty per cent may have supported the government candidate notwithstanding the question of conscription for overseas service. They supported him because he was a personal friend or had obliged them, or for some other reason which did not enter into consideration of the pledge. Is it fair to take the majority of any constituency, even the vote of those who were not interested in the pledge, to release the government from all responsibility in the matter. Of course, it is the majority that rules, but in some constituencies the majority were against conscription. It may have happened in the constituencies of hon. gentlemen—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is discussing the principle of the bill. His remarks are not directed to the form of question to be put. Section 3 of the bill is exclusively concerned with the form of question.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir, but I am not discussing the principle of the bill, but the pledge.

The CHAIRMAN: Even that is not now before the chair. The matter before the chair is only the form of question to be put to the voter, and of course there is the amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are only dealing with section 3, subsection 1?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. LACOMBE: The Prime Minister said a moment ago that the wording of the ballot is the clearest in the world. The wording of the pledge and the commitments against conscription, made to the people of Canada in 1940, were also very plain and clear. Consequently, why does the government not withdraw this bill?

Amendment (Mr. Hansell) negatived.

The CHAIRMAN: There is another amendment moved by Mr. Hansell.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, is it in order for an hon. member to move two amendments at once?

The CHAIRMAN: No. When several amendments are submitted to the chair they are taken one after the other in the order determined by the Chairman. I am taking the second amendment that has been moved, as follows:

That a second question be placed upon the ballot paper as follows:

Are you in favour of the conscription of the financial institutions of Canada so that the government can fulfil its commitment to issue currency and credit in terms of public need?

I declare this amendment out of order for the reason that it is inconsistent and goes far beyond the principle of the bill which is now before the committee. The question is on section 3, subsection 1.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understood that the minister had a new ballot and I compliment him upon it. Is this not the time when we should have an amendment introduced in that regard?

Mr. McLARTY: I was just on the point of moving for adoption of the new ballot which we discussed last night. We do not need to discuss it at length again. It has been simplified in a way which I think will recommend itself to the committee. I will ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) to move the necessary amendment to section 3, subsection 1, to insert the ballot which has now been distributed in place of the one that appears in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Mulock moves that the ballot form which appears in the printed bill be deleted, and that the ballot form which is now submitted be substituted in lieu thereof. Therefore the words "every person qualified to vote at the plebiscite" on the ballot form will disappear and the following will be substituted in lieu thereof: "Vote by making a cross thus X after the word yes or after the word no."

[Mr. Chairman.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the ballot is a great improvement. I only rise to suggest, however, that there be no instructions on the ballot. These are posted at the polling booth and everyone will know then. My experience is that the returning officer invariably instructs the voter how to mark his ballot, although he is not required to do so in every case. I suggest that the words "vote by making a cross thus X after the word yes or after the word no" be stricken out. However, I do not press the point, although I think that is the proper thing to do having regard to the form of ballot in dominion elections.

Mr. SLAGHT: I fear that might cause confusion. I think these words should remain. We know that in other elections voters sometimes write something on their ballot. If this ballot is presented to them as a bare ballot, it seems to me you ought to tell them in that short sentence to make a cross opposite yes or opposite no. You open the door to much confusion if you do not.

Mr. HANSELL: Before this subsection carries, may I impose upon your indulgence, Mr. Chairman, to explain the ruling which you gave a short time ago. You ruled my amendment out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The ruling of the chair can be appealed from, but it is not open to discussion. Moreover, the time to appeal from it has long passed.

Section agreed to.

Motion agreed to.

On section 4—Qualifications of ordinary voters.

Mr. McLARTY: A motion will be required to make two amendments. In line 36 the second word "a" is to be changed to "the"; and in line 37, after the words "provisions of", paragraphs should be inserted—

The CHAIRMAN: Concerning the question that arose last night as to how we should deal with the amendments which have been made in the special committee to which the bill was referred; I have studied that question, and I find that amendments made in the special commitee are not to be proposed as amendments to the bill when it is considered in committee of the whole. They are to be taken up as part of the bill, and they must be submitted together with the clauses to which they refer, but no separate motion needs to be made for their adoption because the committee of the whole is not vested with the power to revise the work of the special committee.

On second reading the principle of the bill was all that was passed, the details being left for the special committee to settle. The house has not approved a single section of this bill, and the special committee has made changes in its clauses. The adoption of these changes in the special committee is complete as far as it goes. They are now incorporated in the bill referred to the committee of the whole, and they must be considered as if they were original sections. This, I am advised, has always been the practice in committee of the whole in the Canadian House of Commons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be true if concurrence in the report of the committee had been moved, but concurrence in the report of this committee was not moved. That being so, I wonder whether that ruling is still applicable.

The CHAIRMAN: There has never been a motion for concurrence in the amendments made by a special committee on a bill referred not to the committee of the whole but to a special committee. The bill is read a second time, then referred to a special committee; the special committee deals with it and then reports the bill as amended by it, or without amendments, as the case may be. When the bill comes back to the committee of the whole it is taken in the form in which it has been reported on by the special committee, and there is no concurrence in the amendments of the special committee; but of course the committee of the whole, when the sections of the bill so amended are taken up, can always amend it further as it deems advisable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That procedure was not followed on the unemployment insurance bill. When that bill came back from the special committee the members of the administration moved time and again to have certain amendments made in it. I do not know whether we were wrong then, but my understanding is that the amendments have to be made one by one.

Mr. McLARTY: I think I explained last evening regarding the procedure on the unemployment insurance bill that I was speaking purely from recollection. I believe your honour has gone into it carefully now—

The CHAIRMAN: Yes. Furthermore, the amendments are before the committee, because the bill has been reprinted. I have no objection at any hon. member's request, to read in what particulars the bill has been amended in the special committee. But I am ruling now that there is no necessity for a motion of concurrence in the amendments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not an important matter, but one of ways and means of doing a thing and the established practice. I am not questioning how it is being done, but I think we should stick to one rule.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the chairman is quite in order even considering the practice followed in connection with the unemployment insurance bill. My recollection is that that bill was not reprinted. We had the typewritten amendments made by the committee, and then those amendments were moved when the bill was discussed in committee of the whole. I see no reason why, with a reprinted bill before us, we should not deal with it as a bill which has received second reading.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask that it be taken up one subsection at a time.

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

On section 4, subsection 1.

Mr. RAYMOND: I desire to move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscouata:

That section 4 of subsection 1 be amended by inserting in subparagraph (a) after the words "twenty-one years" in the second line the following words: "in the case of a woman and eighteen years in the case of a man."

The object of this amendment is to qualify to vote men of eighteen, nineteen and twenty years of age.

What is the purpose of this plebiscite? I refer to the question to be asked of the public in the plebiscite and certain declarations which were made by the Prime Minister when speaking on Wednesday last. The question to be submitted is as follows:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

The Prime Minister said:

If the answer is in the affirmative it will mean that the government according to the opinion expressed by the people has been released from commitments that have been made.

Released from what commitments? The only commitment made with respect to military service is the pledge given that no conscription would be imposed for service overseas. If the answer is in the affirmative, it will mean that the government will be free to impose conscription for service overseas. In other words, it will mean that the government will have a mandate from the people to impose conscription for overseas service if and when it thinks it desirable.

Then a very important question arises: Who should vote to give such a mandate?

My answer is this: All those who will be liable to be called for service overseas, if conscription is imposed, should be entitled to vote on the plebiscite.

The Prime Minister said that he wants to know the opinion of the people, and the Secretary of State also said it is the desire of the government that the fullest possible opportunity should be accorded the people of Canada to express their view upon the particular question which will be submitted.

It is only reasonable that those who will be called upon to pay the bill should be the first to be asked their opinion. The youth of military age, who are directly involved because they are the ones who will be called upon to pay the blood tax, should have something to say. According to the Militia Act all male inhabitants of Canada between the ages of eighteen and sixty, except those exempted, are liable to military service. Consequently all those people should be entitled to vote in the plebiscite. There is a well known principle in the British constitution: No taxation without representation. The Prime Minister rightly said that parliament derived its power from the people, and it has been emphasized that this is the most democratic measure that has ever been introduced in this parliament. Yet some of those most concerned, because they will have to pay the consequences of this measure with their blood, will be deprived of an opportunity of expressing their opinion. The Prime Minister has said that the millions of dollars required are coming from the people, but those who pay those millions have been consulted. The man-power is also coming from the people, and all those who are liable to be conscripted should be consulted. It would be a poor democracy which would have one law for human life and an entirely preferential law for property and wealth.

I do not intend to say any more in support of this amendment, but in conclusion I should like to quote the final words used by the Secretary of State when he introduced the resolution which preceded this bill, as reported at page 754 of Hansard:

> At a time when we are fighting to maintain the democratic way of life throughout the world, let us endeavour in every way to maintain it in our own country.

Mr. LACOMBE: Youth, as much as any other category of electors, should be entitled to vote in the coming plebiscite. These are the men who will have to bear all the sacrifices called for by the government. They will have to fulfil the obligation to serve. They also will have to pay, in the years to come, the terrific costs of this war. The government cannot assign them duties without granting them equivalent rights. Every Canadian youth who has reached the age of eighteen should have an opportunity of voting in the coming plebiscite, not only those who are serving but also all those who will reach the age of eighteen on or before the date when the plebiscite will be held. For the youth of my country I request this act of justice. I request parliament and the government to fulfil the magnificent duty toward the youth of Canada which may be mobilized for the defence of Canada and even for overseas service, if ever—and may God prevent it—the government is released from its sacred pledges and its solemn commitments.

Therefore I readily second the amendment of the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, but I suggest that every man and every woman over eighteen years of age should have the privilege of voting in the plebiscite.

Amendment negatived on division.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall subsection 1 of section 4 carry?

Mr. MacNICOL: If we are not taking the paragraphs separately, I should like to ask a question about paragraph (b), which reads:

> (b) is a British subject by birth or naturalization.

I wanted to inquire if, when the enumerators are compiling the lists, they will have to be shown the naturalization papers of those who are not of British birth.

Mr. McLARTY: I believe there is no oath required by the enumerator to show that a person is a naturalized subject, or that the production of papers or production of naturalization paper is necessary, if he is resident within that polling subdivision.

Mr. MacNICOL: The empire is in a life and death struggle, you know.

Mr. McLARTY: Perhaps we might call it six o'clock, and I will check the regulations carefully.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 4.

Mr. McLARTY: When the committee rose the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) was inquiring whether enumerators would require some evidence of a person being a British subject, especially if he were naturalized; whether the naturalization papers would be required to be produced. The provisions under the regulations are the same as those under the Dominion Elections Act. Consequently, naturalization papers are not required to be produced, but of course the right to challenge at the poll is still left open.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are quite a number of people in my riding who are of non-British origin but are naturalized Canadians. Many of them have sons in the army, in the air force and on the sea, and I am glad to hear that they are not going to be annoyed. I think it is imperative that every effort should be made to preserve harmony among those who go to make up the people of Canada. Nothing should be done to annoy those who are naturalized but not of British birth when they are visited by the enumerators. They will know whether they have a right to put down their names.

Mr. HANSELL: Has the minister considered those who were naturalized some years ago but who, since the readjustment of the naturalization laws, have had to take out further papers? I think the minister knows to what I have reference. Supposing a man cannot produce a naturalization certificate although he was naturalized years ago; will he have difficulty at the polls? There are quite a number of citizens in that position. They are not fully aware of the new regulations and they would have to get further papers. I have had a few inquiries recently along this line, not with respect to voting but with respect to naturalization.

Mr. McLARTY: The provisions under the regulations as to naturalization are the same as under the elections act. I know what the hon. member has in mind. If a man has lost his naturalization papers, or if he is affected by the amendment to the Naturalization Act of 1915, it would not be a difficult matter for him to obtain new naturalization papers.

Mr. HANSELL: It would be too late when he goes to vote to get new naturalization papers.

Mr. McLARTY: Every voter will have to take some precaution to see that his status as a voter is maintained. That is the duty of every citizen. But there will be no difficulty placed in his way in doing that.

Mr. HANSELL: If a man does not have the new papers, will he be eligible to vote?

Mr. McLARTY: Under section 7, undoubtedly he would. The same provision applies as applies under the elections act.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have often wondered why our citizens are always described as British subjects by birth or naturalization. Under the terminology of our statutes we have Canadian nationals or Canadian citizens. I have wondered why the terminology found in this bill is invariably used elsewhere. I think it is wise to preserve the terminology of British subjects, but I think our people in Canada should become more and more conscious of the fact that they are citizens of Canada, whether they have been born in this country or have come here and become domiciled or naturalized. It seems to me that the time has come when we should endeavour to teach our people that they are Canadian citizens. For example, during this debate I have felt that we have not had the consciousness of national unity that we ought to have. Until we teach our boys and girls in our schools, until we teach our men and women that we are not only subjects of His Majesty the King of Canada but Canadian citizens as well, we shall not achieve that Canadian unity we ought to have.

Mr. REID: What about those with dual citizenship?

Mr. MacINNIS: They are only the Japanese.

Mr. REID: Do not fly off so quickly; there are others with dual citizenship besides the Japanese.

Mr. COLDWELL: As far as dual citizenship is concerned, you will find they are naturalized British citizens, although the naturalization may not be recognized by their former country. I am speaking of British subjects who are domiciled in Canada. Our statutes, such as the Immigration Act and the Canadian Nationals Act, which provides also for the renunciation of Canadian citizenship, use the terminology to which I have referred. Why not use it in our other statutes? Why not use it in our elections act on voters' lists and so on? We would thus inculcate in our people the idea that they are citizens of this country. When we were travelling in Great Britain last autumn invariably we signed ourselves as British citizens; there was no distinction as to what part of the British commonwealth we had come from.

I want to preserve my British connection; but, speaking as one who became a citizen of this country by domicile, I think it is time that our children and our people were taught that there is a loyalty due to the Dominion of Canada as such. One way to do that is to write into our statutes and our regulations the terminology that will bring that fact forcibly before them. I am not going to move an amendment tonight; I am simply bringing this before the committee at this time. I do not want to prolong a discussion which has been too long already. This plebiscite was discussed for four weeks on the address, and the present discussion has occupied several days. Because I do not want to prolong the discussion, I am not going to move an amendment. As I say, I think the time has come when we should try to inculcate in our people the idea that we are not French Canadians, English Canadians, Scottish Canadians or some other type of Canadians, but that we are Canadian citizens.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This raises a very important problem, and I am glad to hear the hon. member say that he is not going to pursue it now. In connection with those who are naturalized and those with dual nationality, referred to by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), I should like to call attention to a decision of the privy council. This was the case of Cunningham versus Tomey Homma, which is reported in 1903 appeal cases. In this case the right of a naturalized citizen to vote was specifically raised, and the case went to the privy council. If hon. gentlemen have any interest in the matter, they can refer to the decision of the Lord Chancellor to be found at page 156. This case was referred to by the minister during the resolution stage.

Mr. McLARTY: If I remember correctly, it was in connection with section 5 of the Naturalization Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was in connection with the interpretation of subsection 25 of section 91 of the British North America Act which reserves to the exclusive jurisdiction of the dominion parliament the subject of naturalization. The provincial legislature has the right to determine, under section 92, what privileges, as distinguished from necessary consequences, shall be attached to it. At page 156 the Lord Chancellor makes this observation:

> The extent to which naturalization will confer privileges has varied both in this country and elsewhere.
> From the time of William III down to Queen Victoria no naturalization was permitted which did not exclude the alien naturalized from sitting in parliament or in the privy council.

And further down:

> The term "political rights" used in the Canadian Naturalization Act is, as Walkem J. very justly says—

That was a judge of the Supreme Court of British Columbia:

> —a very wide phrase, and their lordships concur in his observation that, whatever it means, it cannot be held to give necessarily a right to the suffrage in all or any of the provinces.

This means that the mere fact of naturalization under federal jurisdiction does not per se give the right to vote in the province because that right lies within the jurisdiction of the provinces themselves.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. REID: Did not Great Britain at one time disfranchise many classes of our citizens?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. The franchise has been a matter of continual growth and the subject of many reform bills. Their lordships continued:

> In the history of this country the right to the franchise has been granted and withheld on a great number of grounds, conspicuously upon grounds of religious faith, yet no one has ever suggested that a person excluded from the franchise was not under allegiance to the sovereign.

That is not quite apposite to the point raised by my hon. friend, but it is a matter of information which I think the committee should have before them.

Mr. NEILL: Was not the case to which the leader of the opposition referred that of a suit brought by a Japanese against the election registrar who refused to put him on the list?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Right.

Mr. NEILL: And it was decided by Lord Haldane that the province could make any kind of franchise they wished. For instance, Catholics at one time were not allowed to have the vote. In the particular case referred to, it was definitely decided that British Columbia could have any kind of franchise they liked.

Mr. COLDWELL: While I see the point that has been raised, I do not see how it affects the general argument that, even if it would involve a change in the law, we should provide for a Canadian citizenship, definite legal terminology which would embrace Canadian nationals and distinguish them as British subjects of Canadian nationality.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a very much wider question.

Mr. McLARTY: As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did not think it was necessary to move an amendment, I was not going to make any reply, except to say that this question was raised in the special committee and there was sympathy with the view he advances. However, this is a particular bill dealing with one plebiscite, and one only, and therefore a measure of limited application. If the change which he suggests were contemplated, I would suggest that it should be in connection with a wider measure than this particular enactment.

In the Tomey Homma case my recollection is that the effect of the decision of the judicial committee was this: Whereas by section 5 of the Naturalization Act political rights are given to those who are naturalized under that act, there is no inherent giving of the right of franchise in connection with it. That question may arise a little later on one of the subsequent sections, but I do not think we need consider it until we come to subsequent sections under which certain disfranchisement does take place.

Mr. GREEN: Before we leave the question of naturalization I would ask the minister whether it is the intention to set up at this session a committee to consider the whole question of naturalization? If he will remember, two special committees appointed to review the defence of Canada regulations in 1940 and 1941 recommended that there should be a special committee of this house to consider naturalization. Would not this present session be an appropriate time to have that done?

Mr. McLARTY: I would reply that, while it is hardly germane to the particular subject now under consideration, I am aware that the committee recommended that a naturalization committee should be set up, and all I can say at the moment is that while that matter has not been finally dealt with, it is receiving very careful consideration.

Mr. HANSELL: In reference to those who are qualified to vote, it has already been mentioned that there are certain citizens of this country who refused to register in the national registration that was held about a year and a half ago. I cannot bring myself to see how a citizen who refuses to register under a specific law of this country should be permitted to vote on an issue of this kind which, after all, is an issue concerning the carrying on of the war. I believe that at the time of the national registration it was intended to become effective in the mobilization of our human and material resources. At least we can say that as a result of the mobilization act a new ministry was created, ostensibly at least to look after the registration and the calling up of our human resources for war service. But here are citizens who absolutely refused to register, and yet we are permitting them to vote on this plebiscite. I do not think that is right. I know of certain individuals who did register but who, because of some little discrepancy in the answers they gave to the questions asked, have been arrested and punished. I have myself taken up one or two cases of this kind with the proper authorities. Then surely the person who refused to register at all and regarded it as of no importance should not be free to vote on a question of this kind. I do not think it is right, and I therefore move, Mr. Chairman, that section 4, subsection 1, be amended by adding at the end thereof as paragraph (d) the following:

who produces his registration card at the time of voting.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is a great deal of merit in what the hon. member for Macleod says, but on the other hand I would point out that the registration certificate which we received was not of a kind that would keep permanently. I doubt very much whether our farmers of the west, who wear an ordinary pair of overalls, and sometimes a rather ragged pair of overalls under the conditions under which they have had to live in recent years, could produce their certificates immediately. They may have mislaid them or left them at home, or they may have become worn and been destroyed. I know that when someone made a similar suggestion I wondered whether I had my own registration certificate with me. I remembered that I had taken it from my pocket when I went to Great Britain last November, and I wondered whether I had it with me at that moment. Fortunately I had slipped it into a corner of my pocket book and was able to put my hand on it. I am convinced that while the suggestion of the hon. member for Macleod has a great deal of merit, it would lead to the disfranchising of many people. Many would not even go to the trouble of looking for their registration certificates, and many others probably would not be able to put their hands on those flimsy bits of paper which were given us as certificates a year ago last August.

