House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, January 22, 1942

THIRD SESSION—NINETEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued on the twenty-first day of January, 1942, met this day at Ottawa for the dispatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker, the Honourable James Allison Glen, in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house having returned to the Commons chamber:

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

There no longer can be any question as to the character and scope of the present war. It is a world-wide conflict between irreconcilable forces. On every continent, including the confines of our own, and on all oceans, forces that aim at world domination oppose forces that seek the preservation of freedom. In every quarter of the globe, civilization is confronted by savagery.

The conflict can have but one of two outcomes. Either tyranny, based on terror and brutality, must be overthrown; or the free peoples of the world, one and all, slowly but eventually, will be reduced to a state of bondage. Upon the outcome depends, for generations, the future well-being of mankind.

There are strong reasons for belief in the overthrow of tyranny, and the ultimate triumph of freedom. The axis powers: Germany, Italy and Japan, now fight as one. So do the peoples of the British commonwealth, of the United States, Russia, China and the many other nations that, on the first day of this new year, united in a pact to fight together until victory is achieved. The marshalling of the free forces of the greatest industrial nations in the world makes clear the scale upon which the conflict will now be waged on many fronts.

During the present session, opportunity will be afforded for the fullest consideration and discussion of Canada's war effort, actual and prospective. My advisers will submit to you the measures deemed essential to our national security, and for the prosecution of the war to the utmost of our strength.

In accordance with the government's policy of a total national effort for total war, you will be asked to approve a balanced programme for further increases in the armed forces and in the production of munitions of war and of foodstuffs. The increase in the armed forces will involve an expansion of the establishment of the Canadian army overseas. You will also be asked, as an integral part of Canada's direct war effort, to approve a contribution to Britain of vast quantities of munitions, foodstuffs and supplies.

The government's policy of national selective service will be extended, as generally and rapidly as may be necessary, to effect the orderly and efficient employment of the men and women of Canada for the varied purposes of war. You will be advised of the means the government proposes to adopt, to effect as complete as possible a mobilization of the material resources and man-power of the country in direct furtherance of a total national effort.

My advisers believe that the magnitude and balanced nature of Canada's war effort is being obscured and impaired by controversy concerning commitments with respect to the methods of raising men for military service which were made prior to the spread of the war to all parts of the world.

The government is of the opinion that, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should in this connection and irrespective of any previous commitments, possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise.

My ministers accordingly will seek, from the people, by means of a plebiscite, release from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

Members of the House of Commons:

You will be asked to make financial provision on an unprecedented scale for the expansion and maintenance of Canada's armed forces and for war production.

You will be asked to make financial provision for implementing agreements with the provinces to facilitate the orderly and equitable mobilization of the financial resources of the country to the utmost limit of its capacity.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I am confident that in no particular will the Canadian people fail in the full discharge of any of their great responsibilities. At this time, when vision and wisdom are so greatly needed in the affairs of the world, I pray that Almighty God may guide and bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Friday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, government notices of motion and government orders, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the standing committees of this house, under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), Michaud, Casselman (Grenville-Dundas), Taylor, and Coldwell.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council appointing the Honourable T. A. Crerar, Minister of Mines and Resources, the Honourable J. L. Ilsley, Minister of Finance, the Honourable J. E. Michaud, Minister of Fisheries, and the Honourable J. A. MacKinnon, Minister of Trade and Commerce, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled An Act Respecting the House of Commons.

[Mr. Speaker.]

THE WAR

DECLARATION BY UNITED NATIONS AT WASHINGTON, JANUARY 1, 1942, AND RELATED DOCUMENTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to table a copy of the declaration by United Nations, done at Washington, January 1, 1942, and the following related documents: Declaration of principles, known as the Atlantic Charter, by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the President of the United States of America, August 14, 1941; resolutions approving the Atlantic Charter and providing for the reprovisioning of Europe after the war, adopted at the inter-allied meeting held in London, September 24, 1941, and with reference to these, the tripartite pact signed at Berlin, September 27, 1940, and referred to in the above declaration by the United Nations.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the document tabled by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) be printed as part of the Votes and Proceedings so that we may all have it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are printed in both English and French in pamphlet form and will be distributed in that form to all hon. members.

LEGATIONS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): At the last sitting of the last session my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) spoke to me about my having omitted to answer a question which was upon the order paper with reference to the French legation at Ottawa, and also one with reference to Canadian representation in Eire. Unfortunately I did not have with me at the moment the answers which had been prepared in the department, but I have them with me now and I should like to have them recorded on Hansard in to-day's proceedings.

CLERK ASSISTANT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to lay before the house a copy of order in council, P.C. 454, dated January 21, 1942, concerning the superannuation of Mr. T. M. Fraser, Assistant Clerk of the House.

I have assigned Mr. C. W. Boyce, Chief of English Journals, to act as Assistant Clerk of the House pending a permanent appointment to be made by the governor in council.

ACTING DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have assigned J. Laundy to be acting Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms during the present session.

THE WAR

CANADIAN REGIMENTS AT HONG KONG

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the routine business of this afternoon has now been completed I desire the indulgence of the house while I make a brief statement, somewhat in the nature of a matter of privilege. After careful perusal and intensive study of the statement made yesterday by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) regarding the Hong Kong expedition, I have now come to the conclusion that a very serious situation is revealed and one with which I feel bound to deal. When I made my statement yesterday I was not dealing specifically with the question of man-power.

I do not believe that anyone who reviews the minister's statement will find in it a satisfactory answer to the questions which have been asked by the public about Hong Kong in particular, and the man-power situation in Canada generally. A thorough study of the minister's statement has revealed to me certain facts which, as a non-military man, I did not fully appreciate at the time that very technical and, may I add, subtle statement was made. Having since reviewed it carefully, I am impelled to make a further statement, and I crave the indulgence of this house while I do so.

In my opinion the country is entitled to further information and I propose to indicate the method by which I believe that information should be made available. The fact that from 138 to 148 men with less than minimum training were sent to Hong Kong definitely and inescapably establishes the serious lack of trained man-power in Canada. It must be assumed that if trained man-power was available, they would have been sent. One cannot easily believe that the Minister of National Defence, or the military officials, took untrained men if trained men were available.

This fact raises squarely the question of the state of reserves of trained man-power which we have in Canada. The matter is one of such vital importance that I do not believe it can be properly settled without an open and immediate investigation by a committee of this house. How can we as members of parliament, and how can the people of this country pass upon the question of compulsory service and kindred subjects until we and they have full, exact and precise information regarding the present standing of trained man-power in Canada?

The second fact made evident by the minister's statement is that the failure to provide universal carriers, which are fighting vehicles, and other transport at the port of embarkation at the proper time rests with the Canadian authorities. The direct responsibility for this failure must be determined and those responsible must be disciplined. The third fact revealed by the minister's statement is that the commander of the expedition, Brigadier Lawson, was disappointed at the lack of mechanical transports which he should have had. His cable from the boat leads to no other conclusion.

Having regard to all these factors, the country is entitled to know why the expedition was not recalled until such time as the transport and equipment could be provided to go along with the expedition. These are questions upon which the country is entitled to receive specific and factual information, and the only manner in which such information can be provided satisfactorily is by a searching public investigation by a committee of this house. I think the minister himself should welcome a public investigation. A departmental investigation will not satisfy public opinion. Therefore I invite him to set up a special committee of this house to investigate the factual and exact situation regarding what happened in connection with sending these men to Hong Kong.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to say a word as there is some responsibility on the part of the government as a whole in a matter of this kind. As a matter of special privilege my hon. friend has asked for permission to make a statement. I took no exception to my hon. friend so doing, but I wish he had been careful to refrain from using words in his statement that I do not think were at all justified. He referred to the statement made yesterday by my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), as a subtle statement. I am sure that any hon. members of the house who listened to the statement of the Minister of Defence regarded it as a very straightforward, honest and frank statement, and I would add that my hon. friend in his reply yesterday, unless I misunderstood him, more or less so designated it, but since that time he has evidently been receiving information from outside sources and to-day has presented us with the result of his further communications with others. May I say to my hon. friend that the government will certainly grant, and grant immediately, a committee of investigation into this matter. We welcome the opportunity of so doing, and the committee will be granted just as soon as opportunity permits.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the committee which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has asked for and which the Prime Minister so readily granted, but may I ask that the order of reference be wide enough to permit the committee to inquire how the force was asked for, who decided it should go, and under what conditions it went. I suggest that there is something involved in that which should be looked into by a committee of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend and colleague (Mr. Ralston) in his statement yesterday made all these points clear, but I can assure my hon. friend that there will be no desire on the part of the government to limit the investigation in any essential particular.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, and referring to page 4476 of Hansard of last session, the Hansard of yesterday, where I said that: "the Minister of National Defence should resign on account of the Hong Kong affair," the record is not complete because immediately after I had said that, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) shouted "Order" to prevent my saying anything further. That was, as always, a complete contradiction; he does not know what he wants.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 4.15 p.m.

Friday, January 23, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

TAXATION

AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING INCOME AND CORPORATION TAXES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, the last day of the last session, I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to table the agreements proposed to be entered into with the provinces respecting the vacating of certain fields of taxation. On that occasion he said he would like to have time to consider the request—which I thought fair; but in a subsequent statement, as I recall it, he stated:

I am not just sure how far the government should go in submitting draft documents to the house before signature. However, they have been given to the press and I shall give consideration to—

And then I interrupted him. If these documents have been given to the press before they have been given to parliament, I think that is an astonishing circumstance; and I would ask that they be tabled forthwith, without any further consideration on the part of the minister.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was interrupted by the hon. gentleman very abruptly when I was making what I thought—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sorry if I was discourteous.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the hon. gentleman is interrupting again. We are at the beginning of a session, and I would request him not to interrupt me as much as he did last session, or as he has started to do this session.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall be guided by my own sense of fitness.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am requesting him not to interrupt.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am renewing my request. Are we to have these agreements tabled?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the agreements should be tabled. As I have said, I was interrupted the other day. One agreement, the proposed agreement with Ontario, was handed to the press in accordance with an arrangement which was made with the provinces at a joint meeting of the treasurers and myself which was held here in December. The other agreements were not handed to the press in their entirety but certain portions of them were. I think it is quite reasonable to ask that anything which was handed to the press should be put on the table, but I want to look at it and see just what it was. I have not yet had an opportunity to do that. As I pointed out the other day, these are merely drafts, and it may be that when the correspondence or certain letters which are explanatory of them are added, it will be a different thing. I have to table just the amount of correspondence and drafts and clauses that will make the whole matter intelligible at this stage. That is a matter to which I want to give consideration.

THE WAR

JAPANESE NATIONALS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—EMPLOYMENT IN THE PROVINCE AND REMOVAL FROM DEFENCE AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): May I ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health whether he can make any statement with regard to the government's intentions as to the use of Japanese labour in the interior of British Columbia?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): My only direct connection with the situation was, first of all, as a member of the government; second, as minister from British Columbia, and also by way of being chairman of the conference which sat in Ottawa for two days discussing the entire problem. As a result, that conference made certain recommendations to the government, and a press release in regard to government policy was given by the Prime Minister's office. The actual negotiations with regard to placements, accommodation and employment are under the direction of the Minister of Labour, who is not in the house at the present time. The negotiations with regard to actual evacuation will be under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

With reference to where they will be accommodated, there is no definite conclusion, but I understand that a committee was sitting this morning on that very problem, and I shall be glad to get in touch with the Minister of Labour or to arrange that my hon. friend get in touch with him, to give him information with reference to the Okanagan. Representations were received by me from the board of trade of Vernon, recommending that 1,500 or so of these men could be used in fruit picking in the Okanagan. I am not sure as to what is the attitude of public opinion in that district regarding that question. That is all the information I can offer my hon. friend at the present time.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask just another question with regard to removals? The government proposes to move Japanese residents from defence areas. Does that cover males only, or females and children?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not definitely determined. The recommendation made by the conference to the government was that every able-bodied adult male be removed, and most likely the first to be removed will be able-bodied adult males who are Japanese nationals, and whose numbers would be roughly two thousand. There are some 1,714 able-bodied Japanese nationals between the ages of eighteen and forty-five —what we call the military age—but it may be necessary to remove those over forty-five who are able-bodied.

CANADIAN ARMY—REVISION OF MEDICAL STANDARDS GOVERNING ENLISTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): May I inquire of the Minister of National Defence whether the medical categories have been revised so as to admit men now for service in the army who were formerly rejected as medically unfit?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was good enough to send me a copy of the question. The physical standards were revised, and the changes appear in routine order No. 1350 dated October 4, 1941. To give an indication of changes which have been called to my attention, one revision applies to the visual acuity standards; another applies to those who had suffered from a radical mastoid operation; and a third applies to those who had suffered from some infection from a dry perforation of the ear drum. The routine order itself, as my hon. friend will see, because I am going to send him a copy, contains the clause:

> Those rejected under the old standards for defective vision, radical mastoid, one side, or dry perforation of the ear drum, one side, should be encouraged to present themselves for reexamination and possible enlistment under these reduced standards.

That revision was made after a study of the United Kingdom and the United States regulations and standards in these respects, and after consultation with our eye-and-ear specialists. I am sending my hon. friend a copy of the order. It is very long, and I do not imagine hon. members will want this long order printed in the answers to questions. I shall be glad to table a copy of it if anyone wants it.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

KIRKLAND LAKE STRIKE—PROPOSALS FOR SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I would like to direct a question to the acting Minister of Labour or, if there is no acting Minister of Labour, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Some time ago the minister announced that he had made a submission to the parties in the Kirkland Lake dispute of a proposal of settlement of the strike by referring the matter to the national war labour board for arbitration.

Later the minister announced the acceptance of the proposal by the workers' union on Sunday last; the matter then awaited the acceptance of the proposal by the mine owners. Can the acting Minister of Labour or the Prime Minister tell the house whether the reply of the mine owners has yet been received by the Department of Labour, and whether the proposals submitted by the Minister of Labour for arbitration have been accepted or rejected, or where the matter now stands?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): As the hon. member is aware, the Minister of Labour is not in the house at the present time. I would ask that the question stand as notice and be replied to on Monday. The information I have is that the submission made by the minister has been accepted by the miners, but I have not now at hand information as to whether it has been accepted by the operators. I know that the Minister of Labour is very actively engaged in this matter and has been for some time. I will endeavour to furnish the hon. member with the information in answer to his question on Monday.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

BONUS PAYMENTS UNDER THE ACT AND IN RESPECT OF WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION AND GENERAL RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture when the farmers may expect payment of bonus under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the wheat acreage reduction regulations, and the general relief bonus? Some of these are now nearly six months overdue, and the farmers are getting uneasy.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Payments under the Wheat Acreage Reduction Act are practically all made. By the end of November last approximately $25,000,000 had been paid out. Payments under the income regulations are in course of being made. I am not in a position to state just what part of them are out, but the greater part. Payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act were of course not to be made until the month of December. I am not sure of the figures with regard to the other two provinces, but in Saskatchewan $7,500,000 had been passed through P.F.A. for payment by the end of the first week in January. Those payments will be made, of course, on the basis of 60 per cent following December 1 and 40 per cent following March 1. In other words, the payments are either made or in course of being made under all the different plans.

PENSIONS

WIDOWS OF SOLDIERS WHO HAD DRAWN LESS THAN FIFTY PER CENT PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): May I ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health a question along the lines I have asked before? I have had quite a number of letters during the last few days from non-pensioned widows' associations across Canada asking me to inquire—that is, if the minister is able to take the house into his confidence at this time—whether it is the intention to bring down legislation at this session, should such legislation be necessary, in order to make it possible to grant pensions to the widows of soldiers who in their lifetime drew less than fifty per cent pension.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): During the last session I made a definite announcement on this subject. The hon. member for Davenport is aware that the parliamentary committee on pensions recommended at the last session that the government give consideration to the question which he now mentions. The government considered it very carefully and came to the decision that no legislation would be introduced during the remaining part of last session or during this session to deal with the subject. I have also expressed my own opinion, namely, that the objects aimed at by this organization are more related to a national system of social security than they are to any statutes within my jurisdiction for administration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The answer is no.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MR. ALPHONSE FOURNIER AND SECONDED BY MR. W. R. MACDONALD (BRANTFORD CITY)

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull) (Translation) moved:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Earl of Athlone, Knight of Our Most Noble Order of the Garter, a member of Our Most Honourable Privy Council, Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Grand Master of Our Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Governor General and Commander in Chief of Our Dominion of Canada.

May it Please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious Speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to present this motion, I wish to convey to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on behalf of the people of the county of Hull the gratitude they feel towards him for the honour done to their representative. This honour is all the greater for having been unexpected. I welcome it, because the people of Hull are very sensitive to this mark of esteem on the part of the head of the government.

I wish all the hon. members of this house were as well acquainted as I am with the people of my constituency. All of them, whether workers in the city or tillers of the soil, are excellent Canadians and good Christians. The vast majority of them are of French descent, but nowhere else is there to be found more harmony, more collaboration, more cooperation between the two races. The present conflict has imbued them with a single will, a single spirit, a single aim—to make all the sacrifices necessary to bring about the defeat of the enemies of liberty. I am proud of them and I want to be worthy of their confidence.

On Wednesday last the leaders of the political parties and a number of hon. members paid tribute to the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. I wish to add my tribute to theirs. Scarcely two months ago there died a great Canadian, one of the most illustrious sons of his race. The news of his grave illness greatly affected us and it is with deep sorrow that we learned of his death. One of the best known figures of this parliament is no longer in his place. Our country has lost a devoted and faithful servant. His dying in harness was but the crowning of his career, the completion of his life. For nearly thirty-eight years he gave the best of himself to his country and his people.

Difficulties, contests or illness did not prevent him from doing his duty to the end. What the Canadian nation owes to him cannot, at this time, be appreciated at its true value. History will rank him in his rightful place, alongside, and on an equal footing with, the greatest men of our country. But even to-day, his opponents as well as his friends recognize him as an outstanding statesman. His qualities, his talent, and his work have been eulogized by voices more authoritative than mine, but I wish to join them in saying to Madame Lapointe, to my friend Hugues and to Madame Ouimet how deep is my sorrow and how much I sympathize with them in their grief. I have lost a friend, a model and a counsellor. The Prime Minister has no longer at his side the man who has so long been his loyal and faithful friend. He will miss the sound advice of the man who always supported him with his eloquent, sincere and ringing voice. In associating myself with his grief, I wish to tell him that we also will ever cherish the memory of the great Canadian who has departed.

Mr. Chairman, I entertain no illusion about the difficulty of the task I have undertaken this afternoon.

We are, with the rest of the world, passing through a terrible crisis. The world is divided into two thoroughly armed camps set on imposing on the universe their ideologies and opinions concerning methods of government. In our own country, we have to deal with a situation, as set out in the speech from the throne, which will upset, especially in my province, many of the opinions for which we have been struggling in past years. I wish to remain calm in the course of my remarks. The great respect I entertain for our adversaries precludes me from saying anything derogatory. I shall not forget, in the course of my speech, that I am a Canadian, living in a north American country which is a part of the British Commonwealth, a country with a population of 12 million inhabitants, that is less than 5 per cent of the total population of the allied countries waging war on the Axis. I repeat: I shall speak as a French-Canadian. We are members of a free parliament and we owe this freedom to British institutions; no one may prevent a representative of the people from expressing, with due respect for other peoples' opinions, his views with conviction or his opinions with sincerity.

I intend to speak on the war effort of Canada from 1937 to this day. I had the honour and pleasure of visiting England in October and November last. The impressions I gathered from this trip, I shall expound to you in English. Then, I shall review both the successes and reverses of the allies.

I shall dwell on the most important part of the speech from the throne, that which deals with the request of the government to be released of its promises and commitments in connection with the enlistment of our citizens for overseas service; I shall attempt to express the views at least of the French-Canadians I know and who have set their faith in me.

Canada, as well as all democratic countries, was and remains a peace-loving nation. Democracies do not prepare for war. This would be against the spirit of their institutions. The debates during the session of 1937 are proof enough of the aversion of free and democratic peoples for any war of territorial or economic conquest. Only when their way of life and their liberty are endangered will they take the fatal step. In 1937, when it had become evident that a part of the world was endeavouring to apply military pressure to impose its ideologies and opinions on the world, the Canadian government asked parliament to increase its military appropriations by 35 million dollars; it succeeded in securing this amount only after a struggle of many weeks.

In 1938, after having witnessed the plundering of Austria, the seizure of parts of Czechoslovakia and the Munich drama, our population began to understand that danger was getting nearer and that it had become necessary to spend money for equipping our army if we wished to defend our own territory and our own lives.

And from 1937 to the fall of 1939, the government organized this country's defences. We entered this war at the outbreak of hostilities. Our defence estimates then amounted to no more than $64,500,000. To-day, there is no limit. The last budget called for an expenditure of $1,500,000,000 and the speech from the throne informed us that our war effort will grow still larger. There is but little criticism of the present war effort on the part of the people and I refer here to the province of Quebec. There is no criticism of our country's present war effort. If you take its population and its limited means into account, you will see that our war effort is comparable to that of any one of our allies. In a moment I shall refer to what Mr. Churchill said in this house, barely three weeks ago

We entered this war with France as an ally. Trusting Hitler's word and promises, believing that he would protect the rights of minorities, the small nations thought they were secure behind the ideas of neutrality which then prevailed in the world. Events have shown that this doctrine of neutrality cannot subsist in a modern world, organized as it is to-day. There are no neutral countries left. Still less so is Canada by reason of its situation, of its ideas and by reason of the love of freedom which actuates its people. The events of 1940 have shown that our former motherland was not prepared to enter this conflict, no more so, incidentally, than was England. France witnessed the invasion of its territory and the downfall of its government. It is not for me to discuss the motives of the French generals in disregarding the advice received at the time but I wish to repeat to-day, unhappy France has all my admiration. I am French and of French ancestry. I hold a place in this parliament where Frenchmen must be respected and honoured, whatever opinion or opinions may be held or expressed about present-day France and, especially, about the Free French.

In the course of those events, we saw months go by while our war effort increased steadily.

Our army was composed of 4,500 men in 1939; to-day—I am speaking of the active army—it includes 250,000 men who enlisted voluntarily, and a large proportion of those volunteers come from the province of Quebec and from my city. There are 125,000 in England, in Newfoundland, in Nova Scotia, in the West Indies or in other parts of the world, and we have lost over 2,000 of them in Hong Kong. Our recruits continue to appear at the voluntary recruiting offices. And I admit that they are not always given encouragement by those who should extend the greatest measure of help and cooperation to the government.

Our air force was almost non-existent before the war. After the lapse of two years, we have had 100,000 men in one hundred air training schools maintained in this country. No nation in the world has an air training system like the training plan which is now carried out in our own country. That fact is stated over and over again even in Great Britain; we can hear a similar comment voiced in the United States. That training system is a model. Our airmen are to be found in every part of the world, and they are known for their bravery, their courage and their attainments. They also enlisted voluntarily.

Before the war our navy had only 1,800 men and scarcely fifteen ships. Today we have in the Canadian navy 28,000 men and over 300 ships. On every sea lane and over all the oceans are to be met Canadians who help Great Britain in the most useful way. But what I have just stated refers merely to the manpower supplied by us in the great conflict that is now raging. As regards our expenditure, it behooves me to quote some figures—I am not fond of them, but they are helpful for purposes of comparison. I shall have to quote some figures from official documents in order to show the expansion of our industrial and economic effort. Great changes have occurred in our national economy since the beginning of the war. Industry has taken a wonderful development and our commercial activity has constantly increased. National income also shows a huge increase. I know that figures are not very interesting. However, I feel that I am in duty bound to quote some. The most recent figures show that industrial production in the first six months of 1941 has increased by 12·3 per cent as compared with the same period of the preceding year, while production of manufactured goods has increased by 11 per cent. The volume of business has increased by 12·9 per cent; mining production, by 2·2 per cent; exports, excluding gold movement, by 30·1 per cent, and imports, by 30·1 per cent. The total amount of building contracts awarded represents an increase of 71·8 per cent over the same period of last year. Car loadings have improved by 15 per cent and the gross earnings of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific have increased by 28·8 per cent. The employment index has risen by 21·2 per cent, while employment in the manufacturing industries has soared to a level 24·8 per cent higher. The national revenue has increased by 11·5 per cent.

It has been necessary for the Canadian government to help and finance private industries towards the equipment and expansion of plants and the purchase of materials. Our government, together with that of Great Britain, have guaranteed capital advances amounting to more than 520 million dollars. Twelve war industries are owned and operated by the government. Through the supply board, we buy and ship our agricultural products to Great Britain. Our most important exports are wheat, bacon and cheese, three products that are of first necessity for the overseas population. Our own people have decreased their domestic consumption of bacon by 25 per cent to enable the government to increase the quantities shipped. At the present moment almost all our Canadian plants are busy on war production. Many new factories have been built; others have been expanded. On September 30 last, the total value of war contracts awarded by the government through the Department of Munitions, amounted to $2,600,000,000. A large number of keels have been laid and the number of ships being built will increase as the necessary skilled workers become available.

To-day, we are producing guns, small arms, search-lights, munitions, aeroplanes, trucks and tanks.

Every month, every week, every day, we witness the growth of our war industries. Our efforts in this field will be limited only by the available supply of men and materials.

Our pre-war budget totalled $500,000,000. To-day it is five times higher and the speech from the throne indicates that our future expenditures will be still more important.

In our own country, rather harsh criticism is at times levelled at the government in connection with the war effort. I would like to read here certain excerpts taken, some from Mr. Churchill's speech, others from various sources, in order to ascertain the opinion of the British empire's chief on the Canadian war effort. Here is what Mr. Churchill said in his speech before this house concerning our war effort. I quote from the Ottawa Journal of December 31, 1941:

The contribution of Canada to the imperial war effort in troops, in ships, in aircraft, in food and in finance has been magnificent.

This statement was not made by a Canadian, but by the Prime Minister of Britain.

The Canadian army now stationed in Britain has chafed not to have been in contact with the enemy and I am here to tell you that it has stood and still stands in the key position to strike at the invader should he land upon our shores.

A little farther, in the same speech:

Sir, the Canadian government have imposed no limitation upon the use of the Canadian army, whether upon the continent of Europe or elsewhere . . . at Hong Kong, Canadian soldiers of the Royal Rifles of Canada and the Winnipeg Grenadiers, under a brave officer whose loss we mourn, have played a valuable part in gaining precious days and have crowned with honour, with military honour, the reputation of their native land.

And still further:

Another major contribution made by Canada to the world war effort is the wonderful and gigantic empire training scheme for pilots for the royal and imperial air force.

Read further and this is what you will find:

I could, sir, speak also on the naval production of corvettes, and above all of the merchant ships, which is proceeding on a scale almost equal to the building of the United Kingdom; all of which Canada has set on foot. I could speak of many other activities; of tanks, of the special forms of modern high-velocity cannon; of the great supplies of raw materials and many other elements essential to our war effort, on which your labours are ceaselessly and tirelessly engaged.

These words were uttered by one of our allies, indeed, by the leader of our allies. Did he come here to flatter the people of Canada or to recognize the true extent of the effort we are making? I believe he is too sincere and too much interested in the maintenance of the British commonwealth to talk nonsense regarding our war effort. The criticism of our effort comes not from outside, but from inside and from a class of people who never feel at ease when they are out of power.

(Text) In October and November, Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of visiting Great Britain on the invitation of the Empire Parliamentary Association. I wish to thank the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) most sincerely for designating me as a member of that delegation, which consisted of six members of the House of Commons—the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), leaders of their parties in this house; the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), and three Liberal members, my neighbour the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), and myself.

We spent three weeks in Britain. I may not tell you everything we saw during that trip, but I do wish to say a few words about the audience which was granted us by Their Majesties the King and Queen at Buckingham Palace. After touring Britain we were received by their majesties. For forty-five minutes we were in intimate conversation with them, and when we left we were under the charm of their simplicity, their naturalness and their interest in what was going on in our country. They spoke to us of their personal experiences; and as a French-Canadian I must state that nearly all the time I was there Her Majesty the Queen spoke to me in French. I recall that she mentioned her visits to Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa. She referred to her speech at the laying of the corner-stone of the Supreme Court building, in which she compared the laws of Scotland, her own country, to those of the province of Quebec. The last thing I remember about that meeting was the statement that after this war was over it would be a pleasure for them to come back and visit the Canadian people again, this time bringing the children.

We saw the damage that has been done to the cities over there. It is extensive, very extensive. We met the people going on with their ordinary work—grim, determined, ready to meet the foe. We saw something of the preparation that has been made for the defence of the island. We saw the conditions under which the people live, and what particularly struck me was the food situation. I may not give the details, but perhaps we do not always remember that they are rationed over there, and rationed most severely. In our country we are just talking now about making sacrifices, about depriving ourselves of some luxuries, or perhaps some necessities. Well, over there they are living under a rationing system, and that is not the most pleasant or agreeable experience. The blackouts are terrible things. Perhaps I could stand not eating so much, but to be unable to go out after dark; to be closed in—in London, where I wanted to see everything—had a bad effect on my morale. I was surprised to find that Englishmen were glad to endure the black-out, but they endure it because they were told, and it is true, that it was good for the safety of all.

I came back from Britain with some impressions, the strongest of which was the love of king, flag and country shown by those people. They do not speak about aggression. They speak about preparing their own defences, right there. One cannot find anyone in Britain who has not uppermost in his mind the defence of the island. That was quite an example for Canadians, and especially French-Canadians. Loving one's country, being ready to sacrifice one's life and fortune to help the community as a whole—this, applied in my country and my province, would be a great thing. In this country we may be of different races and religions, but we all believe in the freedom of British institutions. We believe, too, that in this parliament we may speak freely.

The second impression I gained was the tolerance shown by public men for each other. They criticize one another, of course, but one public man never doubts the loyalty of another. They do not impute motives; they do not doubt the sincerity of their opponents in public life.

Another point which struck me was their familiarity with the situation in Canada. That is why we read and hear from Britishers words of praise of our war effort. Lastly, I found that the history of French-Canadians and the people of Quebec is well known in Britain. They know exactly our past history. They know what we think of the British system. They know that we believe in their fair play. They know that in my province many people do not want to have our constitution amended in this parliament, but prefer going over the seas, where questions may be discussed far away from the seat of trouble. They know all those facts. Moreover, to my surprise, I did not attend one function where those sitting to my right and left did not speak to me in French. They insisted on doing so. I tried to speak English to them, but they always came back with French.

I reached England in the company of my good friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. He was born there, and upon arrival went home to see his own people. In our party also there was the hon. member for Brantford City, who travelled through Scotland, where the name of Macdonald is well known. Then there was the hon. member for Lethbridge, whose father was born in England, and the hon. member for Rosedale, who had been in England on many occasions. In the party was also the hon. member for Parry Sound who has made part of his fortune in Great Britain, through his appearances before the privy council. These men seemed to know everybody over there, while I expected to be a stranger. After a few days, however, I saw that all these people were my friends, and I have come back to Canada with another opinion of the English-speaking people. Do not think that they showed us the things they did not want us to see. The trip was well organized; they told us what they wanted us to hear. But they did it so nicely that we came back elated with the trip.

What are the chief criticisms against the government with regard to Canada's war effort? I read the papers while in England, and I know the criticisms made over there, against their government. Sometimes I thought they were worse than the criticisms made against this government. But I say this: In this country, do not sneer at national unity. It is the greatest need of our time. People who do not believe in national unity are not working for the best interests of their country. Have hon. members ever visualized this country invaded by the foe? We have read the papers. We read a statement made two days ago by Mr. LaGuardia to the effect that air raids on coastal towns were imminent. Four ships have been sunk off the Atlantic coast of the United States. Two ships have been sunk off our own Canadian coast.

Why, we are in danger—imminent danger—if we believe what we read in the papers, and the statements made by people. I can think of some day when we may be fighting on our own soil against the foe. When that day comes, do you want a united country? Do you want the French and English peoples going forward hand in hand against the foe, or do you want machine guns pointed against one part of the population by the other part? Just think: if you are working in the interests of Canada, you work for national unity.

In a moment or two I shall revert to the French language, but before concluding my observations in English, I wish to state from my place in the House of Commons that the 3,500,000 French-Canadians in my province are asked to make one of the greatest sacrifices they have ever been called upon by their country to make. In the speech from the throne we are asked for national unity and we are asked to consent to releasing the government from its pledges made to the country in the last election. We are asked to say to the government: "If in your judgment necessity arises, you may be free of the promise you made to the people of this country"—one which was not contradicted even by our opponents—"that there would not be compulsory selective service for overseas."

So that there may be no misunderstanding among my English- or French-speaking friends, let me say that my stand in the house, in my own riding and in my province, is that I am supporting the policy of the government. I will say to the people of my province, "If you want national unity now, make this sacrifice." I do not know whether those who have spoken against the French-speaking people in Canada would make the same sacrifice.

Our second reason for favouring the new policy is that when we in our province become friendly with somebody we stick to him through thick and thin. In Quebec we have been supporting the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for the last twenty years. Just look at the membership of the house and see where the largest number of his supporters come from. Well, we are going to see him through in this fight, and we are going to support him. We are going to ask our people to forget the past and to rely on the judgment and the patriotism of the man who is now leading the destinies of our country.

(Translation) Since the opening of hostilities, the postion of this country has certainly changed. At the beginnig we had on our side our powerful ally, France, which has since fallen by the wayside. We had with us all the small nations surrounding France—Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway—which, in spite of their policy of neutrality were invaded and conquered. For a time England had to carry on the war against Germany and Italy all alone with the support of the dominions and colonies. Until the 22nd of June, 1941, Great Britain's position, if not desperate, was at least extremely dangerous. Germany's attack upon Russia gave the British a few moments of respite. There was a let-up in bombing. Great Britain was able to develop her war industries, train her soldiers, manufacture munitions and prepare the defences which I saw myself when I was there in October and November last.

On the 7th of December last the war spread to the entire world. Without warning, Japan attacked American possessions in the Pacific. She also attacked Great Britain, and to-day, except for a few small nations, the whole world is at war. In what position do we find ourselves? A small nation of twelve million souls, we need allies in order to protect our lives, in order to ensure our survival on this north American continent. We need to make all the efforts and sacrifices which patriotism dictates.

I am aware that the speech from the throne contains a reversal of policy concerning which the people's representatives cannot lightly adopt a definite position. I admit that in the minds of my colleagues from the province of Quebec various arguments may arise to justify their attitude one way or the other. Personally, I have adopted a position, and my chief reason is that I am in favour of the doctrine preached for so many years by the late leader of the French Canadians, Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. He has appealed to us, from one end of the country to the other, to be united in the face of danger. He has pointed out to us the need of national unity if we wish to preserve our institutions, our religion and our language, because in the event of defeat all these privileges, all these rights would vanish. I say to my colleagues from the province of Quebec that the teachings we have received from honest men, who for years have preached in my province a certain doctrine, were given openly, sincerely and above-board. These men were not contradicted even in 1940, by our opponents from the other side of the house. Everyone was against conscription. The people voted as a whole against conscription.

To-day the government is asking to be relieved from its commitments and promises.

The government requests a free hand, if this should become necessary, in order to be in a position to send some of our men abroad. They do not say that, to-day or to-morrow, conscription will be imposed on this country. They ask to be released of the obligation they had assumed and their present attitude is that of honest men. They have made promises. Now circumstances prevent, or will prevent their keeping them. They want to be released from them. They again appeal to the people who have placed them in power. If I am in this house, I owe it to the people, to those who supported my candidature in past elections. If the Prime Minister occupies his seat and represents the people to-day, he owes it to the members of this house and, ultimately, to the people. He has no wish to follow the advice of those who say: "Yours is the responsibility of establishing your government's policy. It is your duty, with no regard for the people, to pass a law of conscription." No, as an honest man, he says: "I shall again go to those who sent us to this house and ask them to be relieved of our promises." Circumstances have changed or may change later. We are in peril, our country is in danger. I could adduce in support of this policy, the opinion of many people from my province. In the face of imminent danger, who will refuse to give his all for his country's salvation? I have said in English, and I now repeat, that I will support in this house as I will outside the house, in my constituency as anywhere in the province of Quebec, the government's request embodied in the speech from the throne. I shall lose no friends. In remaining honest, one never loses one's supporters.

(Translation) I shall go back and tell my constituents: "You have repeatedly sent me to the House of Commons. I made a promise to you; I ask your leave to disregard it whenever the situation is deemed such that extreme measures become imperative. Please, therefore, grant us permission to enact the extreme measure which is requested." There is nothing illogical about my attitude. It is easily accountable.

Before closing, I must discuss an issue which I had long believed dead: that of union government. In the last few weeks, some people have been roaming about beseeching in Heaven's name for a voice in the government. They offer their services. They are eager to sit on ministerial benches but, at the same time, vehemently condemn all that the government has done to this day. They say: "You are mistaken." They use language that is far from parliamentary. Read this morning's papers. You will find in them such words as "cowardly," "dastardly," and "indignantly." And those are the men who would calmly lead the destinies of the nation. Their language denotes no self respect. How then can they claim to command the respect of the people?

In the province of Quebec, the idea of a union government is distasteful to us. The French Canadian people were never so unhappy since confederation as they were during 1917, 1918 and 1919.

At no time since confederation have machine guns been trained on French Canadians, except under a union government. Never have bayonets threatened French Canadians as happened when, under a union government, some of them crossed the Interprovincial bridge in 1917 to voice their protest, at Ottawa. And can it be believed that we would support the movement in favour of a union government? Well, I pray Providence, I pray God that our country be spared that misfortune, and I ask, not only for myself but on behalf of the French Canadians that such a calamity should not befall us.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that in the course of my remarks I have not forgotten myself and used language which I might have to regret. I have expressed my sincere opinion. The stand I have taken is that of a free man. I believe that my attitude is logical and necessary if we Canadians of various extraction, creed and race, do not wish to suffer the fate of the European countries overrun by the Germans, and become the slaves of Hitler.

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a great honour for me to be privileged to second the motion which has been moved so eloquently by my very dear friend and colleague the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), that an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, offering the humble thanks of this house to his excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both houses of parliament. Would that I had sufficient knowledge of the French language to understand fully the hon. member's words. Unfortunately, we who understand but one language must be content only to listen with rapture to the music which always flows whenever French is spoken.

The honour which has come to me in seconding the address is in truth an honour to the great industrial city of Brantford which I represent. Brantford is famous for many things and more particularly for the fact that the telephone, which is the basic principle on which wireless and radio has since been developed, was invented in the city of Brantford. Doctor Graham Bell made his home on the banks of the noble Grand on the outskirts of our city, which is therefore aptly known as the "telephone city."

In days of peace Brantford, with a population of thirty-two thousand, made up mostly of loyal, honest, thrifty, law-abiding workingmen and women, was the fourth export city in this dominion. To-day, with commercial exports at a minimum, Brantford is sending to all the battlefields large quantities of armaments of all kinds, and I would particularly call the attention of hon. members to the fact that a very substantial percentage of the motor equipment used in the recent victorious campaign in Libya was manufactured by Brantford workingmen in Brantford factories.

Recently it was my privilege, along with my hon. friend the member for Hull, who has just spoken, the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), leader of the Social Credit group, to visit Great Britain at the invitation of the United Kingdom branch of the Empire Parliamentary Association. My very good companions, when we left Canada, were known to one another as little more than acquaintances; but after flying the ocean, after being in Britain and mingling with the British people, after being received by their gracious majesties and spending the greater part of an hour in easy conversation with them, and after being in Portugal and visiting or flying over other foreign lands, we have established friendships with one another which will be as enduring as life itself.

Shortly after my return to Canada I, along with every other Canadian, learned with deep regret of the passing of one of the most gifted and tolerant, broad-minded and understanding men who ever sat in this house, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. He loved Canada more than life itself and gave his very life for that great love. He in turn was loved by most and respected by all. He was proud to call himself a French-Canadian, and truly indeed might he be proud of that great race who now number almost one-third of our total population, who were the first settlers in this great dominion, and who during the wars of 1775 and 1812 gave of their very lifeblood in order to save Canada for the British crown. Ernest Lapointe loved peace, and with an enthusiasm born of conviction he joined with our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in giving leadership to Canada in order to secure peace for the world and to keep war from our shores.

Canada has contributed greatly to the forces which have kept war from our shores. The total number now serving in Canada's armed forces who have volunteered to serve anywhere in the defence of Canada has reached nearly 400,000. Actually more than 150,000 of these are now serving overseas. May I be permitted to make a comparison between this war and the last war? At no time during the last war did we have more than four divisions in France, which would total something less than 100,000 men, so that to-day we have more men outside Canada, trained and ready to serve, than we had in France at any time during the last war.

May I be permitted to make another comparison? I have stated that nearly 400,000 men are enrolled in the active army, the navy and the air force for service in any part of the world. There are some 360,000 in the active army and the air force, without counting the navy. I mention this figure because it affords a basis of comparison with the projected military effort of the United States. The United States Secretary of War has recently announced that it was planned to increase the strength of the United States army in 1942 up to 3,600,000 men. It should be remembered that the United States has no separate air force. The greater part of its fighting airmen are enrolled in the army air corps. In other words, Mr. Stimson's figure of 3,600,000 for the end of 1942 includes both the army strength and the greater part of the air strength planned for the United States a year hence. This is only ten times the present strength of the Canadian Army and air force, although the population of the United States is almost twelve times the population of Canada. What does this mean? It means that so far as military and air strength goes, Canada actually has to-day a greater strength in proportion to its population than the United States expects to have at the beginning of 1943—and we are not stopping at the point which has been reached to-day.

I could carry the comparison a stage further. Canada has some 130,000 men already serving in the army outside Canada. We do not know how many Canadian airmen are overseas, but we know the numbers are reckoned in thousands. The present strength of the United States army and army air corps was given by Mr. Stimson at 1,700,000. In other words, in proportion to our population, we have as many men serving outside Canada to-day as the United States has altogether in its army and army air corps, and it should not be forgotten that the greater part of the United States army is still in the United States, and that much of it is in a less advanced stage of training than the Canadian Army—the Canadian Army which is still in Canada. It is perfectly natural that Canada, after more than two years of war, should be farther advanced than the United States after less than two months of war, but at the rate of progress Canada has made, and is still making, it is going to take a long time for the United States to overtake us.

These comparisons are made in no unfriendly spirit. Every Canadian welcomed the entry of the United States into the war. Every Canadian will welcome every increase in the armed strength of the United States. Every Canadian will be happy to see the day come when the effort of the United States is proportionate to Canada's effort. But those Canadians who, in an attempt to discredit the government of their own country, are ready to belittle the magnificent effort of Canada, should at least get their facts straight. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is about time that Canadians stopped belittling their own country, and began taking some pride in its military achievement.

When this war started, our air force consisted of very few aeroplanes and a small but valiant personnel. To-day the British commonwealth air training plan is an accomplished fact. There are ninety-two airports actually in operation, with an enlistment of over 100,000 men. What was originally a trickle of pilots has already developed into a great stream. Many of them are serving with the Royal Air Force, and in addition we shall shortly have in operation in England twenty-eight all-Canadian squadrons of our own air force. It is unnecessary for me to tell of the heroism and devotion to duty of these pilots, observers, air gunners, radio men and other aircrew, of whom many have already given their lives in the service of their country.

Our navy has grown from fifteen ships, with a personnel of 1,800, to approximately 350 ships with a personnel of 27,000, and these Canadian seamen on these Canadian ships have assisted in convoying more than 7,000 ships across the Atlantic carrying 42,500,000 tons of cargo to the British isles. Our navy is engaged in active operations against the enemy wherever he can be found upon the high seas. Unfortunately we have lost ships on account of enemy action, but in all encounters the Canadian navy has proven itself more than a match for the enemy, and that enemy now has the same respect for the white ensign which flies on the ships of the Royal Canadian Navy as it always had for that same ensign when it was flying on the ships of the British fleet.

At home our factories are working night and day, turning out great quantities of field guns, anti-aircraft guns and naval guns. Bren guns are being produced at the rate of thousands a month. Our shipyards are busy turning out combat ships and cargo ships. Our aircraft factories are to-day turning out fifteen different types of aircraft, while other factories are making tanks and motor vehicles of all kinds. It is impossible for me to mention our complete line of production, but I must not fail to state that one of our greatest achievements is the production of explosives of all kinds. Numerous arsenals costing millions of dollars have been built in Canada, and to-day are manufacturing a continuous supply of the most deadly explosives.

We have also made a great contribution from our farms. In spite of difficulties, farmers have been able to produce foodstuffs so urgently needed in Britain, and when the history of this war is written it will be recorded that the farmers of Canada, in spite of great scarcity of labour and other difficulties, produced the food which fed the men who won the war. This contribution made by Canada to the allied cause has been, to use the words of the great Churchill, "magnificent". Some have suggested that we should be at the top of our production now. They forget that it takes years to start from nothing and attain the maximum of munition production. Winston Churchill himself, speaking on that subject in the British House of Commons, on December 2, 1941, stated, "first year, nothing at all, second year, very little, third year, quite a lot, fourth year, all you want."

Canada, when one considers that at the beginning of this war we had very few dies, tools, or blue prints, can scarcely be said to be beyond the second year. Nevertheless, instead of producing "very little" we are producing "quite a lot". Credit for that rapid expansion and that great accomplishment must be given to the ministers directly responsible, to their officers, to the many officials who head the various boards, together with their associates and subordinates, and to the executives, directors, and managers of our industrial plants; also, and more especially, to that great body of working men and women who have toiled long hours to make that production possible.

But without leadership all this would have been impossible. There is one man who has given this leadership, one man who has co-ordinated the activities of the various departments, one man who has kept Canada united. That man sits in parliament to-day. He is one whom I am proud to call my leader, and whom all Canadians, in this testing time of our history, are fortunate to be able to call our Prime Minister. History will record that, at the commencement of this war, he called parliament in the shortest possible time, and in two days parliament, under his leadership, voted unanimously to march side by side with Britain in the defence of world freedom. Under his leadership this parliament passed the National Resources Mobilization Act, which placed all the wealth of Canada, human and material, at the disposal of the government. With a boldness required of a war-time leader he announced regulations which controlled industry and fixed prices, and thereby saved Canada from a disastrous era of inflation. On December 7, 1941, Japan treacherously attacked the United States. On that same day, before the United States or Great Britain had taken action, Canada asked His Majesty's approval of a proclamation declaring that a state of war existed between Canada and Japan. Throughout his public life the Prime Minister has advocated measures which would tend toward bringing about a feeling of friendship between our empire and the United States. Within the last few weeks he has seen the culmination of his efforts in the visit of a British Prime Minister from Westminster to the President of the United States at Washington.

With the entry of Japan into the war, new problems have arisen. We are fighting not only on the Atlantic but also on the Pacific. All the world is now involved in this war, and Canada is fighting for its very existence. We are fighting beside the other freedom-loving democracies. We have a definite part to play in this struggle. We know that we cannot win without the proper equipment; man-power alone will not do.

Churchill has said, "Give us the tools and we will finish the job." Our own Canadian soldiers, sailors and airmen are now saying to us, "Give us the tools and we will help to finish the job." Our first task, therefore, is to turn out armaments of all kinds. Those armaments will to a large extent, for the time being, be sent to our gallant allies the great Russian people, who by their devotion and courage have taken a tremendous toll of the nazi hordes. More and more ships must be built, not only for our own defence, but also because our responsibility in the north Atlantic is to-day greater than ever before. It is obvious that unless the Atlantic passage is kept open, Canada will not be in a position to bring her armies and air force to grips with the enemy.

I cannot stress too strongly the necessity of producing as many aircraft as possible, and training men to operate those aeroplanes. No battle in this war has yet been won without air superiority. Three factors contributed most to the successful evacuation from Dunkirk: The English channel was calm; the British people who manned the small ships, and the sailors and soldiers, showed undaunted courage; but had it not been for our temporary air superiority, all this would have been in vain. The allied powers are depending to a large extent upon Canada to bring about, through the commonwealth air training plan, permanent air superiority.

Britain, likewise, as I have already said, has cast a great responsibility on Canada to supply food not only for the forces but for all the millions of brave people on that island fortress.

In order to carry out our gigantic task, the total wealth of our country, that is everything we have—our wealth, our natural resources, our man-power and woman-power—must be mobilized as rapidly as can be accomplished in an orderly fashion. We are already regulating industry, and are telling manufacturers what they may or may not make. We must now go one step further and organize our human resources so that each one, in so far as it is possible, will be placed where he or she can serve best. Those men who can contribute best to the defence of Canada in the factories must be kept in those factories. In many instances it will be found that women can replace men and that both men and women doing non-essential work can be transferred to industries working on essential war contracts.

Our farms must be worked to provide food for our people, our armed forces and our allies; and man-power and woman-power must be provided to produce these foodstuffs. All this will be controlled through complete mobilization.

In my earlier remarks I stated that most of our armaments must in large part, for the time being, go to equip our gallant allies. When, however, we are in full production we should have a surplus with which to equip our armies in Canada. Some have suggested that we immediately call up large numbers of men for our army. By large numbers I mean tens or twenties or hundreds of thousands, as has been suggested. That, in my opinion, would be fatal to our war effort. It would necessarily take men from war-equipment manufacturing plants and, if the men are to be trained, it would take equipment in which the allies now are so woefully weak. Man-power for our army is not now our most pressing need. It must be remembered that if no battle has been won without air superiority, no battle has been lost from a lack of men, but rather from a shortage of equipment. Canada's place to-day in the allied plan for victory is primarily the providing of mechanized equipment, ships properly manned, aeroplanes with trained crews and large quantities of food. Some may take exception to that statement and say that we now have the equipment; and, as the British Prime Minister has stated, the crisis of man-power and woman-power is at hand, and will dominate the year 1942. By that statement he did not mean that Britain would recruit larger armies but that more men and women will be needed for replacements and to turn out armaments. Here are his words:

> The crisis of equipment is largely over and an ever-broadening flow is now assured. The crisis of man-power and woman-power is at hand and will dominate the year 1942. This crisis comes upon us for the following reasons: The great supply plants have largely been constructed; they are finished; they must be staffed, and they must be fully staffed. We must maintain the powerful mobile army we have created with so much pains both for home defence and foreign expedition. We must maintain our armies in the east and be prepared for a continuance and an extension of heavy fighting there. We must provide for the expansion of the air force in 1942 and the far greater expansion which it will take in 1943. We must face a continuous growth of the navy to man the great numbers of warships of all kinds coming steadily into service. We must provide modern equipment for the large armies which are being raised and trained in India.
> Apart from our own needs, we must keep our engagements to send a substantial supply of tanks, aeroplanes and other war weapons or war commodities to Russia in order to help make good the loss of munition making capacity which Russia has sustained by the German invasion. We have had also to forego very important supplies we had expected from the United States but which have now, with our consent, been diverted to Russia.

In 1940, this parliament passed the National Resources Mobilization Act. This act gave the government full power to conscript all the wealth of the country whether owned by individuals or companies. Therefore our government now has, what few people realize, full power to conscript wealth and send it in whatever form it is deemed advisable anywhere in order to defend Canada. Under that act, however, we cannot send our man-power beyond the shores of Canada unless they volunteer to go even if it is necessary to do so in order to defend Canada.

But events are happening very rapidly and to-morrow we may be living under entirely changed circumstances. Who can tell but that it may be imperative for the defence of Canada to send large forces of men to fight nazism wherever it may be found? Personally, I feel the government should be empowered to do so. This government, however, and every hon. member who supports it, and in fact most if not all members of this house, gave their solemn promise to the electorate that they would not require men under any circumstances to go beyond the shores of Canada unless they should go of their own free will and accord. Under nazism, the promise of a leader is nothing but a scrap of paper, but under our democratic system of government it is as binding as any bond under seal.

Some may argue that we should ignore our pledge given to the people and change the law without consultation with them. I greatly fear that such a course would result in tearing Canada asunder, and surely it is patent that we cannot fight one another at home and hope at the same time to defeat the enemy abroad. If the government, if hon. members themselves are to be released from their pledge, only the people themselves can do the releasing. We must trust the people or the people will not trust us. We shall have kept faith with the people, we shall accept the verdict of the people, and democracy, holding high its head, will drive nazism with its broken promises into the abyss of shame and defeat.

One more thought and I am through. During this session, as in the past, the Prime Minister will doubtless receive many suggestions as to how Canada can best contribute to the winning of the war. It will doubtless be suggested that we should form a national government. It will doubtless be pointed out that Mr. Roosevelt has taken into his cabinet two republicans, Mr. Stimson and Mr. Knox, and is considering taking Mr. Wendell Willkie into his cabinet. Why should Mr. Roosevelt not take these men into his cabinet? For months before Mr. Stimson and Mr. Knox went into the cabinet they were openly opposed to all those who were objecting to the national defence policy of the president, and we all remember that immediately after the last election in the United States Mr. Wendell Willkie forgot partisanship and gave his full support to the president. If there are those, within or without this house, belonging to opposing parties, who would serve, let them follow the example of Mr. Wendell Willkie and give our Prime Minister the support which he so justly deserves. I cannot do better than admonish critics of this government to follow the example set by that great statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who, while leader of the opposition during the last war, said:

> Let us here and now sink passions, prejudices, vain and idle recriminations. Let us, when criticism is needed, criticize without bitterness, only by appeals to reason, and above all, let us bend our energies towards making Canada an effective factor in the struggle.

Mr. Speaker, let us be proud of our great country, of our leaders and of our people; and let each one of us, irrespective of party, creed or race, resolve that until this war is won we will support our leaders, support our workers and support our fighters, and that as individuals we will give unstintingly of our best to make Canada's mighty war effort mightier yet.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the adjournment of the debate, may I offer my personal congratulations to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) for the manner in which they have acquitted themselves this afternoon. I expected good speeches from both of them. Both belong to the legal profession; both have had a long training in public speaking; both are leaders of the bar in their own communities; both have had long experience in this parliament. The manner of their performance this afternoon was in keeping with the training which they have both had over a long period of years. I offer them very sincerely my personal congratulations.

I was greatly interested in that part of the speech of the hon. member for Hull which I was able to follow. My regret is that I could not follow his whole speech, because I have not sufficient familiarity with the French tongue to catch more than phrases here and there. I was especially interested in his references to his visit to England, and the impressions he formed of the British people. I should like to suggest to him that he could perform no more useful mission as a public man than to repeat in his own province and elsewhere in Canada a statement of the impressions which he formed of the magnanimity of the British people. I commend that suggestion to him.

May I also say this to him, that the part of his speech in which he discarded his notes was the better part. I make the same suggestion to many hon. members of this house, and apply it also to myself: I pray that they throw away their manuscripts. If the hon. member for Hull had thrown away his notes his speech would have been a still better speech.

To the Prime Minister I especially commend that portion of these two speeches which was, to say the least, most flattering to himself. I say this in no spirit of satire at all. Surely those two speeches should commend themselves to the Prime Minister, and the reward should be, shall I say, a seat in the cabinet, or at least a judgeship, or at the very least a senatorship.

On motion of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 4.50 p.m.

Monday, January 26, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

PETROLEUM

REPEAL OF PETROLEUM AND NAPHTHA INSPECTION ACT

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to repeal the Petroleum and Naphtha Inspection Act.

He said: The Petroleum and Naphtha Inspection Act was originally passed in 1877, at a time when gasoline was a by-product. The main purpose of the act was to safeguard users of coal oil from the adulteration of coal oil with gasoline. Owing to the greatly increased demand for and use of gasoline, the provisions of this act are no longer necessary and are a needless expense.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

NATIONAL FLAG

PROVISION FOR AUTHORIZATION AND APPROVAL

Mr. WILFRID LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3, to provide for the flags of Canada.

Some. hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): The purpose of this bill is to empower the governor in council to create a national flag for Canada, the only nation in the world which does not possess or fly a distinctive national flag. Our country is voluntarily doing its full share in this war, and doing so as an independent and sovereign nation; therefore the time has come for a flag that will express the sovereignty of the Canadian people and the Canadian parliament, just as the union jack represents the sovereignty of the United Kingdom—in other words, of the parliament at Westminster.

A Canadian flag will stand for national freedom, commonwealth fellowship and national unity, and be a rallying force in the defence of the nation. Furthermore, it is a natural consequence of the adoption of the statute of Westminster ten years ago, by which Canada was designated a sovereign nation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUGAR

RATIONING IN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES —BEET SUGAR CAPACITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Why has the sugar ration in Canada been set at three-quarters of a pound per person while in the United States it is fixed at one pound? Again, have any steps been taken or has any plan been made to increase Canada's beet sugar productive capacity by the building of factories? If not, why not?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The question is one which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) would wish to answer. It is also a question that might best stand on the order paper to be answered at a subsequent sitting of the house.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO REMOVALS FROM PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): May I ask the Prime Minister a question? In view of the many statements appearing in the press in British Columbia in connection with the removal of Japanese from the coast, I was wondering if, some day soon, the Prime Minister would make an official statement regarding the matter, as many of us, many of the people of British Columbia, are in doubt as to what is going to happen.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I will try to meet the wishes of the people of British Columbia by giving the fullest possible information with respect to the working out of the government's policy in relation to the Japanese in the province. What may be the best moment to make the statement I am unable to say offhand. Perhaps, meanwhile I shall have a chance to confer with my hon. friend. I will see that the statement is made in due course.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

KIRKLAND LAKE STRIKE—PROPOSALS FOR SETTLEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): On Friday the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) made inquiry with reference to the situation at Kirkland Lake. The acting minister said that he would have some information on the question on Monday. I wonder if he is prepared to give the house that information.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Yes. As suggested by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I did make inquiries, and the Minister of Labour did furnish me with the information desired by the hon. member for Vancouver East. I am advised that the minister has received various communications from union officials which at first he regarded as accepting the proposals, but more recent advices indicate that certain qualifications of the procedure are requested. No formal reply has been received from the mine operators.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, January 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are met here again, at the beginning of the third session of this parliament, under conditions which stagger and appal our thoughts and imagination. Literally the whole world is at war, and we as Canadians are, by free choice and inclination, belligerents in the most momentous conflict in the world's history.

Since we parted in November last, the world has moved on from one tragic event to another in such quick succession as to well-nigh appal the most stout-hearted, and to cause all of us to search our minds and our hearts in an effort to comprehend the meaning and the implications of total war, which now has involved not only the western world but the eastern as well, and threatens to engulf us all.

On a quiet Sunday in December, while most of us were endeavouring to enjoy a day of rest after a week of anxiety over the situation in Russia and Libya, came the treacherous and shattering attack on Pearl Harbour. What an hour of crisis in the world's history! What an hour of crisis for the people of the United States, their government still dealing in good faith with the government of Japan, in an earnest effort to avoid the extension of hostilities to the far east! And what an hour of crisis for this Canada of ours! Living side by side with the United States, we are conscious that every step taken on the part of the axis powers brings the war that much nearer to this nation.

The government acted promptly in the formal matter of declaring war. It did not wait to call parliament. It pursued the correct constitutional practice and assumed the responsibility for its action. That is responsible government under our system and practice.

Did the government have a mandate to declare war on Japan? It did not. It did not require a mandate. Knowing the situation, it assumed the responsibility which, by every principle of responsible government, belongs to representative government, and went through the formality of declaring war on Japan, trusting that parliament and public opinion would sustain its action.

Now that the whole world is at war, now that Canada is at war with all the axis powers, now that we are endangered along with our neighbour on the west coast, this country must face the whole position realistically, and begin for the first time to wage total war with total effort. We have professed to be waging total war. We have accomplished much since September, 1939. But we have never even up to this minute really waged total war. The Prime Minister has on many occasions preached the doctrine of total war, but, he, more than any other man in Canada, has found himself cabin'd, cribb'd, confined, by his own commitments.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) not so many months ago, uttered a stirring challenge in these eloquent words:

I believe we shall win, not simply because we say so, but because Canada, along with the other democracies, will stop at nothing which can be effectively done to ensure that the forces of evil shall be stamped out, that the menace of slavery shall be banished, and that free men and their families may enjoy the liberty which, until this struggle began, we in this dominion had somehow taken for granted. We cannot take it for granted any longer. The menace is against Canada, as well as against the rest of the world.

Noble words those, my countrymen! But the minister is fettered by the commitments of the ministry, which prevent the fulfilment of the aims so eloquently portrayed by him in the quotation I have just read. And because everyone in this house and every thinking citizen in this country knows that in this hour of grave national crisis we must, each for himself, determine that we shall have total war, come what may, I call upon parliament to deal, and deal at once, with that crisis.

What happened at Pearl Harbour may happen at Esquimalt. What happened 160 miles off Halifax may happen at Halifax. What happened 60 miles off Long island may happen at Sydney, Saint John or Quebec. To-day the fate of Canada, of Australia, of the British empire, of all the democracies and of democratic civilization is being determined in Malaya, in the Philippines, in Libya and in the snows of Russia, and shortly it may be in Britain itself, if invasion is attempted in the spring.

And what must our contribution be? I give the answer in the words of Mr. Churchill, spoken in this very chamber less than a month ago in the hearing of most of us:

> The enemy ranged against us . . . have asked for total war. Let us make sure they get it.

And speaking in Washington to the congress of that great democracy Mr. Churchill said:

> Provided that every effort is made, that nothing is kept back, that the whole man-power, brain-power, virility, valour and virtue of the English-speaking world, with all its galaxy of loyal friends, are associated in a common community or state, we can be reunited by the simple but supreme good.

Again, in this chamber, Mr. Churchill summed up in these eloquent words the duty of each and all of us:

> There is no room now for the dilettante, for the weakling, for the shirker or the sluggard; the mine, the factory, the dockyard, the salt sea waves, the fields to till, the home, the hospital, the chair of the scientist, the pulpit of the preacher—from the highest to the humblest, the tasks all are of equal honour. All have their part to play.

The enemy, Mr. Churchill said, have asked for total war: let us make sure they get it. And what is Canada doing to make sure they get it? The Prime Minister has stated, not once but a dozen times, that total war must be waged by total effort. But have we total effort? Are we not shackled by dangerous and paralyzing restrictions, restrictions which are of the government's own making, restrictions which were imposed by the government without any mandate from the people, restrictions which would not be imposed to-day in the light of present-day conditions, restrictions which are impeding the fulfilment of the government's own pledges, made after we had concluded the first comfortable period of our war effort, which was to be a moderate contribution, a moderate participation?

During the past few months I have travelled from Halifax to Victoria, and have to the best of my ability sounded public opinion. I listened as intelligently and as intently as it was possible for me to do. During this period events have happened with tragic rapidity. There has been Hong Kong; there has been Pearl Harbour. These tragic events have brought about a tremendous change in public opinion in every part of Canada. Months ago, when the Prime Minister first preached total effort for total war, it was not interpreted by each of us as having a personal application; the total effort was to be for the other fellow, not for us as individuals. But I am convinced that to-day, without a full mobilization, a full marshalling, a full pooling of the complete resources, both of man-power and of materials, of this nation and of all the democracies, we cannot wage total war, and victory may elude us.

I desire to ask this house and the country two questions: Has Canada fully mobilized her material resources? Has Canada fully mobilized her man and woman power to wage total war? These are, I repeat, two vital questions which face parliament to-day. We as the elected representatives of the people must face these two questions man-fashion. It will not do to leave them to the government. If we do so we abdicate our functions as the elected representatives of the people, and we may as well declare that we are no longer a democracy. No. Parliament must face these two questions. We must no longer tolerate the making of government policy by order in council. I appeal to every hon. member in this house to join with me in urging that parliament, that this House of Commons, assume the responsibility of seeing that the supreme objective of waging total war by total effort is attained.

These two questions face us, and what is the answer? We all know in our hearts that the answer is in the negative. If we are honest with ourselves we can give no other answer. That being so, we must then determine what further steps must and shall be taken.

Now, what are the requisites of total war as applied to Canada at this critical juncture of our history? I have given considerable thought to this problem, and here is my blueprint of the principles underlying a total war effort for Canada to-day. It may not be complete, but such as it is I offer it to the house and to the country.

1. To muster, equip and train as many and as strong forces as possible to meet and defeat the enemy in whatever threatre of war he may be found.

2. To defend Canada and to prevent the invasion of Canada. And I point out, without arguing the question, that there is a distinction between the two.

3. To mobilize by any and every necessary means the wealth and material resources of the nation in order to provide the implements of war for our armed forces and to provide for the other services which are necessary for the carrying out of total war.

4. To mobilize and organize Canadian agriculture to produce and supply to our armed forces and to our allies as much food as it is possible to transport to them, as well as to supply our civilian population.

5. To mobilize and organize Canadian industry to produce as great quantities of armament and munitions as our facilities and available materials will permit.

6. To build and man transport ships and more ships to carry our products of food, munitions and armament to the scene of conflict.

7. Finally, and perhaps not so important, to mobilize and organize the material wealth and resources of the nation, and such of the personnel of its civilian population as are not immediately required for the armed forces and other war services, to ensure the continuance, under restricted conditions, of such peace-time activities and supplies as are reasonably necessary to maintain the physical and mental health of our own people.

Nothing less than these seven propositions will fulfil that theory and practice, if we are serious and mean what we say when we pledge ourselves to total war. In order to accomplish this the man and woman power and the total material resources of the nation, without any limitation, must be marshalled—pooled, if necessary—and put to work. It must be done on a selective basis if the best results are to flow from the effort. It may be that someone else will put these requisites in a different order. That does not matter.

In June, 1940, under great pressure, this government caused to be introduced and enacted the National Resources Mobilization Act. I accept full responsibility and the onus, if any there be, for the position which I took on that occasion when, in company with my colleague the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), I went to the Prime Minister that June morning after the fall of France and demanded that action be taken. Under that authority, patterned after the British act of May, 1940, the government is empowered, with one limitation, to do anything and everything required for the "efficient prosecution of the war." Let me repeat those words—to do anything and everything for the "efficient prosecution of the war." That is the underlying principle of the National Resources Mobilization Act.

With the exception of one limitation the government has full and complete power and authority to mobilize and utilize every resource of the nation, except man-power, for use in a theatre of war "outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof." Therefore, with respect to man-power, the power of mobilization is strictly confined to use within the territorial limitation of the nation.

At the time I accepted that limitation on the theory that half a loaf was better than no bread. And it was a distinct step forward, having regard to the theory of moderate participation which had been government policy up to that time. It imported the principle of compulsion; let there be no mistake about that. This government thus committed itself to the principle of compulsion. It was accepted without reserve by the great mass of the Canadian people.

Did the government have any direct mandate from the people of Canada to introduce and pass the mobilization act? Most assuredly it did not. But it did have a mandate from the people of Canada to efficiently prosecute the war, and it also had the responsibility of defending the nation. At that time, and right up to this present moment, where has been the defence of the nation? The defence of the nation lies in Britain, in the English channel, in the North sea, in Russia, in the near east, in the far east; wherever the enemy may be found. There, overseas, lies Canada's defence, her first line of defence. I think we are all agreed on that principle; at least I hope we are.

May I pause here, sir, to offer a constructive concrete suggestion arising out of the rapidly changing events in the far east. Those of us who have been listening to the news have heard with quickening hearts the urgent appeals of our kinsmen in Australia, the appeals to the United States and Britain for assistance and more assistance. I am sure each of us must have been impressed by the serious situation which has developed there. Every able-bodied man in Australia has been called to the colours. I pray to God that it is not too late. I am afraid that it may be; for how can these men be trained in time for the defence of their shores, men who have never had previous training?

Now I come to my proposal. Why should not this dominion send a division of trained men to Australia? It would be more than a gesture of good will. It would be a demonstration of support and help and solidarity which would grip the imagination of the whole world, and especially of our own people, who have been thrilled by the exploits of the gallant Australians in Libya, in Greece, in Malaya and in every theatre of war. If we have not a division of trained men in Canada—and apparently we have not, I do not know; the minister can answer that—then send one of our trained divisions now in England, and replace it with men from Canada. Those men over there would welcome the opportunity for active service. I earnestly commend this proposal to my right hon. friend and his cabinet.

If we are to defeat the common enemy we must seek him out and defeat him in every theatre of war and wherever he may be found. That is one of the first principles of military strategy, the soundness of which has never been questioned. On no other hypothesis shall we win this war. To me that is fundamental. And if we are to seek out and defeat the enemy; if we are, in the words of the Minister of National Defence, to "stop at nothing which can be effectively done to ensure that the forces of evil shall be stamped out"; in a word, if we are to wage total war, how can we do so when we continue to impose a strangling restriction on our ability to mobilize our man-power for active service in any theatre of war?

That is the problem to which I implore the close attention of hon. gentlemen. Up to date the answer is the voluntary system, and it alone is relied upon. I do not intend to decry out of hand the voluntary system. The loyalty and patriotism of our young men was beyond question, although we were told in September, 1940, that some of them had to be taught their national obligations. Up to a certain point of time the voluntary system produced results. But because of the extended character of the struggle; because of its gigantic nature; because of all the factors which have developed in the course of more than two years of war; because man-power is so vital to any total war effort, I am quite sure that the time has now arrived when the voluntary system is no longer adequate to the necessities of the occasion.

By a reference to recruiting statistics I am quite certain that I can prove this premise.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Further, the figures on recruiting prove beyond a shadow of doubt that some communities are doing far more than others, that there is no equality of sacrifice as between the component parts of the nation. That the voluntary system has failed may be proved not only by statistics but also by the evidence of credible witnesses, those charged with the responsibility of making the system work.

The first witness I call is the Minister of National Defence himself. Speaking in this house on November 5 last as appears at page 4115 of Hansard, he admitted that the army was deficient by 13,000 in the number of recruits sought for the preceding four-months period. That surely is some evidence; to me it is very convincing evidence. Is it not striking and convincing evidence that in the mind of the minister at least the system is not yielding the results desired?

I pause here to say that, so far as my information goes, the defects in the voluntary system are not, up to date, reflected in the enlistments for the air and naval services. I am referring only to the active army. Our men, especially our younger men, are air-minded.

To cover the situation, the department has set up special recruiting committees. One such was established in New Brunswick—a province which, in my view, has done wonderfully well in voluntary recruiting—due, in part at least, to economic conditions; we have no war industry there. I now warn the government and the minister that the consensus among those most active in promoting voluntary enlistment in that area is that the limit has been reached. I offer that in the utmost good faith, believing it to be true. At a recruiting meeting held in my own city within the last few days, addressed by the premier of the province and by the president of the university, there was hardly a man of military age present, and that fact called for some pointed remarks from at least one of the speakers, himself a veteran of the last war.

In the city of Montreal, as long ago as August 27, W. B. Scott, K.C., co-chairman of the special recruiting committee of that city, stated:

> It is time for the public to know and realize that we are not getting the recruits we need for the active army.

On October 16, Brigadier Georges Vanier, the D.O.C. for military district No. 5, Quebec City, who is charged with responsibility for making the voluntary system in his district produce results, is reported to have stated:

> We are not getting enough men; we must have more.

And, according to a news report, he stated, on or about November 20, in a public address, that Canada's present system of recruiting for the armed forces "does not meet our needs".

On August 21, Brigadier Panet stated:

Acceptable recruits have not been coming forward in sufficient numbers to meet the quota.

On November 25, Brigadier Panet stated at a press conference that recruiting was lagging badly throughout most of the country. This is what he is reported to have said:

The recruiting campaign which drew many men into the armed forces during the summer has slowed down to a walk and there is now nothing like the required number of men signing up for service.

Surely the evidence which I have submitted is the best evidence anyone can have that the voluntary system has not provided and is not providing the number of men required.

But if anything more is desired, may I call the attention of the government and the house to a speech made by the premier of New Brunswick, at the city of Saint John, as recently as the 12th of January. Speaking at a meeting of the Engineering Institute of Canada, he went out of his way to make several declarations on this question of man-power; and there is no uncertainty about what he said. Among other things, he said this:

In the United Kingdom, in other portions of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and in the United States unrestricted military service is provided for. Can we afford, as a nation, to apply a lesser measure to our contribution?

At the close of his remarks, speaking on the duty of Canada and the question of national unity, he made use of this language, which I commend to the Prime Minister and the membership of the house:

If national unity means anything it should mean that we are united in our determination to stand wholeheartedly behind our Canadian boys who are committed to bear the brunt and heat of battle. They it is who are making, or will make, the real sacrifices in this war. And as Canadians they are entitled to adequate support in every theatre of war where they may be engaged. They are entitled to our assurance that, come what may, they will receive the fullest measure of assistance that it is within the power of this country to provide. Anything less than that is not enough.

On December 16, the legislature of Manitoba adopted a resolution calling for five specific things:

1. Immediate mobilization and utilization of all resources;

2. Employment of all men and women in the most useful way, according to age, training, physical capacity and ability;

3. Elimination of provisions restricting conscription of man-power for service in Canada only;

4. Equitable division of the burden of service; and

5. Dedication of total effort to the single purpose of destroying the enemy.

This is an important declaration by an important representative body. It follows in substance the stand of the Canadian Legion, as presented to this government in November last. Surely this is evidence of a change in public opinion.

And now I put this question to the government and to the house and to the country. Are men needed for the army? There may be some who will still say, as many believed at the outbreak of war, that a large armed force is unnecessary. Let me call some further witnesses and see what they have to say on this point.

The first witness I shall call is again the Minister of National Defence. Speaking over the radio on April 8, 1941, he said:

Man-power and morale are the paramount factors in this war. . . . If anyone has had an idea that men are not needed, I want to say very emphatically that that idea is wrong. Men are needed now, and will be needed in large numbers from month to month.

Again, speaking in this house on November 5, as reported at page 4114 of Hansard, the minister stated:

There has been an idea that the army will play some sort of minor role, that this is really a navy and air force war. Let me say to you that from the views which were given to me—

I assume he is referring to his recent visit to England—

—it was made quite clear that the role of the army in this war is and will be no minor one. . . . But there is no illusion that this war can be finished without an army to meet and, with the cooperation of ships and planes, eventually beat Hitler's land forces. . . . The army supported by the other services must eventually strike the decisive blow.

This is the considered opinion of the Minister of National Defence. Who is there to challenge it?

A further witness is the former adjutant general. Speaking over the radio on September 7, 1941, he said:

There is only one power on earth that will beat Hitler—man-power. Never let it be said that our men were of the best but our numbers too few.

Surely this is sufficient evidence from high authority to demonstrate the need for man-power and more man-power. And where is that man-power needed? Is it needed within Canada, or is it needed outside Canada? Where should the enemy be faced? Should we wait until he bombs Halifax, until he scales the plains of Abraham, until Esquimalt has been converted into another Pearl Harbour? Or should we go forward to meet him in theatres of war outside our own domain? In other words, where does the defence of Canada lie?

Let us see what the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) has to say on this subject. Speaking, appropriately enough, at the Laurier Centennial at McGill university on November 20, 1941, the minister stated:

> The spirit of Canada could not survive in a world dominated by racial tyranny and given over to racial slavery. That is why every young Canadian, whether he watches the shores of Labrador, patrols the waters of the Pacific, guards the cliffs of Dover or the fortress of Hong Kong, or fights above the sands of Libya or the steppes of Russia, is defending Canada. He is not merely helping to keep the invader from our shores; he is helping, too, to preserve the kind of world—a free world—which is the only kind of world in which the Canada of Laurier or, indeed, any nation worth preserving, could survive.

Speaking, again, at the annual dinner of the Dominion commercial travellers' association in the city of Montreal, the minister is reported to have used the following words:

> The source of the most insidious, most destructive evil which the world has ever known is wherever the hordes of Hitler, the slaves of Mussolini, the murderers of Japan, are to be found. We can only exterminate, we can only destroy it at its source.

Perhaps the best witness one can call in proof of the point is Lieutenant-General Kenneth Stuart, present chief of the general staff, who stated on December 19, as reported in the press, as follows:

> One of the objectives of the enemy is to create confusion in Canada and bring about a diversion to home defence of troops that would otherwise be sent overseas. We must not forget that this war will be won outside Canada and we must send our main forces to the place where they will be needed most.

That is the testimony of a professional soldier charged with the responsibility of running this war under the government. But I go even higher than that; I go to the words of the Prime Minister himself. I quote from a speech which he delivered at the Lord Mayor's luncheon at the Mansion House in London on September 4 last. These are solemn words, and he made a solemn pledge when he said:

> I cannot make too clear that the policy of the Canadian government is to have our troops serve in those theatres where, viewing the war as a whole, it is believed their services will count most.

If, then, it is the clear policy of the Canadian government to have our troops serve in those theatres of war where their services will count most, why have we the restriction contained in the mobilization act? Why do we continue the subterfuge of two armies? Why do we not face the issue frankly, squarely and courageously, recognizing that the defence of Canada best lies beyond our shores and that our armed forces should be sent to meet the challenge?

Now, what are the reasons why we in Canada are circumscribed and unable to implement the pledge of the Prime Minister to meet total war with total effort? The reason in my view is political. It is political because the Prime Minister and his party attained office in 1921, and retained it for nine years, by capitalizing the situation which arose out of the last great conflict. The people of Canada in 1940 were made promises which, it has developed, cannot, in the light of present-day facts, be kept if we are to do our full duty.

The one most potent implement in war is man and woman power. Let no one argue otherwise. It can never be disregarded or eliminated. It is the one vital factor which must be present, no matter how highly developed our war mechanism may be. If you grant me that, and I think you all will, then I come to examine the principle of compulsion. I hope to do so objectively; I hope to do so judicially; I hope to do so without rancour.

In a democratic, self-governing country, the theory of compulsion is, in ordinary peacetimes, anathema to all our instincts. Most of us are individualists. But in war time the situation is entirely reversed. Then, not the individual rights and material comforts of the individual citizen are predominant, but the safety of the state is paramount.

Let me put this question to hon. members of this house and to the people of Canada: Is it consistent with the principles of democracy that the state, when its life is in peril, when its very existence is at stake, should have the right to demand the services and help of all its nationals? All history cries out in the affirmative. In the words of Lloyd George in 1916, on the second reading of the military service bill in England when they were putting compulsion into effect:

> There never yet has been a country faced with a great military peril that has ever saved itself without resort to compulsion. Never! It is true of autocracy; it is even more true of democracy. Every healthy body has demanded the help of its members to defend itself. Thank God Britain is not a paralytic that cannot command the services of every citizen. . . . Every great democracy which has been challenged, which has had its liberties menaced, has defended itself by resort to compulsion, from Greece downwards. Washington won independence for America by compulsory measures; they defended it in 1812 by compulsory measures. Lincoln was not merely a great democrat, but his career was in itself the greatest triumph that democracy has ever achieved in the sphere of government. He proclaimed the principle of, "government of the people, by the people, for the people," and he kept it alive by conscription. In the French revolution the French people defended their newly-obtained liberties against every effort of the monarchists by compulsion and by conscriptionary levies.

A further important statement is that which is attributed to Abraham Lincoln in an article in the Vancouver Province which just came to my attention this morning. When the Union army of volunteers was in desperate condition, President Lincoln is reported to have said:

Voluntarism is the unprincipled dodge of cowardly politicians. It has ground up the choicest seed of the nation. It has consumed the young, the generous, the patriotic, the intelligent, and the brave, and it has wasted the best moral, social, and political elements of the republic, and left the cowards, the shirkers, and the money makers to stay at home and procreate their kind.

But if we are to survive this gigantic struggle, the disciplinary and plenary powers which the government must exercise should not be limited to man-power. Man-power is of great importance. Equally important is the complete mobilization of the wealth and material resources of the nation. Some people argue that this should come first. That is a matter of opinion. My own view is that the one is complementary to the other.

Let me say at once that since July, 1940, the government has taken steps to mobilize the industry of the country and turn it in the direction of production suited to our war needs. Industry and labour alike have cooperated, and to-day I feel sure that we need not hang our heads at the record of production of Canadian labour and industry. Since July, 1940, we have been in the organization stage. To-day we have reached the production stage. Whatever part the government has played in that endeavour, certainly at the outset much was left undone. My own view is that the major credit is due to industry and labour. But it is a gigantic task to convert the peace-time activity of a peaceful agricultural and semi-industrial country like Canada into a war-time economy. It takes time and effort and leadership and good will on the part of all to accomplish this; and, while much has been accomplished, much remains to be done. To that end I advocate the principle of complete mobilization of industry, so that this country shall supply to our armed forces the necessary equipment so essential in a total war.

In the speech from the throne, the advisers of his excellency have asked his excellency to say that this parliament will be invited as an integral part of Canada's direct war effort, to approve a contribution to Britain of vast quantities of munitions, foodstuffs and supplies. We are now part of a gigantic struggle. Production of munitions and foodstuffs is an important element in this effort. Our contribution in mechanical transport has been important and impressive. Our munitions industry had to start from scratch, and, while we had a slow take-off, we have now, owing to the cooperation of industry and labour, backed by the financial resources of the nation as contributed to the government, advanced to a stage of production which is creditable to those who have been entrusted with this important task.

To make a contribution to Britain of our production of food, munitions and supplies is in line and in keeping with the policies which we have advocated since the outbreak of the war. I am glad to see that the government has now recognized the desirability of such a policy. We shall support it.

Our agricultural population has always stood ready to do its part. All it needed was to be told what to do, to be given leadership. More than a year ago I pleaded with the government to give, out of our abundance, a substantial gift of wheat. It will be recalled that this proposal did not even meet with the courtesy of any comment or reply. But I would impress upon the ministry that agriculture in Canada was, for the first two years of the war, producing in many instances below the cost of production; and so much of that situation as still obtains should be remedied.

You cannot expect agriculture to produce for less than the cost of production. For ten years they have been doing it, and agriculture is bankrupt—in my part of the country at all events. And what has happened since the war began? Owing to the fact that our agriculturists are hardly getting a new dollar for an old, men are leaving the farms for the munitions factories. There is no doubt about that. Wherever there is war industry, men, particularly young men, are leaving the farms for the munitions factories. The growth of the munitions industry has drained from many of our agricultural communities a large amount of agricultural man-power which it is absolutely essential should be maintained on the farms if we are to have not only a prosperous and contented agricultural population, but, over and above all that, the quantity and quality of production which is essential to victory.

I propose now, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the government's proposals as revealed in the speech from the throne.

The speech from the throne states that we will be advised of the — . . . means the government proposes to adopt, to effect as complete as possible a mobilization of the material resources and man-power of the country in direct furtherance of a total national effort.

Presumably this is in fulfilment of the statement made by the Minister of National Defence for Air on December 13, when he said:

These powers—

That is, those under the National Resources Mobilization Act—

—we propose to use in this emergency which confronts us, and in an endeavour to see to it that every man and woman in this country carries on the work which will be of the greatest possible benefit to the state as a whole.

If these announcements are carried out in their literal interpretation, the results will be welcomed by the country. Unfortunately there is too much ground for believing that there is in these statements little more than a pious expression of opinion. The statements do not differ from statements which were made by the Minister of National Defence for Air at the time the mobilization act was passed. Speaking in the House of Commons on June 18, 1940, as reported at page 862 of Hansard, with reference to the mobilization act, the Minister of National Defence for Air said:

It should be said that anyone who is physically fit and is below the age of 45 years may, and in fact will, have not only the opportunity but the obligation to join the militia service of Canada.

In a national broadcast on July 10, 1940, in which he was explaining the principles of the mobilization act, the Minister of National Defence for Air spoke as follows:

Every able-bodied man must be and will be trained in the use of arms to defend his home, his loved ones, his liberty, his life.

From these latter two statements of policy came the farce of the thirty-day training plan. Instead of every able-bodied man being trained in the use of arms, twenty-one, twenty-two, twenty-three and twenty-four-year-olds were given elementary training and then posted to the reserve units where many of them probably have been lost sight of. Only 15,000 have been retained in the army, to be used in accordance with the limitation of the mobilization act, solely for the defence of Canada, within Canada.

The only criterion we have of the government's sincerity with regard to its proposals for the future is the means by which it has carried out similar pledges in the past. Must we assume that the policy enunciated in the speech from the throne will be fulfilled only to the same extent as the policy announced by the Minister of National Defence for Air in connection with the mobilization act?

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

I turn now to the question of a plebiscite. Let me say at the outset that the loyal people of Canada will and do feel deeply humiliated by the declaration that we are to hold a plebiscite to ascertain if the people will relieve the ministry and, in particular, the Prime Minister, from the position in which he finds himself and which he took prior to the last election, by his own volition and initiative.

We are, in the words of Premier Bracken, to have "this crowning indignity". We are to be asked to take money needed for the war and spend it in order to relieve our elected representatives from a responsibility that goes with responsible government.

I wish to mention in passing the words of Premier Hepburn of Ontario. They speak for themselves:

One of the most dastardly, contemptible and cowardly things ever perpetrated on a dignified and respected country by any government.

Those are not my words. They are the words of a man who helped put the right hon. gentleman opposite into power.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In 1935; and let me add that a good many hon. members also are here by reason of that fact.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sorry; it is true just the same. My own view is that, "at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history"—to use the words of the speech from the throne—the course suggested by the government is the greatest exhibition of lack of national leadership this country has ever witnessed. It is a masterstroke of bad publicity for Canada among the allied nations. As one newspaper has said, "never were so many people humiliated by so few."

It is a deliberate attempt to evade responsibility and save the face of the ministry, and particularly the face of the Prime Minister. It is the negation of responsible government as we know it and practise it.

We cannot win this war by a plebiscite. Germany does not carry on war by plebiscites. The first function of government is to secure the safety of the state, and the government that fails in that duty commits the cardinal, the unpardonable sin. Let this government rise to the level of its duty; let it not be afraid to lead. A plebiscite is not a policy; it is the negation, it is the avoidance of a policy. It is merely an unworthy expedient to avoid facing a vital issue. Its purpose is to avoid rather than to face responsibility; it is to avoid rather than to enforce the performance of a duty. It is not a declaration of faith; it is a declaration of impotence.

What is the position? The government knows better than anyone else the position in relation to man-power. It knows better than we can know that the maximum must be done and done quickly. This government knows the responsibility which we assumed when we declared for total war, when we sent men overseas, when we undertook to stand by them with adequate reserves and reinforcements. Now we propose to abandon these undertakings to the shadow of a plebiscite.

This government, by this lack of action, has failed these men and it knows it has failed them. History will hold it responsible if disaster comes. In effect, the government admits that we are not a united nation, and we are not a united nation because of commitments made by this government previous to March, 1940, based on the situation then existing, which has little no relation to the known facts of to-day—facts better known to the government than to any of us. And yet it will not move along the only honourable path open to it.

What are these commitments? Briefly, that we shall not have compulsory military service for overseas, in those theatres of war where the conflict is to be fought and won, or, God forbid, lost. The Prime Minister doubtless will argue that because he, unasked, made that commitment, he has a mandate from the people not to use compulsion for overseas service. That will, I assume, be his position. In fact, I believe he has so stated.

Let us examine this question of mandate. Did the Prime Minister, elected to power in 1935, have a mandate to declare war in 1939? Most assuredly he did not. Did the Prime Minister have a mandate from the people of Canada to adopt the principle of compulsion for military service in Canada in June 1940? Most assuredly he did not. Did the ministry have a mandate from the people to put a ceiling on prices at a time when the price level of agricultural products, for instance, was low and uneven? Most assuredly it did not. Did the ministry have a mandate—and I want hon. gentlemen to direct their attention to this, because we are going to meet with it sooner or later—to take from the war appropriation bill millions of dollars, perhaps hundreds of millions, voted by this parliament, taxed from the people of the country of all classes, poor and rich alike, to prosecute the war with the utmost vigour, and switch those hundreds of millions of dollars to the purposes of the new Commodity Prices Stabilization corporation to help maintain the price ceiling on imports from abroad? Assuredly it did not.

I deny that the ministry had a mandate from the people against compulsory military service for overseas. It was not an issue. The Prime Minister himself made a pledge, which was accepted. He now seeks to be relieved from that pledge, but that is a very different thing from a mandate. If I interpret aright the vote of the last election, it was a mandate to prosecute the war—interpreted as moderate in some quarters, middle-of-the-road in others, but undoubtedly a mandate to prosecute the war.

We entered upon a leisurely prosecution of the war for the first nine months. There is no doubt about that. Then came the tragedy of Dunkirk, and things began to happen. The government under pressure stepped up the tempo of the war. We had the mobilization act, a long step forward, but with a limitation self-imposed by the ministry. It contained the very principle of compulsion which the Prime Minister has proclaimed against. The country accepted it without protest. It was the first real sign of leadership the country had been given. Now we have reached a time properly described in the speech from the throne as "the gravest crisis in the world's history", a time which demands the utmost effort, and instead of the situation being met man-fashion we are offered a plebiscite.

Could anything be more fantastic? Could anything be more futile? Let us examine this question of mandate a little further.

In 1916 Woodrow Wilson was elected President of the United States on a cry that he kept the nation out of war. I remember it, and so do you. Yet within twelve months he sent a strong, stirring message to congress, and the United States declared war on Germany. That is history. Did he have a mandate? Most assuredly he did not. He had a mandate to keep the nation out of war.

In 1938 Mr. Chamberlain, valiantly striving to preserve the peace of Europe, brought down in the British House of Commons, long before war came, but in anticipation of war, a measure designed to conscript the man-power of Britain. Previously he had vigorously opposed the idea. Did he have a mandate for that decision? Most assuredly he did not. His action in doing so was an outstanding illustration, however, of the application of the principles of responsible representative government.

In 1914 Sir Robert Borden gave an assurance to the British government that if war came his government was prepared to stand by Britain, and he immediately called parliament together to sanction his undertaking. He staked the life and existence of his ministry on that undertaking. That was responsible government under the British system, and under the British practice which we follow here; that is the principle which this government should invoke.

Did Mr. Roosevelt have a mandate to put into operation the compulsory principle when he started his training plan before the United States went into war? Most assuredly he did not.

This government should have a policy either for or against complete national service in an all-out effort for total war, and by that policy it should stand. That is the leadership which the nation is looking for. And what are we getting? A plebiscite. A plebiscite on what? Not on a concrete proposal for total war—nothing of the sort; a plebiscite seeking a release from an obligation arising out of a commitment made by the Prime Minister, unasked for, and long anterior to the happening of the tragic events with which this nation and the world are at present confronted.

Again, could anything be more fantastic, more humiliating to a self-respecting people? The Prime Minister asks to be relieved from a pledge, made voluntarily, without any mandate. And yet his government has placed on the statute books, in the Dominion Elections Act, a prohibition against any candidate for parliament signing any pledge to his constituents. Why is that prohibition there? Because the government of the day, the government and parliament, decided as a matter of principle that such a thing was improper and should not be done. Yet we have this spectacle before us to-day.

I have a proposal to make to the Prime Minister. If the Prime Minister feels bound by his self-imposed vow; if his conscience bothers him and he now wishes to be relieved of that vow; if he desires, in the light of reason and world events, to change his position and pursue a total war effort by all means open to him as the leader of the state; if he wishes, in the light of the situation now confronting him and this nation and this war-torn world, to give a new lead to the nation, there is a well-defined and well-established constitutional position and practice open to him. That is to say, he may come to this house and say to us that, "notwithstanding my self-imposed vow, for which I had no mandate, I now find that, in the circumstances which confront this nation as a result of this gravest moment of world crisis, another course must be followed, another and more vigorous policy must be pursued." It is his duty and his privilege to come to parliament in this way, to state his new policy, and to ask for the endorsation of the people's elected representatives. That is the British way of responsible government. That is the Canadian system of responsible government. That is the course the Prime Minister should pursue under the pressure of to-day's situation.

Is there anyone so bold as to say that is not the right and proper course? Who is there in this house who will say that that course should not be pursued or cannot be pursued? I venture to say that he would get the consent of the house almost unanimously.

Why have the people delegated to us, their elected representatives, the power to speak for them, and what are our obligations? Surely we have some obligations in the premises. Let those who seek to answer peruse once more the classic declaration of Edmund Burke to the electors of Bristol in 1774. The words he uttered then are in principle as true to-day as they were 170 years ago. In order to refresh the memory of all of us I propose to read a major portion of that address:

> Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion high respect; their business unremitted attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasures, his satisfactions, to theirs; and above all, ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interest to his own. But his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or to any set of men living. These he does not derive from your pleasure; no, nor from the law and the constitution. They are a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion.
> My worthy colleague says his will ought to be subservient to yours. If that be all, the thing is innocent. If government were a matter of will upon any side, yours, without question, ought to be superior. But government and legislation are matters of reason and judgment, and not of inclination; and, what sort of reason is that in which the determination precedes the discussion, in which one set of men deliberate and another decide; and where those who form the conclusion are perhaps three hundred miles distant from those who hear the arguments?
> To deliver an opinion is the right of all men; that of constituents is a weighty and respectable opinion, which a representative ought always to rejoice to hear, and which he ought always most seriously to consider. But authoritative instructions; mandates issued, which the member is bound blindly and implicitly to obey, to vote and to argue for, though contrary to the clearest conviction of his judgment and conscience, these are things utterly unknown to the laws of this land and which arise from a fundamental mistake of the whole order and tenor of our constitution.
> Parliament is not a congress of ambassadors from different and hostile interests; which interests each must maintain, as an agent and advocate against other agents and advocates; but parliament is a deliberative assembly of one nation, with one interest that of the whole; where not local purposes, not local prejudices ought to guide, but the general good resulting from the general reason of the whole. You choose a member indeed; but when you have chosen him he is not a member of Bristol, but he is a member of parliament.

I beseech the Prime Minister to alter his purpose while yet it is not too late, to adopt a manly course, to give to the country that measure of national leadership for which it is so earnestly looking and seeking at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history. This house will support him. The nation will support him.

What is to be the form of this plebiscite? What question or questions will it carry? Will it merely ask approval of a release of the government from a past commitment restricting the method of raising men for military service, as indicated in the speech from the throne, or what? Who is to vote? When will the vote be taken? What machinery will be used? Will our soldiers, sailors and airmen, at home and overseas, have the opportunity of voting—that privilege which at present is denied them in by-elections? What list will be used? Will there be a new registration? There should be.

What is the estimated cost of the plebiscite? When will it be held? Time is an all-important factor under conditions as they are to-day. And I ask this question seriously: What effect will the announcement of this plebiscite have upon the pending war loan? I venture to think, disastrous. Has the government considered the risk to our war effort involved by the delay in having to hold this plebiscite before any major change in policy can be effected? Will it take two months, or three months, or how long? The enemy may have won a decisive victory before then, while we indulge in a plebiscite. What a tragedy! Mr. Roosevelt, that master of epigram, recently said: "Lost ground can always be regained; lost time never." All these and kindred questions the Prime Minister should make plain when he speaks, and I invite him to do so.

What will the government do if the plebiscite is indecisive, if the majority is small? That is a possibility. Will the government then claim that it has a mandate to pursue its present policies? Or will it say that, that expedient having failed, we shall try another course? Meantime, while Nero fiddles, Rome burns! The whole thing is fantastic.

If the plebiscite carries, what then? We have no commitment from the ministry as to what they will do. The speech from the throne indicates that the administration will then take the position that, subject only to its responsibility to parliament—and I am glad to learn that the administration admits that it has responsibility to parliament—the administration shall, irrespective of any previous commitment, possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise. They do not ask for a mandate under this plebiscite; they ask for a blank cheque. We do not know what will be done. What is to be done under that blank cheque? Will it be, as it has been in the past, a matter of political expediency and not of vital reality? I fear so. That, Mr. Speaker, is altogether too narrow an undertaking. Rather, it is no undertaking at all. It will not satisfy the public demand. It will not constitute a policy which will meet the gravest crisis in the world's history. It is no policy at all. It is merely a palliative.

And what if this plebiscite is rejected by the people of Canada? What then is to be the position? Will the government resign? Or will the Prime Minister endeavour to carry on, cabin'd, cribb'd, confined, by a self-imposed vow which renders it impossible to carry out his other pledge to the people of Canada that he will meet total war with total effort, that he will prosecute total war with total effort? What of the pledge of the Minister of National Defence that Canada, along with the other democracies, will stop at nothing—these are the minister's words; do they mean anything? —which can be effectively done to ensure that the forces of evil shall be stamped out? Will the minister resign if this plebiscite does not carry? Knowing him as I do, I believe he will.

But what of the Prime Minister? Surely if this proposal fails, his position will be impossible. Will he resign, or will he, no matter what the cost in lack of total war, continue to see his duty, as he stated in Winnipeg on July 10 last, "to seek above all else to preserve national unity?" That was his supreme objective then. That was why he did not propose to go to Britain; he must remain here to preserve national unity! Well, he went to Britain, and I think he did right. Did we have national unity in Canada? Have we had it all along? The answer comes back in a thousand tongues, that we have not national unity. We have something quite different; we only have unity of the Liberal party, and we shall never have national unity under a party government in war time. The two are incompatible.

Does the Prime Minister think that this subterfuge of a plebiscite to relieve his personal position and save his face makes for national unity? I leave to public opinion the answer to that query. I know what the answer is among the loyal people of this country, who feel nothing but humiliation and disgust at this lack of leadership. For, mark you well, you cannot have national unity without leadership, leadership of a type which only a Churchill and a Roosevelt are giving to the democracies. National unity will come to Canada only when we have in this country a truly national government representative of all the people and backed by all the people. Then you will have national unity; then you will achieve a total war effort. You will never achieve it under a party government.

I am done, Mr. Speaker. I and those who think as I do cannot accept the government's proposal of a plebiscite as a solution of the problems confronting this nation at a time of gravest crisis in the world's history. It is not even a palliative. It is a subterfuge to help the Prime Minister out of an impossible position, created by himself, and with the sole desire to perpetuate his political power.

The people have asked this government, this parliament, for real leadership. In this proposal they have been given nothing. They have asked for bread; they have been given a stone. Frankly, it leaves the country with a feeling of frustration. Verily, never were so many people humiliated by so few!

I move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), the following amendment to the motion now before the house:

That the following words be added to the address:

"This house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers, instead of giving to the country the leadership so essential at a time properly described in the speech from the throne as the greatest crisis in the world's history, on the contrary, have sought to evade their responsibility by holding a plebiscite, which, in the view of this house, is the negation of responsible government.

And this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have not seen fit to recommend to parliament without delay additional measures designed to

(a) completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war;

(b) supply the imperative needs of agriculture, industry, and the fighting forces of the nation; and

(c) prepare for the post-war period."

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) rose on Friday last to begin his remarks in this debate on the address, he very properly and very courteously extended his congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address. I should like to join with him in those congratulations. I noticed that my hon. friend was somewhat careful to stress the manner of the presentation and said very little about the substance of what was said. I should like to extend congratulations not only upon the excellence of the delivery of both hon. gentlemen but also upon the excellence of the remarks themselves. The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) have made a most important contribution to this debate, which, I think I am right in assuming, may prove to be one of the most important in the history of this parliament.

It was of interest and of significance, I am sure, to all present that both hon. members, one coming from the province of Quebec and the other from the province of Ontario, held identical views in regard to Canada's war effort and the policies which should govern in the prosecution of that effort. Both were equally concerned that all the policies of the government should seek first and foremost to preserve national unity in this country. It was fortunate, as well as a matter of interest, that both hon. members had had the privilege last year of visiting Great Britain and of giving to this house during the course of their remarks their impressions of the effects of war on the British isles, and particularly their impressions of the courage and endurance of the brave people of Britain.

It is not without interest that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who is the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), the leader of the Social Credit party, who I understand are to follow me in this debate, were at the same time afforded the same opportunity. And perhaps I may be pardoned if I remind the house that the leader of the opposition and myself each had an opportunity last year of visiting Great Britain, of conferring there with members of the administration and others, and of seeing conditions first hand for ourselves. It is, I believe, a matter of satisfaction and pleasure to all six of us that we had the opportunity of making the trip to Britain by air, and returning to Canada in the same way. I hope the experience gained as a result of those visits will, as I believe they will, be reflected increasingly in the views we may express in the house in respect of the prosecution of the war.

Mr. Speaker, I should like also to congratulate my hon. friend the leader of the opposition on the presentation of his address to the house. I thought his remarks presented the position of his party very fairly. I am sure I shall not be expected to agree with some of the things he has said, but with much of what he said I can agree with him most cordially. I believe it would have been better for this country if some of the controversy which has taken place with such acrimony and violence in a section of the press of the country had awaited the more reasonable and reasoned form of discussion, which I hope will be followed in this parliament.

With regard to what my hon. friend has said concerning the necessity of a total war effort, I believe it will be found that he and I hold similar views. What I take exception to in his remarks, and with respect to the controversy which has taken place outside the house, is that most of what has been said has related exclusively to only one aspect of the war effort. That aspect, I believe I shall be able to show, is a much narrower aspect than is generally assumed. All that Canada has done in addition has been more or less completely ignored.

I must say that I am surprised to find that, after having spent so large a portion of his time telling myself and the house that the government should have brought forward a policy of conscription for service in the military forces overseas, my hon. friend has not had a single word to say about conscription for military service overseas in the amendment he has just moved to the address in reply to the speech from the throne—no, Mr. Speaker, not a single word. My hon. friend is now so concerned about it that he is looking at his amendment to see if that is really so—to see if there is anything in the amendment which will give him sufficient ground to stand on in any reply to what I have just said.

The amendment is in the nature of a want of confidence motion in this administration. I had not expected my hon. friend to extend congratulations to the administration on all of its effort, but I had expected him to stand up for the policy which he led us at all events to assume is the policy of his party at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is right there, in paragraph (a). Read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will have every chance to read his own policy later. But on a matter of so great importance as the one we are now discussing I do not think one should be obliged to search with the aid of a microscope to discover the purport of an amendment which has been moved at a time like the present.

As I have already said, there has been a little too much controversy in the press concerning this matter, prior to the discussion in parliament itself. That controversy has gone very far to confuse in the public mind the real significance of many matters which should receive more careful consideration and discussion in this House of Commons. I believe, as I proceed with what I intend to say this afternoon, it will be seen that with respect to some of the matters on which there is an impression throughout the country that the government and the opposition differ, that not only are we closer together than the public has been led to assume, but that on many matters our views with respect to policies which should prevail are very, very much the same. I believe that is true with respect to the views of all parties in the house. I am speaking now of views concerning an effort for total war, with respect to selective service, and with respect to compulsion where it is necessary, in the application of selective service, and in connection with other points to which I shall make reference later.

But what I do wish at once emphatically to suggest is that hon. members seek to get the true picture of Canada's war effort as a whole, and not be misled into misjudging that effort or misjudging the ministry by singling out one particular aspect and seeking by controversy to obscure the larger and really magnificent effort of the country as a whole.

I cannot agree with my hon. friend, either, in his views with respect to what in the truest sense of the word constitutes responsible representative government. To my mind responsible representative government is related very closely to the will of the people, and particularly to the will of the people as expressed at the time of a general election. If I were to accept what my hon. friend has said, and what some of his followers have applauded him in saying, then I should be obliged to ignore altogether the will of the people as expressed at the last general election. And not only that; but after its having been given also the interpretation which my hon. friend time and again has placed upon it, namely that this government was returned to power with the vast majority it has, in virtue of the fact that it was so often stated that if this government were returned to power, conscription for overseas would not be applied. Notwithstanding that he has said such was a fact, he now wishes me to turn round and ignore the expressed will of the people altogether.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there may to-day be reasons—and I hope this afternoon to make it clear that there are strong reasons—why the people of this country should be told that any commitments made in the past which in any way restrict the government in the exercise of its best judgment with respect to all phases of the war should be removed. That being the case, the people should be told that the government is of opinion that not only the government but all hon. members should be released from any past obligations which may bind their freedom of discussion in any particular at the present time.

When my hon. friend goes on to ask me what I am going to do with respect to any expression of view which may be made by the people in connection with any reference which will be made to them, may I say to him that in seeking to get relief from past commitments I am not going to begin by making new and fresh commitments. In seeking freedom on the part of the ministry I am not going to start in by seeking to tie my own hands. I know the kind of lecture I might have to expect from my hon. friend were I to do anything of the kind.

In the political controversy which, unfortunately, has become so acute of late; which is obscuring the magnitude and balanced nature of Canada's war effort, and which, moreover, threatens to impair its efficiency, attempts are being made to confuse in the public mind three things which should be kept separate and distinct. With respect to each of these the government's position is being misrepresented:

The first relates to total effort to meet total war.

The second relates to national selective service as a means to this end.

The third relates to the application of compulsion without restriction of any kind; in other words, to conscription for service in the armed forces overseas.

As respects total effort to meet total war, that is and has been right along the policy of the present administration. As regards national selective service as a method of achieving a total effort, that, too, is and has been the policy of the government. As respects the use of compulsion in applying the principle of national selective service, that, also, is a part of government policy. In the case of compulsion only one definite limitation has been recognized, and that is the limitation of the use of compulsion as a method of raising men for military service overseas.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Whether or not the government, all circumstances considered, has gone as far in achieving a total effort as it might have gone or should have gone, is a fair subject for debate. Whether the government, all circumstances considered, has applied the principle of national selective service as rapidly and as extensively as it should have been applied, is also a fair subject for debate. Whether, with the single limitation referred to, the government has, all circumstances considered, made sufficient use of compulsion in applying the selective principle is also a fair subject for debate. So far, however, as policy itself is concerned, whether it relates to total effort, to national selective service, or to the use of compulsion, with the single limitation mentioned, there exists no difference, so far as I am aware, between the government and its opponents. I propose to substantiate these statements by reference to the government's record.

What, then, is the difference with respect to policy between those who to-day support the administration, and those who, by every means in their power, are seeking to create opposition to the government in its war effort?

Freed from the emotions and passions aroused by the storm of controversy, it will be seen that the only difference that does exist is a difference with respect to the application of compulsion in raising men for military service overseas.

An examination of the facts will show that the difference of which the government's opponents are seeking to make a national issue is a much smaller difference than even the existing limitation on the use of compulsion would seem to imply.

The limitation, as I have stated, relates solely to the application of conscription to the raising of military forces for service overseas. These forces, as hon. members are well aware, are, in the present war, not confined to one single service, as in the last war was almost entirely the case. They include the men enlisted in the Canadian navy and in the Canadian air force, as well as those enlisted in the Canadian active army. I shall later on have something to say about the total numbers already enlisted for services anywhere, in the three branches of the armed forces. So far as the navy and the air force are concerned, it is well known that the numbers who have volunteered have considerably exceeded the number it has been possible to accept for immediate service. Moreover, it is worth noting that in Britain as in Canada compulsion is not used as a method of raising fighting men for the navy and the air force.

The issue, therefore, between the government and its opponents narrows down solely to the question of the application of compulsion in raising men for the army. The issue is narrower even than that, since compulsion is already being employed, to raise men for service in the army in Canada. It should be added that the issue thus narrowed to conscription for overseas service in the army relates only to a possible future contingency, since up to the present the active army has secured the necessary recruits on a voluntary basis.

Notwithstanding all that has been done and is being done by the armed forces, and in war production of all kinds, and in finance, the government's opponents are seeking to make of conscription for the single purpose mentioned, a symbol of Canada's total war effort.

As I have said already, the policy of the government is, and from the outset has been, the achievement of a total national effort for total war. I propose, now, to explain exactly what I understand by the total effort of a nation. It involves two fundamentals.

The first of these is the devotion to the prosecution of the war of all the available energies and resources of the nation in excess of those required to maintain the health and efficiency of the people.

The second—and it is of equal importance—is a proper balance in the use of these energies and resources for the manifold needs of war. A total effort, for example, would not be achieved if so many men were enlisted in the armed forces, at sea, on land, and in the air, that there were not enough men left on the farms to feed them. In the same way, a total effort would not be achieved if so many men were enlisted that not enough were left in the factories to provide them with the necessary ships, planes, tanks, guns and ammunition. Moreover, modern war has shown that an army, and equally a navy, is dependent upon adequate air support. A total effort, therefore, cannot be made unless the right balance is achieved between all branches of the armed forces. These examples could be multiplied indefinitely. Indeed, the most difficult task in total war is the decision of the correct balance between different aspects of the war effort.

Moreover, the appropriate balance of one country would seldom, if ever, be appropriate for another. Germany, for example, is able to raise an exceptionally large army because she can draw on the enslaved populations for war production and food. Britain, likewise, is in a position proportionately to increase her armed forces to a greater degree than Canada, because Canada requires men to help feed and arm Britain, as well as to feed and arm our own country.

The foundation of the total effort of any country is a correct decision as to the minimum requirements of the civilian population. Once that is determined, production and consumption except for war, must be steadily and progressively cut down to the minimum. Waste must be eliminated; the manufacture of all luxuries and many comforts must cease. The surplus of man-power and resources thus secured must be used to make war.

In using this surplus, it is vital that it be developed in the right way. It is not enough to create a navy, an army, and an air force; the sailors, soldiers and airmen must be fed, clothed and armed; they must be moved to the area of combat, and communications must be maintained; reinforcements of men and supplies must be kept flowing. All this requires the most careful planning and detailed organization.

In reviewing the organization of a total effort for Canada, I shall begin by outlining the nature of Canada's war-time responsibilities; in other words, the various aspects of our total effort.

At the very outset of the war, the Canadian government considered with the British government the broad lines of development and of our war effort. We tried to envisage all the possibilities of a conflict, which we realized might last for years, and which might spread throughout the world. From time to time, since 1939, there have been shifts of emphasis, but anyone who cares to refer to the broadcast I made on October 31, 1939, will find in it the outlines of every aspect of our effort as it has developed since the outbreak of war.

For convenience, Canada's war effort may be divided into six main aspects. All of them are vital to a total effort. The achievement of a total effort depends upon keeping them in proper balance.

A necessary foundation of our whole effort is the maintenance of the security of our own Canadian territory and territories like Newfoundland and Labrador immediately adjacent to our shores. I know some of our citizens were impatient with the government for insisting, from the outbreak of war, upon our responsibilities for the coastal and territorial defence of Canada. We did not find similar impatience in London, where potential dangers, from all quarters of the world, were clearly perceived. Recent events in the Pacific, and the sinking of ships off Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, should serve to dispel any lingering belief that Canada is immune from attack. What we must guard against now is the opposite tendency. Happily, Canadian territory is geographically more secure than the territory of most of the belligerents. We all know, too, that the best defence of our territory is the defeat of the enemy before he arrives. But we must not neglect necessary defences. We must be prepared to meet sudden raids from sea or air in certain strategic areas. The most elementary rule of warfare is the maintenance of the security of the base of operations. This aspect of our effort necessarily includes Canada's share of our joint responsibility with the United States for the defence of North America.

The Canadian navy has a share in this primary responsibility for our territorial defence. Our navy has also a great and growing responsibility in the North Atlantic. Its part in the battle of the Atlantic is already important. We are all aware of the great strain which has been thrown on the British navy, and, more recently, on the United States navy, by the existence of warfare in every ocean. We know, too, that the possibility of finally crushing Hitler depends upon keeping open the sea lanes from North America to Britain and Europe. From the outset, the government has placed no limit on the expansion of Canada's navy. We have manned ships as fast as the navy has been able to acquire them. Not only is the greatest possible Canadian naval strength needed in the North Atlantic, but so are merchant ships to carry men and supplies to Britain. Canada is providing and will continue to provide and to man both, to the very limit of our capacity.

All this is very different from Canada's task at sea in the last war. Then, we relied, in the early stages of the war, not upon ourselves, but on the British navy for the protection of our coasts on the Atlantic, and the Japanese navy for our protection on the Pacific, and, in the later stages of the war, upon ships of the United States navy.

The army shares with the navy the responsibility for our territorial defence. It shares also with the navy in the defence of Newfoundland and other islands in the Atlantic. Its main task, however, has been its contribution to the defence of Britain. Every Canadian will remember with pride what Mr. Churchill has said on more than one occasion, of the sense of security which the presence of our troops has given to the government and people of Britain.

It is natural for Canadians, remembering the last war, to judge our war effort in terms of the size of our army. In the last war, Canada's war effort was essentially and almost entirely an army effort. This, however, is a very different kind of war, and its successful prosecution demands very different methods. This war has been well described as a war of machines, of science and of psychology. I think those are Mr. Churchill's own words.

While prepared to send overseas as large an army as Canada can support, without failing in other directions, the government is even more anxious to see that every man, every unit, and the army as a whole, will have the greatest possible striking power. More important to-day than the size of an army is its striking power.

The Royal Canadian Air Force, like the navy and the army, has its part in our territorial defence and the defence of Newfoundland. Its responsibilities on the Pacific coast have been increased by the outbreak of war with Japan. But its main task is the administration of the British commonwealth air training plan. The battle of Britain in 1940 completely justified the emphasis which, from the opening days of the war, Britain and Canada alike placed upon the achievement of air superiority.

Every campaign in the present war has equally shown that, without adequate strength in the air, an offensive action and even prolonged resistance on land or at sea is foredoomed to failure.

The safety of Britain, and Britain's capacity to strike back at the enemy, depend alike upon the air strength concentrated in Britain. That strength is being developed largely on Canadian soil, both in the British commonwealth air training plan, and in the schools of the Royal Air Force. The air training plan is the greatest and the most vital of all Canada's military commitments in this war. No effort has been spared and no effort will be spared to assure its continuing success.

Canada's concentration on air training has inevitably reduced the number of Canadian squadrons in operations overseas. Unlike the army which serves overseas as a unit, a large and growing proportion of the trained personnel of the Canadian air force serves with the Royal Air Force. The claims of national pride have been subordinated to a total effort.

In nothing could the difference between the present war and the last, and the nature and extent of Canada's effort be more marked than in the country's contribution to aerial warfare.

A vital aspect of Canada's war effort is our contribution to the food supply of Great Britain. This contribution has grown steadily in importance. Britain cannot feed herself, and her own great and growing armed forces. Still less can she feed the ever-increasing numbers of men we are sending from Canada to add to her armed strength. In the present war, unlike the last, her sources of food on the continent of Europe have all been closed off by enemy occupation. Canada is the nearest source of food left open. Without our food, the people of Britain might starve. Without our food, the Canadian army in Britain would be a handicap instead of a help. In a literal sense the very lives of the British people and our own armed forces overseas depend upon the exertions of Canadian farmers and fishermen. In prosecuting the war, theirs is no secondary role. As time goes on, the demands upon Canada for supplies of food for the allied forces and, later, for the peoples of the now subjugated countries are certain to increase.

I have mentioned food production separately because I doubt whether the country is fully aware of the vital importance of food regarded as a munition of war. Otherwise, it might well have been included as a phase of the productive aspect of our total effort. It is not in food alone that Canada's war production extends far beyond our own needs. Canada's production of the machines and munitions of war is already developed on a scale which would have been considered impossible two years ago. The other day, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) stated that Canadian munitions were being used against the axis on every battlefront and on every ocean. That, surely, is cause for pride, though not for self-satisfaction. It is well to remember that every battle which has been lost in this war has been lost because of the lack of machines; of planes, or tanks, or guns, or ships. The cry we continue to hear from every front is not so much for numbers of men as it is for tanks, for planes and for ships.

In making the machines of war, Canada's productive task has only begun when our own armed forces have been supplied. Except for planes, Canada has been a main source of British supplies, outside Britain herself. Only recently has the United States begun to overtake us. And now the United States has many other urgent demands to meet. Canadian weapons and munitions must help fill the gap made larger than ever by Japan's entry into the war.

Our mines and forests, our foundries and factories, are also helping to supply the other nations of the British commonwealth, Russia, the forces of the other allies, and even the United States. In September of 1939, the government assured parliament that every effort would be made to avoid the useless sacrifice of men because of the lack of modern weapons. Every campaign has gone to prove how highly mechanized and how heavily armoured an army must become before it can hold its own in present day combat.

While it cannot be said too often that total war demands total effort, it cannot be too strongly emphasized that total effort means using men and resources, where each will count for most, not where their employment will fit in with individual wishes or the wishes of those who have failed to see the needs of our effort as a whole. Too many of those who are talking of total war are measuring Canada's effort, as I have said, in terms of one aspect only.

Both in the short run and in the long run, Canada would weaken the cause of the United Nations by failure to give adequate protection to vulnerable areas in our own territory; or by failure to contribute adequately to the naval protection of the Atlantic passage; or by failure to maintain a formidable striking force in Britain or in whatever theatre of war Canadian troops may serve; or by failure to keep up the air training on which the air strength of the British commonwealth so largely depends; or by failure to provide adequate food supplies and to produce weapons and munitions in adequate volume. All are essential to Canada's war effort. What is equally essential is that our effort shall be in the truest sense a balanced effort. We must not fail in any of these directions. It is only by keeping all these demands upon our man-power and resources in proper balance that our utmost effort will be achieved. It might be added that all this depends upon the satisfactory financing of the entire effort.

In the light of what I have just set forth, I desire briefly to review Canada's record of achievement in the present war. It will be seen that we have developed our effort in all its aspects simultaneously. Equally, we have sought to maintain the proper balance between production and the armed forces and, among the armed forces themselves, between the needs of the navy, the army and the air force. The foundations of Canada's war effort along these lines were laid in the closing months of 1939. At that time, I stressed the importance of preparing for a long and terrible struggle in which staying power, the power to hold out to the end, might well be decisive.

Knowing the importance that, in the minds of many, would be given to an expeditionary force, I pointed out the vital importance as well of an adequate naval and air contribution by Canada. I said that our effort would be concerned in equal measure with the fighting forces at sea, on land, and in the air; that our economic contribution might well prove to be the most important of all; that, in addition to being the granary of the British commonwealth, Canada might also become its arsenal. From the very outset, we took a broad view of Canada's tasks in this war and organized our national effort on all fronts. I turn now to what has been achieved.

First, as respects the navy: At the outbreak of war, there were some 20 ships and less than 2,000 men in the Royal Canadian Navy.

At the beginning of 1940 the navy had grown to 80 ships, and over 5,000 men; at the beginning of 1941 the numbers had risen to 175 ships, and 14,800 men. At the beginning of this year the navy comprised over 350 ships and 27,600 men.

From the beginning of the war, the navy has assumed a steadily growing share of convoy work in the North Atlantic. Canadian ships of war have shared in the protection of Britain from the threat of invasion. Sailors of the Canadian navy have served and are serving in all the seven seas, either in Canadian or in British ships. Canada's pride in the navy is reflected in the long waiting list of young men seeking to join the service.

As respects the army: At the outbreak of war the permanent active militia, as Canada's regular army was then called, included about 4,500 men. By the end of 1939, the Canadian Active Service Force, to give the army its name at that date, had increased to 64,000 men. The first Canadian division had just arrived in Britain.

At the close of 1940, the active army included almost 170,000 men. A Canadian corps of two divisions had already been formed in Britain. Canadian troops were also on active service in Newfoundland, the British West Indies and Iceland.

At the close of 1941, there were more than 260,000 men in the Canadian active army, enlisted for service in any part of the world. About half this number were on active service outside Canada. A third infantry division, an armoured division, an army tank brigade, forestry troops, and other specialized units, and thousands of reinforcements were in Britain, in addition to the original corps of two divisions.

Canadian troops continued to serve in Newfoundland and the West Indies. Two Canadian regiments recently added a new chapter of valour in the heroic defence of Hong Kong.

In addition to the active army, several thousand young men had, during 1941, been called up for military training and service in Canada under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Of this number, a considerable proportion had enlisted in the active army, the navy, and the air force. Some thousands more had been assigned to duties in Canada, thus relieving enlisted men for service elsewhere.

Mention should also be made of the reserve army, in which at the end of 1941, some 140,000 men were enrolled.

As respects the air force: At the outbreak of war the active strength of the Royal Canadian Air Force was some 4,000, all ranks. By the close of 1939, the strength had risen to over 8,000; by the close of 1940, it had reached 43,000; by the close of 1941, it exceeded 100,000 men.

In addition to the home defence duties which began with the outbreak of war, the air force was engaged, in the closing months of 1939, in planning and arranging the organizational details of the gigantic British commonwealth air training plan.

The year 1940 was a year of construction development for the plan. But, in spite of the strain which was then placed upon the force, Canada's three squadrons which were sent overseas did valiant service in the Battle of Britain.

In 1941, responsibilities of the home war establishment for patrol work in the Atlantic area and Newfoundland steadily increased. The outbreak of war with Japan added seriously to its tasks on the Pacific coast.

The duty of providing a trained air crew for the active theatres of war through the air training plan continued throughout 1941 to be the heaviest responsibility of Canada's air force. The magnitude of the air training plan was still further enlarged during the year, and the output of trained men accelerated.

The growing part of the Royal Canadian Air Force in air operations over Britain and the continent of Europe has found sombre reflection in the casualty lists. At the close of the year, from the original three, Canada's own force in the field was expanded to twenty-eight squadrons which had already been formed or were in the final stages of formation in Britain. Thousands more of the Canadian pilots and air crew, trained in the commonwealth air training plan, were serving as individuals with the Royal Air Force, not only in Britain but also in the western desert and other theatres of war.

Over and above any commitment under the commonwealth training plan, the call for highly qualified and scientifically trained personnel for very special duties, such as radio location, has been responded to by the dispatch overseas of thousands to fill this immediate and important need. Canada's share in the war in the air has reached a stage where Canadian airmen have become a major factor in the armed strength of the British commonwealth.

At the outbreak of war, the production of war materials in Canada was on an exceedingly small scale and was confined to a very limited range of equipment.

Throughout the closing months of 1939 and the early months of 1940 Canada passed through the stage of organization. Plants were established; tools and raw materials and labour mobilized; and the ground work of production laid. But apart from a few lines, such as personal equipment for our fighting men, there was little to show for our manufacturing efforts, except a steadily rising total of orders placed, and contracts let. We did, however, achieve a vast expansion of the output of essential raw materials both for our own and for British production.

Throughout 1940, there was constant criticism of the inadequacy of Canada's war production. No allowance was made for the length of time required to organize the production of complicated machines, most of which had never been made in Canada before. Today, however, the self-same critics are obliged to admit that Canada's production has reached immense proportions. They now are giving exaggerated and disproportionate emphasis to another single aspect of our war effort. Indeed, not a few of the government's critics have become altogether too indifferent to war production. They do not seem to realize, as the government realizes, that, if Canadian production is to be pushed to the limit, many of the most difficult problems are still ahead of us.

It should be remembered that Canada has undertaken, in addition to equipping her own divisions, to help equip British divisions, Australian divisions, New Zealand divisions, yes, and Russian divisions. If there is to be a united allied effort, Canadian weapons and munitions, as well as those of other countries, must be sent where they will be of the greatest service to the common cause.

In two years of war, Canada has experienced an industrial revolution. Our country is now producing almost every type of machine and equipment called for in our munitions programme. In some directions, this production has reached staggering proportions. In others it is mounting steadily.

Let me cite a few details: Our present shipbuilding programme involves a total expenditure of over $500,000,000. We have built and are building large numbers of corvettes, minesweepers, patrol boats and motor torpedo boats. We are engaged in a merchant ship building programme of considerable proportions, so great in fact as nearly to equal Britain's own programme. Canada is also engaged upon the construction of destroyers.

We are making guns of all kinds: anti-aircraft guns, field guns, naval guns, tank and anti-tank guns, several types of machine guns, anti-tank rifles, sub-machine guns, rifles, trench mortars, bomb throwers, and smoke projectors.

In the production of aircraft, Canada's experience has not differed from that of other countries. We have had our full share of problems, delays and disappointments. At one time or another, since the war began, fifteen types of aircraft have been produced in Canada. Production is now going to be concentrated on seven modern types: an elementary trainer, two advanced trainers, two bombing and gunnery trainers, a flying boat, a twin-engine fighter and a long-range bomber. In addition to the production of new planes, some thirty plants distributed across Canada from Halifax to Vancouver are engaged in the overhaul and repair of planes. In order to meet the growing need, these facilities will require to be doubled during the next twelve months.

One of the most spectacular achievements has been the production of army vehicles. Nearly 200,000 of all types have already been delivered. Army vehicles made in Canada are in use on every battlefield of this world-wide war. A large number of tanks and universal carriers have also been delivered. Canadian tanks have already been in action in Russia.

I shall not attempt to catalogue the whole range of Canadian war production, but special mention should be made of the hundreds of thousands of bombs; the millions of shells; the hundreds of millions of rounds of small arms ammunition; and the hundreds of millions of pounds of explosives and chemicals already made in Canada. Not only are we making these munitions for our own forces and for Britain, but vast quantities have been made available to the United States.

The United States, as well as Britain, look to Canada for a part of their supply of essential base metals. Canadian production of aluminum, copper, nickel, lead and zinc has grown steadily in volume. Our steel production—the foundation of our industrial war effort—is still expanding. Since the invasion of Norway cut off all European supply, Canadian timber has been vital to Britain's war effort.

A most striking fact about our war production is that the value of the supplies we have provided for Britain since the war began has been at least as great as the cost of raising, equipping and maintaining Canada's own armed forces. In the first two years of war their value exceeded $1,000,000,000. Britain's need for these supplies has been so urgent that, in some cases, our own forces have gone short in order to fill more pressing requirements for the armed forces of Britain.

In the whole field of war production Canada has become a major factor. Among the United Nations, we share with the United States alone the capacity to produce substantially more than the requirements of our own armed forces. It is true that, in order to supply Russia, Britain has valiantly suffered a shortage in recent months. It is to North America that Britain looks to meet the deficiency, and in North America to Canada no less than to the United States.

The record would not be complete without a reference to foodstuffs for Britain. In times of war, wheat, bacon and milk products are munitions of war quite as much as planes or tanks or guns or ships or shells or explosives or chemicals.

Canada has sent to Britain vast quantities of wheat and flour; bacon and other pork products; cheese and eggs and honey. The range and quantity of Canadian food required by Britain is steadily increasing as the hazards of war make access to other sources of supply difficult or impossible.

For Britain, for many of the other nations fighting for freedom, Canada is an arsenal, a shipyard and a storehouse of food, as well as a full partner on the fighting front.

One measure of Canada's approach toward a total war effort will be found in the record of our financial achievements. The financial burden the war effort has imposed upon the Canadian people is enormous. The cost of raising, equipping and maintaining our own armed forces and of building up the country's defences has reached almost incredible heights.

From the outbreak of war in September, 1939, until March 31, 1940, during the planning and organizational phase, these direct war expenditures amounted to some $118,000,000.

In the fiscal year April 1, 1940, to March 31, 1941, these expenditures totalled approximately $752,000,000.

The estimate of direct war expenditures for the present fiscal year (April 1, 1941—March 31, 1942) was $1,450,000,000. Of this huge sum $851,000,000 had been expended by the end of 1941.

Our direct war expenditure from the beginning of the war until December 31, 1941, had accordingly reached a total of $1,721,000,000. The magnitude of our direct war effort may be illustrated by a comparison of this figure with the cost of Canada's effort in the last war. War expenditures, from August, 1914, to March 31, 1920, including demobilization after the war, totalled $1,670,000,000. In other words, by the end of 1941, a period of two years and four months, our direct war expenditures in this present war already exceeded the whole expenditure on the last war over a period of six years less four months. Even more striking is the fact that Canada's direct war expenditures in the present fiscal year will not fall far short of the total cost to Canada of the last war.

In addition to providing for our direct war expenditure, the government also undertook to provide whatever Canadian dollars were necessary to pay the Canadian producers of war supplies for Britain. For this purpose, it has been necessary, since the outbreak of war, for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to provide an additional $1,219,000,000.

Every effort has been made to distribute the huge financial burden as fairly as possible. By December 31, 1941, some $2,000,000,000 had, since the outbreak of war, been raised from taxes alone. To achieve this what amounts practically to a peaceful revolution in our national tax structure has been necessary. The government has relied mainly on direct and steeply progressive taxes on the incomes of individuals; and drastic taxation of corporation income and excess profits. Succession duties have been included among the permanent features of the national taxing system. Agreements are being negotiated with the provinces to facilitate the orderly and equitable mobilization of the financial resources of the country to the utmost limit of its capacity.

Taxation, war savings, and war loans, while necessary to provide the vast sums required to meet huge war expenditures, also serve a further essential war-time objective. They act as an automatic check on civilian consumption and thus free material resources and man-power for war purposes.

The curtailment of civilian consumption, as I have already pointed out, is absolutely vital to a total war effort. Financial measures such as increased taxation and greater saving contribute to this end; but all the curtailment required cannot be accomplished by financial means. I shall say a word later about other methods used by the government to make additional resources available for the war effort.

One method the government has not been willing to use as a means of reducing consumption. That is the easy method of allowing prices to rise unchecked. That would, of course, have reduced consumption drastically. But it is a method which would be unfair and unjust in the present, and perilous for the future. That is why, in October last, the government decided to halt the rise when prices began to rise rapidly. It was in order to spread the burdens of war as fairly as possible that the government undertook to control all prices, and, where necessary, to take other steps to control civilian consumption in fair and equitable ways.

In undertaking to control the cost of living, the government was following, on the economic side, the policy, adopted at the outset of the war, of a progressive and orderly advance towards the goal of a full-out effort. It was realized that the stage would ultimately be reached when the problem of a general rise in prices would have to be faced. We felt it was advisable to postpone action to control all prices until such action was really necessary. Complete control of prices, as all are coming to understand, involves many complications, and restrictions. Moreover, like all compulsory measures, it requires a large staff to administer the machinery of enforcement. It was clearly undesirable to take men's services from other tasks one moment before they were needed. Price control became necessary, late in 1941, if our people were to be spared the fears, the sense of insecurity, the suffering and the profiteering which the inflation of prices inevitably produces. The successful operation of price control and the ancillary measures to control wages and salaries will help in the winning of the war. After the war, they will aid our country on the road to recovery and reconstruction.

From this brief review, it will be seen that Canada's war programme has been a balanced programme. The record of achievement is a balanced record. What is more, this effort has been achieved by methods which have kept our country united. Indeed, without unity of purpose and effort as a nation, it could never have been achieved.

Let me come now to the programme for the present year, which has been prepared in reference to the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943.

The navy already has 350 ships and over 27,000 men in the service. The programme of expansion for 1942 can be expressed very simply. Our shipbuilding capacity is being used to build ships for Britain and for Canada. Apart from the naval craft built for Britain, the navy will take all the ships Canada can build, and it will enlist and train the men required to man the ships. No limitation has been placed upon the number either of ships or of men, save in so far as the number of available ships necessarily sets a limit to the numbers of men who can be enlisted for training.

The Canadian active army now consists of the corps of three infantry divisions, divisional and corps troops, an armoured division, and an army tank brigade in Britain. In addition, there are, in Britain, in reinforcement units, thousands of reinforcements. A fourth infantry division, and the brigade groups of a sixth division, have been mobilized in Canada. In addition, there are the troops on home defence duties on our coasts and in vulnerable areas, and troops in training as reinforcements.

During 1942, that is this year, up to March 31 next, it is proposed to create overseas a Canadian army of two army corps: one army corps to comprise three infantry divisions and two army tank brigades; the other to consist of two armoured divisions. In addition, all necessary ancillary units to serve these two corps will be provided. To reach this objective it will be necessary: first, to convert the present fourth division into an armoured division and train and equip it for this special role and dispatch it overseas in due course; second, to raise, equip, train and dispatch overseas another army tank brigade for use with the infantry divisions of the Canadian corps; third, to raise, equip, train and dispatch additional ancillary troops for both the infantry corps and the new armoured corps; fourth, to maintain and reinforce these two corps; fifth, to provide headquarters staff organizations for an army and an armoured corps.

It will, however, be recognized that the ultimate disposition of all troops necessarily depends upon circumstances which determine the course of the war.

As for the territorial defence of Canada, special dispositions have been made where that seemed to be required, as a result of the outbreak of war with Japan. The garrisons of coast defences have been strengthened. Reserves have been allotted to deal with any likely emergency.

A special reorganization and regrouping of reserve formations is under way right across Canada, and an emergency organization of active service personnel in training centres or elsewhere is being established.

Whether it will be necessary to mobilize another division for Canadian defence when the fourth armoured division is dispatched overseas will, of course, depend on developments in the intervening period.

The situation in Canada in respect to anti-aircraft defence is improving each month as more equipment becomes available. New units are being mobilized in accordance with anticipated deliveries of equipment.

The 1942 army programme will create a thoroughly modern, well balanced and hard-hitting Canadian overseas army. This army will be complete and self-contained. It will be capable of operating in any theatre, and can be effectively maintained in respect to both man-power and equipment.

It should be noted that the outstanding feature of the army programme for 1942 is the proposed increase in the armoured strength of the army overseas. This development is in line with military experience in the present war and with the policy of the British army.

I have already pointed out that the Royal Canadian Air Force at the end of the year mustered well over 100,000 men, without counting civilians. The air training plan is in full operation; the responsibilities and duties for coastal defence particularly on the Pacific have greatly increased; and the complete establishment of twenty-eight Canadian operational squadrons overseas is to be fully achieved, not only with a full complement of flying personnel, but also with all necessary ground and maintenance crews.

Until such time as arrangements may have been concluded with the government of the United Kingdom to increase the number of Royal Canadian Air Force squadrons beyond twenty-eight, the Canadian pilots and other air crew sent overseas, in excess of the numbers needed to maintain these Canadian squadrons at full strength, will serve with the Royal Air Force where thousands of their comrades are already in active service.

Some increase in the home war establishment must be anticipated. Of this, for obvious reasons, I cannot be expected to give details.

Thousands of young Canadians are now engaged in active operations, and the augmentation of these numbers by air training will continue to be the heaviest work of the Royal Canadian Air Force in Canada. In the long run, as the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) has repeatedly warned, no more acute man-power problem faces the government than that of assuring the supply of recruits for training as air crew, not in the immediate future but some months or a year hence. There is no question of reluctance to serve; on the contrary, young men are eager for the opportunity; but the numbers available with the necessary high qualifications are limited by our small population. Looking ahead, this question looms larger than the needs of the navy or the army, or of industry.

To the solution of this problem by means of the development of air cadets, pre-entry education, physical training and conditioning and other means, the government is directing intensive study.

The effectiveness of Canada's own armed forces depends upon the effort put forth on the farms, in the mines, in the forests, in the workshops and factories, on the railways and the merchant ships of Canada. Canadian production since the war began has been essential as well to the effort of Britain and, indeed, of every nation fighting the axis powers. The dependence on Canadian productive efforts of what are now called the United Nations will be greater than ever in 1942; that is, this year.

I have already pointed out that the government has set no limits to war production. The only limits are those imposed by the growing scarcity of management, tools, raw materials, and skilled labour. Although the Minister of Munitions and Supply told parliament in November that practically all available establishments in Canada were already engaged in war production, he recently stated that he was "raising the sights again". More production can be achieved only by the conversion of existing establishments from unessential production, and by the transfer of labour. There is no slack left in our industrial economy. But I shall be surprised indeed if we do not find, when the year ends, that Canadian industry and Canadian labour have once again amazed us all.

The productive increases already achieved by Canadian agriculture have been little short of miraculous. Cheese production has increased by one-fifth, concentrated milk output by two-thirds, hog production has doubled, and egg production will soon be at an all-time high. For this third year of the war dairy farmers, hog producers and poultry men have been asked to produce the maximum quantities possible.

Canada has contracts with Great Britain for bacon, hams and other pork products amounting to 618,000,000 pounds. The forthcoming agreement for cheese is expected to be for at least 125,000,000 pounds. Then, 675,000 cases of evaporated milk will probably, again this year, be required by Britain. The present contract for eggs is for 30,000,000 dozen. Further large contracts for summer and fall delivery are anticipated. Canada has also undertaken to supply Britain with 4,500,000 pounds of honey; 510,000 barrels of fresh apples; 425,000 cases of processed apples; 300,000 cases of canned tomatoes; and other fruit and vegetable products in substantial quantities. Altogether, the value of the exports of the above commodities will be at least $180,000,000. Exports of the same products in the year before the war were valued at about $50,000,000.

If we do all in our power to help them meet their labour problems, we can, I know, count on Canadian farmers to do the rest. But the goal which is set for them for 1942 will demand their utmost effort.

In his speech at the Mansion House during my visit to Britain, and again in this chamber on December 31, the Prime Minister of Great Britain made particular reference to the financial assistance which Canada had extended to Britain in the present war.

The extent to which Canada has been furnishing supplies to Britain is, I am sure, not fully realized by our own people. Canada has supplied weapons and munitions to Britain for the use of Britain's armed forces, and for other allied forces for which Britain has undertaken to provide equipment. Canada has also supplied to Britain raw materials required in British war production, and foodstuffs required to feed the armed forces and the people of Britain. In other words, Canada is, at one and the same time, a full partner in the war in her own right, and one of the principal arsenals, granaries and shipyards for Britain, other parts of the commonwealth and other of the allied nations. The total volume of Canadian shipments to Britain since the commencement of the war compares favourably with the volume which, thus far, has moved from the United States.

Canadian financial assistance to Britain has been necessary in connection with the provision of these vast quantities of war supplies. The financial assistance which Canada has extended to Britain is, of course, not what is ordinarily understood by the use of that term. Canada does not ship money across the Atlantic; the money itself never, in fact, leaves Canada. Canadian financial assistance has been extended to Britain in the following manner. The British government has purchased war supplies from Canadian producers. Britain, however, has not had enough Canadian dollars with which to make payment for the greater part of these supplies. Payment has accordingly been made in pounds sterling. This English money has remained on deposit in London, because it cannot, of course, be used in Canada. Most of the Canadian money required to pay the producers of guns and copper and bacon and other commodities has been supplied by the Canadian government. This Canadian money has had to be raised from the Canadian people in taxes, war savings or war loans.

Canada's financial aid to Britain has, in other words, amounted to this: the Minister of Finance has raised money in taxes and loans from the Canadian people to pay Canadian producers for ships and tanks and guns and planes and other munitions shipped overseas for the British army, navy, and air force; also, to pay Canadian producers for aluminum, copper, steel, timber and other raw materials needed for British war industry; and, as well, to pay Canadian farmers and fishermen for the food Canada has sent overseas to feed the British people.

The British government has been able to acquire some Canadian money as a result of ordinary business transactions, such as the sale of British exports to Canada, and receipts from interest and dividends on Canadian securities. This money has been used to pay for a part of the British purchases. But British exports to Canada are necessarily on a diminishing scale.

In the early months of the war, the British government had a considerable accumulation of gold and was able to use some gold to pay for war supplies received from Canada. The British government acquired some additional Canadian money by an arrangement to have Canada buy back from Britain certain Canadian government and government guaranteed securities held in Britain. For the most part, however, payment for Canadian supplies has, of necessity, been made in pounds sterling.

For the past year, Britain has urgently required from Canada vast quantities of munitions and supplies. These Canada has created the capacity to produce. The Canadian producers have been paid in Canadian money by the Canadian government. Canada, in turn, has been credited on the books of Britain with English money, which, however, cannot be spent in Canada. In this way, Canada's surplus store of English money has been assuming larger and larger proportions. What, in effect, all this really means, is that Britain has a steadily growing war debt to Canada.

We all remember the international problems and difficulties caused, after the last war, by the existence of huge war debts owed by one government to another. We recall how reluctant nations were to accept payment from other nations in the only way in which a huge external debt can really be settled, that is by removing tariffs and accepting payment in goods. We know that huge external debts created suspicion and bitterness between nations. The government is anxious to avoid the creation of similar difficulties in the post-war relations between Britain and Canada. We believe that difficulties would be avoided and, at the same time, the real extent of Canada's war-time contribution would be more fully comprehended, if Canada's financial arrangements with the United Kingdom, both for the past and for the reasonably foreseeable future, were duly clarified. We believe that the time has come for this clarification.

The government, accordingly, is proposing to the British government that the financial arrangements between Canada and Britain should be placed on a new footing. The offer which is being made is one which we have reason to believe will be warmly welcomed by the British government.

In so far as past transactions are concerned, the proposal is to convert the major portion of the pounds sterling which have accumulated to Canada's credit in London into a loan to the United Kingdom of seven hundred million dollars, in Canadian money. It is proposed that, during the war, the loan will be reduced by the proceeds of any sales made to persons outside the United Kingdom, of Canadian dollar securities now held by residents of the United Kingdom, and also by the proceeds of the redemption or repayment of any Canadian securities held in the United Kingdom. The new loan would not bear interest during the war. As soon as practicable after the war, it is proposed, however, that the governments of the two countries should arrange an appropriate rate of interest to apply from that time forward, and make appropriate provisions for retiring the loan.

Since the beginning of the war, approximately $400,000,000 in Canadian money has been made available to Britain through the purchase by our government of Canadian government securities held in Britain. In other words, our government, during the war, has been paying off a part of the dominion's external debt. Under the arrangement now proposed, the Canadian government will purchase outright the remaining dominion government and Canadian National Railway securities owned by residents of Britain, estimated in amount at some $295,000,000. This means that the Canadian government will, before it becomes due, pay off its own remaining debt in Britain. The British government will pay the present owners of these securities in pounds sterling. The Canadian government, in turn, will pay the British government for the securities in Canadian dollars.

For the future, in addition to the financial provision for raising and maintaining Canada's own armed forces, the government will, as a part of Canada's direct contribution to the defeat of the axis, ask parliament to make provision for meeting Britain's shortage of Canadian dollars by supplying, free of charge and without obligation, to Britain, munitions of war, raw materials, and foodstuffs up to an amount of one billion dollars. Such provision would mean that thereafter Canada's direct war effort would include, in addition to her armed forces, an outright contribution of war supplies on a vast scale.

The proposals I have outlined will, it is anticipated, suffice to meet the requirements of the United Kingdom for Canadian war supplies until early in 1943.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

In announcing this offer, I wish to draw particular attention to the fact that the financial burden of war now being borne by the Canadian people will not be increased by the proposed financial arrangements with the United Kingdom. Canada has already undertaken to supply the Canadian money required by Britain to pay for Canadian war supplies. Whether this money is provided in the form of a loan to Britain, or of a direct contribution to the defeat of Hitler, will not change the number of dollars which the Canadian people are already committed to raise for the prosecution of the war.

The advantages of the proposed financial plan are that it will avoid the growth to huge and unmanageable proportions of a war debt which might breed serious misunderstandings and bitterness in the future; that it will definitely relieve Britain of any financial anxiety which might arise in connection with its Canadian sources of supply; and, finally, that it will bring our working arrangements into accord with the realities of the war situation.

The adoption of the new plan will mean that Canada, at this time of intensified crisis, is giving unmistakable evidence of the determination of our people to put forth their utmost effort in the preservation of our own liberties and in the common cause of freedom.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, before I resume my remarks at the place at which I left off just before recess, I might say a word in reference to the request which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition made, that the government should consider the advisability of sending a division from Canada to Australia. As my hon. friend is aware, whatever assistance it may be possible for any one country of the United Nations to give to any other country of the United Nations, or any one part of the empire to give to any other part, must necessarily be a matter of consideration with all the countries and parts of the commonwealth concerned. The government is anxious, as the government of every other part of the British commonwealth would be, and as the United States and other of the United Nations would be, I am sure, to cooperate in every possible way in affording such assistance as can be effectively given to our friends and brothers in Australia. But what form that assistance will take, what it may be best to do, can only be determined after there has been an opportunity of complete and careful conference with all the parts concerned. My hon. friend will have noticed that the particular request which our friends in Australia are making, is at the present time, for planes and tanks; and I am not without grounds for believing that they may be receiving some assistance of the kind from Canada at present, and that we shall be able to add considerable assistance to them in those particulars, and possibly in other ways, as time goes on.

I had been outlining, Mr. Speaker, our programme for the coming year. In that outline I showed, I think, that in every aspect of Canada's war effort we planned to move forward to the limit of the country's capacity. It remains for me to give some indication of the total financial burden which the programme will involve.

Little more than a rough estimate of the cost can be given at this stage. The Minister of Finance will be somewhat more precise when he introduces the war appropriations. But the provisional estimate at this stage is $3,000,000,000.

The financial advisers of the government believe that this huge sum and the additional sums required for civil government can be raised by taxation, war loans, and war savings, but they equally regard this as a full-out financial effort.

In preparing its war programme for 1942, the government has had but one objective. It is the objective we have had from the outset, namely, the achievement of a total national war effort. It is not, however, an effort exaggerated in any one aspect at the expense of other aspects. It is, as it has been from the beginning, a balanced effort. It seeks to take account of all demands and all eventualities, as far as it is humanly possible to foresee them. Moreover, it is so planned as to fall into its appropriate place in the united effort of all the nations arrayed against the axis.

The most searching and careful study has been given to the extent to which it is possible to expand each aspect of the national effort without weakening some other aspect just as important to the whole.

Equally careful consideration has been given to the methods by which the desired ends can best be attained. A balanced total national war effort requires the mobilization through taxation, loans and savings of the necessary financial resources, and the most careful decisions with respect to the means by which this is to be accomplished. It also requires the mobilization of material resources, and the mobilization of man-power, and like care with respect to the best means by which both of these can be accomplished. I shall leave to the Minister of Finance the question of the means to be employed in mobilizing the financial resources. That matter will have to await the presentation of the budget.

In the case alike of the mobilization of material resources and of man-power, some measure of compulsion is necessary, just as it is in the case of the mobilization of financial resources. The use of compulsion, or if you prefer the word "conscription", for the mobilization of material resources and man-power is, as I have said, not new. It has been approved by this parliament. The principle of compulsion is embodied in the National Resources Mobilization Act, which was enacted on June 20, 1940. This act gives the government very wide powers to mobilize, for war purposes, both the material resources and the man-power of the country. Since of the two the mobilization of material resources is much less a subject of controversy, I shall speak of it first.

In the early stages of the war, the mobilization of material resources presented few problems. Production was in the stage of organization. The demand for raw materials was small. Shortages of Canadian supplies could readily be met by purchase in the United States. In other words, all our other shortages boiled down to a shortage of United States dollars. The government lost no time in facing this problem. Foreign exchange control was established on September 15, 1939, and increasingly stringent measures were taken through the prohibition of pleasure travel in the United States, and the restriction of unessential imports to ensure the supply of American dollars needed to buy war materials in the United States. Fortunately, at the very moment when these drastic measures threatened to prove insufficient, the whole problem was vastly simplified by the reciprocal arrangements embodied in the Hyde Park declaration. The problem has been further simplified by the establishment of joint committees on war production, and by recent agreement between the United States and Canada to remove all obstructions to the free flow of war materials between the two countries.

Means have also been taken to stimulate the production in Canada of strategic raw materials and to prevent the export of raw materials of which a shortage might be anticipated. Stock-piles of imported raw materials have been accumulated.

Steps have been taken to discourage waste, and to salvage waste products. By severe taxation and the encouragement of war savings, civilian consumption has been curtailed.

In recent months, the manufacture of non-essential goods has been curtailed or eliminated entirely. The compulsory mobilization of material resources has been progressively and selectively effected by a highly efficient though exceedingly complex system of economic controls. I might cite the curtailment in the production of motor vehicles and a great variety of other articles in which metals are used, as for example, stoves, vacuum cleaners, washing machines, refrigerators and radios. I might also mention the drastic limitations placed upon the use of silk and rubber.

These and many other measures have been taken progressively, in order to make materials available to our war industries as they have been expanded. Already, the rationing of some commodities for civilian use has begun. If we are to achieve a total effort, far more drastic curtailments will follow.

The whole business of mobilizing material resources is not spectacular; it is far from pleasant; but it is the real foundation of a total war effort. The government has never hesitated to take any of the necessary steps at the moment it was believed they were essential.

I turn now to the question of the mobilizing of "man-power", which term, by the way, when it is used without definite restriction, is intended to comprehend "woman-power" as well. I wish to speak more particularly of the means of mobilizing the additional man-power and woman-power required to maintain the existing effort, and to develop the enlarged programme.

National selective service is the method by which the government proposes to accomplish the mobilization of man-power on an extended scale. Let me define national service as it is understood by the government. By national service is meant any form of service, either voluntary or compulsory, which contributes directly to Canada's war effort. By national selective service is meant the selection of men and women for the various forms of national service according to the method or methods calculated to produce the most satisfactory results. In order to be selective, national service does not necessarily need to be compulsory. Voluntary service is also selective. The army, for example, does not accept every man who offers to enlist. In finding the right place for a man, no quality is likely to count for more than willingness to serve. Compulsion is only of value where it serves to ensure a greater total effort. Wherever necessary and of value in increasing Canada's war effort, the government is prepared to employ compulsion. It would, however, be a waste of effort to engage a small army of officials to compel people to do what they are perfectly ready and willing to do without compulsion.

In announcing that national selective service is the method by which the government proposes to accomplish the mobilization of man-power on an extended scale, the government is not announcing a new policy. What we propose to do is to extend what, in fact, we have been doing right along, that is, to apply the principle progressively. In other words, we intend to continue to extend the application of national selective service to meet new needs as they arise.

As I have already said, this policy, too, is not new, nor is it being advanced to-day for the first time, or as a consequence of high-pressure methods employed to influence the independence of members of parliament. The principle itself, as I have already explained, was approved by this parliament in June, 1940. It has already been applied to some extent. On November 12 last, I made it very plain to parliament that, with respect to the mobilization of man-power, the government's policy was one of national selective service; and, also, that an extension of the application of compulsory selective service—conscription, if you will—was a part of that policy. Let me repeat my exact words as reported in Hansard of 1941, page 4321:

> So far as conscription stands for compulsory selective national service, that is a principle which this government has embodied in its National Resources Mobilization Act passed at a previous session of this parliament. As to how rapidly that principle should be applied, and how far it should be extended, is a matter which the government must decide and will decide in the light of all the knowledge which it has with respect to the needs of our war effort and the position of the country in meeting them.
> I want it to be distinctly understood that so far as the principle of compulsory selective national service is concerned for Canada, in Canada, I stand for that principle. I have never taken any other stand. It is the position that I have held all along. It has been applied in connection with military training, and applied in a number of other directions I might mention. How much further it will be applied the house will learn as the government takes its decisions on that matter.

I did not, at that time, announce any decisions as to its further application. Such announcement would hardly have been appropriate at the close of a session which had already completed all its major business. I felt that, in fairness to parliament, announcements on such an important matter should be reserved for a new session, when members would have adequate opportunity for the fullest consideration and debate.

The extended application of compulsion to national selective service is a highly complicated matter. It is, in itself, a selective process. The use of compulsion selectively is no less complicated in the mobilization of man-power than in the mobilization of material resources. However, the fact that further decisions were not announced in November has not delayed the further application of the principle. Indeed, it has rather facilitated the very careful planning and organization which is so essential before the extended application of selective service, whether on a voluntary or a compulsory basis, can be brought into effective operation.

Everyone will recognize that the effective use of the man-power—and the woman-power—of a nation is essential to the achievement of a total war effort. But it is not the total. It is, as I have already stated, only one factor in the total. In considering any extension of the application of selective service as a means of promoting a total war effort, it is important to remember that national selective service is not an end in itself, but is only a means to an end, that end being a total war effort.

The problems of mobilizing resources, and mobilizing man-power, are inseparable from one another and like all other aspects of our war effort must be kept in proper balance. Material resources cannot be mobilized without man-power to mobilize them, and no good purpose is served by mobilizing men unless they are provided with the necessary materials and tools to work with, and the necessary equipment and arms to fight with.

Under the authority of the National Resources Mobilization Act, a limited measure of national selective service on a compulsory basis has been applied since October, 1940, in the selection of young men for military training. The principles of selection have been age and marital status, with adequate safeguards, through postponements, for other essential forms of national service.

The government now proposes to apply the compulsory powers of national selective service to other aspects of the war effort as well as to military service. These powers will be applied selectively and progressively to those activities where it is considered by the government that their application will contribute to the goal of a total effort. It has not been necessary, nor would it, indeed, have been helpful at an earlier stage to make demands upon the nation such as the government has in contemplation, and as will be set forth as the session proceeds. In this connection I invite your attention particularly to what I am now about to say.

These demands will intimately affect the lives of many men and women. They will also effect the life of the nation in the following way: there will be a further very definite curtailment of the amenities we have hitherto been able to preserve. These demands will not affect physical health or that contentment of spirit that comes from serving great causes, but they will make further inroads upon the comfort and convenience of very large numbers, and upon the character and aspect of our daily life.

It must not be supposed that there are large reserves of idle people leading a leisurely existence who can now be called to the national ranks. The entire adult Canadian population, with very few exceptions, gets up in the morning, works all day, and goes to bed tired out at night. In our form of society people have been accustomed to find their own jobs to a very large extent, thus saving vast government machinery.

If all the efforts of everyone were really devoted solely to making war, there would be no food, or fuel, no transport, or clothes. We have to recognize the fact that a very large proportion of the population, particularly women, is occupied in ministering to the needs of the more actively engaged population, and that that number has increased since the last war with the increase of population who have to be ministered to.

The process which is now to be applied—and has, indeed, been continuously applied—much more vigorously, is not the calling of idle people to work, but the sharpening and shifting forward of a proportion of their effort into work which is more directly related to the war.

Here I end the portion of the remarks to which I invited special attention.

It may surprise hon. members to learn that the words I have just used are not my own words. With the exception of the two words "Canadian population", which I have substituted for the words "British race", the statement is not mine. It is a statement by the Prime Minister of Great Britain. After all that has been said in Canada in recent months about all-out conscription in Britain, and its application to women as well as to men, it may occasion still more surprise that this statement was made, not at the beginning of the war, nor at the end of the first year of war, nor even of the second year of war, but as recently as December 2 last.

The explanation of the timing is simple. In war, correct timing is vital. Some steps must be completed, before others can be taken. The time of application of measures is quite as important as the extent of their application. No mechanical rule or order can be followed. The appropriate measures for one country will never exactly suit another country. In the case of each, local conditions must be considered; the nature of the tasks undertaken by each country, and their relative importance in the total effort of all, must be the decisive factor.

To achieve a total national effort everyone must contribute to the effort either directly or indirectly. All cannot do the same work. As far as possible, each must be fitted into the appropriate task. Many, perhaps the majority, can find the appropriate place for themselves, and, as Mr. Churchill said, save "vast government machinery". Certainly no government is wise enough to decide the appropriate task for every individual in the nation. And, even if governments were all-knowing, the war would not wait while this stupendous job was being performed. What the government can do, and what we propose to undertake to do, is to meet the urgent needs by the best means we can devise.

I shall not attempt at this time to outline the measures which are contemplated in order to extend the scope of national selective service. I shall confine myself to saying that the extended policy of selective service will comprehend measures to increase the supply of man-power available for war industry and for the armed forces; also measures to safeguard and, where necessary, to assist in providing agricultural labour required to expand war production on the farm. These objects it is proposed to achieve by positive action to increase the mobility of available man-power, to add to the number of women available for employment, and to facilitate the transfer of labour from non-essential occupations to direct employment in the furtherance of the war effort. The policy also envisages improvements in the method of selecting men for compulsory military training and service.

The administrative machinery required to carry out the proposed measures equitably and efficiently will necessarily be intricate and complicated. The capacities of men and women cannot be weighed and measured and graded with the same certainty as the qualities of wheat or cement or steel can be determined. To perform the complicated task of selection with success will demand both time and skill.

The government, moreover, has no desire to add unduly—which means wastefully—to governmental machinery. It is imperative that we avoid using men and women for unnecessary tasks. In those aspects of our war effort in which voluntary methods are working satisfactorily, voluntary selection, including a measure of choice by the individual of the appropriate field of service, will be continued. The use of the more expensive and complicated methods of compulsion will be confined to those branches of our war effort where it is felt that compulsory selection will increase its efficiency.

While the government, in its policies, has sought a total effort, it has never ceased to believe that only by a united effort could total effort be achieved. In every step the government has taken from the moment the threat of war appeared on the European horizon, we have sought so to direct our policies and the course of public affairs that the country would remain united in its support of the national effort.

Every hon. member of this house knows that, except for the assurance that, in the event of a European war, there would be no conscription for service overseas, this parliament would never have decided, in the immediate and unanimous manner in which it did, to stand at the side of Britain in the resistance of aggression, and the defence of freedom.

Hon. members are also aware that if, at the time when Canada's participation in the war was challenged in an election in the province of Quebec by a government professing a different political faith, a like assurance with respect to service overseas had not been given in the name of the present government by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), and other Liberal leaders and members of this House of Commons from the province of Quebec, the verdict of the people of that province might have been wholly different.

At that time, the people of the province of Quebec turned out of office the government that had sought to thwart Canada's war effort, and placed in office under the leadership of Hon. Mr. Godbout, a government which was prepared to cooperate with the federal administration in furthering the national effort. I doubt if any service at the time meant more to the allied cause than that rendered by the people of the province of Quebec in thus demonstrating the unity of Canada in its war effort.

When, three months later, the direction of the war effort of Canada by the present administration was challenged—though from an opposite extreme—by a resolution of the legislature of the province of Ontario, and the administration appealed to the people of Canada in a general election, the government gave the assurance that, if returned to power, it would continue to maintain the policy of no conscription for service overseas. Not only the government, but the then leader of the Conservative party—a party disguised it is true, for the time being, as the National Government party—took an equally strong stand in opposition to conscription for overseas service. The candidates, not of one political party only, but the vast majority of candidates in the general election gave their constituents to understand that they were opposed to a policy of conscription for overseas service. In so doing, reference was continually made to the effect of the adoption of conscription in the last war, and the serious wound which, at the time, its application had inflicted in the side of our country.

As I look at the membership of this house which represents the will of the nation as expressed in the general elections, held during this very war, I say there are not a dozen members,—if, indeed, there are that many—regardless of party, who could rise in their places and truthfully say that, in the last general election, they had advocated a policy of conscription for military service overseas.

Time and again it has been said by hon. members opposite—and I think my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said it oftener than anyone else—that the present government would not have had the enormous majority it has in this present parliament if it had not given the explicit assurance that, if returned to power, it would not adopt conscription for military service overseas. Others have held that it is unfair to say that any one issue should be singled out as the decisive issue in a general election. They maintain that many factors were in the minds of the people. It is said, for example, and I believe it to be true, that the present administration owes its vast majority to the belief so generally held that at this time of war no better administration could be found to administer Canada's war effort and to conduct the country's affairs. Not the least of the reasons for this belief was the view that the present administration might be expected to harmonize differences more effectively and thereby to avoid disunity at a time of war when, above all else, unity is vital.

In accordance with the general consensus of view as respects the mandate given by the people themselves, the government, throughout 1940 and 1941, proceeded to develop an all-out war effort. Might I pause here to say a word in reference to what my hon. friend the leader of the opposition said this afternoon with respect to mandates. If I recall aright, he said that this government took immediate action when Japan declared war, though we had no mandate from the people. He referred to a number of other acts performed by the government for which he said the government had no special mandate. He referred to Abraham Lincoln and some of his actions at the time of the civil war, for which my hon. friend said Lincoln had no mandate. That is all perfectly true; but of all the instances mentioned by my hon. friend there was not one in which, when the possibility of action of the kind mentioned had been placed before the people themselves, any subsequent action on the part of the government was restricted by a specific pledge or commitment with respect thereto. Of all the instances he mentioned there was not one in which the people themselves had been given the assurance, before the event itself took place, that if it did take place the government, while it would do all in its power to meet the situation, would not in one particular go counter to what it believed at the time to be the will of the people, and had expressly set forth the limitation that was to be respected. Therefore there is a great difference between what my hon. friend has put forward with respect to actions where there were no commitments in advance and the action of this government respecting a commitment that was definitely made with regard to a definite situation.

In this connection might I commend to my hon. friend, as I continue with what I have to say, the words by Abraham Lincoln which he quoted, that government was or ought to be "of the people, by the people and for the people." I hope my hon. friend will keep that thought in mind in reference to the criticism he has been offering with respect to myself, that I have been paying too much attention to the people and not enough attention to some of the things that at the present time are being said by a vociferous press.

As I was saying, in accord with the general consensus of view as respects the mandate given by the people themselves, the government, throughout 1940 and 1941, proceeded to develop an all-out war effort. Until parliament was in session in November last, the government continued to carry on that effort, not without criticism, but certainly without the issue of conscription for overseas service being raised, in any authoritative manner, by any party or party leader in this house.

At the time of my tour of western Canada, prior to my visit to Britain, an attempt was made to raise the issue of conscription. A cloud no larger than a man's hand appeared in the political sky at Calgary and in some other of the western cities. I at once recognized that this was not due to a spontaneous movement on the part of the people themselves, but was rather the manifestation of a political movement carefully organized by opponents of the government, to force conscription to the fore as a political issue. I accordingly sought to meet this threat to our national unity in the only way in which I believed it could and should be met, if unity throughout Canada was to be maintained.

Speaking in the city of Vancouver before a very large audience, I said:

The policy of the government regarding conscription has been made abundantly clear. We have taken the position that every young man who is physically fit should be liable for military training and service in Canada for the defence of Canada. This policy is designed to provide our country with a second line of defence should the country be subject to direct attack. In the same way, parliament has put at the disposal of the nation, all the material resources of the country.

My colleagues and I, expressing, as we believe, the will of the Canadian people as expressed by themselves in a war-time election, have made it equally clear that service outside Canada in the armed forces of Canada at sea, on land and in the air—service undertaken in the cause of freedom—shall be freely undertaken.

Before war came, the government gave a solemn pledge that in the event of war, we would follow that policy. When war came the pledge was solemnly reaffirmed. At the general elections during the war itself, that policy received the overwhelming approval of the people of Canada. Indeed, no political party can be said to have advocated conscription for overseas service. The leader of the official opposition could scarcely have been more emphatic than he was in declaring that conscription was not an issue; that, having regard to the memories of the past, and experiences in the last war, anyone who might raise that issue was not true to the highest interest of his country.

The present unhappy state of the world is in large part the result of broken pledges. Nazi Germany has erected bad faith and the broken pledge into a principle of action. Bad faith, broken pledges, and disregard of the popular will are the very forces against which Canada is fighting to-day. That being so, I wish the more emphatically to affirm the government's intention to keep the pledge repeatedly given to the people of Canada.

This statement is representative of the views I everywhere expressed in the course of my western tour, and which everywhere met, if not with unanimous, certainly with general approval. With the people of Canada thus reassured, there was little, if any, agitation on the matter during my absence in Britain and immediately after my return. In parliament there was little or no question or discussion raised concerning conscription until, while parliament was in session in November, it was announced that the leader of the Conservative party in the senate was to replace the present leader of the opposition in the leadership of his party, and would also replace him in the leadership of the official opposition in this House of Commons.

Prior to this announcement, I had restated in this House of Commons the government's position with respect to national selective service, as I have already quoted it to the house. At the same time, as leader of the government, I made clear by own position with respect to the application of conscription to service in the armed forces overseas, in the following words:

But so far as conscription for service overseas is concerned in the armed forces of Canada, that question was submitted to the people of Canada at the last general election, an election which was held in war time, and in which the leaders of all political parties made their statements to the electorate, and the people of Canada decided against conscription for overseas service. So far as I am concerned, without any consultation of the people on that subject, I do not intend to take the responsibility of supporting any policy of conscription for service overseas.

These words are to be found in Hansard for November 12, 1941, at page 4321. This statement was made during the afternoon of November 12. On the evening of that day, the new leader of the Conservative party, without any previous attempt at consultation or conference with myself, or any member of the government, and before he himself had become a member of this House of Commons, issued a statement announcing his acceptance of the leadership of the Conservative party, in which he set forth as his policy "compulsory selective service over the whole field of war". In view of the position of the government with respect to national selective service, this statement narrows down simply to a demand for conscription for overseas service. It thereby made the single question of the application of conscription for military service overseas into a political issue of the first magnitude.

Outside parliament altogether, the political skies have now become so overcast with controversy, promoted by high-pressure methods and highly financed publicity, that the nature and extent of Canada's war effort is not only being obscured, but is in danger of being seriously impaired.

If the issue of conscription for service overseas is to be fought out, the place for it to be fought out is on the floor of this parliament. If, however, members of the government and, indeed, members of this House of Commons generally, are to be free to express their views irrespective of any previous commitments, it is necessary that all members be released from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

Quite apart from the controversy which has arisen, there are the strongest of reasons why the government should, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise, subject only to its responsibility to parliament.

When, prior to its outbreak, the possibility of war in Europe was discussed in Canada, it was thought of in terms of another European war, the scene of which would be confined for the most part to Europe. The last war was still much in mind. The incidents connected with conscription and the results which flowed from its application remained vivid memories. The mere thought of the repetition of anything of the kind was abhorrent to the minds of most people in Canada. Few, if any, even dreamed at the time that war might so spread as to bring into the orbit of actual hostilities, any part of the western hemisphere. When people on this side of the Atlantic thought of war during the autumn and winter months of 1938 and the early spring of 1939, they thought first of the protecting power of the British fleet. The war between Japan and China, though it had been in existence for some years, seemed so remote as to have little or no bearing upon the security of the Pacific coast of this continent.

When the general elections were held during the month of March in 1940, the recollections of 1917 were still vividly in mind. Also in the mind of the people were commitments made in and out of parliament respecting no conscription for service in the armed forces overseas. The relatively greater part which the air and naval forces would play in the present war, in comparison with the last; the obligation which Canada had assumed with respect to the commonwealth air training plan; the need for the immediate development of the navy, the importance of developing the manufacture of munitions on a large scale, all pointed to the unwisdom of raising any issue with respect to conscription.

It was not until the intent and might of nazi aggression had become apparent by the subjugation of Denmark, Norway, The Netherlands, Belgium and France, that its danger to all free countries began to be appreciated. When Italy entered the war, concern was still mostly with what might happen around the shores of the Mediterranean and in Africa. It was difficult for many to believe that the enemy might, some day, be battering our own shores on the Atlantic, and even on the Pacific.

During the past year, however, the bombardment of Britain from the air, the varying fortunes of her armies in a continuously increasing number of areas; the vast additions in resources and man-power gained by Germany through the countries she had overrun; the unrest in the far east; all this, and much else, helped, during the past year, to change the picture vastly as viewed from this side.

On the other hand, Russia's entry into the war on the side of the allies served to lessen anxiety with respect to the need for men needed for the army.

Japan's declaration of war against the United States and the British commonwealth, the consequences flowing from her treacherous attack upon United States' possessions in the Pacific, and upon British and Dutch possessions in Asia and the Indies; the present menace of her armed forces to the island dominions of Australia and New Zealand; all these have given rise to fresh anxiety throughout Canada.

The declaration of war by Germany and Italy, as well as Japan, against the United States has brought the United States into the conflict against the combined axis powers. This, in turn, has given rise to problems which the government is facing in meeting its obligations with respect to the joint defence of the two countries. The declaration signed at Washington on January 1 by 26 nations to combine their efforts against the axis powers, has still further emphasized Canada's responsibilities.

In a world situation so involved, with enemies on every front, with no one able to say what the outcome of battle in other parts of the world may bring of immediate and increased danger to our own land, the government feels strongly that it should be perfectly free to recommend to parliament whatever course of action it deems essential to the security of our own country, and to the preservation of freedom in our own and other lands.

Such freedom the government does not possess at the present time, not because of any limitations upon the powers of parliament —parliament is at all times supreme—but because of past commitments made by the government and, regardless of party, by most members of this house.

If, then, it is desirable that the government subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment, irrespective of any previous commitments, it is clear that means must be found of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

There are, as I see it, three means by which this release could be obtained:

The first would be by means of a general election. In a general election at this time the issue of conscription for service overseas would become one of the issues and, in existing circumstances, would almost certainly be the main issue.

The second would be by means of a referendum solely with reference to the question of conscription for service overseas.

The third would be by means of a plebiscite, not to obtain a decision with respect to conscription, but solely with the object of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

These three means have been considered by the government with relation particularly to which of the three would occasion the least interference with the war effort of the country.

The government is of the opinion that neither a general election nor a referendum on the question of conscription is either advisable or necessary.

As for a general election, apart from the fact that the government has every reason to believe it continues to possess the confidence of the country, it would not, we believe, be in the interest of the people themselves, in the existing crisis, to leave the country without a parliament for the time which it would take to hold a general election. Moreover, other issues entering in, it would not be possible to say that the verdict of the people, whatever it might be, had related solely to the issue of the application of conscription for overseas service.

The objection to a referendum on conscription is that far from freeing the hands of the government it would be a specific request to the people to make a decision with respect to conscription. As I have already said, the proper place to debate the question as to the extent to which conscription should be applied is on the floor of parliament.

The strongest of reasons why the government should be given a free hand to take, subject to its responsibility to parliament, any course of action which it may believe to be necessary at a time of war is that the government itself alone can know all the circumstances and reasons which necessitate a particular course of action. These reasons cannot all be made public, linked as they are with the combined plans of other countries, with questions of military strategy, and the necessity of such matters being carefully concealed from the enemy.

A plebiscite differs from a referendum in that a plebiscite is taken to ascertain the views of the people, whereas a referendum is a request for a decision by the people on a specific plan or project. The government does not believe that it would be fair to the people to ask them to make military decisions. It is, as I already have said, not possible, in war time, to make public adequate information on which wise judgments can be made.

In consulting the people by plebiscite, the government is not throwing on the people the responsibility of making a military decision. It is asking the people to give the government full power and full responsibility to take whatever military decisions the government, in the light of all its knowledge, believes to be necessary. In consulting the people, therefore, we are not shirking responsibility, we are asking for full responsibility.

A course completely different from any one of the three I have mentioned has been suggested. It is that the government should ignore commitments altogether, refrain from any consultation with or reference to the people, and here and now immediately put in force conscription for service overseas.

I am perfectly sure that were any government to proceed in any such arbitrary manner, completely disregarding the will of the people as expressed in the past, or as it might be expressed in the present, it would find any such attempt effectively thwarted by the people's representatives in parliament.

Personally, I reject as unworthy of consideration, any course of action by this or any parliament which ignores the authority from which parliament and the government alike derive their power. I reject as still more unworthy the suggestion that the government should break the solemn pledges given and repeated time and again to the electorate. Let me repeat what I said at Vancouver:

> The present unhappy state of the world is, in large part, the result of broken pledges. Nazi Germany has erected bad faith and the broken pledge into a principle of action. Bad faith, broken pledges, and disregard of the popular will, are the forces against which Canada is fighting to-day.