Mr. REID: Perhaps you would not have to go far in this house, either.

Mr. COLDWELL: Probably the hon. member for New Westminster is right, that if we of this house were suddenly asked to produce our registration certificates—

Mr. REID: Oh, I have mine.

Mr. COLDWELL: —some of us might have difficulty in doing so. Like the hon. member for New Westminster, I have mine, I know, because I happened to look for it the other day.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Hansell moves:

That section 4, subsection 1, be amended by adding at the end thereof after paragraph (c) another paragraph:

(d) who produces his registration card at the time of voting.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I think I had the honour of making the suggestion in the house on the resolution stage, although, I suppose, my hon. friends on the left are now going to claim the credit. I have no objection to that. The suggestion is a good one. There are people in this country who have not registered, who deliberately did not register, yet we are going to allow them all the rights of citizenship. The excuses, if I may so term them, raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar are not impressive. Everybody in this country knows it is the law that you must be registered and carry a registration certificate with you, and the absence of it is not excused. Supposing any one of these men wants to get a job; he has to produce his registration certificate if it is demanded.

Mr. COLDWELL: He is not asked for it nowadays.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wonder just how the hon. member knows that.

Mr. MacNICOL: He doesn't know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He cannot possibly know it. He should not make the statement. It may be within his own personal knowledge—

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. I object to that. I have heard it stated authoritatively that many business firms have discontinued asking for the registration certificate, and I am speaking from knowledge that I possess. I am not going to allow the leader of the opposition to give any other implication to my remarks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course the hon. member can speak of what is within his own knowledge, but of necessity it must be, as mine would be, a very limited knowledge. It would not warrant such a general statement as he has made. The fact is that the registration, the issue of a registration certificate, and the carrying of the registration certificate are to-day prerequisites of citizenship in this country. We absolutely ignore that fact in this bill. Either it is the law, and is binding on you and me and every one who is obliged to register; or it is not the law. I cannot see any possible objection to carrying out the suggestion except that it might be an inconvenience to somebody. It will be known, if it is incorporated in this law, that people must, if requested, produce their registration certificates; those who vote, loyal citizens, will have them, and if they do not have them they can get duplicates of them.

I had not thought of moving an amendment because, after the expression of opinion from the committee itself, and no one among the members of the government having taken up the suggestion with approval, I knew it would not carry. It cannot possibly carry without the concurrence of the government. But I have some hope that the government will approve the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre who, I understand, will speak to the matter under section 7, that it be a prerequisite in the case of a man asking to be vouched for that he should produce his registration certificate.

Mr. REID: But are they not two different things—the right to vote and the right to be registered?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We make it compulsory to be registered, but we do not make it compulsory to vote. We have not gone so far in this country as to make voting compulsory, although from time to time the idea has been considered. I have often thought that we ought to adopt it and that we shall come to it some day. Men who are running for parliament would find themselves relieved of a good deal of the trouble they now have in getting people to perform the highest function of citizenship, namely the exercise of their franchise. The burden would be transferred from the candidate who wants the vote to the citizen himself, who ought to perform that function without having to be urged to do it. There is a great deal to be said for the principle of compulsion; we are just afraid to enact it, that is all. They have done it in Australia with good success. I happened some time in the late twenties to be a member of the privileges and elections committee when the Hon. John C. Elliott was chairman of that committee, and we discussed that question. The statistics then were that in Australia, where non-voters were subject to penalty, ninety per cent of the people voted. Here is the broad principle: the hon. member for New Westminster has brought it out by his interjection. We make it a condition of good citizenship in this country that a man shall be registered; it is compulsory; but we do not make it obligatory upon him to produce that registration certificate when he is exercising the franchise. Now, do not the two things seem to be incompatible in principle? I am going to support the amendment of the hon. member for Macleod. It is my own child. I did not intend to try to give it birth; but I may say—without carrying the analogy any further—that it is a good suggestion and should appeal to the membership of this committee. To refuse to give effect to it is to put a premium on disloyalty on the part of some people who have refused to carry out a function of citizenship by registering. You are going to give them all the benefits of citizenship, but you refuse to put any obligation on them in this connection.

I appeal to the minister to give further consideration to this suggestion. I do not want him to pass a snap judgment at this moment. I think the idea has merit, or I never would have proposed it. A man who exercised the right of the franchise should produce evidence of his bona fides, of his identity. What better identification could there be than the production of his registration card? In certain cities they had a system whereby, before a man could exercise the municipal ballot, he had to produce a certificate of some kind of registration with his photograph on it. What in the world is the good of a registration certificate if we do not use it in a given case where it would be applicable? I beg the minister to accept this proposal, to incorporate in the bill at this place, where it seems appropriate, a provision that every person shall produce his registration certificate. The idea is commendable and should appeal to all members of this house. I hope the minister will not lightly turn down this suggestion. If needs be, he could hold over this section.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the minister or someone in the government inform this committee whether the registration certificate has to be produced at the time a man gets employment, or whether it is a joke, like many of the other regulations now in effect? Could we have that definite information? As I have already indicated to the committee, I know of two firms which over the weekend were in need of men; when certain men came for employment they could not produce their registration certificates, and these employers felt in duty bound not to hire them unless they could produce the certificates. Is that the law, or is it not?

Mr. McLARTY: I regret I cannot advise the hon. member as to the necessity, but I shall be glad to get him that information. Possibly that is not germane to the matter which we are now discussing—that is as to the requirement to produce a registration card for the purpose of getting employment—this being a question of voting on the plebiscite which will be held following the passage of this bill. I appreciate that the leader of the opposition raised the point some time ago, and if it were a matter of answering his remarks, my reply would appear somewhat ill-considered if I dealt with them without having the advantage of his previous suggestion, now followed by what the hon. member for Macleod has said. But the matter was discussed by the special committee, namely, the necessity of producing the registration card as a condition precedent to voting. The hon. member for Lake Centre mentioned the proposal the other night, and I think it will appeal to the members of the committee that those who have to be vouched for might properly be required, in urban areas, to produce the registration certificate. I believe the general principle of this legislation will recommend itself to the committee. We do not want to stifle any voting; we want as free and frank an expression of opinion as can be obtained. I would say unhesitatingly, I agree that in the case of vouching in urban municipalities the registration card should be necessary. But the leader of the opposition says that the registration card is a condition of citizenship. The registration card is made under a particular act of this parliament, and for failure to register there are particular penalties that are imposed. Are you going to use the right of franchise as a penalty for the non-performance of a duty which an act makes mandatory that you shall do and which has its own penalties if you fail to do it? It might be that some would register who had not done so, but each act should stand on its own feet. If you pass compulsory legislation, then I doubt your right in a new act to place a penalty which the act that originally compelled a certain thing to be done does not impose.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the fault of that act, then.

Mr. McLARTY: No, it is not the fault of the act. The act has its penalties. It might be the fault of some enforcement of the act, but not of the act itself.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is there any penalty imposed upon the individual if he is unable to produce the registration certificate when required at the present time under the act?

Mr. McLARTY: Under the regulations under the act there is a definite penalty, and the act itself provides a penalty.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is the penalty carried out? Is the act a farce, or is the penalty carried out?

Mr. McLARTY: The hon. member for St. Paul's asks whether the act is a farce, or whether the penalty is carried out. All I will say is that to the best of my knowledge it is carried out. The act is not one that falls within my particular department, but I believe it is fairly carried out; at least an endeavour is made to carry it out. But when it is suggested that the registration card is the surest means of identification, that is scarcely correct. Since the last election—I cannot say since the registration took place—there has been a movement of the general population of Canada, involving about a million people.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope the minister will not fall into the habit of calling it a card. If it were a card it would not be so bad, but it is a piece of tissue paper which the government gave us a year or two ago, and it is hard to keep it in one's pocket.

Mr. McLARTY: I am not going to argue as to the quality of the paper used. I still have mine, fortunately. I have it on me. The point I was going to make was this. While the registrants are required to report any change of address, there is no change of address endorsed on the registration certificate. In view of the fact that it is not as effective an identification certificate as it might otherwise be—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has the registrant's signature and that is some identification.

Mr. McLARTY: There is no question it would be some identifying mark of the particular registrant; but when you consider the shifting of the population in the intervening time, I question very much if it would be of any great value. In addition to that, it would involve this: each enumerator making his enumeration would have to see individually the registration card of every registrant he put on his enumerator's list.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. McLARTY: Each enumerator putting a man on the list would have to do that if you made it a condition, as suggested in this amendment. He would have to see the individual whom he was putting on his list.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not follow.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is only for voting at the polling booth.

Mr. McLARTY: I withdraw that. The amendment says at the time of voting. I do suggest, however, that, especially in the rural areas, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar suggested, there would be quite a large number disfranchised by reason of their inability to produce the registration card. We argued in this committee yesterday about the ballot being a difficult one. If that is a fact, would it not be fair to leave penalties to the registration act itself, rather than make this act to some extent in the nature of a penalty by disfranchising men who are supposed to be punished under the original act.

Mr. NEILL: The minister has taken the line that if we compel a man to produce his registration card as a condition of voting, we are using the loss of his franchise as a penalty under the registration act. That is his argument. I submit that we had a precedent in the last war. We had to produce our registration card on almost every occasion when we played any public part. For instance, if I wanted to travel and wanted a railway ticket I had to produce the registration card, and if I did not do so I did not get the railway ticket. It might be held that the right to travel is a very important liberty of the subject, the liberty to move around as he likes; nevertheless it was held that one had to produce the registration card because it was considered that in a time of war it was essential to weed out those who did not have registration cards. I think the same applied to getting money orders, although I am not certain about that. At any rate we have a precedent to go by. Mr. Bennett had a very logical way of putting forward the argument on both sides and then adding, "on balance I favour so and so". I think it would be fair to say that, on balance, it would be fair to put this condition in; it may disenfranchise some but, on balance, it will have the great advantage of catching a number of people who had not the manliness or patriotism or obedience to law to register.

Amendment (Mr. Hansell) negatived.

Section 4, subsection 1, agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 2—Disqualifications of ordinary voters.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister state concretely and explicitly the disqualifications of ordinary voters contemplated by this subsection? At the moment I am not raising any objection to the clauses of this bill. I think I understand part of them; part of them I do not understand. Subsection 2 provides:

> The persons disqualified from voting as ordinary voters at the plebiscite shall be those persons disqualified from voting under the provisions of paragraphs (d) to (k), both inclusive, and paragraph (m) of subsection 2 of section 14 of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938. . . .

They are all set out; paragraph (m) is included to cover every person who is disqualified from voting under any law relating to the disqualification of electors for illegal practices. Those are quite clear. I call attention to paragraph (i):

> (i) every person who is disqualified by reason of race from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of the province in which he or she resides and who did not serve in the military, naval or air forces of Canada in the war of 1914-1918.

Paragraph (j) refers to the order in council of 1898; I think that relates to the Doukhobors.

In particular I should like to know what provinces have passed legislation which would debar anybody of Japanese, Italian, Finnish nationality, or any of the nations with which this country is at war. The only province I can recall is British Columbia, but I do not pretend that my information is complete. I should like the minister to give us concretely what the effect of this subsection is. Who specifically will be debarred from voting under it?

Mr. McLARTY: I wonder whether my hon. friend requires me to read the paragraphs of section 14 of the elections act. I think they pretty well speak for themselves.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have all that, but I am speaking particularly of paragraphs (b) and (c). What is their effect?

Mr. McLARTY: The effect of paragraph (b) is, it applies only to those who have applied or who shall, prior to the taking of the vote, apply under the national war services regulations, sections 18 and 19, for exemption or postponement of military training. If my hon. friend will refer to those regulations, I believe he will find that section 18 applies to Doukhobors and Mennonites, and section 19 to conscientious objectors. It was deemed desirable to follow that form so as to identify clearly those affected by this disqualification.

In connection with the matter of race, or who would be covered by paragraph (c), I would say there is only one province in Canada which has passed legislation disqualifying any person whose origin is in a country at present at war with Canada: that province is British Columbia, and my hon. friend is quite correct in his interpretation of it. I do not think I can be more specific than that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then this refers concretely only to those whose racial origin is Japanese?

Mr. McLARTY: Correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But there is an exception to that, namely, those who served in the military, naval or air forces of Canada in the war of 1914-1918. Is there any information as to how many Japanese nationals there are who would have the right to vote under that?

Mr. McLARTY: That matter was brought up in the special committee by the hon. member for Cariboo. He went to some trouble to find the number who would be involved. He advises me that the number involved is 43.

Mr. TURGEON: And they will not be at their own polling division and therefore not entitled to vote.

Mr. NEILL: It applies to Chinamen in some provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With respect to section 18 of the national war services regulations 1940, which applies to Doukhobors and Mennonites, if a young Doukhobor is called up under the regulations and applies for postponement, under those regulations he gets postponement but he has to perform certain other services or duties. If he applies for a ballot in this plebiscite he will get the ballot.

Mr. STIRLING: In eight provinces.

Mr. McLARTY: Under section 5.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But there is some regulation in British Columbia.

Mr. STIRLING: Yes. Paragraph (j) cuts him out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then in eight of nine provinces if he applies for the ballot he gets it and is entitled to vote, but loses his right to postponement. There is not one chance in a hundred that that young man will ever ask for a ballot, but it is left wide open for his father and his mother and his sisters and his cousins and his aunts to get a ballot and do all the dirty work he might have done.

Mr. McLARTY: If I might interject a remark there, this subsection to which my hon. friend is referring applies only to the extent that the application has already been made, or will be made before the plebiscite is held. I think the argument he intends to direct to the committee might come appropriately under section 5.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But I think we have to read the two together. The young Doukhobor is unlikely to come forward and vote, but all his relatives who are of non-military age will have the right to vote. Did the minister consider excluding those people? They are now excluded in British Columbia by virtue of provincial legislation, but I am thinking of other provinces. These people are conscientious objectors. It is against their religious tenets to fight. Why should they be allowed to vote on a question of war? Has the minister thought of that; and, if so, what is the answer? Why should they be allowed to vote? Why should the relatives of that young man who will not fight, who will not ask for a ballot for fear he will lose his postponement, be allowed to vote on a question of this kind?

Mr. TURGEON: May I say a word before the minister does. I have personal knowledge of one case—and I should think there would be more—of a young man who is a conscientious objector. His father is a seriously wounded veteran of the last war. Because that young lad is a conscientious objector you would not stop that seriously wounded veteran and his wife from voting?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the case I have in mind at all. That is not under section 18; that is under section 19, and I am not referring to section 19. I am referring to the sect known as the Doukhobors. Why should they be allowed to vote?

Mr. TURGEON: They are not in British Columbia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am told they are in eight out of nine provinces.

Mr. POWER: No one has ever defined what a Doukhobor is. I have been trying to find that out for years. It is not a race; it is not a religion; it is not a sect—

Mr. NEILL: Oh, yes, it is.

Mr. POWER: I have not been able to get anyone to tell me just what a Doukhobor is.

Mr. STIRLING: Surely that is the reason why this description was given some years ago, with the orders in council enumerated. Unquestionably it is a sect.

Mr. BOUCHER: It seems to me there is something of an anomaly as between (b) of subsection 2 of section 4, and section 5. It will be noticed that section 5 refers to any person who shall have voted at the plebiscite taken under the provisions of this bill, and provides that such person shall be ineligible to apply for or to be granted, on his application or on the application of another, postponement under the regulations. Paragraph (b) of subsection 2 of section 4 provides that every person who shall have applied personally —the word "personally" is not there, but that is the meaning—for a postponement, shall not be eligible to vote. In other words, we have one section saying that a man who has personally applied for postponement shall not be allowed to vote. Then in another section we say that a man who personally, or through an agent, has applied for a postponement, is in a different category. Therefore I say that if the wording of section 5 conveys the intention of this house, the same wording should be inserted in paragraph (b), which should provide that every person who shall have applied personally, or through someone else, for postponement, shall be ineligible to vote. I think the argument in the one case applies equally to the other. I should like to bring that to the attention of the minister, and to ask why the wording of the two sections should be different.

[Mr. Turgeon.]

Mr. McLARTY: Under paragraph (b) of subsection 2 of section 4 it is provided that the application for postponement either is in now or will be in before the vote on the plebiscite. It does not matter whether the application is made by the man himself or by another person; the application is in. In section 5 the provision relates to those who, subsequently to the taking of the plebiscite, may apply for postponement notwithstanding the fact that they voted.

Mr. BOUCHER: If that were the meaning I would quite agree with the Secretary of State, but actually paragraph (b) says, "every person who shall have applied." I say a man may not have applied himself but someone else may have applied on his behalf, and under this section he would not be disqualified. That is the point that is brought out in section 5.

Mr. McLARTY: I think under paragraph (b) the man has to apply personally, bearing in mind the very grounds that are laid down for postponement. An application would have to be made on those grounds, and it would have to be made personally. I wonder whether my hon. friend would object if, instead of dealing with section 5 at the moment, we leave the point he has raised for the time being, and I shall endeavour to deal with it when we come to section 5.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Very good.

Mr. MacNICOL: Some time ago I asked the minister a question with regard to Japanese nationals. Under this bill are Japanese barred from voting in Ontario, Quebec, or any other province?

Mr. McLARTY: The answer would be yes.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Paragraph (a) of subsection 2 of section 4 provides that those disqualified from voting shall include:

(a) every person who at the date fixed as polling day at the plebiscite is detained or interned under the defence of Canada regulations.

I think every hon. member will realize that those who are detained or interned under the defence of Canada regulations fall roughly into two groups, those more or less pro-fascist and those more or less anti-fascist in their ideas. It is with particular reference to the anti-fascists that I should like to ask a question. These anti-fascists, who have already presented a petition to this house, have stated in no uncertain terms their desire to support the government's plebiscite, to vote in the affirmative on the question. These particular anti-fascists are neither enemies nor aliens. They are Canadian citizens; and I should feel that it was a serious miscarriage of justice if these men were not allowed the privilege of voting in the affirmative on this plebiscite. I wonder whether the minister could give me any assurance that this particular group of men, interned under these regulations, would have the privilege of voting affirmatively on this plebiscite.

Mr. McLARTY: I am afraid I would be unable to give the assurance for which the hon. member asks. I am afraid I could not give any assurance as to who would vote in the affirmative on the ballot that will be submitted. However, I know the hon. member will realize—and I am not trying to take lightly her question—that, after all, if a person is interned, irrespective of the nature of his sympathies which caused him to be interned, it would scarcely be a regular or proper procedure to allow him to vote on a question of such serious import.

Mr. FAIR: Subsection 2 of section 4 reads:

(2) The persons disqualified from voting as ordinary voters at the plebiscite shall be those persons disqualified from voting under the provisions of paragraphs (d) to (k), both inclusive, and paragraph (m) of subsection two of section fourteen of the Dominion Elections Act 1938. . . .

I have particular reference to paragraph (k) of section 14 of the Dominion Elections Act, which reads as follows:

(k) in any province, every person who is an inmate of an institution which is maintained by any government or municipality for the housing and maintenance of the poor, if such person is by the law of that province disqualified from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of that province, and did not serve in the military, naval or air forces of Canada in the war of 1914-1918.

I was born poor, as I believe we all were. When we die we shall all be in the same class again. But some of us to-day are in fairly comfortable circumstances, while others are fabulously rich. Others again are so poor that they have to be crowded together in institutions and supported by some government or municipality. I do not feel that we are dealing justly with these people. As I have pointed out on other occasions, if they had been given that to which they were entitled during their lifetime, they would not now have to be in institutions of this kind. We are sending men and materials overseas to fight for democracy, and I should like to see democracy practised at home so that those who come back will have something worth coming back to. They should not have the spectacle of seeing perhaps their fathers, mothers, brothers or sisters put away in these institutions and being deprived of their right to vote. In order to bring this matter before the committee—and I hope to get a favourable decision—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Marshall):

That line 21 in subsection 2 of section 4 be amended to read:
"under the provisions of paragraph (d) to (j), both inclusive."

If this amendment is carried—and I earnestly hope it will be—it will have the effect of giving to the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and British Columbia the same rights as are extended to the citizens of the other five provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What provinces permit persons in the institutions referred to in paragraph (k) to vote?

Mr. McLARTY: They are estopped from voting in the provinces mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The other five provinces allow them to vote.

Amendment (Mr. Fair) negatived: yeas, 12; nays, 57.

Mr. STIRLING: I think it was agreed that paragraph (i) of subsection 2 of section 14 of the Dominion Elections Act refers to the Japanese race so far as it is effective in Canada. If that is the case, to whom does paragraph (c) in this section refer?

Mr. McLARTY: Paragraph (i) of subsection 2 of section 14 of the elections act applies to Japanese in British Columbia. By virtue of the additional section in this bill it is extended to those throughout Canada whose origin is that of an enemy country.

Mr. STIRLING: Paragraph (i) will apply to all nine provinces.

Subsection 2 agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Persons who have voted not to be exempted from military service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister was going to make a statement on this section.

Mr. McLARTY: There may be other hon. members who wish to speak on this section, but if not, I should like to deal somewhat carefully with the point raised by the leader of the opposition and to give an exact explanation in answer to his inquiry. It will be noted that this section does not exclude anyone from voting; but, on the other hand, if any person does vote, he is precluded from any subsequent postponement or exemption on the grounds set out in sections 18 and 19 of the national war services regulations. It leaves it optional with any voter whether he shall or shall not vote.

I think I should put this on the record because information was asked for by the leader of the opposition. I have no objection whatever to doing it, but of course I do not want to delay the passage of my own bill. It is urged, on the one hand, that the section is too rigorous in that it precludes any subsequent claim for exemption to anyone who has voted and who may be liable for service under the national war services regulations. On the other hand, it is claimed that it is too generous. I think that is the suggestion by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not for the man himself, but for his kin.

Mr. McLARTY: I was going to follow that up. It allows to vote those of a particular religious faith or who are conscientious objectors but who, on other grounds, are not capable of performing military service.

I should like to deal with the first suggestion. I believe it can be well admitted that those who are conscientious objectors are so because of their unwillingness to take human life and that they are willing to perform all other services, except this one, which might be required of any citizen. But in dealing with this phase of the matter, if you refer to the specific question itself you will find that there is only one particular pledge which the government has entered into and from which it seeks relief, namely, the matter of military service. This military service does, unfortunately, involve the taking of human life.

This is not a general election. Other considerations would apply in a general election which do not apply here. This is a plebiscite on one definite and specific question, and that question relates to military service, which those of military age might require to answer, but in the answering of which they are not vitally affected. For example, if the answer given by such were yes, what does it mean? It means that those who themselves are able to perform military service, but who on account of religious beliefs do not feel free to do so, are allowed to determine whether or not the government shall be freed from its pledge given in regard to one specific matter. In other words, the answer yes means that while they themselves are not involved, they are quite willing that those who do not hold the same religious beliefs might be compelled to assume obligations which they themselves are not prepared to assume.

On the other hand, if the answer is no, what does that involve? It involves this: Those who are capable of bearing arms, but who on account of their religious beliefs believe that the taking of human life even in war time is unwarranted, simply say, "while that is our belief, at the same time we wish to restrain the government from breaking a pledge given to those who do not enjoy similar beliefs and whose convictions in the matter of military service are not the same as our own." Consequently, it would be unfair to allow the vote to those of military age who, while enjoying military capacity, are still free to claim exemption, no matter what the outcome of the vote may be. Therefore, the section has been framed in the manner in which it appears.

On the other hand it is urged that everyone whose religious belief, irrespective of whether he or she is capable of military service, bars them from military service, should be barred from voting as well. It has been pointed out to this committee that many of those who hold these beliefs are willing to do any other service, but they object to the taking of human life. That means this: Those incapable of bearing arms are willing to do everything that is physically within their power to do. They are in the same position as those other classes of the community who are incapable of bearing arms by reason of age or physical weakness.

To deprive them of voting would be contrary to the provisions of the Naturalization Act. That act may be more or less regarded as a contract between the Dominion of Canada and those who become citizens of this country. Let me read section 5 of that act:

> A person to whom a certificate of naturalization is granted by the minister shall, subject to the provisions of this act, be entitled to all political and other rights, powers and privileges, be subject to all obligations, duties and liabilities, to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject, and as from the date of his naturalization have to all intents and purposes the status of a natural-born British subject.

The basis for this provision is that those who vote shall be subject to all the obligations, duties and liabilities to which a natural-born British subject is entitled or subject. On the other hand, the obligations, duties and liabilities will be no greater on those enjoying such obligations, duties and liabilities than they are on a natural-born British subject. In other words, in placing this section in the bill, the government is not breaking faith but keeping faith. That is why the negative provision is put therein. It is not disfranchising those who will be subject to the obligations, duties and liabilities but it is saying that those who assume the right of franchise will be subject to the obligations, duties and liabilities.

Mr. POULIOT: I agree to a certain extent with the principle which the minister has just enunciated, but the same principle should apply to all those who are described as ordinarily resident in Canada. Although it is not so provided in specific terms, the mobilization act is not applied to those young men, refugees and others, who are British citizens but are not domiciled in Canada; in other words, they are here only for the duration of the war. I do not see why those people should have the right to vote if they are not themselves to be subject to conscription. It is the rule with all military boards not to put these British subjects into the Canadian army by virtue of the mobilization act. Therefore, how could they have the right to vote to send others overseas by virtue of any conscription law? That would be most unfair. I have already spoken on this subject on other occasions, and I now bring it to the attention of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State who, I hope, will reach the same decision with regard to these refugees or British citizens temporarily resident in Canada as they do with respect to Mennonites, Doukhobors and conscientious objectors. I hope that the section will be made to apply to them so that they will have the right to vote only if they are to be available to the army. I should like to have an answer from the minister.

Mr. McLARTY: I did not quite catch the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata. I am afraid that it would be extremely difficult for me to amplify what I have already said on this particular section. It is not that I wish in any way to evade an answer, but I find that it is a little difficult for me to give one.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In his explanation of the rights of conscientious objectors, Doukhobors and Mennonites the minister made the statement that while they are not required to give military service they are required to give a like amount of service of a non-military character. I would point out that that is not my interpretation of the regulations, as I read the regulations, those who are conscientious objectors, Mennonites and Doukhobors enjoy a higher right of citizenship than do any other British subjects in Canada in that when they are called up under the mobilization act they are required to serve, building roads and the like, for a period of not more than four months and then they are through, although all others who are called up to serve in the military forces have to serve for the duration of the war. As a matter of fact, that very circumstance is causing a great deal of difficulty throughout western Canada in that conscientious objectors, by serving for a few months in a camp or in one of the national parks, have finished their service to the state for the duration of the war, whereas the man who is not a conscientious objector must serve as long as the war lasts.

Mr. POULIOT: I should just like to make this clear. The mobilization act, of course, applies to all British subjects in this country except those who are not ordinarily resident in Canada, which means that those who are domiciled here are subject to conscription and those who are here but not domiciled in Canada are not subject to conscription. That is the real distinction that exists, although the language of the statute itself is rather vague. My point cannot be evaded. It is just as clear as crystal or spring water. It is that when these young blokes of military age come here to get away from their own country or from any theatre of war and be secure in Canada, I do not see why they should have the right to vote to send others to fight overseas in their stead. That is my point.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask my hon. friend the member for Davenport to sit down and wait until I am through.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was going to ask, Mr. Chairman, if "blokes" is a proper appellation to apply to people coming here from England to train for service.

Mr. POULIOT: I am fond of cockneys but I do not like blokes. I have no objection to giving shelter to any man who needs it, but on the other hand I do not want our Canadian citizens to be controlled by those who are afraid to defend their own country, and who come here for shelter and are given the privilege of citizenship, when they are not at the same time willing to assume the obligations and duties of British subjects. That is my point. To allow them to vote would be unfair, and I know I can rely on my leader the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State to take time to weigh this consideration. You cannot have a two-way policy, a policy of good citizenship for the men who are willing to fight for England, and another policy for those who do not want to fight for their country and come here for shelter. It is time that this should come to a stop, and I rely on the fairness of the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State, and their colleagues to settle the matter in justice to the parties concerned.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, may I have your ruling whether an hon. member is right in calling young men coming—

Mr. POULIOT: The word is found in the dictionary.

Mr. MacNICOL: I ask you, sir, if the hon. member is right—

Mr. POULIOT: It does not apply to any race in particular.

Mr. MacNICOL: —in calling young men from the old country who come out here to train by the name "bloke"?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman was not speaking of the chair or of any member of the house. I refer to May's Parliamentary Practice, twelfth edition, page 99, and citation 294:

> If a member should say nothing disrespectful to the house or the chair, or personally approbrious to other members, or in violation of other rules of the house he may state whatever he thinks fit in debate, however offensive it may be to the feelings, or injurious to the character, of individuals.

That is why, I am afraid, I cannot rule out of order the remarks addressed to somebody outside this house.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would ask the hon. member for Témiscouata if he can give us any particulars of the people to whom he refers. I have this in mind, that over the last two years, since the war broke out, or shortly afterwards, people have not been permitted to leave Great Britain without a special licence or special permit. I wondered whether he had any knowledge of any number of persons of this description to whom he referred, because I must say that if there are people who have come to this country to escape military or other duties in Great Britain, of course they should not be permitted to vote here if our own conscientious objectors are not permitted to vote—and they are not—and they should be treated on all fours with our own people. I should like to know whether the hon. member for Témiscouata has any definite knowledge of people of that description.

An hon. MEMBER: He has not.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank my hon. friend for his remarks—he spoke with fairness—and I will give him any information that he wants. If we were to go together to the eastern townships, and many other places, we could see many of these people. But I will speak to him later about it.

Mr. LEADER: I feel that I shall have to support the contention of the hon. member for Lake Centre and our old friend the hon. member for Témiscouata. There are in my constituency a number of Mennonites—I do not believe we have any Doukhobors—and I feel that if these people, who have come to Canada and now enjoy the rights of citizenship under the protection of our government, refuse to fight for their adopted country, they are not entitled to a vote on a matter of this importance. I believe they are amply protected under the clause—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege; I did not make any such statement. I think the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood me. I was not dealing with the question of voting; I was dealing entirely with the question of conscientious objectors completing their service by four months' work instead of being required to do work throughout the period of the war. I did not touch upon the question of the propriety of their right to vote.

Mr. LEADER: I am sorry. I did not mean to misinterpret the remarks of the hon. member. But I feel I am right in offering the suggestion that these men are amply protected. They can vote if they want to, but they lose their right to appeal for exemption, and I think that is using them fairly.

Section agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Manner of voting by qualified voter whose name is not on the official list of voters.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I spoke on this section yesterday, and suggested that as the section stands it provides a wide-open door for potential wrongdoers. It provides that those whose names are not on the voters' lists have, on the day the plebiscite vote is taken, as a result of being vouched for by someone ordinarily resident within the polling division, the right to vote. The penalty section leaves the person committing an offence under this section quite an easy way of escape, in that it says:

> (3) Any voter who vouches for an applicant voter knowing that such applicant voter for any reason is disqualified. . . .

—is guilty of an offence. In other words, any wrongdoer who wants to assist in getting large numbers of individuals to vote on the plebiscite would simply be required to swear a declaration, and he would be guilty of no offence under subsection 3 unless the prosecution could affirmatively establish that he knew that such applicant voter was disqualified, although he would be liable to perjury. In the discussion this evening as to the necessity of the production of the national registration certificate, the committee decided that such should not generally be necessary. I suggested yesterday, and I repeat, that in order to close the door against the possibility of any wrongdoing, or any general wrongdoing, being committed under this section, all who desire to vote and whose names are not on the voters' list should be required to produce their national registration certificates before the poll clerk or the returning officer. Many abuses which might otherwise arise under this section would thereby be avoided to a great extent. I trust the minister will see fit to consent to an amendment to this section, making it a prerequisite that those whose names are not on the voters' list shall be required to produce their national registration certificates before being granted the right to vote.

Mr. McLARTY: I thank the hon. member for Lake Centre for having called this matter to my attention earlier in the evening. I stated that I thought that when we came to section 7 the suggestion which had been made to this committee, namely, that those who had to be vouched for should produce registration certificates, would be a commendable proposal. I do believe, however, that we would be wise to limit the provision to urban centres, that is, where the population is over 3,500. I do not need to repeat the argument which was advanced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar as to the rural areas. I suggest:

> That section 7, subsection (2), be amended by adding, after the word "oath" in subparagraph (b), the word "and", and by adding another clause as follows:
> (c) in urban polling divisions only upon producing for inspection the registration certificate issued to such person under the National Registration Regulations, 1940.

I would ask the Minister of Agriculture if he would be good enough to move that.

Mr. GARDINER: I so move.

Mr. CHURCH: This is a most dangerous innovation to have in any plebiscite or elections act. It was tried in New York state a few years ago and led to all kinds of impersonation and intimidation, especially among voters who had been only a short time in the country, some of whom could neither read nor write. The section is one that should never be in the act. In the first place, there is nothing to prevent a voter from voting in every riding in Toronto, going from one riding to another, as long as he can find a man who knows him and vouches for him, taking an affidavit or making a declaration. We know what that means. The returning officer has no jurisdiction. I have never seen such a thing in any elections act. The registration card is required in municipal elections; otherwise you cannot vote. As I say, I have never seen such a provision in any elections act and I have read a great many statutes.

Mr. McLARTY: I wonder whether the hon. member just heard the amendment that was moved. If they are vouched for in urban areas, they will have to produce registration cards.

Mr. CHURCH: Even admitting what the minister says, the principle is all wrong, of having such a clause in an elections act. It will lead to all sorts of confusion and it is an innovation that should not be allowed in any British legislature. Any man who has not been living in a polling subdivision for more time than this is not entitled to vote. Taking into account those who are on relief and those who are away, besides those who have moved out of the subdivision, I suggest that this provision should not be allowed. It is not allowed in connection with voting on property rights. Why should it be inserted in such a measure as this? It is beyond my understanding. I suggest that it is a grave mistake for this legislature to adopt such a principle.

Mr. MacNICOL: Before section 7 passes, I should like the minister to tell the committee why the present elections act has been departed from in this particular as applied to the cities. I understand that in the rural areas if an elector is off the voters' list he can be vouched for by someone who is on the list, which I presume would conform to paragraph (a) of section 2. But I do not know of any elections act which allows a man not on the voters' list to be given a ballot on taking the appropriate oath himself. I do not know what the appropriate oath is. There is some merit in section 7, because it does provide for folks who are left off the list. In the recent York South by-election there were thousands who were left off the list, whole streets, whole apartment houses, and the residents there were not able to vote. Perhaps it should have been their duty to see that they were on the list. Had they done so, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidate might have been defeated. However, one cannot tell how people would have voted. The hon. member interrupts me, but he does not know. He got 10,000 to 12,000 Liberal votes and that is why he is here, but he will not get them in a general election. I may say, Mr. Chairman, I am a little fed up with having it said that York South voted C.C.F. It did not; it voted Liberal plus C.C.F. However, coming back to the question, I would ask the minister why the regular urban qualifications of voters have been abandoned in this section.

Mr. McLARTY: I can give the reasons very briefly and they are extremely practical ones. The first one is to save time, and the second is to save expense. There is nothing new in this procedure. It was adopted in rural sections and has been in existence for some time, being applied to municipalities up to 10,000 population. Prior to 1923 it applied in such cities as Edmonton and Calgary—rather substantial ones—and worked satisfactorily. When the matter was being considered in committee the chief electoral officer estimated that it would save at least a week in the taking of the plebiscite if this system were followed. He now advises me it would save a longer time than that. In addition, it will eliminate the necessity of a court of revision, the cost of which would be $200,000 extra; and if the list were printed after the court of revision was held, there would be an additional cost of $350,000. The penalties provided by the section are severe—at least as severe as the penalties provided in the elections act—and I suggest that with the amendment which has now been moved, the requirment of vouching and the necessary declaration, and the production of the registration card, the opportunities for fraudulent voting are pretty well reduced to a minimum. However, the main reasons, in answer to the hon. member for Davenport, are the two that I have mentioned—time and expense.

Mr. CHURCH: Is a man allowed to vote only once? In the declaration is he required to state that he has not voted before? In the old electoral law a man could vote where he had property. In my first vote I voted in York South because I had a vacant lot and I voted in East Toronto as a resident. Is it a case of one man, only one vote?

Mr. McLARTY: The answer is yes.

On section 8—Notice of result of plebiscite published in Canada Gazette.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: Is any provision being made for members of this house to vote? If the house is in session, many members will be away from their polling divisions.

Mr. McLARTY: The situation will pretty well take care of itself. If they reside in Ottawa for twenty-eight days before the plebiscite, they will be entitled to vote in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. GRAYDON: The sections have been carried pretty rapidly, and I should like to ask a question on clause 6. I have no doubt it must be covered by the language of the clause, but it is not clear to me. There are a number of nurses in England at the moment attached to some part of the corps there, and I am wondering whether this language would cover those nursing sisters over there.

Mr. McLARTY: Clause 6 to which the hon. member refers was very carefully drawn in consultation with the judge advocate general in the Department of National Defence. It was drawn broadly enough so that all branches of the service would be covered, and I am advised that the classes to which he refers would be covered by this section.

Mr. CHURCH: Is that to be just an obituary notice before its final burial in the archives? I think so.

On section 9—Regulations by governor in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This I think is the section under which the regulations may be discussed. I have gone through the regulations for ordinary voters but confess that I have not been able to go over the service regulations. I have one suggestion to press, about the numbered ballots. I think the minister agreed to look after that. I do not think it can be done by way of amendment. Will he give an undertaking that the regulations will be changed in some manner, and put that on the record?