I do not propose to erect bad faith and the broken pledge into a principle of action. I propose at all times to do all in my power to see that the will of the people, not that of any particular section or group or interest, however powerful or vociferous, shall prevail in the government of this country.

Perhaps I should add that yet another course of action has been suggested. It is that I should resign and advise His Excellency the Governor General—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I hear some of them opposite; I hope they listen to what I am going to say. It is that I should resign and advise His Excellency the Governor General to call on some other person to form a government which would ignore all past commitments and undertake to enforce conscription without any prior consultation with the people. In other words, I am being asked to sell my birthright for their mess of pottage, and to destroy whatever confidence the people of Canada may possess in my honour as a public man, and, in doing so, also to destroy the confidence the people possess in the honour and integrity of the government.

Those who speak and write in that way might be prepared so to act, but I am not. If we wish to destroy, not at this time of war alone, but for all time, the last vestige of confidence which the people of Canada have in their free political institutions and in their public men, that would be the most effective way to go about it.

The government, having, for the reasons I have mentioned, decided to seek from the people, by means of a plebiscite, release from any obligation arising out of any past commitments, proposes, without delay, to introduce legislation to set up the required machinery for conducting the plebiscite at the earliest possible date. The plebiscite will be taken with the minimum of expense consistent with equitable and efficient provision for a full and honest expression of the views of the people.

I need scarcely say that in the machinery which may be necessary for the conduct of the plebiscite, special provision will be made for ascertaining the views of the men on active service in the armed forces.

I shall not go into detail regarding the procedure to be followed in holding the proposed plebiscite. The question which the government proposes to submit to the people is the simple and straightforward question:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

It will be seen that in seeking freedom for itself to act on all matters pertaining to war in accordance with its judgment, the government is taking a course which will remove all legitimate excuse for controversy, and the course best calculated to maintain the unity of the country in this time of war.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then what will they do?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will depend in part upon what my hon. friend and those who are round him will do.

Mr. HOMUTH: Do not worry about us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to trust the people; my hon. friend certainly is not. Just here may I pause to say that if my hon. friend is afraid that the people will pronounce against conscription, for that is what he has in his mind, and he is still prepared to have conscription put into force without any reference to the people, then I should like to know how he expects that the unity of this country is going to be maintained.

In the presentation of the plebiscite to the electorate the desire of the administration to possess complete freedom of action will, of course, receive the vigorous and whole-hearted support of all members of the government. It will, I hope, receive the support of every member of parliament, and will, I believe, receive the support of the Canadian people.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I could not begin my remarks this evening without first congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, who were our good companions on a recent trip to Great Britain. They acquitted themselves in a manner which, I believe, won the congratulations of hon. members on all sides of the house. I thought that perhaps at times their praise of the government was a bit extravagant; shorn of these superlatives, their speeches were admirable.

I want to take this opportunity of expressing my own appreciation for the extensive tour of Great Britain so generously provided by the British branch of the Empire Parliamentary Association, and to express particularly my thanks to Sir Howard d'Egville, who supervised the arrangements on this side, to Sir Drummond Shiels, to Mr. Spencer-Hess, and to the British Ministry of Information, who combined to pilot us around Great Britain. Nor must we forget to thank, too, the Hon. Vincent Massey and Mrs. Massey and our splendid staff in the city of London. Every one of them did everything possible so that we might see all those things which visiting parliamentarians ought to see, and to make our stay in Great Britain as pleasant as it could possibly be under the grim circumstances of war. And Britain was grim. I knew from past experiences the British seashore and countryside. I would scarcely have recognized some of the places that I had known in my boyhood days. But in spite of the grimness we found a cool, courageous people engaged in a people's war and determined that when this conflict ended, there would be a people's peace and that the British people would build a new Britain in which the people might find security and peace.

But I should like to say more about those things at another time. To-day we are at the beginning of a new session of parliament. We meet within the shadows of dark and threatening skies. This is no time for discussions of relatively inconsequential matters. We are faced with more widespread threats to human freedom than, perhaps, the world has ever known and let us not blind ourselves with undue optimism. All is not well with the war or with our efforts to win it. Except in Russia, north Africa, and China, the axis powers have retained the initiative and have forced the allied powers to retreat from one position to another. This is not because our armed forces are inferior to those arrayed against them, but because we have failed, I believe, so far to realize that this is a war of machines as well as of men. Our steel, copper, nickel and other resources which should have been going into tanks, planes and guns have been going, instead, into automobiles, refrigerators and the luxuries of modern life, and some, indeed, in the early stages of this war found their way to Japan. Our industrialists insisted on business as usual, and until quite recently the government did little to turn those major factories into plants for the production of war material. Indeed, propaganda throughout the country has been directed towards the more glamorous and the more spectacular course of placing men in uniform, when events have proven that the provision of modern equipment should not only have kept pace with enlistments but have outrun them.

Then, too, there has been no real challenge to all our people to put forth every effort. In Britain the people believe most fervently that they are fighting, not to safeguard their present way of life, but to build a finer, nobler Britain, in which there will be larger measures of social security and economic justice. No such dynamic yet touches the lives of our people. They see business as usual, profits much as usual, and the representatives of monopolistic trusts in key positions in the Department of Munitions and Supply and controlling many phases of our war effort. The wheat producers of the west try to make ends meet at prices that were far too low before the war began, while workers in industry see barriers erected against their right to organize in associations of their own choice. Thus our national effort falls short of what it should be, because it lacks the proper dynamic.

I said that the bright spots in the present situation were north Africa, Russia and China; in north Africa because, so Mr. Churchill told us, we have concentrated most of our new equipment there, and so at last a British army meets an axis force on nearly equal terms. The reason for the stubborn resistance of the Chinese is that they fight for a China that had begun to make progress towards a greater measure of economic security, more than old imperial China ever knew. This, too, is the secret of Russian courage and Russian success. Whatever criticism we might have of their methods of government, the Russian people believe firmly that they are fighting to prevent the destruction of those economic and social advances which they themselves have made during the last twenty years. That these advances have been real and marvellously efficient, the effectiveness of the Russian army, the quantity and quality of their equipment, and the magnitude of their industrial reserves, amply demonstrate. Surely we can learn some lessons from these facts. Laboriously, for over two years, we have been mobilizing our war effort, and in spite of our boasted industrial strength we have failed to provide the tools to get on with the job. It is true that Russia had built great war industries before the war. But she was also able to build new cities, new homes, new universities, new standards of life, while we did neither the one nor the other. When the test came, there were no private monopolies, no trusts, no vested interests, no contractors who refused to accept war contracts except on their own terms, no business men who needed the incentive of gain or the acquisition of wealth, to slow up her war effort and bring her to the brink of defeat. In a few weeks she was geared for total war, with the full support of a people with a future to defend. Give our people assurances of a brighter future, remove the hand of selfish gain from our war effort, and in our own way and under our own social institutions Canada can do at least as well.

Thus we can build the hope of a future upon which alone sacrifice for victory will depend. But this hope must be based on something more than fine speeches and attractive promises. As long as people see our aged folk trying to make their meagre pensions meet the increased cost of living, or pensioners, or dependents of those who perished in the last great war, or who are fighting in this one, coping with increasing poverty while industry is prosperous and its total dividends increase, social discontent will act like a canker at the very core of our war effort; for the morale of the nation is the core of resistance, the foundation of victory.

To-day our people see the owners and directors of prosperous industries in charge of our war effort. I know that among them are conscientious and patriotic citizens who are giving of their very best. But even these are human, and sometimes some confuse the welfare of the organizations they have served with the welfare of the nation, while others identify the welfare of their enterprises with the welfare of the nation itself.

No parliamentary committee has yet delved into the activities of the Department of Munitions and Supply, with which most of the dollar-a-year-men have been associated; but that should be done at this session of parliament. In the United States the office of production management corresponds fairly closely to our Department of Munitions and Supply. There, a committee under the chairmanship of Senator Truman investigated its activities. Its report, submitted to congress on January 15, 1942, was most interesting. It recommended that the office should be drastically reorganized. The report stated that there were 255 dollar-a-year-men and 631 who received no government pay, but many of whom retained remunerative connections with the companies which lent them to the government. These men, the report said, had a tendency to favour big business, whether they were conscious of the fact or not. The committee declared that it was opposed to the government taking free services—and I quote —"from persons with axes to grind"—and recommended that if they were needed by the department they should be given salaries and required to relinquish their private business connections, and salaries.

In parts, the Truman report reads like criticisms that have been made in this house. For example, I quote:

> Apparently there never has been any real and coordinated procurement of aircraft.

Again:

> There is a tendency throughout to place everything on order wherever possible and put the sole responsibility for delivery on a few large producers.

Again:

> "Big business" has had its lobbyists in the form of dollar-a-year-men and men without compensation. Small and intermediate business men have sought to obtain the same benefits by hiring those who they think have influence. In some cases the persons are hired to render legitimate services and are paid so handsomely as to lead many to think their employers must have expected to receive added benefits. In others no legitimate services are rendered and payments that are made can be treated only as compensation for influence. In most instances the "Washington connections" are non-existent and the pedlars of influence are relying on the chance that the business man can obtain a contract without help if he made a serious and determined effort.

Are we free from these abuses, with much the same type of establishment? Well, prosecutions now going on in the Ottawa courts should make us suspect that we may not be. There is unrest in Great Britain, too, on another phase of the same problem. The Labour Discussion Notes for December, a publication of some of the members of the British Labour party, contained a careful survey of the matter. It said:

> The feeling that excess profits are being made must lead to cynicism and lack of a feeling of personal responsibility among the workers in factories from whom a more intensive effort is demanded; while at the same time many employers are putting forth the argument that the inability to make high profits owing to the action of the excess profits tax is itself a brake on production.

The publication goes on to express alarm at the growing economic power of the big monopolies and states a fact of which we should take the most careful warning when it says:

> There is one other important factor which requires careful watching—that is the future of the vast capital equipment provided by the government to increase output. . . . It could form the basis of, for instance, a sizeable national munitions industry or it could become a gift handed over at a nominal charge to the present owners. In the latter case, all the effects of the excess profits tax would disappear overnight.

With these warnings before us we should go into the whole problem of munitions and supply, or some day we may find that a few trusts and corporations have so increased their power over the economic life of Canada that the individual, unorganized consumer is entirely at their mercy. Indeed, I would go as far as to say that unless the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself is alert to this situation, he will find that the present trends in Canada will shatter every economic and social policy which he has preached and professed throughout his whole career in public life.

To achieve an enthusiastic response from the people of Canada there must be a greater approach to economic justice and equality of sacrifice. In spite of the excess profits tax, total dividends last year were greater than in the previous year. The Globe and Mail reported J. R. Timmins and Company as saying that 1941 dividends exceeded $285,000,000 as against $280,000,000 for 1940. These are not my figures, but the figures published by the Globe and Mail of the city of Toronto on December 22, 1941.

Our people are not satisfied with our war effort. They look at the personnel of our various war boards and they see representatives of big business in control almost exclusively. To regain the confidence of the people, representatives of farmers and of labour, in the widest sense of these terms, must be given adequate control. By adequate control I do not mean the appointment of the odd farmer or labour representative chosen by the government on the recommendation of some member of this house, but representatives, according to their importance in the country, chosen by their own representative organizations.

Everywhere we went in industrial Britain we found labour representatives sharing public responsibility with the owners of industry and wealth. I was told that in the rural districts farmers and their labourers shared similar responsibilities. Such, of course, are essential links in an all-out war effort. Canada has been called in this house the arsenal of the British commonwealth; yet we have not equipped our own soldiers adequately. The story told by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) of the gallant defenders of Hong Kong reflects little credit on those responsible for the sending of that expeditionary force.

I hope that the committee which the Prime Minister has promised will investigate all the circumstances with great thoroughness. In Montreal on January 6, addressing the Women's Canadian club there, I made a brief and passing reference of concern regarding the equipment and training of our troops at Hong Kong. Newspapers immediately designated those who expressed such sentiments as undermining our war effort. I wonder what those newspapers think now about that, or what they think of the harsh epithets applied by British speakers and British papers, including Lord Beaverbrook's own Daily Express, to those responsible for the lack of preparation in the far east. In my opinion the military and naval authorities who allowed our men to proceed to Hong Kong without anti-tank guns and adequate equipment and training, with the situation in the far east as tense as it was in late October, were guilty of negligence or ignorance. Had they read Lord Gort's report, the official dispatches on the battle of France? That report was published in Canada two weeks before the ill-fated Hong Kong expeditionary force sailed. Of that battle of France Lord Gort wrote:

> So ended a campaign of twenty-two days which has proved that the offensive once more gained ascendancy in modern war when undertaken with an army equipped with greatly superior material power in the shape of air force and fighting vehicles.

> These instances among many others serve to indicate the vital necessity for an expeditionary force, if it is to be used in a first class war, being equipped on a scale commensurate with the task it is called upon to fulfil. The day is past when armies can be hurriedly raised, equipped and placed in the field, for modern war demands the ever-increasing use of complicated material.

But it is equally important to inquire under what circumstances a Hong Kong force was asked for, and under what considerations and agreements it was sent. Who took the responsibility for neglecting Brigadier Lawson's expressions of uneasiness on leaving without complete equipment? Did those who decided that the force was to be sent satisfy themselves that in the event of war the island of Hong Kong could be defended? Did they inquire as to its air defences, its artillery equipment, its water and other vital supplies? Or are we to infer that Canadian troops are being placed at the disposal of the imperial general staff without adequate control or inquiry on the part of our own Department of National Defence? If so, then the government has reversed the policy so vehemently maintained in the last war by Sir Robert Borden, and have relegated Canada to the position of colonial days.

It is clear that Canada, Australia and the dominions should be properly and of themselves represented on an allied council dealing with all matters of war stategy. This is most essential. The Minister of National Defence excuses the failure to send adequate equipment with the Hong Kong force on several grounds, one of which was that Japan suddenly and without warning struck in the Pacific. On Saturday last—and the report can be found in full in yesterday's New York Times—the Roberts commission in Washington reported the facts in connection with the attack on Pearl Harbour. The report shows that as early as January 24, 1941, the secretaries of the United States navy and of the United States army were discussing the gravity of the Pacific situation; that on October 16, 1941, twelve days before our men left Canada:

> The commanding general, Hawaiian department, and the commander in chief of the fleet were advised by the war and navy departments . . . of the probability of hostilities between Japan and Russia and the possibility of an attack by Japan on Great Britain and the United States.

No doubt this view was also held in London, and I assume it was transmitted to Canada.

Then why, in the face of this information, and in view of Lord Gort's report, our experiences in Greece and in Crete and our difficulties in north Africa a year ago, were our troops, even such as were trained, allowed to proceed without equipment to an island which the public now knows could not possibly have been defended successfully?

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) said last Wednesday that there would be other Hong Kongs—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say that. I said there may be.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes; I stand corrected. The duty of this house is clearly to see that there are no repetitions of the Hong Kong episode. It is our duty to see that our men are given at least a chance to defend themselves properly.

The government proposes to ask the people of Canada for, to use its own words, "by means of a plebiscite, release from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service." That being so, the people of Canada have a right to ask that those responsible for the sending of partly trained, improperly equipped men to Hong Kong, and who failed to satisfy themselves that the island was in a condition which made its defence a possibility, should be relieved of any further responsibilities in the dispatch of our men to any war zone. This is no time to condone carelessness or inefficiency. These delinquencies have brought Britain, the United States and our allies to the brinks of several disasters. Britain, and recently the United States, appear to have acted promptly to deal with such situations. The people have a right to know that no more ill-equipped partly trained men will be sent to places impossible to defend.

As to the plebiscite itself, we are always prepared to support a proper and democratic reference to the people of a clearly defined policy. All that the government intends to ask in the present instance is release from its promise not to conscript for overseas service. That is not enough. The government should tell the people exactly what the war situation really needs. Does it or does it not require conscription of men for overseas service? I hope that in this debate the discussion will not centre round the minor matter of taking a plebiscite. The government has decided to take it; then let it be taken with the least possible delay, and in the meantime let the government take the country into its confidence and tell us why release from its commitments is necessary. This is no time for political strategists to wrangle for party advantage. Obviously the need for equipment and supplies is as great, indeed, judging by the lack of equipment for men already in training, the need is greater. The Canadian people, I believe, demand that industry and finance shall be subjected to national selective service to the same extent as man-power, at the same time and on the same terms. Of course that is not what the new leader of the Conservative party wants. Mr. Meighen said quite explicitly at Weston town hall last Thursday:

> I have offered to support the government without stint or reserve in a policy of compulsory selective service for all our forces, our farms and our factories.

No mention here of compulsory service of finance and industry. In commenting, the Montreal Gazette said:

> This policy is broad enough and comprehensive enough to cover the whole man-power issue.

Quite so, but it reveals the real aim of the people who engineered the new leadership; the newspapers who support him and the so-called committee of two hundred, who failed to secure control of Canada several years ago through their defunct Leadership League and who now, in the midst of war, are trying a war stunt of confusion and division. These people are not advocating the policy urged by the Canadian Legion, which asked for an all-round mobilization of man-power, industry and wealth, though they have pretended to do so; or the policies urged by farmer and labour groups calling for the conscription of industry and wealth before further measures for the conscription of man-power are proceeded with. Neither are these policies involved in the amendment that was moved this afternoon. Beginning with the War Measures Act, right through to the National Resources Mobilization Act, the government has had full power to place this country on a total war footing, with one exception, which government spokesmen have claimed to be of minor importance. Yet, as I have pointed out, our industrial and war effort has been carried forward on the business-as-usual basis, with profits and big business control the governing considerations. Let us know, then, what the government proposes to do, and the needs which make these proposals necessary. None will give more support to an all-out war effort than we will give, but we demand that it be based on equality of sacrifice and not be made merely an opportunity for the regimentation of the Canadian people in the interests of a few monopolistic trusts and their beneficiaries.

In order to place our point of view clearly before the house, I am going to move an amendment to the amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) in these words:

> That all the words after the words "this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "have used the sweeping powers conferred by the National Resources Mobilization Act mainly for the conscription of men for home defence, and in the opinion of this house no total effort adequate to meet the present needs of the war, domestic problems and the preparation for post-war conditions is possible without total mobilization of wealth, industry and finance, as well as human resources.

"Therefore this house respectfully requests that the forthcoming plebiscite should seek the support of the people of Canada for the complete and effective conscription of war industries, accumulated wealth and financial institutions, at the same time and on the same basis of sacrifice as the suggested extension of the conscription of man-power."

Such a plebiscite would give our people an opportunity to give proper expression to their views and guide this house regarding what is in effect a new policy to which a large majority in this house gave no support, or, in whole or part, as the Prime Minister said, opposed in the general elections of 1940. In this way the vote would be an expression of the people's approval of a policy and not merely a plebiscite caused by the government's resort to political expediency. For some time attempts have been made to divide the people of Canada artificially on a question which should be decided not on the basis of partisan controversy but on the basis of the nation's need in a great crisis. This need, I repeat, involves more, much more, than a discussion of the use of man-power, though man-power is necessarily involved in it.

I repeat that the present critical war situation at home demands a complete mobilization of the total resources of our country. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group will support such total mobilization, but demands that accumulated wealth and war industries be conscripted at the same time, in the same manner and upon the same terms as man-power. If we are to have this all-out war effort, it must be on the basis of national unity. Every discussion of these matters in this house and in the country ought to be undertaken with due regard to the unity of our people of all races, creeds, and tongues. Had the nature and objective of our war effort been clearly placed before the people, our unity would not be endangered. This house has failed to realize that the greatest danger to our unity in war is exactly the same danger we face in peace, the danger from inequality of sacrifice and opportunity. In any part of Canada where profitable industry is found side by side with low standards of living on our farms, and low wage levels with high prices in the cities, there in peace and war disunity arises. If those who live well on the proceeds of profitable industry are of a different race or tongue, the situation is aggravated because the depressed people can find no basis of unity or understanding with those whom they regard as their exploiters.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Thus an all-out united war effort requires much more than provision for our armed forces, important as that certainly is.

At least some sources of disagreement have been removed since December 7. There were some people who before that date thought of the struggle as one not touching directly the vital interests of this country. But the attack on Pearl Harbour, the outbreak of war between the United States and Japan, as well as the declarations of war upon the United States by Germany and Italy, have brought the war to our shores. The danger of attack has been real in Victoria and Vancouver, while we know that submarines have been operating near our own Atlantic shores. The whole American continent is now in the war zone and our Latin-American friends have, therefore, recognized the need for hemispheric solidarity. There can now be no doubt in any part of this country as to the need for Canada's all-out and united support of the allied effort to defeat the aggressor powers. It is clear now that we are not in this war merely to help Great Britain, or to help Russia, or to assist the United States; we are in it, in a very real sense, to defend ourselves and our future paths to progress. That being so, we dare not do less than organize our country for an all-out, supreme effort. This we have not had, nor can we have it as long as we operate our economic life on the basis of business as usual. In other words, we must accompany any mobilization of our human resources with a thorough mobilization of industry and finance.

There are some who claim that Canadian industry and finance have already been adequately mobilized. That this is not true is shown by our output, by the lack of planning and by the huge profits and dividends which still continue to be made. Real conscription of our material and financial resources must include the following, and I want to place these points before the house in order that we may understand exactly what we mean when we speak of total mobilization and the conscription of wealth and industry:

1. The national ownership or, at least, control of all our war industries to produce everything we require to maintain civilian health and morale and to provide our fighting forces with adequate equipment.

2. An integrated production plan which utilizes every available plant and facility in its proper place without regard to the demands of big corporations and trusts.

3. A complete reversal of the present dollar-a-year-men control policy and the substitution of proportionate representatives of organized farmer and labour bodies on all control agencies, so that the pressure of big business could be effectively curbed and democratic direction of the war effort achieved.

4. Direct national control of all our financial institutions so that without inflation and without unnecessary future burdens of debt, we can finance our national effort.

5. There must be, at least, a one hundred per cent excess profits tax, and, indeed, on all profits a low maximum rate should be set and the excess taken by the government for our war effort.

6. The present loan policy should be replaced by one of compulsory, interest-free loans imposed on the accumulated wealth of rich individuals and corporations, and based on ability to contribute. Indeed, the fairest method would be to establish a fair maximum income for all and to tax back to the country every dollar above that maximum.

In view of the outline of the financial aid the government proposes—and quite properly—to give at this time to those who are fighting our battles across the sea, I should like to see a policy of that kind adopted. It may, indeed, become quite necessary. If we did all this, we would still be doing less to industry, to wealth and to those of us who are not called upon to surrender our futures and our lives to Canada than we propose to do to those who are being called upon to surrender themselves to fight in this terrific war.

I know that as yet we in Canada have scarcely been touched by war. When I flew from Canada to Great Britain last autumn, and when I returned again in the same quick manner, it seemed as if I had stepped from one world into another. Apart altogether from the black-outs, apart altogether from the evidences of destruction and devastation we saw round us in the great cities; apart altogether from the scarring of the countryside we noticed as we passed through; apart from the fact that to-day the people of Britain are living on rations which, despite efforts to make them healthy and adequate, are nevertheless monotonous, and insufficient to maintain that amount of energy required to carry on under the circumstances under which the people in Great Britain are living—I say that despite all these things we noticed the will of the people to carry through to victory.

I might at this point make one reference which will be familiar to those who were with me. One day we saw an aged woman outside a little corner store. I asked her if she did not wish that the government might do something to end the war to-morrow. In spite of her poverty and in spite of the fact she with many others had been bombed out of her home, she said, "No, sir, not until we have licked him."

We saw the courage of the people over there, and we realized the grimness of the struggle. We in this country have not yet begun to understand the grimness of the situation across the seas.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to leave this thought, that in addition to the provision of men to take part in the battles raging throughout the world to-day, there is something which we in Canada must be prepared to do to a greater extent than we have done before, and that is to provide the people of Great Britain with those concentrated foods which they lack and which are so greatly needed to maintain the health of their working force and their morale. Surely out of our bounty we can deny ourselves pork, bacon, ham, cheese, butter and other foods of the concentrated type so that we may send more and more across the seas to maintain the health of the women, children, workers and soldiers on that beleaguered island. When we left Great Britain that was one of the things they said: "Tell your people in Canada to send us more things—more food, more supplies. Those are the things we need."

I had not intended to say that to-night; I had intended to reserve that suggestion for some other occasion. But, Mr. Speaker, I could not let this occasion go by without saying that if it is necessary for our government to restrict the consumption of those things needed across the seas—for, out of our bounty we could substitute many other things—then I say to the government: "Restrict those supplies, and ration the country." I know the people will respond to the greatest extent to such an appeal.

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 9.50 p.m.

THE WAR

IMPERIAL WAR CABINET—SUPREME ALLIED WAR COUNCIL—CANADA'S POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct one or two questions to the Prime Minister, arising out of a bulletin received from London to-day in Ottawa, in which it is stated that Prime Minister Churchill announced to-day that the British government has acceded to Australia's request for representation on an imperial war cabinet. It will be recalled that yesterday Prime Minister Curtin is reported to have stated over the radio:

> We claim representation in an imperial war cabinet so that Australia's voice and counsel may be heard directly.

The bulletin to which I have already referred quotes Mr. Churchill as having said:

> We have, of course, agreed that the same facilities will be accorded to New Zealand, Canada and South Africa.

I now ask the Prime Minister if Mr. Churchill has communicated with Canada offering facilities to Canada for representation in an imperial war cabinet; and if so, will Canada be represented in an imperial war cabinet. I further ask the Prime Minister to inform the house and the country what is the government's position in relation to this important question. Perhaps I may be pardoned for recalling that I have repeatedly urged in this house the formation of an imperial war cabinet.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Is my hon. friend asking a question, or is he seeking—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I am making just a brief statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Might I ask my hon. friend if he is asking a question on the orders of the day? If so, perhaps he would allow me to reply to it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not quite through. If the Prime Minister will be good enough to be patient I shall be through in a moment, and then he will have all the time he requires. Before the Prime Minister answers these questions I would ask him another question. Would he indicate the position which he took in consultations which occurred at Washington with reference to the formation of a supreme allied war council? Press reports at that time indicated that the Prime Minister was insisting upon separate representation for Canada rather than representation through a united British commonwealth delegation. I suggest to him and to the house that we are entitled to clear and specific information about the attitude which the Prime Minister took on that occasion, and I invite him to give it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has asked me two questions—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Three, I think.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Three, possibly; and they are fairly long ones, so that perhaps I may be excused if I do not answer them categorically. However, the first question had reference to a statement which appears in the press, to the effect that Mr. Churchill had stated this morning that an imperial war cabinet was to be formed on which Australia would be represented. He asked me if I had had any communication from the Prime Minister of Great Britain in reference to the matter.

I have had a communication, which I happen to have before me. It was received this morning. The substance of it is that the government of the United Kingdom has been thinking over machinery for consultation between themselves and other members of the British commonwealth on matters of urgency connected with the war in the light of the new position resulting from United States entry into the war, and recent developments in the Pacific; that they had received communications from Australia making certain requests, and that these also were being considered. There is an indication of the form in which the request was made and a reference to the fact that, in the form indicated, it would be acceded to; but I have not seen as yet precisely what the Prime Minister has said in the British House of Commons, nor do I know exactly what the position is that has been reached by the British government. I am not therefore in a position to discuss at the moment what action Canada may be expected to take or will be invited to take. However, I promise my hon. friend that as soon as it is possible to do so, I will give the house particulars as to the exact nature of the proposed representation to be accorded dominion governments in the cabinet of Britain, and will certainly be very happy to indicate Canada's position in reference thereto. That, I think, goes as far in answering my hon. friend's question at the moment as I can go. I have asked to be advised of the exact statement made by the Prime Minister so that I may have it before me in answering any question officially.

The other question related to the attitude I had taken at Washington in consultation with reference to a supreme allied war council and to a statement in the press to the effect that I had pressed for separate representation of Canada at that time rather than adopting the position that Canada would be prepared to cooperate with Britain and the United States in whatever arrangements might be thought most advisable. May I say to my hon. friend at once that I made no representation at Washington with respect to separate representation of Canada in the matter of allied direction of war effort, and that my whole aim at Washington, as it has been in the past in Britain and in the United States, and will be in the future in both those countries, was one of endeavouring to take the position that would best serve to bring about cooperation among all the governments concerned, in the way which would help most to further the effectiveness of the common war effort.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Might I ask the Prime Minister a question? In view of what the Prime Minister has said about north and south America in Washington, can any action be taken by Canada now without consulting Britain and the other dominions? We have a duty to the other dominions and to the empire, and I think they should be consulted before any action is taken.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend says something about what I said in Washington about south America. May I say that to my recollection I never uttered a single word with respect to south America while I was in Washington. The trouble with my hon. friend and many others who come from Toronto is that they often take too literally everything that appears in a certain section of the press.

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE

STATEMENT OF MR. GODBOUT IN MONTREAL ON JANUARY 26

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister, based upon a report of an important and significant speech delivered last night by the premier of Quebec at Montreal, in which he is reported to have said:

> We have Mr. King, who has always been against conscription.
> And again
> We have at the head of the Liberal party Mr. King, who is an anti-conscriptionist.
> Mr. King is against conscription.

Is the statement of Mr. Godbout correct? Is there any undertaking, understanding or commitment, express or implied, existing between himself and Mr. Godbout, or between himself and any other person, to the effect that no action will be taken to provide for compulsory military service overseas, even if the plebiscite is answered in the affirmative and he is released from his commitment?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend, in the first place, that I have nothing before me and he has nothing before him with respect to what Mr. Godbout is alleged to have said last night. I am therefore not in a position to say whether or not any remarks attributed to the premier of Quebec have been correctly reported.

That, however, is not as important as a direct answer to the question with respect to my position in regard to conscription both within Canada and for service overseas, in relation to the past, to the present and to the future.

I tried yesterday to make that position quite plain in my remarks, which now appear in Hansard. I then repeated what, in part, I had previously said in this house on those matters. I now give to my hon. friend as reply to the question which he has asked what I said yesterday, which appears in Hansard at page 44, restating what I said in this house on November 12 last:

> So far as conscription stands for compulsory selective national service, that is a principle which this government has embodied in its National Resources Mobilization Act passed at a previous session of this parliament. As to how rapidly that principle should be applied, and how far it should be extended, is a matter which the government must decide and will decide in the light of all the knowledge which it has with respect to the needs of our war effort and the position of the country in meeting them.
> I want it to be distinctly understood that so far as the principle of compulsory selective national service is concerned for Canada, in Canada, I stand for that principle. I have never taken any other stand. It is the position that I have held all along. It has been applied in connection with military training, and applied in a number of other directions I might mention. How much further it will be applied the house will learn as the government takes its decisions on that matter.

And the further quotation also from what I said on November 12 last which appears on page 48 of yesterday's Hansard:

> But so far as conscription for service overseas is concerned in the armed forces of Canada, that question was submitted to the people of Canada at the last general election, an election which was held in war time, and in which the leaders of all political parties made their statements to the electorate, and the people of Canada decided against conscription for overseas service. So far as I am concerned, without any consultation of the people on that subject, I do not intend to take the responsibility of supporting any policy of conscription for service overseas.

That is my position—as stated, I might say, repeatedly in this house, but certainly most clearly and emphatically on November 12 last and again yesterday in this house.

Replying further to my hon. friend's question as to what I intend to do as a result of the plebiscite, I thought I had also anticipated the answer to that question in my remarks yesterday afternoon, which will be found on page 32 of yesterday's Hansard, when I said:

When my hon. friend goes on to ask me what I am going to do with respect to any expression of view which may be made by the people in connection with any reference which will be made to them, may I say to him that in seeking to get relief from past commitments I am not going to begin by making new and fresh commitments. In seeking freedom on the part of the ministry I am not going to start in by seeking to tie my own hands.

That is the answer to that part of the question.

My hon. friend asked a further question, whether there was any understanding between myself and Mr. Godbout, express or implied, as to the position which I would take as a result of any plebiscite that would be presented to the people. May I say to him that there is no understanding, express or implied, with Mr. Godbout or with any other person on earth with respect to the attitude that I propose to take after the people have expressed their views with regard to giving the government a free hand.

May I add that such attitude as I shall take at the time will be taken in the light of all the circumstances as I may know them as a member of the government, and of all conditions as I know them in regard to this country and, as far as I am able to know something about them, conditions in other countries as well.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO BRITAIN

WAR SUPPLIES, FOOD, AND LOAN WITHOUT INTEREST—ACKNOWLEDGMENT BY MR. CHURCHILL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I be permitted to give the house a little information which I have received this morning. Yesterday, as the house will recall, I made known an offer which the Canadian government was making to the British government with respect to materials, munitions, food and other supplies during the year, and the assumption on the part of Canada of the financial obligations which that offer would involve.

I have received to-day through the High Commissioner of the United Kingdom a statement of the exact words used by Prime Minister Churchill in the House of Commons this morning accepting that offer. I wish to read to the house the Prime Minister's statement. Mr. Churchill said:

Having crossed the Atlantic it was plainly my duty to visit the great dominion of Canada. The house will have read with admiration and deep interest the speech made by the Prime Minister of Canada yesterday on Canada's great and growing contribution to the common cause in men, in money and in materials. A notable part of the contribution is the financial offer which the Canadian government have made to this country. The sum involved is one billion Canadian dollars, about £225,000,000. I know the house will wish me to convey to the government of Canada our lively appreciation of their kind and most generous offer, unequalled in its scale in the whole history of the British empire, and it is a convincing proof of the determination of Canada to make her maximum contribution to the successful prosecution of the war.

I also received this morning from the Prime Minister of Great Britain a cable directed to myself, to which I have been informed publicity may also be given. I shall therefore read this cabled message, which is from Mr. Churchill to myself as from Prime Minister to Prime Minister:

Reports have just reached me of the most generous and far reaching financial proposals which you have outlined to-day in the House of Commons at Ottawa. I recall your memorable words at the Mansion House when you said, "We in Canada are proud to share your burdens. We are determined to share them to the utmost of our strength." Canada under your leadership has given many proofs of that determination in every field of our common endeavour, and I have recently been fortunate enough to see for myself the spirit that inspires you all. Parliament and the people of this country will share my feelings of profound gratitude and encouragement. At this time when the utmost efforts of every nation are required for victory you have again made plain to the world that all the resources and energies of Canada are to be counted upon in support of the fight for freedom.

PAN-AMERICAN CONFERENCE

PROPOSED CREATION OF FREE INTERNATIONAL EXCHANGE CURRENCY—CANADA'S POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): On January 21, 1942, there appeared in the Edmonton Journal an account of the scheme to be submitted to the Rio conference. Section 2 of the proposal, as outlined in the article reads:

Creation of a free international exchange currency to facilitate flow of goods and prevent delay in transactions. It would be on a gold basis and in addition to the American nations, Great Britain, China, the Netherlands, India and all British dominions would enter into the agreement. A pool of allied gold holdings would be created. The Latin American countries would agree to peg their national currencies into the free international exchange currency.

I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether the Canadian government has made any commitments in this regard. If the answer is in the negative, then I would ask: has the Canadian government directly or indirectly given the government of the United States reason to believe that they favour such a proposal?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The answer to the first question is in the negative. The answer to the second is that as far as I am aware the government has had no communication with the government of the United States with respect to the matter. Perhaps I should qualify that remark by saying that the government had no knowledge of any such statement being made until, like my hon. friend, its attention was directed to the reference to the statement which appeared in the press. After seeing what was set forth in the statement, the government did make inquiries concerning the statement, simply to ascertain whether or not it was authentic. I am not aware that anything more than this has passed in the way of correspondence between the two countries on this matter.

SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS

INQUIRY AS TO OPERATIONS OF DEPENDENTS' ALLOWANCES BOARD OF TRUSTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether the government have come to any new decision about paying a cost of living war bonus to soldiers' dependents. Both the minister and the Prime Minister on November 14 told me in the house that during the recess regional boards to consider cases of hardship would be set up in military districts, which is of no use whatever. Surely something should be done about it. What is the new policy about bonuses to soldiers' dependents? There is considerable suffering in Toronto already this winter and nothing is done.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Perhaps my hon. friend uses an inappropriate term. I think he is referring to the dependents' allowances board of trustees, which was announced by my colleague the Minister of Finance last November. The board has been appointed and is being set up. For the information of my hon. friend I may add that the chairmen have been selected already in the larger centres, and the committees are now being organized. If my hon. friend has not seen it already I should be glad to send him a copy of the order in council under which the board is set up, giving the powers and general principles under which they act.

Mr. CHURCH: Has any regional board met in Toronto, and how many cases has it reviewed?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think regional boards have met in Toronto, so far as I know. I happened to be talking to the chairman yesterday on the telephone.

Mr. CHURCH: Money would be better spent in that way than on the referendum.

INTERNMENTS

PETITION OF CERTAIN PERSONS INTERNED IN HULL, QUE.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): On November 14 the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) presented a petition on behalf of certain interned persons. According to the Votes and Proceedings of January 21, the petition has been examined and found in order. According to paragraph 713 of standing order 68 it is now in order to ask for the reading of the petition. I suggest that this be done, possibly at the next sitting of the house if it is not available now.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There is in my mind at the moment a question as to whether this is not a matter that properly relates to the last session of parliament rather than to the present session, and I should like to consult the Clerk of the House in the first instance as to whether a matter relating to the last session might not have to be renewed in a formal way before it could be taken up anew in the house.

JOINT DEFENCE

POSSIBILITY OF SENDING CANADIAN SOLDIERS TO ASSISTANCE OF UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): In view of our joint defence commitments with the United States I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether units of the sixth division would be available to be sent to the assistance of the United States in the event of an attack on the coast of that country.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think the appropriate persons to make reply to a question of this kind would be the military authorities, who no doubt have given every consideration to the matter. They may regard it as advisable not to make any public statement at the moment, but certainly this matter is one that should be referred to them in the first instance.

WAGE CEILING

SETTING UP OF REGIONAL BOARDS UNDER NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo North): Could the acting Minister of Labour give the house any information as to when the several boards dealing with the ceiling on wages will be set up in the various districts throughout the country?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I wonder if the hon. member is referring to the regional boards?

Mr. HOMUTH: Yes.

Mr. McLARTY: Then may I say, without having had any further information within the last few days, that it is my understanding that not only the national war labour board but also the regional boards have been completely set up throughout the country. However, I shall make inquiries into the matter and advise the hon. member to-morrow.

TAXATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked me to table copies of the draft agreements between the dominion and the various provincial governments. I am tabling those copies to-day, but in doing so I should like to make the following statement:

A list of the particular taxes which the provinces and their municipalities are to give up will be attached to the agreements as appendix A. Similar lists of the taxes which the provinces and the municipalities will continue to levy will be attached as appendices B and C. Except in the case of British Columbia, these lists have not yet been completed and are not, therefore, attached to the draft agreements which I propose to table.

The proposed agreements are now being gone over and checked by the provincial authorities. Before they are finally signed there may be some minor changes, either in the wording or in the amounts. I have no reason to expect that this will be so, but it is conceivable that some new situation which we do not know of at the present time may make some changes desirable. For example, some province may dispute the accuracy of the figures or some other question of fact. I do not expect so, but if there should be some minor errors in the figures, we would wish to correct them. Certainly any changes which may be made will be relatively unimportant, but until the draft agreements have been checked by the provinces I cannot say definitely that they are in their final form.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do I understand that none of the appendices are attached to the agreement, except in the case of British Columbia?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; there are certain appendices attached to certain ones.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In all cases?

Mr. ILSLEY: In all cases, yes. I believe all appendices are attached in respect of British Columbia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And in respect to others the appendices are not quite complete?

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will they be tabled at a later stage, when complete?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I shall certainly table the agreements when they are completed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is of course after the event.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, January 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, may I first congratulate the hon. members for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I believe that yesterday the leader of the opposition did the finest job of speaking he has ever done in his life. I thought it a great pity that he is not going to go right on in the capacity in which he is now labouring. Probably he is the victim of a machinating gang, of an outworn philosophy or of reactionary thinkers.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did his usual good job of speaking. The Prime Minister has done superbly in the two speeches he has thus far delivered at this session. His speech in honour of the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe was a model of beauty and eloquence. His speech delivered yesterday was, I thought, altogether an admirable performance for a gentleman who has been in life's battles as many years as he has been. It was remarkable for its length and comprehensiveness, and for the endurance, organization, strength, political skill, idealism, democracy and courage exhibited by the speaker. I believe I have not gone too far in expressing myself in those words.

When he was dealing with new things his courage was obvious. Ordinarily it is said that a man who is beyond fifty-five years is hardly fit to deal with new things. Our Prime Minister has proved that idea to be quite fallacious. He dealt with the tremendous loan to Great Britain—an altogether new thing, this tremendous gift to Great Britain. He told us of the vast expenditures on these big and new things, and he showed a disposition, one which I must say I quite admired in him, to face the facts. He faced courageously the fact that Great Britain cannot pay, and that Canada can pay.

I presume there are in the house a good many who are wondering how in the world that can be. To the orthodox thinker it is impossible to say how it could be, but to a monetary reformer its possibility is quite obvious. By the mere impact of realities that fact is being pounded, if I may use the word, into the heads of even the most reactionary. I wonder how many will continue to ask themselves, as glibly as they have asked so often in the past: Where does the money come from? I wonder how many will remember how that money was obtained when the time comes to apply this simple source of money to the well-being of the Canadian people.

The Prime Minister faced the fact that there should be a balance in Canada, and with that I entirely agree. He pointed out that Canadians should be healthy in mind, body and spirit. Strange, is it not, that Canada has forgotten that for so long?

However, there were two facts he did not face. No doubt he would have faced them had he thought it necessary. He neglected to mention them, but not through lack of courage. The first of these is Canada's war aims. It is high time we began to develop some sort of notion as to what our war aims may be, so that we as the members of the House of Commons and the people in our constituencies may have something to say about them. Obviously the war will end some time, and when it does it is possible that the end will be as it was at the conclusion of the last war—all of a rush. Then someone will spring from somewhere, upon whose initiation no one will know, and form the peace.

The next point he did not set forth was as to whether and how after the war, economic security is to be guaranteed to all the people in Canada. The Prime Minister would have relieved us greatly had he assured us that he knew how that was to be done.

These are points exercising the people of Canada from coast to coast. Down in their hearts, these are matters which are troubling each mother and father. The Prime Minister will need all his courage—and he has plenty of it, and I commend him for it. The common dangers encountered by a leader are, I fear, gathering around him. There are in his war structure of public servants too many who are convincing the Canadian people that dangerously many public servants consist of antiquated egotists, bewildered theorists—witness our price structure—or pious-faced self-seekers, often the servile agents of anti-social interests, masquerading behind the cloak of public service and the mask of Canada's war effort, the unwholesome company of them permitting, aiding and abetting or actively prosecuting iniquitous designs behind the backs of those noble millions who are yielding up their blood, sweat, substance and tears.

The Prime Minister, using discernment, vigour and courage must set about an early spring housecleaning to rid Canada either of these harmful men or their harmful ideas. He must set about to rid Canada not only of $50 brains in $5,000 jobs, but also of certain $500,000 brains now smugly but eagerly in $50 jobs.

The very sight of the hon. members for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), for Hull (Mr. Fournier), for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) or for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) will throughout my days warm my being with a flood of appreciation, sympathy and friendship which will, I think, forever spring to greet each of the five who with me as members of the Empire Parliamentary Association delegation were privileged to take that wonderful trip to Britain. It was a trip matchless for the sights we beheld, for the number and quality of the people we met, for the wealth of the experiences which filled every day of the journey; experiences enlightening, enriching, edifying. The Scriptures advise, "With all thy getting get understanding." As none of us could have done in any other way, we got understanding, got it when most it was needed.

My constituency, my province, my country, along with myself, will from now on owe, to Sir Drummond Shiels, and Mr. A. C. Spencer-Hess, British parliamentary representatives, whose foresight, industry, devotion and solicitude on the British side, joined with Sir Howard d'Egville's ever-active efficiency on the American side, packed our every day with great worth, and to Doctor Beauchesne whose tireless and scrupulous efficiency took care of each of the needful essential details from Ottawa, and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) whose foresight, understanding, thoroughness and patience at length effected the organization of the delegation, a real debt of gratitude. To acknowledge, and in some small measure to discharge my share of that debt, may I here in public thank these gentlemen and assure them that I believe the result of that visit, both for Canada and for the commonwealth, will prove to be worth all that it cost.

Many a time as we sped through hundreds of miles of rich British countryside and got acquainted with afflicted British towns such as Portsmouth, Glasgow, Liverpool and Coventry; many a time as we inspected great war industries, as we saw amazing processes or chatted with war workers; many a time as we reviewed our fighting forces and talked with our soldiers, sailors and airmen, I wished that all Canadians could have been with us. Our well-to-do people all would know then, as we do, something of what it means to be without, or very short of, eggs, milk, beef, pork, cheese, butter, sugar, jams and fruits, all things that Canadians so much enjoy and feel that they need. Perhaps they would sense how it feels to be in a land that is producing all that its resources will allow of such foods and still cannot have enough to live on without importing these commodities across an enemy-infested ocean. Our more fortunate folk would perhaps understand that we depend for our very lives upon common people who live and feel, desire and earn, deserve and should receive what too many even in Canada do not now receive.

But I must turn from our British experiences to consider the speech from the throne. Two things caught my attention. The first was the plebiscite proposal, and the second was the suggestion of a balanced programme for the production of foodstuffs.

The Prime Minister's attitude on the plebiscite perplexes me, in spite of his fine detailed explanation. In the first place he shows that we need conscription, not for the air force, not for the navy, but only for the army. Then he details how tremendous has been Canada's war effort in the production of all kinds of goods, as great, it would seem, as our man-power can sustain. He promises an almost limitless expansion of every kind of production without showing where the man-power exists. Then when he has demonstrated that our labour is quite inadequate for these other activities, he proposes presumably to conscript part of this inadequate labour to build a yet greater army. In other words, having demonstrated that the need for conscription for fighting is all but non-existent, having convinced us that to take away more of our men would jeopardize the necessary development of our production projects, he implies that conscription for the army is vital to our war effort and he risks Canadian unity, through the holding of a plebiscite, to free his hands, ostensibly to introduce a policy which he seemingly does not need and which he can use only at the expense of impairment of our war effort.

Since before Canada declared war, Social Crediters have maintained that recruits for any branch of the armed forces could most likely be obtained in sufficient numbers at any time by using the national credit to pay the soldiers, the sailors or the airmen more attractive incomes and to guarantee them and their dependents real security after the war. Raise the pay, increase pensions and allowances, insure employment and your ranks will fill rapidly. These are the things Social Crediters would do. Also your sacrifices will be more equal. On September 5, 1939, was issued from a caucus of Social Credit members of parliament and Alberta cabinet ministers held in Edmonton a statement in which appeared the following excerpts:

> We believe that Canada should finance its share in this war not by the creation of huge debts but in the following manner;
> (a) By the creation by the government of the necessary credit and currency combined with definite price regulations to prevent any serious inflationary rise in prices;

May I pause to point out that Social Crediters foresaw that all these prices would have to be adjusted. I continue:

> (b) By borrowing abroad only for the purpose of obtaining needed goods and services beyond the capacity of our people to furnish.
> We strongly support the just demands of our people for the greatest possible equalization of sacrifice by—
> (a) Placing an embargo on capital and capital assets as at the date of declaration of war;
> (b) Requiring that financial institutions and corporations reveal all undisclosed reserves as at the date of declaration of war, and that these be forthwith conscripted by the dominion government;
> (c) Introducing a more steeply graded income and profit tax.
> We hereby resolve that conscription of material and financial resources for the purpose of securing the greatest possible equalization of sacrifice as outlined above shall be introduced before the conscription of individual man-power.

It is regrettable that the Prime Minister should have so managed as to put himself in such a position that he should feel obliged to hold a plebiscite. But it is the opinion of many that, having done so, apparently the only logical way out for his party would seem to be a plebiscite.

So much having been said about the plebiscite, let us consider the balanced programme of production, which was the second point that attracted me. By that expression the Prime Minister means, I presume, either (a) having the whole Canadian economy in balance, or (b) producing a balanced amount of each necessity in our war effort. Whatever the meaning, agriculture must be our first concern. It is the most important of all industries. Our farmers now operate at a loss. There may be some exceptions in some provinces, but I affirm without fear of successful contradiction that the farmers of Canada are now operating at a loss; and whereas the producers of war munitions are said to be operating on a basis of cost plus ten per cent, it will be found that the farmers of Canada are operating practically on a basis of cost minus ten per cent.

What is the government doing to bring about an increase in natural production? By what machinery does the government get out to the province, to the county, the municipality, the school district and the farmer: first, just what it wishes that area or that farmer to produce; second, just what the government will help him to produce and how it will help him; third, just what the government will take when it is produced; fourth, just what protection the government will give the farmer in producing it, and how? Does the government know just what it wants each of the above units, each province, each county, each municipality, to produce, and why? How many eggs does the government want? We hear reports of 30,000,000 dozen being required or as many as we can produce. Why not find out how many we think the country can produce and then apportion that number among the various provinces and get down to a businesslike campaign in seeking to increase production?

How much bacon does the government want? How much could it use? How much will it take? The government should plan for the production of a certain amount of bacon and of the various other farm commodities. Mr. Speaker, do you know that the farmers are getting so fed up with the general blundering and mismanagement everywhere apparent in everything pertaining to the agricultural policy of this country that they are threatening to go away and enlist or do anything to get out of agriculture.

Has the government let the individual farmer know what it expects him to produce? If so, by what means has it done this? And how does it know that the farmer knows? Does the government have any definite idea what the farmer is going to do about it, and if so, how?

As an illustration there is in a certain area in my constituency a company which has for some years engaged in the production of beet sugar. This company knows by this time of year just how many acres of beets it wants produced and delivered and it sends out its agents to the farmers all over the area and signs up the required acreage to within half an acre. The result is that it knows exactly how many acres of beets will be planted, and the farmer knows how many beets he will be allowed to sell and what the price is going to be, to within a dollar—yes, better than that. If that sort of planning were followed by the government in the various provinces and counties of Canada with respect to other commodities, what a wonderful difference it would make and what a tremendous addition there would be to the security, happiness and peace of the farmer.

What has the government done to supply the farmer with labour to replace the farmer's boy who has joined the army? Does the farmer know what the government is going to do? Has the government told him individually?

Mr. CHURCH: The government is going to hold a referendum.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Does the government know that the farmer may sell his breeding cows, sell his chickens, sell his equipment, and sell his farm or give it up for taxes, and that after that occurs in a very large percentage of the areas in Canada the effect upon our productive capacity within the next two years is going to be disastrous? What is the matter with the men in charge of the Department of Agriculture that they are unable to foresee these things? What we are going to have, the first thing we know, is a sort of agricultural repetition of Hong Kong. Some government member will say: who was able to foresee for us at a certain time that such a thing was going to happen? With respect to Hong Kong I say that ninety-five per cent of the people of Canada could foresee what was bound to happen before very long. Apparently the exceptions were all in the cabinet. Ninety-five per cent of farmers can see catastrophe ahead with regard to agriculture. Why cannot the government see it?

What is the government doing with respect to reserving electricity for the farmer? There are restrictions on electricity, and how in the world are the farmers going to carry on without sufficient electrical power?

What is the government going to do about money for the farmer? Is the government going to see that the bankers lend money to farmers for the production of certain commodities, and that if they neglect to do so some other agency will lend it to them, and on terms on which the farmers can pay for the use of the money? Is the government going to protect the farmers in case of mishap? Why have we not an agricultural committee on priorities for farming? Everybody else seems to be looked after—there are priorities with respect to rubber, machinery, chemicals, electricity, gas, oil and man-power. The one person who is supposed to be able to look after himself, apparently, is the unfortunate, isolated, scattered, unorganized farmer—the very person whom the government should be looking after with the utmost solicitude.

What was the basis of price fixing of various farm products? No intelligent man so far as I know can conceive on what basis these prices are fixed. Granted that prices were frozen with respect to a certain period; but no one can say that that period was suitable to choose as a basis for protecting the future of this country for years and years of war. The Prime Minister said in October that something would have to be done for agriculture. What has he done? Does he know what ought to be done? If not, who is going to find out? Does the Prime Minister know what is happening to farm production costs? If not, who does, and what is the Prime Minister doing about it? Is he sure that anyone knows or has he taken the trouble to find out?

I am going to refer to the Searle index letter of January 22, according to which I find that the cost of 147 things which the western farmer buys is 151·2 per cent of what it was in 1913-14, while the price of wheat is fourteen per cent lower than it was in 1913-14. I leave that without comment.

Canada simply must have a real agricultural policy which recognizes that we need farmers—all of them—to-day, that we shall need them to-morrow, and that our children's children and their neighbours will need them. Just now, sir, Canada is not crucifying her farmers, she is torturing them to death with a wide variety of forms of torment. May I read a statement which, I think, should be sufficient to establish that? I am reading from "What Share of the National Income Does the Farmer Get?" prepared by Professor Coote, of McGill university, in the spring of 1941:

People living on farms drawing their support from agriculture comprise just about one-third of the population of Canada. Their share of the national income of Canada for the years 1926 to 1929 averaged just one-sixth of the total and the average total income per farm for the period was $1,007 per year. The average cash income for the same period was $791 per year. . . .

In the eleven years, 1930 to 1940, the average income per farm family dropped to $468 per year and the average share of the national income dropped to 9·8 per cent. In the same period the average cash income per farm family dropped to $329 per year. In other words the average total farm family income dropped by 53 per cent and the average cash income decreased by 58 per cent.

If we compare these figures with those for manufacturing industry—

I hasten to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have no complaint against the manufacturing industry.

—we find that the average annual wages per worker for the years 1926 to 1929 were $1,017, and for the succeeding nine years to 1937 they averaged $902, a drop of 12 per cent as contrasted with the 53 per cent in the case of the farmer. In the same period the average salaries paid in industry were $1,894 and $1,724 respectively, a drop of only 10 per cent. No one has envied the position of the worker in industry during the past decade with his short time and low income but in comparison the position of the farmer is desperate.

According to the figures of the last census the average investment in a Canadian farm was $7,000 in round figures. In spite of this fact the average income for the "good" years 1926-1929 was slightly less than the average wages of a worker in industry with no personal investment whatsoever. And the drop in the income of the farmer was four or five times the drop in the income of the worker in industry.

The government must have a plan which appreciates the importance of food and of people. First, Canada must know what she wants. Second, she must get the knowledge out to the farmers—not by means of a random vague leaflet telling the people that "we want a flock on every farm." What the farmer wants to know is: Shall I be able to get my money back if I fill my coop with chickens this year? Am I going to get enough to pay for anything like the time it takes me to go out and look after the hens? We should have, for example, a full coop on half the town and city lots; and why have we not? Simply because we are mismanaging the matter of production of goods.

Third, Canada must guarantee the farmer the means of production. She must guarantee him goods and services and money. Finally, Canada must protect the farmer. First, with respect to price; that is the all important thing. He must be guaranteed his costs plus a just profit. Secondly, with respect to markets: he must know that, if anyone has to absorb the shock if there are too many goods produced, he is not going to be the unfortunate. We must guarantee the farmer that if he happens to be fairly well off and puts his life savings or borrowed money into cattle, and then when the war closes the price drops out of cattle, he will not have to bear the total loss, as he did last time. This anxiety concerning what will happen after the war is deterring thousands upon thousands of farmers from producing beef and pork and milk and on through almost the whole list of agricultural products. I know that from first-hand contact.

We must guarantee the farmer against his creditors. The Canadian courts are eager enough to declare ultra vires the laws which a province might pass for the protection of the farmer. I wonder why some dominion body is not equally eager to bring into being laws which will protect the farmer. In saying that the farmer must be guaranteed against creditors, I am not suggesting that the creditors should lose their money. But if we can have such a tremendous amount of money as it now becomes apparent we are getting, surely some of it can be used to protect the people who advanced the farmer credit.

It may be asked where the money is coming from. That is a question with which I am always glad to deal, and to-day I have a little assistance. May I read a statement which appeared in the report of a speech, published in the Ottawa Citizen of November 13, 1941, by H. T. Jaffray, President of the Canadian Bankers' association. He——told the 50th annual meeting to-day that Canada's vast expansion of wartime manufacturing, and large increase in commerce had been "so well, so simply, and so smoothly" financed by the chartered banks, that the financing has "never been a problem in Canada's war effort." The chartered banks "maintain a very strong position and stand ready to continue to support Canada's war effort to the fullest extent that may be required of them."

I submit, Mr. Speaker, in all humility and plain common sense that one of the major needs to-day in Canada's war effort is the financing of a sound policy for agriculture, and the banks should be requested to proceed to perform this function.

There are other problems which need to be solved before Canada has a balanced production. One of those problems is that of the labouring man. This government has shorn the labouring man of every vestige of protection which his struggle through the generations has erected about him. It has shorn him in effect of the power to bargain collectively, of the right to organize, and of the right to strike. Quotations from certain orders in council may be given to show that what I have said is probably a little extreme. I can give quotations to show that what I have said is thoroughly moderate. It remains the duty of those agencies who deprived the labouring man of his own protection to see to it that by the same agencies adequate government protection is afforded that man before he is driven to desperation with disastrous results.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said as much as I believe it is fitting I should say regarding the war effort, regarding balanced production in Canada. It does not give me happiness to have to say any kind of unpleasant things, but I felt myself to-day obliged to say some pretty sharp things, and I am going to say some sharper ones unless something is done about these matters with respect to the Canadian economy.

Before I close I wish to turn for a minute to the two amendments which have been moved. With the Conservative amendment I am not going to quarrel. I believe that the members of my group will see fit to support that amendment, on the ground that it is a vote of want of confidence in the government because of the fact that the government is not producing a balanced programme of production in this country.

With the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation amendment we are not going to quarrel particularly. We assume that the C.C.F. have finally got round to somewhere near the stand we took in 1939 before war was declared. They probably would be in agreement with the principles set forth in the excerpts which I read earlier in this speech from the statement issued at Edmonton. We therefore are likely to support the C.C.F. amendment.

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, I desire to join with those who have preceded me in this debate in extending to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne my hearty congratulations. Both performed admirably; both, together with four other hon. members, had the great privilege and advantage of seeing for themselves in the British isles the havoc wrought by the forces of tyranny. They were able to observe for themselves the grim determination of the people of Great Britain to carry on against tremendous odds. The house has benefited by their experience and by their contributions to this debate.

One can with difficulty take part in this debate without referring to the great loss which our country has suffered in the death of her former Minister of Justice, Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. He was a man of great integrity, unselfish, true to tradition, kindly, eloquent, a lover of freedom and a true disciple of Laurier. His speeches in this house were models; many of them will remain as masterpieces. His influence in this house and in the country at large will be felt for many years to come. He was a great Canadian who will rank among the greatest of our public men.

The speech from the throne opens with a reference to the character and scope of the present conflict. No doubt remains now that it is a world-encircling conflict. It has reached every continent, including our own. Each day it draws nearer and nearer, and one cannot foresee the end.

The first year of the war was one of disaster and disillusionment. The democratic nations relied on static defence and economic blockade. They were unprepared. The allied chiefs of staff made a serious mistake in thinking that they could sleep comfortably behind a Maginot line, because when it was flanked there followed the fall of France, and the liberty-loving nations were face to face with the grim reality that for seven years Germany had been preparing her youth for aggression and for a campaign of world domination.

The second year of the war has given us more room for hope. It began with the battle of Britain, in which those daring men of the Royal Air Force and the Royal Canadian Air Force saved that fortress of civilization—yes, and civilization itself. Our confidence grew with the victories over the Italians, who at the outbreak of the war had an African empire and who have now lost every vestige of it. Our hopes were shaken by the German successes in Yugoslavia, in Greece, in Crete and in Africa. Again they were strengthened by the passage of the lease-lend bill, which meant the mobilization on our side of the economic power of the United States. Finally, the fateful decision of the nazis, for whatever reason it was made, to attack Russia, has brought us, I believe, the most comforting news of this war. The campaign has now lasted for seven months. At the outset it appeared to be a complete nazi victory; it has now been turned into a humiliating defeat for the Germans, who are in retreat from Leningrad to the Crimea.

The third year of the war saw the British launch a fresh attack in Libya which from the outset met with success all along the line. It brought about the delivery of Tobruk and of Bardia. Many Canadians took part in the air operations in Libya and covered themselves with glory. Some 20,000 motor vehicles of Canadian manufacture, including tanks and universal carriers, stood the test in that campaign. Our hopes have been momentarily shaken in Libya by a counter-offensive, the details of which are yet difficult to appraise.

December saw the entry of Japan into the war, with the treachery and frenzy for which they are known; while their diplomats were negotiating at Washington they made the attack on Pearl Harbour. One cannot refer to the war in the Pacific without having a word to say concerning Hong Kong. For seventeen days Canadian troops held the enemy at bay against extreme odds. In the regiments from Canada were a number of young men from the constituency which I represent. Their fate is not yet known, but I pray they have not been called upon to make the supreme sacrifice.

The war in the Pacific, and particularly the precarious position in which Australia finds herself to-day, should remind us that if it is important and essential to maintain a Canadian army overseas, it is equally important and essential to protect our own shores from attack.

At this stage I should like to say a word with reference to Canada's part and contribution in this life-and-death struggle. Canada has been fighting on two fronts, the military and the economic. The military front is made up of the fighting armies, the air squadrons and the ships of the navy. The economic front is made up of the factory, the farm and finance. Canada, as we have been told, already maintains a Canadian army overseas, composed of approximately 130,000 men. The Canadian corps comprises three divisions, together with the fifth armoured division, to which have been attached an army tank brigade, corps troops and army troops. The speech from the throne refers to an expansion of the Canadian establishment overseas. The Prime Minister in his speech yesterday clarified that by saying that during 1942 two army corps will be established in Great Britain, composed first of three infantry divisions, and two army-tank brigades, and two armoured divisions. In Canada there are the fourth and sixth divisions. The sixth division consists of three brigade groups to which are attached corps and army troops, and there are also coastal defences. Canada maintains troops in Newfoundland and the West Indies; and the grand total of the Canadian reserve and active armies is approximately 450,000 men.

In the air force there are 100,000 men, with a large number on the waiting list. Soon there will be in Great Britain some twenty-eight squadrons, and twenty-five squadrons are said to be equal to one army division. Thus far there have been lost, in the air force, some 1,200 men. The greatest contribution of the Royal Canadian Air Force is in connection with the commonwealth air training plan, to which Right Hon. Mr. Churchill paid such tribute in his memorable address in this house. Under that plan are trained airmen from Canada, the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Australia. It is a commonwealth enterprise. Canada has undertaken the major burden in both men and money. Under the plan eighty per cent of the men are Canadians; and of the $824,000,000 which the plan will cost over a period of three years, this country will pay about $531,000,000. Some ten per cent of those trained under the plan are from the United States, and there are some 600 American instructors operating in the various training schools.

The navy has 350 ships and a personnel of 27,600, and here also we have a large number of men awaiting entry. Thus far 400 men and six ships have been lost at sea. A very important and essential part of the work of the navy consists in the convoying of food, troops and material to and from Great Britain. Thus far less than one per cent of the goods, equipment and men convoyed have been lost at sea.

A moment ago I referred to the economic aspect of the war. It is equal in importance to the fighting armies, the air squadrons and the ships of the navy. A modern infantry division costs eight times as much to equip and maintain as did the division of 1914-18. It has fifty times the horse-power in its transport and fighting vehicles. It has eight to ten times the fire power in its small arms and guns. A machine gun costs $500, and it takes tens of thousands of these guns to equip our troops. An anti-aircraft gun costs $28,000, and they are being produced at the rate of four hundred per month. A tank costs $90,000, and we have manufactured hundreds. We have sent large numbers to Russia, and the reports from that front indicate that they have performed admirably, particularly the type known as the Valentines.

A bombing plane costs some $100,000; a dozen can crash in a night. Our aircraft industry has been built from the ground up. It has manufactured or assembled in Canada some 3,749 aircraft, and the present average rate of production is forty per week, of all types. The automobile industry has played a tremendous part in equipping the forces of the empire. Over 200,000 vehicles of all types thus far have been built, and thousands are being delivered each month. Every four days Canada builds a corvette. Two 10,000-ton cargo ships already have been launched, and the programme for 1942 visualizes the production of 100 freighters of the 10,000-ton class.

In a statement made shortly before the house met, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) said that to-day Canadian equipment is to be found on all the battlefronts of the world—in the Philippines, at Singapore, in China, Russia, the middle east and the British Isles. In his memorable address in this House of Commons the Prime Minister of Great Britain spoke of the production of corvettes and ships, which he said was proceeding on a scale almost equal to the building in the United Kingdom. Coming from him, this was truly a great tribute to the naval production of our country.

When one ponders these facts, sir, he will immediately see why it takes fifteen workers on the home front to keep one combatant in the field. Hence the economic front is truly a front, and not only a salient.

The farm is an essential part of the economic front. If in peacetime it can be said that the farmer is the backbone of the country, that is even more true in time of war. Cheese, bacon, canned salmon, wheat and flour are being sent to Britain in ever-increasing quantities. In the third year of the war our export of bacon to Britain will be more than our entire production in pre-war years. In 1941 we sent 112,000,000 pounds of cheese to Britain, and the contract for 1942 calls for 127,000,000 pounds.

In view of the shortage of labour on the farm and the increase in the cost of production it seems to me that the farmer, and particularly the cheese producer, is called upon to make an extra sacrifice, or an extra contribution. Every year since the beginning of the war—and I believe these are the words of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner)—Canadian farmers have accepted prices for their food commodities far below those to which they were entitled. This is particularly true of cheese. It is interesting to note in the speech from the throne that vast quantities of foodstuffs will go to Britain as an integral part of the war effort. It is to be hoped that for the primary producer this will mean an increase in prices. It seems to me there should be a greater parity between the return of the wage earner and the return of the farmer producer. Canada's contribution in foodstuffs centres chiefly around pork products, cheese, canned salmon, wheat and flour; and in all these commodities we are the chief source of supply for Britain. In his address yesterday the Prime Minister said that Canada is an arsenal, a ship yard and a storehouse as well as a full partner on the fighting front.

Wars cannot be carried on without finance, and in a statement in this house last year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) told us that for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1942, there would be needed, to meet the direct expenses of the war, the current costs of government and the advances to Great Britain, the sum of $2,800,000,000. This sum, I believe, was broken up as follows:

Estimated cost of the war for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1942	$1,450,000,000
Ordinary cost of government	468,000,000
Advances to Great Britain	900,000,000
	$2,818,000,000

This is a tremendous amount of money, so large it is hard to conceive. Perhaps some comparisons may help to make clear the stupendousness of this amount. In 1940 the total paid to all those working for salaries and wages amounted to $2,875,000,000. Therefore it would take 80 per cent of this amount to meet the direct costs of the war in 1941-42. It would require the production of all farmers in Canada for almost three years to cover the cost of war for one year. The direct cost of the last war, from 1914 to 1920, which would include the cost of demobilization, amounted to $1,670,000,000. The amount we now raise for one year is greater by $600,000,000 or $700,000,000 than that raised in the whole of the last war. These sums, I repeat, are stupendous. Still it is estimated that $1,500,000,000 will be raised by taxation and otherwise by way of national revenue. During the present fiscal year 78 per cent of our national budget will be raised by taxation, as compared with 47 per cent in the last war. Canada's per capita taxation will exceed in this war $110 as compared with $28 in the last war.

It is difficult, sir, to refer to the matter of finance without saying a word about the Hyde Park declaration. In the early stages of the war there was an official premium of 10 to 11 per cent on United States dollars in Canada. There was a freezing by the foreign exchange control board of United States cash already here. This method sufficed to keep the books between Canada and the United States reasonably well balanced, and Canadians were able to travel and purchase in the United States during that first stage.

In the next stage, however, we began buying hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of war materials in the United States, and we fabricated them to be sent to Great Britain, without thought of immediate payment from the mother country. During that period we ran desperately low in United States dollars; hence a travel embargo had to be imposed. Heavy taxes on non-essentials were needed to ensure that so precious an asset as United States dollars should be conserved for war purposes.

Perhaps by placing some figures on record I might give hon. members a better understanding of that picture. In 1938 imports from the United States into Canada amounted to $425,000,000. In 1939 they rose to $497,000,000. In 1940, during the first complete year of the war, they jumped to $744,000,000 and in 1941 it is estimated that they will reach $953,000,000. As opposed to this it is estimated that in 1941 Canada will export to the United States $475,000,000 worth of goods, which would then leave us with an adverse trade balance of $478,000,000. Something simply had to be done to offset this serious bottleneck. Then came Hyde Park. The United States began to buy war materials in Canada for lease-lend to the United Kingdom, the Netherlands East Indies, China and Russia. She also agreed to charge directly to lease-lend accounts of Great Britain raw materials which we needed to make munitions of war for the battle of Britain.

The dollar problem did not disappear. But from the most acute bottleneck in our war effort it became something manageable. A crown company, known as War Supplies Limited, was set up as a means of implementing this declaration. Its function is to negotiate and receive orders from departments of the United States government for war supplies to be manufactured in Canada. Since Hyde Park it is estimated that some $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 of war materials will be purchased in Canada. This will unquestionably relieve the pressure and substantially reduce the adverse trade balance.

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word about the Ogdensburg agreement, which was made almost within a month of the fall of France. As a result of this agreement there was set up a permanent joint board on defence to consider the safety of Canada and the United States. Its object was to consider in a broad sense the defence of the north half of the western hemisphere. It included problems relating to land, sea and air. As a result of this agreement the United Kingdom exchanged sites for bases. In Newfoundland and Bermuda these sites were leased. The other sites were exchanged for fifty over-age American destroyers, six of which went to Canada. Early in the war Canada sent a garrison to Newfoundland, and since the Ogdensburg agreement that garrison has been strongly supplemented by American forces. On the west coast joint defence has been put into operation. A chain of well-equipped air bases has been established where none existed two years ago. On both coasts Canada is basing her defence on the three arms of the service, with the naval and air forces predominating.

Closely tied up with the central defence under the Ogdensburg plan is the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes seaway project, of which we have not yet heard the last word. With Japan in the war and the west coast subject to attack, and with enemy activity on the east coast, this giant undertaking is still regarded as a defence job. The proposed 27-foot deep waterway would open the great lakes to all but the heaviest warships. It would provide bomb-free anchorage many thousands of miles from the sea for unlimited concentrations of naval craft. It would make available for shipbuilding, factories in the Hamilton, Windsor and Detroit areas, where there is concentrated the largest amount of power, steel, coal, labour and machinery which can be found anywhere in the world.

The Ogdensburg agreement marks the full blossoming of a long association of harmony and friendship between Canada and the United States. It was the forerunner of that historic meeting at sea between Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt which resulted in the Atlantic charter, while the Hyde Park agreement brought about the declaration respecting the joint war production committee of the two countries. Both Hyde Park and Ogdensburg, so far as this country is concerned, have paved the way for the allied declaration which was made early in January, and which has now been implemented in the speech from the throne.

On September 10, 1939, Canada declared a state of war against Germany, and at the same time declared that she would stand at the side of Great Britain. Since that day Canada has never faltered. That is why Great Britain's Prime Minister was able to pay such a tribute to Canada in this chamber. He called our war effort "magnificent"; and I believe that in a press conference he gave afterward he went so far as to say that, tremendous as was the contribution in the last war, the contribution in this war was even greater. That effort, Mr. Speaker, is due to careful planning on the part of the government. It is due to the fact that men have been placed in the right places.

There have been mistakes. Unquestionably there have been delays; but of irretrievable blunders there have been none. There is one thing that has been manifest thus far, and it is the unity of mind and of purpose of the Canadian people. But we have now, sir, reached a very critical stage in our war effort, a stage which I think in some respects greatly parallels that of the last war. We are now in the third year of the war. It was in the third year of the last war that the crisis came which split this country against itself. I am sure no hon. member in the house would want to see a recurrence of those events. The plebiscite, in my humble view, is another means of preserving intact the unity of our people. Without that unity the war effort could not be national, it could not be total. I do not believe there is any section of this country, in the face of the peril which surrounds us, that would not want us to prosecute this war to the utmost of our strength. If it is to be prosecuted in that manner, the unity of mind and the unity of purpose of our people must be kept intact. I am sure the house will listen to the words of the former Minister of Justice on this subject, uttered not long before his death. He said:

> Sons of our country, brothers in one family, for the future of Canada as for the successful prosecution of the war, is it not imperative that no section of Canada, no race, no creed, should impose upon the other sections, the other races or the other creeds incurable wounds which might destroy our country forever.

In order to have total war there must be total unity, so that in the days to come the Canadian people, side by side with the British and American peoples, will, to use the words of Britain's Prime Minister in his Washington speech, for their own safety and the good of all, walk together in majesty, in justice and in peace.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to conform to that pleasant practice which is followed in this house and express my words of commendation to the mover (Mr. Fournier, Hull) and the seconder (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City) of the address, and I do this not in any perfunctory way because I appreciated listening to these hon. members. Both of them are members of standing in this house who have made for themselves niches; both of them recently had the opportunity, as did I, of crossing to Great Britain by a most novel method. We saw for ourselves the valour of that people and the recovery they are carrying out; we saw the extraordinary way in which their nerve is being upheld. I was particularly delighted with the phrases used by the mover when he described, in rather touching words, the grace of their majesties.

The speech from the throne is intended to reveal to the people of Canada the intentions of the government in the prosecution of the war, recognizing as it does that the situation is critical and the danger great, and consequently that unless that danger to our existence is overcome by early victory, other things fall into insignificance. Canada went to war two and one-quarter years ago in order to uphold her principles and to defend her honour. During this time the war has steadily expanded, and to-day she is confronted with far graver conditions because the war is on both her coasts and her men are fighting on every front.

Therefore I examine the government's intentions with critical interest. I find that the fullest consideration of the war effort, past, present and future, will be given in the course of the discussion, and that measures will be submitted providing for our national security and the prosecution of the war to the utmost of our strength. This implies to me that the very wide powers which parliament gave to the government under the National Resources Mobilization Act and other acts have proved insufficient for their purposes. That is indeed surprising, or has the government not yet made full use of the powers so granted to it by parliament?

Yesterday, when referring to the form and contents of the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave him commendation—naturally it was qualified commendation—and accepted a good deal of what my leader said as being something to which he could subscribe. Then he went on in banter and referred to the fact that, as he followed him, the leader of the opposition appeared to spend the major part of his time in advocating compulsory service for military affairs and then had omitted that from the amendment which he proposed. To that view I certainly cannot subscribe because in my opinion the leader of the opposition treated compulsory service for military affairs as one of the factors making up what he conceived to be Canada's total national effort.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend omits the word "overseas." That is the point I was making.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It says, "any theatre of war."

Mr. STIRLING: I think that will develop from a re-reading of the amendment. My hon. friend was discussing what we consider necessary for man-power and its development in this country, and he dwelt upon the necessity of using compulsion in the matter of military service. When I come to the amendment which he subsequently laid before the house, I find the following clause:

> (a) completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war.

[Mr. Stirling.]

For the Prime Minister to say that there is little reference in that to compulsory service seems to me to indicate that he needs something more than a microscope if he desires to get the meaning of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I think I agreed with the leader of the opposition as to compulsion being applied to military service at the present time. My point was that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was identifying military service overseas with a total war effort, and the application of compulsion to military service overseas with a total war effort. My objection was that when he was presenting his amendment, attaching the importance he did to compulsion applied to military service for overseas, he did not so specifically state his point in the amendment.

Mr. STIRLING: I regret that I cannot follow the Prime Minister in his explanation of his exposition. It appears to me that my leader was referring to one phase of the man-power question, to the necessity, things having changed as they have and conditions being so much graver than they were, of applying compulsion if we were to carry out the war effort that we are supposed to be carrying out, a total one and that in any theatre of war.

We are further informed in the speech from the throne that approval will be sought of a balanced programme for further increases in the armed forces and for the production of munitions. I am not aware that parliament has in the previous war sessions put any bounds whatsoever on the numbers of the fighting forces or on the amount of production of which organized industry is capable. But the house will pay close attention to the way the money voted has been expended, and will readily accord what further authority is necessary.

Mention is made of the government's policy of "a total national effort for total war" and of "national selective service", and I look for evidence of either. When the national registration was arranged for under the National Resources Mobilization Act, the country welcomed it as evidence that it was the government's intention to use such a numbering of the people for the purpose of getting everyone able to work into work which would further the war effort. They were certainly justified in that assumption, if one may judge by the words which were used in explanation of the legislation when it was placed before the house. I quote from Hansard one paragraph of the Prime Minister's speech on June 18, 1940, pages 854 and 855:

It will enable the government to make the most efficient use of our man-power for the varied needs of modern machine warfare. It is of the utmost importance to realize that success in war to-day depends upon the use of men for the kind of work for which they are best fitted. The armed forces are only a part of the essential equipment of war. The skilled worker in the factory, the transport worker and the farmer, to mention only a few, are as essential to the effective prosecution of war as the soldier, the sailor and the airman.

To that I subscribed at the time, and to that I subscribe to-day. It has to be a total war effort so that every kind of effort which can be put forward by men shall be made use of, and it will have to be directed, and, in certain instances, men will have to be compelled to give service.

Again I quote the Prime Minister, in the same speech:

National registration will also provide the government with an inventory of the mechanical and industrial skill of our population. Such an inventory will prove valuable in affording additional information on the extent of our resources of skilled labour which can be drawn upon to meet the needs of essential war-time industries. It will also show the directions in which intensive industrial and technical training is most urgently needed to provide an adequate supply of labour to meet the growing demands of our war industries and other essential services.

I also quote the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) speaking on July 30, 1940, when he was Acting Minister of National War Services. The setting of his remarks was that he was speaking of the communications which the government had received in which various persons throughout Canada volunteered their services in carrying out the registration. He said at page 2125 of Hansard:

Some of these communications represented whole staffs in large organizations, determined to see that this registration is properly made in the shortest possible space of time. That cooperation is given to the end that every available man, every product of industry and primary production and the whole credit of Canada shall be placed at the disposal of the governments of Canada and Britain to drive back the forces of Hitler and reestablish freedom in the world.

The registration was looked upon as something which would be of very great service to a government that desired to get every man's effort into the war in the best possible way in which it could be used. But the government finds that, in spite of the information collected by the registration, in spite of the powers granted by the National Resources Mobilization Act, progress in its policy of "total national effort for total war" has been impeded and impaired by a "controversy concerning commitments", and for that reason it proposes to seek by plebiscite:

. . . release from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

If the government can obtain such a release it will then feel free "to act in accordance with its judgment".

In the first place, what are the commitments? The one that comes to mind is the Prime Minister's statement of his opinion about compulsory service. Are there others covered by the term "any commitments"? If there are no others, it is a pity that it was not so specifically stated. The Prime Minister has on several occasions referred to compulsion as an issue in the last general election. That is not the case. A question becomes an issue at an election when opposing views are placed strongly before the people. At the last election, so far as I am aware, the argument for the use of compulsion was not stressed, and few, if any, advocated it. True, there has always been a body of opinion which held that compulsion by selective service was the fairest way to fill the ranks of the fighting forces. But that question was not an issue at the last election. For many years in Great Britain recruiting for the services was on a voluntary basis, but when the time came that the government of the day was persuaded that compulsory selective service was imperative, that government proceeded to put it into operation and it did not hold a plebiscite. It took the onus of putting the scheme into operation and it took the risk of censure. Similarly, when last year that government decided that it must remove the restrictions in order to include women, it did not hold a plebiscite. It included women and took the risk of censure. Yet this government, which has always stressed the supremacy of parliament, now prefers to hold a plebiscite. It is going to ask the electors whether they will release the Prime Minister from the pledge he made.

Between the time of the last election and the present day the position of the allies has grown graver. The war is on both our coasts. The United States has joined us and has taken of its manhood what it considers is required for the task confronting it. It did not hold a plebiscite. It acted in accordance with its wisdom.

In this country it has been evident for a year that our manhood must be subjected to direction of effort if what the government calls its policy of "total national effort for total war" is to be carried out. In the year that has passed, the wheat crop, the apple crop, and some other crops were light, and, even so, the required labour was not easily obtained. In the season that lies ahead, there are prospects of greater crops and of greater demand for crops, for foodstuffs and for our munitions of war, and the farmers are already wondering what plans will be evolved so that labour may be available when it is required. They know of the registration. I do not think they know of what the government calls its policy of "national selective service". They know that industry is drawing away men and women by the lure of better wages and steady work, and they are anxious.

The government's efforts at recruiting for active service have been shrouded in some secrecy so far as total numbers by units and by provinces are concerned, except that in November last the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) submitted figures which showed that they were some distance below requirements; and now we have the sorry story, told by the minister on the last day of the 1941 session, that when he required to find in an emergency fewer than 2,000 trained men, some 130 with insufficient training had to be sent.

I do not suppose that I am singular in receiving continuous requests for advice as to how a man most desirious of helping in the war effort should get into touch with work he could do, and the only answer that one has been able to give is the address of the director of services. In the earlier months of the war we had the voluntary service registration bureau, and we were never able to get any information as to how that bureau functioned. There was an occasion, I remember, when it was intimated that the number of these applicants had reached five figures, but we were never able to get an answer to the question of how many had been put to desirable work for which they were suited. We have never been able to get an answer to the question of what percentage of applicants have received employment. The whole question of the man fitted for work lacking direction as to how he shall get into contact with that work, is still to be solved.

A blacksmith of my acquaintance was asked after the registration whether he was prepared to go back to his trade. He was not following his trade at the time. He said that he would be glad to. He heard nothing more; and then, as the work on which he was engaged, in an irrigation district, came to an end, he wrote, informing the authorities that he would be free the following month and would go to work at his trade if he was required. He was not seeking a job; he had occupation; but he wanted to do his bit. He was instructed to go to Vancouver and present himself in a shipyard. He drove the three hundred miles at his own expense, and he found that men were being laid off, not taken on. He went to other shipyards and found the same condition. He went to the labour office, and in that office they were astonished that he should have ever been instructed to find his way to Vancouver because he was needed to do certain work. So he, a disappointed man, returned home the three hundred miles at his own expense. He was wanting to help the war effort. Add that instance to many others of men who have mechanical training, who want to make parts in connection with contracts, who want to feel they are doing their bit, and imagine their feelings when told that the government has been impeded in carrying out its policy of national selective service by a controversy concerning commitments. Imagine the feeling in that blacksmith's district when he came home and it got around that that was what he had suffered when he, hoping to make use of his talents and his training in work, found at the end of a three hundred mile journey that he was not wanted; and imagine how that spreads around that fertile field of depression, among the many men in this country who are just waiting to be directed so that their skill and their talents shall be made use of.

This government was elected in March, 1940, by a considerable majority with a mandate of the people to get on with the job. Compulsory service was not an issue at that election, though the Prime Minister says it was. It did not prevent the government from making the only use I know of, to that date, of the registration, and applying compulsion to the training of young men of certain age classes, first for a thirty-day period, and then for a four-month period. It has not hampered the government in applying compulsion to those young men by retaining them in the reserve army. But note that the speech from the throne says that the government's efforts are impeded by its commitments, and it holds that, to set aside those commitments and get on with the total war effort, even though the facts which we face are completely different from what they were when the commitments were made, would savour of dictatorship.

Therefore the government is going to hold a plebiscite, and the people are to be asked, "Will you release us from our hampering commitment?" The government has been the custodian of the facts; it must of necessity control what we are told. It has released what it has seen fit, and the facts connected with our needs, if we are to wage total war, have not been very plentiful to us in this house. Would not a reasonable reply to the question be from the man or the woman in the country, "Why ask me? You ought to know. You were put there to govern. You say your policy is total national effort for total war. Go ahead; don't ask me if you may."

There are in this country a considerable number of people of stocks other than English and French who came here and threw in their lot with us, and whose descendants, with our descendants, we hope, will build a greater and grander Canada. Very many of them have not yet sufficiently mastered our language to be able to follow the niceties of the question, when is a commitment not a commitment?

Mr. MARTIN: And vice versa.

Mr. STIRLING: It may be difficult for them to find their answer, yet the sons of many of them are in the armed services, and they under wise leadership would be as anxious as we are to defend liberty.

I could have understood the action of the government had it submitted a measure susceptible of simple explanation to people, asking for a yes or a no, though I could not have agreed with the action, because I hold that a government is put there to govern. But, to ask the people if it may be released from a commitment, and leave its subsequent action a mystery, is making government in this country a laughing-stock. In this plebiscite the government will have to use methods, yet to be described to us, for the purpose of informing the far-flung population as to the reasons and the facts connected with the question which they are asked. It will be no easy matter to do that. There are hundreds of thousands of people in this country who do not read a daily newspaper. Some of them no doubt see a weekly newspaper. There are, I do not know how many hundred thousand who listen to the radio; perhaps it runs into the millions, but my impression is that the dial is very quickly turned off when something entertaining ends. How are the government going to inform the people in detail of what this question means and why it is asked? If the government can answer that question satisfactorily, they may make those of us who dislike the idea of a plebiscite a little less hard against it.