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be glad to do so. I gave an undertaking last night to the hon. leader of the opposition. If he would like to have it placed on the record, I will see that it is placed on Hansard.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In connection with the hours of voting, regulation 18, for ordinary voters, clause 5, provides that the voting hours shall be from eight to six, but I think it was stated yesterday that they would be extended to seven o'clock in the evening. There was some discussion from the industrial point of view and that of the farmers of rural Canada that the hours should be extended until eight in the evening. Many of these industrial workers and farmers are labouring under a handicap in producing food and materials for the war effort, all of which are very necessary. We should do all we can to assist them, and extending the time until eight o'clock in the evening would help them in many respects to cast their votes. Has the minister given thought to that?

Mr. McLARTY: Yes, it was given consideration. I might mention that in the original bill the voting hours had been fixed at eight to six, and the special committee after consideration decided it would be wise to extend the time until seven o'clock at night. That makes a rather long day, and the pay for poll clerks is not as large as at a general election. The thought was that unless we are prepared for a substantial increase in expense, the hours should not be extended further.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I call attention to the fact that in a great many of the war industries men work until six o'clock at night. These industries are so far from their homes and polling subdivisions that it would be impossible for thousands of them to reach the polling subdivision in one hour. I know that the law allows them two hours in which to vote, but that provision is seldom invoked, and I doubt if it would be in this case. If you close the polls at seven o'clock, you will automatically disfranchise a great many of those working in war industries.

Mr. McLARTY: In view of the observations made and the fact that the government is anxious to secure the largest possible vote, I am agreeable to having the regulations amended to keep the polls open from eight in the morning until eight at night.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In the draft regulations for service voters, No. 23 provides:

(1) The vote of every Canadian service voter shall be cast before any commissioned officer. . . .

What about a soldier on leave? He is an ordinary voter, but some deputy returning officers might say he cannot vote except before his commissioned officer.

Mr. McLARTY: My advice is that the man on leave can vote as an ordinary voter at home.

Mr. CHURCH: That is a most dangerous principle.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Should not that be changed, because the minister knows, as we all do, that some deputy returning officers might take exception to that?

Mr. McLARTY: I assure the hon. member that consideration will be given to his suggestion. After all, the regulations are not being passed to-night.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): On page 4 of the same regulations provision is made that there shall be six scrutineers to count the votes; the Prime Minister to appoint two, the leader of the opposition two, and the other groups two between them. It also says that two have to be for the negative and two for the affirmative. The leader of the opposition says he is for it. What about the Prime Minister?

Mr. McLARTY: I think he has made the same declaration.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What kind of box are you in?

Mr. McLARTY: As far as possible the appointment of scrutineers will be the same as for the taking of the overseas vote at the last election. There may be some difficulty, but I do not think the leader of the opposition will be embarrassed about finding some man overseas who may not agree with him but still could act as a proper scrutineer. I do not think there will be any practical difficulty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The matter of scrutineers at civilian polls is also important. As I recall the regulations, those who are supporting the affirmative are entitled to have two representatives present, and those supporting the negative are entitled to have two. Does the minister think that is going to be very effective? I know the question of scrutineers at the civilian polls is rather difficult. I do not think it is my duty to suggest scrutineers. I should like the minister to give consideration to this. In my province at all events the men appointed deputy returning officers are usually of a very good type. If a man is considered to be below par, shall I say, people know about it; representations are quietly made to the returning officer, and he looks into it and in many cases will agree that that man should not be a deputy returning officer. I think the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Hill), at whom I am looking, will agree with that. And we have practically no election frauds.

Mr. GRAYDON: Of course that is New Brunswick.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am speaking only of my personal experience. They do not countenance personation. I am sure that the two deputy returning officers at the poll where I am accustomed to work on election day would not allow anything like that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): That applies to all Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I would hope so; I cannot say except from my own personal information. The suggestion I have made is that in the absence of anyone appearing as scrutineer for or against, perhaps the deputy returning officer could be instructed to appoint two competent, qualified voters, to act as scrutineers. That is just a suggestion I throw out, but it is something to which I have given some thought. In an ordinary party election, of course, we all have our own men on whom we rely to see that the law is carried out. Here it is not going to be the duty of any particular person to see that scrutineers are appointed, and I am afraid that in many rural polls no one will be appointed. Certainly they are not going to be paid under this schedule, and they will not spend the whole day there of their own accord. Would the minister give consideration to the appointment of qualified voters at a given poll by the deputy returning officer, in the event that no one is appointed to represent the affirmatives or the negatives? I point out to him, of course, that this may involve a demand for payment. I do not like the idea of paying scrutineers. It ought not to be done; it is a duty that men owe their party, but I am afraid in some cases it is not so considered. However, I just throw that out as a suggestion.

Mr. McLARTY: I quite agree with the leader of the opposition that the method suggested is by no means ideal, and subject to the qualification he offers in regard to the matter of payment I think his suggestion is one to which we can give very serious consideration when the regulations are being drawn up.

Mr. CHURCH: Section 9 gives the governor in council power to make rules and regulations under this statute which will have the force and effect of law. That has been condemned all along the line in Lord Hewart's work, "The New Despotism". Here we have a statute fixing dates, establishing methods, giving the text of the question, stating those who are excepted, providing for the votes of soldiers and so on, and now we are going to hem in this statute with a provision which will permit the governor in council to pass regulations which will have the force of law, under which fines, penalties or imprisonment may be imposed, outside the whole scope of the measure. Do you see where we are heading, Mr. Chairman? We have about four hundred different controllers and boards operating to-day under the War Measures Act. Each of these boards can fine anyone up to $5,000 or impose a year's imprisonment for the breach of a regulation passed by order in council. That is what we have in Canada to-day, government by the bureaucrats. I say we must beware of them, because this is a principle which never should be adopted by any British legislature. Why, the governor in council can change the whole intent of the statute. It can pass rules and regulations, having the force of law, varying everything contained in the first eight sections of this bill, and I wish to protest against it. Under this bureaucratic government these various controllers and boards can impose fines and imprisonment without this high court of parliament knowing anything about it. I do not see the need for this provision. Those who may vote are set out clearly; the time of the vote, the appointment of officers and all that sort of thing are already settled, under the elections act. I think it is all wrong.

Mr. McGREGOR: Will the overseas vote be credited to provinces or ridings, or what has the government in mind in that connection?

Mr. McLARTY: It will be dealt with as suggested the other day, as one vote.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are all the regulations to be passed under this bill included in these two volumes I have in my hand?

Mr. McLARTY: I should think they would be complete. Certainly they are as complete as they can be, bearing in mind the suggestions which have been made to-night, which might lead to some amendment of them.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think that is important, because it has been a very well-known policy of the Liberal party that parliament should decide in all these matters. Here we have a bill composed of ten sections, which are not very long. Then, after the bill is passed by the house, we have a volume of regulations covering one hundred pages, together with a second volume of some thirty pages, and section 9 of this bill states that "the governor in council may, for the purpose of this act, make such regulations as are expedient for the effectual taking of the plebiscite," and so on. Then subsection 3 of section 9 provides:

> Any regulations made under this act shall have the same force and effect as if enacted in this act.

Usually there is a phrase included in sections of this kind providing that such regulations as are made must not be inconsistent with the act itself, but there is no such limiting clause here. The minister has not been listening to me; he has been in a very earnest conversation with the two hon. gentlemen sitting in front of him. That may be quite interesting, but for the moment I think the sections of this bill are more important. I have been pointing out that there is no limit on the regulations which may be passed by the governor in council under this bill. They may pass regulations that are inconsistent with it.

Mr. McLARTY: If my hon. friend will refer to subsection 2, he will see a limitation there.

Mr. MacINNIS: Subsection 2 reads:

Such regulations shall, as near as may be—

That is pretty wide, isn't it?

—conform to the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, with such additions and modifications as may be deemed necessary, and shall include special provisions for the taking of the votes of Canadian service voters.

If the regulations were included in these two volumes, and if they had come before the committee, then there would be no great objection to them, but here we are passing a short bill in which we give the governor in council power to extend it to whatever extent they may deem fit. As I have pointed out already, the usual phrase, "regulations not inconsistent with this act" is not included in the section at all. I claim that this power is too wide to give any government, particularly a government that is continually claiming that parliament is going to decide. Parliament certainly is not deciding here. Parliament is getting a mere outline of the bill, and the government takes the power to extend it as far and as wide as it may deem fit.

Mr. McLARTY: May I say just a word in reply to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver East, and especially his specific reference to inserting the words "not inconsistent with this act." I suggest that that would have very little, if any, meaning if put in the bill. What he probably has in mind as to the regulations would not be inconsistent with the elections act in which those regulations occur. The intention to cover that is clearly stated in subsection 2 of section 9, which states:

Such regulations shall, as near as may be—

Mr. MacINNIS: How near is "as near as may be"?

Mr. McLARTY: That is about as approximate as you can come, keeping in mind that one is an election and the other is a plebiscite. In other words, in this case there are not candidates running, and it is necessary that there be some variation by reason of the changed circumstances. This is the clause that was inserted in the 1898 act. When my hon. friend deals with penalties, I suggest that there is not a single penalty under the regulations which has not been passed upon by the parliament of Canada. In other words, the objection which has been raised that penalties are included without parliamentary sanction cannot apply in this case. I believe that there is no intention of amending those regulations which have already been placed before the special committee of this house except to the extent that may be necessary in order to make the same workable arrangement, or within the limitations of the undertakings given to this committee to-night.

Mr. GLADSTONE: To revert for a moment to the hours of voting, in federal, provincial and municipal elections the vote polled between eight and nine c'clock in the morning is practically negligible; in fact there is only a small vote cast during the entire forenoon. From eight in the morning until eight in the evening makes a long day. The remuneration for deputy returning officers and poll clerks is to be less for this plebiscite, and since many people are employed on war work who were available on previous occasions, there may be difficulty in securing help. It will be especially hard on women who are occupying these positions to have to work a twelve-hour day. I would suggest that it would be better to have the opening hour at nine o'clock. There is no necessity with this plebiscite of having a compilation of the returns the same evening as is the case with other elections. I think an eleven-hour day would be more advantageous.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask just why the government has decided that the soldier vote shall be counted en bloc. In the last dominion election the soldier vote was counted according to constituency. We over here think it is desirable to know how the soldiers vote by constituencies. I should like to know how my soldier constituents vote. If the soldier vote is counted en bloc, it will not be possible to know how the sentiment of the soldiers is spread. No good reason has been given why this is being done. In fact I do not think any good reason can be given. I ask the minister to give some further consideration to this matter. I shall want to say something on subsection 3 when he has given me an explanation.

Mr. McLARTY: The only reason that was suggested was to have a practicable working out of the plan for taking the vote of the soldiers. In an ordinary election where candidates are running, the votes would necessarily have to be referable to a particular constituency, but in this plebiscite it is simply a matter of answering yes or no. As I suggested the other day, the procedure contemplated is to segregate them in lots of 500, take out the inner envelope and put it in the ballot box. I wonder whether the effort of obtaining the information desired by the hon. gentleman is worth the trouble it entails. There was no subtle reason for not doing it the other way; it was just a matter of convenience.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite appreciate the argument the minister has made with regard to constituencies, but that would not hold good with regard to provinces. Why could we not have the vote summarized by provinces? That would not be quite as difficult, and it should be possible to do it. I ask the minister to give consideration to this when he is considering the regulations.

Mr. McLARTY: I shall be glad to. I do not know just exactly what it would involve, but it certainly would be more simple to do it by provinces than by constituencies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be a compromise anyway.

Mr. McLARTY: I assure my hon. friend that consideration will be given to it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is about all I can ask. Then on the question of regulations by order in council, I pointed out long ago that this power of making legislative regulations is wrong. The power to make regulations for instructional and interpretative reasons is quite proper, and that is the principle in the elections act. Subsection 2 reads:

> Such regulations shall, as near as may be, conform to the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, with such additions and modifications as may be deemed necessary, and shall include special provisions for the taking of the votes of Canadian service voters.

Necessarily there will be some substantive enactments under these regulations as they are now. They may be changed at any time. Is there any finality to these regulations? When they are once proclaimed, they may be changed. I do not suggest that they would be changed for any ulterior purposes; it might be necessary to change them to make them completely operative. That is just the danger of having this sort of thing in regulations, and I want to register once more my protest against doing it in this way. Under the elections act the regulations are largely directional or instructive. The great bulk of the law surrounding the taking of this plebiscite, for both the civilian and the soldier vote, is to be found in the regulations. The statute that we are considering to-day is merely an enabling statute giving the power. That is all it is, with certain limitations as to qualification, disqualification, the character of the ballot and that sort of thing. The whole procedure is provided for in the regulations which do not come before parliament. They are enacting regulations, and therefore they are objectionable. I do not intend to hold up the bill, but I think this is the third time that I have pointed out that this is an objectionable principle in legislation. For a party that used to howl against government by order in council, as hon. gentlemen opposite did from 1930 to 1935, it is a complete reversal of form. It is not correct, but I do not have any hopes that my protest will be of any avail.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister for a clarification of one point in connection with the appointment of enumerators, deputy returning officers and poll clerks? Do I understand that the regulations here with respect to these appointments follow in every respect the appointments made in 1940 under the Dominion Elections Act? If so, I would ask this further question. I have not the particular section under my hand, but I recall that there was a special section in the act whereby the chief electoral officer was empowered, in cases where there was a floating population and for other special reasons, to declare a certain municipality or division to be an urban section in what otherwise was a rural constituency. During the 1940 election a number of these urban municipalities were created by virtue of the latitude thus allowed to the chief electoral officer. I would ask the minister if in taking the vote on the plebiscite the same procedure will be followed as in the 1940 election with respect to creating these urban municipalities in rural divisions, or will someone have to make application to the chief plebiscite officer for the purpose of having a particular division made an urban one instead of a rural one as in 1940?

Mr. McLARTY: I understand that the procedure included in the regulations is the same as for the election of 1940.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean that we shall have to go through the same procedure again in order to have a particular part of a rural constituency declared urban after it has already been so declared in the election of 1940, upon evidence submitted?

Mr. McLARTY: I understand that the procedure will not have to be repeated, but that if the divison was urban in 1940, it will be urban for the purpose of taking this plebiscite.

Mr. MacNICOL: Some days ago the newspapers had the statement that the northwest territories, particularly the settlement of Yellowknife, would vote on the plebiscite, but I do not notice it in the bill.

Mr. McLARTY: That is provided in section 2, paragraph (d).

Mr. SHAW: I do not want to prolong the debate unnecessarily, but I do feel that there is one other matter which has thus far not been discussed and which should be given consideration. I am not sure that what I am about to say deals particularly with section 9, but it seems to be a case of either section 9 or never. I have in mind the question of an educational campaign and regulations that may be brought down regarding, say, a government-sponsored campaign. A few weeks ago the press dispatches indicated that the government was at that time contemplating purchasing radio time from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as was done in the last general election, and that certain time periods would be allocated to the various groups in this house for the purpose of expressing their views on the plebiscite to the people of Canada. I have not heard the matter discussed since then, but if the government are contemplating such a step, there are a number of things which should be borne in mind.

First, if moneys are to be taken out of public funds for the purpose of sponsoring any type of educational campaign the radio time should not be allotted only to government leaders, but all other groups in this house should be allotted a certain portion of time—I might even go so far as to say an equal amount of time. I would ask the Secretary of State if it is the government's intention to purchase time on the Canadian broadcasting network for the purpose of carrying on an educational campaign and, if so, what method is to be followed in allocating time to the various groups in this house?

Mr. McLARTY: I think the only reply I can give to the hon. member is that so far no consideration has been given to the point which he raises or the campaign he suggests, but I have no doubt that when consideration is given, if it is given, his observations will be borne in mind.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Section 9 says that the regulations for the taking of the plebiscite shall conform as nearly as possible to the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act. Will the procedure under the Dominion Elections Act be used in setting up the machinery for taking the vote? I have in mind the selection of returning officers for the various constituencies. Will the 1940 returning officers be used, or has the government in mind selecting a fresh list? Has the government considered asking the Canadian Legion and other national organizations to make suggestions? I would also ask the minister how he proposes to select the deputy returning officers for the various polls. In the 1940 election a lot of voluntary service was given by service clubs and similar organizations, and I am quite sure it would be possible to get a lot of voluntary service on this occasion. Does the government propose to accept voluntary service, or does it propose to set up a lot of election machinery pretty well on a patronage basis? The public, I am sure, will be resentful if, when a war is on, we propose to spend one and a half million dollars, a large part of which is to be spent on a patronage basis. If the Canadian Legion, service clubs and other organizations interested in public welfare were approached, I believe they would be glad to make suggestions, and their membership might even be willing to give voluntary service in taking the plebiscite vote. How will the election machinery be set up?

Mr. McLARTY: The intention is to have the same returning officers as acted in the election of 1940. There necessarily are some changes under section 8 of the elections act. The returning officers have the appointment of the deputy returning officers, and the deputy returning officers appoint the poll clerks. I believe the suggestion made by the hon. member for Weyburn is one that has been drawn to the attention of this committee, namely, the advantage that will accrue if we take the opportunity of employing as much voluntary help as is available, and I understand that steps are being considered whereby advantage will be taken of that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That just means that all the returning officers are political appointments. They are now. Everyone in New Brunswick is a political supporter of the government, and they will all be paid out of public funds. They will make political appointments. They are there in most cases entirely because of their politics. They are not there because of any special qualifications. The returning officers will appoint the deputy returning officers, who will also be political appointees, and the poll clerks will also be political appointees.

There was an effort made prior to the last federal election to have the nominations of returning officers divided up in a measure. In some constituencies there was, I believe, a break. My colleague tells me that there was. In mine, in the rural districts, the returning officer absolutely refused to appoint anybody but a man of his own selection. In a city or an urban district, I believe there was a provision in the law whereby there was a fifty-fifty break or something like that. Of course, this is a political patronage system, and the government must get away from that, in this connection, just as quickly and as far as they can, if they want to obtain wholehearted support in favour of this plebiscite. I hear some hon. members laugh. I mean every word I say about that. The more partisan a tinge you give to this, the less likely it is to receive the cooperation of the public.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sure of it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I believe there will be a good deal of disappointment at the statement we have just had from the minister. For all that he has tried to make it sound as pleasant as possible, the fact remains that, as the leader of the opposition has said, what we are going to have is a political set-up in the taking of this plebiscite, and it will not be received in a very kindly fashion. I believe that one of the most successful things which was ever done in this country was handled on a cooperative and largely voluntary basis, when the registration was taken in June or July, 1940, at a cost of less than $900,000, over a period of three days. It was done at so low a figure because hundreds of people, irrespective of politics, race or creed, gave their services, thinking they were performing a national duty. That sort of thing should be capitalized upon again. But apparently it is not to be. Some members of the public resent the plebiscite now; they will resent it a great deal more if they have reason to believe that public funds are being used very largely to support patronage. That is what it is going to mean. I have no objection to the same returning officers being used as were employed in 1940, if some attempt is made to pick the deputy returning officers on a non-party basis. Why not ask them to set up non-partisan committees representing different viewpoints in the community, and so get a cooperative endeavour in the district? But if, as the Prime Minister has been asking them to do, all groups in this house go out and try to rally the people of Canada to give a preponderantly affirmative vote, and at the same time the machinery is set up on a purely patronage partisan basis, the two things will gibe very poorly, and a very bad impression will be created throughout the country. To talk of asking a few people here and there to do the work on a voluntary basis is not enough. You must either set it up on a non-partisan basis, and then form representative non-partisan committees in the different districts, or leave it the way the minister has outlined it—which would be a purely pork-barrel affair, and would disappoint the public generally.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the same connection may I say just one word before the Prime Minister speaks. There is the position of enumerator, which is much more important than the others, because that is worth the most money. Are those positions to be filled on a political partisan basis? I suggest to the Prime Minister that he give some consideration to this question if he wants the plebiscite helped along.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was just rising to say that there is nothing that I should deplore more than that anything connected with the taking of the plebiscite could be made an instrument of political patronage. I agree with those who say that it would completely defeat the purpose of obtaining the kind of cooperation which is most desirable. I see no necessity for it, and personally, if it were done in that way, I should abhor the whole business. I did not hear what the Secretary of State said, but I am quite sure that he had not in mind anything of the kind. His references were, I understand, to the appointment of the returning officers, and there has to be consideration given to the selection of certain officers who are already known.

But when it comes to choosing persons for such positions as that of enumerator, of which the leader of the opposition has just spoken, I can see no reason in the world why some arrangement should not be made between the different parties in the house which would satisfy everyone that we desire to have a perfectly impartial administration of the machinery of the plebiscite. Personally I think the citizens of Canada ought to welcome the opportunity of giving their services very largely, if not completely, voluntarily in connection with the taking of the plebiscite. I suggested the other evening that those who are appointed to any position might be told that while there is, perhaps, a fee attached to their services, the government would welcome receiving it back from them as an expression of patriotism in connection with that part of our war effort. I do not think that is too much to ask of the kind of persons who would be best qualified to fill the different offices under this measure. There should be in connection with it as much in the way of voluntary effort as can be obtained with a sense of security, and as much as possible in the way of cooperation of all parties in respect to it. The details of working that out might require a conference between the leaders of the different groups. Certainly, whenever I have heard the matter discussed and in discussing the matter with my colleagues on a prior occasion, that is the view we all had. Reference was made to some recent election in which the enumerators were chosen by the different parties—some from one party, some from the other.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was, I believe, in urban districts, and only in urban districts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Only in urban districts.

Mr. STIRLING: And, in rural districts, in the old-fashioned way, as in these regulations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I think we must try to introduce a new fashion if we can, as far as this proposed plebiscite is concerned. At any rate I have no hesitancy whatever in expressing emphatically my opinion on this matter. I should deplore seeing it made in any sense of the word a political patronage affair. I shall do all on my part to impress upon those who have to do with it that it be made as largely as possible a matter for voluntary effort, so administered as to ensure cooperation between all parties on the understanding that it is intended to be as fair and square as may be possible.

Mr. ROWE: I am glad to be able to agree with the Prime Minister when he is taking that attitude. Would he consider urging the returning officer to use for deputy returning officers, wherever possible, returned soldiers of the last great war?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the suggestion is a very good one. I should not like to commit the minister who is in charge of the bill, or any of my colleagues, without a conference on the matter, but the kind of suggestion which the hon. member has just made appeals very strongly to me personally and will, I believe, appeal equally strongly to others.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I suggest to the Prime Minister that this be carried out as far as possible on a non-partisan basis? I do not think we can call it wholly non-partisan, but let us endeavour to get all the parties to agree as far as possible to the appointment of the officers. At the present time most, if not all of the returning officers, are Liberal appointees and, I believe, Liberals. If that is the case, they will remain so, but let the other political parties appoint either the deputy returning officer, or the poll clerk, alternately, as the case may be. I think then a large measure of cooperation could be obtained, it being recognized that the government would appoint the returning officers. The other officers might be appointed alternatively by the political parties interested or represented in constituencies. In my opinion, as far as possible this should govern not only in this particular matter but in other matters during the war. There is a great deal of resentment, in constituencies represented by members who are not on the government side of the house, at the petty political patronage shown here and there, and it does interfere with the war effort. I believe the Prime Minister sincerely wishes to avoid that. He does not want to have that obtain during the war. He said so early in the war and I take his word. But in my own province of Saskatchewan there is a great deal of criticism of the political appointments that have been made of inspectors and others, and if we tried to carry this out on an all-party basis we would do much to unite our people and obtain a good vote, and probably a vote that would be more likely to be the vote which the Prime Minister wants in this plebiscite—an affirmative vote. I am certainly strongly in favour of trying to eliminate that kind of politics from our effort during these war years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am reassured by the Prime Minister's statement and I thank him for going as far as he has. The returning officer is the key man all the way through, and if he is not directed to conform, in many instances he will not do so. I remember trying in the last election to get a returning officer to eliminate a certain deputy returning officer who, in my opinion, was not qualified or fit. My recollection is that I even went so far as to telegraph to the chief electoral officer. The chief electoral officer did what he could, but he had no authority. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he go the whole way and review the returning officers, because, after all, they are the key to the whole situation, and if they are partisan it is difficult to eliminate partisanship down through the ranks.

Mr. MacNICOL: At the time the registration was taken, the minister in charge, who, I believe, was at the time the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was, I may say, quite fair. As far as my riding was concerned—and I believe this extended pretty well to other cities and towns, though I cannot speak for the rural districts—I found his administration in the taking of the registration eminently fair. In Davenport the appointments were divided between Liberals and Conservatives, because in the previous election there had been only two parties running in that riding. In some other ridings where there were three parties running in the previous election, the appointments were divided up after that manner. I am glad to hear hon. members endorsing the recommendation I made at the time the elections act was enacted. I strongly advocated then—and I was very much disappointed that my recommendation was not carried out—that the government of the day name the returning officer in the ridings, and that the opposition, or the other parties as the case might be, name the clerk. I suggested that the government of the day name the returning officer and the deputy returning officers in the polls, and the opposition or the candidate of the party which was next highest in the previous election name the clerks, so as to eliminate politics. I am glad to hear hon. members recommending the same thing, and I hope that if there is an amendment to the elections act, that suggestion will be followed.

Mr. CLEAVER: I wish to add my support to the suggestion which has been made that the vote should be taken on a strictly non-partisan basis, and I would go further and suggest that we should not leave the matter in the air merely as a pious hope. I think definite instructions should issue from the cabinet minister in charge to the election officer explicitly informing him that all of the officers, deputy returning officers and clerks, are to be appointed on a strictly non-partisan basis; that is to say, that each of the major political parties in all the ridings should definitely make one-half of the appointments of deputy returning officers and one-half of the appointments of clerks. I would further urge that this entire work should be done on a strictly voluntary basis as a war service. The national registration in my riding was done on a straight fifty-fifty basis. The Conservative party appointed half of the officials and the Liberal party half, and all did the work without cost to the government, even for the hiring of halls. I would urge that that practice be followed on this occasion, and that the entire cost of the plebiscite, the entire work in connection with it, be on a voluntary basis, with the exception, of course, of the printing.

Mr. CASSELMAN: There is one difficulty that presents itself to me. I have not had an opportunity to look at the regulations; but according to the instructions under the Dominion Elections Act, the chief returning officer appoints the deputy returning officer, and the chief returning officer has nothing whatever to do with the appointment of the clerk. The deputy returning officer has the right to appoint the clerk. I say this because I had occasion to look it up at the time of the last election. I did have an arrangement with the chief returning officer for the district, but the arrangement fell down because at the last minute it was pointed out to me that under the law he had nothing to do with the appointment of the clerk—that was the duty of the deputy returning officer. These regulations, based on the instructions under the elections act, will place that in the same position as it is in the elections act, and unless the regulation is changed I do not see how there will be a division of appointment as far as clerks are concerned.

Mr. WHITE: May I say a word with regard to what the Prime Minister has said about having appointments on a non-partisan basis. Unless the instructions are followed out, it may work out in the same way as it did at the time of the taking of the census, because at that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce issued instructions to the census commissioner in each riding that the appointments were to be on a non-partisan basis, divided between the major political parties. He also pointed out that returned soldiers were to have the preference, and so on. The census commissioner in my riding refused to answer a letter or to give me any information. I submitted to him a list covering all the polling divisions. He would not appoint a single man I suggested, and in the village in which I reside he appointed a man who had obtained exemption from military service in 1914 as a conscientious objector. I communicated with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who replied that he was much disturbed at my letter and would look into the matter at once. I received no further communication from him, and that man who was a conscientious objector in 1918 proceeded to take the census in my village. If instructions are given, unless they are followed up and it is seen to that they are carried out, the whole thing will be a farce, just as it was at the time of the taking of the census. I suggest to the committee that returned soldiers and returned soldiers only, where available, be appointed as enumerators, deputy returning officers and poll clerks.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister express himself as he did. But I had exactly the same experience in my riding as a previous speaker during the taking of the census; the lists we submitted were entirely ignored. I go back to the time of the national registration. The then Minister of National War Services was very fair in his suggestions, but in the province from which I come there were only two hon. members who carried out those suggestions. In the other fourteen ridings the appointments of both registrars and deputy registrars were made on a partisan basis. Therefore the minister will have to take this matter in hand and issue definite instructions, if it is to be done on a non-partisan basis. I believe the Canadian Legion have undertaken to do all they can to see that a large vote is got out, and an affirmative vote; I think it behooves the department in charge to do all they can to employ these men, who probably need a little assistance.

Mr. ROEBUCK: On this matter of partisanship, I am reminded of the old saying that:

The devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
The devil was well, the devil a monk was he.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Are you not feeling very well?

Mr. ROEBUCK: I am feeling fine. I have had experience with my hon. friends across the way on a good many occasions and never in my experience have I known a Conservative government, when they were in power, to do anything except on the most strictly partisan basis.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In my constituency, at my request, when we were in power, the sheriff was appointed returning officer. He was an old-time Liberal, and a very fine man.

Mr. ROEBUCK: My hon. friend is an outstanding exception. In connection with the national registration, as far as the city of Toronto was concerned there was a gentleman's agreement that we would divide up the so-called patronage in that way. I did it to the very last letter, to the *n*th degree, to the crossing of the t's and the dotting of the i's. I appointed the president, I think, or the secretary of the Conservative association as assistant to the registrar, and that gentleman has been kind enough to say that the matter was carried out in a splendid non-partisan way. But unfortunately those conditions did not prevail in some of the constituencies over which hon. gentlemen opposite presided; we had strict partisanship to the full extent of their ability to apply it against us. It is very nice for hon. gentlemen opposite to take these lofty attitudes when they are not in power. I hope if they ever do come to power—

Mr. ROWE: We won't have a plebiscite.

Mr. ROEBUCK: —they will remember their exalted statements of the present time. It may be a long time, so perhaps we need not consider it.

There is another thing I want to say. It is very fine to talk about patriotism and giving time to the public interest and that sort of thing. The public is doing that, and I hope a considerable amount of it will be done in the riding which I represent. At the same time I feel sure that if we ask the poor people, the very poor people, of most of these constituencies to give their time free of charge, while we are paying everyone else the full value of their services—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Including ourselves.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Including ourselves and including the leader of the opposition—

Mr. ROWE: He is earning his.

Mr. ROEBUCK: —we shall receive criticism for our pains. I do not see why we should ask poor people to be the only ones to give their services free. When the manufacturers, for instance, refused to accept a five per cent limitation on their profits in the early stages of the war, I am not particularly enthusiastic over asking common people who perhaps need the money to give their day's time free. If they wish to do it, all right, but I am not in favour of pressing them unduly and taking advantage of their patriotism.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

42. Grant to the International Red Cross committee, $10,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The purpose of calling this item to-night is simply to have the department get into committee of supply. The item may stand.

Item stands.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like if possible to get another item—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have three now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It relates only to giving the ministers who happen to be here on Thursday or Friday an opportunity to take up their estimates. If my hon. friend would not object to allowing a post office item to be called—

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Pensions and Other Benefits.

249. To provide for the payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties, or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service, or in protecting his majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged; payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $5,000.

Item stands.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

CHILE, BRAZIL, AND THE ARGENTINE—MOTIONS FOR APPROVAL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to call item No. 9 on the order paper and then take up the two resolutions under government notices of motion with regard to trade with the south American republics. I think the matter has been fully discussed. This particular order was held over because of a special reason which I think does not obtain at the moment. I move:

That it is expedient that the Senate and House of Commons do approve the trade agreement between Canada and Chile signed September 10, 1941, and that this house do approve the same.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If we may return to government notices of motion and call the first two resolutions, one relating to trade with Brazil, the other to trade with the Argentine republic. It will be recalled that we discussed those two resolutions at the same time as the resolution with respect to trade between Canada and Chile. I move:

That it is expedient that the Senate and House of Commons do approve the trade agreement between Canada and Brazil signed October 17, 1941, and that this house do approve the same.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That it is expedient that the Senate and House of Commons do approve the trade agreement between Canada and the Argentine republic signed October 2, 1941, and that this house do approve the same.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house has approved trade agreements entered into with Chile, Brazil and the Argentine Republic, and to ask their concurrence in the said approval.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.54 p.m.

Wednesday, March 4, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

BRITISH COLUMBIA SECURITY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I lay on the table of the house a copy of the order in council appointing the British Columbia Security Commission, setting forth its powers and duties; also copy of the order in council setting forth the names of the advisory committee to the British Columbia security commission.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): May I ask whether they will be printed in Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has been requested that the orders in council with respect to the British Columbia Security Commission be printed in Votes and Proceedings as in previous years. I would ask His Honour the Speaker if he would direct the Clerk accordingly.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT—SASKATCHEWAN*

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What is the number of soldier settlers who settled in Saskatchewan under the soldier settlement board?
2. What was the total original indebtedness of these settlers to the soldier settlement board?
3. How many of such original settlers are still on their land?
4. What was the original indebtedness of the settlers who are still on the land?
5. What are the total payments made by those who are still on the land?
6. What is the present indebtedness of those who are still on the land?

Mr. CRERAR: This question is answered, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to make a comment upon the answer. It was found that answers to questions 4 and 5 would involve a great deal of work, and I understand that the director of soldier settlement has had some communication with the hon. member who asked the question and has taken a cross-section of the accounts which will probably give a very fair reflection of the position as a whole. With that qualification the question is answered as follows:

1. 6,164.

2. Land, $14,044,899.88; removal of encumbrance, $834,755.50; permanent improvements, $3,011,253.57; stock and equipment, $7,685,423.06; total, $25,576,332.

3. 2,308.

4. For 750 accounts only, amount is $2,859,837.95.

5. For the same 750 accounts as referred to in reply to question No. 5, amount is $1,508,534.69.

6. As of January 31, 1942, $3,864,905.40.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—1941 CONTRACTS

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. What was the total value of all munitions and supply contracts placed in Canada in 1941, prime contracts only?

2. How were such contracts distributed, province by province?

Mr. HOWE:

1. $1,641,853,758.

2. It is impossible to give a money breakdown by provinces that will properly reveal the extent to which each province is participating in war contracts. A contract placed with a firm in one province may require manufacture or purchase of component parts from firms in other provinces. Also, contracts may be placed with companies whose head offices and administration are in one province, and whose factories for production are in one or more other provinces.

SHELLS FOR BREN GUNS AND VALENTINE TANKS*

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. What is the per unit cost to the government of Bren machine guns?

2. What is the per unit cost of twenty-five pounder guns?

3. What is the per unit cost of Valentine tanks?

4. What is the per unit cost of shells in each of the different sizes manufactured?

5. Are these unit prices the same as charged on British account for war material manufactured in Canada for the United Kingdom?

Mr. HOWE: It is not in the public interest to reply to this question. We have never disclosed our financial arrangements respecting contracts held by the British government, and it does not seem in the public interest to disclose the cost of war munitions.

COMPENSATION FOR HOG CHOLERA

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How much was paid to hog producers in 1941 by way of compensation for loss from cholera?

2. What areas, if any, in Canada are presently under quarantine?

3. How many hogs died from the disease in 1941, (a) in Canada, (b) in Ontario?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. $60,485.67.

2. None.

3. Figures are not available regarding hogs that died from hog cholera. The number of hogs slaughtered in controlling this disease in 1941 was: (a) In Canada—9,257; (b) In Ontario—7,468.

WAR SAVINGS STAMPS AND CERTIFICATES

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How much have the people of Canada invested to date in war savings stamps and certificates?

2. What amount have the citizens of each province so invested?

Mr. ILSLEY:

Sales of war savings certificates, May 27, 1940, to February 28, 1942

Province	Purchase Value
Prince Edward Island	$ 455,675
Nova Scotia	6,208,875
New Brunswick	3,356,084
Quebec	23,375,713
Ontario	60,910,021
Manitoba	8,548,614
Saskatchewan	5,864,328
Alberta	7,052,833
British Columbia	10,554,293
	$126,326,436

The total of sales amounting to $126,326,436 is before deduction for certificates redeemed or received for redemption, the aggregate of which to February 28, 1942, was $3,820,022.

The amount of unredeemed war savings stamps in the hands of the public on January 31, 1942, totalled $3,896,957.75. Statistics are not available to indicate the distribution by provinces of the unsurrendered stamps in the hands of the public.

NATIONAL STEEL CAR SHELL SHOP

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. Has the shell shop of the National Steel Car at Hamilton been closed?

2. If so, for what reason?

3. What type of shell was being produced in this shop?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The National Steel Car Corporation Limited, Hamilton, is making 4 types of shell: 25-pounder, 3·7AA, 75-mm. HE, and 4·5AA.

A section of the 4·5AA shell shop was closed from February 12 to February 23, 1942.

2. For lack of steel billets and difficulty in securing tonnage of steel to the extent required.

3. Answered by No. 1.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SAVINGS DEPOSITS BY PROVINCES

Mr. PURDY:

What were the aggregate savings deposits in Canada, by provinces, at the end of each month for the year ending February 28, 1942, in (a) chartered banks, (b) other recognized saving institutions, including government agencies?

SALE OF SCRAP METALS TO DEALERS IN SECONDARY MATERIALS

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. Has the government sold any scrap metal to junk dealers during the calendar year 1941?
2. If so, how much and at what price?
3. What are the names and addresses of the concerns to which scrap metal was sold?

PAYMENTS TO JOHN INGLIS COMPANY

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn):

1. What is the total amount of money that has been paid to the John Inglis Company as at December 31, 1941?
2. How much of this was paid on the Bren gun account?
3. How much has been paid on other items manufactured by the John Inglis Company?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

HALEY STATION, ONT., MAGNESIUM PLANT

Mr. WRIGHT:

For a copy of all agreements, correspondence, telegrams and other communications exchanged between the government and any individual or company, regarding the erection and/or operation of a magnesium plant located near Haley station, Ontario.

DOMINION BOND ISSUES AND REDEMPTIONS

Mr. QUELCH:

For a statement showing the various issues of bonds by the dominion government since the outbreak of war, sold to (a) the public, (b) the chartered banks, (c) the Bank of Canada, showing the date of issue, date of maturity and rate of interest in each case?

Also a statement showing (a) Dominion of Canada bond redemptions since the outbreak of war, (b) holdings of dominion and provincial direct and guaranteed bonds by chartered banks of Canada, (c) holdings of dominion and provincial direct and guaranteed bonds by Bank of Canada.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—ADVISORY COUNCIL

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

[Mr. Howe.]