The Prime Minister indicated yesterday that, in his opinion, three courses were open to him, and that two others had been suggested to him. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a sixth course open, a course which I think is the one this government should have followed. The proper course would have been to submit the difficulty of a commitment to parliament and take parliament's answer. This government was returned to power by a considerable majority. Each one of the members is the chosen mouthpiece of the constituents he was elected to represent. It is to them the Prime Minister should turn for an answer to the question: May I be released from a commitment which I made when times were far different from what they are to-day?

To parliament he can relate the facts, to parliament he can divulge the difficulties, far better than they can be explained to the population at large. Members of parliament are delegates sent by the people, they are sent to express opinions on whatever questions are put before them. The majority wish of parliament is supreme. Under a democratic system what possible objection can be voiced to letting parliament decide? Then the course that this government should follow would be to get on with what it calls its policy of total national effort for total war; get on with it though it is a year late; make use of national selective service so that the available man and woman power may be put to the best possible use, and then see the Canadian people adapt themselves to their duty and accept sacrifice and self-denial if these are required.

Mr. R. W. GRAY (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to express some views on the speech from the throne presented to this house on Thursday last, may I first be permitted to congratulate the mover of the address in reply, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), and the seconder, the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), on the excellence of the material chosen and the clarity with which they expressed their views. Both these hon. members have recently returned from a visit to war-time Britain, and it is therefore fitting that they should have been chosen for this high honour. They have discharged their duty with credit to themselves and to the constituencies which they represent.

Since we met in this chamber in November last, a new and powerful enemy has attacked us. But a new and more powerful friend has joined us. When the history of this war is written, I feel certain it will be found that the part which the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) has played as liaison officer as it were between England and the United States, in forging those links which now bind the English-speaking nations together, will rank among the highest of his achievements.

Mr. Speaker, we have passed through difficult times; we are facing times more difficult. We have achieved much; much remains to be done. That there is room for criticism the government would be the first to admit. But in any criticism we may offer let the fact not be obscured that Canada is rendering a service of which we may well be proud. There are times when we are too prone to belittle our own effort. That is due in part to the fact that we are hearing over the radio and reading in the press of the huge production programmes announced by our neighbours to the south, and losing sight of the fact that we are a nation of some twelve million while they have some 130 million. We have, as has been pointed out in this house—and I think it cannot be too often repeated—accomplished some great things since we declared war. We have some 150,000 soldiers, sailors and airmen serving outside Canada. We have a total voluntarily enlisted man-power of something over 387,000. Our navy went into action immediately war was declared and has played an increasingly important part during the battle of the Atlantic. The personnel of the Royal Canadian Air Force as of December 31, 1941, totalled something over 100,000 men. To this must be added some 12,000 civilians, or a force of nearly twenty-five times as many as we had when war was declared.

I should like here to commend the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) for his foresight in establishing an air cadet corps and schools and other services in order to bring up the educational standing of men who did not quite meet the required qualifications. The commonwealth air training scheme is turning out pilots, gunners and observers at a rate far in excess of that which was planned for this time. It has been reported that some 80 per cent of the personnel of its air crews are Canadians, and the fact must not be lost sight of that Canada is paying 60 per cent of the cost. In its first three years of operation the plan will cost something like $500,000,000, more than the dominion collects in taxes in a normal peace-time year. Canadian aircraft industry, very small as we know it was at the beginning of the war, has now turned out something over 2,700 aircraft. Chemical and explosives plants of huge dimensions have sprung up. Shells are being made in factories, some of which were closed for years, others have been built upon soil which up to a few months ago was barren land. Tanks, army vehicles, are rolling off assembly lines; automatic weapons, guns and small arms ammunition are being produced in greater and greater quantities.

One could go on and tell of corvettes, freighters and smaller craft being built in Canadian shipyards. All this is a tribute to the industry and energy of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the staff that he has gathered under him. Canada's direct war spending in the present fiscal year will be more than $1,300,000,000. When to the war expenditures are added the other expenses, federal, provincial and municipal, the Canadian taxpayer will be found to be paying in taxes between fifty and fifty-five cents out of every dollar he earns. These are some of the things we are doing, and, for a nation of around twelve million people, not to be deprecated.

In spite of these tremendous accomplishments more remains to be done. It is true that too many of us may be what is termed Monday morning quarter-backs, but it is a poor coach who does not take a lesson from such quarter-backs.

Mr. Speaker, these words stand out in the speech from the throne:

> The conflict can have but one of two outcomes. Either tyranny, based on terror and brutality, must be overthrown; or the free peoples of the world, one and all, slowly but eventually, will be reduced to a state of bondage. Upon the outcome depends, for generations, the future well-being of mankind.

Agreeing as I do with that statement, I am disappointed that the government have not given us the facts which enabled them to put into the mouth of his excellency the words indicating the gravity of the crisis. These were not surmises but facts of which they had knowledge; facts which, if given boldly to the people of Canada, would have been accepted just as willingly as the people have accepted every definite request made during this war. They have accepted, without question, higher taxation, restrictions, loans of all kinds, whatever they have been told was necessary for the successful prosecution of the war.

With this in mind, Mr. Speaker, I submit that in this crisis the government would be justified in now—and by "now" I mean immediately—asking parliament to extend the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act in order to eliminate the restrictions concerning service in Canada only, in order that our armed forces both here and overseas, including reserves and reinforcements, may be maintained at the highest possible strength consistent with the maintenance of our food supply and industrial production. Instead, the government is about to refer this question to the people of Canada in the form of a plebiscite. I would not be true to my convictions or to my duty as I see it if I should fail to voice in this house my disapproval of that procedure. It means delay; it means heartburning; it means bitterness. It means that after it is all over and the government is released from its pledge, the issue still must be faced; and the bogy of national unity will again rear its ugly head. Speaking for myself alone, I do not ask to be relieved from the responsibilities that go with responsible government. I was elected to do my duty, as I saw it, to my country. If I fail to do so, then under our democratic system the remedy is at the polls.

Much has been and will be said of broken pledges. The hon. member for Brantford City, in seconding the address on Friday last, remarked that under our democratic system the promise of a leader was as binding as any bond under seal. Does the hon. member forget that in the mother of all parliaments, Westminster, on April 27, 1939, while the nation was still at peace, and only four weeks after the then Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain, had renewed a pledge made by his predecessor, Mr. Baldwin, that compulsory military service would not be adopted, Mr. Chamberlain introduced a motion in these words:

> This house approves the proposal of his majesty's government to introduce as soon as possible a system of compulsory military training, as announced on the 26th of April.

In the debate which followed the introduction of that motion, the prevailing opinion was the same as it should be here in Canada: The facts are there and we must face them as they exist to-day. Let me suggest to the Prime Minister that whatever his declaration may have been, as our first minister in this hour of peril he is bound to act in accordance with what he believes is required for the national safety. That is the supreme pledge which he made, though perhaps not in words, when he assumed the high office which he now holds. What of the solemn pledge given by President Roosevelt during his last election campaign, to the effect that the forces of the United States would not be sent overseas? Within one month of the declaration of war we find the president telling congress and the nation:

> We cannot wage this war in a defensive spirit. As our power and our resources are fully mobilized, we shall carry the attack against the enemy. American land, air and sea forces will take stations in the British isles—

Has there been any outcry in the United States of America against broken pledges?

There is another powerful weapon being used in this war, one of which we must not lose sight. That is the weapon of propaganda. Can anyone here doubt that the position Canada is taking to-day will be distorted far beyond its real significance? Can anyone doubt that the very real accomplishments of Canada, to which I have already referred, will be ignored in an attempt to show that in taking this plebiscite there is uncertainty and lack of sincerity when we say that total war can be met only with total effort? It does not matter what our enemies think. What does matter is the interpretation that will be placed on this action by our allies. I need refer to only one of them. On the very day that the government announced this plebiscite, the Commonwealth of Australia, through Prime Minister Curtin, was calling the man-power and the woman-power of the nation to take battle stations. What will the Australian people think as they read the pages of Australian casualties in Libya and Singapore; what will they think as they hear the air raid sirens warning of impending Japanese attacks, and at the same time read that Canada is leisurely to take a plebiscite as to whether or not the government may be released from certain pledges given prior to the hour of national peril?

These, sir, are days when the situation changes very rapidly, indeed almost from hour to hour. It is not too late to take a different stand; and I urge the government to extend the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act in the manner I have indicated.

Whenever the subject of compulsory selective service is brought up, there are those who immediately take it that this has reference to compulsory service in man-power for the armed forces only. Of course that is only one phase of a compulsory selective system. In the broad sense it would include all of us. It would mean immediate re-registration and reclassification. It would train those best fitted for industrial work; it would release man-power, replacing it with woman-power, for our women are just as anxious to serve as are the men. It would put an immediate stop to the flow of labour from the farm into industry at high wages, a situation which is serious in many parts of Ontario and which will require immediate action if the farmer is to be enabled to maintain maximum production. If proper boards are set up, it should clarify the system of calling up the extended classes for training. At the present time the uncertainty with which these postponements are being granted has a detrimental effect on the production of our farms. This is so in spite of the excellent manner in which registrars—and I refer particularly to the registrar in western Ontario, who is handling a difficult job—are carrying on this work. We find that farmers, particularly those having one son in the age category, are in a state of absolute uncertainty. It is all very well to say that there can be postponement. I am sure nearly every hon. member has had farmers come to see him in the fall asking what they should do in regard to putting in a stock for the winter. They have had to be told: "Yes; a postponement may be given for a couple of months if application is made to the registrar." But then they ask. "Well, what about the next postponement, and the next?" They want to know if they will continue to get postponements, provided that conditions remain unchanged. I do not know what has been the experience of other hon. members, but in many cases of which I have knowledge, in which two postponements have been granted, letters have been received to this effect:

> Kindly be advised that commencement of your military training has been deferred until approximately ..... date. No further postponement will be granted.

That situation must be clarified. With all the emphasis at my command I state that a plan to provide farm assistance in western Ontario must be announced at once if our farmers are to be equal to the task of producing what is required of them.

I turn now to the question of man-power. What are some of the weaknesses of the voluntary system as we have it to-day? Key men in industry, and men who, if not key men, are of an age at which they would be more useful in Canada, are enlisting.

I am of opinion also that the pressure put upon young men of the trainee age, during their four months' training, to enlist for service in units anywhere is unfair, and in many cases unjust. It is a method of getting men through the back-door when we cannot get them through the front. Further, Mr. Speaker, don't let us fool ourselves by saying that we can go under the old system by extending the trainee age; in other words, by saying that if we can get 300 volunteers out of a class of 1,000 of the 21- to 24-age limit, then by extending the trainee age to 30 or 35 we can obtain 700 in each class. The method of embarrassing and, in some instances, coercing men into service is not to the credit of this country.

The question naturally arises: Are we getting sufficient men for the army under the volunteer system? Much has been said in connection with this matter—too much, perhaps. And as a result there is confusion. We have information from departmental bureaux, speeches, some of them from ministers of the crown, implying at least that all is well. On the other hand, we have the opinions of commanding officers of military districts, and of military recruiting officers, who say that we are not getting a sufficient number of men under the voluntary system.

They should know, and I prefer to accept their statement. I think this house should know of the latest system being adopted by those in charge of recruiting for the army, certainly in western Ontario, and, I am advised, elsewhere as well. The method is that of setting up civilian recruiting committees in the various counties. I attended a preliminary meeting a few weeks ago at which time the officer in charge of recruiting for that district frankly and honestly admitted the difficulty he was facing in getting recruits for the army. He told us that they plan an exhibit for two days in the county town, and that exhibit is taking place to-day.

That is all very proper, and in my opinion the army has been lax in not placing before prospective recruits the advisability of joining the army, telling them something of its life and helping them to choose the service in which they are best fitted to serve, in the same manner that visiting recruiting officers for the air force and the navy have been visiting various county towns and larger villages for the past few months, giving their assistance and help. As a result, they have been able to get volunteers.

But the weakness of the system as I see it is the fact that what is being attempted in these exhibitions is the shifting of responsibility to the shoulders of civilian committees. During the exhibit a meeting is requested, to which would be invited some 100 to 125 representative citizens, and the needs for recruiting are set forth. The civilians in turn would be asked to form themselves into a recruiting committee. I think I know the feeling of the majority of those who attended that preliminary meeting, and it was this: Responsibility for the proper and complete utilization of man-power and woman-power rests with the government and the boards it may create, and not with the individual, untrained and without proper knowledge of who should go and who should stay.

This brings me to a further argument in favour of unrestricted compulsory selective service; and when I say that I mean that there is under such a system a place for all of us, a job for all of us to do, not merely in the mobilization of men for overseas but also in the placing of an equal burden of sacrifice in some form on every one of us not in the armed services. This, in my opinion, can be done only by a complete and scientific organization of all our resources and, great as our accomplishments have been, no one will suggest that that effort has really seriously been made.

What criticism can there be with regard to a principle of the right of the state to call upon its citizens to sacrifice wealth, comfort and even life itself when the very existence of our civilization is at stake? Is the compulsory system of selecting men for our armed forces unfair or undemocratic? No words of mine could answer this question as well as the remarks from the lips of Right Hon. Winston Churchill when, as a member of the British House of Commons, and largely opposed to the Chamberlain government, he supported the compulsory training bill in April, 1939, in these words:

> There is nothing undemocratic about this measure; it is the most democratic thing we have ever done. Provided that no exceptions are allowed, it will wear away differences between class and class, and it may also be the beginning of a far more broadly and evenly based society than we have ever known. . . . Almost everywhere we see hesitating, cautious governments, and resolute peoples. Here at home, the spirit of the people is far ahead of the government, and perhaps even of parliament, also. . . . This is a time when prejudices must be abandoned on either side, and a true comradeship established between all parties and classes throughout our loyal, anxious land.

If Canada does not put forth the greatest effort possible and we lose the war, the result is plain enough. The lights will go out on this continent for longer than the lifetime of anyone now living—much longer. Again if Canada does not put forth the greatest effort possible, her utmost effort, and none the less wins the war, how can we hold up our heads in the future, and what representation can we make at the bar of history? Sometimes it takes a terrible tragedy to enable a people to find itself. When the full story becomes known, Canada may find herself in Hong Kong. Britain found herself at Dunkirk. So long as the English tongue survives, the word "Dunkirk" will be spoken with reverence; for in that harbour in such a hell as never blazed on earth before, at the end of a lost battle, the rags and blemishes that had hidden the soul of democracy fell away. There, beaten but unconquered, in shining splendour, she faced the enemy.

They sent away the wounded first. Men died so that others might escape. It was not so simple a thing as courage, which the nazis had in plenty. It was not so simple a thing as discipline, which can be hammered into men by a drill sergeant. It was not the result of careful planning, for there could have been but little. It was the common man of a free country rising in all his glory out of mill, office, factory, mine, farm and ship, applying to war the lessons learned when he went down the shaft to bring out trapped comrades, when he hurled the lifeboat through the surf, when he endured poverty and hard work for his children's sake.

This shining thing in the souls of free men Hitler cannot command, attain or conquer. He has crushed it where he could from German hearts. It is the true tradition of democracy. It is the future. It is victory, if we will grasp it—victory, not of a military character, but victory over our own complacency, a victory which will enable us to see that there is no half-way house. It must be victory or defeat.

We have already heard talk of a new world to appear when this deluge of war has subsided. Unless we achieve victory for the great cause for which we entered this war, the new world will simply be the old world with the heart out of it. To redeem Britain, to redeem Europe, to redeem the world must be the settled purpose of every man and woman who places duty above a life of ease.

> Let us have faith
> That Right makes Might,
> And in that Faith
> Let us dare to do our duty
> As we understand it.

Mr. CHURCH: There will be a noble thirteen yet.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like to express my appreciation of the words uttered by the mover (Mr. Fournier, Hull), and the seconder (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City) of the address. I am sure that all members of the house envy them the experience they had in being able to visit Great Britain and to return to give us such a vivid picture of what Hitler has been doing across the sea. I suggest to the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) that he should make use of all hon. members who crossed the Atlantic and arrange that they bring first-hand information to the people all across Canada. I do not wish to subscribe to everything said by the hon. member for Brantford City and the hon. member for Hull, but I think that they, along with the others, could make a valuable contribution toward strengthening the morale of the Canadian people during this crisis.

I feel that every hon. member who takes part in the present debate must recognize that Canada has made a valuable contribution toward the defence of democracy. In my opinion, however, the question we should ask ourselves is not, "how much have we done?" but rather, "have we done as much as we ought to?" We cannot conclude that Canada has done all that should have been done. I should like to suggest that the government arrange now for the establishment of a separate department of government, a ministry of economic warfare or economic planning. I might remind the house that in September, 1939, Mr. Chamberlain outlined plans for the establishment of such a ministry in Great Britain. He pointed out that his government had been engaged over a period of two years in organizing such a ministry and that the staff had been selected several months before hostilities broke out. He intimated that it was not until 1916 during the great war that a similar ministry had been established. His words were:

> For every man in the front line, you must have many behind the lines, engaged in the production and servicing of weapons of war.

Although two years have passed, it is not too late to establish such a ministry in Canada in order that we may plan our economic warfare. I am aware of the fact that we have a committee on economic policy under the chairmanship of the deputy minister of finance. The membership of this committee includes the governor of the Bank of Canada and some deputy ministers in key departments. Every member of this committee is carrying tremendous responsibility, and I do not see how it is physically possible for them to give the direction that should be given to Canada's economic policy.

The questions that should be asked and answered are: How many men and women can be used in the various armed forces in order that Canada may make her greatest contribution? How many men and women should be engaged in our various war industries? How many should we have on our farms producing the foodstuffs necessary adequately to feed our own people and to fill every inch of space on the boats plying the Atlantic? As I said, these questions should be asked and they should be answered.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has urged us to consume less. A year ago I asked him to be more specific and to help us decide what commodities we should not consume in order that we might help our war effort. To date the Canadian people are waiting in vain for direct leadership in the field of consumption. A bewildered Canadian people scan the daily and weekly newspapers and see where they are urged to buy automobiles, radios, refrigerators, furniture and every conceivable commodity. High-pressure salesmen interview people who have received pay cheques and explain that since these articles are being manufactured and sold, no harm will follow in acquiring possession. On the one hand our people are urged not to consume and, on the other, they are urged to consume.

Our farmers across the country have been urged by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to produce less wheat. One of the pamphlets issued last year by his department says that less wheat in 1941 will help win the war. The government asked as a war service that the land sown to wheat in 1941 be reduced as much as possible compared with 1940. Are we to understand that the farmer who does not produce any wheat is making his greatest contribution? The Canadian farmers are waiting in vain for a lead from this government as to what should be done. I endorse what was said by the hon. member (Mr. Gray) who has just taken his seat regarding the uneasiness in the minds of the Canadian farmers. I, for one, am not satisfied with the decisions with regard to agriculture's place which have been made by the committee on national war services in our province.

Just recently I had occasion to discuss a case with the chairman of the board. This was the case of a young man who had bought a farm in 1937, two years before war broke out. He got married after war broke out and is now in the twenty-four-year-old age group. He has several cows, horses, pigs, chickens, et cetera. I realize that the chairman of this board is a judge who has an enviable reputation as a soldier and on the bench, but I am not willing to agree that he is in a position to decide what foodstuffs Canada should produce and whether a man's contribution should be made in the armed forces or on the farm. The order issued to this young man was to report on January 8, which involved the selling of his live stock and the necessity for making such other arrangements as he could. I think the board wisely agreed to give him another thirty days, but he still does not know what the decision will be at the end of that time. The chairman of the board pointed out that by being in the armed forces this young man could look after his family much better than if he were on the farm. That may be true, but is that the policy of this government? Is it the policy to take men off our farms who are producing and place them in the army and to leave our farms without men to operate them?

As I said, we want leadership. We want this government to do everything necessary to see that every man or woman is in his or her right place to make the greatest contribution. There is not an hon. member representing a rural constituency who has not had a great many inquiries from people who have said, "Well, if we have too much food, how about getting into a war industry?" Those of us who come from the west have had countless requests. I should like to cite one case which is unusual rather than typical. This is a case where I think one would say offhand that there should not be any trouble in deciding into what category this man should be placed. I should like to remind the house that at the time the registration was being taken, the then Minister of National War Services explained that one of the reasons for taking the registration was to enable the government to tell the people where to go, to direct the people who were unemployed to find employment in industry, to enable people who are employed but trained for one particular type of work, to fit into another industry where their best contribution could be made.

The particular case I wish to discuss is that of a veteran of the last war, a man still in his forties, a mechanical draughtsman by trade. He has kept in touch with his profession while he has been on the farm. He wrote to me well over a year ago asking that he be given information as to where he might be able to make a greater contribution towards the war. I took his case up with the Department of National War Services and they agreed that this man had unusual qualifications and should be able to make a greater contribution than he was making in the particular industry in which he was then engaged. But they said they did not have the machinery to place him. They felt, however, that the employment agencies in Ontario would have no difficulty in directing him to employment. I got in touch with the employment office in Ottawa, and they said, "We have no suitable opening here, but the employment office in Toronto, Hamilton or Windsor will no doubt be able to place him." I communicated, in turn, with these other employment offices, and it was suggested that as my friend was in the west, he should communicate with an employment agency in the west, which would relieve him of the necessity of coming east. So I wrote to Winnipeg, and the employment office there said that in view of the fact that this man resided in Saskatchewan he should apply to the office at Regina. I then wrote to the office in Regina, and they said that in view of the fact that this man was living in the west and that all the war industries were in the east, he should apply to some agency in the east. So we were back to where we started. But my friend, a very patriotic citizen, is not satisfied to be staying on the farm producing what has been described as a drug on the market—wheat. He asked me to take his case up again last summer, and I have a letter here from the Wartime Bureau of Technical Personnel dated November 24, 1941, and referring to a letter they had written to my friend on September 27. Nearly two months after they had written him, they wrote me saying that there was a definite shortage of mechanical draughtsmen, and they said:

> It is quite possible that if he happened to be so located that he could conveniently make application in person to some of the larger organizations engaged in essential war industry, he would be successful in securing a position.

But he is not so situated. The letter goes on to say:

> I believe you will understand our hesitation in making such a suggestion to Mr. , or to anyone who happens to be so located that he will have to incur fairly heavy expenses in order to present himself at places where his services might be needed.

Would we say to a man who, at some place a long way from where fighting is going to take place, offers his services as a soldier: "We are sorry, but it would cost a lot of money to send you from here to where the fighting is going on, and we do not want to put the country to that expense." Of course we do not say that to the man who offers his services as a soldier. And here is a man who risked his life in the last great war and is now impatient at being kept on the farm and being unable to make a greater contribution in this war. Yet we are told that we should not go to the expense of moving him to places where employment might be found and where he might make a greater contribution.

I replied to this letter, giving a review of this man's case, and went on to say that I hoped the department would understand my difficulty in assuring my friend that Canada was doing everything that could be done and should be done.

I believe that without any further delay we must have a comprehensive plan for agriculture. Next week a delegation will visit this city from western Canada, a delegation that is being sent here by the hard-pressed people of Saskatchewan. Certain newspapers have suggested that if these men can find money to travel to Ottawa conditions in the west cannot be very difficult. Those who make this suggestion do a great injustice to the people of Saskatchewan. The contributions to send these people here will not average twenty-five cents per person, so that the suggestion is most unfair. I think it is unfortunate that it should be necessary for these people to come to Ottawa in order to get from the government an outline of a plan and to secure a fair deal. I remind this house that we are making plans for the development of our war industries, but we never say to a manufacturer who is making planes or tanks: "We are sorry that there is no other market for your product in the world to-day, so we will give you half of what it costs to produce it."

This government is in the business of handling wheat for our farmers. There is no market for wheat, of course, except such markets as we provide for it, but wheat is an essential commodity for national defence in Canada and for Great Britain. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that this government must without further delay outline a plan to ensure that all necessary foodstuffs be produced and that those producing them will receive a fair return.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, before the six o'clock recess I took occasion to ask a number of questions relating to the position in which, it seems to me, we now find ourselves as a result of the lack of a bold, courageous plan; and I should now like to pose some additional questions, feeling that each one should be answered.

First, what is the policy with regard to the production of automobiles, trucks and buses in Canada? According to a press statement a new automobile contains, on the average, about 1,700 pounds of steel, 500 pounds of iron, 60 pounds of copper, 20 pounds of aluminum, 70 pounds of cotton, and 15 pounds of wool, with a few pounds of glass. The latest statistics supplied by the bureau of statistics present an alarming study of the increase in the production of passenger automobiles for domestic use. Here are the figures of sales, month by month, in the years 1939, 1940 and 1941:

January	4,795	6,738	5,727
February	4,507	7,780	6,728
March	7,998	10,481	11,272
April	14,255	15,453	16,082
May	14,334	16,646	10,170
June	8,620	12,604	8,108
July	5,826	4,542	6,306
August	3,672	2,755	4,333
September	4,948	3,572	3,785
October	5,682	4,827	3,879
November	7,613	7,616	3,385
December	7,804	8,775	....

The statistics for December, 1941, are not available.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to the following increases in the early months of 1940 compared with 1939: January, 40 per cent; February, 72 per cent; March, 31 per cent; June, 46 per cent. It is true that the later months of 1941 showed a decrease, but the total number produced in the first eleven months of last year is given as 79,775, compared with 93,014 in the first eleven months of the previous year.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

In peace time I am enthusiastic about having an automobile in every garage. But in a war of machines I think it is unfortunate that so many skilled mechanics and so much valuable material should be utilized in the production of automobiles for pleasure. The production of trucks and buses has been increased; in the first eleven months of 1941, 32,218 were produced, compared with 26,618 in the corresponding period of the previous year. I know it can be argued by those who are selling these commodities that they have sales staffs to maintain and factory workers to pay, and that they cannot very well be expected to sacrifice their organization. But a plan which will include the entire country should be taken into consideration. Every mechanized unit possible should be supplied to our forces; we cannot continue to drift along using such a large volume of material in these non-essential industries. Last summer, while travelling on the train which goes from Saskatoon to Edmonton, I was told that every day of the week there is a large bus which runs on practically the same schedule as the train. On the day I was travelling there would have been no difficulty in accommodating on the train all the bus passengers. Surely we must not leave it to individual bus companies to decide whether theirs is essential work or not. There must be planning of necessary transportation in Canada. The production of the equipment necessary to transport our people must be carried on, but we should not have any unnecessary manufacture of buses or trucks or automobiles when the materials used in their production are needed for other purposes.

Then I should like to ask, what is our policy with regard to housing our people? I have discussed this subject on several occasions in the house. In my opinion we have here a problem which so far has not received the consideration it deserves. I raised the question when the house met here last November and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), in whose department the appropriations for war-time housing are made, stated, regarding the situation in Winnipeg, which I had mentioned in passing:

> Winnipeg was a city where there were many vacant houses. I suppose before the war there was no city which had as large a number of vacant houses as had Winnipeg. I have heard of no shortage there, but if a shortage occurs we will meet it.

I understand that, following this statement by the minister, there were some unfavourable comments from Winnipeg; an official of Wartime Housing Limited was sent to Winnipeg to find out what was the situation, and one of the directors of Wartime Housing in Winnipeg said that Winnipeg did not have any housing problem. What are the facts? I received this week the 24th annual survey of vacant houses for the city of Winnipeg, issued by the health department of that city, and I want to congratulate Winnipeg upon having such an efficient department of municipal administration. On the first page of the report we are told that the total vacancies in Winnipeg, which I believe is the third city of Canada, are 111 houses and suites at the end of November, compared with 337 a year ago and 704 in the year before that. How does that compare with the statement made by the minister in November that in Winnipeg there was no shortage of houses? The percentage of vacancies in 1939 was 0·86 per cent; in 1940, 0·43 per cent; in 1941, 0·20 per cent; and this very carefully prepared report states:

> It will be seen that we have reached an all-time low in the number of vacancies, which means that more and more families are having to crowd together. This condition is, of course, in conflict with our health and other by-laws, but it is evident that there is little we can do about it. . . .
> The shortage of accommodation for the low-income group has been acute for years and I have referred to this over and over again in these reports. The present plight of the average working man to find moderate but satisfactory living quarters for his family is lamentable. . . .
> Surely our present housing shortage cannot continue much longer. The risk to health of our sub-standard housing, not to mention that of the fire hazard in our nondescript tenements, much evidence of the toll in moral and mental standards, also the cost of crime, in our blighted districts. . . .
> The doubling-up of families is one of the chief characteristics of slum areas and this condition is spreading like a cancer into some of our most exclusive residential districts. It is only a matter of time, therefore, when these districts will degenerate into blighted areas.

I object to a minister of the crown stating that Winnipeg has not a housing problem, in view of the fact that information of this sort has been supplied to the various cabinet ministers over a period of years. The officials of Wartime Housing Limited should have consulted the health department of the city of Winnipeg, to find out whether the statement made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply was correct. I say again that there is a very serious shortage of houses in Winnipeg, where large capital expenditures have been made in connection with the war effort. Hon. members will understand that after being at war for two years we should have some general plan with regard to the housing of our people.

I am interested in this subject from a peace-time point of view, but particularly concerned about the problem as it affects our war production. It is impossible to get maximum production from people living in the sort of houses that I saw when I passed through Winnipeg last week. We had in Canada a national housing administration that had done commendable work, had made extensive plans for launching into the building of necessary temporary housing in areas where new houses were needed; but instead of giving this department, over which we have control, the go-ahead signal, we find a number of dollar-a-year men taken into war-time housing. The order passed at the time this department was set up went on to say that each of the directors would serve without remuneration. I believe we have had too many men who have offered their services without remuneration. Men who can give their time without remuneration are not necessarily the best men for the job. Without further delay we should have a comprehensive plan to deal with the acute problems of housing all across Canada.

At the Seigniory club the other day some concern was expressed as to whether the work of the national housing administration would be discontinued. Here parliament is in session, but we have no statement as to whether this very important part of our national life is going to be overlooked. We are told that some $20,000,000 have been spent in connection with war-time housing, but as a member of parliament I have had the greatest difficulty in finding anyone in any department here prepared to discuss whether we are getting good value for the money spent, whether the taxpayers can be assured that all is well in war-time housing. Without further delay there should be a clear statement made by the government as to its policy in connection with housing.

I come to another equally important question: What is the policy of the government with respect to the consumption of liquor in Canada? Again I refer to the bureau of statistics. Just to-day I have received the latest figures regarding the consumption of spirits, malt liquors and wines in Canada. I am shocked to realize that the Canadian people in this very critical period are spending so much of their money for and allowing so much of their labour to be engaged in the production and distribution of intoxicating liquors. The apparent consumption of spirits is reported as follows:

Year	Gallons
1940.....	3,818,409
1941.....	3,714,790*

*A slight reduction.

Of malt liquors the apparent consumption was:

1940	66,196,961
1941	78,529,426

For wines the figures are:

Year	Gallons
1941	4,812,614

I am sorry that the provincial governments have not yet submitted statements concerning their operations for the past year—at least only three have done so. Gross sales were reported as follows:

	1939 Gallons	1940 Gallons	1941 Gallons
N.B.	3,714,000	5,209,000	6,627,000
Man.	5,947,000	6,653,000	7,887,000
B.C.	13,758,000	14,960,000	17,590,000

Recently, on October 22 to be exact, a delegation representing many churches and temperance organizations waited upon the government in Ottawa. Representing the Roman Catholic church was Rev. Canon Philippe Casgrain on behalf of His Eminence Cardinal Villeneuve. Representing the Church of England was Canon Judd, of Toronto. Rev. T. Christie Innes represented the Presbyterian church and Rev. Peter Bryce represented the moderator of the United church. There were representatives from the Baptists, the Evangelical church, the Salvation army and various temperance bodies. This delegation had been here a year ago, and at that time were, I understand, promised that the government would give their representations careful consideration. That is a favourite expression with this government; "The matter is being considered." We have been told that so often that we are getting most impatient.

This delegation asked:

1. That sale of alcoholic beverages in taverns, beer rooms, wine shops, et cetera be discontinued and that sale of such beverages be confined entirely to government-owned liquor stores.

2. That sale from government liquor stores be permitted only between the hours of three o'clock in the afternoon and eight o'clock in the evening, and on week-days only.

3. That all advertising of liquor in Canada be forbidden except in the place of sale.

4. That when the request in item 1 is implemented, an order issue from the Department of Defence closing all wet canteens in military establishments.

I understand that the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) referred to the divided jurisdiction between the dominion and the provincial governments in the matter of liquor control, but he assured the deputation that the matter would be given earnest consideration by the government. That is an old story also, about divided jurisdiction. But we have the War Measures Act, which gives this government the right to do anything that is in the interests of the Canadian people during the war, and I submit that the representations made by this representative group were very reasonable. They have formulated these representations, taking into consideration the minimum that should be expected to win the support of the Canadian people.

I was interested in reading an article in the November issue of the Fortnightly, written by the eminent scientist J. B. S. Haldane. Writing about their problem in Great Britain, he said:

The less food we waste the less we must import. A very large amount of barley and hops grown in this country is used for making beer, which has practically no food value. The barley could be used for bread or feeding cattle. The hop fields could be used for beans or other food plants. If not another gallon of beer were brewed, this would save scores of ships for essential imports. But the disappearance of beer would cause grave resentment, both among beer drinkers and in the drink trade, some sections of which are making record profits at present. The resentment would be legitimate if the soldiers got no beer while the officers had their whisky. So the country as a whole would have to go "dry". On the other hand I see no reason why the publicans should be better treated than the little shopkeepers who are forbidden to sell rationed food because they have less than twenty-five customers registered. But this gigantic food waste could only be stopped after a big propaganda campaign. And in view of the close connection between the Conservative party and the drink trade I do not believe that it will be stopped. I may add in parenthesis that I am not a total abstainer, but have very nearly become so for the duration of the war.

I had better explain that he was not speaking of the Conservative party in Canada.

Mr. HOMUTH: It would be a good idea to make that very clear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: At the outset I stated that I was quoting from an article by a British scientist, appearing in a well known British publication. But I might say that what Professor Haldane says about the Conservative party in Great Britain might be said of the party in power here.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why not say it?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Because I am quoting his article. I am not writing an article or making a speech—

Mr. HOMUTH: You are making a speech, so why not say it?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I think it unfortunate that this large amount of money should be expended in Canada in connection with the drink trade, while so little money is spent by this government to educate our people with regard to the evils in connection with the use of drink, and, as Professor Haldane says, to "carry on a gigantic propaganda campaign." Perhaps hon. members would be interested in an article that appeared in the Temperance Advocate, published in Brampton, with regard to what they are doing about this problem in that so-called godless country, Russia. It states that back in 1933 they launched a strong campaign against the use of alcohol. There was a great and completely organized anti-alcohol movement, with the equivalent of local option. No liquor was sold in the vicinity of the barracks of soldiers or sailors, or of labour exchanges. Sale was also forbidden on pay days and during annual conscription. The advertisement of the sale of alcohol was forbidden in the press, in the streets, in railway stations, on boats and in other public places. Anti-alcohol teaching was carried on in all primary and secondary schools, and was included in the training courses for teachers. Anti-alcohol propaganda was included in theatre and cinema productions.

I believe the valuable work that was started in Russia in 1933 has had results we can all appreciate. The fact that Hitler has been stopped so completely by the Russian army gives a great deal of support to my statement that Russia has been able to make a much greater contribution, as a result of the propaganda that has been carried on, than she ever could have made under the old regime, under which the government received so much revenue from the manufacture and sale of liquor.

There was another table which I intended to quote, showing the revenue to this government from the liquor trade. Perhaps I can dispense with that, but in view of the disastrous results of the use of liquor in Canada at the present time I urge the Department of National War Services to appropriate a large sum of money for the purpose of carrying on the necessary educational work to place the facts in this connection before the Canadian people. I realize that the views I have expressed are not shared by a great many hon. members. But to-day we find ourselves in the most critical situation ever known in human history. The laissez-faire methods that were tolerated in peace time are not good enough in the present crisis. Plans must be evolved by which every Canadian industry and indeed every Canadian individual will carry on the work most necessary to be done to enable us to make our greatest contribution to the preservation of democracy and the absolute defeat of Hitler.

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General has very graciously read to this house a speech from the throne that has been cautiously prepared by the government of the day. May I add my congratulations to those already offered to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) on their addresses, which were delivered with a dignity in keeping with the highest traditions of this house. As legal gentlemen they certainly demonstrated a skill and ability in their defence of a somewhat difficult case.

The worst apprehensions of the Canadian people at last have become a reality. We have learned from the speech from the throne that a plebiscite is to be submitted to the people in which they are to be asked whether or not we are going to back up those gallant, loyal sons of Canada who are fighting for our freedom. Canada is a great country. No other country in the world enjoys our geographical security. No other country with our population enjoys such vast resources, such strength in agriculture, industry and potential wealth of all kinds. Canada played a noble part in the last great war, and the soldiers, sailors and airmen who are fighting the battle of freedom in this war are the noblest of our countrymen.

During the past twenty-nine months the people of this country have done a great deal indeed. I might say also that the government has done something. Indeed, we have accomplished much; but much more could have been done, and I believe much more will have to be done if we are going to win this terrible conflict. We must take the offensive. Whenever and wherever possible we must increase our production of foodstuffs and munitions, no matter what sacrifices may be involved. As soon as possible we must raise, train and fully equip an army of unheard-of numbers on land, on sea and in the air, if we are to meet the onrush of the combined axis forces in the spring drive. We must have our armies mechanized and trained, not to fight where it is hoped the enemy never will be found—that is, here in Canada—but to fight wherever the enemy may be met. This also involves the training and equipping of vast reserves to back up our gallant soldiers in the front line. In these days first things must come first with every Canadian, and to-day the foremost requirement is the winning of this war. We are in a struggle that will require every available ounce of energy we can muster. Let us become concerned with the defeat of the enemy, and not only with the defence of Canada. If we meet the enemy where the fighting now is going on, then the enemy will never reach our shores. To advocate any other policy is, to my mind, near treason, for when we declared war in September of 1939 we meant what we said; we were not just playing soldier.

Many problems must be faced by this parliament if we are to achieve an all-out war effort. To one reference in the speech from the throne I believe every Canadian will give whole-hearted approval; that is, the statement that we are to contribute to Britain vast quantities of foodstuffs, munitions and supplies. In this regard may I say that if our government would come out with a courageous policy and tell our young men where they belong, whether they are needed on the farm, in the factory or in the front line, we then would have equality of service and, along with it, equality of respect as between the boys who are fighting our battles on those different fronts. If you told the boy on the farm that was where you wanted him, you would enable him to escape any feeling of humiliation he might have because he was not wearing khaki. You would create a feeling of equality between the boy in the factory, earning $7 a day, and the boy in khaki receiving $1.30 a day. Nothing less than a courageous stand will meet this situation.

So far as munitions are concerned, I believe this country has done a great deal and will continue to make a substantial contribution. Unfortunately I do not have the same feeling of confidence with regard to agricultural production. It will be impossible to meet the demand for agricultural production without some direct, immediate action by the government. I think nothing short of the establishment of a food production board can give the necessary leadership if we are to achieve our objective and keep our forces fed. At the appropriate time this session I propose to ask the government to appoint a national food board capable of integrating a gigantic national effort combined with a willingness to cooperate with all elements of our population in order to achieve our objective in this regard.

The evident inability of the Department of Agriculture to-day to make public definite goals of production for 1942 and 1943, as has been done in the United States of America, constitutes a serious problem to our whole war economy, because, as hon. members are aware, enough food of the right kind is a rock-bottom essential of war-time production and morale, and necessary for our fighting ability. Enough of the right food cannot be secured either, if industry is going to be placed on a cost-plus basis and farm production is left in many cases on a cost-minus basis, thereby leaving industrial employers to take the men off our farms.

We hear a great deal about preventing inflation, but, Mr. Speaker, unless the increased purchasing power is diverted from consumer markets, we shall have the general public competing against the government for materials and supplies essential for an all-out war effort. These problems must be met, if we are going to have an all-out and all-round war effort. This situation must be met if our unprecedented effort to control inflation through the establishment of price and wage control is to achieve any degree of success.

I believe consideration should be given to some form of compulsory savings under which a graduated percentage of all incomes in excess of a certain stipulated amount should be paid directly to the government and credited to the individual with interest at a stated rate, the principal to be repaid after the war. I may say that many people will need some of their principal. I believe some plan of compulsory saving should be part of any sound programme of price control, and I propose at a later date to discuss this matter further.

To-night, however, I consider that these important issues temporarily fade under the shocking proposal in the speech from the throne by which the government of the day, with a large majority behind it, is endeavouring to escape its responsibility in military reinforcement.

I listened to that speech—and I have heard many come down in this House of Commons—with very great care, because I realized that much hinged on what the government proposed to do at the present time. I have followed it through, as carefully as I was capable of doing. In brief generalities it reviews a few of the past war tragedies. From there, to the end, with unprecedented cruelty it postpones future purposes.

The very speech itself begins with the words, "There no longer can be any question", but it ends with the government fearfully and feebly asking others to give the answer. It tells us that the government knows we are in the gravest crisis in the world's history now. But the government will not take full responsibility to act until after they hold a plebiscite, either next spring or summer. May I be pardoned for again using those apt words of the Montreal Gazette, in saying that "never in the history of this dominion have so many people been so humiliated by so few."

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): A pretty poor source.

Mr. ROWE: If the Minister of Marine can take comfort from it, then he is a better parliamentarian than he is Minister of Marine.

Mr. POULIOT: Minister of National Defence for Naval Services.

Mr. ROWE: I intended to give the minister a better title than "marine." I must say, however, that that is one branch of the service which possibly is doing all it can; and perhaps that is what makes the minister so confident that he can pull up the slack for the rest of them.

When democracy faces the test of its greatest adversity, our government, to which the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services belongs, demonstrates its greatest weakness. We have been told that "he who hesitates is lost." Yet we postpone for months the needs of the hour. In other words, Mr. Speaker, while our homes burn, we hold a firemen's ball.

What a spectacle of inspiration to those great Britishers, like Smuts of Africa or Curtin of Australia, has their big sister Canada given them in their hour of crisis! There appears to be considerable confusion as to what the action announced by the government means. It is a topic of argument on the street corners. Some farmers in the back concessions think it may mean an election; some other people think it may mean conscription; some others believe that it means relieving the present government of the great numbers of promises they have made since 1919; others believe that it means relieving the government of some of their broken promises. Others just do not know what it means, but they believe it just relieves the government and lets it do as it pleases.

To-day the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) tells us that it means getting the people's opinion, provided he does not tell anybody what he will do after he gets it. Mr. Speaker, "it is a means of consulting public opinion, when a public body is unable to take the responsibility which belongs to it." Nobody knows what the answer is going to be, and nobody knows what the action will be after the answer is given.

This is the most Asquithian type of appeasement that has ever been proposed by a responsible government in a time of war. Unfortunately it is the same type of appeasement and complacency which has dominated our actions in peace-time failures, and which now so dangerously retards our war-time action. It was this type of wait-and-see policy which held up for two years Canada's air training plan, following the visit in 1938 of the British aviation authorities. It was this famous wait-and-see policy which made Prime Minister Asquith in England the greatest armchair warrior of the last war, and bids fair to make Prime Minister King of Canada the greatest wait-and-see warrior of the present war.

The Prime Minister takes great pride in his relationship with the great republic to the south of us, and on many occasions he has so stated. May I compliment him on any progress he has made in that regard. Speaking in his home constituency of Prince Albert on February 29, 1940, he is reported to have said:

> Canada has done more to help bring about that friendlier relationship between the United States and Britain than has any other part of the empire, even than Great Britain herself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: I wish I could deliver one of those five-hour speeches of the Prime Minister. If I did I would get a lot of applause. Perhaps, however, the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) will applaud me again if I quote another part of the same speech:

> It is a matter of great pride that I have lived to see the day when I could go to the President of the United States and work out a reciprocity agreement. It took twenty-five years to bring it about, but I lived to accomplish it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I shall be allowed the time hon. members opposite have applauded, after my quotation from the Prime Minister's speech.

I am sorry that through this relationship with the United States the Prime Minister has not copied the example of his great friend to the south. He must surely observe the contrast of the last twenty-five years.

The Prime Minister tells us that he could not break one of those pledges of his. I have not time at my disposal to tell hon. members about those he has broken, but I would point out to him what happened in the United States of America. In 1916 President Wilson was elected with the battle-cry that he would keep American boys in the United States. But in 1917, when the hour of crisis arose, he drafted those American boys to join the British forces in France.

By way of further contrast I would draw the Prime Minister's attention to the recent election of Mr. Roosevelt. Here is one of the promises made by the President of the United States over the radio just prior to his recent election:

> And while I am talking to you, mothers and fathers, I give you one more assurance. I have said this before, but I shall say it again and again. Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars.

Since that promise was given, the President of the United States asked for and received from his parliament and from his country the right to send United States soldiers anywhere an enemy might be encountered.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is not a foreign war; the United States was attacked.

Mr. ROWE: She had the courage to draft men before she was attacked; the Canadian government has not courage enough to draft men after we are attacked. That is responsible government functioning in a crisis. With almost frenzied eloquence we heard the hon. member for Brantford City tell this house that the Prime Minister was the first leader of the allied countries to declare war on Japan. Then he told us that the Prime Minister is going to be the last man to draft men to fight her. While the battle rages in every quarter of the globe, we have a wait-and-see policy to draft men to stay in Canada only until we hear how that policy is decided for this great lopsided, top-heavy government, by those outside the government.

We are now told by the Prime Minister in the twilight of his long years as leader that we must give him time off in this crisis to go back over the record. I know very well, and any other senior hon. member in this house knows that his record is strewn with broken pledges. He wants to revive one now in order to make it sacred in this time of crisis. I well remember that famous list of pledges and the planks of the platform in 1919. I remember how he excused himself here on the floor of this house when twitted for having dropped these planks so rapidly that we could not count them, by saying that that platform was only a chart to compass a course no one knew.

In 1925 he made that famous promise to reform the senate, but at that time we did not have a plebiscite so he could go back to York North. In that election he promised most faithfully to reform the senate, and I was sitting here in this house when he said rather jocularly to the former Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett, that he had reformed the senate by placing in it the first lovely lady. That was a reformation because, although she is a staunch Liberal, she is a great improvement over many of the Liberals who were there.

Now in this hour of world crisis we are asked to provide unprecedented millions to supply equipment for overseas forces, while in the same breath we are asked to spend several millions to have those outside the government say whether or not we should draft men for Canada only. Three million dollars spent for a three months' delay! It will surely be made known to the opposition countries that Canada's secret weapon is a slow-timed dud. When we come to think of it we realize that our position is being made ridiculous. I plead with the government to change their course. Surely they are not going to lead us down this course at this time.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: It is all very well to jibe from the back benches when there are so many of you there. Is that all you can say to the boys overseas? Go over and talk to them and tell them why they should vote for or against this plebiscite. For twenty years those who sit to your right, Mr. Speaker, have hackneyed this issue back and forth across the election roads of Canada, claiming to be preserving unity in time of peace. They now plebiscite it to split their country from end to end in time of war.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Where did the hon. member stand in 1940?

Mr. ROWE: Where did the minister stand in 1925?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Where did the hon. member stand in 1940? Did he stand with his leader?

Mr. ROWE: I stood with my leader as I always do. My pledges to my constituents are just as good as my hon. friend's leader's are to his. As I say, this issue has been hackneyed up and down this country along with a claim for unity. The same men who claimed that they were bringing about unity in Canada by harping on an issue that was then twenty years old are now going to leave it wide open in a time of crisis. Is it any wonder that the red herring, abused so much in time of peace, has now become the white hope that is feared so much in time of war? We have made ourselves ridiculous and we shall be making this country ridiculous. We are told that the reason for this cowardly action by a supposedly responsible government is to release the Prime Minister from pledges given to the people of Canada prior to the last general election.

An hon. MEMBER: Your pledges too.

Mr. ROWE: I will look after mine; you look after your own. If you support this government, I venture to say that I shall be back but I do not think you will. That is if it is left to the boys overseas, the most gallant gentlemen we have at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: What about 1917?

Mr. ROWE: I am not talking about 1917 and 1930 when it is was not an issue; do not bring that up now. You will have trouble enough with the red herring that has been yours for twenty years. What has happened since the last election? We have seen Germany overrun Denmark; we have seen her overrun Norway; we have seen her practically dominate Sweden; we have seen her take charge of the Netherlands; we have seen Belgium fall. We have had our own Dunkirk, and we have seen Italy and Japan join the axis. We have seen the United States go into war, and we have had our own Hong Kong and our near Singapore. We have seen great countries overrun like Bulgaria, Yugo-Slavia and others. Our great sister dominion Australia is in danger, yet what do we do? This afternoon we heard a brilliant speech by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray). Many of you may not agree with it, but few of you could duplicate it even if you had the same convictions.

The United States of America have had their Pearl Harbour; England has had her Dunkirk; Canada has had her Hong Kong, but she now says that she is going to meet it with a plebiscite next summer. The minister smiles; I could not smile if I were in his place and had the responsibility for a policy like this. We have no time to talk because dangers are approaching on our east and on our west. We are told that the reason for this action has something to do about an election. I followed the pledges given by the Prime Minister in the last election, even though I was the last one who thought that he was going to keep his promises. I have been following his pledges for many years, and I do not know of any leader who has gone further by sacrificing more promises than has the present Prime Minister. This is the most novel incident in Canadian political history, that he should try to make one sacred. If I could have the time I could name a list of promises that he has broken as long as my arm.

An hon. MEMBER: Give us one.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member would not understand it if I did. When a man follows a leader so blindly for twenty years and he keeps breaking promises all that time, it is difficult for him to understand. After two and a half years of war we are told that we must have a mandate, that it is necessary to appeal to the people by means of a plebiscite, in order to secure men to back up those gallant boys who have left our shores. Moreover, notice has been given this government of the position taken by our party. Time and time again our present leader has told the leader of the government that he would support him, that we as a party would support him, just as the United States supported compulsory service when the occasion arose.

Loyalty in this chamber is not confined to any one party. There are loyal men to your left, Mr. Speaker, and loyal men to your right, and I venture to say that there are very few in this house who would oppose the Prime Minister if he came out with a bold and courageous war policy at this time. That is all we have asked him to do. I made my position clear in this house in the November session, and hon. members will find what I said at page 4370 of Hansard. I said then:

> The time has come when this government should take vigorous action. I should like to see the Prime Minister of this country provide by order in council for compulsory selective service, and then come back to parliament and say, "I did not have a mandate to pass compulsory selective service for home service, let alone a mandate to send the boys overseas, but this is what I have done." I should like him to tell us that he had gone down to the compatriots of the Secretary of State in the province of Quebec and explained to those loyal people that the home front for the defence of Canada was overseas, that without a mandate he had brought in compulsory selective service to defend the shores of Canada and he therefore had provided for compulsory selective service for where the fighting is going to be. Do not dodge the issue. If there is anything I can do to help this government, I am ready to do it. I have endeavoured privately and otherwise, to make suggestions and offer proposals to this government which I believed might help. Surely we can get away from politics for a while.

The same sentiment was expressed forcefully by the leader of our party in this house and by the present leader of the largest opposition group in this country, our next Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, in a recent broadcast. Some of my friends may laugh—

Mr. MARTIN: He has to be elected first.

Mr. ROWE: He will be elected and may be elected sometimes when my hon. friend will not be elected. Let my hon. friend listen to what he said because he said it better perhaps than others can do. Mr. Meighen said:

> We, the Conservative party, stand at this time in the way of no war effort however big, however drastic. On the contrary—

I ask my hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell), who made such reckless statements yesterday, to listen to this:

On the contrary, we stand behind demands for every sacrifice however extreme, every sacrifice whether of time, money, property, income, as well as men for the army, so long as the laws making these demands are equitable and fair and apply everywhere without discrimination. We are against subterfuges—

I ask the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) to listen to this:

We are against subterfuges and evasive practices that impose on the willing; that put a penalty on patriotism and allow the selfish to escape. We stand ready to help the government in its endeavour, yes, to help it the more, the greater the endeavour. We demand that political expediency be forgotten; that we decide what is the right thing to do and do that very thing, and trust to the conscience of the nation. When we call upon the government to abandon political expediency, we must be ready to abandon it ourselves. We are, therefore, prepared to join with the government, share the responsibility with them, carry the onus, if there is an onus, and suffer the consequences whatever they may be. But while prepared to share the burdens of office, we are not striving or asking for office; we are striving only for victory. There are great tasks that must be done, and with might and main we will demand that they be done, and done now. Canada must not fall short of her best and her mightiest. Canada must move with redoubled speed.

Surely, Mr. Prime Minister, if you have the interests of the country rather than the interests of the party at heart, that announcement of policy from the leader of the largest opposition group in this country and his offer to cooperate must mean something to you.

We are told that a plebiscite is necessary now in order to release the Prime Minister "from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service." Those are the words of the speech from the throne. True, opposition has been expressed by the Prime Minister to conscription for overseas service, but those statements were made on his own responsibility and largely since the last election, and as my hon. colleague (Mr. Stirling) said this afternoon, those statements of the Prime Minister were not opposed, they were not an issue in the election campaign. Those statements were not opposed by hon. gentlemen to our left or by those who sit behind me or by hon. gentlemen who sit opposite. But no one at that time knew what was going to come. We knew nothing about Dunkirk and the blitz attack on England and nothing about Hong Kong. Surely in a time of national peril, when every dollar, every weapon and every man are required in the defence of liberty, we are not so weak as a people that we must accept a plebiscite regardless of its vicious consequences.

We are told by the Prime Minister that this plebiscite is necessary in order to preserve unity. Has democratic government in Canada fallen to such a degraded level as to flout, by the expenditure of public money, the responsibility inherent in the right of office? The Prime Minister himself did not say so in the last election campaign, because here is what he said in a radio broadcast from the city of Ottawa which I heard on February 23, 1940, and which was reported in the Toronto Star of the following day, and I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite who applaud the Prime Minister so vigorously to-day, had he not better add these words to his plebiscite and seek relief from this commitment also? The Prime Minister said:

Under our parliamentary system the party with the majority in the House of Commons is charged with the responsibility for government. From that it can't escape, even if it would.

Unity is a very important thing in any democratic country. With that we all agree. But to bring up the cry of unity to cloak a policy of appeasement is an entirely different matter. We believe in unity just as much as any hon. gentleman opposite does, but to raise at this time the cry of unity in order to cloak a policy of appeasement—

Mr. CRERAR: Appeasement of whom?

Mr. ROWE: Appeasement with whom? I would say to my hon. friend: Go overseas and make appeasement with the boys over there.

Mr. CRERAR: Appease whom?

Mr. ROWE: We have listened to hon. gentlemen opposite talk about economic appeasement for the past twenty years. It has been their watchword, and here is a policy of appeasement from the government when the life and security of Canada hang in the balance and when our boys are fighting our battles overseas. No Canadian—

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will permit a question, will he explain what he means by his expression that we are appeasing somebody or something. Whom are we appeasing?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Appeasing your own conscience.

Mr. ROWE: That is a very good answer. I am not going to be distracted from what I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, because the interruptions of the Minister of Mines and Natural Resources (Mr. Crerar) seldom add much to any of the debates of this house.

Mr. HOMUTH: Where did he stand in 1917?

Mr. ROWE: I say that no Canadian, whether the minister or myself—and I say that in all respect because I know he is the senior member of this house at this time, and I compliment him upon that and upon looking so well—no matter what province he comes from or what his race or creed may be, can as a Canadian and a British subject subscribe to this bogy of unity now brought up to bolster a broken-down government of appeasement floundering on the rocks of responsibility. If this government, by weight of its majority, insists upon evasion of the responsibility which goes with responsible government by foisting upon the people of Canada a plebiscite on conscription, it will establish definite and distinct lines of cleavage which will exist long after the record of this government becomes buried in the dust of history. Such action will throw into Canadian unity thorns which generations yet unborn will be called upon to remove. Do not, I say to the government, create a smoke-screen to cover your retreat from duty. Do not create a bottleneck of a "wait and see" war policy. This Asquithian policy of appeasement should be thrown into the discard, and let us, as a people, face the realities of war. For the first time in our history we find ourselves vulnerable to attack on both coasts—and the Prime Minister raises the cry of unity!

Did anyone ever see a family disunited when there was a thug at the door? Why, this cry about unity is the most ridiculous bogy that was ever trailed across a difficult road. If in the face of these grave dangers the head of the government cannot preserve unity, then it is high time for the head of the government to make way for someone who can. The welfare of Canada far exceeds the welfare of any individual or of a party, no matter how long that individual or that party may have been in office. In the face of grave danger in the last war, Asquith made way for Lloyd George without an election, yes, and without a plebiscite. No one ever heard of a plebiscite in England in war time.

An hon. MEMBER: They had it in Australia.

Mr. ROWE: That is not the British way of doing it. But they were anxious for inspired leadership; they realized that leadership of that kind was just as important in the defence of the empire as was military might. A more modern example of this is to be found in the records of the British parliament, where, on May 8, 1940, Lloyd George rose from his seat and, facing Mr. Chamberlain, declared that the best service the Prime Minister could render his country would be to surrender the seals of office. When the people of Britain finally realized the might of the enemy, Chamberlain gave way to the more aggressive, confidence-inspiring leadership of Churchill. This was also accomplished without an election and without a plebiscite.

The situation is no less serious here in Canada. Surely the government will change its mind and spare this country in her hour of peril from the expense and shame of a plebiscite, or the danger and delay of an election. The present Prime Minister has served Canada in a high position for a great number of years. However, let us realize as a people that while the Prime Minister has served the country, the country's peril of the hour does not serve the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, in the light of the fact that we are now called upon to sanction a plebiscite and a huge expenditure of public money to release the Prime Minister from pledges which he made to the people of Canada long ago on the question of compulsory service, I feel that, should I withhold my opinion at this time for fear of giving offence, I should consider myself guilty of near treason towards my country. Therefore, as one of the senior members of this house, I say that the greatest contribution the Prime Minister could make to an all-out war effort would be either to assume responsibility, or surrender the seals of office to someone who shall let parliament decide and avoid a plebiscite or an election during our nation's most perilous crisis.

Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, about our unity. However, the source of the unity of Canada is not the welfare of any party or any province; it is the consequence of external pressure. Let us not search for unity by actions that will breed disunity; let us not search for some palliative; rather, in this hour of peril, let us face the facts, not on a basis of political, racial or religious faith, but as Canadians and as Britishers.

Further, let me say—and I say this with all sincerity—sentimental sobbing about unity in time of war will be, to my mind, one of the most disastrous things that could happen to this dominion. A continuation of this type of thinking will bring us to the end of the war divided, and then we shall have the spectacle of our allies having won a war for us abroad and us losing the peace at home. Let us not forget that it was the sons and daughters of two great races that gave Canada her birth. Let us not forget either that even France has fallen—England still lives. Let us then stand together to make sure there will always be an England, which is the only assurance that France in all her glory will ever rise again.

I say that a compromise such as this proposed plebiscite will bring us disunity, class consciousness and racial strife, and in the misbelief that we are defending our system of government, we unconsciously surrender its very citadel.

We stand to-day as a united country. We entered this war as a united country, and we stand in unity with our allies engaged in the grimmest struggle for life and freedom that the world has ever known. Against half the world we stand to-day, not as Englishmen, not as Frenchmen, not as inhabitants of the Atlantic or the Pacific provinces. Without thought of sectionalism we entered this war as a nation in September, 1939, and without need of a lot of talk of unity or sectionalism we shall win this war, if God spares us and we have courage to face the issue.

By that declaration of war we pledged ourselves as a nation to cooperate with our allies to out-build, to out-produce, to out-fight and finally to overthrow the tyranny of the axis powers.

Dare we as a people rescind that pledge? Are we to be led again into the "valley of humiliation" to serve the purpose of any party? When we hear flashes from the radio that Latin-America is turning solidly against the axis, that Australia is going to be invaded and is fighting with her back to the wall, and that Singapore, the great centre of our eastern trade, is tottering, I put this grave issue to the government and I plead with them again to reconsider their course and save us from the shame and disgrace into which they are evidently leading us.

I say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that Canada must not wait for expediency, while England fights for freedom.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak in French. I shall, however, make a few remarks in English so that they shall be understood by all.

I must in the first place congratulate the hon. member (Mr. Rowe) who has just resumed his seat; he surely made a brilliant plea in favour of the violation of pledges and promises solemnly made. I believe I heard the hon. member, and also the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), say recently that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had not asked for a plebiscite before he declared war on Japan and before he passed a measure for the control of prices.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; I said he did not ask for a mandate to declare war on Japan.

[Mr. Rowe.]

Mr. BRUNELLE: I accept the correction of the leader of the opposition, but I desire to point out that during the election of 1940 the Prime Minister on behalf of the government stated definitely that he would not introduce a measure of conscription for service overseas without consulting the people. During that election he did not say that he would or would not declare war on Japan, nor did he say that he would or would not pass a law to control prices. In my opinion there is a great difference between these situations. The mandate which the government received in 1940 was a mandate not to propose conscription for service overseas.

It is, Mr. Speaker, useless to undertake at this time to discuss any problem other than the one of war. In contradiction of what has been said, I wish to express my own opinion, and give some reasons in support of it, that conscription for service overseas is not so urgent and expedient a measure as some would have us believe. Let me say that in reading much of the press comment of to-day, and in listening to most of the speeches which are made, particularly by the opposition, one who was ignorant of Canada's war production would be inclined to think that this country has done very little. Yet the real facts show that the contrary is true, and those facts were very ably and clearly set out by the Prime Minister in the magnificent speech which he made yesterday.

In the eyes of a few, conscription of manpower seems to be the only thing which will win this war. Other factors that may be found in this country, or that may be found in the countries of our allies, do not seem to count. If anyone thinks that I exaggerate when I say that conscription alone will win this war, according to some people, let me quote the words of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) in a speech he made last November in this house to show that conscription for service overseas is the only thing that will win the war and save the empire:

> The government's adherence to the voluntary system of recruiting is inconsistent with total war, and yet this is the only kind of war that will enable us to help defeat Hitler. It is perfectly obvious to every thinking man that Canada cannot make a total war effort without compulsory selective service, and also that if our aid is not to be a vital factor in this struggle this empire, and with it Canada, is doomed.

If such a point of view is not silly, it surely is ridiculous and even insulting to the other peoples who are siding with us in this war. Canadian soldiers are brave; they are courageous, ingenious and strong. But the 50,000 Canadian soldiers, which is about all, or possibly more than conscription will bring in addition to those we have already—at any rate it is more than it gave in 1917-1919—spread over the various fronts of the war, will not relegate the millions of British soldiers, and American, Russian, Indian, Australian and all sorts of other soldiers, to the background, and will not, like an irresistible whirlwind, smash every obstacle that will be in their way and win this war.

In reality we have accomplished wonders in the totality of our war effort. I shall not undertake to enumerate the various activities of our government, because those who do not want to see or believe up to this time will not any more see or believe by reason of further proof. They did not change their opinion after Senator Pepper last year expressed the following appreciation of our effort:

> I owe it to you to say that it is the gallant and limitless way in which all of you who are fighting this good fight of faith have thrown yourselves into it which has made our people as determined as they are to help you until it hurts. Before I came here I knew what share of your income you were spending in the cause, I was aware of some of the external evidences of your mighty effort, but I did not know until I came to see it and to feel it just how fixed and determined was the purpose of your people to carry on until the inevitable day of victory against this devilish attack on freedom everywhere.

They did not change their opinion after the Right Hon. Malcolm MacDonald, who represents Great Britain in our country, expressed his appreciation of our war effort. I quote from an article in the Toronto Star of August 26, 1941:

> If there are those in Canada who discount the dominion's war effort, Right Hon. Malcolm MacDonald, the British High Commissioner to this dominion, is not one of them. Speaking at the Couchiching Canadian Institute, Mr. MacDonald, with no wish to belittle the United States effort, pointed out nevertheless that Canada's, on a basis of proportionate wealth and population is greater. Said Mr. MacDonald, Canada's war effort is such that no country on this continent can throw stones at Canada.

They did not change their opinion either when General McNaughton in August 1941, used the following words:

> It is tremendously gratifying to us here to be using Canadian equipment and to find it unbeatable. . . . We are not going to win this war by force of numbers, but by our inventiveness and thoroughness in the arming and in the supply of materials.

They did not change their opinion when Lord Halifax paid tribute to this country and the immense help it was giving to England and to the British cause. They did not change their opinion when Mr. Churchill in this house expressed in such clear terms his appreciation of what this government has done to help win the war. I quote one paragraph of Mr. Churchill's speech:

> I could speak of many other activities—of tanks, of the special forms of modern high-velocity cannon, of the great supplies of raw materials and many other elements essential to our war effort, on which your labours are ceaselessly and tirelessly engaged. But I must not let my address to you become a catalogue.

To-day the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) read to this house another expression of appreciation showing what Mr. Churchill thinks of what we have done recently.

The opposition did not change their view, and they will not change it, or cease to belittle our war effort, for the simple reason that it is a Liberal government that has done it. If I did not want to deprive them of the pleasure of saying we are playing politics, I would tell them many things that I would feel justified in saying. But I cannot refrain from thinking aloud of the agitation which is now being stirred up in Montreal by the Gazette and in Toronto by some newspapers and some other people, which has behind it a faction which is strong and merciless, and that faction is no doubt the big interests and the money monarchs of this country. I will not talk of the calamities that would fall upon our people if that class were governing the nation. Suffice it to say that after two years of war in which we have made enormous sacrifices, unity and harmony still reign in our country. I shall not praise or defend or speak for any one section or another of Canada, or for any province, for I believe it is time that people should stop making such comparisons as to war contributions. The time has come when everyone should take for granted that every province and every section are ready and willing and prepared to do what should be done to win the war. The performance of duty is not contingent upon what the other fellow does or does not do. Worthy members of the fire brigade in case of emergency do not stop to think of how their work compares with the work of others; they simply do what they should do. It was the Pharisee who thanked the Lord that he was better than others.

There is a relationship between love of country and love of God, on the one hand, and the merit of those whose duty is to serve, on the other hand. But I take this occasion to say that when duty is fulfilled in hardship, in suffering, in danger of losing an eye, a limb or even a life, it behooves those who benefit by the fulfilment of such duty to acknowledge their debt as adequately as possible, either by tribute or by actual remuneration. A doorkeeper, a messenger, a pick-and-shovel man, accomplishing his duty on firm land with a minimum of risk, receives between $2 and $4 a day, and other classes of people receive a great deal more. Yet the soldier defending his country, protecting the messenger, the doorkeeper, the lawyer, the doctor, the farmer, the business man, the money-monger, the preacher, the woman and child, receives only $1.30 a day, with no union to guarantee him an eight-hour day. This is beyond my comprehension. I am told that Canada pays her soldiers better than any other country. Well, sir, I can only say that at least Canada has the honour of leading the civilized nations of the world in the partial abandonment of a barbarian custom.

At any rate our dominion is doing and has done very well. If the allies—England, China, Russia, India, the United States and the dominions—were supplying as many soldiers of all categories as Canada is, our cause would have an army of 35,000,000 equipped men on the various fronts. Yet up to the present Canada has not been in a unique position. Ulster, Australia and south Africa do not have conscription for service overseas. In two referendums during the last war the Australians turned down any suggestion of conscription for overseas service. At that time we did not hear that the Australian people had committed such an extraordinary indignity in so doing; and to-day I wonder whether the Canadian people are acting so very differently from the way in which the Australians acted during the last war, which I think also was rather a serious war. During last session I think I heard the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) ask with disappointment why our soldiers were not at the side of the gallant Australian soldiers in Crete or Africa or Greece. To-day we hear the disappointed voice of Prime Minister Curtin of Australia asking the United States and England for help in order that he may defend his territory. This point of view was expressed even yesterday by the leader of the opposition, when he said at page 20 of Hansard:

> What happened at Pearl Harbour may happen at Esquimalt. What happened 160 miles off Halifax may happen at Halifax. What happened 60 miles off Long Island may happen at Sydney, Saint John or Quebec.

I am sorry the leader of the opposition is not in his seat, so that he might hear what I am going to tell him; but while I am speaking of him I should like to mention what he said yesterday with reference to the merit of the plebiscite. These were his words:

> . . . the loyal people of Canada will and do feel deeply humiliated. . . .

I may say that loyalty is not to be found only in the hearts and ranks of the opposition. We are, however, accustomed to that sort of declaration, so the leader of the opposition can continue in that vein. It will not do much harm; and he can go on thanking the Lord that he is better than others. If Canada is likely to be attacked, let us arm to meet that attack; let us prepare for home defence. If, on the other hand, Canada is not likely to be attacked, let us and let the allies take advantage of that situation and produce here three or five times more ships, tanks, guns and aeroplanes in our factories and plants which are not exposed to destruction. It has become a platitude to say that steel will win this war, but since it is so true, we must keep on saying it.

Upon their return to England recently, Prime Minister Churchill and his ministers replied to several questions which were put to them. I think it was the under-secretary for air, Lord Sherwood, who said: "Of course there is the difficulty there always has been about weapons in this country, because we are still a long way behind what you would properly call a real preparation for war. We are short of weapons, but we shall get those weapons." They say that we will maintain production, in spite of conscription, by employing women. Without further discussing the question of the employment of women, let me say that it will create an overwhelming after-war problem. At present in England an organization is being formed to protect men's jobs against what I might call the infiltration of women into the domain formerly almost exclusively occupied by men. They say the menace is as great as Hitlerism. If that had not been said in England, I would hesitate to say it in this house, but the organization just mentioned made the statement that during the last depression there were two million men able and willing to work who could not find work, while six million women were employed in various industries, trades and professions. Therefore I say that after this war we shall have to face a tremendous labour problem.

I felicitate the Prime Minister on having appointed an able labour leader, in the person of Mr. Mitchell, as Minister of Labour. On each and every occasion the Prime Minister is proving to be a wise, sound statesman. He has been true to the promises and pledges he has made to the people of Canada; yet strangely enough a certain school of thought has lately argued that it would be a virtue for him to repudiate his promises and violate his pledges. The Prime Minister deserves the confidence of the people. I for one do not hesitate to say that he has my confidence. The speech he made in the house yesterday is one which will go down in history as a most salutary expression of honesty, nobility and decency in public life. Lest it might be said that my appreciation of the Prime Minister is based on partisan inclinations, I should like to read an appreciation published by the Montreal Star on the occasion of his birthday anniversary. It states:

> Of his patriotism, his devotion to duty and his sacrifice of personal interests in the service of his country there can be no doubt whatever. . . .
> To-day Mr. King is carrying a tremendous burden under which a stronger man might well have given way. He is, fortunately, in the enjoyment of good health, and he is meeting the strain of public office with serenity and stoic endurance. That he may be long spared to serve the country whose gratitude he has so well deserved is the united wish of the Canadian people.

I might say, before I speak in French, that I completely approve his attitude and stand on the plebiscite question.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, a single topic fills the minds of all hon. members and, without doubt, of all the people of Canada—the forthcoming plebiscite. At the last general election the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his ministers pledged themselves not to enact conscription for overseas service without having obtained a special mandate to do so. The Conservative party gave the same pledge, but, maintaining that breaking pledges is a virtue, its members have long ago repudiated their promise and announced that they were in favour of conscription for overseas service. Many people in the English-speaking provinces consider that the situation in the various theatres of war has become so different that changes are needed in our methods of raising men far the army. The Conservative party contends that the people are in favour of conscription for service outside of the country and, in order to make sure that events would not falsify its contention, it recently launched a great movement with a view to convincing the country that conscription for overseas service is the proper policy.

In order to put a stop to this agitation and to prevent this boasting on the part of the Conservatives from disrupting national unity at a time when it is so necessary to be united on the principal matters relating to the prosecution of the war, the Prime Minister, faithful to his pledge, has decided to ascertain by means of a plebiscite whether the views of the electorate have changed since 1940.

The question to be asked is a very simple one: "Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?" The people remain the masters. I shall not anticipate; rather, I shall await with calmness the decision which the Canadian people will give by their vote after having realized that they are the masters and that they have to decide themselves a question of which they all know the importance.

Whatever may happen, whether some other kind of conscription is established or not, I take the liberty, Mr. Speaker, to point out, on behalf of a certain number of Canadians at least, the urgency of making some improvement in the living conditions of our young men in the army and in the training camps. At best, the soldier's life is not a bed of roses. That is inevitable. Many of our young men find themselves away from home for the first time, and they obtain their first experience under rather unfavourable conditions. Again that is inevitable. War cannot be carried on without some discomfort. Yet, without blaming anyone, for we have embarked in a new military enterprise which is still at the organization stage, there is seemingly need to effect certain improvements.

I talked to young French-Canadian soldiers stationed at Petawawa, Peterborough or Kingston. Not being conversant with English, they feel at a loss in the midst of a throng speaking nothing but English, in the midst of a group of young men who follow their own way of entertainment, leaving our compatriots under the impression that they are strangers in their own land. Most of the officers—whom I do not blame, since they are only the victims of the present situation—most of the officers do not speak French and our soldiers can only follow the orders by sound or gesture or through an interpreter. How could they be interested in military matters and make the same progress as the others, in such circumstances?

I request that the hon. Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) whose kindness and willingness are well known both in this house and outside, be kind enough to give proper consideration to the problem I have just outlined. Young men who do not know English should not be sent to camps where officers cannot give orders in French, except on their own request.

We must realize, Mr. Speaker, that the French-Canadians are neither by nature nor formation inclined to embrace military life or join the army. However, they are ready to sacrifice everything for the defence of their country and, to date, they have willingly accepted the present conditions and have behaved in such a way that we should never lose an opportunity of singing their praise. I take this opportunity of congratulating them from the bottom of my heart. Nothing should be avoided that could simplify their task.

Time and again, public bodies and organizations of all kinds in the province of Quebec have requested the formation of a military college in their province. I take the liberty of repeating this request on the floor of this house.

Would it not be in the public interest that we should train real French-Canadian officers in large numbers who would be competent to take command of numerous regiments, battalions or divisions? It would help to eradicate the idea among our co-citizens that French-Canadians are not appointed and cannot be appointed to important posts, even in the army. Bad impressions often degenerate into prejudices which, when they are aimed at people of a different race or religion, become very dangerous.

There is in the province of Quebec an impression, even a conviction—and I am not prepared to say that it is not founded—that we are not getting our fair share of the good positions in the civil service and in industry, particularly in the war industries. The blame cannot, I think, be laid at the door of the ministers or of the government. A certain state of affairs has become general. I have endeavoured to make suggestions with a view to remedying it. The ministers in charge of our four war departments are very busy men. They are labouring under a heavy burden of work and care. They have not time to attend to everything, and meanwhile some of the higher officials of their departments who do not realize the importance of a fair distribution of positions, especially in time of war, or who do not trouble themselves to bring it about, are taking advantage of the circumstances to push forward their own friends to the detriment of our people.

Mr. Speaker, after spending six years in this house I have come to the conclusion that the deputy ministers of the various departments should be ordered, clearly and unequivocally, to give at least one quarter of the civil service positions to French-Canadians, in spite of all rules and rulings made by the civil service commission, provided the applicants possess the required qualifications. Otherwise, I do not think we will ever get satisfaction. I doubt that the civil service commission will ever grant our request of many years standing and this is an incessant cause of complaint in the province of Quebec.

Besides, we have practically no representatives on the office and managerial staffs of the war plants and I know what I am talking about, for I have made personal inquiry in the matter. I have myself witnessed these conditions. The competent men may not always be available, but the abilities required in the training of an office or managerial staff are so varied that many of our compatriots could fill some of these positions. Here again, let us take steps to correct this situation and let those steps be taken as soon as possible, for it is essential that the public mind be at rest and willing to submit to measures which are necessarily unpopular. If our citizens gather the impression that they may not have their share of the cake, they might easily decide that those who get all the cake should be alone to defend it. Small and ceaseless exasperations leave the most far-reaching impressions both physically and morally.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I desire to state that my remarks were made with the greatest sincerity and for the general good. These suggestions were uttered with the sole purpose of eliminating causes of friction, which although seemingly negligible, may be important enough to provoke, in the end, a state of mind, incompatible with the conditions required to promote national unity and ensure the maximum collective effort of all Canadians.

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, I am going to take advantage of the generality of this debate to discuss one or two matters, some of which may be interrelated, but all of which I believe have an important bearing upon the country's war effort. Usually suggestions relating to matters of finance are reserved until the budget debate, but it seems to me to be almost nonsensical to reserve such suggestions until after the financial policy has been formulated and announced, for then it is difficult indeed to have it changed in any material particular. Consequently it seems to me that now is the proper time to suggest a course of action, before the ministerial mind has been set in its almost unalterable mould.

A few short weeks ago the price-ceiling legislation was announced by the administration, by an administration which did not deem it advisable even to consult the people's representatives before putting into effect what has been described as one of the most drastic steps ever taken by any free country. To my mind it was another piece of evidence of the growing impatience the administration has with parliament and the functions of parliament. I know it has been said that there was not time to call parliament together before these regulations were passed, but the fact is that parliament is always at the service of the people who send us here. Parliament had been adjourned last June for the very purpose of being called together on short notice. If you examine the events preceding this legislation you will see that legislation of this type was almost inevitable. I suggest that there was no real reason, no good reason, why the people of this country should not have had the right to have their representatives pass upon this legislation.

Anyone who has considered or studied the matter at all knows that a basic period had to be set, and that it had to be unalterable. In this particular case it was from September 15 to October 11. No one will deny that it was necessary that this period should be unalterable, but also no one will deny that the people's representatives should have had the right to scrutinize these regulations before they were passed. Surely no one will deny that we sitting here should have been given the opportunity of presenting the views and opinions of our constituents from one end of this country to the other. I say to the house that the action taken by the government was the very negation of democracy, the very denial of all that we are fighting for. We know that at the beginning of this war it was necessary to give the administration practically unlimited powers, and those powers were given without stint. At the same time this parliament and the country felt that those powers should not be exercised in any arbitrary or dictatorial manner and that they should not be used unless absolutely necessary. Surely the administration must see how important it is that we should not adopt dictatorial or totalitarian methods in this country unless the emergency is such that they are absolutely required. To do otherwise can be but to create distrust, suspicion, ill-feeling and fear, and I suggest that in future the administration bear very carefully in mind the necessity of not passing any legislation by order in council without consulting the people's representatives unless such a course is absolutely imperative and there is no other way out.

These regulations were passed for a definite purpose as an anti-inflationary measure. It was apparent from an examination of the situation which had arisen since the beginning of the war that anti-inflationary measures of some kind were necessary. The purpose of this legislation has been explained on numerous occasions both in this house and out of it. I do not propose to dwell at great length upon that phase, but briefly I should like to recapitulate my understanding of the situation in the following manner. From the beginning of the war until the time when the regulations were announced, a period of a little over two years, the rise in the cost of living in this country was about 15 per cent. Of that amount one-half had taken place in the first eighteen months of the war, and the other half within the next six months, thereby demonstrating that the inflationary spiral was beginning to accelerate tremendously. The reason for that was obvious. At the beginning of the war there was a tremendous unemployment slack in this country which had to be taken up. This slack was used, first of all, to supply additional labour which was required for war purposes. It was used at the same time to supply those additional consumer goods which the increased purchasing power was demanding—additional purchasing power which came into being through the unemployment slack being taken up, through men being provided with jobs, and also by reason of the fact that the armed forces we were raising in this country, our soldiers and our sailors and our airmen and their dependents, were all in receipt of pay. At that time there was no need to restrict the production of the ordinary consumer goods because the material was not yet required for war purposes. We were in the transition period, referred to by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) as the "tooling-up period." Consequently the amount of raw materials required was not so great. But, as the war progressed, more and more men were employed in the manufacture of war materials and more and more men were required for the armed services. As more and more material was required for the production of aeroplanes, tanks, shells, guns, rifles and that kind of thing, it became evident that the production of the ordinary consumer goods, those things which we use in everyday life, clothes, drugs, cars and so on, had to be cut down, and cut down drastically, and so we had the picture of a daily increasing purchasing power fighting to obtain a continually diminishing supply of consumer goods. Prices started to rise, and the price-ceiling legislation was put into effect.

The price-ceiling legislation did not achieve any miracle. It did not supply us with additional consumer goods; it did not take away any of the increased purchasing power. All it did was to put a limit on the price that could be paid for the things the people were wanting to buy. It put a stipulated limit on the price that could be paid for the goods which were available. The situation then was this. There were just as many people wanting to buy and with just as much money, more money in fact than they had before, and they were wanting the goods that were available at the established price level.

Having dealt with that phase briefly and described the position, I come now to the question of what means does the government propose to adopt to see that this continually diminishing supply of goods which are available to the people of this country are distributed in a fair and equitable manner.

That the system of price-fixing will require policing is almost axiomatic. That we shall require and must have a proper and efficient system of rationing in this country seems to be obvious. We cannot and must not allow this system to develop into a catch-as-catch-can one. We must not allow a haphazard policy to be adopted for the distribution of those goods that are available. If there is to be justice and equality among all classes of our people, these goods will have to be distributed on the basis of the greatest need, and not on the basis, I suggest, of personal influence on the part of the individual or something of that kind. So I suggest to this administration that it should announce, and very shortly, a proper and adequate system providing for a fair and equitable distribution to all classes, based of course on the principle of the greatest need, of those things which are available to the consuming public. We cannot allow a system to grow up in this country such as has been suggested in connection with sugar rationing. If we are going to have equality between all classes, it is impossible to have what has been described as the "honour system". The great majority of the people of this country will do the fair and the proper thing, but in all countries and among all classes there are people who will not do the proper thing.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They are in Toronto.

Mr. BENCE: I do not know about Toronto. I come from a long way from there. The fair and proper thing, I suggest, is to have a system which will provide that a man, whether he comes from the far coast or from Toronto or from the Atlantic seaboard, will have equal rights with his fellows when it comes to the distribution of those things that are available, and the distribution should not be left to any haphazard system which would allow one section or one type of person to obtain more than another.

Another matter on which I think we should have some elucidation and for which I believe the government should propound a solution is this. Having come to the point I have described, having decreased the production of consumer goods, having increased purchasing power, and having set a limit on the amount that can be paid for consumer goods, what does the administration propose to do to take up the extra money that is available? What is it going to do with this extra purchasing power? The administration knows that this must be drained off, and it is endeavouring in certain ways to effect that purpose. For example, high taxation has been put into effect. High-powered and high-pressure saving and loan campaigns on a voluntary subscription basis have been put on. But I suggest that in the very nature of things this cannot do the job efficiently. According to those who purport to know, taxation has reached its limit. The question of voluntary savings campaigns and voluntary loans has been receiving, I know, the consideration of the administration, but so far the government has not given a lead to this house as to how it purposes to take away from the people, other than by the voluntary system, more of that purchasing power.

Is the government going to allow, for example, those persons who do not contribute to war savings certificates or to loans, to take time off from their work to take things a little more easily because they have some extra money in their pockets and do not know where to spend it? Or is it going to allow them to spend their money on luxuries of the type to which my hon. friend the member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) has referred—things like hard liquor or soft drinks, as they may prefer? Or, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) suggested a year ago he would consider doing, is the government going to put into effect a system of compulsory borrowing, or give consideration to the enactment of legislation for compulsory savings such as the form that is known as the Keynes scheme and is in force in England to-day? Or, if the government is not going to do any of these things, will it explain to the house and to the country how it intends to pick up and take care of in an efficient and equitable manner that additional purchasing power? The Minister of Finance, although he has not yet made a statement to this house in connection with the matter, stated yesterday in the city of Toronto that up to this time the administration had decided that it would not put into force any type of compulsory savings or compulsory loans. I hope he will give a statement to this house in the course of this debate, and that he will explain the reasons for that policy, because in my opinion, unless something is done, something more than is being done now, either the tremendous pressure which is being created under that price ceiling will burst through the ceiling, or we shall have a type of chaos in this country. There cannot be anything else. I suggest, therefore, that the price ceiling is one step and one step only in the course of anti-inflationary measures. Of itself, by its very nature it cannot possibly accomplish the proper result; it has to be accompanied with a method of drawing from withunder that ceiling that extra purchasing power which, as I say, is increasing day by day.

One tragic and important consequence has developed from this diversion of our national energy and our raw products from a peace-time to a war-time production. It is a result with which I, coming as I do from the western plains, am greatly concerned. I refer to the large numbers, increasing every day, who have been thrown out of employment on account of that very diversion, on account of the fact that they were employed in the organization, distribution and selling of the products which the administration has now said must be so drastically curtailed. Unfortunately for the prairie provinces, and unfortunately in the long run, I predict, for the whole of Canada, the administration has not accomplished, with any degree approaching success, the spreading of our war effort from an industrial point of view across the whole of this dominion. No real attempt has yet been made to iron out what some of us have referred to before in this house as the economic sectionalism of the country, and consequently we on the western plains, particularly in Saskatchewan, from which I come, have no alternative employments in which to place the men and women who are being thrown out of their work by the diversion to which I have referred. In this war we have done very well where we have been given a chance. The figures on recruiting which were supplied to this house the other day will bear me out in that statement. But as I have said, in the industrial field, and particularly in Saskatchewan, we have been given little or no chance, and there is nothing for these men and women to do whom I have described, some of whom have been employed for as long as twenty or twenty-five years, even more. They are being discharged in large numbers because their employers have nothing to sell, and thereby a great problem has arisen which, I say, is the direct responsibility of the administration to solve.