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the promotion of vocational training projects, the entering into financial assistance agreements with the provinces in connection therewith, the appointment of a vocational training advisory council and of such officers, clerks and other employees necessary for the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

INFILTRATION FROM PROTECTED AREAS—RADIO SETS AND OTHER ARTICLES—SUPPORT OF NATIONALS TRANSFERRED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): In view of information received from British Columbia with regard to the infiltration of persons of Japanese origin from the protected areas, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice what steps he proposes to take to prohibit the ownership of radio broadcasting and short-wave receiving sets, automobiles and other articles now prohibited within protected areas, and in view of the public meetings which are about to be held in parts of British Columbia outside the protected areas, what in general the government proposes to do to prevent settlement of persons of Japanese origin, except in work camps on highways under rigid supervision?

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member addressed a notice of this question to my office. I was not able to receive it; it was communicated to me just a few minutes ago over the telephone.

Under the regulations as they exist at present, the Department of Justice has no authority to deal with Canadian citizens residing outside protected areas. Whether or not additional provisions should be made in the regulations is under consideration; and it was hoped that the matter might not be so urgent as not to give us the opportunity of having the advice of the British Columbia security commission upon such further provisions as should be inserted in the defence of Canada regulations.

With respect to the second part of the question; the regulations as they exist at present would empower the department to make some order with respect to the future residence, temporary or permanent, of persons of the Japanese race who were ordinarily resident in the protected areas when such protected areas were proclaimed. That also is something which is under consideration, and it had been hoped that we might have the opportunity of getting the advice of the British Columbia security commission as to what agency should have the determining of the portions of the province of British Columbia where these persons of Japanese origin might not go, even temporarily.

I trust that it will be possible to get at a very early date the advice of the British Columbia security commission upon those two points.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Justice relating to this Japanese situation. If he is not able to answer to-day, it may stand as a notice.

In a communication which I received to-day from British Columbia the question is raised as to who is to support the Japanese population now being removed from the protected area. They have been spoken of as being wards of the government. Will the Minister of Justice throw some light on this question, having regard to the allegation which has reached me that many of these Japanese are well able to take care of their own requirements with respect to food and clothing? If they are to be interned in the ordinary sense, I understand what the position would be. If they are not to be interned in the strict sense of the word, of course they might be expected to look after some of their own requirements. I should like to know what the position is in this respect.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall be glad if this question may stand as a notice, for further consideration.

PROVISION FOR GUARDING THOSE IN WORK CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the Minister of Labour explain what provision is being made to guard the Japanese in the government work camps?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice. Ample protection is being provided through that department and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is it just the police who are guarding the Japanese, or are soldiers put on that work also?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

IRRIGATION

ST. MARY AND MILK RIVERS WATER DEVELOPMENT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. Has the St. Mary and Milk rivers water development committee, appointed to consider the Lethbridge Southeastern water conservation project, yet submitted its report to the minister? If not, why not? Will the minister inform the house when, approximately, we may expect this report to be tabled?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I understand that the committee held its last meeting on February 16 for the preparation of the report, which is now in draft form. That is going forward to Mr. George Spence, a member of the committee, and director of prairie farm rehabilitation operations in Saskatchewan, who is now in western Canada. It is expected that the report will be ready within a few weeks.

COST OF LIVING BONUS

ORDER IN COUNCIL P.C. 8253—POLICY AND PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Minister of Labour. There seems to be confusion in the minds of some wage-earners in Canada over the government's policy relating to the cost of living bonus. Some are paid it. Some are not. The reasons for the distinction in such cases are not always clear to the workers or to the public. The Ottawa Journal of last Wednesday cited the Minister of Labour as indicating that no general policy is being applied, and that each case is being dealt with on its merits. There may be good reasons for the lack of a general policy in this regard, but I wish to ask the minister if he will make a brief statement to the house clarifying the situation so that our working folk may clearly understand the policy which is now being pursued and the procedure to which they must conform in order to seek its application to their individual cases.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): A definite general policy in this regard is being applied by the government. That policy is set forth in an order in council, P.C. 8253 of October 24, 1941.

The principal mandatory features concerning cost of living bonus are:

1. Employers paying a cost of living bonus prior to November 15, 1941, must continue to pay it and must increase it or decrease it by the amount of 25 cents per point for every point of change in the cost of living index from the index number for October, 1941. The changes are to be announced quarterly by the national war labour board. In February the board announced that there would be no change for the time being because the index did not change one whole point or more from October, 1941, to January, 1942, which was the primary requirement.

This in effect indicated that at least in the first quarter the government prices policy was functioning on all six cylinders, and we hope it will continue to do so.

2. Employers not paying a bonus prior to November 15, 1941, are mandatorily required to begin paying one as soon as the national board announces that the cost of living index has risen by one whole point or more.

3. An employer in the foregoing group may not pay a larger amount of bonus than the announced amount, or begin to pay one in any amount before an announcemet is made by the board, unless he applies for and is given permission to do so, or unless he is directed by the board to do so as the result of an investigation of his situation.

Provision is made in the order whereby an employer or an employee or any association or group of employees may apply in writing to a war labour board—that, of course, includes the regional boards as well as the national board, if it is a regional employer—for an authorization that a cost of living bonus be paid in such amount as the board may find fair and reasonable.

The reason why it was not made mandatory for all employers to pay a cost of living bonus of any amount larger than the amount dictated by the future movements of the cost of living index is this: that many employees have received wage increases since the outbreak of the war which have compensated them in whole or in part, for the rise which has taken place in the index to date. Furthermore, the government could not order a general payment of bonus without regard to the financial condition of a business which may be operating on a reduced margin owing to the price ceiling. On the other hand, the payment of maximum bonuses by all employers able to pay it, without regard to wage increases granted, would release taxable corporation earnings into channels of consumer purchasing at a time when the government is interested in restricting purchasing power for civilian goods.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

The house will appreciate, too, that some industries today are existing on government funds in the form of subsidy.

Employers required to pay future mandatory bonuses or who, having already paid a bonus, find that as a result the business cannot operate, have the right to apply for permission to reduce the amount of bonus or to defer the payment. In such cases, an audited financial statement is required by the board.

I think it was just as well to deal with this at length at the moment so that hon. members would have an indication of the policy.

When an application for bonus payment is received, consideration is given to all the factors mentioned. The board is limited in its authority in that it may not direct that a bonus be calculated in the rise in the cost of living index from a month earlier than the month in which the last general increase in wage rates was granted. The board has absolutely no authority to order that a bonus be paid retroactively, although, as stated, it may order calculation of the rate of bonus from an earlier date than October.

Although the hon. member asked only for remarks with respect to the cost of living bonus, this opportunity to remark in the wage control side of the order in council should not be foregone.

It has been stated in various quarters that wages are frozen and that, in consequence, injustices as between wage rates have become "frozen" also. This is not true. Just as in the case of bonuses, provision is made for application by employees of a revision in wage rates in cases where it can be shown that wages are low compared with the wage paid for similar or comparable work in a locality or a comparable locality.

Many workers do not know or have forgotten, but I have not and many members of this house will recall the situation of the wage-earner after the last war when his enhanced earnings bought far less than they did before that war, because in an uncontrolled economy wages always lag behind rises in the cost of living.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is the argument for a planned economy.

Mr. MITCHELL: You have been asking for a planned economy for many years and now you have it.

To-day there is a formula which protects workers to some degree against rises in the cost of living. It was designed to be applied, and will be applied, to anyone who can show justification for it. It is feared that many workers not receiving a bonus—but often in receipt of increased wage earnings—do not recognize how much better off they are not to get a bonus for the reason that the cost of living does not justify it, owing to the effect of the government's policies on prices, salaries and wages. On the other hand, they would be playing leap-frog with a continually out of reach cost of living level to which a completely adequate bonus formula could not be applied without wrecking many business institutions.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

DIVISIONAL WAR SERVICES BOARDS—DETERMINATION OF POSTPONEMENTS

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a number of questions to the Minister of National War Services based on communications which, in common with members of rural constituencies, I have been receiving daily from those who have been called up for service during the coming month, who desire to claim exemption on the ground that they are necessary in agriculture and who mistakenly believe that members of parliament may intercede on their behalf.

The questions are: 1. Is not the decision of each of the provincial national war services boards on the question whether or not a person is liable for service, final under the regulations now in effect? 2. What directions if any, additional to the provisions of regulations, have been given to the various provincial boards as to the particular circumstances that these boards should take into consideration in determining the question as to granting or refusing postponements? Finally, will the government give consideration to the appointment of a special government representative for agriculture, additional to the provision that now appears in the regulations providing for the fact that agriculture may have its own representative in each of the provinces, whose duty it would be to appear in all cases before the various provincial boards so that the imperative needs of labour and agriculture will be assured, with due regard, of course, at all times to the need of man-power in the army?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): With great reluctance I rise to a point of order. A year ago Your Honour ruled on the limitations that must be placed on questions asked on the orders of the day. At that time Your Honour gave a considered ruling on the question. I suggest that the rule is being broken every single day in this house.

Mr. LOCKHART: These are emergency times.

Mr. SPEAKER: I find that many questions of the kind suggested by the minister are being asked on the orders of the day, when they should rightly be on the order paper. I also find, however, that many of these questions have been sent to ministers and are replied to in the house. It seems to me that there is one way by which these matters could be regulated, namely, that if a member is sending a notice to a minister with regard to a question concerning his department, which question the minister considers to be out of order on the orders of the day and one that should properly be placed on the order paper, the member proposing to ask that question on the orders of the day should be notified accordingly, and the question would then appear on the order paper in the regular form. If that were done it would obviate such discussions as have been taking place recently on questions which are followed by supplementary questions, and further supplementary questions, until the proportions of a debate are reached. I suggest that the matter is one which is really in the hands of those asking the questions and of the ministers replying thereto.

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): I am prepared to answer the questions asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask them. The questions relate to matters that are giving a great deal of concern to members of parliament, particularly at this time, and likewise to the members of the government.

As my hon. friend knows, the question of postponement of military training is vested in divisional boards.

There are thirteen of these divisional boards across Canada, each one of them headed by a judge of a superior court or other court in the province in which the board is located. These boards deal with all applications for postponement of the call for military training, and have exclusive jurisdiction to deal with such applications. It is not within the power of the Minister of National War Services or of the Department of National War Services or of any other person to bring about a postponement. That question is exclusively within the jurisdiction of the divisional board; the decision of the divisional board in respect of the matter is final, there is no appeal from their decision. That answers the first question of my hon. friend.

With regard to his second question, the matter is dealt with by the regulations; I would refer my hon. friend and other members of the house to section 14 of the National War Services Regulations as amended. This section gives directions to the divisional board. The divisional board may grant a postponement whenever it is of the opinion that it is in the national interest to do so.

Then in the case of applications for postponement from persons engaged in certain occupations such as agriculture, the board is specifically directed to take into account the supply of labour that is available and the importance of the applicant's occupation to the national economy. Those are factors which the board is directed to take into account.

With regard to the third question raised by my hon. friend, I should tell him that the government has already acted in connection with this matter. Until recently a representative of the Department of National Defence and a representative of the national labour supply council had the right to appear before the divisional boards and make representations to those boards. Recently the regulations were amended, giving the same right to representatives of agriculture.

Mr. CHURCH: Conscription for some and not for others under the minister's department. It should be abolished altogether.

Mr. ROWE: Referring to the statement of the Minister of National War Services in reference to giving directions to the boards in Ontario, did I rightly understand him to say that they were asked to take their recommendations from the agricultural representative in the district?

Mr. THORSON: No, I did not say agricultural representative; I said amendments had been made to the regulations giving a representative of agriculture the same right to appear before the divisional boards and to make representations to such divisional boards as is now possessed under those regulations by the representative of the Department of National Defence and the representative of the national labour supply council.

Mr. ROWE: Would the minister take into consideration—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: When a question has been put to a minister and an answer given the asking of supplementary questions bearing on the answer that has already been given is objectionable, and should not be practised.

Mr. ROWE: I leave it to Your Honour to say whether my question is in order. It is whether in view of the embarrassment of agricultural representatives throughout Ontario the minister would give consideration to having some other representative, a judge or someone in some other capacity to make representations to the board.

[Mr. Thorson.]

Mr. THORSON: I said nothing about the "agricultural representatives." It does not necessarily follow that the agricultural representative in any particular place is the representative of agriculture.

Mr. ROWE: No, but they are the ones who are being embarrassed at the present time.

BRITISH COLUMBIA FISHERIES

POLICY WITH RESPECT TO ESTABLISHMENT OF FISH TRAPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. OLOF HANSON (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has representation been made to the government this year for the establishment of fish traps in British Columbia waters, not including the Sooke area? If so, will he give the names and addresses of the applicants? What would be the government's policy in this respect.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): The answer to the first question is no. The answer to the last question is that the government's policy will be considered in due course.

PLEBISCITE ACT

PROVISION FOR TAKING OF VOTE ON ANY QUESTION SUBMITTED BY WAY OF PLEBISCITE

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved the third reading of Bill No. 10, respecting the taking of a plebiscite in every electoral district in Canada and the taking of the votes at such plebiscite of Canadian service voters stationed within and without Canada.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): This is no time for speeches. It is time for immediate action to assure and complete the defence of Canada. Therefore the question being proposed that Bill No. 10 respecting the taking of a plebiscite be now read a third time, I move, seconded by Mr. Parent (Quebec West and South):

That the word "now" be left out and the words "this day six months" be added at the end of the question.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Pouliot) which was negatived on the following division:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have just a word to add on the main motion. I had not intended making any observations on the third reading of the bill, but quite unexpectedly the amendment asking six months' hoist, which has just now been voted upon, was moved. I believe a word is in order with respect to my position on the vote.

I opposed the principle of the bill on the ground that there was no necessity for a plebiscite. That is over. The government carried the second reading of the bill; it has been carried through committee, now stands for third reading and, after it goes to the other place, is to become law. I accept the will of the majority. Let us get this plebiscite over as quickly as possible and, in the meantime, let us get on with the war effort.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, before the bill is read a third time I want to say that I have opposed the principle of the bill at every stage, and the plebiscite policy to the end. For ten years in this house I have at times stood almost alone in urging immediate rearmament, cooperation and coordination with Great Britain, as I saw this war coming on us. The enemy now is right at our door, in the Pacific. As has been said by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, we have lost command of the sea in the Pacific and our government should manage this war over here itself. I am not going to put party first, but the country, no matter who moves this resolution. I do not think I have ever voted against this party over here since I have been a member of the House of Commons first elected in 1921. But at the present time the matter of life and death for the empire and the defence of the realm is at stake and, as one who has urged for ten years rearmament at a time when it was unfashionable and unpopular to do so, I cannot see my way clear now to change my view, turn around and vote for such a measure in which I do not believe, and which is not war to beat Hitler.

I am not one who has sat in power for years and passed pacifist measures and votes and supported pacifist measures now to turn around and pose as a super patriot. While I have great respect for my leader, who has done so well in the house, and great respect for his views, I cannot accept any measure so fatal to a total war effort as a plebiscite, which shifts responsibility for the defence of our country over to a vote which will hurt our war effort. That is why I voted for the six months' hoist—not because I am in sympathy with the movers, or anybody who voted for that amendment. I dealt with that a week ago, and showed I was out of sympathy with those who moved the six months' hoist to-day. I have a duty to perform, and I have done it to the best of my ability. I am not a yes-man or nodder, and "your leader is your policy; follow your leader," is not my way. I have already given my views at various stages in opposition to this bill, consistently and strongly.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, before the main motion carries, I want to say a few words on subsection 2 of section 4 which reads in part as follows:

(2) The persons disqualified from voting as ordinary voters at the plebiscite shall be those persons disqualified from voting under the provisions of paragraphs (d) to (k), both inclusive, and paragraph (m) of subsection 2 of section 14 of the Dominion Elections Act, 1938. . . .

In order that the house may know what I am talking about, I will read paragraph (k) of subsection 2 of section 14 of the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: I cannot hear what the hon. member is saying. Is he speaking to a particular part of the bill?

Mr. FAIR: After explaining my point, Mr. Speaker, I intend to move an amendment. Paragraph (k) reads:

(k) in any province, every person who is an inmate of an institution which is maintained by any government or municipality for the housing and maintenance of the poor, if such person is by the law of that province disqualified from voting at an election of a member of the legislative assembly of that province, and did not serve in the military, naval or air forces of Canada in the war of 1914-1918.

I am quite satisfied that this provision excluding inmates of a poorhouse from voting is unfair, unjust and undemocratic. We have been told on numerous occasions that after this war is over we are going to have a New Order. In my opinion it is not necessary to wait until the war is over to bring at least some part of this New Order into effect, and I believe that the exclusion from this bill of the provisions of paragraph (k) which I have just read would be one of the best ways in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) could show the country his good faith in the New Order he proposes. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Marshall):

That this bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole with the instruction that they have power to amend it as follows: by striking out the words, "under the provisions of paragraphs (d) to (k)", in line 21 of section 4, paragraph 2, and substituting therefor the words, "under the provisions of paragraphs (d) to (j)."

I noticed on another occasion that a number of the members of this house were uncertain whether to vote for or against the amendment. Having had time to consult their conscience since then, they now have an opportunity to let us know their considered opinion. I should like very much to see the amendment I have proposed adopted unanimously.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not quite sure whether I caught the point my hon. friend was making, but I gathered he was referring to persons in poorhouses being given the right to vote. If I recollect aright, that very point was brought up in committee of the whole and has already been voted on. In these circumstances I am inclined to think, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment is out of order. The point of order is that it has been voted upon already and disposed of.

Mr. HANSELL: Do I understand the Prime Minister to say that the amendment is out of order because a similar amendment was passed on in committee of the whole?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It had already been voted on and disposed of in committee of the whole.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not appreciate that point. If it is well taken, no one can propose on the third reading an amendment that has been proposed in committee.

Mr. MacINNIS: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the rules are quite clear, so clear that I do not think there need be any misunderstanding. Standing order 77, citation 813, reads:

When a bill comes up for third reading a member may move that it be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the committee of the whole for the purpose of amending it in any particular. The motion for third reading is debatable under standing order 38.

I need not read any further. There is no limitation in the paragraph I have just cited, and whether or not the amendment now proposed was moved at any previous stage of the bill no member is debarred from proposing an amendment again at this stage. This is his last opportunity to amend the bill, and I submit that this amendment, whether or not it was discussed before, is quite in order to be moved now.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, if we are to have a ruling sustained that an amendment cannot be moved on the third reading because it has already been decided in committee, there is no occasion whatever to vote at all on the third reading; in fact, it would be quite out of order because the principle of the bill has already been voted on and approved on the second reading. Moreover I would point to the whole history of Canada with respect to the rule on this point. Such an amendment has been moved dozens of times.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Hundreds of times.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, hundreds, and if we are going to accept a ruling such as has been suggested, I do not see what use our rules are at all, because after a bill has been accepted in principle on the second reading, if we are not allowed to amend it subsequently, we do not need to take a vote on the third reading.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker I should like to support the argument of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Neill). The third reading is the last point of attack which a member has on a bill, by moving that it be referred back. I can recall dozens and dozens of instances in which that has been done in the last twenty years. I submit that the amendment is quite in order. I would be astonished if it were not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with the hon. gentlemen who have taken a view opposite to the one I expressed. What I really had in mind was an amendment that had been considered by the whole house, but this particular amendment was moved in committee. Hon. gentlemen are quite right in saying that the proposed amendment is in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I had intended so to rule.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I should like to say a few words on the main motion, Mr. Speaker, to explain the vote I propose to give on it. My views have been very largely, if not entirely, expressed by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). It is not for me to criticize the actions of any hon. gentleman. I can only express my surprise that a large body of creditable men have spent six weeks here arguing strongly, logically and well, I think, against the principle of this bill and are now prepared to vote for it. I have pondered it carefully and cannot see my way to do so. Once the bill becomes an act of parliament and the plebiscite is put before the people, I shall do my utmost to get the people to vote in the affirmative because I think, once the question is submitted, that that would be the best thing for the country. But I was and am opposed to the introduction of the plebiscite at this time for reasons which have been stated scores, yes five score of times, and I cannot see my way to vote for it on this occasion.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the amendment. It seems to me quite invidious that in a war which is being fought for democratic rights we should disqualify any person in the Dominion of Canada from voting on this plebiscite merely because he or she is poor. This is a dominion plebiscite. The law under which this plebiscite is to be taken is a dominion law. While we should recognize the rights of a province to legislate in all matters which directly concern the province or provincial rights, this parliament ought to be and is supreme in the election of members to this House of Commons.

In the same manner, therefore, it is supreme in the granting of a dominion franchise and the taking of a plebiscite for all the people of Canada; and I contend that the objectionable provision is one which takes us back to the dark ages. Why, this is a relic of the Elizabethan poor law of over three hundred years ago. It is the sort of thing which Charles Dickens railed against in Great Britain until the disabilities of those who were poor were removed. I appeal to this house not to make ourselves a laughing-stock of democratic people, not only in our own country, but in other countries if they hear of what we propose to do this afternoon, but to give those who are poor the right, equally with those who are better off, to express themselves.

None of us knows what the future has in store for those of us who are members of this house. These are days of rapid and stupendous change, and it is not without the bounds of possibility that even we who occupy these seats may at some time in the future find ourselves under limitations of this description, and therefore unable to cast our votes in relation to matters which vitally affect the future of this dominion. I appeal particularly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), whose long career in this country has been that of an advocate of democracy and of the rights of the ordinary man. He has given a great deal of time, study, and—at least—lip-service to the cause of democracy, and I appeal to him now to reconsider this provision of the bill, and to give those who by circumstances are poor the right to exercise their citizenship in this matter as fully as any other people in our dominion. I strongly support the amendment of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair).

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I rise to support this amendment. It was written long ago, "Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land". Many of the people who are in these institutions are fathers and mothers; they are to be deprived of the vote; they are thereby being dishonoured.

Considerable care, I take it, has been used in drafting this bill to eliminate as voters those people who might have a particularly strong selfish interest in voting against the plebiscite. The people who are in our institutions have had very great experience in this country; they have been through many campaigns; they know more than most of us know of what is to be learned from experience. To deprive such people of the vote on a matter of this kind seems to me clearly wrong. Many who are in these institutions are pioneers of this country. It makes my blood boil to think of our neglecting men and women who have gone out into the wilds and hewn out of those wilds the communities and provinces which constitute this dominion. Because of the fact that we are likely to be disfranchising many of the pioneers of this country, I would oppose the bill as it stands, and support the amendment.

Finally, let me point out that these people are least likely to be actuated by selfish motives. It is improbable that they have sons eligible for military service, although they may have grandsons. They are in the best position, I believe, to pass impartially on the question.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I shall support the amendment.

Mr. McLARTY: It may be appropriate to say a few words and to clear up, perhaps, a little misunderstanding which appears to have arisen in connection with section 4 of the bill.

The amendment which has been suggested is an amendment to subsection 2 of section 4 of the bill. It has been suggested that people are being disqualified from voting merely by reason that they are in what, for lack of a better term, I call a poorhouse. That is not correct. The point is that in framing this bill we adopted section 14, subsection 2 of the elections act, which clause has continuously been in the elections act for some time prior to the passing of the 1938 act, and have adopted in the matter of disqualifications—and it was the wish to make disqualifications as few as possible—the provisions of the various provincial laws dealing with disqualification of voters. It was not anything put in this bill with the thought of disqualifying those voters to whom reference has been made; it was purely to adopt the general provincial plan of disqualifications that this provision was inserted in the bill.

In other words, the special committee, in dealing with the matter, felt that there might be some argument made on one side or another regarding various classes, and it was felt that as the general scheme of the bill was to adopt provincial disqualifications, the exceptions should be and are very small and inconsiderable.

In certain provinces provision is made that this class of persons can vote; they were not restricted in voting in such provinces at all; it is only in the provinces where the province itself has enacted the legislation that there is any suggestion that this right of franchise will not be extended.

This provision is identical with the provision in the elections act which received the assent of this house four years ago.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder whether there are not in this bill three or four very marked exceptions to the rule that, generally, the provincial laws are being observed. For example, in section 4, subsection 2, paragraphs (a), (b)—particularly (b)—and (c) are marked exceptions which have been definitely designed in view of the war.

Mr. McLARTY: We are on the third reading of the bill, and I do not wish to consume the time of the house; but what the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) says is quite correct, that they are there by reason of the fact that we are at war. If hon. members will read paragraphs (a), (b) and (c), those in internment camps, those debarred by reason of having claimed postponement, those affected by what we may as well frankly refer to as Japanese, are there, but the exceptions are all by virtue of the fact that we are at war.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the reasons given by the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) are very lame indeed. In the Dominion Elections Act we have never closely followed the election laws of the provinces. We followed them where it suited us to do so and departed from them where it did not. For years in the province of Quebec women were not allowed to vote in provincial elections, but ever since we have had universal franchise in Canada women in that province have been allowed to vote in federal elections. To take the position that the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) takes would mean that if a province should put a prohibitory clause in its elections act, this parliament would be bound to adopt that provision in its election acts. That does not make sense. This is a sovereign parliament, and in enacting this measure we can put in it any provision we wish. I would urge that this house put content into our assertions about building a new social order, by extending the benefits of that new order to the least among us.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): This is a dominion plebiscite, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said a moment ago. The hon. member is perfectly right in supporting the amendment. I will do so. The poor must have the privilege of voting on this plebiscite; consequently I am deeply pleased to support the amendment. Why disqualify the poor, who are making greater sacrifices than the rich in this war?

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I only wish to say a word as to my position in regard to the bill that is before the house. My leader (Mr. Hanson) has expressed my views as to why it is consistent to vote with the government at this time, because over a period of some weeks nearly all the members of the house have expressed themselves and some of us have stated our views in opposition to the bill. I still find the bill as abhorrent as I did at the beginning, but if we must have this measure let us get it over quickly. That is why I am voting with the government to-day.

May I suggest, before the last rites have been performed over the remains of parliamentary government in Canada, that the members of this house observe the usual two minutes of silence for contemplation and that the Prime Minister and his cabinet apply to themselves the message that was brought to Canada yesterday in speaking before the Rotary club, Montreal, by a very distinguished brain surgeon, Doctor Penfield, who has just returned from Great Britain: "Get your heads out of the sand; you are not doing enough; it is later than you think."

The new Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) a few weeks ago spoke of the Prime Minister as the captain of the ship. I would carry the simile a little further and say that we members of the house are the crew, and now that the ship of state is hopelessly adrift in a terrific gale, we find the captain ignoring the crew and calling upon the passengers to help him guide the ship.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I had not intended to take part in the discussion of this amendment, but it might be proper to say a word in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). It is, I think, of interest, certainly to the country, if not to hon. members who are fully aware of the fact, to know that on the second reading the principle of the bill is always the main consideration. I would direct attention to the fact that all members of this house supported the second reading. There was no division, nor was any division even called for; every hon. member therefore, according to the records of parliament, was in support of the principle of the bill.

The hon. member for Parkdale has said something about the message brought by a distinguished gentleman to the people of Canada to the effect that they should get their heads out of the sand. I hope my hon. friend's head was not in the sand at the time of the division on the second reading, because certainly he supported the second reading of the bill or else was absent from the house and did not indicate any position. But, according to the records, his position is that he supported the principle of the bill, or at any rate did not oppose it. I am at a loss, therefore, to understand how, when all parties in this house have supported, and I think wisely and rightly supported, the principle of the bill, and members generally are now advocating that when the plebiscite is taken it be supported by the people of Canada generally, some hon. gentlemen opposite should continue, as the hon. member for Parkdale has sought to do this afternoon, in the remarks which he has just made, to cast ridicule not only upon the bill and the purposes of the bill but upon parliament itself.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Fair) which was negatived on the following division.

Motion (Mr. McLarty) agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed, on division.

CANADIAN FORCES

REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONS WHO ENLIST IN HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES

The house resumed from Monday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mitchell for the second reading of Bill No. 5, to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in his majesty's forces or who perform essential war employment.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take advantage of this opportunity of congratulating the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) upon having risen from the ranks of labour to his present high position, in which I wish him every success. He follows in the footsteps of distinguished men in his office; in fact I believe no less a person than the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was the first Minister of Labour and had the honour of organizing the department. That is a mark for the new minister to keep in sight.

As one who for years served with many hundreds and thousands of working men, many of whom served in the first world war and many of whose sons and grandsons are serving in the present war, I not only rise to support this bill, but I will support any other bill that may be introduced providing for the reestablishment or rehabilitation of our soldiers on completion of their service. For years I was associated with working men and shared their joys and sorrows. I experienced with them their satisfaction at having full-time employment with reasonable working conditions and adequate wages, to all of which the workers are entitled. I experienced with them their grief and distress when they and their families had to suffer through unemployment. Naturally any bill that has for its object the provision of employment will have my support; and while this bill does not by any means go far enough to suit me, at least it is a step in the right direction. I hope that what I and others who take part in this debate may say will encourage the minister to go further, if not in this bill then perhaps in other measures. As I have said, the minister has risen from the ranks of labour, as I did; he has been a union man, as I was, in my early days having belonged to a transport union. I am confident that his mind is sympathetic to improving the conditions of our working men, and as a rule, though not always, our soldiers are working men.

Everyone is not in accord on this bill. Recently I read two articles in which the writers took this house to task for proposing to discuss rehabilitation and reestablishment measures instead of proceeding with measures designed to prosecute the war. They argued that if we lose the war, any rehabilitation plans we may adopt will be of no avail. I do not agree with that attitude. I am not a defeatist, and that is a defeatist attitude. We will win the war; I am confident of that. I know that in the long history of the British empire on many occasions she has lost serious battles, but always she has won the decisive victory and dictated the terms of peace. I remember that in the first great war Admiral Cradock lost a whole squadron, except one ship, in the reverse at Coronel. We were driven out of Gallipoli with great loss. General Townshend lost a whole army at Kut al Imara, but we experienced the satisfaction of Scapa Flow. In this war our first great loss was at Dunkirk, then Hong Kong and then Singapore. But I have implicit belief that God in His infinite mercy will again vouchsafe victory to our arms, and that again we will have the pleasure and honour of the equivalent of a Scapa Flow. I say therefore that the minister is doing a worth-while service when he brings in a bill looking to the rehabilitation of our returning soldiers. Through its plans the government is making at least a start in that direction.

The cabinet has set up a special committee consisting of five of its ministers to study demobilization and reestablishment after the war. It has set up also an interdepartmental committee on demobilization and reestablishment. And outside—I do not know whether or not the government is responsible for this, but it may have had something to do with it—a committee on reconstruction has been formed, to consist of educationists, labour leaders, leading industrialists, business men and others. In addition there is the British dominions immigration society which I hope will cooperate with the objective of the bill later to be introduced by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). I refer to the measure to settle returned soldiers on the land.

I should hope that after the war we would be in a position to bring out hundreds of thousands of those heroic soldiers from the old country, and that we might settle as many as possible of them on the land. Then, there is the British Empire Service League reconstruction committee. It would seem therefore that the work of these groups or committees, when added to the operation of the bill which is later to be introduced by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, and the operation of this bill, ought to develop something which would make impossible the dire conditions which followed the last war—conditions about which I shall speak a little later.

When the minister moved second reading of the bill on February 23, he made a brief statement to which for a moment I should like to refer. These were his words, as reported at page 807 of Hansard:

> In my opinion the measure will provide for the orderly reinstatement of tens of thousands of men.

I hope that was just an expression of opinion, because we will have to provide not for tens of thousands but for hundreds of thousands of men. I suggest the word should have been "hundreds" instead of "tens". The minister nods his head, and I am pleased to note that he agrees with me.

Then he spoke about the British bill, the National Service Act of 1939, and made particular reference to that portion of the bill dealing with the armed forces. I have read that bill carefully, and I am convinced that in some particulars the bill now before us is a little better. There are one or two points however in the British bill to which I shall direct the attention of hon. members, and which seem to me to be a little better than our bill. Then, the minister may be able to tell me a section in the bill now before us which would be equivalent to the enforcement section in the British bill.

As I said at the outset, however, in my view this measure should go a great deal further. Conditions in Great Britain are to a great extent different from what they are in Canada. In the first place, Great Britain is a highly industrialized country. I should think that there is a greater population within a radius of twenty-five miles from St. Paul's cathedral than there is in the whole of Canada. They have thousands upon thousands of factories, some of which I have visited. Conditions are different in Canada, because we have only a few highly industrialized areas, and the majority of our people live outside the industrial areas.

I observe that in the United States a programme of works has been introduced, and I should hope that if not in this bill, then later, the minister might institute similar projects. I shall make further observations along these lines at the proper time. In other words, the government of the United States through its department of labour is planning means to provide hundreds of thousands of jobs apart altogether from those offered in industry. I am sure the minister has that in mind for discussion later.

I should like now to refer briefly to the bill itself, and shall deal only with the principle of the bill. In the first part it appears to deal with almost any returned soldier. It is an act to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in His Majesty's forces. That is the first part. And then, the second: to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who perform essential war employment.

The bill deals with the first classification, namely, the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in His Majesty's forces, and it contains the expression "service in His Majesty's forces" sixteen times. So far as I can see this measure pertains almost wholly to individuals enlisting for service in the armed forces. There may be a portion of it—and I must confess I have not been able to find that portion—which pertains to individuals who perform essential war employment. I assume that expression refers to individuals engaged in industrial plants.

Let us for a moment consider the soldiers who worked in the iron and steel business, with which I am more familiar, and include the men right back to the miners in the iron mine.

Mr. MITCHELL: The words "or who perform essential war employment" are to be stricken out. It was an error in drafting. I shall move an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sorry to hear that those words are to be struck out, unless the minister is to introduce another bill to provide for these.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What did the minister say?

Mr. MITCHELL: That those words are to be struck out of the title, and I am to incorporate a measure of that kind in another bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that.

The bill pertains largely to industry, and I call particular attention to these words:

> And whereas many employers of persons who have enlisted to serve in His Majesty's forces in the present war have voluntarily undertaken to reinstate in employment such persons, following their honourable discharge or demobilization from His Majesty's forces . . . and whereas it is deemed expedient for the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada that provision should be made for the orderly reinstatement in their previous employment of such persons aforesaid.

Let me say that the minister can depend on industry, almost to the extent of one hundred per cent, reinstating their men when they come back from overseas. I had something to do with that matter at the end of the last war, and I know the problems which must be overcome. It is a tremendous problem, and some time will be required to solve it. No one need doubt what industry will do, despite the scurrilous statements I have heard in the house frequently by men whose statements indicate that they know little or nothing about industry or employment in industry.

Industry will do its part. I have been through that phase, and I know it. But I hope when the bill is changed, as the minister indicated, there will be something in it for the government to do. Industry cannot do it all. I do not find anything in the bill outlining what the government itself may do thus to provide reemployment.

May I say a word about my experience following the last war. The plant with which I was associated had about one thousand employees, more or less, in the first week of November, 1918. Within a month or at all events within a reasonable time after the war, employment had dropped from one thousand to one hundred, more or less. I myself expected every day to be advised that my services were no longer required. Holding an executive position, I knew I was not earning my salary and could hardly look the paymaster in the face and take my salary. My point is that industry will not be able to rehabilitate and reestablish quickly large numbers of returning men, and I want that point to be considered if the bill is to be changed in any way. That interim period between the close of the war and the time when it might be possible for plants to take their men back is a more or less indefinite period, and later I shall suggest some provision to take care of that period.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: May I point out to the hon. gentleman that on the second reading of the bill, while a brief reference may be made to the subject matter of its sections, he should stick to the principle of the bill.

Mr. MacNICOL: The principle is the reemployment of returning service men. I had just started to say that the minister has intimated that there will be changes made in reference to those performing essential war employment; and that will be a very large number to be provided for in the bill.

There is another group of men about whom I am worrying. The bill by section 2, paragraphs (b), (i) and (ii), applies to returned men who had employee status on September 9, 1939, and to those who had employment for six months after September 9, 1939. I should like to inquire, where will a great many of the men who enlisted in the first, the second and perhaps the third divisions come in? When these divisions were being mobilized, great numbers of young men from my own riding who had never had any employee status in their lifetime rushed to join the colours. They had been out of work for years before the war and were trudging round the streets looking for work. When war broke out, thousands of these young men rushed to enlist. I do not for a moment suggest that they enlisted because they were out of work. I say that they are patriotic, and I cannot find anything in the bill which would cover many of these young men who enlisted in the first, the second and perhaps the third divisions and who were not employed either before or after September 9, 1939. I know that the minister would be the last man in this house to bar them from employment. It may be an oversight that the bill does not cover them, and I hope that when it is in committee provision will be made for the thousands of young men who rushed to the colours when war broke out but did not have employee status. It would be manifestly most unfair if they were debarred from employment under this bill, and I hope that the minister will take that into consideration when the bill is in committee.

The British bill has something to say about enforcement. The returning men who did have employee status may be turned down when they go back to the plants where they worked to seek employment, and somebody should be ready to assist them in getting reinstated. There may be something in this bill to that effect. Perhaps I am not sufficiently qualified to understand its legal terms, but I do know that the British bill specifically provides for that contingency. The British bill, chapter 81, George VI, by section 14, subsection 4—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What is the date of that bill?

Mr. MacNICOL: It is the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, and is contained in Public General Acts and Measures, 2 and 3 and part of 3 and 4, George VI, 1938-39, Volume 11.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): That was before the war.

Mr. MacNICOL: No. The bill is entitled the National Service (Armed Forces) Act, 1939, and subsection 4 of section 14 reads:

(4) If the minister is satisfied that it is necessary to restrain employers from terminating the employment of their employees by reason of any duties or liabilities which they are or may become liable to perform or discharge by reason of their having been called from their civil employment for service connected with the present emergency, or to make provision for the prevention of evasion of the provisions of this section, he may make regulations for those purposes. . . .

There may be something in the present bill providing for the enforcement of its provisions. I trust that is so, because from my long association with working men—and I know the minister, too, has had a long association with working men—I know and he knows that working men would be diffident about enforcing their rights to return to work. If a working man went to get the help of a lawyer, he might be scared as soon as he got inside the door of his office and saw the desks, easy chairs and all the rest of the paraphernalia of a lawyer's office, and might at once back out again. So I hope the bill will contain some provision that will make it somebody's business to receive representations from the soldiers and to see that they get fair play in the matter of reinstatement.

Having had a lot to do with unemployment following the last war, I look forward with a very great deal of interest to what is going to take place after this war. As I said at the commencement of my remarks, I am hopeful, from the plans which the government is making, that the same conditions will not prevail after this war as after 1918, when soldiers returning to their home town were compelled to walk the streets for months and months looking for work, and often were turned away from the plants where some of them had worked before. I am most anxious, so far as I can assist, to see that the returned soldiers become reestablished.