I suggest, as an expedient which would alleviate this condition to a certain extent, that in view of the fact that these people have been thrown out of employment through the policy of the government to cut down domestic production and place a price ceiling on goods, when the administration comes to choose men for positions—of which the Prime Minister suggested there would be quite a number—in connection with war-time prices and trade board appointments, first preference should be given to those people who have been so deprived of a living by the government's own action. I assert that they are entitled to the first consideration. After all, what better men could be found to act in the administration of price controls, of rationing and so on, than the people who have been dealing in these products for so many years? Who can know better the prices and the qualities of goods than those who have been dealing in them, handling them, distributing them over so many years? I seriously commend this suggestion to the administration. Mr. Churchill, when he was in Ottawa, said that there is a place in this war for everyone. I suggest that the administration as speedily as possible see to it that the services of these people are utilized.

Quite a lot has been said lately on the subject of compulsory service, and I do not propose to traverse the arguments which have taken place in this house or have been going on in the country during the past few weeks. The administration has now announced its intention of seeking to be absolved from what it believes to be a binding commitment. All I have to say in that regard is that, if a thing is necessary for the preservation of our people and of our country, that thing should be and must be done irrespective and regardless of the political consequences in the years to come. The people of Canada look to the administration and to the members of the cabinet for leadership at a time like this. They were elected as the leaders of this country, and the country rightly looks to them for leadership. The people feel—I say this with confidence—that they should exercise that leadership without fear, favour or affection for anyone. Mr. Churchill, the leader of the British commonwealth of nations, of which we are an integral and inseparable part, the man we are all so fond of quoting in these days, had something to say about leadership a short time ago. These are his words:

> Nothing is more dangerous in war time than to live in the temperamental atmosphere of a Gallup poll—always feeling one's pulse and taking one's temperature. I see that a speaker at the week-end said that this was the time when leaders should keep their ears to the ground. All I can say is that the British nation will find it very hard to look up to leaders who are detected in that somewhat ungainly posture.
> If to-day I am very kindly treated by the mass of the people in this country it is certainly not because I have followed public opinion in the last few years. There is only one duty and one safe course, and that is to try to be right and not to fear to do or say what you believe to be right. And that is the only way to deserve and win the confidence of our great people in these days of trouble.

Sometimes it would appear that we in this country do not realize the terrible consequences that would befall us if we should—which God forbid—be defeated in this terrible struggle.

We are committed to a life-and-death struggle. We were committed to that struggle in September, 1939. I have always felt that whenever one starts to fight, whether against an individual or a nation, he must fight with both fists, and unless one does, the other man, particularly if he is fighting without reserve, is likely to come out on top. As far as I am personally concerned I committed myself publicly some time ago and I stand by that commitment, that we must do everything without reserve. That means complete and total mobilization, of material things as well as of man-power. One of the worst things that could happen for the morale of the people of this country would be to give to those people who are giving their husbands, their sons, their brothers, their sweethearts and their friends, the idea that those with material wealth were not prepared to put everything they have into the balance in order to save and preserve our way of life.

If the administration is determined to follow its course with respect to the taking of a plebiscite, then I suggest that there should be no half-way measures in the taking of that vote. I was astonished to see in the press the suggestion by the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) that we might use the 1940 election lists. I have obtained some knowledge during the last few months of the 1940 election lists, and I know in my own constituency literally hundreds have moved away from the addresses given in 1940 and hundreds more have left the constituency. Therefore, if a vote is to be taken, I urge that it be taken properly, and that everyone who is qualified be allowed to vote. Further, if the 1940 election lists were used, there are a number of men in our armed forces to-day who were not qualified to vote two years ago; they would be deprived of their vote.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member is talking nonsense.

Mr. BENCE: The hon. member will have his opportunity to speak. He has never been backward about speaking in this house or interrupting other speakers when he felt like it. Men who were under twenty-one years of age in 1940 were not qualified to vote.

Mr. Speaker, Canada is recruiting the women of our country for service in the ranks, and I understand that the response has been excellent. This is a matter of great satisfaction, and I am pleased to remember that it was my friend and colleague the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) who first suggested this matter in this house during this parliament. In connection with the matter of raising a women's army and women's air force I have this warning to offer to the administration: that those women should be used for the purpose for which that force was intended, namely, to replace category A men in order that those men might be available for a more active theatre of war. They should not be used to replace ex-service men from the last war, men who are not able to grade up to the physical category they formerly did, but who offered their lives in the last conflict and who are serving in the only and best way that is available to them at the present time.

In Saskatoon recently we had the spectacle of ex-service men from the last war who had been hired in civilian capacities, as cooks, dish-washers, general handymen and so on, being discharged and replaced by category A service men. The explanation given was that there were too many general duty men available, that a number of air force men had been brought in from other districts, and that there was a limit set by the department on the number of general duty men that could be used in any particular station; consequently it was the ex-service men who were discharged.

I am pleased to say that that situation has now been remedied. As a result of a request that I made to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), he gave me an explanation, and I am pleased to be able to quote the last paragraph of his letter:

> It is regretted that any difficulty arose in connection with this matter, but the situation is now more stabilized, and it is not the intention to dispense with the services of any returned men now employed as civilians and who are carrying out their duties in an efficient and satisfactory manner, and the various units have been advised accordingly.

For that I was very grateful. But in the next mail I received a letter from the secretary of the Saskatoon branch of the Canadian Legion advising me that there was further trouble in this regard and that his branch had been officially notified that about fifty ex-service men employed at No. 4 service flying training school were being discharged at the end of this month and being replaced by the women's air force. Was this, I ask, the reason why a women's army or air force was raised? I suggest it was not. There is a job for women in the service of this country, but it is not to displace men like that. I warn this administration that there will be a storm of indignation if, in its zeal to raise that army so rapidly, it allows this kind of thing to happen. To let that course be followed is, in my opinion, nothing short of disgraceful, and the government should take immediate steps to see that the situation is rectified.

Mr. EDOUARD LACROIX (Beauce) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the situation in which we find ourselves at this juncture is so serious that I feel in duty bound to rise in this house and express my viewpoint which apparently does not coincide exactly with opinions put forth until now.

To speak his mind fully is at times unpleasant to a public man, for someone's feelings may be hurt. Still I wish, at the very outset, to assure the hon. members of this house that my remarks reflect my sincerest convictions and that I would deem myself unworthy of public service were I to remain silent at this time.

My family first came to Canada in 1660, which means that I am rooted to the soil and that my viewpoint is thoroughly Canadian, solely Canadian and nothing more. I am a Canadian living in his homeland, who was born here, who understands all that a Canadian heart can feel and whose wish it is to ensure by every means in his power the greatest possible happiness for the generations to come.

Mr. Speaker, what is the present purpose of certain extremists from Toronto?—for such is the origin of that whirlwind of disunity spreading throughout our fair Canada at the present time.

Unity between the two great races in this country would mean in the eyes of this handful of nervous individuals à la Hepburn an absolute obligation to think and act in accordance with their own narrow conception of things. It would mean submitting to the dictates and personal interest of a few individuals who, for one reason or another, would wish to see the government of this country entrusted to their hands the better to sabotage the future of those inhabitants so that the appetites of these extremists might be satisfied.

Two great races, between 7 and 8 millions in number, true Canadians all, count for little or nothing in the calculations of such ambitious people who in time leave for Bermuda or elsewhere so that their heirs may be spared succession or other duties or even taxes directly attributable to their own blind, excessive and unreasonable demands.

The war effort which has been demanded in such sections is too great for a young country of twelve million inhabitants. Nothing was being done fast enough; to hear them, more is forever required, more man-power; there never is enough man-power according to them—production is always insufficient—and the cry goes out for more, and more and yet more.

To-day, these extremists are beginning to feel the effects of their exaggerations. One must pay and in order not to pay, they would transfer upon the shoulders of generations to come the excessive burden of this costly war.

They have, first, to secure the services of a new leader—and of course the security of his well-being is guaranteed for his lifetime—then conscription is taken as the battle standard—it worked so well with the same leader in 1917—

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that such extremists can find some measure of support from a few of our friends who force the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to make such concessions.

Because to ask the people of Canada, by means of a plebiscite, to release the government from its solemn promises, is surely a terrible concession to the extremists.

At the last general election, 90 per cent of the public men of Canada, and I am one of them, have said that they would always be opposed to conscription for sending troops outside of Canada. Indeed, in 1939, I affirmed the same convictions right in this chamber.

Some will say: Give a free hand to the government; you must have confidence in the Prime Minister who will never enforce conscription for overseas service.

I have confidence in my leader. I have supported him on every occasion since 1925.

But if we release the government from its sacred promises, what would follow should the Right Hon. Prime Minister disappear from the scene? Mr. Speaker, I wish the Right Hon. Prime Minister long life, health, happiness, but God alone can prolong his life. Who in this house is sure of to-morrow? And what if our hon. leader were to disappear sooner or later? For what reasons should we leave the known for the unknown? No, no, I, for one, think the issue at stake too important to run such a risk.

Mr. Speaker, if this measure is so vital in 1942, why was it not brought up during the 1940 election? Is the situation more desperate in 1942 than it was in 1940?

That is what I wish to discuss fully. I hope to prove by an official document that the reverse is true.

To my mind, Canada has done more than her share and it is about time someone should say so on the floor of this house; the voter is not the only one bound by his duty.

We have a right to ask ourselves if some military authorities are absolutely reasonable when they tell the public as they did again the day before yesterday: Canada is in great danger; Canada is encircled by the enemy; we must wake up; we must stand shoulder to shoulder, close our ranks; young men must enlist, go and fight overseas.

Mr. Speaker, those flights of oratory are nothing but a state of nerves. Our country is in danger, in immediate danger, encircled, go and fight in Europe, repeat those nervous people...Well, if the country is in so great a danger, let us keep our man-power here; call back here, immediately, shall I say to the military authorities, our army of volunteers stationed overseas.

That would be more logical to defend our people, our land, everything dear to us. Charity begins at home, says the proverb; apply it.

Are we in a more precarious position than we were in 1940, even in 1941? I say no, a thousand times no. And I shall prove it. Since 1940, the number of our allies has increased by 180 millions of Russians and by 130 millions of Americans. Since 1940, our factories have functioned at full capacity.

In a booklet entitled "Canada at war", No. 4, published by the office of Public Information under the authority of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), and dated December 4, 1941, I find figures that are very eloquent when compared with those of other countries.

Page 6, I read:

To-day about forty per cent of our national revenue goes to war needs.

Further down under the heading: "Armed forces" we read that the following figures are necessarily a rough estimate, but nearly accurate.

Enlisted voluntarily for service everywhere: In the navy, more than 27,000.

In the army, 240,000. In the air force, more than 93,000. Altogether over 360,000 volunteers for service anywhere. The number of volunteers exceeds 500,000.

These figures show, Mr. Speaker, that on December 4, 1941, Canada had under arms for service anywhere approximately 5 per cent of its total population. Mr. Speaker, is 5 per cent much or little? I say that it is much. As I see it, it compares well, nay favourably, with conditions in countries now at war the world over. It compares well with Russia whose army of 9,000,000 men represents exactly 5 per cent of its total population of 180,000,000. It is comparable to an army of 6,500,000 men in the United States, if the latter country had such an army. It is comparable to 20,000,000 men under arms in China, assuming that 5 per cent of China's population were under arms. It is comparable to 4,000,000 men under arms if the Dutch colonies had an army of such proportions.

After all, let us be honest about it and let us give Canada and the Canadian government their due.

On page 7 of the same pamphlet we read that, in the six months between May and November, 1941, voluntary enlistments for service anywhere, in the Canadian armed forces, amounted to more than 100,000. The total is made up as follows:

Navy	11,000
Army	59,000
Air force	35,000
Total	105,000

And that in the six months alone between May and November.

Mr. Speaker, how generous do I find the people of Canada! Extremists alone persist in exclaiming: "More, more, and still more!" They are more exacting than the Prime Minister of Great Britain who, for his part, exclaims: "A magnificent effort." On opening the dictionary, I find that the word "magnificent" means: "A high degree of generosity." Personally, I am quite content with the tribute of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Great Britain.

Treating of the financial aspect of the situation, the pamphlet shows, on page 31, under the heading of "The greatest undertaking in Canadian history", that our expenditures for the present fiscal year amount to $2,650,000,000. Mr. Speaker, this quite exceeds the three digits we learned in the little red school house. The figure is made up of 10 digits, and I feel that many of our friends here are unaware of this fact.

The pamphlet adds:

To finance the fulfilment of its various undertakings, the government needs 45 per cent of its total revenue.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that for the current year the war effort will require 5 per cent more than last year, that is, 45 per cent of the country's total income, as compared with 37 per cent in England during 1941.

On page 58 of the same pamphlet, in the last paragraph, I find the following:

Combining the war expenditure with the ordinary expenditure of all the administrative services of Canada, federal, provincial and municipal, it will be necessary, in order to foot the bill, that the citizens of Canada contribute approximately 50 cents out of every dollar of income.

On page 66 of the same pamphlet, I find a comparative table showing the taxes paid by the citizen of Canada and the citizen of the United States. The Canadian citizen with an income of $1,600 pays in income and national defence taxes $71 a year, against $6 paid by the citizen of the United States enjoying a similar income. A Canadian earning $3,000 a year will pay $355, while the American of similar income will pay $138. On an income of $5,000 the Canadian citizen will pay $925 and the citizen of the United States $375. An income of $10,000 is taxed $2,930 in Canada against $1,305 in the United States and a $20,000 income pays $8,030 in Canada against $4,614 in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to make this comparison in order to show where Canada is being led by its war effort and to see whether it is true, as some extremists contend, that Canada is not doing its duty and its whole duty.

Moreover, on the 4th of December last, there was no question of lending Great Britain $700,000,000 without interest for the duration of the war, nor of making to England an outright gift of one billion dollars worth of foodstuffs, munitions of war, etc., in addition to maintaining our own forces overseas.

I quote the following words spoken by the Prime Minister and printed on page 42 of Hansard:

> For the future, in addition to the financial provision for raising and maintaining Canada's own armed forces, the government will, as a part of Canada's direct contribution to the defeat of the axis, ask parliament to make provision for meeting Britain's shortage of Canadian dollars by supplying, free of charge and without obligation, to Britain, munitions of war, raw materials, and foodstuffs up to an amount of one billion dollars.

Mr. Speaker, what a beautiful country we live in, what splendid people we are! The assumption of these obligations represents the discharging of the debt of a noble son towards his father. However, this son, Canada, has, in the past, been very generous to his father.

Our national debt, which, in 1911, under Sir Wilfrid Laurier's administration stood at $300,000,000, had exceeded $3,000,000,000 in 1920, and will stand at more than $6,000,000,000 in 1943. This entire increase is attributable to European wars. Starting with annual interest payments of $13,000,000, that is $1.50 per person in 1911, we shall attain the figure of $200,000,000 in interest, in 1943. This represents a sum of $16 a year for each Canadian. Still I would be satisfied if I were sure that this last billion dollars is a final payment on the account of our total independence. But we have no such assurance.

This is not all, Mr. Speaker. The government asks to be relieved of its promise to forego the blood tax, that is conscription, for the release from previous commitments has no other object but the adoption of conscription.

What makes me still more anxious is this paragraph of Hansard, page 51. I quote:

> It will be seen that in seeking freedom for itself to act on all matters pertaining to war in accordance with its judgment, the government is taking a course which will remove all legitimate excuse for controversy, and the course best calculated to maintain the unity of the country in this time of war.

Mr. Homuth interrupting, asked:

> Then what will they do?

And the Right Hon. Mackenzie King answered:

> That will depend in part upon what my hon. friend and those who are round him will do.

I gather from this that the Conservative party will be in a position to blackmail the government and force it to adopt conscription.

For the last 25 years, Mr. Speaker, the conscription issue has been debated. My leaders have taught me that it would be absurd to force our sons to fight in Europe against their will.

I am convinced that it would be a folly. Our line of defence is in Russia, in China, at Hong Kong, shouts the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). Would he be kind enough to tell us how many of our English friends from the British Isles are at present in Russia, in China or at Hong Kong? We will probably be told that the British Isles are in danger.

But Canada is in immediate danger, says General LaFlèche.

No, Mr. Speaker, we must be logical with our Canadian people. I, for one, am convinced we have gone too far; our effort, as regards both man-power and capital is out of proportion, compared to the capacity of our population of 12 millions.

Nobody in Canada wants to lose the war, but we shall lose both the war and the peace if we bring economic ruin on Canada. We shall be the slaves not of Germany or of Japan, but we shall nevertheless be slaves for a hundred years to come. Mr. Speaker, militarism has spelled the ruin of Germany and Japan. It will reduce those people to slavery for centuries to come. Is not militarism in Canada already driving us to it? Those are questions we have a right to ask ourselves, we have a right to take into consideration. It seems to me we must be logical with ourselves. I am convinced we have gone too far.

Our farmers are already short of help and many of their sons would better serve our war effort by remaining on the land and producing the foodstuffs so necessary to feed our soldiers. There are, in my own constituency some sad cases. Reluctance is shown in granting exemption to the eldest son of a widow who has to feed twelve children with the sole products of her land.

Another young man is being harassed, who inherited his father's farm, with 30 cattle to feed, and who lives alone on his property. If he were mobilized, it would be necessary to slaughter all these cattle, for there are seasons when cattle are in no condition to be sold, and the land would remain idle during the owner's absence. How many more similar cases could I not mention. I could go on indefinitely. There are new instances every day.

Mr. Speaker, I shall now conclude my remarks. I have sought to give, in my own way, a clear outline of the critical situation in which we find ourselves and to ask the Prime Minister, as well as all the ministers, to consider the post-war period. Is it a fact that ours is the only government in the world having a commission charged with studying post-war problems? Mr. Speaker, it is great time for us to do some reckoning, to think of those who will come after us, and of all the responsibility which rests upon us. Will this government, the strongest since 1867, capitulate in the hands of a small clique from Toronto bearing, in some cases, the colours of the dollar-a-year men who, after gathering some ten million dollar orders, quit for criticizing the present administration. They would have Mr. Meighen instead so that future generations might have to settle for their extravagance.

In conclusion, I regret to state that after due deliberation I feel obliged to vote against the Tory amendment, against the C.C.F. subamendment and against the main motion, that is against the adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, just as I shall vote in the coming plebiscite against releasing the government from the obligations assumed in 1940 both by them and by 90 per cent of public men in the country.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) moves the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. LACOMBE: I desire to submit to Your Honour standing order 34 which reads:

Every member desiring to speak is to rise in his place, uncovered, and address himself to Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. E. Lacroix.]

Standing order 35 provides:

When two or more members rise to speak, Mr. Speaker calls upon the member who first rose in his place; but a motion may be made that any member who has risen "be now heard," or "do now speak," which motion shall be forthwith put without debate.

When a few moments ago the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix) rose in his place, I rose at the same time, Mr. Speaker, and I want now to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member for Beauce sat down I saw the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) who rose immediately and moved, seconded by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) the adjournment of the debate, which is the motion now before the Chair.

On motion of Mr. Abbott the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Wednesday, January 28, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

PRECIOUS METALS MARKING ACT

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO SPECTACLE AND EYEGLASS FRAMES

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the Precious Metals Marking Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Explain.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): This is a relatively small matter. While the wording of the amendment may appear somewhat technical, the purpose of this bill is to facilitate the marketing of gold-filled spectacle ware. At least 75 per cent of this particular type of merchandise sold in Canada is manufactured in the United States. Over there they must conform to the Bureau of Standards, whereas in Canada our manufacturers must conform to the Precious Metals Marking Act. There is a slight variation in these two requirements, and in order to facilitate the marketing of these goods without loss of service to the public, it is deemed advisable to make this slight amendment. The amendment has been approved by the Canadian Jewellers' Association.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN FORCES

REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONS WHO ENLIST IN HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (for the Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in his majesty's forces or who perform essential war employment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. McLARTY: The purpose of this measure is to implement the undertaking that was given at the time the order in council was passed providing for the reinstatement in their civil employment of those who joined His Majesty's forces. At the time the order in council was passed the house was advised that in view of the fact that this was a measure which would be required not only during but also subsequently to the war, legislation to effect it would be introduced at this session.

Mr. CHURCH: Any distinction between those who serve overseas and those who work in the offices here but who wear uniforms?

Mr. McLARTY: The legislation will generally follow the order in council, and my recollection is that the only provision is for those who have joined for service in his majesty's forces. I do not think there is any distinction between any classes of the service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the hon. gentleman indicate the number and date of the order in council?

Mr. McLARTY: I do not remember the exact date of the order, but speaking from memory it was passed in the month of June last. I shall, however, be glad to furnish the hon. gentleman with the information.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS AND MOTIONS FOR PAPERS—PRECEDENCE OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, on the order paper there appear a number of questions and a much larger number of notices of motion for the production of papers, most of which seek important information relating to the war effort. I believe it will be the consensus of opinion that we should have the information thus sought brought down at the earliest possible date. Under the rules this order will not be called, as I understand it, until the present debate is concluded. Therefore I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if he would seek the consent of the house to a motion similar to that which was passed during the debate which took place in November, 1940, and which will be found at page 240 of Hansard for November 20 of that year. The right hon. gentleman moved this resolution:

> That consideration of the special order relative to the debate on the address to his excellency be suspended until the house has proceeded to the orders respecting questions and notices of motion for the production of papers standing on the order paper.

This seems to me a wholly reasonable request, and one which might readily be complied with.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As my hon. friend was speaking, I had in mind that a similar situation had arisen during a previous session and that it was dealt with in the manner to which he has just referred. I shall be very glad indeed to instruct the Clerk—indeed, I do so now—to place on the order paper a resolution similar to the one which my hon. friend has read. I have no doubt it will meet with the general approval of hon. members.

IMPERIAL WAR CABINET

DOMINION REPRESENTATION WITH GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND—CANADA'S POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have received this morning from our high commissioner in London the following text of the statement made by Mr. Churchill in the course of his speech in the House of Commons at Westminster yesterday, the 27th instant, on the subject of dominion representation in the war cabinet of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. The statement begins:

> Now I come to the question of our own empire or commonwealth of nations. The fact that Australia and New Zealand are in immediate danger zone reinforces the demand that they should be represented in the war cabinet of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. We have always been ready to form an imperial war cabinet containing the prime ministers of the four dominions. Whenever any of them has come here they have taken their seats at our table as a matter of course. Unhappily it has not been possible to get them all here together at once. General Smuts may not be able to come over from South Africa and Mr. Mackenzie King could unfortunately stay only for a short time. But Mr. Fraser was with us and it was a great pleasure to have him, and we had a three months' visit from Mr. Menzies who was also a great success, and we were all very sorry when his most valuable knowledge of our affairs and the war position and his exceptional abilities were lost. For the last three months we have had Earle Page representing the commonwealth government at the cabinet when war matters and Australian matters were under discussion, and also in similar circumstances upon the defence committee. As a matter of fact this has always been interpreted in most broad and elastic fashion. The Australian government have now asked specifically that an accredited representative of their commonwealth government should have the right to be heard in the war cabinet in the formulation and direction of policies. We have of course agreed to this. New Zealand feels bound to ask for similar representation, and the same facilities will of course be available to Canada and South Africa.

The presence at the cabinet table of dominion representatives who have no power to take decisions and can only report to their government evidently raises some serious problems, but none, I trust, which cannot be got over with good-will. It must not, however, be supposed that in any circumstances the presence of dominion representatives for certain purposes would in any way affect the collective responsibilities of his majesty's servants in Great Britain to the crown and parliament.

From the foregoing, it will be seen that Mr. Churchill has made a clear distinction between an imperial war cabinet, which, in addition to the Prime Minister of Great Britain, would contain the prime ministers of the four dominions, and an arrangement under which an accredited representative of any of the four dominions will have the right to be heard in the war cabinet of Great Britain in the formulation and direction of policy.

Mr. Churchill's statement makes clear that an imperial war cabinet containing the prime ministers of the four dominions would involve having them all together in London at one and the same time, either periodically or continuously. This, as Mr. Churchill points out, has not thus far, at any time, been possible. It requires no comment to make clear how impossible it would be to form, at the present time, with its seat in London, an imperial war cabinet containing the prime ministers of the four dominions.

The statement also makes clear that since the outbreak of war, whenever any of the prime ministers of the dominions have been in London, they have, as a matter of course, taken their seats at the cabinet table in the war cabinet. On other occasions Mr. Churchill has made it equally plain that this privilege will continue to be accorded to the prime ministers of the dominions.

Mr. Churchill's statement next discloses that in the last three months Sir Earle Page, representing the commonwealth government of Australia, has been accorded the privilege of being present at the cabinet table in London when war matters and Australian matters were under discussion and also, in similar circumstances, in the defence committee. It is clear from the statement that this privilege, while broadly interpreted, has, however, been extended only as a matter of courtesy. What recently has been asked specifically by the Australian government, and agreed to by the government of Great Britain, is that an accredited representative of the commonwealth government of Australia shall have the right to be heard in the war cabinet in the formulation and direction of policies. Similar facilities, Mr. Churchill states, will, of course, be available to New Zealand, Canada and south Africa.

Mr. Churchill's statement leaves no room for doubt that the power to make decisions and the responsibility for decisions made in the war cabinet of Great Britain will continue to rest with the war cabinet of Great Britain. The right being accorded to accredited representatives of the dominions is that of "being heard" in the formulation and direction of policies.

It is clear from the word sent by the British government to the governments of the several dominions to which I made reference yesterday, that this right to be heard relates to the machinery for consultation between the government of the United Kingdom and the governments of the other members of the British commonwealth on matters of urgency connected with the war; further, that it has resulted from the United States entry into the war, and recent developments in the Pacific, and also from the request of the Australian government.

Speaking for the Canadian government, I may say that the existing machinery for consultation between not only the governments of Great Britain and Canada but also between Canada and the governments of the other dominions has, in our opinion, worked exceedingly well. If at any time in the future we should find the means of consultation inadequate to meet the new developments which have arisen or which may arise, our government will not only be prepared but glad to avail itself of the supplementary arrangement to have our views presented to the war cabinet of Great Britain by an accredited representative, in accordance with the procedure which was announced yesterday by the Prime Minister of Great Britain.

PACIFIC COUNCIL

REPRESENTATION OF CANADA ON COUNCIL TO CONCERT COMMON DEFENCE IN SOUTH PACIFIC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Prime Minister? Press dispatches appearing yesterday afternoon quoted Prime Minister Churchill as saying in the British House of Commons that negotiations are under way—in other words that they are not yet completed—to set up in Washington a Pacific defence council, comprising representatives of Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, the Netherlands East Indies, and presumably the United States. As a nation at war in the Pacific area, is Canada to be represented on this council, and if not, why not?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was good enough to send me word that he intended to ask the question he has just asked. I have a reply which I shall read to the house.

The Prime Minister of the United Kingdom announced in his speech in the House of Commons at Westminster yesterday that it is proposed to set up a Pacific council in London comprising Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and the Netherlands East Indies, which would be able to transmit their united views to the combined chiefs of staff committee sitting at Washington. Final arrangements regarding the working of the Pacific council have not yet been decided upon. Its primary responsibility, however, will, I understand, be to concert the common defence of the countries in the south Pacific which Japanese aggression has placed in the immediate danger zone. The physical and geographical complexities of a world war waged on so many fronts compel subdivisions of responsibility. Our immediate sector of the Pacific front is one we hold jointly with the United States. Arrangements for the common defence of the coast of north America both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific are being worked out jointly by Canada and the United States.

Mr. GREEN: With regard to the answer given by the Prime Minister to my question, did I understand him to mean that Canada was not asking for representation on the Pacific council?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say that such information as I have about the proposed Pacific council is what I read in Mr. Churchill's speech of yesterday. I have given to my hon. friend the only interpretation it is possible for me to put upon his words, and I believe on reading what I have said my hon. friend will see that the explanation I have given as to the representation on the council being confined to the countries named is due to the fact that it was expected to relate only to matters in the south Pacific, or the zone in which the Japanese are operating at the present time.

With respect to the Pacific on and about the north American coasts, as I have said the responsibility rests primarily between the United States, ourselves and Great Britain. It is just a division of the zones, as I see it, in which there are the several responsibilities. But in any event, now that the matter is before the government in the form in which it is, we, of course, are taking occasion to look carefully into it.

Mr. GREEN: I would point out to the Prime Minister also that in reading the extract from Mr. Churchill's speech the Prime Minister did not read the succeeding paragraphs, which said that Australia and New Zealand had asked that the council, instead of being set up in London, should be set up in Washington. The Prime Minister's statement a few moments ago was to the effect that it was to be in London. Apparently the negotiations are looking to setting up the council in Washington.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe a reading of the text bears out what I have said, namely that the announcement made by the Prime Minister of Great Britain related to this council as being located in London, but it was to have its views transferred to the chiefs of staff in Washington. There has been, I understand, since the original conference with New Zealand and Australia, some request on their part that the council itself should be located in Washington, but what answer has been given to that request I am not in a position to say at the moment. I believe what I have said will cover what my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. CHURCH: Will the Prime Minister table all the correspondence both of this year and of last year on this matter and respecting the empire war council?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to this particular matter, there is no correspondence that I am aware of.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the hon. member is referring to something else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Sometimes I have difficulty in catching the purport of my hon. friend's questions. But generally with respect to the tabling of confidential correspondence, may I say that before it can be tabled the consent of all governments concerned will have to be obtained. In any event, where it is thought that it would be inadvisable to make public any part of correspondence at a time of war, that part should not be made public.

CHEESE

QUESTION AS TO THE SHORTAGE OF BOXES AND MILK CANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture. It has been drawn to my attention that there is danger of a serious shortage of cheese boxes, owing to the failure of the controller to release material for manufacture. It has also been drawn to my attention that the same condition exists in regard to milk cans. It is pointed out that there is an insufficient quantity of tin to coat the cans. Have any representations been made to the minister on this subject, and if so, does he intend to take action?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, my answer is that I have not recently discussed the question, just as it has been put, with officials. Only this morning I discussed the general question whether there was any difficulty in regard to materials generally which might be under the control of the boards. I was informed that there are no insurmountable difficulties, and that everything is being arranged satisfactorily.

I shall, however, make definite inquiries with respect to these particular matters, and if there is any further information I shall give it to-morrow.

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON

REPORTED NEUTRALIZATION FOR DURATION OF THE WAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. I have not been able to give notice of it, because it has just come to my attention. A report appearing in the New York Times of yesterday, January 27, states that a solution has been reached in London for the neutralization of the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon for the duration of the war. The article continues:

> Canada, it was indicated, will be asked to assume the responsibility for the protection of the neutrality of the islands, and Admiral Muselier will withdraw his small force.

Is the statement contained in that dispatch correct, and if so what is the nature of the solution which has been reached with respect to this vexed question?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The matter to which my hon. friend has referred, as he is aware, is one of very grave importance, and the time at which an announcement in respect of it should be made is a matter which should be taken into account. I shall be pleased to give the house a statement in the matter as soon as I am advised by the governments of Great Britain and the United States that so far as they are concerned it will be quite satisfactory that a statement on which they are agreed can be made in the Canadian House of Commons.

PRINTING BUREAU

RETIREMENT OF EMPLOYEES FROM SERVICE WITHOUT PENSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask of the Secretary of State. I am informed that upwards of eighty employees of the printing bureau between the ages of 65 and 70 years are shortly to be retired from the service without pension. I should like to ask the minister if this is so, and if in view of the present state of affairs he would not consider it to be in the public interest to retain the services of all who are still competent to carry on their duties, even though approaching the retiring age.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): The hon. member for Carleton was kind enough to give me notice of his intention to ask this question. The figure which he mentioned of 80 employees over the age of 65 is somewhat too high. Actually there are 33 over 65 who are now employed in the printing bureau. The matter of the extension of the term of employment rests primarily with the treasury board. But I believe that under existing circumstances such employment has been continued and, unless ill health intervenes, it will be the policy to continue it in the immediate future.

WAGE CEILING

SETTING UP OF REGIONAL BOARDS UNDER NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Yesterday the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) asked a question about the setting up of regional war labour boards, and at the time I advised him that I thought that these had all been set up. I have confirmed that information. The regional war labour boards, which, as hon. members of this house know, were to be appointed for each province, have all been appointed, the first on December 2 last and the last on January 9.

JOINT DEFENCE

POSSIBILITY OF SENDING CANADIAN SOLDIERS TO ASSISTANCE OF UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Yesterday I directed a question to the Prime Minister and he said that it would have been more appropriate to direct it to the military authorities. I assume that the Minister of National Defence is the highest military authority, and I will ask him whether he is prepared to answer my question. I shall repeat it if necessary.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think my hon. friend misunderstood my answer if he believes I said that he should not have directed his question to me. Directing his question to me was quite all right. What I did say was that before the question could be replied to, I thought the military authorities of the defence department would have to consider it.

Mr. BRUCE: I may have misunderstood the Prime Minister. May I hope, then, to have a reply to the question from him?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): The hon. member for Parkdale inquired yesterday if units of the sixth division would be available to be sent to the assistance of the United States. That question is a rather large order. Whether they would be available of course would depend upon the military circumstances at the time, and the need for them. There are a great many troops in Canada which might be utilized besides the brigade groups of the sixth division. I want to say to him, however, that the units of these brigade groups would be available if it were considered advisable and necessary to send men to the United States, less any home defence personnel who were in those units who did not volunteer for that duty.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Speaking for the air force, all the air force is available for service in the United States if the necessity should arise.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): That is true of the navy.

SUGAR

RATIONING IN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES—BEET SUGAR CAPACITY—CONFECTIONERY INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should give an answer to a question asked on Monday by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). The first part of his question was:

> Why has the sugar ration in Canada been set at three-quarters of a pound per person while in the United States it is fixed at one pound?

The answer is supplied by part of a press release issued by Mr. Leon Henderson on Monday, from which I quote:

> Consumption of sugar this year—

He is speaking about the United States.

> —should average close to one pound per person per week. This does not mean that under the rationing plan now being proposed it will be possible to buy that much per person each week for home use. Actually, the initial sales under the plan may not be more than three-quarters of a pound per week per person; since sugar will have to be provided for people who eat in hotels, restaurants and institutions, sugar so consumed will help make up the annual total of fifty pounds per person. . . .

The ration of three-quarters of a pound per person in Canada relates to home use and therefore is consistent with the rationing plan adopted in the United States. The latter part of the hon. member's question was:

> Again, have any steps been taken or has any plan been made to increase Canada's beet sugar productive capacity by the building of factories? If not, why not?

If the hon. member is asking that consideration be given to that question, I can assure him that consideration will be given to it. I may say, however, that the sugar administrator advised the beet sugar industry some time ago that they should do everything possible to bring production of beets up to the maximum capacity of their factories. If this were possible in the case of the two factories in Alberta, it would mean that beet sugar production would exceed the total requirements of the three prairie provinces.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): While the minister is dealing with this point, and if I am in order, I should like to ask whether any decision has been reached with respect to the allocation of sugar to confectionery manufacturers. During the ten long years of the depression I do not think there was any other industry that suffered more than this one. Most of the confectionery manufacturers had to absorb the sugar tax. In arriving at any decision I hope consideration will be given to that fact. Has any policy been announced or adopted with respect to the allocation of sugar to this industry?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to make inquiry from the wartime prices and trade board before I can answer that question.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, January 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. DOUGLAS C. ABBOTT (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my tribute to those which have been paid already to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has already said, from the point of view of both substance and the manner of presentation their speeches were outstanding. Of course, I may say that that is no more than I would have expected from two such distinguished members of my own profession.

I propose now to place before the house certain views which I hold on two rather controversial questions, the question of conscription and the related issue of the plebiscite. May I say at the outset I realize that for some months there has been a feeling in my constituency that I should have made a public statement of my views on these questions. I have been in public life for only a short time, and, rightly or wrongly, I decided that any statement which I might have to make on a matter of public policy of a controversial nature would be made in the house and not before service clubs or in "Letters to the Editor." So far I have adhered to that rule. I am now taking advantage of the first opportunity I have had of placing my views on these questions on record.

Like most returned men, I am personally a believer in conscription. Those are my personal views and, I think, the views of a good many others, including the majority of my constituents. But I am satisfied that had an attempt been made to enforce this policy at the outset of the war, the result would have been disastrous. I am convinced that it would have split this country from one end to the other, and that our war effort to date would not have achieved anything like it has done.

So far as I am concerned, the question which I must ask myself, and which I think every hon. member must ask himself, is: What policy will result in this country putting forth its maximum war effort? I am prepared to support any policy which I believe will accomplish that object. I intend that any remarks which I shall make to-day with reference to conscription shall apply to conscription for the armed forces. That is the field in which the controversy appears to be most acute. As the Prime Minister indicated in his speech on Monday afternoon, the war effort of this country covers a pretty broad field. The army aspect is only one aspect of our war effort. It is evident to me that in a country of this size there must be a top limit to that armed force effort.

That top limit is something on which I do not feel qualified to express an opinion, and I doubt whether there are very many people in this country, or, for that matter, in this parliament, who are in a position to give an informed opinion on that question. It depends obviously, it seems to me, on a great many facts which of necessity can be known to only a few people. As was stated here, yesterday, we are a nation of some eleven and a half or twelve million people, and as an editor friend of mine wrote the other day, a considerable number of those people have either not yet cut their eye-teeth or lost them forever. Therefore, if we accept the statement which has often been made that it takes anywhere from twelve to fifteen men or women to support one fighting man, it does not require any knowledge of higher mathematics to realize that our armed forces cannot be as extensive as some of our more enthusiastic citizens would lead us to believe.

I take it that the purpose of conscription or compulsory service is to provide an adequate body of trained fighting men; and, of course, since the training takes time, that training cannot be deferred until the need at the front becomes urgent. We have at present in this country a considerable number of men in training under the compulsory system. We can call up and train more, and it seems to me that the controversy in recent months has turned entirely on the question whether we should now adopt a policy of saying that these men will be liable for military service elsewhere than in Canada, or whether that decision should be deferred until the need in the fighting areas becomes apparent. At the moment the men we are calling up are not, of course, available for service outside the territorial limits of Canada. The provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act provide that they shall not be so liable. So far as training is concerned, the result is the same. The men are being trained; but as matters stand at present, when trained, if they are required outside, they cannot be sent. That is because the government went before the people of this country in March, 1940, and expressly pledged itself that, if returned to power, it would not enforce compulsory service for the armed forces overseas.

This brings me to the second part of my remarks, namely, the proposed plebiscite, which in effect is asking, as we all know, that the government be given a free hand, that they be released from that pledge and be in a position, if the situation demands it, to send our armed forces whereever they may be required. We pride ourselves, Mr. Speaker, that we are living in a democracy, and we say that we are fighting to preserve that system. The whole basis of that system, as I have always understood it, is that the will of the majority shall prevail. As I said a moment ago, the government of this country went before the people less than two years ago and made an express statement that it would not enforce compulsory service for overseas. The government was returned on that basis. It has frequently been referred to as the pledge of the Prime Minister, but in my view the pledge is not the pledge of the Prime Minister alone but the pledge of every Liberal candidate who offered himself for election.

So far as I personally am concerned, conscription was not an issue in my riding. I do not recall that it was referred to at any time during the campaign. It certainly was not referred to by me; nevertheless I consider I am just as much bound by that pledge or commitment as any other Liberal member who was elected in March, 1940. One reason, by no means the only reason, but one reason why the present Prime Minister of Canada has retained the confidence of his fellow Canadians for a longer time, I think, than any other Prime Minister in the history of this country is that the Canadian people know that when he gives a pledge or makes a commitment, it will be respected.

I have no sympathy with the view that political pledges are made to be broken; I do not particularly care what the circumstances are; it savours too much to me of the doctrine that the end justifies the means. The government is charged with evading responsibility. If insistence on respecting a pledge solemnly given is evading responsibility, the charge is correct, but that does not coincide with my definition of that term.

On this question of responsibility I should like to say a word or two about the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin). As we all know, the minister has gone through a long illness, and we are delighted to see that he has made such a splendid recovery. I do not think anyone in this country could have criticized him had he decided that he had already given generously of his time and ability to the public service, and that for reasons of health he should now retire to the side-lines and leave responsibility to someone else. He has not done that. I do not know, but I strongly suspect, that his return to the duties of his office and in this house are much against the advice of his medical advisers. Whether that be so or not, it does not strike me as being an evasion of responsibility, and I commend his action as an example to those numerous critics who are always so willing to define other people's responsibilities.

I have heard other criticism of the plebiscite on the basis of the effect it will have outside. I think the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) said last night that it did not matter what effect the plebiscite had on our enemies, but that it did matter how it affected our friends, and I presume he had particular reference to our great neighbour nation, the United States. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, that is a form of criticism which does not carry very much weight with me either. Anyone who listened to the speech of the Prime Minister the other day—as a matter of fact he did not need to listen to that speech because he knew it before—must realize that the war effort of this country is a magnificent one. We sometimes worry too much about what other people think about us and not enough about what we are actually doing. It is what we do that counts, and I venture to say that the war effort of this country will stand comparison with that of any other. So far as the United States is concerned, I would be the last to minimize the efforts they are putting forward, but from the outset of the war their interests were just as much at stake as our own. They have come in now. They are in, and I think it will still be some little time before, either on a proportionate basis, or on any other basis you wish to take, their effort will come up to ours. I have no doubt it will, but in the meantime we need not worry particularly about whether our war effort will be misunderstood in the United States.

I should like now to make a brief personal reference on this question of plebiscite. I have had a certain number of communications, by telegram, letter and otherwise, intimating that the stand which it was assumed I was taking on this question was dictated by considerations of political expediency or party loyalty or the like. Well, I am almost forty-three years of age, and except for some two and a half years I served overseas in the last war I have lived all my life in this country. I suppose that on the basis of the mortality tables I may have another twenty or twenty-five years to go. I have three young children who, I hope, have considerably longer. If anybody tells me that the stand which I take or the views which I express on questions such as we are now considering, relating to the prosecution of this war, are dictated or actuated by motives such as I have suggested, I will say to these people that they are talking utter rubbish.

I know that in war time we are in danger of giving our emotions free rein, and we have to make allowance for that; but I believe we could do with a lot less high-powered emotion and a lot more careful analytical thinking. In that connection I was struck by a phrase that occurred in a sermon I listened to last Sunday in Montreal. It was delivered by the Reverend Mr. Wilkinson, rector of the church of St. James the Apostle. He was discussing this question of thinking, and he said: "Some people who think they are thinking are only rearranging their prejudices."

I was very much encouraged to read in the press on Saturday night the statement made by Mr. Alex Walker, Dominion President of the Canadian Legion, of which I am a member. Mr. Walker said that all branches of the legion would work to secure an overwhelming result at the polls so that this plebiscite would be transformed into a weapon of victory. I congratulate Mr. Walker upon that statement. I think it is an example of clear thinking—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What else did he say?

Mr. ABBOTT: —such as I have referred to. I congratulate him and commend that attitude to some other organizations such as committees for total war and the like.

It seems to me that no useful purpose is going to be served by interminable debate in this house or outside as to the desirability or otherwise of this plebiscite. We are going to have it, and, in spite of what some people may have to say, it is a thoroughly democratic procedure. I spoke a moment ago about responsibility, and I suggest that the people of this country as a whole now have an opportunity to assume their responsibility, to turn out and vote and show each other, and the rest of the world if you will, that democracy can be made to work even in war time. So far as my own constituency is concerned, I have no doubt as to the result. I cannot believe that it will be other than an overwhelming affirmative answer to release the government from its pledge and to give it a free hand to conduct the war as it sees fit.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the government has made solemn promises and parliament has no power to release it from commitments which induced our population to return it to power. It is for this reason that I shall again revert to the ticklish question of conscription in order to hammer a truly Canadian mentality into the minds of the ultra-loyalists, if such a thing is possible. Allow me to recall to them the recent political history of our country, which is also theirs.

Speaking on conscription, the Right Honourable Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on March 30, 1939, made the following statement before this house, as you may read on page 2426 of Hansard:

> One strategic fact is clear: the crossing of the oceans is not likely to recur. Two years ago, I expressed in this house the view that it was extremely doubtful if any of the British dominions would ever send another expeditionary force to Europe.
> One political fact is equally clear: in a war to save the liberty of others, and thus our own, we should not sacrifice our own liberty or our own unity. Planning and coordination would be essential, but the necessary coordination could be made, and if this government were in power it would be made, without sacrificing those vital ends and conditions of our existence. Profits could and would be rigidly controlled, and profiteering suppressed. But men's lives and men's wills cannot be put on the same basis as goods and profits. The present government believes that conscription of men for overseas service would not be necessary or an effective step. Let me say that so long as this government may be in power, no such measure will be enacted.

On the following day, the right hon. Minister of Justice made the following statement, recorded on page 2468 of Hansard of March 31, 1939; this is his greatest title to glory, in spite of all that may be said by Ernest Lapointe's self-seeking eulogists who are now attempting to exploit here his brilliant career in order to enhance petty interests implacably branded by his whole life. The former Minister of Justice used the following words:

> Now I am going to touch a subject which is a delicate one. The French Canadians will never agree that any government has the right to force them to military service on the other side of the ocean. In 1917, that was my view, and I have never altered it. I believe that conscription, in 1917, was a blunder of frightful magnitude, and that we are still reaping the sad and sorry results of that ill-conceived policy. I was pleased that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) said yesterday, what I have myself learned, that the results did not in any way justify the taking of the risk; because in the end very few conscripts ever saw the front lines during the war. All should be reconciled to the doctrine which I have just expounded. The best way, the most effective way of helping is not the way that would divide our country and tear it asunder.

We are not alone in that view. Australia has always been against conscription. South Africa will never have conscription, Ireland would never have conscription. I think I am true to my concept of Canadian unity when I say that I shall always fight against this policy; I would not be a member of a government that would enact it; and not only that, but I say with all my responsibility to the people of Canada that I would oppose any government that would enforce it. I agree with what was said yesterday by the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister, and what was said by Mr. Bruce of Australia, that the time for expeditionary forces overseas is certainly past, and it would not be the most effective way to help our allies.

These grave statements have been accepted with satisfaction by the whole country. At the general election of March 26, 1940, the Canadian electorate overwhelmingly approved a thoroughly Canadian policy and nothing else. Of the two main party leaders engaged in the struggle, one claimed that the Canadian government's war policy was inefficient on account of its moderation. However, he stated that it should remain on a voluntary and free footing. The other laid down as a principle that our war effort should remain moderate, voluntary and free. Of two evils, the Canadians chose the lesser. The popular vote of March 26, 1940, expressed a choice of a thoroughly Canadian policy more than anything else. However, neither of the leaders had thought that a time would come when war contingencies would alter the situation. War remains indifferent to all political machinations and no one, even though he be the greatest genius, may foretell its emergencies. Once war is declared all its consequences must perforce be accepted and endured. The soldier deserving of the name never spares even his own blood. Only war profiteers measure their efforts by their value in gold, for they are too petty to rise to the heroism of the soldier who stands ready to make the supreme sacrifice.

Military and financial imperialism, the petty interests and criminal hypocrisy of war profiteers should not be allowed to impose conscription on a whole nation who condemned it scarcely a year ago. Let the government deal, once for all, with these fomenters of national disunity and these war profiteers! Those who clamour for conscription are abusing the government of the people for the people and are insulting democracy, the defenders of which they claim to be. Wilfully ignoring the will of the electorate, as clearly expressed on March 26, 1940, they set themselves up as would-be dictators of Canada. A country which, through the might of her resources and the valour of her blood fights dictatorship must, by all means, free public opinion from the hateful theories of those fosterers of discord and disorder. They are the ones who are truly sabotaging the war effort and the national defence.

I shall now demand, once again, exemption from military service for farmers. The ultra-loyalists should not construe this request as the expression of a feeling peculiar to my province. There is no better evidence for that fact that the letters I have recently received from many places. Of whatever race they may be, the writers, like the majority of true Canadians, wish to save our agriculture from disaster and our nation from bankruptcy. Loyal and true to their King, they believe that they can serve him best on the very soil where unprecedented efforts and sacrifices are being made. The warning cry sounded in the letters written to me by those people is as follows:

I should like to read a letter which I have received from New Brunswick:

Royal Road,
Feb. 21, 1941.

Mr. J. B. L. Lacombe,

I saw by the paper where you are going to ask for exemption for people engaged in agriculture. May you meet with every success.

My husband is a cripple, he lost his leg two years ago when his team ran away with him on a reaper. Our only help and support is a son and if he has to go in training, we don't know what in the world we are going to do. May you get every support.

Yours truly,
Mrs. William Nealis,
Fredericton, R.R. No. 1, N.B.

That is from the constituency of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson).

Another letter which I should like to read is from Saskatchewan:

Balcarres, Sask.,
March 1, 1941.

Mr. J. B. L. Lacombe,
Ottawa, Ont.
Dear Sir,

An item on Feb. 26, issued of Free Press Prairie Farmer that all farm youth be exempted from training. I beg to ask why parties in my position cannot obtain help to get back to another start. I am married, 44 years of age, wife and two children, girl 16, able to work and boy 11, school age. I have tried to exist on $7 municipal relief and such odd jobs as I could pick at very small wages for the last three years. Lost nine horses through disease, had to sell other stock. Have applied to governmental service, also offered to join the army but not fit. Now I must vacate the building I live in with nowhere else to go as mortgage company wishes us to move. Then I have no money for advance rent on house in town also need clothing, fuel and groceries, etc. for family use which I cannot get work nor money to pay for. I was drafted off a farm while the sole support of my parents in last war and saw thirteen months army service. I have tried every branch of government service for employment to no avail. I and my family are badly destitute. I would like to know why something cannot be done to give families in my position another start even in agriculture work. There are two or three in the same position in this district. I would like to buy more certificates but would also like to be in position to make a fair living for my family. Also hoping something can be done to give in this matter chance, I beg to remain,

Respectfully yours,
D. T. Young,
Box 1095, Balcarres, Saskatchewan.

I may add that similar representations have been made to me by a great number of English-speaking farmers from Ontario, the maritimes and the prairies. However, the letters containing those representations were confidential and I would be unfair to the writers if I were to state their names.

History repeats itself. During the last war, thousands of Canadian farmers of every racial extraction, over eight thousand of them in fact, laid before Sir Robert Borden in this capital of Canada, a unanimous petition urging the then prime minister to exempt their sons from compulsory military service. They met the head of the nation during the winter of 1918 at a huge meeting that took place in one of the theatres of this city. Sir Robert Borden rejected the petition presented by the farmers, who in turn defeated his successor at the election of December 6, 1921. In the prairies and in Ontario, the Progressives and the United Farmers returned a considerable number of members, and as a result, for nine years the Liberal party itself would have been unable to remain in power without their support. Almost a decade elapsed before the Conservative party again took power on July 28, 1930.

Those events should teach a lesson to those who might be tempted to repeat the frightful blunder of 1917. The common people's reactions would be still more dreadful in a second post-war period.

At a time when the farmer is the most affected by the minimum prices regulations, and when he is deprived of the help he needs for cultivating his land, it is important to exempt from military service farmers' sons, farm labourers and all persons who are working in industries related to agriculture. Exemption courts should be set up in all constituencies. Invested with the necessary powers, such courts would be instructed to seek the most efficient means of preserving agriculture, our first line of defence.

The letters I have mentioned express an opinion held throughout the country by those who believe in the survival of Canada through agriculture. Those letters show how well-grounded are the demands which I have felt constrained to submit again to parliament. As regards conscription for overseas service, the great majority of Canadians, from whatever race they may be descended, are against it. That is evidenced by the vote given by the young men in all Canadian universities. Canadian citizens, whatever their age, their condition, their calling or their residence, have rejected conscription in the past and they are still condemning that measure. The financial sharks, who through their unbridled greed have rearmed the axis powers, are alone in again supporting conscription. Those traitors to their country who were branded by Winston Churchill himself scarcely four years ago in the British House of Commons, are still demanding conscription. Those rascals who have plenty of money will only be satisfied when they have fully appropriated our resources, our incomes and our blood. I say again as emphatically as I can "Our first line of defence is in Canada." And if, unfortunately we were sooner or later to face an invasion, those who have neglected to rearm our country for the benefit of military and financial imperialism shall have to bear the dreadful consequences of such an invasion.

Here is a letter sent to me by a Toronto citizen. It is a good illustration of the true Canadian national sentiments shared by all those who believe that our main duty is the protection and defence of our own shores.

I will read a letter from Toronto:

172 Oakmount Road,
May 9, 1941,
Toronto, Ontario.

Liguori Lacombe, M.P.,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir,

It was most refreshing to read your recent speech against conscription. I had long ago given up hope that any of our representatives thought the same way that I and many of my fellow citizens do.

The imperialists will probably ruin our country financially but, as long as you are championing Canada's rights, I do not think they will desiccate our national unity. This war is following the same pattern as the last one, and the imperialists are again preparing to fertilize Europe with Canadians. When are we going to assert ourselves as a Canadian and American nation?

With best wishes, I remain,
Sincerely,
John V. Newton.

I shall read another letter sent to me by an honest Ontario farmer, requesting, for his sons working on the farm, exemption from compulsory military service and training. This letter is worded as follows:

Springfield, Ontario,
February 20, 1941.

Dear Sir,

I read in the London Free Press to-day of your resolution exempting all young men who are engaged in farming from military training, and I want to congratulate you for your stand. Not that I think that farmers or their sons are any better to fight for their country than anybody else, but I do think that a good many of them can serve their country better by staying on the land. It does seem to me that there are some at Ottawa who do not understand conditions pertaining to agriculture. Now I would like to state, and you can use this if it will be of any benefit in getting your resolution through. One year ago last fall, my wife and I bought one hundred acres with the understanding that our son was to take it over when he was twenty-one. Well, he went on and worked it last year, cleaned it up for accredited cattle, has sixty acres ploughed; he has a contract signed to grow peas and beans for the canning company. Now the point is, what is he going to do. He will be twenty-one in June. Under the present law it would seem the only thing he can do would be to sell his stock, which we have been trying to build up for years. I might add that this farm is three miles away from my own farm, and I have all I can possibly do to work my own farm.

Yours truly,

Harvey Nigh,
Springfield, Elgin County,
R.R. No. 1, Ontario.

(Text) Let me add just one word on agriculture. Every hand is needed on the farm, and the farmer plays an essential part in the war effort. Farmers, farm labourers and all persons employed in industries relating to agriculture should, therefore, not be called up for military training. Whether the farmer be engaged in the production of food, in the raising of live stock or in lumbering, he provides our fighting men with food, clothing and shelter. I urge that we exempt the farmers from military training.

Concerning the matter of conscription for overseas service, I believe I am justified in repeating what I said in this house on April 30, 1941. The adoption of such a measure would endanger the very foundation of national unity. It would imperil true Canadianism which must be prevalent and alive in all our people and their leaders. Let us not repeat our past monstrous mistakes.

Before concluding, I beg to remind the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government of their commitments toward the people of Canada. When Canada was on the verge of declaring war upon Germany, that is on September 8, 1939, the Prime Minister stated in this house, as reported at page 36 of Hansard for 1939:

I wish now to repeat the undertaking I gave in parliament on behalf of the government on March 31. The present government believes that conscription of men for overseas service will not be a necessary or an effective step. No such measure will be introduced by the present administration.

Even a few months after the last general election, the Prime Minister made the following declaration, as reported at page 966 of Hansard for June 20, 1940:

Those who were anti-conscriptionists were against conscription for service overseas, and as long as this government is in office we are going to maintain that position and see that effect is given to it. That is just one of the reasons why, in carrying out the will and the wishes of the people, we do not propose to take into this government any of those whose object in coming into the ministry would be to see that conscription overseas was again made one of the issues in this country.

As to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, I do not approve of it, and my constituents could not approve of it either. This amendment deplores the plebiscite on conscription for overseas service, but it is not opposed to conscription itself. Therefore, as I have always been against conscription, I will not, in this difficult moment, shun the fulfilment of my duty. I request the government to respect its pledges and the terms of the anti-conscriptionist mandate, which it received from the people of Canada on March 26, 1940.

Will the most powerful administration which the country has had so far, withdraw before the invasion of the howling mob of rotten financiers? Behind the ramparts threatened by the assault of conscriptionists, will our leaders stand up in front of the enemy, who wants to sacrifice at all costs the defence of Canada upon the altar of military and financial imperialism? Will they respect their pledges and the mandate which they received from the people? This is what we shall see. Personally, I will not free the government from its commitments and promises because, in accordance with the terms of its mandate and the constitution of the country, it may and must administer the country during at least three years without imposing conscription. I will not free it from any pledge it has given against compulsory service overseas, because our total war effort must be directed more than ever to the total defence of Canada before all. The leader of the opposition stated that our line of defence was everywhere in this confused universe. He grieved over the fate of Australia, which is dangerously threatened. He fears that Halifax, Saint John, Vancouver or Quebec may meet with the fate of Pearl Harbour. If that is true, our first line of defence more than ever is on our shores, and our first duty is toward Canada.

The leader of the opposition, in his amendment, is asking for a total national war effort and for the mobilization, in any theatre of war, of our complete effective in man and woman-power. He also requests the total mobilization of the wealth and material resources of the country to be used for war purposes throughout the world. He does not speak of the defence of our shores.

Are Halifax, Vancouver, Saint John and Quebec adequately protected, or is their defence merely casual? Are the more thickly populated cities of Canada ready to face an air invasion from the enemy? These matters do not seem to interest the leader of the opposition or the government. They believe that we should fight in Europe, Asia, Africa, the South Sea islands and undergo the utmost sacrifices in natural resources, munitions and man-power, even if Canada must neglect its own defence and suffer the same fate as the countries dominated and subdued by the enemy. The commonwealth of Australia is seriously threatened, while its heroic soldiers are facing death in Africa and thousands of others were mowed down by the enemy in Greece and in Crete less than one year ago. Did the government and the opposition come to an understanding to reserve the same deplorable fate for Canada?

From their former actions, from their former statements, I can only arrive at the conclusion that at present we are facing the most anti-Canadian and imperialist policy which the country has seen so far. Therefore, fully aware of my responsibilities toward my constituency and my country, I will vote against the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I will vote against the amendment and against the amendment to the amendment, because the latter also calls for the conscription of man-power for overseas service, as well as for the conscription of wealth.

When the rules of the house allow it and when hon. members have voted on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), I will immediately move an amendment to the amendment requesting that the government keep its pledges and the terms of the mandate which it received from the people of Canada during the general elections of March 26, 1940, against conscription for overseas service.

I will close with the following statement: The formation of a Canadian party is necessary. I will adhere to this party which was originated to-day in this House of Commons. Other hon. members also will adhere to it, together with all true Canadians. Our policy will be directed toward the prime defence of Canada, toward the best interests of the country in the economic and social domain. This doctrine, believe me, will not be the exclusive prerogative of one province. It will shine over the whole country and over all loyal Canadians, faithful to His Majesty the King of England, who is also the King of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, may the extreme inequalities of wealth which have led our democracy to the verge of the abyss disappear from this world. Was not this wish expressed in the war aims of the allies, as approved by His Majesty the King, by the Archbishop of Westminster, and again recently by Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt when they drafted the charter of the Atlantic? May the war profiteers and the thieves of Valcartier camp who took away from our worthy soldiers the food which was intended for them perish also. May the corrupters of democracy perish in order that we may save whatever good and praiseworthy elements are still left in it. May the traitors to our country perish, those who have rearmed Japan and the axis powers to the prejudice of the allies and Canada. Let us sever the last link which ties us to those renegades who have forsaken their sacred pledges, and let us join the Canadian party which has just been created in this house. We shall soon set forth the doctrine of the new Canadian party which has been established in the best interests of the country.

The new Canadian party requests better remuneration for our land, sea and air forces. The wages received by employees of our war industries are two, three and even four times as great as those received by our soldiers. Those employees work only eight hours a day. The soldier who gives his life, who sometimes wrecks his future when he outlives the battle, gets but a meagre compensation. No soldier, airman or seaman should receive less than $4 a day, exclusive of his uniform, upkeep and food. The first duty of the Canadian party will be to retain the farmer on the land, to produce munitions and supplies, to organize the defence of Canada before all, and to give the defenders of our country the fair remuneration to which they are entitled.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, I have on my desk the speech from the throne. We usually look upon that speech as the legislative menu card for the coming session, but a careful study of this document almost leads one to believe that this menu card was prepared in a country which was on very severe rations. One item that we had expected to see on the card is not there, and in its place is something that is certainly not palatable to most people of the country and is absolutely nauseous to a great many. I refer to the question of the plebiscite.

There will be opportunities to deal with other departments of the government as the session proceeds. I want to deal particularly with the questions of man-power and money as they affect our war effort, and with the suggestion that we are having a plebiscite to relieve the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) from a promise which he made.

In the first place the voluntary system has fallen down. I think every hon. member in the house will admit that that is so. The proof is to be found in the radio addresses and speeches of high ranking army officials and important members of the government. Anyone who attends the recruiting meetings that are being frantically called throughout this province will realize only too well how the whole system of voluntary recruiting has fallen down.

Mr. MUTCH: That is pure nonsense.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is not pure nonsense. If it is pure nonsense, then my hon. friend's leaders in the cabinet and the various officers who are out recruiting are not telling the truth.

Mr. MUTCH: It is either nonsense or sabotage; the hon. member can have it either way. I know something about it.

Mr. HOMUTH: So do I. I know a lot about it. The hon. member will have an opportunity of expressing his views.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Make him withdraw "sabotage."

Mr. HOMUTH: I did not hear him say it. Oh well, no one pays any attention to what he says anyway.

The very fact that the government have decided that we should have a plebiscite, the very fact that they are asking the people of this country to release them from their promises with respect to service overseas, should be ample proof that the voluntary system has fallen down. Certainly if they were getting all the recruits they needed, the Prime Minister would never suggest having a plebiscite on this question.

If the situation is so serious, there is only one answer—national selective service. We have to get them in; we must have men to fill up the ranks when the time comes. If we cannot get them in voluntarily, then we must have national selective service. All we expect is that the government of the day shall have the courage to see to it that the men who have enlisted for overseas service, the men who have already left the shores of Canada, are not going to be deserted. Certainly no hon. member would suggest that the ranks of these men who have gone overseas should, when the time comes, be decimated by any failure to give them the necessary support. Surely no one would expect us to say to them: We have no more men to send to support you; so far as that phase of our war effort is concerned we are through.

When we declared war on Germany, and I was one of the members of parliament who sat here and voted for the declaration of war on Germany, did we say to Herr Hitler: We are declaring war on you and if you ever dare come near our shores we will slap your wrist and send you back? Or did we say to Germany: We are declaring war on you and we are going to fight you anywhere to drive from the face of this globe the vicious philosophy you preach. Isn't that what we said? There is only one way in which we can do that, and it is to fight our enemy wherever he can be found. When we declared war on Japan did we say to Japan: We are going to wait until you come here before we fight you? Did we say that to any nation with which we declared ourselves at war?

I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the reluctance of the government to take the courageous move they ought to take in order to get the required number of men. The only reason they give for not doing so is that the Prime Minister made a certain promise. Certainly he made a promise. But does that mean that no matter how serious this war may become, no matter how closely it may approach our shores, no matter how many men we lose, the Prime Minister is not prepared to fill up their ranks because of that promise he made; that instead he is going to take a plebiscite? That promise was given by the Prime Minister before the ravage of Norway and Denmark and Holland and Belgium. It was made before Dunkirk; it was made before Greece; it was made before the murderous attack by Japan, not only on the United States but on ourselves, in which we lost two regiments at Hong Kong.

If this were the only political promise the Prime Minister had ever made, or if he had been in public life only a short time, then I would say that in trying to keep such a pledge he was taking a real statesmanlike responsibility. Or if he had carried out all the promises that he has made in his long political life, then we might unhesitatingly say that this is just what you would expect him to do, to be consistent with the course he had followed during all his political life. But, Mr. Speaker, his political life is cluttered not only with broken promises but with promises that he has made and failed to carry out and never will carry out.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Name them.

Mr. HOMUTH: I will name some of them right now. But no promise he ever made had the political significance or the political repercussions of this promise with regard to compulsory service for overseas. I could go back to 1919, and to the various elections held since then, and quote promise after promise that the Prime Minister made which he has never tried to carry out and has no intention of ever carrying out. But let us come to more recent days, to the election of 1935. Many of the members of this house will remember that throughout this country at that time large camps had been established in which unemployed young men were housed and clothed and fed and trained. During the campaign of 1935 the present Prime Minister directed attention to these camps every time he made a speech, and he always referred to their military aspect, to the fact that they were administered by the Department of National Defence. He tried to sow in the minds of the people of this country the idea that these camps were simply a military move, and that the boys were there under military rule and discipline, which might mean that eventually they would become soldiers. He was going to close all of these camps. He was going to take the boys out of the camps and give them lucrative employment. He painted a glowing picture of these boys marching out of the camps and working on the railways and other great public projects throughout this country. He closed the camps all right, but what did he do with the boys? The boys were left to wander up and down the highways and byways of this country, unwanted by anybody. If that was a sacred promise of the Prime Minister, and it certainly was a promise, he did not carry it out.

Again, speaking in the west before he went to England, the Prime Minister made another promise. He reiterated his stand on conscription for overseas service. He told the young men that they ought to get into the army or the finger of shame would be pointed at them as long as they lived, and then he added: "I give this pledge, that there will be no coercion for overseas service." Is there any hon. member of this house who will stand up to-day and say there has been no coercion in Canada for overseas service? Why, Mr. Speaker, I said during the last session of the house, in November, and I repeat now, that we have had in Canada the most cowardly system of coercion for overseas service that was ever conceived, because the boys who were taken into the training camps were shamed and humiliated and everything possible was done to drive them into active service for overseas.

Mr. MARTIN: Quote the Prime Minister's statement which you are talking about.

Mr. HOMUTH: Look it up in Hansard. You have more time than I have.

Mr. MARTIN: The fact is you have not got it.

Mr. HOMUTH: There are two promises that were made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members not to interrupt.

Mr. HOMUTH: I do not mind, Mr. Speaker. Again, the Prime Minister on many occasions has declared that he and any government that he was leading would never declare war on any country unless parliament was first called.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) cannot deny that one.

Mr. HOMUTH: Yet over one week-end he declared war on four countries—Finland, Roumania, Bulgaria, Japan—

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a conversation going on across the floor which is not fair to the hon. member who has the floor, and I would ask hon. members not to interrupt.

Mr. HOMUTH: The Prime Minister made the statement that war would not be declared on any country unless parliament was first called. He enunciated it at every election. But he did declare war on various countries without summoning parliament. What made him declare war in those cases without calling parliament? Something unlooked for, something unprecedented, something he had never thought of when the promise was made. Yet was that promise not just as sacred as his promise on the question of compulsory service for overseas? When the Prime Minister declared war on Japan he gave out the statement that he had consulted with the leader of the opposition about declaring war. In fact I understood he had consulted with the leaders of all the groups in the house. But let me tell the Prime Minister this, so far as his promise was concerned: that the leader of the opposition and the leaders of the other groups sitting on the opposition side of this chamber are not the parliament of Canada.

This is the parliament of Canada and this is the house which he said would make the declarations of war. But these are things affecting more or less the material welfare of the people, whereas the question of conscription for overseas, the filling of the ranks of the fighting forces, have to do with the actual life of the person. If we took definite action right now and did it as quickly as possible it might save more lives than anything else we could do. Is it not plain to all of us that the Prime Minister's attitude now is no excuse for him? Are there any bodies of Canadian citizens who are prepared to say now that they are against an all-out war effort? Are there any people in this country who are prepared to say that we are going to desert the men overseas? From the riding I represent there are a thousand men who to-day are serving beyond the shores of Canada, and there are many more enlisted for active service. What are we going to say to them? What am I going to say to the mothers and fathers of these men?

Reference has been made in this house to the dynamic leadership of those two great leaders, Churchill and Roosevelt. The hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) has referred to these leaders—and incidentally, in his speech the other day he completely swallowed himself so far as his attitude to this question is concerned, because he certainly expressed different views a couple of weeks ago in the county of Waterloo. He referred to that great man Roosevelt—and a great man he is, and a great friend to us and to the empire. But when Roosevelt was elected there was no idea of the United States being embroiled in any war in Europe, or in any war at all. They would not send men outside the United States. Well, is he any less democratic than the Prime Minister of Canada? Are his promises any less sacred?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He said, "any foreign war."

Mr. HOMUTH: Certainly. Now he has changed his mind because he has seen the danger as we see it here. And the very man who is leading England and the empire to-day, the most outstanding figure in the world, has done a great many things in this war, in the House of Commons in England, which time after time parties had pledged themselves against.

Now the Prime Minister says we will take a plebiscite. I asked him the other day, and then what? I said, after the plebiscite, what? He would give no answer. It was simply an evasive answer. He is not pledged to do anything; he is not going to pledge himself to do anything.

What if the people of Canada vote against this? What if the people vote not to release the government from its promise? What then are we going to do? What is Canada going to do? Hon. members speak of this plebiscite as if it were a foregone conclusion that it will carry; and yet within the last two days we have heard opposition to the plebiscite from the government side, and how some members are going to work against it and vote against it. This very plebiscite itself is bringing about national disunity, because this vote will end simply in a fight on conscription; on one side you will have the conscriptionists and on the other the anti-conscriptionists. The country will be split wide open; and after that, I say, what then? What is the government going to do? What is the Prime Minister going to do?

We are going out in the course of a few weeks to urge the people of Canada to invest in the war loan. We are going to plead with them to put up every dollar they can. We have gone into various industries in the country and pleaded with the workmen to give everything they can in war savings. I was asked if I would address a couple of meetings in my riding on behalf of the war loan, and I know that one question is going to be: How about the cost of the plebiscite? For someone will have to take charge of the work—and it is going to be a great opportunity for a large band of Liberal workers, from one side of the country to the other, to have a job for a few days. Someone will have to take charge of it, and money will have to be spent to explain the thing to the people. Money will have to be spent to organize the people—or is it going to be an unwanted baby, and are the people going to be left to vote just as they like without anyone taking the initiative? When I ask these people to invest in the war loan I shall have to say to them: Well, the first four or five million dollars will have to be raised anyway to pay for this plebiscite so that you people can decide whether or not the government is to continue in this war so far as man-power is concerned. From one end of the country to the other there is sweeping resentment at the spending of this money on something that the government itself should have the courage to do.

If there is behind the Prime Minister any large group of members who are opposed to national selective service, I think the time has come when the Prime Minister should say to them, "We have come now to the parting of the ways; we have now come to the point where we have to do the brave thing on behalf of the country, and if you cannot see eye to eye with me, then we shall have to part company." The Prime Minister can be assured of sufficient support in this house to put any such bill through. In fact, I think he should go further than that. I think the Prime Minister should be prepared to-day to say, "I am going to form a truly national government in this country so that I can wage war against the aggressor with every dollar, with every man and every woman and every bit of material wealth that we have in Canada, and it is not going to be the responsibility of any political party, nor is it going to be hampered by any political expediency, but all the parties in the Dominion of Canada are going to be behind this war effort"—as they are.

Hon. members opposite sometimes laugh when we mention the question of national government. The Prime Minister on more than one occasion, and the late Minister of Justice, Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, on one or two occasions, referred to the great Liberal following in the House of Commons—180 members. And the Prime Minister said: "What could be more national than that? What could be more of a representative national government than 180 members out of 245, representing constituencies from Halifax to Vancouver?" It may be true. But the peculiar part is that when he wanted a minister of national defence for naval services there was apparently no one in that great national group fit to fill the job, so he went outside to get a minister for the navy. Then he wanted a minister of justice. Now, I have met and associated with a great many of my right hon. friend's legal friends from the province of Quebec; bright men, smart men, men with long experience in politics, men with long experience in the courts of their province. But apparently not one of them was fit, in the eyes of the Prime Minister, to be minister of justice; he had to go outside of the elected members to get a minister of justice.

Mr. MARTIN: Why did you go out of the house to get a new leader?

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): And a discredited leader.

Mr. HOMUTH: Let me remind my hon. friend that the new leader has served a long time in parliament and was still part of the parliament of Canada. Then the government wanted a minister of labour. Certainly they have tried many of them in the last couple of years, and one was no more successful than the other; they have bogged labour down, they have messed up all the legislation concerning labour; it is in a worse mess to-day than it was two years ago. They wanted a new minister of labour, and none of the hon. members on the other side of the house who have been associated with industry or have had something to do with labour was considered fit. I see the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser). I say and have said before they could not have got a better man in the cabinet for minister of labour or anything else, because he is the most dynamic personality I have met for a long time. He may be ruthless in his politics, but from long association with him I would say that he never went after anything that he did not get.

There, Mr. Speaker, is the picture that we have of this great national government.

The hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) referred the other day to the farmers. This is becoming a serious question. In our district farms are being sold out; farmers are being taken to the training camps; their sons may get two postponements and then they are told there will be no further postponement and they do not know what to do. These men do not want to shirk their duty. All they want is for someone to say: "This is the job you ought to do." They say: "Let them tell us whether we should stay on the farm or go into the army, but at least give us some leadership." But there is no one to do it. Every time one mentions selective service the idea of conscription comes up, and everyone thinks: That means we are going to grab all the man-power in this country and put it in the fighting forces. It is nothing of the kind. Hon. members know that. We should select men and women for the job they can do best in this war. There is a great army of men, fifty to fifty-five years of age, who cannot get into industry, who cannot get into the armed forces. These men want something to do. They feel disappointed and frustrated because they cannot get into something that will help the war effort. Yet when men are needed for special war jobs and the civil service is filled up with thousands of extra employees, these men are given no consideration because they are too old to come under the act. Since these jobs are only temporary, these are the men that should be taken into the service, thus releasing others who are young and can go into the forces or into other jobs.

I referred to the fact that recruiting had fallen down. We are facing a very serious problem. Now the government are trying a new scheme; they are going to issue dress suits for the soldiers. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver), in a speech in his own county, before the Burlington Branch of the Canadian Legion, said that there will be no difficulty after these new suits are issued; we will get plenty of recruits for the army then. Well, I do not think it is going to have that effect. But I suppose if it fails the next thing we will do will be to give each soldier a wardrobe trunk and a valet and see if that will help.

There is a very serious aspect to this matter. We are going to supply the soldiers with an extra uniform. When this was decided upon was it simply a promise by the Department of National Defence without taking counsel with the Department of Munitions and Supply? I warn this government that within a few months if we are not careful, there will be a serious shortage of the wools required for military goods; we may not have any more of them in the country. Our men do not want this dress suit, and it would be far better for the government and more pleasing to the soldiers if the government said: Here is the price of that suit; take it and use it for yourself."

So, Mr. Speaker, I think I am expressing the feeling of the great majority of the people of Ontario when I say that the people of this country would be satisfied and glad to have the government say to them in this all-out war effort, "We are going to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act and see that every available man and woman is used in this war in one way or another." The government have power already to conscript —if you want to call it that—money, factories, material wealth.

An hon. MEMBER: They are not doing it.

Mr. HOMUTH: But they have the power. That is another promise they are not carrying out. All they have to do is get the added power to use the man-power of this country for overseas service. I am prepared, I know every hon. member in this party is prepared, and I think most hon. members on this side of the house are prepared, to support the Prime Minister in such a move. If he will bring down a bill to-day to that effect we will give him wholehearted support. I am prepared to support him or any other leader or any party in this house that will see that we have an all-out war effort. We are not fighting to-day simply to protect territory that is ours; we are not fighting an aggressor who has only territorial designs; we are fighting the bloodiest bunch of bandits ever let loose on this world. To-day we see the march of this militant godless force, and it is going to take everything we have to conquer it. Let us then do the job that as freemen we should do.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer briefly to two matters only, the questions of man-power and the plebiscite, both of which were mentioned in the speech from the throne.

It must be apparent to everyone to-day that the question of the proper allocation of man-power to provide the proper men for the farm, the forest, the mine, the factory, the fisheries and the army, is the most vital question facing this house. During the past few months high ranking military officers have made many speeches throughout this country with regard to the need of men for the armed forces. To any hon. member who resides in an agricultral district the sorry plight of the farmer to-day must be clear. In the county of Hastings, in which I reside, they produced over 9,500,000 pounds of cheese in 1941, the record for all Ontario, and an even greater production is planned for 1942. But I would point out that in my county many cheesemakers have been called up under the present system of selecting men for compulsory service. It is quite true that these cheesemakers may obtain exemption for short periods, but, as we all know, these exemptions finally come to an end, and sooner or later the cheesemaker must report to the training centre. One must realize that cheese factories must plan their production for at least a year ahead; and if these factories are to maintain this enormously increased production, they must be assisted. The same thing applies to the farmer, who has been asked and encouraged to increase his acreage under cultivation, to increase his stock, and so on. In many instances he finds that no help is available, while his sons are called up for training. The same thing applies to the lumbering industry in the counties of Hastings and Peterborough. Many camps are not operating there during this winter, for the simple reason that no men are available, and also because the lumber operator cannot compete with wages paid by industrial concerns.

A proper system of selective compulsory training would have the effect of placing every man and woman in this country in the place where he or she can best serve to further our war effort. As long ago as March, 1941, I advocated in this house a policy of that kind, and even urged that conscription for overseas service was the only way to fill the need with regard to supplying man-power.

At that time it was almost treason even to mention the word "conscription" in this house, and I was told by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) that my words would tend only to create disunity. Yet to-day the minister himself must know better than any other hon. member the serious need and lack of men for the army. He knows of the strenuous efforts being made by the various district officers to obtain the men required. Our general staff must know of the situation. Why, then, are we waiting to take the proper action that will ensure all necessary man-power for our armed forces? The Hong Kong expedition is only one incident showing the serious lack of trained men; and our so-called reserve army units, which the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) so loves to set out in his monthly blue-book, in many instances exist only on paper. Perhaps it would be just as well not even to mention the equipment the average reserve unit has for training purposes. The methods used at some of the training centres, which pride themselves on obtaining one hundred per cent of their men for active service, are little credit to a democratic country. The underhand methods of compulsion and coercion would be more credit to the government of nazi Germany. But this is just another example of the tragic need of men for the armed forces and the lengths to which this government will go to obtain these men instead of facing the true facts.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other hon. members may make excuses and explanations, may becloud the issue with smoke-screens as lawyers and politicians love to do, but the fact remains that men are needed at once for our armies overseas. You may call it conscription, selective service or whatever name you choose, but the need for man-power is the vital, urgent need of the hour. Why, then, should we not, as members of parliament, face this paramount issue and here and now set up the proper machinery to ensure all branches of our armed forces a steady, regulated supply of man-power? When the government of Canada declared war in September, 1939, and decided to send a force overseas, I submit that every member of parliament and every citizen of this dominion assumed an obligation to support those boys with clothing, food, arms, equipment, and the finest of weapons in unlimited quantities. We assumed the further obligation to support them with all needed reinforcements for any emergency, no matter how drastic.

The Prime Minister has spoken about broken pledges, and no doubt much more will be said in this house on the same subject. I should like to point out to all hon. members that a pledge, express or implied, was given by every member of this house and every citizen of Canada on the day war was declared, to every man and boy who enlisted for overseas service. I submit that this pledge must have preference over every other commitment or pledge, and must be honoured to the full limit of our resources. This country is facing a grave national emergency, the first in our history. At such a time, when the very existence and safety of the state are at stake, the rights and privileges of individuals, the observance of pledges, commitments, promises and everything of that kind, must be ruthlessly cast aside, and the proper authorities must take whatever steps are necessary to ensure the preservation of the state.

Have we then, as members of parliament and as citizens of Canada, no duty to our men overseas? Are we at this late date to waste more precious time and money in the holding of a plebiscite to determine whether or not we are going to supply those boys with reinforcements? In the event that the majority of the people of this dominion vote in the negative, what is to happen? Are we then to withdraw all our forces from beyond the seas? Or are we to say to the boys, "No further aid will be sent you. You will get no further help from home. You will just have to do the very best you can with what you have?" Surely no hon. member will even attempt to argue against supporting our troops in every possible way, to the very limit of our resources.

Many hon. members are veterans of the war of 1914-18. I appeal to them, irrespective of the party or group to which they belong, to rise in this house and denounce this treacherous betrayal of our boys overseas. Such hon. members know what war means, because they helped to pay the ghastly price that all free men were called upon to pay between 1914 and 1918. Many hon. members still carry on their bodies marks and scars which formed part of that price.

Any hon. members who went through the battle of the Somme, who took part in the fighting at Courcelette, the fighting in Death Valley, or the storming of Regina trench or Sugar trench will easily recall what their unit looked like when they returned to Tower hill or the Chalk pits. They will remember the immediate need of new clothing, new equipment, and, above all, the need of immediate reinforcements to enable their unit to carry on as a fighting force. Or do they recall that grim Easter morning in the snow-storm at Vimy Ridge? Many units had tough going that day, and the days that followed. And they will recall that many reinforcements were urgently needed.

Any member of this house who went through Passchendaele will never be able to erase the memory of the mud, the filth and the slime of that man-made hell-on-earth, for Passchendaele showed better than any other scrap how men and equipment can be used up. Hon. members who went through these scraps, what would you have thought if, after coming back from Courcelette or Passchendaele, with your unit cut to pieces, you had been told by your commanding officer that the parliament of Canada had decided to hold a plebiscite to decide whether or not further help or reinforcements should be sent to aid you? If anyone had dared utter such words you would not have been able to find fitting and proper language in your extensive army vocabulary to express your disgust and contempt for such a cowardly course. But you knew in those long-ago days in France that the parliament of Canada, the people of Canada, your own kinfolk, would not fail you. Why? Because they were Canadians all through, people who had born and bred into their beings the finest of traditions which, through the ages, have brought imperishable glory to our empire, traditions which have carried our flag through the centuries, across the seven seas and to the far-flung corners of the earth. Our flag has always come back, untarnished and unsullied, because it has always stood for justice and freedom.

So to-day all hon. members who are war veterans have a double responsibility; for to-day the boys of the new generation are facing even greater odds than we faced in the last war. As members of parliament you now have the authority in your own hands; for this parliament is the only legal body in Canada clothed with authority to take the necessary steps to provide and supply all needed aid at once to our troops overseas. You now have the opportunity to protest in the house against this shameful betrayal of your comrades. You have the opportunity to place yourself on record as disapproving of this betrayal, and by so doing you will not be branded for the rest of your lives as persons who shirked their responsibility, as persons who failed in their duty to their war comrades. Can hon. members who are war veterans feel that they are holding high the flaming torch thrown to us from failing hands? Are we, as war veterans, holding that torch high? Are we living up to the high ethical code set by our former comrades who sleep to-day in foreign fields, under the nazi heel? We state that we fight for democracy, to preserve our way of life, our democratic way of life. One of the things we wish to preserve is our free parliament, one of the symbols of democracy. Yet we are asking those boys, who at this very hour stand guard at the outposts of our empire, the boys who man the ramparts of that little island called Britain, which has been described by one writer as the last outpost of freedom in the old world, boys who are willing to give their very lives that we may remain free men, to fight with their lives to preserve this parliament—a parliament without enough back-bone or courage to take at once the necessary action to ensure adequate support for those boys! I can easily imagine what the boys overseas will think and say when they hear about the plebiscite. I can hear their expressions of contempt and disgust for this parliament. No doubt, if the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should visit the troops again, he would get a reception slightly different from the last one. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the whole question of national selective service can and should be settled by this parliament at once, and should not be submitted to a plebiscite.

Much has been said in this house during the past year about national unity, but I submit that if the plans for this plebiscite proceed, such a wedge will be driven through this country that we shall never again in our lifetime know what unity in Canada means. To hon. members who come from the province of Quebec, I would say that I have heard many speeches in the house and have read other speeches in the press delivered by leaders of your church and state in which they have emphasized the desire, the need and the right of the French race to preserve all those things of life which are so dear to them, such as your religion, your language, your customs, your culture and all the other traditions that made France a great nation. I do not quarrel with those speeches. It is only natural that you should wish to preserve those things, but I would point out that those very things you cherish so much are the things you will lose in the event of defeat; for under the so-called new order of Hitler and Mussolini there is no place for those things you wish to preserve. Your rights and privileges, which have been preserved and guarded under our democratic government, would vanish. Are they not worth fighting for to-day? No matter what your political leaders have told you in the past, the opportunity is given to-day for the two great races in Canada, irrespective of the material things which may divide them, to unite in this great crusade and side by side destroy this barbarian Hitler who threatens to destroy us.

An opportunity is given that may never come again to unite the whole of Canada. All our past differences, all our past hatreds, prejudices, self-interests, and quarrels may be forever eradicated in this new common sacrifice to preserve all those decent things of life that free men and women cherish. If we all unite in this crusade—all classes, all creeds, all races—we shall demonstrate to the world and to ourselves a unity that the years to come will never be able to break.

On the other hand if you refuse to join, and unreservedly place all your resources of wealth and man-power at the service of the state, in the common cause, such action in my opinion will only drive the wedge deeper through the national life of this country, and there will emerge after the war such bitterness, hatred, and division that no leader, no government or group will ever again be able to achieve even the semblance of unity in this Canada of ours.

The function of a government is to lead, and this government has failed in that vital respect. A government that promises its people and its allies a total war and a total war effort, and then for any reason fails to make it, is guilty of a betrayal, and is worthy of the disdain and contempt of all honest men. During the past two years we have seen so many governments fall, and, worse, betray their people into bondage, because they failed in the purpose of government, and failed to carry into action the fine promise of their words. All men in free-thinking countries to-day regard France as having been betrayed internally by a weak and blind government policy, by a government that talked and had great efforts on paper, and that was pitiably weak and rotten behind a Maginot line, also great and impregnable on paper. These men who betrayed France are condemned to-day, they are called traitors to their country. Is any man in any country who follows those policies of inertia and procrastination and talks instead of acts any less a traitor? I say that behind the Maginot line of the Pacific and the Atlantic this government is deliberately fostering the same supine belief in its efforts and programmes that led to the fall of France. Time and action are on the side of the enemy, and he who wastes time and leads astray the effort of his country is a traitor to his people.

To-day our kinfolk in Australia cry aloud for help, for men and material, and we, supposedly a proud nation, give her what? We give her words, not men; a plebiscite instead of weapons; resolutions instead of action. At Hong Kong those gallant boys from Canada added another name to the scroll in Canada's hall of fame. Against terrific odds those boys of Canada played the part of men on the world's stage. Were the men who fought and died or were taken prisoners at Hong Kong comforted in their dying or in their prison camps with the thought that the help they so badly needed may come some day, if and when our government can play the part of a government? Those gallant men who have been fighting in Malaya, dying in the swamps and jungles for lack of support, for lack of men and weapons, will it comfort them to know that after a plebiscite, after months of delay and waste, this government may give the total war effort it has pledged already to its allies?

Within two days after the attack on Pearl Harbour, our good neighbours to the south were further ahead with the allocation of man-power than we are after nearly thirty months of war. At this late date, with the yellow rats from Japan daily coming closer to our shores, we are to have a plebiscite to decide whether or not we shall do anything about fighting them before they reach our shores. How can we expect our good neighbours to the south to have any faith or confidence in us or respect for us as an ally? Are we Canadians the type of people who are content to sit quietly with folded hands and criminal complacency and allow our allies, the Russians, the Dutch, the Chinese, the Aussies, the New Zealanders, the British, the boys from South Africa and the Yanks to do our proper share of the fighting?

If this plebiscite is held, for years to come the people of Canada will be looked down upon with scorn, contempt, disgust and hatred by all decent free people throughout the world because of our cowardly action at this critical hour. Does the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) expect that the spending of millions of dollars on a needless plebiscite will help him in raising the needed money for the new war loan or help the future sale of war savings stamps?

In conclusion, I wish to place on record the expressed feelings of the citizens of my riding and myself as being absolutely opposed to this plebiscite. We condemn in every way the action of this government in having plebiscite which is a comtemptible, cowardly betrayal of our boys overseas and an abrogation of the rights of responsible government.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in conformity with convention and in all sincerity I wish to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address upon their eloquence and the subject matter of their speeches.

During the last few months the hand of death has been laid upon this house. The honoured senior member of this house, Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, has passed on and has left a vacancy which will be hard to fill. He was a comparatively young man who had endeared himself both to the members of this house and to the people of this country. He had reached a high place in the councils of our land. It goes to show that—

The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things;
There is no armour against fate;
Death lays his icy hand on kings.

We are engaged in the greatest war in the world's history. Whatever causes there may have been for this war in its early days, it is now clear that it is one of aggression, that our enemies are out for the domination of the world. This throws upon people living in this age a great obligation, the obligation of resisting aggression in the name of religion, in the name of our way of life, in the name of the freedom and the liberties which we have enjoyed. Surely we are the custodians of what has been gained in the past, and we must save for posterity some of those precious rights which were gained by our forefathers at great cost. This is the critical stage, and those who may live in this world long after we have gone will look back upon our actions at this time. A great responsibility has been thrown upon us, but at the same time a great opportunity has been given to us. Perhaps I can express this in a few lines of poetry:

Ye that have faith to look with fearless eyes
Beyond the tragedy of a world at strife,
And trust that out of night and death shall rise
The dawn of ampler life;
Rejoice, whatever anguish rend your heart,
That God has given you for a priceless dower,
To live in these great times and have your part
In Freedom's crowning hour;
That you may tell your sons who see the light
High in the heavens—their heritage to take—
"I saw the powers of Darkness put to flight,
I saw the Morning break."

In this titanic struggle we have twenty-six nations banded together. We have the gallant fighters of Russia; we have the democratic English-speaking nations all in the fight together. At this time no one can doubt that the fostering of good-will, of friendship and of neighbourliness between Canada and the United States was statesmanship. No one can deny that Canada, acting as a liaison between the British commonwealth and the United States, was working out a great and glorious accomplishment. The one man who deserves striking credit for that accomplishment is the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). The names of Churchill and Roosevelt will live long, but with them will stand out forever the name of the Prime Minister of Canada.

I believe I express the views of practically all hon. members in this chamber when I say that the ambition of the people of Canada is to contribute to this war to the utmost limit of their capacities. The only question is how this can best be accomplished. There have been those who have emphasized unduly certain aspects of the war effort, but we know that up to the present the organization has been magnificent. Pressing toward the goal we must make decisions in the light of the knowledge we have and of the circumstances that exist at the time. We are going to have a plebiscite, whatever the result may be; and surely in furtherance of our determination for an all-out war effort we should give those who are in the best position to know the facts a free hand to decide how best we can make our contribution.

I wish to take advantage of the latitude allowed in this debate to draw to the attention of the house certain subjects which are of interest to the district whence I come. The beet sugar industry is one of which I have spoken many times. The investment in this industry means a great deal to the irrigated districts in the drought-stricken area. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has promised that serious consideration will be given to the expansion of that industry. In rural districts the people are very active at this time. In the very smallest communities there are Red Cross organizations where you will find women knitting comforts for the soldiers, and war savings campaigns are carried on continuously. The people are also very much interested in the salvage campaign. Up to the present it has been difficult to accomplish very much because of the high costs of getting salvage from where it is available to the place where it can be made use of. Recently as a result of many conferences between the department and the railway officers a very reasonable freight rate has been arranged for carload lots of 30,000 pounds and upwards, and some sixteen sortation centres have been selected in different parts of Canada so that the salvage of rubber, bones, bottles, shoes, metals, paper, magazines and things of that sort can now go on, and there is reasonable prospect of making a contribution that is really worth while.

There is a great deal of discouragement and dissatisfaction among the farming people of this country. Within a few days, Mr. Speaker, a delegation of some 400 or 450 farmers, mostly from the province of Saskatchewan, will arrive in Ottawa. There has been collected from people who have signed petitions something like $35,000 or $40,000 to bring two trainloads of delegates here. That in itself is one indication of dissatisfaction. Another is the indignation meetings which are held by the farmers from time to time. The statistics show that there is a very unequal distribution of income in this country. About 33.9 per cent of the able-bodied people of this country are engaged in the farming industry, and although that makes up one-third of the population, they received in the year 1940 only 11.1 per cent of the national income. There is a discrepancy there which should not exist, a discrepancy which is causing much dissatisfaction throughout the length and breadth of the country.

This government has tried to increase, by a system of bonusing, the revenues which the farmer receives. Quite a number of bonus schemes have been put into operation. There is the wheat acreage reduction bonus, a supplementary bonus of seventy-five cents per acre up to a maximum of 200 acres, and there is the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Yet there is much disappointment because of the slowness with which these payments come through. I have stood at the post office and have seen farmers, poorly clad and certainly not well off, watch the mail come in, wait until it is sorted, and then stand up at the wicket hoping that their bonus cheque has arrived; and all too often I have seen them turn away very much disappointed because their cheque had not come. The postmasters tell me that this is a very common occurrence.

There are so many causes of delay. I might enumerate a few of them. Sometimes the proper description of the land is not given. Sometimes several members of the family have applied for the wheat acreage bonus on the same land. Sometimes there is a landlord's claim. Sometimes the officer has overlooked the notification; I know of whole districts which were denied the bonus because the proper official had not made the notification in time. There are 250,000 farmers and it takes a considerable time to get in contact with them all. The cheques are going out at the rate of 5,000 a day, but even at that rate it takes months to reach all the farmers. Then again some of them get a mere pittance when they expect a substantial sum. This may not be a tragedy to the average man in an office; it may not matter much whether he puts the cheque into one pigeon-hole or another, but to the man on the farm with no money and no credit, whose store bill is overdue, whose taxes are not paid, and who needs money badly for his family's requirements, it is indeed a very serious thing. So that while the people are grateful for these bonuses and feel that they are serving a good purpose, yet the slowness with which they come, and the technical details which must first be complied with, have caused a lot of disappointment among the farmers.

The cattle-raising people of the west have greatly benefited by the reduced duty on cattle going into the United States. There is a ceiling now on the price of meat sold in retail stores, and there is some doubt as to the availability of a sufficient quantity to meet retail requirements; but I do want to impress upon the government the necessity of not interfering at all with our tariff arrangements with the United States, because that is something that has given fresh life to the ranching industry. I do hope, notwithstanding the influence of other parties to the deal, that our market will not be curtailed or an embargo put on or a change in duty made.

The farmers are asking for two things, and they need two things in order to sustain their industry. One would be something approaching parity prices. If the man who grows wheat cannot recover his costs he cannot stay in business. The second thing that is needed is something for the man whose crop fails. We know something of the cost of cultivating an acre of land.

The cost of producing a bushel of wheat depends upon the production yield of that acre of land. Professor Hope, in 1938, gave these figures in dealing with the cost of producing a bushel of wheat, including interest charges. First, if the yield is 20 bushels to the acre, the half-section farmer can grow a bushel for 72 cents; the section farmer, 62 cents; and the two-section farmer, 51 cents. Twenty bushels is a tremendously large crop over a large part of that country. Suppose the yield is 13 bushels an acre, then the figures would be: for the half-section farmer, 99 cents; for the section farmer, 79 cents; and for the two-section farmer, 71 cents. Those are the prices at the elevator. The guaranteed price at Fort William is 70 cents for No. 1 northern, so that the present price is far below these estimated costs.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has recognized that the man who has no wheat to sell must live and cannot be expected to live on charity or on relief, and so these bonuses have helped that man and made it possible for him to get along. But the tremendous task which faces the officers in Regina and Edmonton does make for delay, disappointment and discontent among a good many farmers.

For instance, take the practice of allowing land to rest fallow, where the land is light and all blows away when summer-fallowed. The custom is to leave the stubble to hold the moisture during the winter and to do the ploughing during the following spring. It was definitely announced that if that happened to be the custom in a district, the summer-fallow bonus would be paid. Later on, the Department of Justice or some other department in Ottawa decided that it could not be done, and this was a hard blow for many who live on light land. In the meantime, in some way, some had been paid, and that made for more dissatisfaction. The minister and the committee have, however, succeeded in arriving at an arrangement by which some of the bonuses on this rest land can be paid, and it will be a great relief to many who have been dependent upon it to be paid at last.

In southern Alberta an area of about thirty miles square has been set aside as a British block. About 126 farmers who lived there for thirty years have been forced to move off that block, and they were paid a reasonable price for the buildings. They were given a reasonable amount to move their stock, but were given only $4 an acre for seeded land and $1 an acre for grazing land. They planned their spring operations, and many of them decided to cooperate with the government and reduce their acreage. Then they were moved off this land in June and July. The officials who bought that land from them, although they had no right to do so, indicated that they would be paid their wheat acreage reduction bonus. The Department of Agriculture accepted applications for that bonus, and yet when the farmers were moved off the land they were told that they did not qualify for the bonus. This was a harsh decision and it has caused much heart-burning. It is very unfair. Take the man who was patriotic and listened to the plea to reduce his acreage. He gets only $1 an acre for his unseeded land. Take the fellow who said, "I don't care what the government say, I am going to put in a crop." He has received $4 an acre for his land.

These men who, in good faith, entered into an agreement with the government and carried out their part of that agreement in so far as they could, should receive some consideration. Of course, they did not do summer-fallowing because they were not there, having been moved off the land through no will or desire of their own. This is an injustice which should still be reviewed in the hope of giving these people what in my opinion is their right. They became attached to their homes and lived there with their neighbours for thirty years, enjoying companionship and sociability in a splendid community, and now they are scattered like the Acadians described in Evangeline. They have not enough money to settle in other places. Many of them spent a good deal of the money they did receive, and altogether they have a grievance. I want to make this appeal to the minister to redress that grievance and give these people further consideration.

In closing, may I say that there is general prosperity throughout the urban parts of the country. People are employed; money is circulating very well, and yet forty-five per cent of our national income is going to war purposes—and we may have to increase our contribution to the war. My suggestion is that soldiers, farmers, munition workers, members of parliament, civilians and everyone else should get down to the same level, and to the same rate of pay, so that we shall be making a contribution in proportion to our ability to contribute. Then, when victory is won, let us maintain the high rate of taxation; let us maintain the high rate of employment, and instead of buying war supplies—we hope we shall not need so many—let us build roads and houses, clear slums and provide proper homes, a proper standard of nutrition and an adequate standard of health for the people. Then we shall emerge from this war in a better condition, and the sacrifices which we have made will not have been in vain.

On motion of Mr. Gershaw the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, January 29, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT

FREE RAILWAY TRANSPORTATION FOR MEMBERS OF HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: This bill amends the Railway Act to provide that members of his majesty's forces shall be carried free on all railway trains in Canada for the period of the war.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GASOLINE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT AS TO PROPOSED SYSTEM OF RATIONING EFFECTIVE APRIL 1

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply if he is prepared to make a statement on Canada's gasoline rationing system, which it was announced some weeks ago was to go into effect on April 1. If not to-day, when may the house and the country expect a statement?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Preparations for the rationing of gasoline are proceeding, with the intention of bringing it into force on April 1. The need for this rationing is becoming more apparent every day as additional tanker tonnage is sunk along our coast and as the demands of the army services increase. The details will be announced shortly by the oil controller. It is a highly involved matter, and while I could bring the information to the house I think the purpose would be served equally well by the oil controller explaining the situation through the public press. I discussed the matter with him this morning, and I know it is his intention to take such action within the next day or two. If my hon. friend so desires I shall be glad to get the release and present it to the house before it is given to the press.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister not think it should come to the house first?

Mr. HOWE: It is rather involved, and I doubt if a reading here would help very much.

REDISTRIBUTION

INQUIRY AS TO PROCEDURE IN VIEW OF CENSUS RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the announcement made yesterday by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) regarding the population of the various provinces as revealed by the census, and in view of the effect thereof upon the membership of this house, will the Prime Minister inform us whether it is the intention of the government to proceed with redistribution at this session of parliament?

Perhaps I might be permitted to indicate my own view, in advance of his. It is that we shall probably have enough to do in attending to matters directly concerned with the war without undertaking this very onerous duty of redistribution.

[Mr. Church.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my hon. friend that up to the present the government has not considered the matter but will do so in the light of the observations he has just made.

WHEAT

REPORTED SALE TO UNITED STATES BUYERS FOR LATER DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce based upon a report appearing in the issue of the Winnipeg Tribune which came to hand to-day. This report states that Canadian wheat is being purchased by United States buyers for shipment south of the line after the opening of navigation; that warehouse receipts are being taken by the United States buyers, and that, according to reliable authorities, the wheat is being hedged in the Chicago market.

My questions are these: From whom are these United States buyers securing these warehouse receipts, since it is cash wheat? Why is it being hedged in Chicago? What part did the Canadian wheat board play in these trades, and is there any possibility of this wheat coming into competition with the export of other Canadian wheat to the United Kingdom?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be glad to give attention to the questions asked by the hon. member and bring down a reply as soon as possible.

PRAIRIE FARM INCOME PAYMENTS—ORDER IN COUNCIL P.C. 8126

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to draw attention to order in council P.C. 8126, dated October 22, 1941, but published only on January 23, 1942, in an extra edition of the Canada Gazette. My first question to the Minister of Agriculture is, why was the publication of this order in council so long delayed? What other steps were taken to bring its provisions to the attention of the interested public? The order in council provides for the expenditure of $20,000,000 by way of additional payments to increase the income of farmers in the spring wheat area of western Canada. I should like the minister to explain the real purpose of this order in council, and the relationship of the payments to be made under it to the $35,000,000 provided under schedule B of Appropriation Act No. 4 of 1941. May I also ask him to tell this house why those provisions were made by order in council instead of being brought before parliament at its November sitting in the usual and proper manner.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think I had better leave the answer until to-morrow. I am not familiar with the reasons why the document was not published at an earlier day.

DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME

APPLICATION OF ORDER TO EASTERN SECTION OF CANADA

On the orders of the day.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. It has reference to the question of daylight saving. I should like to explain at the outset that I am not personally opposed to daylight saving, but in view of the situation as I understand it in eastern Canada I believe this question should be asked.

On Monday, January 26, order in council P.C. 547 was passed under the provisions of the War Measures Act, whereby it was ordered that as from Monday, February 9 next, until otherwise ordered, the time for all purposes in Canada shall be one hour in advance of accepted standard time. The order recites that on September 20, 1940, daylight saving time was continued for the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and that the Secretary of State reported that it would be advantageous to the war effort of Canada to have daylight saving time observed in all the time zones in Canada.

May I point out to the Secretary of State that the major part of that portion of Canada within the Atlantic standard time zone—roughly speaking, the portion of Canada lying east of the international boundary at the Saint Croix river—is now thirty-six minutes, as at Saint John, New Brunswick—ahead of true sun time; and to have Atlantic daylight saving time imposed in that zone will put practically all the people of New Brunswick, and a great portion of the people of Nova Scotia, ninety-six minutes ahead of true sun time. When the terms of the order were being considered, was any consideration given to that position? To-day we are in the happy position of substantially conserving daylight by thirty-six minutes, and are operating on the same time as the large central provinces, which is most convenient. It may be that other factors, such as transportation problems, time tables, and so on, affect the position; but as at present advised I suggest that the position be reviewed so far as it relates to the maritime provinces.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was good enough to give me notice of the question he has just asked. Unfortunately I have not had sufficient time to go into the technical matter he has raised, namely, the application of the order to certain sections operating on Atlantic standard time. There is one matter he suggests, however, which, I believe, cannot possibly be correct, namely, that whereas the western boundary of the zone of that portion of the maritimes which is on Atlantic standard time is thirty-six minutes faster than sun time, that condition would apply wholly throughout the maritimes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is because we are nearer that meridian. It goes out into the sea.

Mr. McLARTY: The thirty-six minutes would be accounted for by its being nearer the westerly meridian where the time changes. In view, however, of the concluding sentence of my hon. friend's question I believe it would be better if I were to defer my answer until to-morrow or until the earliest possible opportunity.

ANTHRACITE COAL

EXEMPTION FROM CUSTOMS DUTIES AND WAR EXCHANGE TAX WHEN IMPORTED INTO MARITIMES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a further question, directed to the Minister of Finance, and based upon order in council P.C. 394, dated January 20, 1942—just last week. This order in council, which was passed on the minister's recommendation, provides for the exemption from customs duties and war exchange tax of anthracite coal when imported into the maritime provinces between January 1 and April 30, 1942. I should like to ask the minister the reasons for the passing of this order in council, the reasons for restricting its operation to the maritime provinces, and also whether it is not anticipated that this exemption will discriminate against the coal producers and coal miners of the maritimes. May I ask also why this exemption, which expressly suspends a provision of an act of parliament, was made by order in council one day before the session was resumed? Why was it not brought before parliament in the usual and proper manner?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I counted correctly, the leader of the opposition has asked four questions. I shall proceed to answer them.

He asks first why there has been an exemption of anthracite from customs duties on coal entering the maritime provinces. The reason is that the freight on anthracite moving by water is very much greater than it was a few months ago. If importers of anthracite coal are to be able to continue to sell anthracite under the price ceiling, something will have to be done for them. Assistance could be given to them either by way of subsidy or by way of tax or tariff remission. It was decided that tariff remission would amount to about the proper sum to enable them to continue to sell under the price ceiling. The same necessity does not exist in the case of anthracite into other parts of Canada, because it does not move by water as it does into the maritime provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It does not all move by water to the maritimes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Pretty much. This applies only to anthracite moving by ship, waterborne coal which comes to seaports. It was considered it would be perfectly practicable to limit the concession to the maritime provinces, because there would be no danger of this coal coming into the martime provinces and then being loaded on cars and shipped to other parts of Canada.

With regard to any possible prejudice to producers of coal in the maritime provinces, as the hon. member knows, no hard coal is produced there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Quite so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe anthracite will be no more dangerous as a competitive factor in the coal situation now than it was before, when the ocean rates were so much lower than they are to-day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The fifty cents duty has kept some out.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes, but freights were very much lower when the fifty cents was imposed.

With regard to the final question, as to why it was done by order in council, I would point out that it was done in that way pursuant either to the War Measures Act or to the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act; I am not sure which. Anyway, there was ample statutory authority for proceeding, and it was done by order in council because it had to be done. If we had brought it before parliament on the first day of the session we would not have reached it for a long time. I do not know what else we could have done, because it was a budgetary sort of thing, and action could not be deferred until the spring or early summer. It had to be done right away.

RIGHT HON. ARTHUR MEIGHEN

PRESS REPORT RESPECTING RESIGNATION AS MEMBER OF THE SENATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I should like to ask a question with reference to a news item which appeared in the press not long ago. Is it possible to learn whether all the formalities in connection with the resignation of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen as senator have been completed; and if so, if his resignation has been accepted and, if so, if it is final?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so far as I am aware, all formalities have been complied with. Senator Meighen's resignation was tendered to His Excellency the Governor General. His excellency asked my advice with respect to the acceptance of it. I advised its acceptance. It has been accepted, and so far as I am able to recall, all the formalities were completed over a week ago.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you very much; very good.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ADJOURNMENT AT SIX O'CLOCK ON FRIDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister if the government has given any consideration to the question of Friday evening sittings?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would say to my hon. friend that for such time as I have been in this parliament the house has usually adjourned on Friday evening at the end of the first week of the session, and if it is accepted by the house that custom will prevail to-morrow by the government moving the adjournment. With respect to the session as a whole, I have every reason to believe that it would be advisable and would meet with the general approval of the house if we followed the practice of last session. Because of the war we are all working with a greater intensity of effort and have a much larger number of problems to deal with than has been the case at any other time. On occasions the government may wish to have the house continue its sitting on Friday night, but unless there should be a special reason for doing otherwise it is the intention of the government to have the adjournment moved each Friday at six o'clock.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

RADIO RECEIVING AND TRANSMITTING SETS—CAMERAS AND FIREARMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health a question which I understand comes under his department. Has the government taken away all receiving and transmitting sets, cameras and firearms from all the Japanese residing in Canada?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): That would not come under my department. The only connection I have with that matter is the fact that I acted as chairman of a conference between certain gentlemen who came down here from British Columbia and a number of permanent officials of various departments in Ottawa. The question of firearms, cameras and receiving sets was discussed at the conference and a recommendation made to the cabinet. The Prime Minister issued a statement in regard to receiving sets and cameras, but whether or not actual action has been taken by the mounted police upon that enunciation of policy I am not able to say at the moment.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, January 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, before beginning my address I should like to read two telegrams which I have just received. The first is from Mr. Lidstone, secretary of the Toronto business men's branch of the Canadian Legion. It reads:

Toronto business men's branch of the Canadian Legion in meeting strongly urge you to oppose plebiscite and to support legion policy of total war effort including conscription for overseas service.

The other is from Colonel C. E. Reynolds, president of the Canadian Corps Association It reads:

I ask you to request our Prime Minister to beg Churchill, Wavell and Prime Minister Curtin to hang on. Canada is voting in three months.

After listening to the excellent speeches of the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I could not help but regret that I too had not had the advantage of a legal training. May I congratulate them both upon the presentation of their cases. On the day that the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) spoke the press reported that both the Kiwanis club and the local council of women of Brantford had passed resolutions disapproving the proposed plebiscite. In addition the Brantford trades and labour council is reported to have wired the member expressing their disapproval. I venture to say that if he has had anything like the overwhelming mail I have had from my constituents he knows the extent of the support for compulsory selective service in his own riding. I think I am justified in saying that when the hon. member spoke on Friday last he was speaking as a supporter of the government rather than in his capacity of representative of those who elected him. I presume he spoke again for the government when he said, as reported on page 16 of Hansard:

Man-power for our army is not now our most pressing need.

If man-power for the army is not so urgent, why did the district commanding officer of military district No. 1, London, Ontario, write on January 6, 1942, to a married man with three children who had been rejected three times as unfit for service and put in category E, as follows:

1. Some time ago you offered your services for enlistment into the Canadian active army but were rejected as being medically unfit.

2. Recently, medical categories have been revised very materially and some causes for rejection completely eliminated.

3. Your previous offer of service is appreciated and as the need for men is now urgent, it is suggested you would wish to take advantage of this opportunity to have your medical status reviewed.

4. If such is the case, would you be good enough to present yourself at Wolseley barracks, London, or St. Luke's barracks, Windsor, at your earliest convenience.

5. If you have no way of getting to London, please advise this office or your nearest armoury, and an effort will be made to provide transportation.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my hon. friend to whom that letter was addressed?

Mr. BRUCE: The man does not want his name announced. This is the original paper from the recruiting officer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend must know that he has no right to use communications in the house unless he is prepared to give full particulars of any name that will authenticate the document.

Mr. BRUCE: For obvious reasons this man does not wish his name revealed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend cannot give the name, then he has no right to use the communication.

Mr. BRUCE: I do not propose to give his name.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: The other day the Prime Minister gave the figure for our active army as 260,000. I am reliably informed that of the so-called active army, at least 60,000 men are not available because they are employed as home guards or on the staffs of training establishments or hospitals. Surely it is improper to include those men. I should like also to call attention to the fact that in our coast defence forces we have many men who are known as "R" recruits, men who have been called up under the mobilization act but have failed to volunteer for overseas service. In my judgment it is a misrepresentation to suggest that those men are active service units.

Mr. RALSTON: I can assure my hon. friend that they are not included in the number on active service.

Mr. BRUCE: Of course I accept the minister's statement. In reply to a question which I asked yesterday as to whether units of the sixth division would be available to go to the assistance of the United States if they were attacked, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said in part, as reported on page 109 of Hansard:

> I want to say to him, however, that the units of these brigade groups would be available if it were considered advisable and necessary to send men to the United States, less any home defence personnel who were in those units who did not volunteer for that duty.

In other words, the commanding officer of these units would take his troops to the United States boundary, call a halt, and ask all "R" recruits to take three paces to the rear and drop out, since he could not ask them to serve outside Canada. If amongst these units there were several signallers, the line of communication would be put into confusion and our force rendered useless. Can anyone imagine a more ridiculous or perilous position for our troops to occupy? Would Great Britain be mobilizing her women if she had not reached the limit of her resources in man-power? Would United States troops be landing in Ireland if man-power was not needed by Britain?

I am not unmindful of the contribution which has already been made by our factories and our shipyards and of the splendid part labour has played, and I wish to commend all concerned, which includes, of course, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) for what he and they have achieved. But speaking as one who is trying to run a farm I have the greatest sympathy and admiration for the farmers who are still carrying on, producing foodstuffs in spite of the low prices and steadily mounting wages and the increasing difficulty in getting labour at all. Unless something is done for them it will have a serious effect on our food production programme—if we have one.

The hon. member for Brantford City compared our war effort with that of the United States. My answer to that comparison will be brief. The United States brought in universal compulsory selective service as soon as she declared war, and according to Mr. Winant, the United States Ambassador to Britain, speaking in London yesterday, the United States is now planning to have an army, not of 3,600,000, but of 7,000,000. The United States is preparing to attack; Canada is waiting to be attacked. Can anyone imagine a more humiliating position for any country to be in at this time of crisis, when within a few weeks the fury of the enemy will be descending upon us, to have its Prime Minister, knowing full well the needs after nearly two and a half years of war, transfer his responsibility to an uninformed electorate? When I heard the member for Brantford City supporting his chief, in spite of his declaration only a few days before that he was in favour of compulsory selective service, it reminded me of the story of another Macdonald, a Macdonald of revered memory at least on this side of the house. On one occasion when Doctor George Grant, then Principal of Queen's university, told Sir John A. Macdonald that he always supported him when he was right, Sir John replied: "The kind of support I prefer is that which is given me when I am wrong." Such a loyal supporter as the member for Brantford City must be appreciated at this time.

Referring to his western tour last August, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), as reported at page 47 of this session's Hansard, said:

> At the time of my tour of western Canada, prior to my visit to Britain, an attempt was made to raise the issue of conscription. A cloud no larger than a man's hand appeared in the political sky at Calgary and in some other of the western cities. I at once recognized that this was not due to a spontaneous movement on the part of the people themselves, but was rather the manifestation of a political movement carefully organized by opponents of the government, to force conscription to the fore as a political issue.

I wonder if the cloud to which he refers would not have been larger if his vision on emerging from the train had not been obscured by a large banner stretching across the street calling for conscription. The hostile reception which he received in that city, plus the selection of a new leader by the Conservative party and his immediate announcement of policy, plus the recent activities of an Ontario committee for total war, are given as reasons by the Prime Minister why he finds it expedient to have a plebiscite. But then he went on to say that the place to fight out this question is on the floor of the house. And later on he announced the plebiscite. I must confess that I am unable to follow his argument.

In his speech the other day the Prime Minister also said, at page 48 of Hansard:

> Outside parliament altogether, the political skies have now become so overcast with controversy, promoted by high-pressure methods and highly financed publicity, that the nature and extent of Canada's war effort is not only being obscured, but is in danger of being seriously impaired.

No doubt the Prime Minister refers to the recent movement in the province of Ontario for total war by the immediate enforcement of unrestricted compulsory selective service. When the Prime Minister uses the term "political pressure," he means by that, I presume, pressure from his political enemies. Would he put Mr. C. L. Burton in this category, or Mr. James Y. Murdoch? I think I am correct in saying that they are both life-long Liberals, yet they were joint chairmen with Mr. F. K. Morrow, a patriotic citizen and a prominent Roman Catholic whose name will be found in every philanthropic organization. The committee was strictly non-partisan and represented practically every social and patriotic organization in the province. May I refer to just a few members of that committee?

There was Mrs. Wallace Campbell, president of the Ontario division of the Red Cross and dominion chairman of the Red Cross women's war work committee. I should like to pay tribute to the outstanding contribution made by Mrs. Campbell to Canada's war effort by the wonderful leadership she has given to many thousands of women throughout Canada. Other members of the committee were Mrs. W. B. Horkins, dominion president of the Imperial Order of Daughters of the Empire; and Mrs. H. D. Warren, dominion commissioner of the Girl Guides of Canada; Mrs. Maud Miller, Ontario president of the Provincial Council of Women; Dr. W. E. Gallie, dean of the Medical Faculty of the University of Toronto; Dr. H. J. Cody, president of the University of Toronto; Bishop R. J. Renison, rector of St. Paul's Anglican Church, Toronto; Commissioner Orames of the Salvation Army; Sir Ernest MacMillan, president of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra; Hon. Mr. Biggs, a former minister of the Farmer-Liberal government of Ontario, Mr. Aubrey Davis, Mr. Elmer Davis, Mr. William Dryden, and Doctor Smirle Lawson, chief coroner for Ontario.

Do these names suggest political enemies of the Prime Minister and the Liberal party? I ask the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenize).

In referring to the work of this group of patriotic citizens, the Prime Minister speaks of the controversy being "promoted by high pressure methods and high financed publicity." What about the government's own political publicity advertising? What about the pamphlets, speeches and other things which are distributed, we are told, to 400,000 people?

I listened most carefully to the long and laboured effort of the Prime Minister on Monday last to justify the course he is taking. He failed miserably in his attempt to convince the public, as is evidenced in reading editorial comments and letters in the press.

I think I have shown that this demand for compulsory selective service comes not alone from Conservatives but from many of the Prime Minister's own personal Liberal friends. Does he not realize that it arises from a growing feeling of apprehension due to the extension of the war to this continent? Remember that the call from Ontario for conscription for a total war came after Japan's entry into the war.

Although the Prime Minister speaks of having first heard of this subject when he went west, may I remind him that I proposed it several months before in this house, and for my pains was severely rebuked by the Minister of National Defence.

In my opinion it is criminal folly, both from the standpoint of delay and that of dividing the country in the face of the enemy, for the government to hold a plebiscite at this time. How humiliated we must feel that recent events have justified the cartoon in the Montreal Gazette of January 23, wherein the Prime Minister is portrayed as a fireman in charge of the hose in front of a great conflagration, saying to his helper who is about to turn on the water hydrant, "Let's take a vote to see if we should turn it on full." Many of you have seen this cartoon; I do not suppose it will be reproduced in Hansard.

May I say again to the Prime Minister that conscription was not an issue in the last campaign. How could it have been an issue when both leaders were in agreement? To make it an issue, surely one party must oppose what the other proposes. I had no occasion during my election campaign to refer to or make any commitment on the subject of conscription. The question then was whether the country would trust the present government to carry on the war, and the argument which the electorate apparently accepted was that it would be better that they should do so rather than change horses in crossing a stream. One of their slogans, I would remind the house, was "King or Chaos." We now have both.

The Prime Minister emphasized again his oft-repeated claim of preserving national unity. While I agree with the importance of this I am not in agreement with his method of bringing it about. In my view there is nothing which would promote national unity more than equality of service and of sacrifice for all; and per contra, there is nothing that would bring about a greater feeling of bitterness and disharmony than the knowledge that some sections of the community were bearing a greater share of the burdens and dangers in the fighting forces than others. There is nothing which will bring people more closely together than to share intimately and equally in danger and sacrifice.

Enjoyment of the privileges of citizenship in Canada carries with it the obligation upon all of defending their country. I do not mean that all available youth should necessarily go overseas to fight, but by compulsory selective service they would be placed either on farms, in the factories, or in the forces, wherever their special abilities would be most useful.

Immediately following the Prime Minister's speech we had in this house striking evidence of disunity among his followers, and this in spite of the Prime Minister's announcement, following his three-hour caucus a few days ago, that "we have never had such a united and enthusiastic meeting". If this could be described as a "love-feast", what must the others have been like! I wonder what kind of "love-feast" they had at their caucus this morning.

I desire to commend the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray), as I know his constituents will do, for the courageous, manly course he took in following his conscience rather than the crack of the party whip. When he goes back home and faces his people he will be able to hold his head erect, knowing that he has faithfully done his duty.

[Mr. Bruce.]

Already the much-advertised unity of the Liberals shows three serious cracks. And, forsooth, we are to have yet another French-Canadian party, led by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe).

The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle) quoted a passage from my speech of last November, and from his remarks I take it that he did not know the meaning of compulsory selective service, which I thought I had made clear in June last. I will let one of his own countrymen reply to what he said in the house two days ago. I am going to quote from an open letter written by Captain Talbot M. Papineau, headed as follows: "In the Field, France, March 21st, 1916", and addressed to his uncle, Henri Bourassa, in which he says:

> Those of us in this great army who may be so fortunate as to return to our Canada will have faced the grimmest and sincerest issues of life and death. We will have experienced the unhappy strength of brute force. We will have seen our loved comrades die in blood and suffering. Beware lest we return with revengeful feelings; for I say to you that from those who, while we fought and suffered here, remained in safety and comfort in Canada and failed to give us encouragement and support, as well as from those who grew fat with wealth dishonorably gained by political graft and by dishonest business methods at our expense, we shall demand a heavy day of reckoning.
> We shall inflict upon them the punishment they deserve, not by physical violence, for we shall have had enough of that, nor by unconstitutional or illegal means, for we are fighting to protect, not to destroy, justice and freedom, but by the invincible power of our moral influence. Remember, too, that if Canada has become a nation, respected and self-respecting, she owes it to her citizens who have fought and died in this distant land and not to those self-styled nationalists who have stayed at home

If Captain Papineau had written from our present army overseas he could not have better expressed the situation as it exists today than he did in 1916.

May I suggest to the Prime Minister that there is still another way out. He must already know that it is unnecessary for him to be relieved of his promise by eight of the provinces of Canada; for he knows full well where they stand. The Gallup poll of the whole of Canada was taken by the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion, also the Toronto Star, and twenty-five other prominent newspapers of all shades of editorial belief, at the end of December last. The result was published in the Toronto Star as follows: sixty per cent would vote for selective service overseas; thirty per cent against; and ten per cent undecided or would not vote.

A recent survey by the Globe and Mail, with the cooperation of eighty-one weekly newspapers of the province of Ontario, was made to test the rural opinion on compulsory selective service anywhere, with the result that ninety-five per cent of the rural papers gave it as their considered opinion that there would be no objection from the farmers to compulsory selective service if the government made provision for farm labour.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the hon. member put on the record the question that was asked? Has he the question that was asked?

Mr. BRUCE: No, I have not the question.

Mr. RALSTON: It is very important.

Mr. BRUCE: I will look it up.

Mr. RALSTON: There was a distinct "out" for the farmer, as I remember it. My hon. friend might also put on the record the editorial of the Ottawa Journal with regard to that same poll. It would be informative.

Mr. BRUCE: Why, therefore, go to the expense and the disturbance to industry of testing public opinion in those eight provinces? If the worst comes to the worst and Quebec refuses to cooperate, then why not consider the suggestion of the editor of Toronto Saturday Night and exclude Quebec from the operation of the compulsory selective service act?

An hon. MEMBER: Why exclude Quebec?

Mr. BRUCE: What a time for a plebiscite, corresponding as it does with the announced intention of Hitler to launch his spring offensive? The Prime Minister and the party caucus will not escape the shame and humiliation attached to this cowardly decision. After this, how many will be able to hold their heads high before their constituents? Why not ask this parliament for a vote, which I feel confident it would certainly give, to absolve the Prime Minister from his improvident undertaking? What justification is there for asking the thousands of Canadians who did not vote for him in the last election to release him from his pledge? They may decline to vote when they realize that this might be improperly interpreted as a vote of confidence in his handling of the war. I think I would myself decline to vote unless the Prime Minister gave a definite undertaking to bring in compulsory selective service if he receives an affirmative vote.

The Prime Minister must know that there is anger and bitter resentment on the part of thousands of Canadians for the humiliating position in which he has placed them. May I suggest that he is taking a very dangerous course which might very well cause the rise of another William Lyon Mackenzie to lead a movement for responsible government.

If the Prime Minister is committed on conscription he is equally committed against a national government; consequently, if he is bound to proceed with a plebiscite he should also ask to be released from his commitment against a national government. We are asked at this time, the most critical time in the history of the world, to spend millions of dollars and delay our war effort—for what? Simply to save the Prime Minister's face—not to save Canada, mark you, but to save the Liberal party. Is it worth the price? On Monday the Prime Minister said, "I am being asked to sell my birthright for their mess of pottage." If by this he means his right to prevent this country from doing its obvious duty of reinforcing our troops overseas by equality of sacrifice, then I say to him that the life of one of our soldiers overseas is of more value than the political life of the Prime Minister.

I invite your attention, Mr. Speaker, particularly to what I am about to say now. We must reinforce our own brave men. Are we going to face the problem of getting recruits with folded hands, by doing nothing? We have asked these gallant men to go to the front, and they are giving their lives for us. Are we going to abandon them now? The government talks as if we were going to support them, but acts as if we were going to abandon them when the reserves are exhausted. I believe the people of Canada have the courage and the patriotism to respond to the need if they are told by the government what the need is.

Parliament is now in session and can enact new measures adequate to the situation if only the government will take hold of things. Surely in a crisis like this, when our men are falling at the front, pouring out their life-blood this very day that Canada may be free, we are not going to sit silent, in apathy and helplessness. Men all over the country should make it known to the government that it is no longer our master but our servant, and that vigorous action must be taken to meet the situation.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend know that nearly ten thousand men have enlisted voluntarily this month, including some five hundred only yesterday?

Mr. BRUCE: That is a very fine contribution. Now may I proceed?

There are many men all over the dominion, in every walk of life, men of both parties, who for two and a half years have been anxious to render war service, but the opportunity has never been given them by the government. In other countries they have used the best brains of all political parties. In this country the government has not even attempted to use the best brains of its own party. How can the people of Canada put the war above every other consideration unless the government puts the war above all other considerations? Canada should have been doing a thousand and one things that she has not done to help the mother country, and she might still do some of those things if the government would only lead or get out of the way and let somebody else lead. Let each of us put those things first which will help win the war; for that is a thousand times more important than any political party or a hundred political parties combined.

I have concluded that portion of my remarks to which I invited special attention. It may surprise hon. members to learn that the words I have just used are not my own. They were taken from a report appearing in the Globe of May 9, 1917, of an address before the provincial Liberal association in my own riding of Parkdale on May 8, 1917, delivered by Hon. Newton W. Rowell, who was an old and trusted friend of the Prime Minister; who was appointed by the Prime Minister as chief justice of Ontario and who was entrusted with the chairmanship of the commission on interprovincial relations, a commission which bore his name until illness caused him to resign, when the vice-chairman, Mr. Sirois, assumed the chairmanship. I can only add that if the Prime Minister has not the courage to perform the functions of the high office to which he was elected, then in all conscience he should step aside, as Chamberlain did and as Mr. Rowell invited Sir Robert Borden to do, and let some other war leader take his place.

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few observations on the question now before the house, in the first place I want to congratulate the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) on the splendid way in which he pronounced the sentences which went to make up his carefully prepared essay. I think with practice his reading has improved very much, and if he continues to improve no doubt he will be able to give us leadership in how to read and how to pronounce the various sentences we have written out. He has done an excellent job in that regard.

Mr. BRUCE: Thank you.

Mr. GOLDING: I want also to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address for the splendid speeches they made in introducing and seconding the motion.

In the speech from the throne itself, as was to be expected there is very little sunshine; and it is quite evident that we are going to be called upon to make further sacrifices from time to time. When we read the speech from the throne it is also evident that the government is making preparations to meet any emergency that may arise. I have listened to quite a number of speakers, and so far there has been very little complaint about the contents of the speech from the throne, with the exception of that part which states that the government is going to submit a plebiscite to the people in regard to a release from all commitments made before the election, during the election or since the election.

I want to state briefly but definitely my position on this question. We have in the cabinet, I believe, eight hon. gentlemen who are veterans of the last world war, some of whom still carry the marks of the wounds they suffered in that great conflict. Some of these hon. gentlemen have badges which were given them for distinguished valour on the field of battle. Some of them have sons, as many of the rest of us have, in the army, in the navy or in the air force. I know this question has been considered, not just for a day but day after day, by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), by those members of the cabinet to whom I have referred, and by the other members of the government as well. They have come to a decision on what they believe to be the best course under the circumstances, and I am prepared to accept their judgment.

That is my first reason for supporting them in their proposal. I do not know why the Prime Minister should be singled out as the only one who has made commitments. Every member of this party, when he accepted the platform laid down by our leaders, by our cabinet, made commitments just as strong as those made by the Prime Minister himself. And for the life of me I cannot understand the position taken now by the hon. member for Parkdale. I believe he accepted the platform that was laid down by his leader, who headed a national government party; and having accepted that platform he made commitments just as strong as those made by his leader. I am in favour of this proposal because it not only relieves the Prime Minister of the commitments he has made but I would say it also relieves all hon. members on both sides of the house, though I cannot speak for the two independent groups, since I do not know what stand they took.

Under the circumstances I think it is the honourable and decent thing to do. I have been in public life in one way or another for some twenty-seven years, and I have always tried to be honest with the people who elected me. I agree with the government in the action they propose to take now. It is up to the people themselves. If they want to relieve us of those commitments, well and good.

I should like also to take this opportunity to congratulate members of the cabinet upon the manner in which they are carrying on the work of their various departments. Especially do I commend the ministers who have been entrusted with the responsibility of organizing Canada's war effort. These hon. gentlemen are carrying loads such as perhaps few cabinet ministers have ever been called upon to carry. As a supporter of the government I take this opportunity publicly to express my confidence in them. I assure them we appreciate the effort they are putting forth to apply sound business principles in carrying out their task. We realize that if any scandal arose in connection with this tremendous job of prosecuting Canada's war effort, among others, the private members supporting the government would suffer. Therefore we should be grateful that we have in the cabinet men who stand solidly for honesty and integrity in the great task to which they have set their hands. In the ministers who have been entrusted with the responsibility of organizing our war effort we have a group of men who hold our entire confidence and have, I believe, the confidence of the great masses of the people of Canada.

I take this opportunity also of paying what I believe to be a well-deserved tribute to the Prime Minister, who has endeavoured to give us efficient and honest administration. Canada is fortunate at the present time in having at its head a gentleman with the experience, ability and honesty of purpose found in our present leader. It was no surprise to me when he and his government received such splendid endorsation at the last federal election. Notwithstanding, however, that remarkable expression of approval by the people, there were editors of some of our important daily papers who both before and since the beginning of the war have continued their sniping, and who apparently are definitely determined to try to destroy confidence in the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues. There are some exceptions to that condition, of course. For example the paper which comes to my home at the present time, the London Free Press, has been most fair. The editor of that paper, Mr. Arthur Ford, deserves commendation for the manner in which he has played cricket ever since the country declared war on Germany.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): May I ask the hon. member a question?—and I am sorry to interrupt.

Mr. GOLDING: Let me finish.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Would the hon. member also tell the house—

Mr. GOLDING: I would like to go on.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): —what the Stratford Beacon-Herald, in his own constituency, has had to say?

An hon. MEMBER: You will have a chance.

Mr. GOLDING: I do not complain about constructive criticism, because in my opinion it is the finest thing we can have. Anyone who represents the public will appreciate that kind of criticism. But the kind I have in mind is criticism which is not based on facts, or, as in many cases, criticism based on facts which are grossly misrepresented.

For example, on the occasion of my coming to Ottawa in November, 1940, for the continuation of the adjourned session, before I boarded the train at Toronto I obtained a copy of the Toronto Globe and Mail. One of the first articles which attracted my attention—it was on the front page—stated that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was coming back from overseas empty-handed. It pointed out that he had been unable to come to any agreement with the United Kingdom government for the sale of our farm produce. Just what good was to be accomplished or what useful purpose was to be served by spreading a story such as that across the country at that particular time is something which for the life of me I cannot understand.

A short time ago, I believe about the middle of December, the same paper carried an editorial in which it pictured the Prime Minister holding out a delicious carrot, which represented senatorships, cabinet portfolios, judgeships and the like. It also described private members supporting the government as donkeys, crowding around, trying to get a bite out of the carrot. I would be disposed to say some nasty things about an offensive editorial of that kind, but I take the view that if they are not ashamed of it, then surely there is nothing I could say which would have any effect on them. In my opinion the Prime Minister has on many occasions been most unjustly and unfairly criticized.

Because of what is happening now I would like to refer to what has happened in the past. We see at the present time an organized effort which hurls a barrage of criticism at the government and the Prime Minister, and which is definitely harming this country's war effort. That is my reason for referring to past events. We well recall the incident in September, 1938, when the position with respect to Czechoslovakia was so acute. On that occasion many of the papers I have in mind persistently demanded that the Prime Minister make a definite stand, that he should make definite commitments. We were repeatedly told that all the dominions, with the exception of Canada, had done that very thing. A careful review of the proceedings in those other parliaments reveals that not one of them had made any such commitments. This fact was clearly established by the proceedings in the British House of Commons, on the occasion of a question being placed on the order paper in which it was asked if any commitments had been made by any of the dominions. The question was answered by a definite "no" from the then prime minister.

It is also clearly established that Great Britain herself was acting only in the role of mediator at that time, and was particularly anxious that no action be taken or no word be spoken which would prejudice the success of their efforts.

In view of these facts—and they are facts—I have never been able to understand the sense of the tremendous barrage of criticism which was hurled at the government on that occasion. The Prime Minister had stated his position time after time, in parliament and out of it. He said that in the event of a crisis which might involve this country in war, parliament would be assembled, and parliament itself must make the decision on such a momentous question. This promise was kept to the letter, and as a result Canada entered the war a united people. That history is now written, and surely it must be a source of satisfaction to look back and, in the light of all circumstances, appreciate the soundness of the position taken then by the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has been criticized, too, for not taking a definite stand on important questions. I agree at once that he has not danced to the tune played by some of these super-wise gentlemen who, because they have been entrusted with the responsibility of writing a few editorials, think it is impossible for them under any circumstances whatsoever to err. But he acted at the proper time and in the proper place according to his judgment. I think it is generally conceded that over the period of years that he has been Prime Minister his judgment has been most remarkably sound. When this parliament was assembled on September 7, 1939, under circumstances most serious, the Prime Minister stated his position briefly but definitely—page 21 of Hansard—as follows:

> We stand for the defence of Canada; we stand for the cooperation of this country at the side of Great Britain; and if this house will not support us in that policy, it will have to find some other government to assume the responsibilities of the present.

[Mr. Golding.]

I think it was a source of satisfaction to him when he saw how many members from all sides of the house rallied to his support and to the support of the government by the strong stand they took. From that time in September until January in the following year, the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues endeavoured, by means of radio talks and press releases, to keep the people informed as to what action was being taken to organize our war effort. The radio talks and press releases were appreciated by the great majority of our citizens, but there were those who ridiculed the whole effort as nothing but political propaganda. The situation in which the government found itself at that time was simply this: if they remained silent, they were criticized; if they endeavoured to keep the people informed as to what was being done, that was called cheap political propaganda. It was no wonder, therefore, that the Prime Minister definitely decided to dissolve parliament when we met on January 25, 1940.

It will also be recalled that at that time the Prime Minister was placed by his opponents in the same category as Hitler for having, as they termed it, scuttled parliament. If we will just re-read the brief debate which took place on that occasion we will find that the Prime Minister stated that charges had been made that his government had lost the confidence of the people. Some of those charges were made in places which could not be ignored. He believed that if the Canadian people felt there was another party or group who could manage things better than the government was doing, then they ought to be given the opportunity of voting for that party or group. In view of that democratic statement and that democratic action I could never understand the philosophy of those who placed the Prime Minister in the same category as Hitler. Since when have we heard Hitler tell the German people that if they were not satisfied with his leadership they would be given the opportunity to select someone else to guide their ship of state?

I am not going to review the charges and counter-charges which were thrown back and forth during the last election, but there are some aspects of that whole discusssion which I think should not be overlooked. Every hon. gentleman who was a member of this house in 1939 will recall that a determined effort was put forth by a section of our press to discredit the House of Commons and create want of confidence in every member representing the people at that time. During the election a determined effort was made to destroy confidence in our party system of government. I should like to say a few words in reference to that.

I think we all remember the formation of the "Leadership league" in the city of Toronto, which league was organized somewhat as the present "total war" committee was. The Leadership league apparently took unto itself the task of trying to improve the position of our people, which was of course a most commendable thing to do. Unfortunately it set out to accomplish that task by carrying on a campaign designed deliberately to create a lack of confidence in every hon. member who sat in this house at that time. We were called politicians and the whole trend of their effort seemed to be to make people believe that we were a species of humanity which should be immediately exterminated. Efforts were made to make the people believe that we were not to be trusted. Reading between the lines we could see that we were accused of being far more concerned with the welfare of our parties than we were with the welfare of those who had sent us here to represent them. Efforts were also made to make the people believe that we had all made promises at election time that we had not the slightest intention of even trying to fulfil. That is the sort of campaign that was carried on by this organization against the members of the house at that time, and it was directed at all members.

In reference to this criticism I may say that I have attended quite a number of public meetings in my day, and I have heard those aspiring to office give an outline of the policies they would support if elected. Generally speaking I think they did that very thing. In view of the criticism which was directed against the members of the house by this organization it is interesting to read the assurances that they themselves were giving, assurances which would make any of the speakers I have in mind look like pikers. I have here a clipping from the Toronto Globe and Mail of February 28, 1939, and I should like to read the following:

Count Your Problems

Government—How to reduce it.
Taxes—How to reduce them.
Public debts—How to reduce them.
Patronage—How to kill it.
Home ownership—How to save it.
Farming—How to revive it.
Unemployment—How to beat it.
Railways—How to make them pay.
Resources—How to develop them.
Defence—How to speed it.
Freedom—How to guard it.
Unity—How to get it.

How was that to be done? All you had to do was sign your name on a little slip of paper and, presto! these problems would disappear. Wonderful, was it not?

Mr. ABBOTT: Who was the head of that league?

Mr. GOLDING: I am coming to that. I think it will be recalled also that one of the present members of this house took a very active part in the formation of the Leadership league. This hon. gentleman had occupied a high and important position in the province of Ontario for quite a number of years, and I presume he felt that he had reached heights where as a statesman he could look down with pity on the weakness, the frailties and the ignorance of the ordinary member of parliament. I presume he felt that with his superior wisdom and knowledge he was the chosen one to lead us out of the darkness of the wilderness in which we were floundering, and into the light of the promised land. Naturally we expected a great deal in the way of leadership from that hon. gentleman when he came to this house; but if I am any judge at all, the house has been keenly disappointed.

Our first disappointment came when as a new member, sitting as a member of parliament for the first time in his life, and that only for a few days, he took it upon himself to suggest to the Prime Minister that he should retire from the high office he was occupying and had occupied for a great number of years. The hon. gentleman ignored entirely the fact that the Prime Minister and his government had recently received the greatest endorsation in the most democratic way that any prime minister and his government had ever received in this country. One can hardly understand the mentality of a person who ignores entirely the expressed opinion of the people and sets himself up as one to dictate who should or who should not be prime minister of this country. Not long ago I saw in the papers that he was even dictating to our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation friends, telling them what they should or should not do.

An hon. MEMBER: What a man!

Mr. GOLDING: I have been disappointed in the narrow, partisan speeches which he has made since he became a member of this house, the very thing he was denouncing when he was strutting his stuff in Toronto as leader of the Leadership league. We have been disappointed too in the fact that he has given no leadership at all in observing the rules of this house, which distinctly prohibit the reading of these orations of his from time to time.

Mr. CASSELMAN: How many members have spoken in this debate without reading their speeches?

Mr. GOLDING: We have all heard it said, Mr. Speaker, by those who are anxious to destroy confidence in our parliamentary system of government, that there is no difference between the two old parties, that they only put on a sham battle at election time in order to divide the people, so that the successful party can carry on its programme of political patronage and political racketeering. That is the idea which a section of our press and some of our people are trying to instil into the minds of our citizens. Let me say at once that in any attempt to create such impressions as these, there is far more danger to our national unity and the future welfare of this country than those responsible for it imagine. When confidence is destroyed in our whole system of government, when a deliberate attempt is made to destroy confidence in the men and women who accept positions in public life and the responsibility that goes with it, the very foundations of democracy and of responsible government itself are undermined, and when that is accomplished we may well ask ourselves: Where do we go from here?

It is true, of course, that there are those in public life who do not conduct themselves in a manner which would warrant our confidence in them or confidence in the party or group with which they may be associated. That has been so in the past and in all probability will be so in the future. But that in itself places a direct responsibility on our citizens to be extremely careful whom they select to represent them in the administration of our public affairs. In my experience in this house during the past ten years I have found, generally speaking, that the members of all parties and groups are exceedingly anxious about and deeply concerned with the welfare of the people. It is true that we have our differences of opinion in regard to the best methods by which we can assist the people, but they are honest differences of opinion, not based on political expediency alone, as many would lead our citizens to believe. If we study the political history of this country I am sure we shall not come to the conclusion that those who have been our leaders in the past or are our leaders in the present are the kind of citizen who could be placed in the category of political racketeers. The very opposite is the truth. Those who have occupied the office of prime minister of this country or that of premier of a province have all retired honourably from public life or have passed to their great reward with their praises on the lips of our citizens. Generally speaking they have endeavoured to give honest public service, and have been an inspiration to the young people of their day and generation.

But, sir, if a persistent effort is made to discredit everyone who accepts a position in public life, surely there can be no inspiration for our young people to fit themselves for the public tasks which someone must carry on.

I think a great deal of the criticism which is directed against governments arises out of the fact that in all too many cases governments are expected to do the impossible, that they are expected to do things for the people which the people should do for themselves, and would be infinitely better off if they did. I remember after the close of the regular session of 1939 reading an article in the press which stated that parliament had prorogued without solving any of the problems with which it was confronted, but the article failed to point out that parliament had passed legislation dealing with those very problems. Such critics apparently fail to appreciate the fact that parliament is not an administrative body but a legislative body. While it is true that it is in parliament that laws are passed and policies enacted, it is equally true that those laws and policies are administered through departmental officials and other agencies. I know of no government which has solved all of its problems, nor do I know of any business concern which has solved all of its problems, or of any private individual who has solved all of his, for the very reason that new problems are continually arising. Governments have to face these new problems as they arise from time to time. The press feel free to criticize everyone who accepts public office, and that is right and proper, but even the press do not contend that they have solved all their own problems. As a matter of fact every decade since confederation has brought new problems for the press of this country to face, and some of these problems have made it exceedingly difficult for the press to carry on. But parliament does and can and always will deal with the problems that confront it from session to session.

There is another type of criticism to which I shall refer. I want it distinctly understood there is nothing personal in this, but it is a type of criticism which I think should not be encouraged. I am sure the house was shocked when one of its new members in his maiden speech made the statement that farmers never had received fair treatment from any government, and he gave as his reason for that statement that all governments had accepted campaign funds from the big interests, that they were bought body and soul before they ever started to function. This is a serious indictment, one which involves not only the Bennett government and the present administration but previous governments whose leaders have passed to their great reward—those of Sir Robert Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir John A. Macdonald, and many others. It is a serious charge, and one wonders what evidence the hon. gentleman had on which to base such an indictment. One wonders, too, why anyone, particularly a farmer, should in season and out of season continue to support a party which he believes has never given the farmers a fair deal as a result of having been bought body and soul by the big interests.

No wonder that parliament as an institution is losing prestige and that respect for it is dwindling, when members will make such statements as these. The members making them have a conveniently short memory. We all remember how in 1911 Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government went down to defeat in an effort to improve the position of our farmers. At that time no one disputed that the so-called big interests were definitely opposed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier's policy of reciprocity. In our own counties of Huron and Perth there were five elected at that time, every one of whom was opposed to reciprocity, but I would resent the slightest insinuation that the people of those counties were bought or could be bought. As a matter of fact one of the things that has always made me feel proud to represent that constituency has been that its citizens cannot be stampeded in any way but think these things through for themselves, and then decide what is the best thing to do.

During the course of the campaign many catch-phrases were used, such as "No truck or trade with the Yankees". It was said that if reciprocity passed there would be two lines of rust running from the east to the west; and so on. These phrases and others of the kind did influence the people. I absolutely refuse to believe that the Canadian people or the Canadian government were "bought" on that or any other occasion.

In 1936, when the Canada-United States trade agreement was brought before this house for ratification, a lengthy and bitter debate took place. Every member of the official opposition opposed the agreement, but when the vote was taken it had the endorsation of the government, their supporters, and all the independents present. Will anyone suggest that the government, their supporters and the two independent groups in this house were bought body and soul when they voted as they did on that occasion? In 1939 we practically had a repetition of this vote. I remember well that one of those who vigorously opposed the passage of that agreement was the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). I want to say that in my opinion there is no more honest and no more conscientious member in this house, and when he speaks for industry and the industrial worker he is speaking of something which is part of himself, because it has been part of his life's work. But, Mr. Speaker, nobody will make me believe that because he opposed those agreements the hon. gentleman was bought body and soul. This is a most unwarranted charge, one which could not be substantiated if a judicial investigation were held.

In the city of Toronto we have a financial sheet whose editors in my opinion have tried their utmost to discredit three outstanding veterans of the last great war, and so far as I know they are still carrying on in the same way. It is most unfortunate that when men and women are giving of their time and substance for the good of the country, the whole time of these people seems to be occupied in trying to discredit someone connected with the administration. About the only thing, it seems to me, they have to be thankful for as each day draws to a close is that another day has afforded them another opportunity to besmirch someone's reputation and standing. I am quite sure that if this government were bought body and soul by the big interests, opposition to them would not be coming from that particular source.

I have taken more time than I had intended to refer to these matters, but I feel very strongly about the prestige of parliament as an institution. I suggest to every hon. member that while we resent unfair criticism of the house and of its members, it lies within our own power to make this House of Commons a place which will have the respect and confidence of every one of its members and of every citizen of this country. I appeal to each and all to consider this his or her responsibility.

My advice to the government is to carry on efficiently and honestly, as they have been doing, the great task which has been assigned to them by the Canadian people.

There are many problems which, if time permitted, I should like to discuss, in connection with our farms, in the matter of taking boys off the farms, and as regards farm prices. But fortunately we have in the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) one who is a farmer in my own constituency, who is operating a farm and making a success of it, and I feel free to go to him and talk over with him any of these problems. I do not think, therefore, that I should take up the time of this house in stating the case for the farmers of my riding. Also the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) and I were deskmates for four or five years. It seems to me, therefore, it would be time wasted for me to discuss these matters in the house when I have access to these ministers in the manner that I have.

I appreciate, too, the responsibility which rests on the official opposition. I believe that in general they are trying to carry out honestly and efficiently the duties which fall upon them in this critical time. The leader of the official opposition (Mr. Hanson) does occasionally hit below the belt, but I am not going to say anything more about that, and I know he won't expect me to say otherwise, because—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to say that I have never been accused of that before.

Mr. GOLDING: Well, that is the way I feel.

I suggest to every party and group in this house that if we do what is expected of us by the Canadian people during this crisis, parliament as an institution and our whole party system of government will be honoured and respected.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, with the blare of political trumpets, both in the house and across the country, sounding out praise and condemnation of the government's plan of a plebiscite, it seems that other matters of importance have gone into the background. Perhaps if I were to give way to my immediate impulse, I would have something to say about this plebiscite business, but I think I shall wait until the bill comes down and, for the present, deal with another matter which I consider to be of vital importance at the present moment.

The matter I have in mind has so far not been dealt with in this house since the commencement of the war. I refer to the relationship between Canada and the United States in respect of that country's defence of its northern frontier state in the war with Japan. I refer, of course, to the United States territory of Alaska, our next-door neighbour to the north.

The house is aware of the fact that some years ago the President of the United States appointed a commission to investigate the possibilities of constructing a highway connecting the Pacific northwest with Alaska. I do not suppose that the United States in its administration is any more free from politics than is Canada or any other country, and I must confess that from my reading I have come to the conclusion that a good deal of political pressure was brought to bear upon that commission, appointed by the president in connection with its work. From my reading I have reason to believe that the work of the United States commission on this Pacific coast route to Alaska was complicated by political considerations. To say the least, it did not take into account any possibility of impending war with Japan. I am quite aware, of course, that the intention in the first place was to have a tourist highway connecting Alaska with the western states of Washington, Oregon and California. I know full well that the tourist idea was what all those who were interested in the matter were concerned about.

I should like to read the names of those who were appointed on the United States commission. Of course, this has nothing to do with us directly, though indirectly it has. The chairman of their commission was Congressman Warren G. Magnuson, of Seattle, Washington. There was also Doctor Ernest Gruening, director of division of territories of island possessions of the Department of the Interior at Washington. That was a good appointment. There was Donald McDonald, engineer, Alaskan Road Commission, Fairbanks, Alaska. Perhaps that was a good appointment. There was Mr. J. W. Carey, Public Works Administration, Portland, Oregon. I read these names only to show that the idea of the commission and its work was specifically to run this highway from Alaska to the western coast states of the United States.

Following that, a Canadian commission was appointed by the present government. This commission was appointed on December 22, 1938, pursuant, of course, to the United States action in appointing their commission. I should like to read the personnel of our Canadian commission. I think it is interesting. The chairman of that commission was the Hon. Charles Stewart, whose address is given as Ottawa, and there were Brigadier-General Thomas L. Tremblay of Quebec; J. M. Wardle, Department of Mines and Resources, Ottawa; Arthur Dixon, Department of Public Works, Victoria, and J. W. Spencer, whose address is given as Vancouver.

I am not going to criticize this severely, but I would point out that at any rate Mr. Spencer is secretary-treasurer, I believe, of the David Spencer Company of Vancouver and Victoria, one of the largest department store institutions on the Pacific coast. It goes without saying that these men are interested in having that highway go along the Pacific coast, through British Columbia, to the north, eventually reaching Alaska. Naturally, they are going to be interested from a business point of view, and perhaps no business benefits from the tourist trade more than does the department store business unless it is the oil and gas business.

I discover in my study of this whole matter that no consideration whatever was given to any other route to Alaska than the British Columbia route. In fact, certain representations were made to our Canadian commission from people in Alberta, but the commission refused a hearing. This is from the report of the commission:

> Requests were also received for meetings at Edmonton and Fort McMurray to enable the representatives of those places to present the views of their people as to the advantages of a route through Alberta to the Yukon and Alaska. The commission found it impractical to accede to these requests, the order in council creating the commission specifically confining its consideration to routes through British Columbia.

That commission was appointed in December, 1938. It did not begin its work until July, 1939; the war broke out in September, 1939, and the government here, in setting up this commission, gives them strict orders to confine their investigation to the one route in British Columbia. They could not consider any other route. The government must have been aware that there were other routes to Alaska which were just as accessible and through which it was just as easy to put a highway as any route in British Columbia; yet once again, such was the lack of foresight of the government, that the commission was impaired in its work.

There have been developments since then. I know, and I have already recognized, that what was in the minds of both the United States government and the government here was to have a tourist highway. But as late as May, 1941, Congressman Magnuson of the state of Washington, who was chairman of the United States commission, recommended the immediate construction of this highway from a military point of view. I read from a press dispatch from Washington dated May 23, 1941:

> Immediate construction of a $25,000,000 highway from the United States through Canada to Alaska, approximately 1,600 miles, as a precaution against invasion from Siberia, was recommended to State Secretary Hull Thursday by the Alaska international highway commission. The commission's report, made public by its chairman, representative Magnuson (Democrat, Washington), said that Russia, if so disposed, could attack from existing bases in Siberia.

From that dispatch you will see, Mr. Speaker, that the chairman of the commission must have realized that there was impending danger of a military nature in connection with that northern outpost of America; yet his commission studied only the British Columbia route. What actually happened? General Marshall, United States army chief of staff, rejected the British Columbia route as being unsound from a military point of view.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Where is that remark of General Marshall's found?

Mr. HANSELL: I saw that in a press clipping, which I might read. This is a dispatch from New York dated December 17, 1941, in which these words appear:

> —General Marshall, army chief of staff, rejected the long-cherished dream of a highway to Alaska.

Of course that is just part of the dispatch. Mr. William Albee, who was considered a specialist on Alaska and the Yukon, and who was the author of the report of the Magnuson commission, was called before the federal planning board, and this is what he said, which, by the way, is from the same New York dispatch dated December 17, 1941:

> The Alaska highway commission's work was complicated by political considerations and took no account of war conditions. . . . Its primary objective was to build a road linking the important coast towns of Alaska with the American west coast area. It developed into a Seattle-to-Juneau log-rolling junket.

Further on, he says, referring to a route east of the Rockies:

> Our present estimate is that if the work of moving in the road-building equipment is begun before the end of January—

January is here now.

> —there can be a road built to the Bering straits and military trucks rolling on it at express speed before the winter of 1942. With the Russians doing the same kind of work on their side of the Bering straits—and I was given to understand in Washington that this is an integral part of the project—we can carry out an encirclement move against the Japanese from positions in Japan's front yard, back yard and side yard instead of from thousands of miles away as at present.

That was before the outbreak of war between Japan and the United States. Just what are the immediate needs? This entire matter must not be regarded too lightly. With Japan entering the struggle and the United States compelled to take action, let us make no mistake about it; the north American continent is in danger. I think British Columbia is in danger. I am glad to see the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), who comes from Vancouver, in his seat. Perhaps he knows more about this than any of us. I said British Columbia was in danger. The Yukon is in danger. Alaska is in danger; and while I am dealing with this point, I would remind hon. members that it would not take very much to isolate British Columbia completely from the rest of civilization.

I do not know if we altogether realize the position. Many hon. members come from Ontario and Quebec; indeed, from the point of view of membership, Ontario and Quebec control this parliament. But there are several great provinces out west. I wonder whether hon. members realize the situation. There are only two railways and one highway going into British Columbia. All that is necessary, whether it is done from the air or by sabotage, is to blow up a couple of bridges on those railways, or cave in one or two tunnels, and British Columbia is absolutely isolated from the rest of Canada. You would not be able to move a machine or a soldier to that province.

I do think—and I have had this in mind for some time—that this parliament should know exactly the situation that exists in British Columbia in relation to the entry of Japan into the war. I believe the Prime Minister should meet with us in a secret session and tell us exactly the situation that exists in British Columbia. He should tell us exactly what defences we have there. He should tell us exactly the number of men we have there in the army and air force. He should tell us the number of planes and equipment we have there. He should confide in this parliament in connection with these matters. I am exercised about this thing; it is serious business. Not only are these territories in danger —British Columbia, the Yukon and Alaska— but, as Mr. Albee said or implied, as a piece of military strategy the cooperation of the three nations, the United States, Canada and Russia, in carrying out an encirclement move against Japan by means of a highway to Alaska, is most essential at this time.

I do not wish to suggest in one breath that certain political pressure was brought to bear upon the governments and commissions, and be interpreted as going a bit political myself in the next breath. If I wished, I could recommend that such a highway run through southern Alberta, because that is where my constituency is located.

Mr. GERSHAW: It should be through Medicine Hat.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Medicine Hat says it should run through there. All right, I have no objection to that. If I liked, I could recommend that the highway run through my constituency and also through the rich Turner valley oil fields located therein. But I am not going to suggest anything of the kind. It does not make any difference to me whether the highway comes through Coutts or Sweet Grass and through southern Alberta, or whether it comes through North Portal and thence through Saskatchewan or, if you wish, through Emerson and up through Manitoba. But I do say that such a highway must connect with the industrial areas of the United States, and must run north by way of Edmonton.

Perhaps one of the greatest authorities on the north and defence projects in northern territories, a man who has been called in to advise United States defence authorities, without question favours the route from Edmonton, north. I refer to that eminent arctic explorer, Doctor Vihjalmur Stefansson. What does Doctor Stefansson say? I read from an interview with him reported in the Philadelphia Record under date of May 20, 1941. It states in part:

> Of the four routes to Alaska that have been proposed, any two could be built for less than half the cost of one battleship; the least difficult to construct could be built in half the time required to turn out a battleship. This latter inland highway, Doctor Stefanssen says, would reach Alaska via Edmonton, Alberta, and the Mackenzie river, and would be largely self-fueling, since it would skirt two extensive petroleum fields, the tar sands of the McMurray district of northern Alberta and the oil region of Fort Norman on the lower Mackenzie. . . . Impartial analysis of the four routes from the military defence point of view seems to indicate that, although one of the two coastal routes might be advisable for communication purposes if two roads are to be built, the inland route through Alberta would be by far the most valuable in the event of war and would most certainly be the choice of army officials if only one highway were to be built.

The article goes on with further explanation, and I am told from authoritative sources that there is no reason why that highway could not be started now. There are tractors going through that north country every winter, hauling huge machinery of one kind and another, while the ground is still frozen.

I would recommend that a new commission be appointed immediately. The old commission is now defunct; it is dead; it has finished its work. I do not know how much it cost, but in the light of events which have since occurred, its work was absolutely worthless. As a matter of fact, the commission itself is not certain as to whether or not it should recommend a highway. May I read one part at the conclusion of its report. This is contained in a press release handed out after the report was submitted:

> It agrees also with the opinion expressed by its engineering members that it is not practicable to offer a sound recommendation to the government either as to the merits of any of the alternatives of the "A" route or the comparative value of the "A" route and the "B" route—

Both of which, by the way, are British Columbia routes.

—and it agreed with the recommendation that provision be made for further field work on the "A" route in the season of 1940, as outlined in the engineering reports.

In view of recent developments, there is no use in bothering with that commission now; there is no use even in thinking of putting a highway through British Columbia now. I would recommend, therefore, that a new commission be appointed immediately, that the members of such commission be entirely unprejudiced politically and from a business point of view. I would recommend, however, that the ministers of highways or their appointees in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and perhaps Manitoba, be on the commission, or appear in an advisory capacity. They know the machinery; they know the territory. Routes have been surveyed, and they are the men who can give information. I would urge that they be instructed to dispatch their business with the most careful thoroughness, but with the greatest haste. They should be instructed to see that the right machinery is moved in as soon as possible, while the ground is frozen, and that they seek to have the work done this year.

In the light of development in the Pacific, the importance of such a move cannot be stressed too forcibly. The danger is clear; no time should be lost. It is not sufficient to say that the United States fleet will protect the northern part of this continent. Since the war began, the unexpected has happened more than once. One of the greatest fleets in the world was outmanœuvred in one of the most surprising pieces of naval strategy. I refer to the invasion of Norway. Let us not be asleep or fooled in this matter. Let not the government blunder here. We have had our Hong Kong; we have had our Dunkirk. Let us be aware, and act now with respect to this highway to Alaska, lest we have our Norway on the north American continent.

Mr. J. M. TURNER (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on what seems to be the topic of the day, namely conscription, and also something about the plebiscite which will come before our people shortly for their endorsation or rejection. I do not, however, believe I could do any better to illustrate my views than to say that after studying public opinion for some time very closely I have found that it would require considerable research to discover the origins of what might be called the Toronto movement of uplift and control. There are probably traces of it right back to the days of muddy York. But it is within the last thirty years that it has really come into its own, attracting the attention of the outlying masses and drawing from them due and fitting comment and, at times, appropriate action. The full record of its activities must be left to the admiring historian, but in the short time at my disposal at least a note or two can perhaps be made.

It begins with 1935 when the best people, who are the life and soul of the movement, appeared on the streets and in the haunts which they frequent, wearing nice red, white and blue rosettes calling for national government. The laudable purpose for which national government was desired was to trim down the Canadian National railway by tearing up hundreds of miles of rails and to turn over what was left to the management of people of whom the movement approved. An unsympathetic public opinion failed lamentably to respond, and the great project failed.

But the dauntless spirit which inspires these drives did not long remain depressed. There followed, after a brief interval, the Leadership league. Surely this noble and inspiring experiment has not so soon been forgotten. This was directed towards creating in the outlying and dependent areas watchful committees which, under direction from the head office, would see to it that the elected representatives obeyed instructions—or else! In the latter event they would be replaced at the next election by more malleable material. How unfortunate it was that when an election occurred a little later, there was no Leadership league to exercise control and give direction, with the lamentable result that there were elected in large numbers members of whom the movement disapproves. But what had happened to the Leadership league? Why, it had died untimely of a combination of troubles—teeth-cutting, convulsions and infantile paralysis. Very sad, very unfortunate!

But again there was a rallying of the broken forces. This time it took the form of the Ontario voluntary constabulary association. Headed by one whose eagle eye can see treason and a disposition towards subversive action through any number of closed doors, it stripped for action with all the necessary accoutrements, uniforms, passwords, secret gatherings, training in manoeuvres. How it happened that despite the distinguished approval of the attorney general of Ontario, it wilted and died before it had a single scalp to its credit—not one person was landed in gaol—is a mystery, but this is indeed the melancholy fact. It only illustrates what a tough world this is for noble experiments.

But it is not altogether a record of failure. There are bright spots of achievement. Conspicious among these was the performance of the hijacking commando in its surprise attack upon the Conservative committee of organization in Ottawa in November. In a movement of rapid action, which puts to shame recent tactical performances in other fields, they took the committee into captivity, put chains on it, and provided it with a leader who embodies all that the movement yearns for and demands. Some lads from the west who went to Ottawa to deal with the business that the meeting was called to consider, have been showing a most mutinous spirit, writing to the papers in protest and that sort of thing. But they might as well understand that if they want to stay with the grand old party, they must wear the yoke of submission. Toronto will supply the leader, make the policies and, if the miracle of victory happens, distribute the spoils on the basis of rewarding home virtues first.

The zeal, alertness and determination with which subversive ideas and tendencies are detected and trodden on has often been demonstrated, and this has never been more in evidence than right now. The approved missile in these cases is the manifesto. A memorial with the names of a few leading figures attached is considered to be a formidable weapon; though it must be sadly admitted that the results do not seem to bear this out. Within the last few days it has been found necessary to issue such a manifesto. Within twenty-four hours of the appearance in the New York Times of a dispatch indicating that Canada was taking a direct part in the proceedings of the allied war council, there was action on the Toronto front, showing how watchful and determined they are in resisting revolutionary change. Let Canada send her representations to London in the good old colonial style, and if London graciously approved, they might then go forward to the allied council. Thus said the manifesto; such was the demand of the alert watch-dogs. Good old blimps!

All these movements and activities, all these champions of "what Toronto says must be done" have now come together in a grand crescendo of demand, affirmation and denunciation by the device of the committee for total war. All their names are appended to the latest manifesto. Here are to be found the signatures of the National government leaders, the Leadership leaders, the voluntary constables who rallied to save Canadian civilzation, the wrecking brigade that stormed the Ottawa Conservative meeting, the alarmists who issued the warning against Canada trying to act like a nation. Here they are pigging together, heads and points, in the same truckle-bed, as the eminent Mr. Burke would say. And with them, selected individuals from outside points who have joined in the great crusade.

The purpose of the great crusade is to do their thinking for the elected members of parliament, inform them as to their duties and instruct them in their performance when parliament meets. It is only necessary to see the two hundred names attached to the manifesto and to read its text, to realize that the Leadership league managed to leave a descendant.

It has to be recorded with pain that in calling in the outsiders, two slips were made. Two of the hand-picked membership turned out to be dissentient. One of these indicated an inclination to think that perhaps the members of parliament in intelligence and patriotism were the equals of their would-be instructors and could be relied upon to make their own decisions. But the gentleman who made these observations, only having served the country with distinction in both the Ontario legislature and the dominion parliament, and in the high office of attorney general of Ontario, was obviously not in the same class with the distinguished amateurs who had matters in hand. Moreover, he comes from Kingston, where the vice of independent thinking is still practised.

The other dissenting voice—that of a woman who had served at Ottawa in five parliaments—showed a similar lack of understanding of the technique of the movement. She actually had the crude idea that they ought to know who was putting up the money. Ought she not to know that this information is given only in camera? Clearly, it is a case of back to the wilds of Grey county for the lady—she is not yet acclimated to Toronto standards.

It is very regrettable that discordant voices should be raised not only in the gathering itself but outside in the waste spaces, in doubt, in derision and in repudiation. I have here, for instance, a newspaper which has the audacity to deny that the movement is the outcome of a spontaneous spasm of anguished patriotism—a low-down sheet that dares to say that the great rally "appears to have been just about as 'spontaneous' as the drafting of Mr. Meighen for the Conservative leadership." But this newspaper is published in Kingston and is under the blight of that town.

Meanwhile, the great movement is well under way with drums beating, flags flying and men shrieking. It has posh quarters in the Royal York, which is a quite elegant hostelry. It is not thought there will be any trouble about the rent.

If I did not say another word and took my seat now, I think the whole story would be just about told of how a group of racketeers from a city named Toronto got together and I am informed by many people of Ontario that they have had that province in their hip pocket for some time and also have had the lead-off man in that province over a barrel so long that he has become warped. But that gang are not satisfied with that; they are aiming to get control of Canada itself. They are pounding away on the word "conscription" in order to rile up the people. They are using that method just as a means to gain their real objective, namely, the ousting of this government and the gaining of control at Ottawa. In all sincerity I question whether that group is as much interested in conscription as they are in gaining control. I might say that I am referring to the people in Toronto—I understand there are some good people there—and not to the members of the house. If the matter were brought out in the open from behind the bush, we would find that conscription is just camouflage, that the pay-off is control.

If ever we needed unity in Canada, we need it now. That was emphasized quite strongly by the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald.) But I shall have to be shown how we can have unity when one city is trying by every means possible to dominate and control the rest of Canada and is continually belittling and torpedoeing our war efforts, which the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain, termed as magnificent.

Let us get right down to the marrow of this question regarding this countermovement organized by the so-called money manipulators. Why has this clique been continually out to get the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his government? What is their real reason? It is simply that they know full well that they cannot bulldoze, stampede, railroad and muscle in on our present Prime Minister. That is what is burning them up. That is what is eating out their hearts. He is not a "yes" man. For once they cannot get their own way regardless of how much money they have or control. That is the real reason.

If there is one quality our Prime Minister has, it is that he is always cool, cautious and careful. To some he may seem to be a little slow at times, but it is just as well that he is that way. He has those qualities, and I am proud that he has them, particularly during a period of war or any other crisis.

Now, a few words about the plebiscite. I have always been taught that a promise made is a debt unpaid. On many occasions the Prime Minister has said that he would not enforce conscription unless he first consulted the people. I made the same promise on many occasions during the last election. The Prime Minister and the government are now seeking to carry out that pledge and are appealing to the very people themselves. Is that democracy? What is wrong with it? Time and time again we and others have condemned Hitler and Germany for breaking pledges, treaties and pacts, but when this government seek to carry out theirs, they are condemned.

Let us never forget that the people are the highest court in this dominion, and that they are our masters and we are their servants. Should that situation ever change, then the heart and soul of democracy is destroyed. I sincerely believe, Mr. Speaker, that holding a plebiscite is the honourable course for this government to take at this time, and I commend them for so doing.

Now I want to say, Mr. Speaker, what I think would take place in Canada if ever those sharks in Toronto got control here. About the first thing to happen would be the wiping out of the excess profits tax. Away would go the price-ceiling idea, and the sky would be the limit so far as profits on war equipment are concerned. On that very point let me say that maybe this is what that gang mean by "total war effort"—get everything out of this war that it is possible to get, because the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, whom this group has forced in as leader, speaking on that very subject in the other chamber on December 6, 1940, is reported by the Senate Hansard of that date, page 62 of the Senate Debates, to have said:

> I have no sympathy with those who would tax profits at 100 per cent. People will not work for nothing. Human nature is the same in war time as in peace, and instead of helping the war effort you are defeating it by stripping people of the stimulus to toil and run their business right. Leave the incentive, and make the reward greater the greater the toil and the greater the success. You have to do that. You do not do it under this bill. I do not exaggerate at all when I say that I have had business men by the dozen tell me that they are leaning on their oars; they have nothing to work for. They say: "We might just as well take it a little easier now, for we are only working for taxes anyway."

We are all familiar with the song, "Roll out the Barrel." You have heard it many times, Mr. Speaker. That would be played again if those gentlemen got into power; only then it would be, "Roll out the pork barrel," instead of the beer barrel, and I should be very much surprised if under the control of Toronto our army would not soon resemble the Mexican army of a few years back when there were no privates and every soldier was a general or an officer. Those are only a few of the things which we might expect if the Toronto outfit should take control, but I am not afraid to trust the people of Canada to see that that shall never take place.

While I am on my feet, I want to pay a tribute to my district, which was well represented in the great battle for the defence of Hong Kong against overwhelming odds. Their stand in that battle will go down in history as equal to any made by gallant, courageous troops in any other war, past or present.

So much for the question of conscription and the plebiscite.

As food has been mentioned in the speech from the throne, I take this opportunitv to make a few observations with respect to wheat. I did not oppose the wheat policy of the government last year because I understood it was just a temporary policy, just trial legislation for one year only. But I must say to the government at this time, when we are all striving to preserve unity to the utmost in Canada, that we must, above all else, keep a proper economic balance right across the entire country, and I am sorry to say that that balance does not exist to-day. Due mainly to war contracts and government subsidies for plant extensions, and so forth, which I know are necessary, eastern Canada, particularly Ontario and Quebec, has the big end of it financially, and quite naturally they are having a great boom in business generally and are enjoying a period of prosperity. This is easily proven by a report in the Toronto Globe and Mail—there is Toronto again—of January 27, 1942, where I find this headline: "A surplus of $600,000 for Toronto." But, Mr. Speaker, what of the western provinces, those all-important wheat-growing areas? Almost the opposite is true. The farmers are striving and labouring to keep their heads above water, to keep going and stay off relief. That is what I refer to when I say that there is not a proper economic balance right across the country.

If we could weigh it on the scale, the indicator would show that the balance overwhelmingly favours the east. When a situation of that kind arises, it is up to the government immediately to take action. In addition to what I have already said, let me show how, by our action here in setting up a schedule of prices for labour on war projects, and so forth, and providing a minimum wage of forty-five cents an hour, plus cost of living bonus, which is little enough, we have automatically made it tougher for the farmer.