The fundamentals in dealing with labour are clear and simple. I always think of what Mr. Herbert Hoover said in 1919, when he was chairman of the reconstruction committee in the United States, and later president of the republic. I have not his exact words, but they impressed themselves on me in my days of closer association with labour than I perhaps have now, and I remembered them as long as I had anything to do with actual labour. He said (1) that any man desiring to work should have the opportunity to work; (2) that his working conditions should be reasonable; (3) that his health should be protected while he was employed; (4) that he should have adequate wages or return for his labour to enable him to keep his family in reasonable comfort and provide for their education. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that nine out of ten members of this house have come from humble working-men's homes. I did, and I am proud of it. The minister did, and he is proud of it. So the education of the working-man's child is all-important.

Mr. Hoover's fifth point was that he should be able to pay for his home. I hope that after this war there will be no such conditions as obtained following the last war. I remember the cases of many workmen who had paid their all into their little homes, and then, after a period of unemployment, became sick and died or their wives died, their families became scattered and their homes were lost. The present Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has a long connection with sane labour organization; he never was an agitator. I remember that when he was in this house before, he invariably talked from a sane point of view on behalf of labour; and I have always tried to do the same.

I trust that these fundamentals will be before every hon. member in considering this bill, so that, after the present war, the humble labouring man will have, what he has not had as long as I have known him, constant employment, fair wages, and reasonable working conditions—all of which are his just due. I speak from experience. I have been out of work; I know what it means. The average working man is, after all, the best buyer, the best consumer, because God usually blesses him with a large family. When he is not able to buy, the purchasing power of the country goes down and down. If he is thrown out of work for any length of time—as happened after the last war, during the depression—he becomes a charge on his family, his friends, or his relations, and loses all he has. I hope that the minister, in this and other legislation, will see to it that these conditions do not recur, otherwise the war will have been fought in vain.

Mr. REID: Do not forget the workman's old age.

Mr. MacNICOL: I said a few moments ago that I would suggest some other things for the minister to do in this bill, because men have to be provided jobs—that is the purpose of the bill. All of them cannot be reemployed in industry in any reasonable length of time I know; I have been through it. A number of industries will close their doors when the war is over. All the large munition plants will cease operations unless they have other demands to meet. Those old line industries which have transferred their activities from their own products to the making of war material will require some time to reestablish their plants on the former basis. In the meantime there will be an interim for which provision must be made.

According to what I have read, the United States department of labour proposes to set aside this year $550,000,000 for after-war rehabilitation in just one line, the building of power dams and plants in the western states. Many individual states are also making preparations. Either Iowa, Kansas or Nebraska, I am not sure which, is appropriating from three to four million dollars a year for after-war rehabilitation. I suggest to the minister that he double up his good strong hand and come out boldly for full after-war rehabilitation. The Prime Minister, having himself administered that department, is perhaps more inclined to be sympathetic to its needs than are some ministers who are less familiar with labour, so the minister should be able to count upon his support in asking that a large annual vote be placed aside until the war is over, in order that the department responsible for seeing that every man who wants work shall have work will be able to discharge his fundamental duty. If in the United States they are doing it, we can do it here. There is ample opportunity.

After my last trip to Germany, a trip which thoroughly convinced me that war was in the offing, I speeded up my travelling across Canada until to-day, I believe, I have covered the greater part of the dominion south of the 58th parallel and much of it between the 58th and the 63rd parallels. I know that no other country in the world has such resources as we have, resources lying wide open for development. Development is necessary to keep men employed; and once they obtain their wages they circulate those wages.

I never could see why men should not be provided with employment by the government. I remember that some years ago the previous government brought in a bill to vote $20,000,000 for the alleviation of unemployment. The amount was a mere bagatelle. Had the government brought in a bill to spend $100,000,000, it would have got through this house just as easily as the smaller sum, and the result might well have been to have started a programme of rehabilitation which would have prevented the depression. I say to the minister, do likewise; ask for large sums of money. It may keep you in power for years and years. I am not particularly interested in whether I am on this side of the house or the other side. But I am and always have been interested, since I was a young man, in providing jobs for men, and I have provided or assisted in providing many jobs for men. There is nothing which delights one's heart more than to be able to do that. Our main duty here is to provide jobs. It matters little whether we are on one side of the chamber or the other, but it does matter that men and women shall have employment for reasonable hours and at reasonable wages, so that they may adequately take care of their wives and families.

During the last war the nations of Europe, the United States and ourselves spent a hundred billion dollars in destroying each other and destroying the treasure of the ages.

It is not much to ask the government to vote millions of dollars to keep men employed. It is a thousand times better to keep them employed than to vote millions of dollars to destroy them.

Therefore I say to the minister, in conclusion, take a big bold stand for the provision of opportunities for men to work. Industry cannot absorb them all; it will help; then the government must provide works, and there is ample opportunity in Canada for works. If the United States can spend $550,000,000 on building power plants, we in Canada can do something. Last summer I saw a great power opportunity on the Slave river, and another one on the Peace river; the two combined would produce over a million horse-power, and if we could provide the horse-power we might invite industry to make use of it.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) will undoubtedly have in view, for the settlement of some returned soldiers on the land, the country north of the Peace river, but we must not do what was done in the past, some thirty or forty years ago. We must not send men into parts of the country seventy miles away from any railway. As some pioneers north of Peace River told me, for thirty-five or forty years they looked in vain for railway transportation which they never got, and they were obliged to cart their grain by truck or horses. At one place, Notikewin, they were seventy miles away from any railway. There is ample opportunity to give thousands of men jobs which will provide abundant employment.

I suggest that the minister set up a committee. I shall be glad to serve on any research committee free of charge in connection with the job of providing jobs. The munitions plants should be kept going if at all possible. Surely there must be thousands of things that can be made in them and that should be made after the war. I suggest, therefore, that some research board or committee be put into operation to look for opportunities to keep these plants going, which ordinarily will cease production at the end of the war and consequently throw men on the streets. We must do something to keep these plants in operation so as to provide employment for men in the making of things which people will buy if only they have money. There is nothing like putting money into men's pockets. They will circulate it.

I am wondering what about the men returning now. When I go home on Saturdays I am besieged by returned men asking for employment. I cannot give it to them, and in that regard I would say to the minister that he should keep the men in khaki for a reasonable length of time after demobilization, or at any rate after their retirement from service, so that they will have some income to look forward to in the interim before being regularly established.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have a few words to say in connection with this bill. We all know what national problems present themselves after every war. That is a matter of history. We must see to it that we shall not have a repetition after this war, of the condition that prevailed after the last war, the condition that has prevailed after other wars. Employers should be enabled to take back men after the war. That is a good idea and it is one that should be in the bill. It is admirable on the part of a great many employers to-day that they have made it a condition that men who have enlisted in the army shall be reinstated after they come back.

After the last war we had a depression resulting in unemployment, with men walking the streets. There was despondency among the people, who were wondering whether, after all, the fighting that had taken place had been worth while when men came back to the condition they found existing then. The government looked after men by way of pensions and so on, to the extent of a certain amount of money. We had not had a great deal of experience in those days, but we have experience now, and that experience must be put into practice after this war.

The bill is certainly a step in the right direction. We want to have a bill which will not be a deterrent to the enlistment of men in the army but one that will tend towards increasing the enlistment of men. The men returning to-day are to a great extent being absorbed in industry. Employers have done a good deal in the way of taking men back wherever possible, and where men have come back with disabilities they have been absorbed to a large extent. But it is in the time that will follow the cessation of the war that we shall have the tremendous problem on our hands. It is all very well to have a bill which has a compulsory feature such as this; but no matter how much you compel, you cannot compel people to do something they simply cannot do, and if it is impossible for employers to reemploy these men it cannot be done and no amount of compulsion through a bill such as this will be any good unless we have planning.

I want to give a warning to the government and to the house. When this war is over we must demobilize men slowly, both our armed forces and also the workers in industry. We shall have to continue making munitions long after we have need for them; we shall have to keep a large army long after we have need for it. Neither must demobilization be precipitate. That is one of the great faults we have to avoid, and no amount of cry from the taxpayers should be allowed to interfere with any programme in that regard. The cry of taxpayers should not be an inducement to any government at that time to shut down industry and to demobilize the army too rapidly, or anything of the sort. It must be done gradually.

What will be the position after this war? It will be different from the position after the last war. We shall have an army of technical people highly trained—because there will be both men and women. These people must be looked after, and therefore technical jobs must be provided for them. The bill will not be any good unless some of these things are thought of. The employees of the country are all highly trained technically, and that is the kind of employment that must be provided. There is no use talking about vast programmes of public works, and so on. We must have something more than that. We must readjust the industries that we shall have at that time to the needs of the future in order to keep up production. Everything that can possibly be done must be done for these people who come out of the army, and we must do the same for those who are in civilian life and who are technically trained. There is no reason why it cannot be done. The one thing to do is to keep always in mind the factor of importance, on which the prosperity of any country really depends, and that is the rapidity of exchange of goods and services among the individuals of the country. We must keep that rapidity in the exchange of goods and services on an even keel, not allowing it to go either away up or away down. There are a good many things that can be done.

After the war is over we shall need to replenish the supply we have of consumption goods, but we must not allow the increase in the supply of consumption goods to accumulate too fast. We shall have exploitation if we do. It must grow gradually. We shall still have a great many war controls such as we have to-day in connection with prices and trade and wages and so on. We must keep these controls on and loosen them only gradually; otherwise we shall have chaos. Unless the government of the day take into consideration all these factors, and remember that we must have a gradual transition from war-time to peace-time industries; unless they plan far enough ahead, we shall have the same conditions as we had after the last war.

There are other things that must be taken into consideration. When the war is over there is no doubt we shall have a very large increase in foreign trade. The question how the goods are to be paid for will be a matter for arrangement. We must not let the people of the country receive too quickly the benefits of that trade so that there will be too much prosperity all at once. It has to be done gradually. Then as time goes on we shall have the opportunity for creating new desires, for such things as labour-saving devices; opportunities for increasing the standard of living; public works will not take care of everything, although there will be plenty of public works to be done. But we must not allow too much prosperity too quickly; that is the warning I give now.

There is no use in just having a bill like this; it is a good gesture, but to my mind there is a good deal of eyewash in it. Unless we do all these other things it will be only a scrap of paper, just the same as anything else that is not thought out far enough ahead. Therefore I suggest to the Minister of Labour that now is the time to set up a parliamentary committee which will have the time and can give a good deal of thought to the matter, and can call in economic experts to help them so that they can plan comprehensively for the future. That would be far and away ahead of trying to compel something, as this bill would do, which you cannot compel unless you take into consideration all the factors of which I have just spoken. It is a tremendous problem.

People say to-day; Oh, we cannot do anything else now but think of the war. It is true that the war effort demands our utmost power, but there is no reason why the government should not be putting its best foot forward and preparing a plan for the future. This will aid our war effort. Anything that can be done to provide for our men when they return is all to the good. I am all in favour of it, but we should go further than that.

Another aspect of a situation such as this is that of contributory old age pensions.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that old age pensions do not come within the purview of this bill and are not germane to the matter before the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I submit that it is quite in order for the hon. member to suggest them as an additional remedy for the condition he has in mind.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I will allow a certain latitude so long as I can see some connection with the subject matter before the house, but old age pensions is a subject by itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I suggest that if the hon. gentleman is not satisfied with the bill in principle, he should suggest something better.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I did not hear what the minister said. All I am saying is that we do not want charity for these men when they come back, and because old age pensions are not on a contributory basis they are looked upon as charity. We do not want people as they grow old to be objects of charity. Therefore I suggest old age pensions as another factor to be considered. The minister seems to think that I disagree with the principle of the bill. I am trying to say that I agree with the principle, but that is no good unless we have something more.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to say a few words on the principle of this bill. It is entitled:

An act to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in his majesty's forces or who perform essential war employment.

It goes on to define employer and employee and contract and the duty of employers and so on. On second reading the clauses cannot be taken up clause by clause. I believe that this bill is going to be largely a scrap of paper except as it applies to government employees. In the last war the city of Toronto was a pioneer in this matter. When any employee enlisted he was guaranteed that his position would be open for him when he returned from the war. We had several thousand employees, including outside boards. Everyone who enlisted was notified that his position, as far as the city and the various outside boards were concerned, would be held for him until he came back, and that was carried out. The practice spread to the province and to some departments of the federal government.

The principle is all right, but under this bill I point out that the classification of federal employees herein is hardly proper. It is all right for those who go overseas or serve time in training, but to apply it to a few who just leave one department to get better pay in the Department of National Defence is all wrong. This matter was discussed in England, as the minister said. We have the cart before the horse in this bill, because the government must decide what it is going to do with industry in this country. The definition of a civil employer is given, a man who engages people by contract, sometimes written, sometimes verbal. But what is the position of industry in this country to-day? They do not know. In England it is the same. Take the small retail business man, having ten or fifteen or twenty employees; where does he come in? Under this bill and with the barriers and restraints of trade and artificial burdens imposed by these various bureaucratic bodies and the government, the small independent business man is being put out of business, so that when the employee comes back there is no business, the store is closed. Take, for example, one large industry in Toronto of which the minister knows; to-day the key is turned in the door. I will give the name of the industry to the minister privately. That industry was ruined by the abolition of the British preference and the war. The result is that a number of men who joined up quickly, went overseas and enlisted in the British forces are to-day out on the street.

If the government want to enact this bill, let them first decide upon their policy in regard to industry after this war, and not appoint boards to destroy all competitive industry. That is the first duty. The way things are going both here and in England no one will be able to conduct a business. A certain amount of bureaucratic legislation may be all right, but when you have a small industry trying to compete with a department store, for instance, what is going to happen? A man cannot carry on his small, independent business with all the artificial burdens and barriers that have been established.

I believe in protection, and so do hon. gentlemen opposite. That will have to be the backbone of this bill. If not, there will be nothing to support it; it will be just a paper charter, just a scrap of paper. No one will want to be an employer under these conditions, though perhaps they are necessary in time of war. Once the war is over, however, these same dollar-a-year men and boards will want to continue these policies for a great many years, and as a result no one will be able to qualify and keep a contract made with his employees under this bill.

I protest against this sort of thing. I would refer to only one industry that might come under this employer and employee arrangement. That is the building and construction industry, which is practically standing still to-day. I think, shortly after the present minister came into this house, a committee was appointed to try and place the construction and building industry on a proper basis; that was in 1935. During the depression that industry was put on the shelf, and it went to ruin. The government embarked upon a housing scheme; my former leader, Viscount Bennett, who was then Prime Minister, went ahead and revived that industry by promoting housing, reconstruction, the building of roads and so on. To-day there is no construction going on. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is trying to build some houses, but that will not relieve the situation. If the minister wants to give this bill some basis, let him revive the original housing scheme and see that some funds are made available for housing after the war.

I notice one defect in this bill. What about these apprentices? In the British bill there is a provision concerning apprentices which I do not see here. Large numbers of young people were learning trades in many different branches of industry. After war broke out, some of these industries were driven to the wall because they were not war industries, but there are many key industries which have numbers of apprentices, who would qualify under the bill if they had a chance. I should like to read a short quotation from the British Hansard of February 20:

> Mr. Parker: asked the Minister of Labour whether he has made arrangements, or will do so, for young men in reserved occupations who, in response to public advertisements, volunteer and are accepted for air crews to complete their interrupted training and apprenticeships after the war in order that those who survive may not be penalized for their patriotism?

This was the reply of the minister:

> Mr. Bevin: In cooperation with the British Employers' Confederation and the Trade Union Congress an invitation is being addressed to organizations of employers and work people and to joint industrial councils and trade boards asking them to consider now the post-war position of apprentices and others whose training has been interrupted by war service.

In his last sentence the minister said:

> The problem arising can best be considered in the first place by the appropriate organization and by joint machinery in each industry, and the result of this examination will be reported to me. No doubt the industries concerned will pay regard in the course of their examination to the special position of the men referred to by my hon. friend, as well as to other special circumstances.

I do hope the minister will consider the position of these young people from seventeen to twenty years of age who have given up their jobs and enlisted.

There is one other matter, with which I shall conclude my remarks. I want to refer to the position of trade and commerce to-day, inasmuch as the government has not laid down any policy in that connection. The success of this whole scheme will depend upon the rebuilding of industry in this country, so that after the war is over, it may be in a position to employ some labour. If an employer has no work and his trade is taken away from him, how can he carry out any agreement of this kind? I have referred to one particular industry. I could refer to small retail stores, larger establishments, and all that sort of thing.

I believe the government must consider the whole question of trade and commerce. The other day my respected leader referred to a remark made by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) in regard to the trade agreements then under consideration. One of the main things upon which the minister should rely for the success of this measure after the war is the balance of trade between this country and Great Britain, which now is not what it should be. One of the ministers (Mr. Michaud) is reported to have said that after the war we would not have to sell anything to Britain. In the past Great Britain has been our best customer. We never shall be able to make a success of this measure, and employers and employees who come under it will get no benefit, unless we get back that trade. But we may have some difficulty in getting it back because these agreements we are making with other countries are going practically to establish free trade and so injure those businesses which might qualify under this measure. The British preference, the preference to our most reliable customer, has been abrogated. During the five years it was in effect it increased trade between Britain and Canada by forty-five per cent, creating work for employees and employers in the large industries, which had to expand and build additions all over the country. Where are those industries to-day? They are not here now, but they would have benefited substantially under this measure.

I hope the minister will consider some of these suggestions. First of all, he will have to revive and reestablish industry. There is no use in just passing an act and having it remain a mere scrap of paper. You can go on and talk for the next three months or six months about what you will do when peace comes, but we do not know anything about it. All the countries that have been invaded by Germany will have a say in the peace treaty. All the countries that have been ruined by the axis powers will have something to say. There is the United States; there is Russia, and all the other countries I could mention. Here we are passing rules and regulations and considering what should be done after the war, but in the end it will be only moonshine, and we shall have to start all over again. Let the government look into its own business, with the large number of employees it now has. Why should there be some few people wearing uniforms all over Canada, for which the country must pay, going about the streets taking salutes, while some of them are nothing more than filing clerks? They leave one branch of the government and go into the army; then they stay in offices here, fighting Hitler at home and drawing higher salaries. I think this bill is going to protect them instead of protecting those who are overseas serving in actual theatres of war.

Therefore I believe the first thing the government should do in this connection is to lay down a definite policy in connection with trade and commerce, not just socialism. What are we going to do about it? Are we going to do as the socialists say we should, and have everyone working for the government, with the farmers getting $15 a week and all that sort of thing? Are we going to adopt a policy of that kind, or are we going back to the old days of protection; are we going to have a real trade and commerce, built on thrift and on sound economies, and all that sort of thing? We must read into this bill clauses 4 and 8 of the Atlantic charter, which proposes to abolish all tariffs on the continents of North and South America. This charter has never been before this parliament, but it is binding upon us.

As I said yesterday, the Atlantic charter will interfere with and kill Bill No. 5 in the manner I have indicated, because it proposes the abolition of tariffs on the south and north American continents. Let the government, which never yet had a foreign policy but drift, give us a policy for trade and commerce, one which will stabilize and help us during the war and after it, and protect industry. Let it try to remove the artificial burdens put on by the dollar-a-year men, unnecessary in many cases. I know that some of those dollar-a-year men who were engaged in the clothing business never had any experience in any actual competitive business except as clerks and office boys. Yet they are imposing artificial burdens and barriers on the small independent retail storekeepers along some of the retail streets of Toronto, and putting those men out of business.

On motion of Mr. Roebuck the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