Here is the farmer's situation now as I see it. We first of all guarantee him seventy cents a bushel for his wheat, No. 1 northern, basis Fort William. That is not enough, particularly during war time. It will be noted that the price in the United States for May wheat is $1.30¾ at Chicago. We tell the farmer that he must sell his wheat only at the point of delivery stipulated in his permit. But we have done more than that. As I have just said, we have automatically raised the price of labour which the farmer must have, particularly during the all-important harvest season, to forty-five cents an hour. No farmer can pay forty-five cents an hour for labour on seventy-cent wheat, plus bonuses, but less freight and dockage. Therefore we are clipping the poor farmer at both the top and the bottom. He is being pocketed by our own action. Let me give an illustration.

I was present at the beginning of the harvest season last year when an order came through for 1,600 men at $3 perhaps $3.50 a day, plus board, et cetera, and not one man of the hundreds present came forward. I personally spoke to many of those men, and their answer was that they wanted to get a job in a munitions factory at forty-five cents an hour. During the harvest period last fall I took a trip through part of my riding, and on one farm I saw a poor old lady, sixty-five years of age, on top of a grain stack, working away there when she should have been at home listening to the radio or at least doing some easier job. On another farm, on the next section, I saw a little girl twelve years of age driving the tractor, while her father operated the power binder behind. He told me that he had tried his best to get help, offering $4 a day, but had not been able to secure it. That little girl should have been out playing. I am sure she must have been tired at night.

I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and to the government that the farmer be given, say, $1 a bushel for No. 1 northern wheat, not at Fort William but at the point of delivery. If all the farmers of Canada are taxed equally and contribute equally to the treasury of Canada, why should they not withdraw from that same treasury share and share alike? No farmer should be penalized by the difference in freight rates just because he happens to farm a little farther away from Fort William than another farmer. Just as a further suggestion, the government might, if it so desires, consider paying that $1 a bushel on the first

1,000 or 2,000 bushels only, and then scale the price down from there. Such a plan would certainly take care of the thousands of the smaller wheat farmers all over western Canada.

I know the Minister of Agriculture had a job on his hands last year when we had such a large carryover of wheat, and with the new crop coming in, nevertheless I think we should simplify our national wheat policy and make it easier for the farmers and everybody to understand by considering cutting out the wheat acreage reduction plan, bonuses, et cetera; and tell the farmer what he is going to get in cash on the line, and let him store his wheat, if he wants to, on the farm and pay him for it. The machinery set up under the wheat acreage reduction plan is all that is necessary to take care of the inspection and so forth that would be required.

Therefore, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the minister and to the government, and particularly to the Prime Minister, who represents a farming constituency in Saskatchewan, the province which produces the most wheat of any province in Canada, to give the poor farmers of western Canada the assistance necessary to keep up their very important end in our war effort and at the same time to bring about a better balance across the country generally, which in turn will create greater harmony and certainly a higher degree of unity in Canada from one end to the other.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, when there is something on your mind the sooner you get it off, the better for yourself.

In opening my remarks I should like to congratulate not only the mover and the seconder of the address, but also the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), who I am sorry is not in his seat and the leaders of the other groups, who have been so constructive in their suggestions that one would almost think they were Liberal-Progressives.

To touch first upon what, to me, is the most important subject, I will say a word on the plebiscite. Neither in the last war nor in the present one have I felt that I could tell a young man that he should sign up, nor have I ever allowed my better half, as far as I could control her, to send a white feather to anybody. First, God gave that boy his life and to God he is responsible. As the old Book says, "the dust shall return to the earth as it was, and the spirit....unto God who gave it"—not to the government. Second, because if you put a soldier's uniform on a coward you cannot make him a soldier against his will, any more than you can put a gown on a profligate and make a saint out of him, or by painting a pump, change the water. I would add, as another reason, that it has been my sad duty on more than one occasion to break the painful news of a loved one missing or gone beyond. Just before I came to Ottawa I had to bring the news to a young wife, to the mother and father and family of one of the finest young men at the head of the lakes—where they are as good as any in Canada—a Christian young man and a first-class athlete, that he was missing, and when I saw the effect on the parents and the wife, I felt that I was not going to take the responsibility of telling anybody that he must enlist. But I was extremely proud that my own boy enlisted before he told me of his decision, and whether, when he goes into the air he comes safely down again, or his spirit soars up and beyond, is less to me than the consciousness that he is "white" all the way through. But it is my duty to support every young man who goes overseas in everything which will make him a soldier battling an accursed thing, and everything that the government can give those young soldiers it is our duty to give them. As I have said, if a boy is not a soldier at heart, if he hasn't "got it under his belt", you cannot make him a soldier. But I admit there are certain things that we must do. We must show the need. In our own way we must act whole-heartedly.

I should like to congratulate the government upon its choice of the new Minister of Labour, Mr. Mitchell. I worked with the Hon. Humphrey Mitchell and with the late Hon. Norman Rogers on the youth training scheme, which was one of the most constructive measures that a Canadian government ever put into effect. I know that from Fort William not hundreds but several thousands of young men have passed through that youth training and are now engaged in war work or overseas —on the land, in the air and on the sea. Mr. Mitchell himself was a worker. I believe that any man who is Minister of Labour should know how a man feels, like after a hard day's work. How can he best legislate for the toiler without some personal knowledge of the man's problems?

I admit I am biased in favour of labour. You can trust the workers through thick and thin; they are the cream of Canada, and, with labour willing to do its best, we as a government should give them the best possible leadership. In the interests of an all-out war effort there should certainly be some equalization of wages and results. I know something of the difficulties which come to those whose task it is to handle men. I realize that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and his fellow ministers have a terrific job. I would suggest that they throw out some inducement to men to join the infantry, because to-day service in the air or in the navy holds superior attractions for many of our young men. If the pay of the foot soldier were increased from $1.30 to, say $1.50, it might facilitate recruiting in that arm of the service.

When I think of the war work of Canada I am not just sure whether we have enough men to supply all our various needs. Recently a farmer who had spent $10,000 in equipping a splendid herd told me that he was sending them to the butcher because he could not get help. Perhaps there are not enough men in the country for every phase of war work, but to my mind it is the duty of the government, and they should have a free hand, to say whether a man can serve better on the farm or in the machine shop or elsewhere.

Public opinion changes rapidly. The other day, when I saw that a United States army had landed in Ireland, I thought, "Boy, they are in for a fine time over there. Once they get a peek at the cruelty and the devastation which has been wrought in Belfast, that most beautiful city in the British empire, they will get a taste of the thing they need to open their eyes." And knowing something of Ireland and its characteristics, I think they may be taught the rudiments of how to take care of themselves and how to learn to fight and to beat the enemy.

As I have said, public opinion has changed quickly. In a letter from my brother, a member of the cloth, a real soldier and a real man, who is on the coast of Washington, he says that a little while ago public opinion there was anti-Churchill, anti-British, anti-Canada and anti-Roosevelt, but since Pearl Harbour was attacked they are going "all-out" in order to show that they are anti-Hitler and against everything that supports Hitler.

This change in public opinion reminds me of my own attitude towards Russia. I have been guilty of reading everything that I could get hold of about Russia. Some of it was true; some of it was not, but my attitude towards that country and its people, and towards communism as well, has changed. To be called a "red" to-day is no disgrace. Some time ago I visited Tim Buck. I did so because he had been through a bad wreck. I did so as a minister; for, if I had not, I would have been like the priest and the Levite who looked and went by, fearing lest public opinion might criticize. I know what I had to meet during the dominion election because of that action. I was called a communist. But my constituency knew me perfectly well, far better than my critics, and they voted accordingly. I would advise the government to have reexamined all those who are interned as opposing our war effort. I think they should be given an opportunity of getting into our war work, because, as I understand the government, it is not their desire to keep men in prison but rather to give them an opportunity of doing their best.

Canada is doing a great job. Among those engaged in our war effort is the former leader of the opposition. When I think of former members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party and of the Conservative party contributing to our war effort—and this includes the Hon. Dr. Manion, who was chosen to lead his party at an all-Canadian convention—I cannot help believing that the best brains of Canada to-day are engaged in this country's war effort. I suggest, therefore, that we have in reality a better national government than we could otherwise hope to have.

When a man wishes to serve, I think it is wise that he should be given an opportunity to serve in that capacity which he is best fitted to fill. It is not fair to put him to serve where he is not best fitted to serve. Take a trainee who has signed with the air force; he has spent years fitting himself for service in that force; he wants to fly. Well, you hurt that man if you do not give him an opportunity to fly. Another man wishes to join the navy, let us say, and he, too, is a trainee. He should be allowed to serve in that capacity, because he will make a good sailor and he will not make as good a soldier; he will not be a soldier of the same calibre as a sailor, if he were allowed to go to sea. I think, again, of the premiers of our provinces who are willing to go all-out in their own way, whether we think they are right or wrong, in supporting the government, and in this regard I would make a suggestion. I think there are some things the provincial governments can do to help the war effort.

It may surprise you, Mr. Speaker, to know that I made my rounds of the beer parlours of the city of Ottawa. I was not surprised that I did not find a member of this house in any of them, either man or woman, but I did find these places crowded, and I think the premier of this province would do well to try to settle his own affairs and not leave it to the dominion government, because that traffic does coarsen life and unfit soldiers, muddling the brains of men.

Another thing is this. The provinces should do something with regard to old age pensioners. The sum of $20 a month is not very much to-day. Pensioners need a bonus; so do soldiers' wives and soldiers' widows. In my opinion the provincial governments could very well exert themselves and go all-out in their own way.

I notice that in most of the countries at war there is a seven-day week, twenty-four hours a day, in the production of war materials. Well, I have been taught from my youth that the human body needs one day in seven, and if a man does not take one day in seven he will certainly take all his Sundays in a row. I might mention our own car works in Fort William. Girls have gone in there to work with strong healthy bodies and vigorous minds, and I have known of several instances in which they were compelled to retire from their jobs for a month or two on account of ill health. If you do not take your Sabbath day you will pay for it. I would remind hon. members of the old proverb, drawn from the Bible, that if you break the moral law, the moral law will break you. We must "remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." A man who toils six days a week needs a day off in which he can get something spiritual to help him in his work. The greatest leaders in every age have recognized the need of one day's rest in seven, and I am sure the Minister of National Defence agrees with me in this regard. After a man has worked for six days, he needs the seventh day to rest. Of course, what he does on the Sabbath makes all the difference in the world. If he rests, in order to build up his mind and his spiritual powers, he will be the better fitted for the work he has to do. If he does not, so much the worse for him.

A famous physician, Sir James Crichton-Browne, said:

> We doctors in the treatment of nervous diseases, are now constantly compelled to prescribe periods of rest. Some periods are, I think, only Sundays in arrears.

The eminent conductor, Sir Landon Ronald, discontinued his Sunday concerts in 1928 on account of his health, saying: "I can no longer work seven days a week."

Gladstone attributed his long life to his rigid observance of the Lord's day.

President Coolidge was asked: "Cannot I worship God in the green fields?" He replied: "You can, but you don't."

Of course, I believe that the place of prayer is the place for a man to spend part of his Sunday, because he will hear something there that will put him in communion with the Master Workman, who will give him that stimulus necessary to fit him to play his part in life's work.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, when one has been in this house for a time, one can sense the feeling, the atmosphere that prevails in this chamber. I am convinced, and I think you will agree with me, that at this session there is a tenseness, an earnestness and a depth of feeling which I hope and believe goes even deeper than partisan feeling in the minds of members of this house. And I hope this feeling will be allowed free rein by the ministry, because if that is done, decisions may be reached, right here in parliament, which will point the way for the Canadian people during this dark, yet challenging period in our national life. Therefore, believing the house to be in such a frame of mind, may I state quite frankly at the beginning of my remarks that to-night my aim is to point out to my fellow members, and through them to the country, that Canada, our nation, of which we are justly so proud, is in deadly peril. I repeat those words; Canada is in deadly peril; and I aim also to convince members of this house and the people throughout the country that certain things can, should and must be done.

I speak as a representative from Canada on the Pacific. Canada is a two-ocean nation. I am always intrigued by that verse which is carved over the main door of this building, and which is as follows:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both east and west.

On the east we have those old provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Quebec, forming Canada on the Atlantic. But on the west coast, constituting Canada on the Pacific, we have only my own native province of British Columbia.

Since the house met last November, war has come to the Pacific. The fires of war are raging round that great ocean. War is the grim business of killing and being killed. Those of us who served in the last war are only too well aware of that fact. But this war is far more grim than the last one by reason of the development of the bombing aeroplane, which has made possible the slaughter of thousands upon thousands of civilians, men, women and children, and because the war in which we are engaged is a war of extermination. Nowhere will it be fought with more savagery than on the Pacific. That was made perfectly clear on December 7 last, when Japan struck at Pearl Harbour while her envoys were still negotiating with the envoys of the nation she attacked. Japan struck and crippled the United States fleet. Crippled the United States fleet! Those are ominous words for Canadians on the Pacific, because year in and year out we have been told that our defence on the Pacific was the United States fleet, and that, in fact, was the truth.

In the seven weeks that have intervened, the British fleet in the Pacific has also been crippled by the loss of those two great battleships, the Prince of Wales and the Repulse. Various strategic islands have been seized. Hong Kong has been taken, wiping out our courageous but ill-fated, ill-equipped and ill-trained Canadian sacrifice force. Hong Kong! Members of this house and all Canadians must burn that name into their memory, for we have a score to settle with the Japanese over Hong Kong. And it must be settled not in North America but on the far side of the Pacific.

These seven weeks have seen Manila taken and the Americans fighting a last-ditch stand for the Philippines; Malaya overrun, with the British fighting a last-ditch stand for Singapore; and Singapore, whether it stands or falls, no longer effective as a great naval base. Bases have been taken in Borneo and in the Celebes for an attack on Java, which is the heart of the Netherlands East Indies. Bases have been taken in the Australian islands, as a prelude, the Australian people believe for an attack on their mainland. May I point out to hon. members that Canadians on the Pacific have great sympathy for Australia. We have a keen understanding of their attitude, because we realize that Canada may eventually be placed in exactly the same position.

In short, these seven weeks of war on the Pacific have placed Japan in control of that ocean. As my authority for that statement, I quote none other than the Britist Prime Minister, Right Hon. Winston Churchill, who, in his speech on January 27, only this week, is quoted as having said:

> For a time, therefore, naval superiority in the Pacific and the Malayan archipelago passed into the hands of Japan. How long it will remain in Japanese hands is a matter on which I do not intend to speculate, but it will be long enough for Japan to inflict many heavy and painful losses on all the united nations who have possessions in the far east.

[Mr. Green.]

Further on in his speech, referring to the United States as well as Great Britain, he said:

> I expect and I have made no secret of it that we shall both receive severe ill usage at Japanese hands in 1942.

So Canadians on the Pacific find themselves closer to war than any other Canadians, and more directly involved. I do not wish to make light of the peril in which our fellow Canadians on the Atlantic find themselves. They too are in great peril, but on the Pacific ocean there is no island fortress of Great Britain between Canada and the enemy. There is as our only protection a crippled United States fleet. There is an enemy—not without a fleet, as the German Reich, but an enemy with a first-class navy; an enemy with a first-class and very strong merchant marine, an excellent air force, and an army that has had experience in warfare for the last ten years. And there is an ocean—the Pacific ocean, such a vast ocean that there is plenty of room for fleets to operate without their being discovered.

Canadians on the Pacific coast have already experienced that sudden warning which can be appreciated only by those who have heard it in their homes. They have heard coming suddenly over their radios—"An enemy attack on the Canadian coast is imminent"—and then the radio station shuts off. The attack, presumably, was expected from aircraft carriers off the coast. Sooner or later that attack will come. It did not come at the time we received the warning, but I am convinced that sooner or later it will come, and our coastal cities and hamlets will be bombed. The people of British Columbia are not whining about that. They are not of the type who whine, any more than are any other Canadians. We are not a whining nation.

They realize, too, that the United States has bases in Alaska. To the north and northwest of us there are great United States bases which afford considerable protection to us, but at the same time those bases are a great menace to Japan. The base on the Aleutian islands is, I believe, the nearest hostile base to the shores of Japan. Therefore those Alaskan bases may be—"may be" I repeat—the next in line for attack by Japan. It may be that included in the objectives of such an attack would be our own city of Prince Rupert, the Queen Charlotte islands, and even Port Alberni. These may be sought by the Japanese as nuisance bases, or even as invasion bases.

Should they be taken by the Japanese, it would be possible from them for the enemy to bomb our coastal cities at short range; they would be in a position to bomb our shipyards, our war industries. The greatest shipbuilding industry in Canada is on the Pacific coast. Our heaviest merchant-shipbuilding programme is being carried out on that coast. It would be possible to bomb United States coastal cities where, again, are naval bases and great aeroplane plants. I believe 90 per cent of United States aeroplane factories are located on the Pacific coast. It would be possible to make the whole of British Columbia a battle-ground, and even to bomb the prairie cities such as Edmonton and Calgary.

This is not just an idle fancy of my own. I should like to read to hon. members dispatches from Japan published on January 9 of this year, only about two or three weeks ago. I quote this report of an article in the Japan Times and Advertiser, controlled by the Japanese foreign office:

> The Japan Times and Advertiser, controlled by the foreign office, declared to-day it was within the realm of probability "that the armed forces of this country will land on the American continent" . . . "The contention that the United States cannot be invaded" the article declared "is as much a myth as that the Maginot line could not be taken or that Singapore and Pearl Harbour are impregnable. . . . The fall of both the Philippines and Singapore was forecast soon. After that, the newspaper went on, "It will be for us to say when, where and how we will strike."

Let us not forget that the shortest route from Japan to San Francisco is by the Aleutian islands and the coast of British Columbia—much shorter than by way of the Hawaiian islands. Let us remember that Vancouver is closer to Yokohama than is Sydney, Australia.

Canadians on the Pacific coast know, also, that the Canadian armed forces on that coast are hopelessly inadequate to deal with an attempted invasion. They know that large numbers of our troops on that coast are home-defence troops, called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. This means that fighting troops from Prince Rupert could not go, as a unit, to the neighbouring panhandle of Alaska, should Alaska be attacked. Fighting troops from units defending Victoria at this time could not go to neighbouring San Juan island, or across the strait of Juan de Fuca to Port Angeles. It means that the fighting troops guarding the city of Vancouver could not go across the line to Bellingham, should Bellingham be attacked, because many of them are home-defence troops. Our units could not go across to aid United States troops —joint defence council or no joint defence council. On the other hand, if you please, young Americans could and doubtless would be sent to help us, should we be attacked.

That is an intolerable position. It is intolerable for a brave and proud people. It is intolerable for a nation which in the last war sent out fighting men who proved themselves on the battle-field the peers of any men on this globe, a nation which in this war has sent abroad young men of the same breed.

Canadians on the Pacific coast know, too, that what forces we have are not all adequately equipped. For example, we find this press dispatch on the front page of the Vancouver Province of January 3, nearly a month after Japan had declared war:

> Guns coming here within few weeks.

The dispatch goes on to say:

> A number of anti-aircraft guns have been allotted to the Vancouver defence area, and on their arrival here within the next few weeks will be mounted at strategic points through the district, an army spokesman announced to-day.

And as for rifles for the reserve army—some of them have no rifles at all. Those who have, I believe, are, or were within the last few days, using old United States rifles with red bands round the top, signifying that they were not fit to be fired.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend must not say that. If my hon. friend knows anything about the matter at all, he knows they are perfectly fit for service in every way. I suggest to my hon. friend that he get the facts. If he would come to my office and get the facts, instead of making statements of that kind in the house, he would be doing better service for the defence of Canada, and not bringing comfort to the enemy.

Mr. GREEN: I am making my speech, and I ask that I should not be interrupted.

Mr. RALSTON: I appeal to my hon. friend. I do say to him that if he would get the facts before making statements of that kind, it would help considerably in the defence of Canada, and certainly would not afford the comfort to the enemy that a speech of this kind is bound to do.

Mr. GREEN: That is old talk, about helping the enemy. The enemy have known for a long time. And as for the rifles—it might be possible to fire them a few times, but it is a bad thing when the men who defend the Pacific coast have to do so with old United States rifles that were made twenty-five years ago; when they have not modern rifles.

Mr. RALSTON: I suggest that my hon. friend does not even know the first rudiments in reference to the supply of rifles. I suggest that he come to my office and find out before he makes a statement of that kind.

Mr. GREEN: I think the minister is going a little too far.

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend is going a little too far.

Mr. GREEN: I do not propose to try to follow the minister along that line. It is the lives of our families, our relatives and our people that are at stake in this matter. I did not come here to make cheap political talk; I am worried about the people on the Pacific coast. The men who are defending us are entitled to the best equipment that can be obtained in Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: Hear, hear. And if my hon. friend will find out about the availability of equipment, it will be a different story. He should also find out with regard to the efficiency of these rifles about which he is speaking.

Mr. GREEN: There are men in the active army on the coast who have no rifles at all. These are not men in the battalions, but in other branches of the active army. Every soldier on that coast should have a rifle and should be trained to use it. He should be trained to fight regardless of what branch of the service he happens to belong to. And again, Japanese fishermen on the Pacific coast have been made to turn over their boats. I think this was a wise move on the part of the government, but Canadians out there see these Japanese fishermen who naturally may be embittered, going back to their villages up and down the coast. There are eighteen hundred of these fishermen, and if they saw fit they could guide enemy naval forces to every bay, every landing place and perhaps every gun on the Canadian coast. Meanwhile the government ponders what is to be done next. And they see that this government has done everything possible to foist the responsibility for air raid precautions upon the provinces and the municipalities, although it is clearly a problem of defence and should be handled by the dominion.

To sum up, the Canadians on the Pacific coast are restless; they are worried, they are annoyed. Now they are given a plebiscite in which the following question is asked:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

What will go through their minds when they are voting on that question if there happen to be air raids threatened at the time? The Prime Minister talks of unity, but this plebiscite will not create unity among the people on the Pacific coast. So much for the peril in which Canada finds herself.

I shall now go on to suggest certain things which can, which should and which must be done. First of all, let us cast out from our minds at once the thought: It cannot happen here. That has been the curse of democratic countries in this war. Let us replace it with the thought: It can happen here; right here in Ottawa, in Halifax, in Toronto, in Vancouver, or in any other part of Canada. No thought will make us more realistic, no thought will help us more to avoid reverses and to gain victories.

For example, I am convinced that the ministry have not given serious consideration to the possibility of a Japanese invasion of Canada. If they had, they would not risk the delay and confusion that will be caused by this plebiscite. I am convinced further that the staff on the Pacific coast and the staff here in Ottawa have not considered what they would do in the event of invasion. Our new chief of staff is reported in the Vancouver press of December 18, less than two weeks after Japan had declared war, as follows:

> "Canada's Pacific coast defences are, I believe, capable of coping with any probable attacks that we may have to face", Lieutenant-General Kenneth Stuart, chief of the Canadian general staff, said this morning on his arrival here following a three-day inspection of defence areas on Vancouver island.
> "I have no doubt," General Stuart added, "that I will be accused of complacency in this regard, and yet that is far from correct. We are fully aware of the dangers that have developed with Japan's entry into the war and we are adjusting our forces to meet these dangers."
> The chief of staff stressed the possibility of hit-and-run attacks along the British Columbia coast. "I do not say we can prevent these attacks but I do think we are in a position to deal with them."

Further on, the report states:

> The possibility of a Japanese invasion here, he believed, is extremely remote.

That reminds me of the words of Air Marshal Sir Robert Brooke-Popham, who said in Singapore on December 8, the day after Japan struck:

> We are confident. Our defences are strong and our weapons are efficient. We had plenty of warning and our preparations are made and tested.

Words which unfortunately held more of hope than of fact.

If this invasion attack should come, probably our generals would make another of these strategic retreats with the remnants of our forces to the mountains, leaving the people on the coast to their fate, and in the result thousands of Canadians would have to die to get back what need never have been lost. Let us make up our minds now; let us tell our commanders and our people that not one inch of Canadian soil is to be yielded without a fight.

My second suggestion as to what should be done is that we should give our commanders armies that can fight anywhere. At the present time we are giving commanders in Canada units made up of two kinds of soldiers, those who can be taken beyond Canada and those who cannot. That makes it impossible to build up here an efficient fighting force. Let us go further and make certain that we can keep these armies reinforced with fully trained troops, not troops who have had less than sixteen weeks training. I believe at the present time, and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) can correct me if I am wrong, that even the fourth and sixth divisions are not up to full strength.

Mr. RALSTON: I may tell my hon. friend that the fourth division, which is an armoured division, is up to full strength for an armoured division. I cannot remember just the number it was below for an infantry division, but I think there were one or two units that were not mobilized. With regard to the sixth division, I think the strength is about 10,000; that is nearly the strength of three brigade groups.

Mr. GREEN: Then the fourth is not up to strength.

Mr. RALSTON: It is up to strength for an armoured division. I stated that, as an infantry division, I think there were one or two units that were not mobilized.

Mr. GREEN: The announcement that this was to be turned into an armoured division was made only a couple of days ago.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend get my point? There were a couple of units which had not been mobilized. That is the correct situation. It was not up to strength on that account.

Mr. GREEN: My suggestion is that we make certain that there are ample reinforcements, and that means conscription. Why should we dodge this issue of conscription as a means of organizing our man-power? I was greatly impressed by the report of a Gallup poll taken in Great Britain where the common people of Great Britain were asked what advice they would give to the common people of the United States about the war. One of these suggestions was that man and woman power should be organized efficiently and at once, that they should not take half-way measures. Why should we in Canada hesitate? In Great Britain we had Prime Minister Churchill saying these words this week:

> It looks as if we were in for a very bad time. But, provided we all stand together and provided we throw in the last spasm of our strength, it also looks more than it ever did before as if we were going to win.

Canada should throw in more of her strength and not leave it all to Great Britain. This government, I believe, feels much the same; otherwise it would not be calling for a plebiscite. Let us have conscription, and let us have it without delay, but let us make it complete conscription of all our resources right down the line, including industrial and financial resources, as advocated, for example, by the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League.

My third suggestion is that things must be done now, without delay. We should pay more attention to timing. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he spoke on Monday, gave us a little curtain-lecture on the importance of timing. Well, the principal thing about timing in this war is not to be too late. Let us realize that in this war every day is precious. Japan struck nearly two months ago, and this government rushed in to be the first to declare war. Apparently it is going to be the last to rush in to take up the fight. The ministry should have moved at once to put this nation on an all-out war basis. But they did not. Now, although they see the need, they are taking time out to hold a plebiscite, which means, at the minimum, a delay of three months. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that that is making a mockery of talk of a total war effort. We must wage war now—not a matter of months hence.

Finally, I have suggestions with respect to the Pacific front. The Pacific coast is a front, and should be treated as such. It is a war front, and on that Pacific front we should have one supreme commander. I believe that we now have three commanders—and the ministers will correct me if I am wrong. I believe that the army commander, the navy commander and the air force commander work together by cooperation rather than any one of them being in command over the other two. That was the situation at Pearl Harbour, except that instead of three commanders there were only two. But Canada, almost two months after Pearl Harbour, still has a triple command on that Pacific front. Also let us make it a fighting command where we shall put, not one of our older generals, but one of our most aggressive commanders with experience overseas in this war, and with a fighting staff built up on the same basis as those in Great Britain. We may see fighting on the Pacific coast before our troops in Great Britain get into action.

Then let us build up a striking force, not a force that will merely sit there to defend, but build up on the Pacific coast a striking force which could be an expeditionary force. For example, why should Canada not have air troops; trained and in position on that coast? They would be of the greatest advantage in recapturing any point of the coast that might be attacked and captured. No troops would be of more use, but apparently we have none in Canada at the present time. I suggest that the government obviously is treating the Pacific coast as a secondary theatre of war. The Prime Minister said the other day that perhaps—perhaps—there was nothing certain about it—we would raise another new division to help defend Canada after the fourth division had gone to Britain. Again, yesterday, when I asked him whether Canada was to be represented on the new Pacific defence council, he said he did not know anything about it at all, that it had only to do with the far, far away southern Pacific, and apparently he was not very much interested.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has said one thing which I must correct. He said that Canada was treating the Pacific coast as a secondary theatre of war. I say that Canada in our defence plans is treating the Pacific coast with the greatest seriousness, with the seriousness which it deserves. Within a very few days after war was declared with Japan, the chief of the general staff went out to the Pacific coast himself to inspect the defence positions all up and down that coast. My hon. friend has read from his statement, but the fact that he does not agree with the chief of the general staff as to the technical and strategic position does not mean that we are treating the Pacific coast in any secondary way at all. My hon. friend knows, if he knows anything, that the dispositions made out there indicate that we regard the Pacific coast defences as of unquestionable importance, and I would add that the Pacific coast has defence, in certain items of equipment, that no other part of Canada has.

Mr. GREEN: That is not very much for the government supporters to applaud because there it should be. The Pacific coast is the portion of Canada most likely to be attacked.

Then I suggest that the government should give leadership in organizing the people in the matter, for example, of air raid precautions, in organizing home guards and arranging for insurance against bomb damage. There has been talk of that for months, ever since Japan struck, but no plan, so far as I am aware, has been announced. No minister of the government, including our minister from British Columbia, has been on the coast since war was declared on December 7. There should be a minister of this government resident on the Pacific coast during this present crisis.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I will support that.

Mr. GREEN: I did not say that necessarily we want our own minister there.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It will never be left to your judgment, thank heaven.

Mr. GREEN: There is another grave danger on the Pacific coast. Canadians on the Pacific are entitled to and insist on getting complete protection from treachery, protection from being stabbed in the back. The rest of Canada, under successive dominion governments, failed to listen to our representatives from British Columbia when they asked for an end to Japanese immigration. But now what British Columbia members for the last thirty-five years have been telling other members of the house would happen has come to pass, and the rest of Canada must do its part. It must now come to our help. I appeal to private members on the government side of the house to see that the ministry do come to our help in this matter. We have at least 24,000 of Japanese origin in our province, all in the coastal area—fishermen, men working in our woods in the lumbering industry, men farming on both sides of the great Fraser river valley, which means that they are astride both of our transcontinental lines. There has been treachery elsewhere from Japanese in this war, and we have no reason to hope that there will be none in British Columbia. If we were in a similar position, if we were Canadians in Japan, we might feel much the same; we would be only too willing to assist British troops should they attempt to land on the Japanese coast. The only complete protection we can have from this danger is to remove the Japanese population from the province. I believe that the commanders of the fighting forces on the coast and the special committee on the Japanese problem set up by this government have advised that at least all Japanese males be removed from the coastal areas. The ministers will correct me if I am wrong. This government announced on January 14 that it would define certain areas as protected areas and move out from those areas Japanese nationals—not saying whether they would move out the Japanese born in our province or those who have become naturalized, and no man can get a fishing licence without taking out naturalization papers. But it has not yet been done, and British Columbia is waiting, waiting rather impatiently, to know whether this was just a stall, to know just what this government intends to do and when it intends to do it.

Mr. RALSTON: I may say to my hon. friend that the protected area has been defined. It is a matter for the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Justice. I am satisfied that the submission to council has already been signed and that the protected area will be declared at once.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister, what it is?

Mr. RALSTON: It is defined by a line hundreds of miles long. It is a matter for reference to a map.

Mr. GREEN: The whole policy on the Japanese question should be announced without further delay. We ask that we be given complete protection.

In conclusion, the situation as I have stated it is as I see it and, I believe, as it is seen by the great majority of the Canadians on the Pacific. I am in deadly earnest because I believe that this nation is in dire peril, and also because I believe that at this time, as never before, the members of this parliament hold in their hands the future of the Canadian people. In this dark and challenging time Canadians look to us here in the Canadian parliament. Let us rise to the occasion and give them the bold and far-seeing leadership to which they are so justly entitled.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, the members of this house, are extremely fortunate to-night to have the privilege of hearing, not just one, but two members from British Columbia. I realize that some hon. members from the rest of Canada have long awaited this privilege; I have been looking forward to it myself. I did not know that I was to have the good fortune to follow the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green)—a good personal friend of mine, though we may disagree politically.

I want, for a few minutes, to discuss the war effort, particularly in so far as it concerns the conscription issue; the Japanese situation, of which I have heard a little during the last few minutes; and agriculture.

In days gone by, all of us used to hear of the famous "Four Hundred". Coming from a farm, I never had the privilege of living among them, but I have read a little about them in the Toronto Globe and Mail or some such paper. More recent interest is in the famous "Two Hundred". Most of the "Four Hundred," I have understood, wear diamonds; they are invited to the houses of the Vanderbilts and similar mansions. Now, having heard of the famous "Four Hundred", I wanted also to discover what I could of the "Two Hundred". One of the good things that the Dominion of Canada does is to provide a library in which one can get information concerning all the leading-lights of Canada and the world at large. I repaired to the library to get some information. I recommend to hon. members, or some of them, that they spend a little of their time enlarging their information, as I do. In the library there is a shelf of biographies of the great men of Canada, and of history, and I want to commend the librarian, whoever he may be, whether appointed by the last government or the present one, for his discerning talent in selecting books. The first book I found on the shelf was a life of Winston Churchill by Robert Sencourt. Nobody can find fault with that selection; Mr. Churchill is one of the greatest men that ever lived, one of the outstanding figures of this or any other generation. Then I found "Roosevelt, A Study in Fortune and Power". Can anybody name a man who has contributed more to the allied cause than Roosevelt? And no man has done more for the British empire in cementing the friendship between Roosevelt and Churchill than has Mackenzie King.

Naturally, being a modest and unassuming young man from the far west, I hesitate to tell you of the next book I found in the library on the shelf of lives of famous men. I hope that my hon. friend the member for Vancouver South is listening carefully. I will mention, first, the name of the author, Blanchard Jerrold. It is a little red book, well bound; its title, standing as the book does on that shelf of lives of famous men, is "George Cruikshank". Any hon. member may get this book, and I shall be happy to autograph a copy.

I shall not take up much time, on such a serious occasion as the present in congratulating the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, although I claim that I may have a greater knowledge of such speeches than many hon. members who are sitting in this present session. If the Speaker would permit me—I do not know whether I would be in order or not—I could divert now and give half of my speech in the Japanese language; let me say that if conditions in the west are allowed to continue as they have been going, everybody in British Columbia will, in a few years, be speaking Japanese.

I am very proud to say that my roommate is now serving overseas, and I have the privilege of looking after his riding as well as my own. I say I consider it a privilege, because he is where a good many men ought to be who are talking about conscription. Just this evening, while the hon. member for Vancouver South was speaking, I received a cable, which I will read to the house because it concerns two hon. members from British Columbia who are supporters of the present government, and I have full authority to speak on their behalf in this connection.

Mr. George Cruickshank, M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Met Alan Chambers in town and heard Churchill in parliament yesterday. Advise you join the army and come over.

James Sinclair, M.P.

I want to say to this committee of Two Hundred, "Join the army and go over; don't try to send others over."

As I said, I have heard something in connection with speeches made in the house by those who move and second addresses in reply to speeches from the throne. My roommate made his speech so often in my hearing that, before he was through, I could have repeated it in English, French, Japanese and Esperanto and done it better than he did, so far as being word perfect is concerned. One word which I heard frequently in that speech and which possibly some of my friends in the party to which I belong do not like particularly, was used by him with regard to the war effort of Canada—the word "complacency". He chose that word, and it echoed and re-echoed from one end of Canada to the other.

Let me assure the house in all seriousness that I support a great deal of what the hon. member for Vancouver South has said with reference to the Japanese situation in British Columbia. Let me make this statement, in fairness to myself and to those whom I represent—and I may say that I represent with the hon. member for New Westminster, 75 per cent of the Japanese population in British Columbia. We are not satisfied, and under our democratic system we have a right to say so in the houses of parliament. We are not satisfied with the action that has so far been taken in my riding, at least, with regard to the Japanese situation.

I would rather enjoy it if any member of this house or anyone else were to question my patriotism or loyalty; but much as I love my country, I love my family more. I live in the Fraser valley where we are surrounded by Japanese. I have read all about Pearl Harbour, and I can tell the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) what our views are out in that part of the country. I want to tell him emphatically what we think, and I say this with all respect to him; for with only one exception, so far as this House of Commons is concerned, that exception being the Prime Minister of this dominion (Mr. Mackenzie King), I revere the Minister of National Defence more than any one else. I say to him, however—and I am speaking my own opinion as a member from British Columbia, and one who should know something about the Japanese situation—that he has been ill-advised with respect to the situation in our province.

We cannot afford to wait; we cannot afford to take chances after Pearl Harbour. I wish to make my position clear, and it is my duty to do so. I was never consulted by the so-called committee—not the Department of National Defence, but the so-called committee, who know nothing about the Japanese situation in that province; nor was any other member from that province consulted. I regret the mistakes that have been made in that connection, and I have expressed my views on every platform on which I have spoken. I am not, however, worrying about mistakes made in the past so long as they are not repeated in the future. I want to warn the house and the Minister of National Defence—and I do so in all sincerity, irrespective of party—that there are no people living at present in the city of Ottawa who have any greater or more intimate or more thorough knowledge of the Japanese situation than is possessed by the members elected to parliament from that part of the country in which is to be found the "Japanese peril."

Let me pass on now to the subject of agriculture. I like to talk about that subject, because the only people who, I understand, have made any money in agriculture in the last few years are some of the farmers in Ontario. One of my hon. friends—I could call him by name, but I am not permitted to do so, and I have forgotten his riding—has a couple of race horses. I am ignorant about race horses; the only one I ever bet on came in last. I do not know anything about that sort of farming, but I do know something about agriculture, British Columbia agriculture at least. It is true that we are not getting a better price for our agricultural products than we did get; it would be foolish to deny this. But I should like to refer hon. members to the Vancouver Daily Province, a representative British Columbia paper. On the day I left British Columbia, that journal carried fourteen advertisements under the caption "milker wanted", in each of which the pay was stated to be $55 to $65 a month and board.

I realize that many members of the house cannot know a great deal about farming. That is natural. As I say, however, there were fourteen advertisements for "milker wanted", paying from $55 to $65 a month. To digress for a moment, I may say that for the first time since I have been in Ottawa I approve of one of these officials that have been appointed. I refer to Mr. Gordon, a man who knows his business and is administering the price-fixing plans. He has the courage of his convictions, and it is only men of that type who should have such responsibilities.

When we were getting a certain price for milk we were paying from $20 to $25 a month for labour, and now we are paying $55 to $65 and board and cannot get labour. I want to keep my record clear on this question. I do not blame labour; it is not getting what it is entitled to. But labour will agree with me, I believe, when I say that the prices which were set, so far as agriculture is concerned, were not set on the same basis as in the case of labour. So far as labour is concerned, they were set in accordance with high prices; this was not so with regard to agriculture.

Let me point out to my hon. friends to the extreme left, for whom I have great admiration, that the greatest safeguard labour has in Canada, or in any other country for that matter—I hope the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) is present—is organized agriculture. That is the greatest safeguard that labour can fall back upon. You could not keep a union going to-morrow if you did not have agriculture to fall back upon, and it is in the interests of labour as much as it is in mine to see that agriculture gets a fair break. As my respected leader said, agriculture is as much an integral part of the war effort as tanks, guns, or anything else. Everyone, I believe, agrees with that; but you cannot carry on a true war effort until such time as you put agriculture on a sound basis. I repeat, you cannot establish a true war effort until you put agriculture on a parity with labour and industry, and no one can tell me that this has yet been done.

Let me quote a few head-lines from the Ottawa Citizen:

> Controlled price for butter urged by dairy farmers.

Here is another:

> Proper proportion of guns and butter held victory aid.

As you will see, I am leading up to conscription.

Here is one point to which I think the government should pay particular attention. I strongly disapprove of the policy of bonuses. I am not from Saskatchewan or Alberta or Manitoba or any of the desolate countries, and I strongly disapprove of the policy of bonuses. I want to quote a head-line that appeared in a prominent paper last night, and to repeat something I said in the first speech I made in this house. The greatest asset Canada will have to offer when we come to discuss peace terms is our vast store of food. I do not think we should curtail the production of wheat; I think we should encourage it. I would far rather see more wheat grown in Canada than more gold produced in Kirkland Lake, British Columbia or anywhere else. This is the head-line that appeared in last evening's Citizen:

> Bread Selling in Athens for $15 per Loaf.
> Famine conditions in Greece are so acute that two thousand persons died in Athens alone in a single day, and bread sells for $15 a loaf, the Journal de Geneve reported to-day.

I need not read the rest of the dispatch; but is it not reasonable to expect that food will have more to do with the peace terms, after this war is over, than guns, tanks or anything else? I am firmly of that opinion, and I believe it is nonsense to curtail the production of foodstuffs. I think the government should pay the prairie farmer an adequate return on a reasonable acreage for as much wheat as he can produce, and let him produce it.

For a moment I want to turn to conscription. You may call it a plebiscite or anything you like, but that is what it amounts to. I honestly consider myself a friend of every man and woman in this house; at least I should like to think I am. I do not claim that I am more patriotic than any other hon. member. I do not claim that the party to which I belong is any more patriotic than any other party. I think we are all sincere in what we do, and so I hope what I have to say in this regard will be taken in good part, because I do not wish to give offence to anyone. In this, however, I speak as a veteran of the last war, as a farmer and as a member of parliament. For good and sufficient reasons many men were unable to serve in the last war; they were physically unfit, or something else prevented them from serving. But I must say—and in doing so I speak as a member of the Canadian Legion, and as a veteran accept full responsibility for what I am saying—that I think it ill-timed and ill-advised for any man to advocate, preach or talk conscription of the other fellow if he himself is under the age of sixty, if he did not serve in the last war, and has no son serving in this war. I am expressing my opinion, whether or not some people like it. I think it ill-advised for any man who is physically fit, of military age and not in uniform, to advocate that his neighbour's son be taken for this war. That is my opinion, and I stand by it. A great many of the men who have been talking about conscription know nothing about it. In the last war I served all the way from a private to a company commander; and I will take one volunteer in preference to any ten conscripts in any war. During my election campaign I said I believed, and I still firmly believe, that from the start we should have had compulsory selective service. It is the fairest way. But I want to repeat what I also said during the campaign, that it must be accompanied by the compulsory service of wealth and industry. That is what I said on every platform; that is what I still believe, and I speak as a returned soldier who is not afraid to go back to his riding at any time and face his electors. I believe in compulsory selective service from start to finish, but I believe that it must be accompanied by the conscription of wealth and industry.

I do not believe in red herrings, Mr. Speaker. I do not know where I heard it, but somewhere I heard that in some districts they can their lobsters and sell them, while in other districts they elect them. I am prepared to support any party that will come out with a legitimate proposition to help in winning this war; but when it is brought out as a red herring, as was the case with this famous committee of Two Hundred from Toronto, representing financial and vested interests, that is another matter. I will not say I am ashamed, but I am surprised that my good friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, whom I greatly admire, should even associate themselves with an amendment that will further such a dastardly attack on the democratic rights of the people of Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: But we have not.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Thank you; I am glad to hear that. I for one stand by my pledge, and will continue to stand by it. That pledge was given also by my leader and even by Doctor Manion, who said that before conscription for overseas service would be introduced, the people would be consulted. I am asking my friends in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation to remember that. This government is doing the only honourable thing in asking to be relieved of the pledges it gave in good faith. You may question whether or not the pledges should have been given, but they were given. So I am asking my friends in the extreme left corner—not too extreme; half-way down—to get out and work for this plebiscite, as I intend to do, and to vote for it, as I intend to do. As a member supporting the government, I firmly believe that if we break our pledges, we lose all we are fighting for. Then, after we have been released of our pledge let my friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation ask me to vote with them for the conscription of wealth, industry and man-power.

It has been said of the Liberal party that we would not take other people into the government. I do not know how much time I have left, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps you could check up and let me have a few more minutes anyway.

I want to point out that we as a Liberal party have been criticized because we did not form a national government. That is all this committee-of-two-hundred smoke-screen is, with respect to national government. That is all Tory stuff. They think it should be a national government of a few mining interests, a few financial interests; that is all this smoke-screen of conscription is about. They have not the courage to come out, as did the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, and declare their stand. They are hiding behind the smoke-screen of conscription, and yet they ask us to bring in members of all parties, or members from outside the government, and persons outside the House of Commons.

Yesterday I listened to the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), and I heard his objections with respect to the new Minister of Labour and the new Minister of Justice who are to be brought from outside the House of Commons. But it will be remembered that during the last two sessions hon. members in my hon. friend's party were demanding that we bring in the best brains of the country from without the house, or from anywhere. We all know that; they demanded it.

We now bring them in—and what do they do? They say, "Oh, you did not take them from your own little house around you." I may get around in time; maybe I should be over there on the government benches. But they blamed us when we did not take them from within, and when we have not taken them from without. What do they want us to do?

I want to say here and now that I have the greatest respect for the Conservative party, but I have not the slightest respect for the Tory party. Yes, I have great respect for the Conservative party. To be frank, I would not be here to-day if I had not had some friends in the Conservative and Cooperative Commonwealth Federation groups. I am willing to admit that. But I must point out that the Conservative party, when they asked us to form a national government did not have a man to offer. I would naturally assume that when they asked that, they wanted us to take a Conservative into the cabinet, but they frankly admit they had not one to give us. Yes, they admitted that they had not one to offer us, and they cannot deny it. I defy one of them to rise in his place and deny it. They had not one to offer us, I repeat, for the simple reason that they could not even get a leader among themselves. They had to go outside the party to get one. So, how could they give us one?

I want to tell hon. members—and I defy contradiction—that not a solitary Conservative western member voted voluntarily for Arthur Meighen to lead the party. He was not elected. I have had disputes with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), but I respect him. He is the leader of a great party, and he is a sincere man who was elected by the popular vote in his riding. He was chosen by the vote of his members to lead his party. But the new leader was not elected at all; he was appointed by George McCullagh, and a few others. We cannot get a member to come into this cabinet; and if we cannot get a prominent Conservative among the forty or so elected representatives in the House of Commons—and how so many people made that mistake in Canada, I cannot say—I want to ask: Where will we get a Conservative to come into this so-called national government, governed and directed by the Financial Post of Toronto and a man named McCullagh? Where would we get them? We cannot get a prominent Conservative across the Dominion of Canada to come in, because if he has not been elected, he is a dollar-a-year-man, or a prominent official in the Department of National Defence. Where are we going to get him, I would like to know—and I hope the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is in his seat.

I still have confidence in the youth of Canada. I believe I have made myself clear on the matter of conscription; even the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation will agree that I have made myself clear. It is my opinion that we can get sufficient volunteers at the present time. If the time ever comes—and it may—when we have to enforce conscription, then, party or no party, it must be done. I am a Canadian and a Britisher first; party comes last, so far as I am concerned.

I do not believe it is necessary yet to enforce conscription, but I must point out that if voluntary enlistments have not been what they should have been, nothing is more to blame than the Department of National Defence. At the time of the last war we had what was known as the intelligence branch. In this war, in so far as my private opinion is concerned, we have what is sometimes called the recruiting branch. I call it the "stupidity branch," and that is the reason we have not more volunteers.

I should like to describe one case in the principal city of my constituency. This has reference to a young chap who earned a gold medal in his senior matriculation year at high school. He had the leading record in British Columbia, so far as graduation is concerned. This boy went to a Royal Canadian Air Force recruiting office. I must add, in passing—and I say this in all sincerity—that he was a Tory, I am sorry to say. I should have preferred him to be a Social Crediter, or something else. However, he was a Tory. Remember, I am not drawing on my imagination, because I could give the boy's name. He went to the recruiting officer appointed by the Department of National Defence—I am sure he must have been an officer appointed to keep them out. Do you know what he said? Well, he said, first of all, "Where are you from"? and the boy replied that he was from the farm. Well, God help the day when any son from a farm in Canada is not as worthy of consideration and respect as any other man—even if he may come from the city of Toronto. This recruiting officer said to the young man, "Oh, you do not want to join the Royal Canadian Air Force; you would not be at home in the officers' mess; look at your hands." That boy had earned his way through high school, even to the point of winning the gold medal, and yet he was told that he would not feel at home, because his hands were rough. But that boy bombed Germany on several occasions, and after a raid over Berlin he is now missing.

There is great stupidity in the recruiting offices, and that is the reason why we have not more volunteers. Then, there is another constituency I happen to represent, during the absence of my roommate. I refer to the constituency of Vancouver North. The second largest shipyard in Canada is in that constituency, and it is operated by a man having millions of dollars. That man has three sons, two of whom are twins nineteen years of age. The other is twenty-one years old. This boy is missing somewhere over Germany. The other two boys are serving to-day in England in the Royal Air Force. Some stupid, ignorant representative of this select outfit—God knows who selected it—called up the mother of this lad who is missing. The father of this boy is quite a wealthy man and has been doing a marvellous job in his war work. This stupid, ignorant appointee of some official who has undermined the government and undermined the war effort called up this lady and said, "I am sorry to tell you, but you have not a God's chance of ever seeing your son again." Why did he want to tell her that? These are the stupid asses who are to be found in that building not far from here. If you are short of recruits, I could get enough to fill ten divisions from the Jackson building, the national defence building or the dollar-a-day men.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) will excuse me if I do not try to follow the many arguments he has presented to-night. There is, however, one thing I must say. The speech you are going to hear now will not be half as good as the one you have just heard. Following two hon. members from British Columbia, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), and the hon. member for Fraser Valley, I cannot help realizing, as I am sure all other hon. members do, the grave situation that exists on the western coast. I would, however, point out to these hon. members that we in eastern Canada have realized for the last two years that the situation was very serious. Perhaps it is the newness of the situation on the western coast that has impressed the hon. members so emphatically during the last few weeks or months.

I agree that the western coast is in danger and that every effort should be made to meet that danger. I am aware also that we have been in danger on the eastern coast for over two years and are still in grave danger. This simply emphasizes the fact that Canada is a great and large country, and I am sure that Canadians, whether they come from the east, from the middle or from the west, are interested in one thing only—the defence of Canada as a whole.

Any remarks which I make this evening will of necessity be quite brief. I have heard only a little of this debate because I have been here but a few hours since the session opened, having had other duties to perform during my short stay in Ottawa. I understand the mover, (Mr. Fournier, Hull) and the seconder, (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City), of the address made eloquent speeches. It is just what I would expect from both of those hon. gentlemen because I have been with them in the house for the past six years, and I know they are able debaters. As to the substance of their remarks, there is naturally a great difference of opinion. From what I have heard I do not think I can agree with the substance of the remarks of either one of them.

I was surprised at the attitude taken by the hon. member for Brantford City. Brantford is one of the most patriotic cities in the dominion, and I do not believe his remarks represent the opinion of the people in that splendid city.

We have heard a great deal about the promises that were made in the election of 1940, and this will be the chief topic of my remarks this evening. I believe both the senior parties made a great mistake by stating as planks in their platforms that they were not in favour of conscription. If we had been honest with the people of Canada, as we should have been when a war was on, we would have told them that if conscription were necessary, we would be in favour of it. We find ourselves in our present position because we neglected to do that. In the light of present events it would have been both an honourable and a proper attitude for these two parties to take. Being wrong, then I contend that we only perpetuate the wrong by calling for a plebiscite. Two wrongs have never made a right, and I do not think any argument that can be presented now will make them right.

I saw a report of some remarks made the other day in Montreal by the premier of Quebec. He was addressing a mass meeting, and there was a clamorous cry against conscription. Young men who should be in khaki were clamouring against conscription to defend the country in which they live. The argument used by the premier of Quebec was that we should consider the position in which Australia finds herself to-day because she sent so many of her men out of the country. A good many of those men were volunteers. The fact that a man volunteers for active service does not mean that he will be sent out of the country; it is up to the Department of National Defence to say whether he shall be sent out of the country. If he is needed in Canada, he remains here; if he is needed overseas, he is sent overseas. To say that because we have conscription all our men will be sent out of the country and will not be here to defend the country if needed, is not a logical argument. It is one which should not have been used before an intelligent audience by the premier of Quebec.

I agree with the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White), who spoke yesterday and said that there was an implied promise on the part of the government. Sometimes an implied promise is stronger than a spoken one, and in this case there is no doubt which is the stronger. It is a more binding promise than anything that could be said in the heat of an election. Then there was a definite promise by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—all hon. members heard it—to the effect that we must wage a total war. What does total war mean? I would say it means that we must wage war to the limit of our resources, both material and man-power. I believe that is the definition which the Prime Minister himself would give.

The Prime Minister says that he wishes to keep a promise which he made in the heat of the election to the people of the Dominion of Canada. He went on to say that the condition in which the world finds itself to-day is due to broken promises. That is just one of the reasons, and, I would say, the least. The present-day condition of the world is not due entirely to broken promises. It is due to the fact that the democratic countries of the world ignored those broken promises of Germany and Italy. They knew that the enemy countries were arming but they made no effort to arm themselves or prepare in any way to meet the terrible crisis which is now upon us.

I am opposed to this plebiscite being held, and I have four reasons for opposing it. First, I think it is unnecessary and unfair. Second, I think the money being expended for this purpose should be used for other purposes where it would do more good. True, it may be only a matter of $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, but every dollar counts at the present time, and there is no reason why we should waste one dollar or three million dollars. Third, it is a waste of valuable time. If the Prime Minister intends to bring in compulsory service for overseas—I think it is fair to assume that he does because otherwise, why hold the plebiscite?—why should we waste three precious months? Now is the time to act, and time is very valuable to men who are being trained for our armed forces. Two or three months may make all the difference in the world, and on that count I say it is not fair or just that we hold a plebiscite at this time. My fourth reason is that to hold a plebiscite is shelving responsibility. We, the elected representatives of the people of this Dominion of Canada, if we have the intelligence we should have, are the ones who should decide this question, and here in this house is the place where the decision should be made.

Why do I say that this plebiscite is unnecessary? The reason is that I believe the people of this dominion would be behind the government if they declared that compulsory service overseas was necessary. We need only look at the press of this country from one end to the other. I believe that the press reflects the opinion of the people and that the people of this dominion to-day would be behind the government in imposing compulsory service on this country if it were necessary. Furthermore, the government knows the actual circumstances, and the people do not. We in this House of Commons do not altogether know the whole situation. But the government hear reports every day from every sector in which the war is being waged and know the facts. Let them tell the facts to this House of Commons, and then place the responsibility on the elected representatives of the people to decide what shall be done.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that a plebiscite is unfair. Why? Whom are we asking to decide this question? We are asking the mothers with sons of military age who would have to go overseas, mothers who do not know the actual facts. It is they whom we are asking to go to the polls to put their ballots tremblingly in the box to send their own sons away, and without knowing whether it is necessary or not. On that count I say a plebiscite is not fair. The same applies to the fathers of these young men, and to the sons themselves. But these young men, I believe, would willingly go if the great necessity for men for active service were pointed out to them.

As to recruiting, I am proud to say that I have good results in my own province of New Brunswick. About eighty per cent of the men who served under me have enlisted for active service. That is not true of every other section of this dominion. I do not know the facts, of course, relative to all the other sections, but I do know that there are sections which have done wonderfully well, and other sections which have failed miserably so far as enlistments are concerned. I have had young men say to me, "If they want us and we are needed, why does the government not enact legislation to that effect?" After the thirty-day training period the young men of this country were compelled to go into the service for the duration of the war and I can say without fear of contradiction that very few of these young men, who were told they had to stay in the service for the duration, complained. I could count on my fingers the young men who went through my training camp and complained of having to stay in the service after taking the thirty days or four months training. Nearly all of them accepted the situation as a necessity, and I believe that if the government had told them that it was necessary for them to serve not only in Canada but in any other part of the world where their services were needed, they would just as gladly have accepted that fact as they did the other form of compulsion.

I have also had young men come to me and say that they were willing to enlist if they could first go home and consult their parents. I have had them come back to me after discussing the matter with their parents and tell me that they were sorry but they had to change their minds. These young men were humiliated and ashamed. But had their parents known that it was necessary for them to serve, these young men would have been spared that humiliation, and I am sure the parents would not have felt very badly about it either.

As I said a few moments ago, we are proud of our record in recruiting in the little province of New Brunswick. We have more than filled our quota on every occasion. That is also true of other sections. The little province of Prince Edward Island has a record of which it may justly be proud. I think most men have enlisted from a spirit of patriotism. I am quite satisfied of that. And may I point out to hon. members that in New Brunswick we have a mixed population? We have in the north our Acadians, of whom we are justly proud, and then we have in the south the descendants of the Loyalists, the Scotch, the Irish and the English. All these races in New Brunswick have been doing and are doing their share. The Acadians from the north have come to my camp in large numbers, splendid young men, as have men from every other section of the province.

There is another reason why possibly we have had more enlistments in my province, and this is not such a creditable one. We have not the war industries in New Brunswick that are to be found in other parts of Canada. I shall not take the time of the house to go into that to any extent, but I should like to give the following facts which were obtained in a study prepared for the Dalhousie University Bulletin on Public Affairs for the year 1940.

On a per capita basis, Munitions and Supply contracts to the end of 1940 amounted to $63 per person for Canada as a whole, but only to $19 for the maritimes. Conditions have changed somewhat for the better since then. Again, on the basis of $1,000 invested in industry, the figures show $205 for the dominion as a whole and $112 for the maritimes.

Government grants to industry for capital equipment have gone 42 per cent to Ontario, 41 per cent to Quebec, 10 per cent to the prairies, 4 per cent to British Columbia—since then that figure for British Columbia has greatly improved—and the remaining 3 per cent went to the maritimes, Nova Scotia getting 2.75 per cent, leaving New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island practically neglected. That may be another reason why the young men of our province have enlisted in larger numbers than men in other sections of Canada.

My own constituency of Royal has done well. Most of our farmers are dairymen and they find it very difficult to carry on at the present time on acount of the great number of young men, trained dairymen, who have left that part of the province.

Another great plea that was made by the Prime Minister was for national unity. It is hard for me to understand the conception of national unity in this dominion. I have not defined it for myself, and I do not propose to undertake to do so for others, but I would ask this question. Is it unity when many of our young men from one section of this dominion go and fight the battles of Canada and very few men come forward from some other section? I do not think that sort of thing tends towards unity. I do not think that is the sort of thing we may expect to find in a united country. I might also ask is it unity for all the sons to go from one particular family—and I know of families where practically all their young men have enlisted—and to have other families with four or five sons not one of whom has volunteered? That sort of thing does not tend towards unity in a community nor, when multiplied to a great extent, does it tend towards unity throughout the nation. Will it make for unity in Canada when this war is over, for thousands of our men who have fought overseas to return and meet the thousands of young men who were on home service and home defence? There will be a barrier raised between those two groups, and I foresee much discord and disunity so far as the young men of this country are concerned.

We talk of equality of sacrifice. I have mentioned the young men from New Brunswick serving in the army, alongside, of course, men from other parts of the dominion, and getting their $1.30 a day. But one can go through towns and cities and see thousands of young men, after working hours, parading the streets in their best clothes. Those young men are working in the factories and getting $5 to $6 a day. I contend that it is unfair that young men from one section of the dominion have to fight Canada's battles for $1.30 a day, while thousands of others, taking no such risk, are receiving four times as much for working in factories. Such conditions do not make for unity. It may be asked, what can be done about it? Well, we might arrange, if there are no industries which can be established in the smaller and outlying districts of the dominion, to take the men to the industries. Bring the men from New Brunswick to Quebec and Ontario; they would be willing and glad to help in industrial work; and let Quebec, Ontario and other provinces supply their due proportion so far as service for overseas is concerned.

We have heard Abraham Lincoln quoted in this house during the present debate. I happened to see not long ago a statement regarding conditions during the civil war in the United States from 1861 to 1865. This question of compulsory service is not new; it is as old as history. The issue has been fought in parliaments for a great many years in many countries. Lincoln, in the United States, had his own troubles. At the time to which I refer, in 1863, they had the voluntary system, and it was not working well. The war which broke out in 1861 had so far resulted in an almost unbroken string of victories for the Confederate army. Early in the war the southern armies had pushed within thirty miles of Washington. The Union army was in a chaotic condition. Generals quarrelled; armies fought like undisciplined mobs; there was every indication that the Union would fail. Up to that time the Union had depended upon the voluntary system. In some states the militia would not even go outside the boundaries of their own state, and men were called up for service for only six months. As I have said, the situation was chaotic. Lincoln, in speaking about the voluntary system at that time used these words; whether they are appropriate to conditions at this time is for us to judge:

> Voluntarism is the unprincipled dodge of cowardly politicians. It has ground up the choicest seed corn of the nation. It has consumed the young, the generous, the patriotic, the intelligent and the brave. It has wasted the best moral, social and political elements of the republic, and left the cowards, the shirkers and the money-makers to stay at home and propagate their kind.

That statement, I say, may be worthy of consideration by the members of this house.

A few weeks ago we had the honour of listening in this chamber to the Abraham Lincoln of the present day. I believe hon. members all know to whom I refer. We heard Mr. Churchill say at that time:

> If anybody likes to play rough we can play rough too. Hitler and his nazi gang have sown the wind; let them reap the whirlwind. Neither the length of the struggle nor any form of severity which it may assume shall make us weary or shall make us quit. . . .

Of "the broader world which lies beyond," he said:

> We have to win that world for our children. We have to win it by our sacrifices.

He did not tell us then that it would be easy. He is not telling his people to-day that the road is easy. What is happening in England? What happened in England to-day? When Churchill came before the British House of Commons for a vote of confidence, the vote stood 464 to 1—practically unanimous. Why? Because Churchill makes and leads public opinion in that country. It was a magnificent tribute to a great leader and a great statesman, a man who tells his people what is needed and sees that those needs are carried out, as far as is possible for him to do so. He offers no apologies or excuses. He said to them, "I make no promises". I commend that to the people of this dominion and to the members of this house. We make too many promises. If we had not made promises which we could not fulfil, we would not have been in the position in which we are to-day. A wise man is Mr. Churchill. He makes no promises, and he holds no plebiscite in his country during war time to find out whether he should be relieved of those promises to satisfy new conditions. He told us, as I said a moment ago, that the road was not an easy one. He assured us it would be hard. He told us also:

> We cannot for a moment afford to relax. On the contrary, we must drive ourselves forward with unrelenting zeal. In this strange, terrible world war there is a place for everyone, man and woman, old and young, hale and halt. Service in a thousand forms is open.

And he reminded us:

There is no room now for the dilettante, for the weakling, for the shirker or the sluggard.

Man-power is needed in this country. We have no less an authority for that statement than the adjutant-general in the Department of National Defence. He told us not long ago, and I believe what he said is correct, that man-power is the only power which will defeat Hitler. Let us, then, not be shirkers. If man-power is needed, if it is needed now, let us of this House of Commons not shirk our responsibility. Let us stand up and vote for conscription if it is necessary, and not throw the responsibility upon women and men and boys of this country who do not know the facts. I ask hon. members that when the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) comes before this house, they give it their full support.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, these are dark days for Canada and for our empire. The history of this war so far has been such as to create gloom, yet also to arouse many people from apathy and cause them to search and question among themselves, what is it that is wrong? To-day Singapore is in imminent danger. It is one of the last barriers in the far east; if it falls, Australia and New Zealand will be in grave peril. I hope that a message has gone forward to the people of the sister dominions telling them that while Canadians still live, they will never permit the heel of nazism or the Japanese tyranny to reign over those parts of our empire.

It is my intention to use the time allotted to me to deal with an element of total war which, in my opinion, has been sadly neglected by those who are directing our effort. I speak of morale. In any effort the first requirement is vision. It appears to me that those responsible for Canada's total war effort have lacked sufficient vision to see the importance of morale. It is too essential an element in total war to be disregarded. Apparently they do not understand that ideals and ideas are of the importance that they are and that, if we are to succeed, they go along with the tanks and troops. Hitler's highly organized forces were led on by brutal ideals and perverted ideas; but, brutal and perverted as they are, they led a desperate people forward in the factory, in the troops and on the farms. In Russia to-day the people are fighting for their homes and their lives, for an economic system in which they believe, a system for the people of Russia. Those people in Russia have gained economic democracy; they have yet to gain political democracy. To those people no sacrifice is too great. They will burn down their homes and their crops; they will destroy their dams and their industries in those areas where they might fall into the hands of their enemies. It is the morale of those people which is saving the democratic way of life to-day, and has been saving it for months. The Russian front news is the most hopeful that we have had during the past dark days from any part of the war front.

In Canada we have a form of political democracy, but we yet have to gain economic democracy. We in Canada do not need to be told what we are fighting against; what we do want to know is what kind of life we are fighting for. "V" for victory! Yes, but victory for what kind of life and what kind of reorganized Canada? We hear people in all parts of Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, saying, "Well, things will be different after the war." I am sure every hon. member here has heard that. Then let us get a vision of what things will be like after the war. Of course, I know there are some who say that we have not time for that now. But we must have time for it. We must give our people some hope of a vision for the future. That is what is necessary in order to get our people, as they do in Russia, to go out for total war. What they want to see in Canada is action which will give equality of sacrifice, if such a thing is possible in Canada to-day.

The vision that this government should give is a vision of a better life. When that vision and that morale are supplied, Canadians' contributions will be doubled. If that vision had been given by this government for the past two years, there would be no need for a plebiscite. No one suggests, in talking about a reorganized Canada, that we are going to ask the boys who crawled out of box-cars and out of the jungles and who went into the forces, to get back into those box-cars and jungles when the war is over. No one suggests that the million people or more who were on relief in 1938 and 1939 are going to be sent back on relief when this battle is won.

What is this government telling the people of Canada? What assurance is it giving those boys who have come out of the box-cars as to what is going to happen in Canada? This government has shown itself fearful of great ideals and new ideas. It is apparently afraid to present the people with a vision, which it should have done long ago. The spirit of Canada is great, but this government should give a vision which will arouse that spirit. The men and women who came to this country in the early days travelled in their carts and wagons and faced fearlessly and boldly the difficulties of forest fires in the east and prairie fires and blizzards in the west. In that way a great nation was developed. These elements were fought, and the people suffered and worked and planned—why? Because they had a future. They had a vision of bright things to come. That is what is needed to-day.

Our people throughout the country feel to-day that they are being driven down a blind alley in darkness instead of being led out with a clear light ahead of them shining on a reorganized and reconstructed Canada worthy of the sacrifices that are being demanded and are being made. Morale is needed in every phase of our war effort: in our army, navy and air force; by the workers in our factories, in our mines and on our farms. Why this murmuring from agriculture? Mr. Speaker, the back-bone of any nation is the great mass of common workers and toilers, the people in the factories and on the farms, the people in the lumber camps and in the mines, the fishermen on the sea, the toilers who produce goods and wealth. These are the back-bone and being of any nation; and when the nation fails these men who supply the troops in time of war, it is failing the men who take the steel. The nation which forgets and neglects these people is failing deeply and inwardly. It failed them in time of peace, and it is failing them in time of war.

According to the statement given by the department, 260,000 men of Canada have offered on the altar of national sacrifice their lives, their blood, everything they hold dear. I want to know whether one thousand industries have volunteered even to lend their factories for the duration of the war. We do not ask that these factories be completely destroyed, but can any sacrifice equal that of a mother who gives her son? Why on earth cannot one big industry; why cannot all the industries of Canada, place their buildings, organization, managerial ability on the self-same altar of sacrifice on which 260,000 men of Canada have offered to place their lives and everything they have? We are not forgetting that industry in this country refused to touch contracts even when a profit of 5 per cent was offered to them. Canadian industry is turning out great quantities of materials these days at its own price. There is unfortunately too much evidence to show that too many people in this dominion look upon war as a harvest time, the time when they feel they are legitimately entitled to amass great wealth and property for themselves. With their usual callous inhumanity and disregard for moral obligations, they fail to see that the harvest they are reaping is a crop grown on soil which is fertilized with the blood of their fellow men.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Can the hon. member name any of those men? Name one.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: One what?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): One man reaping any benefits.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Any coupon-clipper who to-day reaps profits out of this war; those who demanded their profits in time of national crisis. They endanger everything that is worth while in our domocratic way of life. With everything we have we oppose such an outlook and such a philosophy as dangerous in a time like this. We are opposing that philosophy in the constituency of York South to-day. Perhaps the attitude of industry can be no better revealed than in a speech made on December 6, 1940, by the new leader of the Conservative party, speaking in another place. I quote what was said by Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, speaking on the War Exchange Conservation Act, as reported at page 62 of the Senate debates:

> I have no sympathy for those who would tax profits at one hundred per cent. People will not work for nothing. Human nature is the same in war time as in peace, and instead of helping the war effort you are defeating it by stripping people of the stimulus to toil and run their business right. Leave the incentive, and make the reward greater the greater the toil and the greater the success. You have to do that. You do not do it under this bill. I do not exaggerate at all when I say that I have had business men by the dozen tell me that they are leaning on their oars; they have nothing to work for.

A lot of work they do!

> They say: "We might just as well take it a little easier now, for we are only working for taxes anyway." You will get that result in any case if you take away all incentive to work. But leave the incentive and let it grow as profits increase, and increase taxes as profits increase. There is no other way I know of to get results.

Mr. POULIOT: Did he go as far as that?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: These are his words, from the Senate Hansard of December 6, 1940.

Mr. POULIOT: It is awful.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is a sad commentary on the national life of this country that in the hour of need, business men by the dozen should be resting on their oars, with our men at Hong Kong needing equipment that was not there. Have we Quislings among the industrialists of Canada? Then the Toronto Daily Star of yesterday, January 28, quotes Right Hon. Mr. Meighen as having said :

> If we have to conscript wealth to win the war we will, but people of common sense don't advocate that until the last gasp.

This man is particularly anxious to conscript the man-power of this nation now, but he says that wealth must be conscripted only as a last resort. Blood should go now; wealth only at the last! In effect he says, "People, give your sons that we may keep our gold." May the people of York South do a service to the common mass of the people of Canada by sending here a representative who will work and strive along with those who say—and I quote from our amendment—"place the war industries, accumulated wealth and the financial institutions of Canada at the same time and on the same basis of sacrifice as the suggested extension of conscription of man-power."

That is the policy the people of Canada want, and this adminstration ought to know it. I do not think a plebiscite is necessary; but if this administration is anxious to know what the people from one end of Canada to the other want, I challenge it to place upon the plebiscite a question in the terms of the amendment to the amendment: "Do you want industry, the war industries, the accumulated wealth and the financial institutions of Canada placed at the same time and on the same basis of sacrifice as the suggested extension of conscription of man-power?" This administration has passed more orders in council in less time, with parliament sitting, than any other government in the history of Canada. Now it goes to the people with a plebiscite and asks for an expression of opinion merely on the conscription of man-power. People are having their lives restricted by these orders in council in a way they scarcely dreamed of a short time ago. The cost of living is frozen; wages are frozen at a lower level, and agricultural products are frozen at a still lower level. The cost of production on the farm continues to increase, but the value the farmer will get for his products is frozen. What is happening is this: you are freezing servitude on labour and peasantry on the farmer. Sons are being taken from the farms; mortgage and loan companies are foreclosing and driving the parents off the land.

On February 1 a delegation will arrive in this city from the west, to protest even in these times of strife, against this treatment. These people do not ask for profits; they merely ask that they be allowed to continue to work their farms and produce the foodstuffs so urgently needed both now and for the period of reconstruction. Britain is severely rationed to-day. Our Department of Agriculture says, "Grow less wheat and help win the war." Food is going to be needed as it has never been needed before. Those engaged in agriculture in Canada wish to make their contribution. They wish to be allowed to continue to make their sacrifice and do their bit to help save Canada.

In the west, as in other parts of Canada, the people turned to cooperatives as a means of protecting themselves against exploitation by the privileged who were stealing the substance of their production. They found that the banking institutions and the loan, mortgage and insurance companies were bleeding them white. The packing companies amassed their millions out of the unprotected producer and unorganized consumer. Implement and oil companies continued to charge what they wished. The grain exchange continued to steal its millions, yes, hundreds of millions from the producers. So the people organized themselves cooperatively.

In Saskatchewan the cooperative pool elevator company own over a thousand elevators which they use to handle their own grain, and they reached the point where they were handling almost fifty per cent of the grain produced in that province. But what happened? For two crop delivery seasons the car allotment committee, set up under the government grain board, effectively forced the producers to use the old line elevator companies and deliver their wheat to those companies and, through them, to the grain exchange. No cars could be obtained by the pool elevators beyond the allotment, which was based on the permanent storage capacity. To meet this regulation, the pools built temporary storage. This took them through 1940 fairly well, and they were planning to do the same thing for 1941; but the building of temporary storage, which had saved the pools the year before fairly well, was stopped by order of the lumber controller, and the cooperative organization was crippled. In many places it had to close its doors for months during the delivery season. Tens of millions of bushels of wheat were thus directed through the old private and corporate business institutions, and through their channels to the grain exchange. Government agencies of this administration directly or indirectly effectively prevented the cooperative institutions from operating.

The people of Canada resent this deeply. Special privileged groups in the economic life of Canada have kept on exploiting the resources of this dominion to the point where the situation can no longer be tolerated. The people of Canada will not permit their cooperative institutions to be ruined in this way —and that goes for all of Canada. It goes for the Okanagan apple growers in British Columbia, for the western wheat farmers, for those who produce the cattle and beef, for those who provide materials and food stuff. It goes for the cooperatives in Ontario and Quebec; it goes for the cooperatives in Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces.

This delegation of over 400 people coming here under the organization of the Saskatchewan wheat pools are coming to protest against the treatment of agriculture, and particularly against the treatment of western grain growers. Farmers across Canada have not been sufficiently well organized to make effective protest, and certain forces for years have been working to keep them from organizing. People do not come down here in war time for pleasure; they are not coming here to cause trouble. These are patriotic Canadians of good character. They are people who have fought and suffered, people who have helped build Canada. They are protesting against the treatment of agriculture, and they would not come here if conditions were not desperate. Those conditions are desperate. This administration has turned a deaf ear to the voices of these people, or those who spoke for them. One after another, ministers of agriculture in this house have betrayed the people of the west, and far too often have broken their pledges. Saskatchewan is withering and dying on account of the failure of this government to provide adequate legislation to protect the people of Saskatchewan.

Recent figures from the bureau of statistics show that the population of that province is decreasing from year to year. People just cannot exist out there. They are driven away from their province; they are driven off their homes. They are driven off the farms on which they have lived for possibly twenty or thirty years. This is the reward meted out by the administration to a people who have produced by billions the wealth of this dominion. They are a betrayed people.

This delegation coming to Ottawa is a living symbol in protest of that betrayal. People and homes are more important than profits. That should have been recognized in peace time; it should be recognized more fully in war time. Mothers' sons are more important than profits, and that should be recognized now. That delegation is coming here to speak for the masses in agriculture; it is marching here with a bill of rights; the government cannot disregard them. This is a demand for justice, and they are bringing it to the foot of the throne. That demand is coming from about two million people. Donations of dimes and quarters, a few dozen eggs, a few pounds of butter, or a chicken were made. And 160,000 or more people have signed their names to a petition of protest to the government. I would suggest that the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), who was associated with the grain growers institutions for some years, might explain to them the great battle which is being fought for them. I wish Mr. Dunning were here to speak to them, and I would be pleased if the ex-Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Motherwell, could do so. I hope the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in the present government will hear these people, and the justice of their cause. They come asking for bread.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They will get a stone.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: To return to the problem of reconstruction. During November I had the privilege of visiting an area in Canada where men of vision are providing leadership in a real way. I refer to that small university known as St. Francis Xavier in Antigonish, Nova Scotia. Through its extension department it has taken education to the masses of the people. When education went to the people light dawned and fear disappeared. They caught the vision of a better land; they learned that they could run their own institutions. Miners and fishermen, farmers and steel workers are running their own businesses, doing their own financing, operating their own packing plants, and in a cooperative way building their own houses. They have consumers' cooperatives, producers' cooperatives and wholesale cooperatives. For the first time they are learning the meaning of the word "exploitation." They are learning what is wrong with the plight of the common man, and how the fruit of his labour is stolen from him.

These people have learned about a system which has displaced profits as a motivating force. Cooperation must displace competition as a way of life. Service for one's fellow man is more efficient as a motive than profits for the few. Cooperation creates character, whereas competition destroys it. Cooperation builds the character of those who work with it, but competition born of the jungle, ruins, with poverty and slums, the exploited toilers and with corruption of too much wealth, those who steal from the workers.

Cooperation has created a vision of a society where economic security can reign, and with it democracy can live. Those people, marching forward, have a vision of a world in which Canada can make its contribution, a world where profit shall cease. Peace will be possible, because some day the profits of war will be eliminated. And when the profits of war are eliminated throughout the world, that curse which now returns to us every twenty years will cease.

To get the necessary morale established in Canada I would ask the government to do a few things. Immediately it should establish courageously and boldly some equality of sacrifice. It should start now with the conscription of industry and accumulated wealth. Then it would have some right to ask mothers to place their sons on the altar of national sacrifice. Place agriculture on a basis where it can play its part. Give to labour that degree of democracy it should have. Give Canada a vision of a reconstructed land where social justice shall reign, and economic security shall drive fear from the hearts of our people. This will give us the morale for victory which, I say, does not exist to-day.

Mr. G. RUSSELL BOUCHER (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak at this time may I be permitted to join those who have previously spoken in paying my compliments to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

We are going through momentous days; we are facing grave problems, we are almost at the turn of the way. I should like to read an excerpt from page 45 of Hansard of last Monday with respect to the war effort. It is:

> These demands will intimately affect the lives of many men and women. They will also effect the life of the nation in the following way: there will be a further very definite curtailment of the amenities we have hitherto been able to preserve. These demands will not affect physical health or that contentment of spirit that comes from serving great causes, but they will make further inroads upon the comfort and convenience of very large numbers, and upon the character and aspect of our daily life.
> It must not be supposed that there are large reserves of idle people leading a leisurely existence who can now be called to the national ranks. The entire adult Canadian population, with very few exceptions, gets up in the morning, works all day, and goes to bed tired out at night. In our form of society people have been accustomed to find their own jobs to a very large extent, thus saving vast government machinery.
> If all the efforts of everyone were really devoted solely to making war, there would be no food, or fuel, no transport, or clothes. We have to recognize the fact that a very large proportion of the population, particularly women, is occupied in ministering to the needs of the more actively engaged population, and that that number has increased since the last war with the increase of population who have to be ministered to.
> The process which is now to be applied—and has, indeed, been continuously applied—much more vigorously, is not the calling of idle people to work, but the sharpening and shifting forward of a proportion of their effort into work which is more directly related to the war.

Those are the words of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) repeating the words of the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of England. I commend them to this parliament. The morale of the public of Canada was referred to by the previous speaker, and this feeling is echoed through this chamber and throughout the length and breadth of Canada. How many of the amenities of life has this government asked the Canadian people to forego in order that we may have a national all-out war effort? How many inroads have been made into the comforts and expenditures of our people? What has been done to take up the reserves of idle people? Since coming into this house this session, we have heard hon. members from western Canada say that unemployment is still plentiful in that part of the country, and then we have heard hon. members from eastern Canada, particularly from agricultural constituencies, tell us of the need for farm labour. But we have not heard any policy announced by this government to cope with the situation. The service rendered by the women of Canada in administering to the needs of the unfortunate, in caring for the sick and wounded of our fighting forces, is well worthy of the Canadian morale. The war effort of these women has been performed valiantly and with a devotion to duty. As Mr. Churchill said, the process which is now being applied is to be more vigorously applied.

A number of our members have been overseas, and they have come back and told us of what they saw. We have heard of the shortage of agricultural products, of those things of which we have such a surplus. How much of this has been brought home to the Canadian people? What has been done to make the Canadian citizen sensitive to his or her responsibilities? What has been done to increase the cooperation between our citizens and those who are fighting to stem the tide of war away from our continent?

In the speech from the throne we are told that it is now proposed that a plebiscite shall be taken to grant pardon or absolution to the Prime Minister and to the government for promises made before the last election. A lot of water has flown under the mill since the last election. Times have changed since then. What will be the morale of the Canadian people; what will be the condition in Canada when this vote is taken? If this plebiscite is taken, it will probably be around the first of April, although the date has not yet been announced. Do we know what the state of the world will be by April 1? Do we know what will have happened in Singapore by that date? In what condition will Australia be by April 1? What about New Zealand and the Philippines? What will Hitler and his hordes be doing in Asia and Africa? What will our kinsmen in England, Ireland and Scotland be doing? They are now facing a dire situation. The German and Italian hordes will probably be attempting an invasion of their country. In what mood will the people of Canada be to vote upon a plebiscite to release the Prime Minister, to grant absolution for a wrong? Obviously it was a wrong commitment.

If that commitment was not wrong, why this plebiscite? The Prime Minister has stated that the one point at issue in the plebiscite is the question of compulsory military service for overseas. If compulsory service for overseas is not necessary now, why the plebiscite? If compulsory service for overseas is necessary, when will the relief from that restriction be brought into effect and we in Canada be given an opportunity to do our whole part in this war? As I say, this plebiscite cannot be taken until on in April. The soldier is entitled to vote. How long will it be before a complete record of the plebiscite reaches Ottawa?

Assuming that the plebiscite is one hundred per cent satisfactory to the Prime Minister and his government, how long will it take them to put the machinery of compulsory service overseas into operation? Will he put it into operation? How long will it be before the men will be ready to commence training? How long will it take to make a soldier capable of serving overseas? When we look at things from that perspective, and consider that length of time, we can only come to the conclusion that it will be into next winter before we shall have results. Anything can happen between now and then.

What is this plebiscite? The Prime Minister has stated to the house, as reported at page 51 of Hansard, that the plebiscite is going to be worded thus:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

His statement to this house was that such was the bone of contention. Is the plebiscite being placed before the Canadian people to ask them if they are in favour of sending men by compulsory selection overseas? Is that what this plebiscite states? Why does he not ask parliament, and not the people, is it in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men? The plebiscite states "for military service." It does not say "overseas service". What is the answer to that question? Is it not asking this question: Are you willing to exonerate the Prime Minister and the government from any commitments they ever made in any manner with respect to sending men into the military forces?

The people of Canada are to be asked that question at one of the most critical times that you and I, Mr. Speaker, or any other member of this house could conceive of. If that plebiscite is necessary, if any pardon is necessary, we have here in this House of Commons 245 members elected, with great responsibility, to do a terrific task and to represent the people who sent us to parliament.

What are the duties of the private member of this house? They are certainly not to formulate policy. Our task, to judge by the past performance of this administration, is not to pass legislation, because we sat here for thirteen days in November without any legislation before us. The principal policy announced in the speech from the throne this session is that the country be asked to forgive the government for its past commitments with respect to raising men. We had the price-ceiling legislation passed a few days before parliament was called into session and we have orders in council passed every day whether parliament is sitting or not. What better authority can I quote than the Prime Minister himself for my statement that parliament should decide this question? I shall quote passages from statements made by the Prime Minister as far back as March 30, 1939, when speaking in this house he said, as reported at page 2612 of Hansard:

> If Canada is faced by the necessity of making a decision on the most serious and momentous issue that can face a nation, whether or not to take part in war, the principle of responsible government which has been our guide and our goal for a century past, demands that that decision be made by the parliament of Canada.

Again, from the same page:

> Whether it has been in reference to the application of sanctions under Article 16 of the covenant of the league or to participation in wars apart altogether from the league, Canada's position has been the same, namely, that in either case the approval of parliament will be required.

Again!

> The Canadian parliament reserves to itself the right to declare, in the light of the circumstances existing at the time, to what extent, if at all, Canada will participate in conflicts in which other members of the commonwealth may be engaged.

Again the Prime Minister comes back with the same thing on the same day, as reported at page 2618 of Hansard:

> My immediate purpose in quoting the statement, as will be apparent from the context, was to emphasize the continuity of Liberal policy as regards parliamentary control, the view which was held then and which we as a government hold to-day, that in the great as in the small issues of a nation's policy, the policy of self-government which we have followed for a century makes it essential that parliament and no other body should decide.

Yet the policy for a century must now be discarded and this question referred to the people of Canada!

Again, as reported at page 48 of Hansard of Monday last the Prime Minister said:

If the issue of conscription for service overseas is to be fought out, the place for it to be fought out is on the floor of this parliament.

Again, as reported at page 49 he said:

In a world situation so involved, with enemies on every front, with no one able to say what the outcome of battle in other parts of the world may bring of immediate and increased danger to our own land, the government feels strongly that it should be perfectly free to recommend to parliament whatever course of action it deems essential to the security of our own country, and to the preservation of freedom in our own and other lands.

I quote these passages to show that in this parliament some responsibility must be assumed by the members, some questions of national import must be dealt with, some duties must be performed. Is it not our duty to deal with the question raised in this plebiscite? But instead we have a plebiscite by which the people are asked to decide.

What is the purpose of the plebiscite in any event? What would happen if the plebiscite were answered in the negative? Will the government stop raising men? Will it stop using compulsion to raise them? Will it stop using the selective system? Will it go to the enemy and ask forgiveness, saying: "We meant to declare war, but we did not mean to raise men to fight that war." What would happen if some sections of our country vote overwhelmingly "yes", and some other sections overwhelmingly "no"? Will the government still claim to be the champion of national unity? Will the government still feel that to preserve national unity they must take no course at all lest they offend either the yeas or the nays? Why does not the Prime Minister in his plebiscite put this further question to the Canadian people: Are you in favour of the plebiscite being taken at all at this time? If he wants to interpret the plebiscite as an endorsation of his policy and as approval of his administration, what better question could he ask? If the Prime Minister has any doubt as to whether the people of Canada will release him from his pledges—and he does not seem to have any—why not find out from their elected representatives in this parliament whose duty it is to reflect the opinions of the people, and let us get on with the war? Possibly the answer should be the formation of a government under a man who is not manacled or handicapped by his previous commitments. What was his answer to that? I hesitate to repeat what I interpret it to be. As reported at page 51 of Hansard, in dealing with that very question he said:

In other words, I am being asked to "sell my birthright for their mess of pottage", and to destroy whatever confidence the people of Canada may possess in my honour as a public man, and, in doing so, also to destroy the confidence the people possess in the honour and integrity of the government.

Are we still in the days of the Tudor kings, of the Jameses, and of the policy of the divine right of kings, or has it just come down to the divine right of King?

Apart, however, from the wisdom, the folly or the blunder of a plebiscite at this time, I should like to express what I take to be the opinion of the agriculturists in my riding. The farmers of my riding are to a large extent men operating farms of from 100 to 400 acres. Their pursuits are the dairying industry, the hog industry, the beef industry, and egg production. Like most farmers, for the last ten or fifteen years they have gone through very difficult times. Many of the farms have been left idle. Within the last few years, conditions, through the increased demands for their supplies, and through federal and provincial government subsidies of one kind or another, have greatly improved. They have not sufficiently improved, however, to attract to the farms the help which is required, or to keep on the farms the men who are already there. Go through the rural centres in eastern Ontario and look for young people, and you will find that many of our rural centres are like Goldsmith's deserted village. School attendance has greatly decreased from what it has been at any time within the past twenty years. Aggravating this condition is the policy of calling to the armed forces farmers' sons and farm help upon short notice. Repeatedly and almost constantly I have found agricultural workers being called for military training and given ten days to apply for postponement when seven or eight of the ten days have already elapsed before the notice is received. It is annoying and, I say, alarming to see how many boys are being called for military service when they are the sole persons running the farm or the main help on that farm, and are totally indispensable to the production of milk, cheese, beef, bacon and eggs.

When national registration was taken, information was given to the military authorities and to the government to indicate what men were available with least impairment of our war effort. The Prime Minister has himself stated that agriculture is a very essential part of our war effort. Something will have to be done to provide labour in view of the increasing demand for food, involving greater production. If that is the situation, and if this information has been made available through national registration, why should men have been called up who are the only help on the farm and where they are essential to necessary agricultural production? Truly, postponements can be granted. To my own knowledge many have been granted. But any man who appreciates the problems of the farmer will realize the difficulties of putting in a crop, of growing the produce required, without some assurance as to the help which will be obtainable for reaping it. The farmer must plant his crop from the viewpoint of the available help, not at present, but six months, a year, or even two years ahead. Many farmers to-day, even within twenty miles of this capital city, are being compelled to reduce their stock, and even to quit their occupation, on account of shortage of help. I believe that this essential part of our farm problem, coupled with our war problems, should long before now have been taken into consideration by parliament. A broad and comprehensive scheme of calling men to military service in some order, with some certainty, should have been placed before our people. It may not be possible under such a scheme to state just when a certain man is going to be called, but the order in which men are to be called in relation to their occupations should be announced. I believe it is the policy of the government to call up men in accordance with age and marital status. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the occupation of a man in civilian life is an important factor. If a man is engaged in a productive capacity in an essential war industry, that point should be taken into consideration, and he should have some certainty as to the necessity of his appearing for military training, and as to those who should appear before he does.

Any man who has knowledge of the agricultural industry—and there are few here who have not—will realize the amount of foresight and planning required to produce the products which are so essential to our requirements, and how difficult it will be, under the present policy of this government, for a farmer owning anywhere from 20 to 160 head of cattle, as is the case with many in my riding, to operate his farm if his son or his hired man is called for military service, given ten days to apply for postponement, and does not know until, perhaps, two or three days before the time for reporting, whether he is to report or whether the postponement is granted. What is the farmer to do if postponement is not granted, when help cannot be had? If postponement is granted, it is to the first of April, the first of May, or the first of July—right at the busiest time. No wonder agriculturists are very much discontented; no wonder our production is not what it should be, when consideration in such matters as this is not given to our agriculturists. Remembering that we are in the third year of the war, I believe the time is long past when a broad and comprehensive scheme of calling men to the service should be placed before the country. If the time when certain individuals are likely to be called to service cannot be announced, the order in which men are to be called in relation to their occupation should be made known. The age group and the marital status should not be the only order of calling.

I believe that for a total war effort there is plenty of work within the confines of the army, the navy and the air force for men of almost every possible classification of health and physical condition, and in my opinion these matters should long before now have been taken into consideration and placed before the people. Lack of information along this line has caused a great deal of dissatisfaction among our people, who are anxious to have some guidance in these matters. If it is necessary to prepare for the shortage of sugar, as announced in to-day's papers, or for the shortage of gasoline, which has been talked about for three or four months in advance, why is it not equally important to consider the primary industry of agriculture, and why is it not equally important to discuss or to consider the necessity of getting our man-power armed, trained, equipped and placed for service overseas?

On motion of Mr. Pouliot the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, January 30, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF SPECIAL ORDER SUSPENDED TO PROCEED WITH QUESTIONS AND MOTIONS FOR PAPERS ON MONDAY NEXT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That consideration of the special order relative to the debate on the address to His Excellency be suspended on Monday the 2nd

February, 1942, until the house has proceeded with the orders respecting questions and notices of motions for the production of papers standing on the order paper.

Motion agreed to.

"FAIRMILE FUDDLE"

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN THE JANUARY-FEBRUARY ISSUE OF "BOATING MAGAZINE"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services to an editorial appearing on page 4 of Boating Magazine for January-February of this year, under the caption "Fairmile Fuddle". I shall not read the editorial, because I presume the minister has a copy of the journal. I should like to ask these questions: First, where are the five boats which are reported to have left Midland early in November, 1941 and, second, was a qualified officer in charge of those boats?

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not give notice of his question, and as I have not seen the article I should like to read it and get the information for him.

PRICE CEILING

APPLICATION OF REGULATIONS TO SPECIFIED COMMODITIES—SEASONAL GOODS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. H. BENCE (Saskatoon City): I should like to address a question to the government, for attention of the Minister of Finance. My question has to do with a news item appearing in yesterday's Ottawa Journal, headed "One hundred commodities are not affected by price ceiling." Will the Minister of Finance give to the house within the next few days an explanation as to the reason for removing the price ceiling on the one hundred odd commodities referred to in that item? Will he at the same time state whether or not there will be a similar removal in connection with other so-called seasonal goods, such as those which are purchased for winter purposes only?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall direct the attention of the minister to the hon. member's question.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NEW GLASGOW STEEL WORKERS—APPLICATION OF PRINCIPLE OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. I am in receipt of a copy of a telegram sent to the Prime Minister under date of January 29 by the New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, Union of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee. The wire indicated that the workers in that area are disturbed over the refusal of the government to honour the principles of collective bargaining laid down in order in council P.C. 2685, particularly in the case of the Kirkland Lake dispute. The wire also indicates that stoppages of work may take place in other essential industries in Canada unless the government insists that without delay the mine operators of the Kirkland mines accept the principle of collective bargaining.

Has the Prime Minister replied to the telegram of the New Glasgow steel workers, and would he tell the house the nature of his reply?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the telegram to which the hon. member has referred was handed to me just as I came into the house. I have not had time to read it through.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I received a similar telegram at midnight last night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The morning has been pretty well occupied through deliberations with the cabinet, and other matters. The result is I have not had a chance to see some of the communications which have come in. I shall endeavour, however, to answer this one as soon as possible.

SHIPBUILDING DISPUTES—ANNULMENT OF AWARD BY BOARD OF CONCILIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to ask a question of the acting Minister of Labour. I have a telegram from John W. Bruce, international organizer for the Plumbers and Steamfitters Association, a group identified with the American Federation of Labor. Mr. Bruce complains about an order in council passed on Monday last, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, annulling an award of the board of conciliation acting in respect of certain shipbuilding yards in Ontario and Quebec. Would the minister explain the procedure in this matter, and will he table the order in council mentioned?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (for the Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the telegram received by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) was not called to my attention. I should not like to give a detailed answer as to the effect of the order in council passed on Monday last in connection with shipbuilding plants. The hon. member is aware that a board of conciliation was appointed to investigate one particular plant, whereas the commission was appointed to investigate all plants as a group. My impression is that the order in council referred to deals with the report of the commission; I was not aware that it dealt with the report of the board. I shall be glad, however, to make further inquiries and advise the house and the hon. member in connection with this matter.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, January 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be fitting first to remind the house of a gentleman who died not long ago, who formerly sat upon the treasury benches of this house for several years, acting in various capacities, particularly as Minister of Public Works and Postmaster General. I refer to the Hon. John Campbell Elliott. Mr. Elliott was liked by all and was a very good minister. One of the joys of his later life was to have my chief, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), ask for his advice, particularly concerning Ontario. I cannot forget one beautiful summer day, a Sunday in 1934, when a mass meeting attended by 10,000 people was held in the town of Trois Pistoles. This part of my constituency was taken away from me by Viscount Bennett. There were many speakers, among them our late lamented friend, the former Minister of Justice, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe; Mr. Elliott was there as well. There is in the vicinity of Trois Pistoles a summer school which is attended by many students from Western university in London who go to that school to learn French. Mr. Elliott spoke in French, but he did not mention the redistribution, nor did he refer to the gerrymander. He made a beautiful speech about good understanding, bonne entente. I offer my deepest sympathy to all my colleagues, to the members of the Senate and to the members of his family.

The government has suffered another great loss in the death of the former deputy minister of public works, Mr. J. B. Hunter. Mr. Hunter was civil servant No. 1 following the death of Sir Arthur Doughty, who created our archives and placed at the disposal of every student in Canada official documents pertaining to Canadian history.

This House of Commons is not the same at all since the death of the gentleman who was praised so highly on February 21, the man who was the right arm of the Prime Minister, who was a Liberal to the core, and a true disciple of Laurier. I refer to the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. It was most fitting that a special tribute should be paid to him, and I was deeply moved by all the speeches that were made on that occasion. That was not the time to contradict anyone, but I remind the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) that he made a slight error—this is important to me—when he stated that the late Mr. Lapointe had been born in Kamouraska county. Mr. Lapointe was born at St. Eloi, which was never taken away from Témiscouata. If it had been, there would have been a riot.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I regret the error in my geography.

Mr. POULIOT: I know my hon. friend did it in good faith, but if he would consult me before making his speeches he would never make mistakes.

We have heard many interesting speeches. We live in a free country, and some of our colleagues hold certain views, while others hold altogether different views. That is their business. I do not intend to say anything unpleasant to anyone because he is in favour of conscription for overseas service while I am against it. That would be his right. But I do not want anyone to tread on my toes. I have sincere convictions and they are well known to all my colleagues. I quote:

> If a member dislikes the government . . . he ought to have the manhood to testify to his opinions. Nobody need be mealy mouthed in this debate. . . . No one need be chicken-hearted in the division lobby. I have frequently voted against governments which I have been elected to support and, looking back on it, I have sometimes felt very glad I did so. Everyone in these rough times must do what he considers his duty . . . Surely the hon. gentleman is not a man to be frightened of the whip.

That is fine language, but it is not mine. I could have made it mine with a slight change. I have never voted against my party, although I have been near doing so at times. The man who said those words sat in this very place a short time ago, the Right Hon.

Winston Churchill. I was honoured to notice that Mr. Churchill sat right here when he was received in this chamber. I quote again:

> Whoever speaks for Britain at this moment must be known to speak not only in the name of the people—and that I feel pretty sure I may—but in the name of parliament and, above all, the House of Commons.

I have said already that I am a Liberal to the core. I shall always be a Liberal and be true to the doctrines laid down by my late lamented leader, Mr. Lapointe, when he spoke at St. Roch de Quebec in his own constituency and said that if reforms were to be advocated, they should be advocated within the party. I believe the Liberal party is in good health, although it has two decayed teeth. If they are removed, its health will be splendid.

There are more important things, there are more urgent things, than a plebiscite. It is to make certain that democracy remains supreme in this parliament and that no one on the treasury benches shall be blackmailed or terrorized by any leader of any party. As I have said, opinions are free, and it is our common privilege to express them. But there is something very important, and that is that no leader of any party shall forget that he must always think, speak and act first as a Canadian, and as a good one.

Last summer I witnessed the ceremony held at St. Patrick, commemorating the anniversary of Sir John A. Macdonald, who spent twenty-seven summers in my constituency. At the same time a similar ceremony was being held at Kingston, the riding he represented for so long, and on that occasion the man who was at times Prime Minister of Canada spoke thus of Sir John:

> Never at any time did he lose sight of or subordinate to a selfish Canadian purpose the oneness of our interest, the oneness of our security, and the oneness of our destiny with the British empire.

I am not anti-British; I am pro-Canadian, and in my humble view the interests of Canada must be considered first in all our dealings, whether with Great Britain, the United States or any other country in the world.

Let me speak now of the by-election in York South, and I have very good news. I cannot give it all at once but am giving it bit by bit in due course, and the members of parliament will get great comfort from it. I am not going to tell anything new. I just want to remind my colleagues in the House of Commons that the people of York South are just as sound-minded as the people of any other constituency in this country, and to say that Arthur Meighen will be beaten on the ninth of February worse than he has ever been beaten before at the polls. I have a right to speak in this way because he is no longer a member of the Senate, and I can express my views about what is going on. It is the fight of democracy that is being waged in that constituency, and if Canadians look at it in that way, the by-election interests not only the electors of York South. We heard a lot about the leader of the opposition in the Senate, although his name was never mentioned. He was described as a very great man, and, of course, if a man is to be judged by the position he holds, undoubtedly he is a great man from the fact that he has been Prime Minister of Canada two or three times, although in that capacity he has never been elected by the Canadian people. The Canadian people turned their thumbs down on him every time he came before them because they did not trust him.

It appears that the Conservative party held a caucus, consisting of a handful of men, some of whom are very fine gentlemen—those are the Conservatives—and some others who are not such pleasant gentlemen—they are the Tories. It was rumoured on a Friday that they had made their selection and that Mr. Meighen would be the leader of the Conservative party, but it was only on the following Thursday that he accepted the position. What was the reason why Arthur Meighen did not want to represent such a fine group of gentlemen as I see in front of me? He was fearful; he was not sure of himself. It was not the voice of the people that chose him; it was just a handful of men, and he was preferred to my hon. friend the member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson); he was preferred to my hon. friend the member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), to my hon. friend the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and to all the other gentlemen who were there. It was a discovery. They were like Archimedes. They had found a marvel. They were also like Diogenes. They were out hunting with a lantern, and they went to the Senate door, where they found a man who had courage. Oh, courage, maybe, but no brains.

The first thing that was done under the instructions of Arthur Meighen was to play petty politics—petty politics, I repeat—in the press by resurrecting a few days later an incident that had arisen a few days before in the House of Commons when I had complained of the way in which my leader the Prime Minister had been greeted by some of the troops in England. I shall not insist on that. But after Arthur Meighen was selected as leader, something very funny happened, and that is that only two members out of the forty Conservative members of parliament offered him their seats—two out of forty. So evidently they liked him, but they did not want him to take any of their seats in parliament.

Here I have a clipping from a very interesting paper edited by one of the brightest journalists of our time, Miss Judith Robinson, daughter of the former editor of the Conservative Toronto Telegram. The article is headed "Tory patriot offers leader costly seat," and to my great surprise none of the Conservatives have protested against this article since the commencement of the session.

An hon. MEMBER: Because it is beneath notice.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh! The article goes on to say:

> The Conservative party has a great history. But something happened to it in that election of March, 1940. The group of men elected to the House of Commons, particularly from Ontario, do not represent the Conservatives who voted for them.

Hear, hear.

> At least it is hoped they don't, for if they do the Conservative party is unwilling to make sacrifices; is unwilling to do anything but hold on to what it has and let someone else bear the burden.
> The two men who offered their seats to Mr. Meighen were Col. Alan Cockeram and Earl Rowe.
> Mr. Meighen did not want Rowe's seat—

And so forth. It goes on, referring to Col. Cockeram:

> It isn't that Cockie doesn't like being a member of parliament, and his $4,000 per year. He believes Arthur Meighen, if he does nothing else, will give Mr. King the hot foot.

Oh, ho!

> Other Ontario Conservative members were willing to step aside for their leader and do the cause some good. But one wanted $12,000 on the line, and Meighen's men refused to stand for blackmail. Others just disappeared. No answer to the telephone. No answer to wires.
> Then there was this Ontario Tory who has one of the safest seats in the house. He isn't much as a member, never will be.

This is an appreciation by a good Conservative!

> But he is a great patriot. He wouldn't step aside for anyone except his leader. Yes, he would for his leader, because it was his duty as a Britisher and a good Conservative. But he would have to have—

How much?

> —$20,000. And only for Meighen would he do that. The big-hearted soul.

I do not blame Conservative members for not having offered their seats to Arthur Meighen. I praise them for that; and when there was a rumour that the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) would give his seat to Arthur Meighen, I said that the new leader would not fill the gap caused by the retirement of the hon. member for Danforth. No; I do not blame those hon. members for having refused him their seats. I cannot conceive how sound-minded men, as they seem to be, should have been disturbed to the extent of selecting him as their leader, even temporarily.

At the time of the Tory convention last November an item appeared in the press that the Conservative caucus did not want the present leader of the opposition to declare himself for conscription overseas. Yet Meighen did it without further authorization. Now here is something interesting, which I take from the Le Canada, of Montreal, under date of January 21. After it was decided that Mr. Meighen would get Mr. Cockeram's seat in York South, he wrote to the Department of Justice asking the law clerks if they were not of opinion he could remain a senator until the election was over—showing that he was not sure of himself, that he was afraid he would lose his election. Of course the answer at that time was sensible; it was "no". It was the right answer. The answer was, "resign as a senator if you want to stand for election as a member". There is a corridor between the House of Commons and the Senate, but it is not for a member of the Senate who wants to run in an election. Then the Hon. Leopold Macaulay, a Tory of the Tories, a former member of the Henry government, said, "Let everyone vote for Arthur Meighen. All of those who have been Conservatives at any time in their lives must vote for Arthur Meighen. There is not a vote to spare." This shows that he is not very well accepted by the Canadian people.

But there is more. I remember very well what was said on February 7, 1933, by Mr. Mitchell F. Hepburn, then hon. member for Elgin West. He said, as reported in Hansard, page 1867:

> Mr. Speaker, the morning papers contain the personnel of the newly appointed tariff board, naming Mr. Justice Sedgewick as tariff chairman at a salary of $12,000. I should like to know if this is the same Mr. Justice Sedgewick who as an appointee of the Ontario government was the chairman of a commission which investigated the Ontario hydro commission and gave that body a complete whitewash.

Who was a member of the Ontario hydro commission at that time, one who has been similarly censured by Mr. Hepburn himself? It was the very same Arthur Meighen, and in my ears I still have the sound of the voice of Mr. Hepburn denouncing the dealings of Mr. Meighen with the Abitibi power company. If, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Meighen was not good enough to be a hydro commissioner of Ontario, if he had to be denounced by the present premier of Ontario for wrong dealings with the Abitibi power company, how can he be accepted as leader of a great party and a prospective prime minister of Canada?

There were other statements, and I am not afraid to refer to them. I do not want any hon. member to say, "here is a French-Canadian from Quebec who is dealing with Ontario matters". I do not know whether the leader of the opposition is aware of it, but I may tell him that I have more friends than he thinks among the English-speaking members of his party—although it is a small one. Not only that, but some of my best friends are from Ontario. No less a gentleman than Doctor Edwards, former leader of the Orangemen, was a very dear friend of mine. When he died I came here to give the news to the then leader of the opposition, Mr. Bennett. I saw to it that Doctor Ross, of Kingston, came up to take care of Doctor Edwards, and I gave my room to Mrs. Edwards and to Mrs. Macdougall, wife of the then hon. member for Inverness. Moreover, I have in my room a letter, written in French in his own hand, by Doctor Edwards, which shows that in his later days he was thinking differently from what he did before. Apart from this, I had very dear friends in Ontario. One of them was Mr. Hepburn, who is still my friend, and the friendship started at the time when we were the two members of parliament whom Mr. Bennett hated most. This is the reason why I made the campaign for Mr. Hepburn. No member of parliament was invited to speak in a larger number of constituencies in Ontario in 1933 and in the provincial campaign of 1934 than the member for Témiscouata. I was delighted to meet good friends, and I returned afterwards at the time of the general election, saw old friends whom I had met there before, and spoke in the constituency of the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding). I was a Liberal speaker at the convention of the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), and I went to different places, meeting good English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians, and supported Mr. Hepburn because I thought he was a good man. And both of us, indeed all of us, regarded Arthur Meighen as one of the calamities of the world.

Therefore I am not a stranger in Ontario, although I do not now speak there very often. I have many other good friends in that province. Besides Doctor Edwards, there was Mr. Alison Young, of the Windsor Star, a close friend of mine, and dear Harry Anderson of the Toronto Globe, one of the finest citizens of this country. There are many others whom I have not the time to name.

Well, here is Arthur Meighen, the Charlie McCarthy of the Bergens of high finance in Toronto. He decided to run in that district, and immediately afterwards we saw a full-page advertisement published in the newspapers of this country, headed "Total war effort", signed by about two hundred persons—I have not counted them, but I know some of them —who want to substitute themselves for the elected members of parliament. They say that they want total war. We want total war, too, but we do not want to use total war as a pretext for some schemes which are shameful and which they try to hide under the flag.

One of them is the completion of the amalgamation of railways; and I have here official copies of the two speeches published by the king's printer, which had been delivered before in the Senate—one by Arthur Meighen, and the other by Senator Beaubien. The title of Meighen's speech is "United management of railways". Was it sent to me by Arthur Meighen? Was it sent to me by Senator Beaubien? Who sent it to me?

They have not yet succeeded in performing their operation. The idea is not at all to wage total war; the idea is to speculate in Canadian bonds, and that is all that is behind that move. That is why they are against my leader, the present Prime Minister. It is because he is not the man of Bay street and St. James street. They want their own tool here in the House of Commons at the head of the Conservative party, and they want him as the head of the government. They want to prevent the members of parliament from expressing their views, and they call them unpatriotic when they differ from them. Arthur Meighen and his gang—whether the members of his gang are in the house or outside—are the depositories, the only depositories, of pure patriotism—the purest!

To show the insincerity of that man, let us judge his own acts and his present words, comparing his behaviour with his speeches. In the Citizen of January 23 I find:

> Never believed government capable of such an act. Right Hon. Arthur Meighen asserts plebiscite on conscription is admission of its necessity.

I do not want to say anything unpleasant about Mr. Hepburn, for whom I have great respect. I think he has rendered numerous services to the party. Although at times he was not satisfied with what was going on, we have remained friends. I cannot say anything unpleasant about him. Whatever he does, whatever he says, I shall continue to respect him. On the other hand, his position will be very difficult. Senator Meighen says a referendum is a necessity; Mr. Hepburn is opposed to it. How will they explain it to the people? The other day I listened with great interest to the speech delivered by my friend the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray). He said, "I am for conscription at once; that is why I am against a plebiscite." He will vote against the plebiscite if he is logical with himself, and there he will meet another gentleman who holds entirely different views. He will meet my hon. friend the member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), the father of the new Canadian party. Both will vote on the same side, although for different reasons.

Now, sir, speaking of insincerity, I find this:

Meighen deplores failure to give armed forces vote.

Is it possible to have less tact than that? There is no man in Canada who is more tactless than Arthur Meighen. When he said that, he forgot the War-time Elections Act, that miserable piece of legislation for stealing votes in order to get power against the will of the people. There is one sentence that was used outside the house by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), which I will now quote. It is most appropriate. He was referring to the loan:

I know the Canadian people will not grudge that money. It is necessary to save the most precious life in the world—the life of liberty.

That is, liberty, freedom—freedom of speech and freedom of vote.

I have here a telegram that was sent by the same Arthur Meighen, who wants the soldier's vote now. This telegram was sent in 1917 and was read at the Liberal convention which selected my leader in 1919. It was read by Judge Adamson.

Mr. POWER: It is on Hansard.

Mr. POULIOT: The telegram reads:

Winnipeg November 30, 1917. Robert L. Borden, Ottawa, Ontario.

Would like one thousand soldiers' votes at large for Manitoba, of which 300 for Selkirk, balance divided between Provencher, Macdonald and Springfield, or same proportion of division, no matter what our allotment may be.

Arthur Meighen

This is the man who wants more soldier votes. Here is something else he said:

"Present system needs reform," Meighen says.

That appeared in the press on January 17; he said it on January 16. To continue:

Conservative leader, in by-election speech, calls for end to baseless aspersions and stop to fomenting of class antagonisms.

He made that statement in Toronto. I have here another telegram which is signed by a well-known citizen of the world with regard to illegal arrests in Winnipeg. It is dated June 17, 1919, and is a telegram from Mr. Meighen to Mr. Andrews:

Notwithstanding any doubt I have as to the technical legality of the arrest and the detention at Stony Mountain, I feel that rapid deportation is the best course now that the arrests are made, and later we can consider ratification.

The meaning of that is that the law did not authorize him to keep these men under arrest in the penitentiary. Nevertheless, as he says, afterwards we will ratify it by changing the law and making it valid. This was quoted by no less a man than the Hon. Peter Heenan, now a minister in Mr. Hepburn's cabinet, on June 2, 1926, as reported at page 4004 of Hansard of that year.

Is it surprising that after Mr. Meighen's speech of January 10, we had this news item in the press:

Fredericton, January 11. "Mr. Meighen's speech speaks for itself," said Hon. R. B. Hanson, acting Conservative house leader, when asked Saturday if he had any comment to make regarding the speech of Right Hon. Arthur Meighen at Toronto last night. "He is the leader of the Conservative party in Canada and I commend his views to the Canadian people," said Mr. Hanson.

The correspondent of the Gazette, a very distinguished journalist, Mr. Mears, wrote on January 12 that Mr. Meighen simply refused to admit that the present conflict is not a continuation or repetition of that of 1914-1918. Mark you, sir, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) is not the leader of the opposition. He is acting leader of the opposition. His accepted leader is Arthur Meighen, who is now a candidate and who will be defeated on February 9.

The other day I, a Liberal member, said that the Minister of National Defence should resign. It was my right to say so, but should have been said before by the acting leader of the opposition. Arthur Meighen's supporter, Colonel Drew, made a statement in Toronto about Hong Kong. And when I spoke, the leader of the opposition said: "Order," meaning by that that he did not want me to express freely my opinion about that. How can he explain that? How can Arthur Meighen complain about the government when every time I have complaints about the government, the ministers were not defended by their colleagues, they were defended by the leader of the opposition himself, who was like Ferdinand the Bull and had a flower in his mouth for every cabinet minister on this side of the house?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: I withdraw at once.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Surely this exhibition has gone far enough.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, I have the floor, and I do not want my time taken up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a point of order. I object to the language being used by the hon. member, and I do not know why he has not been called to order before now, and especially by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Crerar) who is now leading the house. Do I have to listen to a comparison like that, from the hon. member for Témiscouata or anyone else? I call upon you, Mr. Speaker, to make him withdraw every word he said about me, and I call upon the leader of the house—

Mr. POULIOT: I withdraw Ferdinand the bull, nothing else.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —to end this state of affairs.

Mr. CRERAR: I have not followed all the speech of the hon. member for Témiscouata because I was required to be out of the chamber for two brief periods. But from what I have heard I think the hon. member's remarks were in order until the last statement he made, which he has already withdrawn.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall read from an editorial in the Toronto Evening Telegram of January 23. It is headed:

Opposition forces the door to open inquiry into incompetence.

The editorial begins:

It is not often that it is possible to agree with J. F. Pouliot, M.P., the effervescent member for Témiscouata, yet in his statement that the Minister of Defence should resign over the Hong Kong affair—a statement that was drowned by cries of "Order!"—he appears to have been the only member of parliament who recognized the gravity of the situation revealed by the admissions of Hon. J. L. Ralston.

That concerns what I have said. There is one thing should be done; it is that all Canadians should unite to perform a national and patriotic duty to "squeeze" Arthur Meighen on February 9. I remember very well the day in the special session of 1939 when my leader, the Prime Minister, was speaking, through the chair, to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), and he said: "There is no man for whom I have more respect in this house." But at the present time it is not a question of accepting all the views of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation; the question is to defeat Arthur Meighen so that the big financial interests and the "two hundred" in the city of Toronto do not rule this country. That is all I have to say for the moment.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be of congratulation to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald). They indeed had a great opportunity in having seen Britain, resolute and fearless. The inspiration that came to them from that opportunity was reflected in their words. The Empire Parliamentary Association is to be congratulated on having invited these hon. members to Westminster. I would make the suggestion that the government of Canada might well consider inviting a group from the congress of the United States to visit us, and at the same time the parliamentary association might arrange that some hon. members of this house have an opportunity to go to Washington, thus indicating to the United States of America our appreciation of the efforts they are putting forth as our allies and the magnificent assistance they gave us long before the actual outbreak of hostilities between the United States and the axis powers.

As I listened to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) it came to me once more what democracy in this empire and this country means: That in the midst of war, when all of us are worried and concerned, an hon. member may rise in his place and make the type of speech he made to-day. That is freedom of speech—the opportunity to express one's view in parliament.

I am not going to endeavour to follow the hon. member in what he has said. I think now is not the time for me to endeavour to enter into any defence of our new leader. That may well be left to less perilous times. As I apprehend my responsibility as a member of parliament it is this, not to indulge in personalities, or in recriminations as to what took place in 1917 or since, but to try to place before the house and the country any ideas I may have that might be of assistance at this time.

The speech from the throne confined itself in general to an expression of the intention on the part of the government to extend the war effort. But throughout the entire speech there is only one definite promise, contained in the following paragraph:

> My ministers accordingly will seek, from the people, by means of a plebiscite, release from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service.

Two amendments have been proposed. The only point of conflict that I see between these amendments is that that proposed by my hon. leader is clear and unequivocal; we challenge the right of the government at this time in our history to submit a matter of life and death to the people of the nation in this way. On the other hand the subamendment, while agreeing with all that we say in our amendment, suggests that provision should be made in the plebiscite for an additional question. Let me ask at once: is there any hon. member in this house to-day who denies the proposition that treasure should be mobilized with blood? Could it ever be said that Canada would conscript her sons but not her wealth? No hon. member would say to-day that large profits should be permitted in time of war. We all admit that in war time large profits are indefensible and unjustifiable.

What is the amendment we propose? In essence it is this, that we should completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war, and that we should supply the needs of agriculture and industry and the fighting forces and prepare for the post-war period.

I point to the order in which these requisites are referred to in the amendment—that we mobilize wealth and material resources, and mobilize on a selective basis the man-power of the nation.

Let me make just a reference to agriculture. We are asking that the imperative needs of agriculture shall be met. For almost two years in this house we have called attention to the situation of agriculture in western Canada. Population records now tell the story—parts of western Canada depopulated in large areas because of the fact that in part the government has failed to realize that there is a problem in so far as western agriculture is concerned.

We on this side of the house have taken the stand consistently that so far as the wheat grower is concerned, as of right he should be entitled in this time of war to a parity price. Finally, the farmers of Saskatchewan, in desperation, knowing that there was no hope from this parliament unless they showed themselves here, will arrive on Sunday next. On November 27 the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was interviewed, and rather ridiculed the projected trip. His words were:

> Asked about the plan Friday, the Hon. J. G. Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture, said if such a delegation does come they will no doubt be received and listened to attentively. I am afraid they will have left the impression that money is more plentiful in western Canada than most of us believe it to be.

They are coming, Mr. Speaker, to demand their rights. They come in no threatening mood, but rather as individuals who to-day find themselves in a position bordering on economic slavery. The farmer must have parity prices for farm products, and I believe that when they do come, and when this government realizes they mean action—and by that I mean political action—the government will see the light and do that which it has not done, in spite of the representations made from this side of the house, during the last year. That is all I am going to say at the moment about agriculture. Our attitude is this—and it was the attitude of Mr. Meighen adopted when he accepted the leadership: our stand demands every sacrifice, whether of time, money, property, income as well as men for the army, so long as the laws making these demands are equitable and fair and apply to everyone without discrimination.

Here we are, Mr. Speaker, in the darkest period of the war. All of us to-day admit the peril to freedom. What the people of Canada are asking for is not a reference; it is not a consultation. What they are asking us to give is a plan, definite, comprehensive and fearless in its operation. They demand that. They have no way of getting it other than by asking for it, and by requiring their representatives in the house to stand up and make their demands on their behalf. Our responsibility as members is to give voice to their demands.

Great changes have come over the world in the last few weeks. The freedom-loving nations are banded together to forge the greatest chain for the preservation of liberty the world has ever known. They are banded together—1,720,000,000 people, as compared with 293,000,000 under the axis, and 215,000,000 in countries under the scourge of Hitler. They are banded together with over seventy per cent of the world's natural resources.

Wealth unused, man-power unmobilized and potential resources unless utilized avail nothing. We were told by Mr. Churchill when he was here that the period of consolidation is ending, that the pattern of victory is being designed. Yet even to-day Germany is spending $25,000,000,000 a year, while the British empire as a whole is spending approximately $23,000,000,000. I am not one who deprecates our war effort; it is fine, so far as it goes. We are all Canadians, but, Mr. Speaker, there are dangers which must be met. Hong Kong was to Canada its Dunkirk. Hong Kong was another example of that principle of "too little and too late"—"too little" in numbers, "too little in forces" and too late as to transport and armoured vehicles. I suggest to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) that whoever was responsible for making the errors at Hong Kong should be punished and removed from office.

What will be necessary, I ask the minister, to awaken the people of Canada to immediate action regarding man-power? Will not the foreboding news of Singapore or the repulse in the Libyan campaign to-day? The answer of the government for not acting is that "national unity," must be preserved. Is "national unity" being used as a shibboleth to avoid responsibility, and as an excuse? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, will not the common danger which faces this empire to-day, which faces this country, and which was so admirably pictured last night in the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), bring national unity in Canada?

Is Canada's war effort to be like a convoy in the Atlantic, the speed of which is to be determined by the slowest ship in the convoy? The Prime Minister says he believes in total war, and he has used striking words in that connection. He has said this:

> There is only one way to meet total war, and that is by total effort, not for a day or a week or a month, but every day until victory is won.

Must we in Canada wait until every person agrees that the government in its good time takes action? The great majority of Canadian people are asking for and pleading for action, and the government seems to be hobbled by those who ask for moderation in the extent of Canada's war effort. It is no time for discouragement. It is time for courage, for action, and above all for a banishment of political considerations. It is time for us to take stock of our resources and to act resolutely. Once and for all we must determine that the days that are gone, are gone. 1917 is gone; the last election is a thing of the past. We remember what Churchill said, —"If we wrangle about yesterday we have lost to-morrow."

I make this appeal to-day: let us forget recriminations, forget the past and the mistakes which have been made: forget partisanship and forget jockeying for votes, with an eye on the ballot box of the future. Let not Canada's effort be circumscribed by political considerations. What the people are asking for is not partisanship. They ask for psychological rearmament, rearmament of hope and faith.

The heroes of Hong Kong went out into the night, a night of certain sacrifice. They went with courage unexampled, because they knew they would be avenged, that others would take their places, and that Canada represented by its parliament would not fail them. The foundation of morale is faith and knowledge —faith that those who serve will not be deserted, an appreciation of the eternity of the principles for which this empire stands, the knowledge that there will be no surrender by those who survive, and that though life is lost there will be others to take their places.

Lose morale and you court disaster. Who is the custodian of our morale? The responsibility rests upon parliament. The Canadian people can do nothing, they are helpless, they are shackled. However willing they may be to serve, they can be frustrated by a parliament that will not act. What happened twenty-four years ago has nothing to do with the question to-day. Our duty, our obligation, our trusteeship as members of parliament is to see that no man who serves is sacrificed unnecessarily, and that the wealth and resources of this nation are mobilized.

I think the time has come when the members of this house have the right to ask of the members of this government what their plans are, and to have the answer. What of the balanced programme that was referred to in the speech from the throne regarding increases in our armed forces and in the production of munitions and foodstuffs? Is Canada's main contribution to be materials? In the armed forces is the first consideration to be to secure men for the army, the navy or the air force? Instead of saying to the young men of this country, "we need you in the army, we need your services", a regulation goes out making provision for a new suit. In other words, the man shall determine where he will serve. This is not decided upon the basis of need according to government plan, it is decided by the individual upon the basis of whether or not the suit suits. Have we achieved maximum production? What is the plan for the mobilization of agriculture to assure producers a fair and reasonable return for their products? What is the plan regarding selective allocation of men to the places where they will give the maximum service to the war effort?

Are our objectives known? Except for the British empire training plan, which was worked out a year and a half ago, our objectives have been announced piecemeal. We are told that there is a shortage of gasoline, that our forces need gasoline, and we are given a rationing scheme that is a sham. The people of this country are being allowed to drive for pleasure a total of 5,500 miles. We hear about a rubber shortage, but what is being done to mobilize the available resources of this nation? We have heard a lot about a salvage campaign, about the need for iron and steel and scrap iron. A plan was evolved under which the people of Canada patriotically endeavoured to supply the needs of the government. But does the government accept that scrap iron? No, it goes to the clearance centres for its needs.

One instance comes to my mind. The farmers in the vicinity of Strongfield, in my constituency, believing that cast iron was needed, went out in their fields and removed all unnecessary parts from their machinery. They got together a total of 138,000 pounds, but they found there was no market. They finally got an offer of a certain price per ton which they had to accept although the price was low. They shipped the scrap iron and received a net amount of $400 upon the basis of a ton of 2,250 pounds. The purchasers pointed out that a ton of scrap iron is that weight according to the decision arrived at by the government last summer, but later on made up the difference in price.

Are men needed? When Mr. Churchill introduced his man-power bill in the British House of Commons extending compulsion to men up to fifty-one years of age and to women for the auxiliary services, he said this:

> The crisis of equipment is largely over and an everbroadening flow is now assured. The crisis of man-power and woman-power is at hand and will dominate the year 1942. This crisis comes upon us for the following reasons: The great supply plants have largely been constructed; they are finished; they must be staffed. We must maintain the powerful mobile army we have created with so much pains both for home defence and foreign expedition.

General Auchinleck says that the empire needs men; Mr. Roosevelt says that the United States needs men, but the government of Canada says that there is no need. I ask the government to tell us what system they have for the mobilization of man-power.

Mr. RALSTON: That is not so.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How are they to be the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said that they were getting enough men. That is the record of the last few days.

Mr. RALSTON: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How are they to be obtained? What is our system of mobilization? Conscription for service in Canada penalizes the youth from twenty-one to twenty-four years because of his age. Every day one receives complaints from young men who are in the service about the coercion that is being used, young men who say they are being browbeaten and intimidated in an effort to get them to go overseas. Records can be given. Let the government investigate the situation in military district No. 12. Farmer boys have been called up whose brothers are already serving overseas. They leave their homesteads when there is no possibility of securing the necessary labour to work them. They are brought into the city and placed in a position where enlistment for overseas is forced upon them. And the government calls this voluntary enlistment!

Why have we no planned coordination in the empire? Why are we not represented in an imperial war cabinet? I suggest that it would be fitting to take one of the ministers of national defence in Canada and send him over to England to cooperate with the ministers from other parts of the empire. The other parts of the empire have asked for this but the Prime Minister says that we are getting along as well as we need to at the present time. What is the psychological effect going to be in Australia, in New Zealand, in south Africa, if Canada persists in this action? I cannot understand the attitude of the government in refusing the offer of a place for Canada in a war cabinet as proposed by the Prime Minister of Great Britain. The membership was not refused directly, but acceptance has been postponed indefinitely.

Australia is fearful and afraid. Has any good reason been given why Canada is not a member of the Pacific defence council? The failure in Hong Kong apparently arose because the government was not aware of the probability of Japan coming into the war. If they had been, they would not have sent untrained men over there. We have a joint defence council for Canada and the United States headed by Mayor LaGuardia. Did he not tell Canada of the danger? That the danger was known in the United States is revealed in the report of Mr. Justice Roberts on the Pearl Harbour disaster. He said:

> As early as October 16, the commanders were warned of the possibility of an attack by Japan on the United States and were directed to take precautions and make preparatory dispositions in the light of this information. A significant warning message was communicated to both the local commanders on November 24. On November 27 each responsible commander was warned that hostilities were momentarily possible.

The warnings indicated war and war only. What was the reason the munitions did not arrive in Hong Kong? Was it that there was no appreciation of the danger? Was it that they were shipped in a slow ship? Is that the explanation? I am glad the whole matter is to be investigated, and I express the prayer and hope there will be no more Hong Kongs.

Why not mobilize man-power now? The Minister of Agriculture is authority for the statement made on September 12 last that Canada could still muster a million men without interfering in any way with the production of primary products and industry. He went on to point out that 1,198,000 single men between the ages of eighteen and forty-four are still available. But the excuse given to-day is that we cannot do that because we have not the necessary man-power for industry and we would not be able to equip the troops. Well, we have the answer to that in a speech delivered by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) on September 11, 1941, when he said:

> As a matter of fact the problem of equipment for our Canadian armed forces is one that no longer gives concern.

He went on to point out that we had almost reached the limit of Canada's industrial production. He said:

> The Department of Munitions and Supply has been entrusted with the task of mobilizing Canada's full productive capacity for the manufacture of munitions and war supplies. As minister of that department I feel that I can now report practical fulfilment of that task.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will permit me, he has used the word "munitions" twice with reference to the Hong Kong expedition. Probably he misunderstood. The munitions went with the ship. It was the mechanized vehicles that did not reach there. Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to make that correction.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is perfectly true. I was referring to the mechanized equipment.

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps the hon. member will also permit me to put the record straight. As a matter of fact my statement was this: If a million men are necessary, the other seven million could do the work necessary to keep them there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not what the press said.

Mr. GARDINER: That is what the press said, if I was reported properly.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Here is what the Minister of Agriculture said as reported by the press:

> Canada can muster 1,000,000 men for the armed forces and still attain the necessary production in farm and factory, Agriculture Minister Gardiner said last night in a Reconsecration Week speech on the national network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.
> If 1,000,000 men were called to arms, he said, there would still be 7,000,000 persons over 16 years of age left and these "properly organized and determined to stand behind the armed forces can operate all our farms, our factories and places of business in a manner which will give us the production required."

Mr. GARDINER: If my hon. friend will permit me, because this matter has been referred to three times in the house already, in the last sentence he has read he has quoted what I actually said. But before that in the first sentence he read the newspaper lead.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The Minister of Agriculture made the statement as reported by the press.

Mr. GARDINER: I made the statement as reported in the last sentence that was read.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who is making the speech?

Mr. GARDINER: I am making a correction.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The record speaks for itself, but as usual the Minister of Agriculture, after making one statement, finds it necessary to withdraw part of it when challenged later on.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not recalling any part of the statement I made. My statement is reported in the press and properly reported, but I am not responsible for the reporter's lead.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We are not going to get into an argument over reporters' leads, except to say that this reporter's lead summarizes exactly what the minister said.

Mr. GARDINER: It does not. Read it again.

An hon. MEMBER: The minister has never denied it until to-day.

Mr. GARDINER: I corrected it last session when the same speaker was speaking. I made him read it a second time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, surely the minister knows the rules of this house much better than that. If he wants to make a correction, there is a proper time and place.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member does not wish to have any interruptions, I would ask hon. members not to interrupt.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): By all the rules the proper time to make a correction is when the statement is made.

Mr. GARDINER: The speech was read over the radio; it is on record and can be produced at any time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not concerned about the interruptions, Mr. Speaker, but if the Minister of Agriculture has a speech to make, let him make it, because the people of Canada want to know whether the Minister of Agriculture who spoke in September last has the same views to-day that he had then.

Man-power is necessary, and it can be secured. The speech from the throne admits inferentially that there is need of man-power in our war effort, in the armed services, in industry and on the farms. And what does the government do? It holds a plebiscite, a sop to public opinion, to be acted on, I presume, as was the referendum on prohibition in 1897. The majority voted in favour of that plebiscite, but the government failed to act for fourteen years.

Mr. GRANT: I thought the hon. member was not going to go into past history.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Your situation, Mr. Speaker, is a difficult one when a member refers to matters that are not to the liking of the government. As I was about to say, what does the government give us to-day? A plebiscite. I would not contest so seriously the government's action if they were frank enough to inform the people of Canada that if there is an affirmative vote on the plebiscite, they will act and mobilize the man-power of this country, that is, of course, provided that the pledge of the Prime Minister and the other members of the government is such that they find it impossible to be released therefrom in this parliament by the people's representatives. But they will say nothing about what they will do after the plebiscite is taken. The Prime Minister says he will give no commitments. I ask the ministers who have been interrupting me: What will you do? I ask the Minister of Agriculture now: If the Canadian people come out in favour of releasing the government, what will you do? I ask the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar): what will you do? I ask the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock): what will you do? I ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald): what will you do?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Do the right thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Do our duty.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, Mr. Speaker. The government give no undertaking. They say: relieve us of our responsibility and we will do what is best. What is best? The best is a matter of interpretation according to the whims of the person voting on the plebiscite. The hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) says: The government will act. The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) says: The plebiscite will allow troops to be sent overseas. But the premier of Quebec says: no; it means nothing of the sort. The Prime Minister denies that he gave Mr. Godbout any authority to make such a statement. Then where did Mr. Godbout get his authority to make a statement such as that? Again I ask the ministers of the crown: Did they give authority to Mr. Godbout to make that statement? Have hon. gentlemen read in the press to-day that every member of the Godbout government is opposed to conscription? I ask the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar): What would he do if the plebiscite passed, in view of the speech he delivered in the city of Winnipeg prejudging the matter?

The Prime Minister claims that a plebiscite is the only way available to him to secure release from his pledged word. Mr. Chamberlain, when Prime Minister of Great Britain, found himself in a like position, by reason of the pledges of Mr. Baldwin, and himself appealed to parliament for release using these words:

> The Prime Minister, whatever his declarations have been, is deprived through external circumstances of the ordinary constitutional methods of escaping from a difficulty of this kind. Therefore, he is bound to act in accordance with what he believes to be the national needs and safety. That is the supreme pledge which is tacitly and unspokenly given by all those who hold first office in the state. I should like to point out, that, looking back on the past, this is exactly what happened in the great war. We were all pledged against conscription in the great war. The most fiery speeches were made by all the members of that government before the war and at the election preceding it. I certainly declaimed against it with the utmost vigour. When, however, the crisis of the war was reached and it was found to be absolutely necessary to have conscription, hardly any of the ministers found the slightest difficulty in voting for it.

But what did the Minister of Mines and Resources say when speaking in Winnipeg? The government claims the right to consult public opinion and yet the Minister of Mines and Resources said that you cannot depend on public opinion. This is his statement as reported in the Winnipeg press:

I have never ignored public opinion but in my experience and observations there are times when public opinion may not be well informed.

Then he goes on, in these significant words:

And I have not a great deal of admiration for the public man whose ear is always to the ground so that he may trim his sails according to the wind. . . .

Mr. CRERAR: Does my hon. friend quarrel with that?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Wait till you get the rest of the story.

I say frankly that if I were convinced that conscription of men for overseas service is the one best contribution Canada can make I would be for it.

An hon. MEMBER: What about answering the question?

An hon. MEMBER: How are you going to vote on the plebiscite?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members not to interrupt the speaker. If they do not agree with his statement they will have an opportunity afterwards.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The Prime Minister has often spoken of the supremacy of parliament. In this case he substitutes uncertainty for constitutional responsibility. If he would say frankly to the people of Canada that he wanted to take this step, I and every person in Canada would believe him, and there would be no opposition. But, no, we are to have procrastination and delay for another two or three months, to see what is going to turn up. I suggest this, bring in a resolution to the house, or give the private members an opportunity, through the restoration of private members' day, to introduce a resolution for complete mobilization of wealth, man-power, and resources. Let the Prime Minister and each of his ministers get up and say to their following—as loyal and patriotic as any in the house—"Vote according to the dictates of your conscience." Allow the members of parliament to vote on this question. Do not submit the question to the people of Canada, for in my opinion the taking of a plebiscite at this time may well destroy the unity of Canada. How will the people know how to vote? If they vote to release the government, what is the government going to do? God forbid that the proposal be defeated! But if so, what harm will be done to a united war effort? Is parliament to be sovereign, or is it to become a political juke-box which is to be voiceless unless the token of public opinion is inserted, and public opinion, on inserting that token, is still uncertain and uninformed as to the tune the government will play as a result? Let us have certainty. Let us know what the government's attitude is and what its plan is. The Prime Minister referred the other day to taking the people into their confidence. I say, yes, do that, and take the members of the House of Commons into your confidence! Tell us what you are going to do. Why allow the issue involved in the plebiscite to depend upon the uncertainties of interpretation by each and every individual who votes on it?

My time is almost exhausted, but I wish to deal with one other matter—the mobilization of man-power within this House of Commons. Here are 245 members in touch with the needs of their constituents all over the dominion. There are the members of the government who to-day are overworked. We all have some appreciation of the load of responsibility which they carry. But the rest of the members, with the exception of a few who are on committees, have nothing to do, no work to engage them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have too much.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, the hon. gentleman represents, he says, two or three constituencies. It may not be a suggestion in accord with ordinary democratic principles, but we are at war. Mobilize the brain-power of this house. Divide the membership into committees; let us get together, not on the basis of committees over-loaded with government supporters, but as members each of whom is endeavouring to see the other man's point of view. Set up a committee on the mobilization of our resources, so that all the machine shops throughout Canada will be used, so that we shall be assured of getting the necessary oil production. Set up a committee on agriculture; it is two years overdue. Set up a committee on labour, to be sure that labour is receiving proper treatment. In passing I should like to suggest that representation on various war administrative boards be given not only to dollar-a-year men but to representatives of agriculture and labour as well. Set up a committee on home defence to deal with air raid precautions and the like. Set up a committee on rehabilitation problems. Set up a committee to utilize the services of veterans all over the dominion, the men who served in the last war and, who, but for age and other handicaps, would be serving to-day. Mobilize these veterans, through a committee of this house, to replace young men in service to-day in Canada. Seventy-five per cent of the members of this house get no opportunity whatever, except through criticisms and suggestions, to assist the government at this time.

One thing more, Mr. Speaker. The people of Canada are asking that civilian expenditures be reduced to a minimum. Yet what has happened during the past few sessions? Estimates in millions and millions of dollars have been brought in during the last day. Give us an opportunity, by bringing them in earlier, to sit down and pare millions and millions off those estimates, to the advantage of our war effort.

As I see the situation, there is a challenge which comes to every one of us in these terrible and trying times. I saw the other day a quotation, in one of the articles sent out by the Department of National War Services, "God grant that no brave boy shall lose his life because I falter." That is the message for all hon. members of this house. Our duty is to assure the people of Canada that her effort will be such that no man in our armed forces will lack for a plane, a tank or a boat; to make sure that it will never be said of the members of this parliament, on whom the responsibility rests, that we have been "weighed in the balance and found wanting."

I warn you that the people of Canada are in no mood for trifling. They are prepared to sacrifice, to pay increasing taxes, to reduce their standard of living, to do all, but they demand that service be equalized and that wealth as well as man-power be mobilized. Parliament is more than a sounding board. It symbolizes the hopes and aspirations of all the people of Canada, whose eyes are on us. If we allow partisanship to govern to-day, parliament will become nothing but a voiceless vassal of the government.

We on this side of the house are sometimes ridiculed for our criticism. If it had not been for the criticism that came from the member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), would tanks be built in Canada to-day? Would a great shipbuilding project have been undertaken? What about the acceleration of production of aircraft? What about the acceleration of the war effort? Criticism has come from this side and not from government members in general and it was met in many cases by ridicule at first but later was accepted.

"Politics as usual," with its companion, "business as usual," is a dangerous partnership in time of war. Canada to-day is asking her men to do and to give their all, and they ask us to make our objective victory and not votes. Let us forget our partisanship, which we have shown in the past. All of us have been guilty. Let our party drums cease to rumble, and let not party declarations stymie us from our goal of a total war effort, stultifying the national war effort and stagnating the people's morale and their will to do and their desire to serve.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): There can be, I think, absolutely no division of opinion on the assertion that we have at this time passed into one of the gravest periods in the world's history, a period wherein British institutions, British ideals of justice and liberty, in fact, the whole British way of life are all threatened by a combination of evils which aim to subjugate and eventually to exterminate our empire and everything for which it stands. At this particular time we are satisfied, I am sure, that it is more essential than ever that we in Canada should take stock with a view to ascertaining whether or not we are doing everything which it is necessary to do in order to meet the impending danger. I believe, further, that in every quarter of this country people are realizing more and more that every aspect of our Canadian life must be more highly coordinated and organized if ours is to be the most effective war effort.

In my humble judgment, the energies of the members of this house, the members who are the responsible representatives of the Canadian people, should be directed toward one main objective, namely, that this government and those responsible for the direction of this effort should use every measure necessary in keeping with the needs of the hour. We must take it upon ourselves to make it abundantly certain that partisanship, the desire for party advancement, must, for the moment at least, go by the board.

I am one who personally believes that actions deliberately designed to create complications tend only to frustrate and impede and have no place in the present and the immediate scheme of things. The major portion of this debate has centred round the avowed intention of the government to take a plebiscite in order that the government may be relieved from any commitments which it made in the past regarding the method of raising men for military service. A vote at this time is not a vote for or against conscription, but it has precipitated a heated debate on the question of conscription.

It is, in my opinion, extremely regrettable that this government ever allowed itself to be manoeuvred into a position where a course of action such as that which is contemplated need ever have been considered. It is a most unenviable position in which it finds itself, and I believe it is going to be a most difficult position out of which to extricate itself.

I am taken back to that hectic March of 1940 when what courage, vision, or foresight the government may have had at that time was sacrificed on the altar of political expediency. Verily, in my opinion, it would appear that for them at least the day of judgment has at last arrived. It is also extremely regrettable that our vociferous friends of the Conservative party, inspired, I believe, by the scent of political blood, are endeavouring to move heaven and earth with their incantations, forgetting all the while that they, too, made ample use of that altar in 1940, though without very much success.

That this plebiscite is to be taken is, in my estimation, a certainty. I presume we may just as well reconcile ourselves to that fact. Since, however, it is to appear in this house as a formal issue to be debated as such, I shall refrain from making further reference to it at this time. With war convulsing the greater part of the world, with our own shores in imminent danger, as has already been indicated by many members, with that grim spectre of Hong Kong staring us in the face, it is probably timely that some of us say to the government, "Let us really get down to business and battle and thus set an example to all of our Canadian people." We are asking our Canadian people to gird themselves for war; but if we expect results which will be most highly satisfactory, it is essential that we set an example for them to follow.

I do not propose to comment upon the extent of our war preparations. I encounter a good deal of difficulty in arriving at some basis upon which I am able to criticize. We hear the reports of the various ministers. We are obliged to take their word for what they say. We have no way of knowing whether those reports are exaggerated or not. Therefore it becomes extremely difficult for us to speak in definite terms with regard to the extent to which we should expand in the production of machines of war.

There are, however, many matters about which we are familiar. In the first place, if I were to level any charge at all at the government, it would have to be this: I believe that we lack a definitely coordinated plan. I say that for this reason: We see, at this late stage, the spectacle of agriculture still in an unfortunate position; we witness the spectacle of thousands yet unemployed; we see certain cross-sections of our Canadian people still not having been given the consideration which is overdue. I have in mind, for example, the old age pensioners of whom I spoke here a few months ago. We have those unskilled workers, who, because of the fact that they are unskilled, seem to be unable to find a corner or a niche into which they might be fitted in the war effort. We witness men being taken out of essential industries and put in uniform, thus impairing the efficiency of those industries and retarding our production. I believe that it will soon be necessary for the government to set up a board or a commission, or whatever they wish to call it, for the purpose of establishing a definite, clear-cut plan for the prosecution of the war.

Let me speak of one group of Canadian citizens who are rendering most valuable service at this time even though they are unheralded; a group who have been given thus far practically no consideration by the government. That group, the teaching profession must have their views aired here. I feel competent to deal with this matter inasmuch as I have spent more than one-third of my life in that profession, and I realize from first-hand experience the difficulties they are encountering. I might be asked, "Why do you bring it up here?" Recently the government of Canada passed drastic regulations restricting certain wage increases, and granting cost of living bonuses to those in certain professions. This legislation or order in council, obviously designed to prevent inflation—which incidentally was supposed to arise only under proposals which we advocated —was intended to prevent inflation and also to ensure that all essential Canadian workers should be enabled to maintain life at a level compatible with physical and moral efficiency. The government, however, failed to take into consideration the teachers of Canada. I know the government may have regarded this as a provincial matter or a municipal responsibility. We know the government believed that the suggestions set forth in the order in council would be recognized by employing bodies. Nevertheless many of these municipalities, many of these smaller areas, failed to appreciate the valuable services performed by the teachers and the extremely necessary nature of their work. There are in Canada over 30,000 teachers in rural districts who, during the year 1940, received less than $1,000 a year for their services. There were 19,000 such teachers in the dominion who received less than $625 a year, and there were approximately 13,000 who received less than $525 a year. Outside Canada, in other parts of the British empire, we find that inexperienced women teachers enjoy an average income of from $700 to $800 a year with guaranteed increments for experience and satisfactory service.

I also have in mind that in Great Britain, when regulations were adopted granting bonuses, there was absolutely no question about the teachers being included; they were included. Unfortunately, there are all too few people in this country who appreciate the nature and the value of the work carried on by the teaching profession. Unfortunately, that profession, like many others, has been relegated to a minor position. It is high time that we gave proper appreciation to the value of education, if for no other reason than in order that the rising generation may be a little more competent to deal with the problems which confront them than we have been to deal with those which face us. I have seen during recent months hundreds of our most competent and efficient teachers move from their schools to factory centres because the rates of pay offered there are far more satisfactory than those they were getting. All this is to the detriment of the children.

From coast to coast, we have witnessed the spectacle of schools closing on account of the inability to secure teachers. In recent weeks we witnessed the spectacle of many inexperienced youngsters, if I may so describe them, without sufficient training being taken out to teach school in many rural communities. We cannot afford to allow our standard of education to become a third-rate standard. We cannot afford to see our teachers submitting themselves to economic degradation. We cannot afford to allow a semi-illiterate generation to come forward, charged with the responsibility of solving the problem which we shall pass on as a legacy to them. The terms of the order in council should be broadened to enable the teachers of Canada to demand and to secure cost of living bonuses which are necessary, if they are to continue to perform the type of service we require.

For a moment I should like to refer to the matter of salvage. I am quite satisfied that if Canadians are given a clear-cut understanding of the need for salvage, there will be no reluctance on their part to do everything within their power to provide the materials which are available and are required. The more recent aspect of our salvage campaign has had to do with the salvaging of paper. If there is a shortage of paper, as has been indicated, and if it is the desire of the Department of National War Services that paper should be salvaged, the first thing that department must do is to indicate to our people that it is prepared to set an example.

I have before me a notice which I presume appeared recently in all Canadian newspapers. It bears the heading "Bullets for Britain", and then, in large type, it states:

> Waste paper is a valuable war material—don't throw it away or burn a scrap of it. Canada needs it —needs it badly—needs it now!

And so on. It has come to my attention in my own home town, through the chairman of a committee set up to salvage paper, that recently various papers and publications have come into his hands. After examining them, he has come to the conclusion that he cannot be inspired to go forward with any great measure of enthusiasm, because he can see no evidence on the part of the government that it is anxious to conserve supplies we already have.

For example, I hold in my hand a copy of a publication sent out to newspaper editors in Canada. It is headed "Press censorship", and comprises twenty-four pages, sixteen of which are absolutely blank. When this information becomes known to the people in any community, they are not going to be enthusiastic about proceeding with this or any other type of campaign. Sometimes I wonder why the salvage organizer, as I believe he is described, for Alberta and British Columbia has not been able to get more than four or five people to attend meetings held in centres of 1,100 or 1,200 population. I believe the condition I have set out affords a definite reason why he does not secure better results. The government must indicate that it is going to practise conservation.

One further observation in that regard. Our people have not been directed as they should have been in connection with the disposal of salvage. Probably I should say that they are not satisfied that the salvaged materials are going to the sources at which they are required, without certain persons or groups of persons profiting unduly as a consequence of the operation. I am not making any accusation, but I do state that the position should be made clear to those who are called upon to salvage materials.

Not so many years ago there was set up in Canada an organization known as the air cadet league of Canada, and I should like to make one or two statements about it. I do so because in my constituency we have one of the largest air cadet squadrons to be found outside the larger cities in Canada. Squadron No. 7 at Penhold is composed of about 186 cadets. I approve the idea of an air cadet league, and it is my belief that great good will come from it. As the months roll by, we shall be in a better position to appreciate the vision of those who took the first steps toward establishing an air cadet league in Canada.

Let me place on record this paragraph from a little booklet in which the regulations are set out:

> The desirability of providing organized elementary training in aviation for Canadian boys and young men was apparent to many people long before the war. It has taken the present conflict in all its seriousness, however, to focus attention, both public and private, not only on the desirability but the necessity of creating such an opportunity for the youth of our country. From youth itself has come an overwhelming and irresistible appeal for this training.

At one point the regulations state:

> The air defence cadet corps of the United Kingdom organized in 1938 by the air league of the British empire—

—was a tried and proven plan to use as a guide. It continues:

> The achievements of this corps, and its ever-increasing contribution to the war effort in the mother country are an inspiration and a record to which the air cadet league of Canada pays a sincere and grateful tribute.

In making this reference, I am not being critical at all. I offer suggestions because I believe in the idea of an air cadet league. I have witnessed the operation of the air cadet league corps in my constituency, and I believe the idea is first class. But this is what we are up against: Under the present system of organization we find that, with the exception of meagre assistance, the squadron is left pretty well to its own resources, as far as financing its operations are concerned.

It is true—and we are grateful—that old aeroplane parts, certain other used equipment such as rifles, and a per capita grant of one dollar a year are provided. But to provide a uniform requires about $20 per cadet, and our 186 cadets could not be provided with uniforms for less than about $3,700. I know we are supposed to appeal to our people for money to meet this cost, but by reason of other calls being made upon their resources at this time we find that many of our youth, after a number of months in the corps, are still without the required uniforms. Since the Department of National Defence for Air is more or less the godfather of this organization, I would recommend that the Royal Canadian Air Force take over immediately the general supervision of the air cadet league of Canada. They should supervise all organization work, the provision of uniforms and officer personnel. I am sure that in a few years, or in possibly a few months, we shall realize to what extent the Royal Canadian Air Force depends upon the air cadets as a source of air crew.

[Mr. Shaw.]

It is a recognized fact that many of these young men are leaving the air cadet league to join the active service. There have been eight from the Penhold squadron. It is also a well known fact that an air cadet is able to complete the Royal Canadian Air Force course in approximately two-thirds the time required by a young man without similar preliminary training. I urge that consideration be given to the recommendation I have made.

I do not propose to take up much more of the time of the house, but I should like to point out—I referred to this a moment ago—that I believe the unskilled labour which is still drifting from place to place should be given training immediately. Many men have come to me and reported that they have tried to enrol in the war emergency programme section of the youth training scheme, but that for apparently no reason they have been rejected. Daily we hear of the need for manpower, and yet in many instances these young men, when making application for training, do not receive even courteous consideration. A number of young fellows of about eighteen years of age came to me and stated that they were anxious to receive some type of training, but had been advised they would not be eligible unless they could produce proof showing that they had been rejected for or discharged from military service. We cannot permit a condition of that sort to continue. Our unskilled labour should be given an opportunity to become skilled. We shall require them if production in this country is to be in keeping with the needs of the armed forces.

These are dark days. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, we are being threatened by the most evil type of forces who would restore the dark ages if they are successful. It is essential that we should forget all those things which have hitherto divided us, that we give sane and sound consideration to our country's needs, and that the one and only concern at this time should be the needs of our country and the needs of our nation.

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in this debate, may I first congratulate the mover (Mr. Fournier, Hull) and the seconder (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City) upon the splendid speeches they made. I had supposed that they would give some credit to the administration for Canada's war effort, but I think we should pay a tribute to the men and women of Canada who have put forth such magnificent efforts in this connection. There are thousands of men and women who have made considerable sacrifices, who appreciate the realities of the present time.

I am sorry that I cannot congratulate the government upon that portion of the speech from the throne which deals with the proposed plebiscite to save the political face of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his ministers. Under the guise of national unity it is proposed to hold a plebiscite in order to endeavour to preserve the solidarity of the Liberal party. There are several aspects of the speech with which I shall deal later; at some future time I intend to discuss increases in old age pensions, veterans' allowances and certain other matters, but to-day I shall confine my remarks mainly to the question of the plebiscite. I come from Toronto, and I must say that I listened with considerable interest to the speeches of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) who both gave the house some first-hand information in connection with the serious situation that exists on the west coast. In passing, I should like to add my protests about the lack of interest the government seems to have taken in this situation.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) upon the magnificent contribution he made to the debate. His was a well constructed and powerful speech, and I hope each hon. member will read it carefully. The speech from the throne tells us:

> . . . that the magnitude and balanced nature of Canada's war effort is being obscured and impaired by controversy concerning commitments with respect to the methods of raising men for military service which were made prior to the spread of the war to all parts of the world.
> The government is of the opinion that, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should in this connection and irrespective of any previous commitments, possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise.

With that I agree. To my mind the government have always had complete freedom of action, subject to its responsibility to parliament. Pledges given prior to an election are not binding upon the government as far as the people are concerned. It is within the jurisdiction of parliament to free a government of any of its pledges so given. On many occasions the Prime Minister has told us that parliament is paramount, and that is the view I take. I was elected to represent the people in my constituency, but I was elected also—hon. members will find this in Beauchesne—to represent the people of Canada. At the time I was elected I told the people of Canada that I would endeavour to further their interests to the best of my ability. I imagine that is the position of most hon. members. But I also told them that I would use my own judgment as to what I thought was in the best interests of my constituency, and I intend to do so now. I said at that time that I did not think compulsory service for overseas was necessary then. But times have changed, and I shall use my own judgment, as every member of the house must, as to what is in the best interests not only of our constituents but of Canada as a whole.

The conduct of the worst war in the history of the world is in the hands of the Liberal government. They have decided to remain in power alone, to share responsibility with no one who has ever dared to criticize the Prime Minister. They are now faced with the question of conscription. It calls for courage, but they must do their duty, and that duty cannot be done by holding a plebiscite. A plebiscite is the evasion of duty.

What is the position of the government with regard to the pledges so given? Those pledges were given at a time when circumstances were entirely different, when the people of the country were not war-minded. Those pledges were given for political expediency. Has the government not given pledges before, Mr. Speaker, and not kept them? The Prime Minister, when seeking votes in the election of 1935, said in Quebec on September 28:

> I say that Mr. Bennett has no right to commit Canada in any way directly or indirectly or to take any action whatever as regards the possibility of war. The people of Canada do not want war and a war in such a distant part of the world holds no interest for Canada. Mr. Bennett has no right to commit the country without consulting the people by means of a plebiscite.

The Prime Minister was speaking at that time on the imposition of sanctions in connection with the Ethiopian war. Here was a clear commitment by the Prime Minister that he would not take the country to war without a plebiscite. Yet in 1939 parliament met, and without any plebiscite at all we declared war.

Again, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), speaking in a by-election in St. Henry in January, 1938, said:

> I have already so stated. Canada will not participate in wars beyond its territory. Canada will do nothing in wars beyond its territory.

That was a definite commitment given by a responsible minister of the crown. I could make many similar quotations from Hansard, but that is sufficient for my purpose. As I said, parliament did declare war, and we did not have a plebiscite.

But now we are asked to determine by plebiscite a question which, to my mind, is not half as serious as declaring war. The way to declare war is the democratic way, by parliament declaring it, and the way to settle this question of compulsory selective service for any theatre of war is for parliament to thresh the question out here on the floor of the house, and not by appealing to the people of the country. Were hon. members pledged in 1939 not to declare war without a plebiscite? If they were, the country has certainly exonerated them from those pledges. Two wrongs do not make a right, but I just wish to say that the Prime Minister and his ministerial colleagues have not always been so meticulous in carrying out the pledges they have given to the public as they would have the country believe at this time.

In the last war we had conscription, and it was opposed by the Liberal opposition of that day. The anti-conscription cry has been used by the Liberal party to win elections, and now the government finds itself faced with this hurdle which must be jumped. It proposes to get over the hurdle not by taking responsibility and deciding the question itself, but by throwing the responsibility on the people to decide by way of a plebiscite. In 1917, as I said, the opposition was against conscription. The issue then was conscription for overseas service. The need then was great, but who will say that the need was anywhere as great as the need to-day, in view of the magnitude of this war? To-day the issue hinges round compulsory national selective service for any front. There was no lack of courage displayed by the government in 1917, when the opposition was opposed to conscription. But now we have an opposition in support of that issue and we have the spectacle of a lack of courage on the part of the government. What good is a government if it will not act according to the needs of the country without seeking the opinion of the people before it acts? The members of this parliament will back up this government in whatever steps it believes to be necessary, and we know the steps that are necessary to be taken at this time from the very fact that the government is endeavouring to be freed from the pledges it gave at election time. But the principle involved in this plebiscite is simply that of asking the people to take a responsibility which the government should rightly take itself. In view of all the support which has been indicated in this parliament to-day for freeing the government's hands, there is no need to put the country to the expense of a plebiscite. The government can quite properly take whatever methods it thinks are justified, and the members of the House of Commons will exonerate it from all its pledges. Is it not unthinkable that such a thing as a plebiscite or a general election should be considered at such a critical time as this, particularly in view of the expenditure it will involve at a time when every dollar counts?

This is not just Canada's fight or Great Britain's fight. It is the fight of what I like to call the new commonwealth of the democracies of the world, and their crying need is for men. It is not only the waste of money which is involved, but the waste of valuable time, which can be measured only in the sacrifice of thousands of lives. I hope hon. members will take this into consideration before they think of holding the plebiscite. Now is the time for the government to introduce any measures which will fully mobilize us for total war. The Prime Minister must implement his pledge for total war with total action. Time has been given us to mobilize. Time—so precious—has been won by the gallant stand of those United States patriots at Guam and the Philippines; the brave stand of our brothers of the various nations of the commonwealth in Singapore—an act which will live forever in history; the stand which has been made in Libya; the stand made by our gallant allies the Russians, the Greeks, and others; the stand of our heroic allies in China; the stand of the Dutch; the stand of our own Canadians at Hong Kong—which helped to win more time for us—and the stand of our own brave men in the army in Great Britain. This time has been won for us, and now it is proposed to waste two or three months of it and plunge this country into a state of turmoil and controversy.

Let me remind you of a little history of the recent past. It may be useful if we are thinking of sheltering behind some kind of Maginot line to-day:

April 9: Germany overruns Denmark and occupies Norway.
May 10: Invasion of the Netherlands and Belgium.
May 14: Netherlands army surrenders.
May 28: Belgian army surrenders.
May 29: Allied troops withdraw from Dunkerque.
June 9: Norway surrenders.
June 10: Italy declares war on Britain and France.
June 22: France collapes.
Sept. 7: Air blitz attack on London begins.
Sept. 27: Japan joins the Axis.
Oct. 28: Italy invades Greece.

1941

March 1: Bulgaria joins Axis.
April 23: Greece overrun.
June 1: Allies withdraw from Crete.
June 22: Germany, Italy and Roumania declare war on Russia.
July 24: Japanese troops invade French Indo-China.
Dec. 7: Japanese attack Pearl Harbour.

Dec. 7: Japanese invade Malaya.
Dec. 8: Japanese attack Philippines.
Dec. 17: Borneo invaded.
Dec. 19: Penang taken.
Dec. 23: Fall of Wake Island.
Dec. 25: Japanese take Hong Kong.

1942

Jan. 13: Celebes and Tarakan captured.
Jan. 16: Burma invaded.
Jan. 20: Bismarck archipelago invaded.
Jan. 21: New Britain and Solomon Islands invaded.

This is a grim chronology of twenty months of war. Are we not in a position to-day similar to that of the Netherlands and Belgium, Norway and France and Denmark? If they had had leadership and realized what was going to happen to them, would they too not have fought right from the start and mobilized everything right from the start? We cannot let our allies down. Nothing but the best is good enough. We must be realists. We do not want to have to defend Canada on Canadian shores. If that happens, it will be too late. The sad record of all these countries shows that. We may not have sufficient equipment now, but we will have it by the time we get all these men partly trained.

National selective service is long overdue. It will be approved by the House of Commons and by the people of the country.

Now, again with regard to pledges. The hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), in seconding the reply to the speech from the throne, said in effect that if the government broke these pledges it would be in the same position as Germany before the world war. No parallel of the kind can be drawn. The present government gave these pledges, as did some hon. members, at a time when they believed they would never have to forgo them. The government know it must be done now. They must have a free hand. Not so with German pledges; for at the time Germany was giving pledges the German nation was accumulating men and materials on the borders of the nations which they had pledged never to attack, and was preparing to attack them when these pledges were given. There is no comparison along those lines; the circumstances are entirely different.

As I said before, the people of Canada would be behind the government and would exonerate them; there would be more unity, too, if the government took this action themselves rather than tried to appeal to the electors.

The motion picture of the progress of events has changed too. All these years the world has thought in slow motion. Now we are in high speed with supersensitive film; high speed of the rapidity of moving events and the supersensitiveness of the public, jittery and nervous with regard to the world situation, which is obscured by lack of knowledge of facts and lack of leadership, prone not to believe that any crisis is upon them; their supersensitiveness increased by two classes, those who have selfish motives, and the hidden army of fifth columnists within our midst. The government must smite both out of the country.

The stakes are not only life and death. They are worse. The alternatives are life or a living hell. The government knows this, and still it proposes a plebiscite!

The Prime Minister, arguing in his speech, says:

> It must not be supposed that there are large reserves of idle people leading a leisurely existence who can now be called to the national ranks.

I agree with him to a certain extent, but there is developing a certain class of idle people in this country, and there will be more because of control legislation. These people must be reallocated to war jobs. It may be difficult. Vast numbers of them are white-collar men. They probably will have to become blue-overall men.

Again he says:

> The entire Canadian population, with very few exceptions, gets up in the morning, works all day, and goes to bed tired out at night.

This may be and probably is so, but I have no doubt in my mind that many people do just this in connection with non-essential war work. They should be available, and are available in a great many instances, to the country's war effort.

The Prime Minister says further:

> In our form of society people have been accustomed to find their own jobs to a very large extent, thus saving vast government machinery.

But we have the machinery. It is set up, but it has not been functioning very well. These people must be directed to their work where they can be spared, and I am sure they are willing to do the jobs.

I could give many instances in which people could be spared right at the present time. Where are they listed? They are not listed in the national registration. What accounting is there of those people who might be available? Do we know just what number of men and women are available for this balanced programme? So far as our war effort is concerned it is not a question of comparison with the war effort of some other country. The question is whether we are doing everything we can and whether we are going to do everything we can.

We must move with courage and thoroughness. We cannot leave a single citizen, man or woman, not doing the job he or she ought to be doing. If we want some comparison, it might be measured in monetary terms. Britain alone is spending this year £4,000 millions, or $400 per capita. A comparative figure for Canada on a population basis would be about $4,500 millions or $400 per capita. We are spending in Canada this year, in the words of the Prime Minister, $3,000 millions, or about $250 per capita. Britain will produce 45,000 guns, with corresponding ammunition. They are well up to their needs and if they had no one else to take care of, their position would be fairly satisfactory, but they have to give away about half of their supply.

So far as man-power is concerned, our problem is this. For a balanced effort there are so many people in this country. Some of them are trained for special jobs, and some are not trained, having, however, the natural strength and ability to become trained. Some are men of military age, while some are too young to fight and others too old. There are so many women, some married with children, others married without children, some young and others old. This is a vast pool of brawn and brain to draw from. On the other hand, there are so many jobs that have to be done. Obviously some of these people must be diverted towards the preservation of those physical amenities of life, the supply of food and shelter and clothing, transport and so on, which cannot further be shrunk or restricted. We have also huge numbers of men and women for the army, the navy, the air force and the merchant fleet.

As regards war production itself we have the factories and we have now the tools, and if we are to do the jobs we must keep the factories going three shifts. The government's job is to see that the efforts of the millions of people in Canada, between the ages of 14 and 65, are directed to the particular tasks for which they are best fitted.

Total mobilization on the basis of equality of sacrifice would knit together the people of this country in closer bonds of brotherhood than ever before. It would be a long step toward the realization of the new and better world which everybody is wishing for after victory. It would show by this act of the government, backed by parliament, sincerity of purpose beyond all shadow of doubt, and our soldiers, sailors and airmen would have renewed confidence.

Man-power is the paramount need for 1942. So said Mr. Churchill. Every part of Canada must bear its fair burden in producing for our war effort. Surely we must all recognize this, and it can be done only by compulsory national selective service. I have listened with great interest to the arguments put forward against compulsory selective service. They are not convincing. Those arguing against it seek to compare our effort with that of other countries—how many men we have serving in comparison with those of other countries. The comparison serves no useful purpose. The main point is this: What is our capacity, and how shall we get 100 per cent of that capacity?

> They say that we will maintain production, in spite of conscription, by employing women. Without further discussing the question of the employment of women, let me say that it will create an overwhelming after-war problem. At present in England an organization is being formed to protect men's jobs against what I might call the infiltration of women into the domain formerly almost exclusively occupied by men.

What an argument against conscription, compulsory selective service, to say that we must limit our effort because of the danger which might come after the war from over-employment of women in men's jobs! If we are to have an after-war problem—and we shall have one—we must win the war first and then face the problem. If we lose, however, slavery will be our fate and the problem whether men are in women's jobs or women in men's jobs will not make much difference.

It seems to me that those who are arguing against conscription are merely in favour of seeing what we can do or what our efforts should be so that we can still get by and save our faces. The axis is asking for total war and they will give it to us. We have to give it back to them. These are facts.

We have our men overseas and we have an obligation to keep them reinforced and not let them down. That is our most sacred duty. We must defend our country wherever it can best be defended. We must raise an army for service anywhere. There must be no restriction; there must be no party politics.

I listened with interest to the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) when he formed his own party—Canada only, I think it was called. Wait, is he not responsible to members of the human race other than Canadians? Are we not all? Did he raise his finger when Mussolini slaughtered his Christian brothers of Ethopia? Did he raise his finger when Japan raided China? I must admit that we were all more or less in the same position when we allowed the international gangsters a free hand, when we allowed these acts of banditry to go unpunished. We laid the groundwork then for the arch bandit, Hitler, and we have the consequences with us to-day.

Peace at any price—that was the downfall of France. That was the lesson taught in the French schools. That was the propaganda work of fifth columnists. The French politicians told their people that Britain's neck would be wrung in three weeks, as Mr. Churchill said, and his famous words stand out —"Some chicken! Some neck!" There was similar propaganda in Great Britain and in Canada as well. That is not what we want here. We want a total effort.

I am going to make an appeal to my French-Canadian compatriots. I understand their difficulties and I think that the situation with them is a psychological as well as a political and racial problem. For upwards of 180 years the whole mental attitude of the French-speaking population of that province has been a defensive one, rightly or wrongly. For the people of that province acknowledged that, as a result of former British policy, and as their spokesmen have taught them, they have had all the rights and privileges and liberties of other Canadian citizens, in some cases possibly more; but their basic attitude is still one of resistance to any concessions of these privileges or rights.

They are willing to give, but they resent the shadow of compulsion coming from other provinces. I assure them that the other provinces do not wish to compel them to do anything; they only wish to persuade them. The Quebec Liberal representatives have accepted the plebiscite proposal and promised to support it on the government's demand for release from past pledges, with few exceptions I suppose; then let those hon. members support the government in parliament. We do not need a plebiscite. Let them go to their people and tell them what they have done. Loyalty—I have heard the word spoken many times by hon. members from Quebec, as if we on this side of the house sought to cast any aspersions on the loyalty of the people of Quebec. Of course they are loyal. As I have said, they enjoy all the rights as well as the privileges of citizens of other parts of Canada. If they want to retain these rights and privileges they must, as General LaFleche and others have said, fight for them. If we lose this war they can rest assured their rights will be taken away. They must bear their full share of the burden if they wish to enjoy the fruits of victory.

If we have leadership I believe we have at the present time in embryo a united nation. Unity can be obtained by the government taking full responsibility and enacting all necessary measures for the safety of the state. The opposition have promised to support and will support the government; of course it reserves its right of critcism. But the opposition support cannot be obtained by such cries as come from some of the government benches when criticism is offered—cries of "sabotage". Our criticism is not offered in that way.

In the speech from the throne we find these words:

> The conflict can have but one of two outcomes. Either tyranny, based on terror and brutality, must be overthrown; or the free peoples of the world, one and all, slowly but eventually, will be reduced to a state of bondage. Upon the outcome depends, for generations, the future well-being of mankind.

Are there any hon. members in this house who do not believe these words? The peril is now. Some hon. members evidently do not believe those words. They talk about some people in this dominion as extremists. Those who advocate an all-out war effort are being called "extremists". No one can be called an extremist for advocating any measures that are necessary as a result of his belief in Mr. Churchill's pronouncements, or if he believes the words I have just read. These people are realists. You cannot be too extreme in days of perils such as this. Here are Mr. Churchill's words spoken in this chamber: do hon. members believe these words, or do they just give lip service to them? I quote:

> We have to win that world for our children. We have to win it by our sacrifices. We have not won it yet. The crisis is upon us. The power of the enemy is immense. If we were in any way to underrate the strength, the resources or the ruthless savagery of that enemy we should jeopardize not only our lives—for they will be offered freely—but the cause of human freedom and progress to which we have vowed ourselves and all we have. We cannot for a moment, Sir, afford to relax. On the contrary, we must drive ourselves forward with unrelenting zeal.

Yet some hon. members call these patriotic men "extremists."

Now a word with respect to compulsory service. What are the people of Canada saying to-day? They are saying that we have recruited so many men here in certain places, and the fellows in other places are not holding up their end. As a consequence national prejudices and jealousies are being set up. If we have compulsory national selective service that will stop, and one more step towards unity will be taken. What are the young men saying?—and this to my mind is one of the greatest arguments in favour of compulsory selective service. I know one young Canadian who supports his mother. He is willing to enlist, but he asks why he should give up his job to an element in our midst who are chasers of dollars and not doing their duty. He says, "My chums and I feel that there is only one fair basis, compulsory selective service anywhere from everyone." These boys also feel that they want some method of removing any chance of future stigma on their name which might be caused by their being in some particular job.

What do the government hope to gain by a plebiscite? At best the government get a respite of two or three months. Meantime there are all kinds of turmoil. When the three months are up there will be the same pressure for action. This proposal of a plebiscite is an affront to the rights of parliament and an undeserved reflection on the people of this country, of whatever race or creed. It will get nowhere. If the proposal carries it will not get rid of the controversy, and it will leave uncertainty as to future action; if it fails to carry, our troops will be abandoned to the uncertainties of voluntary enlistment. In either case the country is humiliated and disgraced.

Let the government say to the country that the interests of Canada demand compulsory service anywhere. Let the government, after giving hon. members the facts and making plain the necessities which may arise, demand that hon. members give them their freedom and a vote of confidence. What did Mr. Churchill do in the House of Commons the other day? He demanded a vote of confidence and he got it. He did not ask for anv plebiscites during this war, no matter what controversies arose or what difficulties he had. There is no necessity to split this country in two by the wholly unfair method of asking those who do not know, who have not the opportunity of knowing the facts, the mothers and fathers and the boys, to vote to conscript themselves. It is a cowardly act.

On motion of Mr. MacNicol the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at six p.m.

Monday, February 2, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SHIPBUILDING—BASIC RATES IN ONTARIO AND QUEBEC PLANTS

On the order for motions:

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I should like to lay upon the table copy of order in council, P.C. 629. I may state that this is the order in council requested by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) on Friday afternoon. It deals with the basic wage rates in shipbuilding plants in Ontario and Quebec.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR COOPERATION IN MATTERS OF HEALTH AND HEALTH INSURANCE

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

He said: This is a reintroduction of a bill which was not reached last session. The purpose of this bill is to provide that the Unemployment Insurance Commission created by the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, shall cooperate with other authorities in the dominion or provinces for the purpose of collecting information concerning any plan for providing medical care or compensation in cases of ill health.

These provisions were found in the Employment and Social Insurance Act, chapter 38 of the statutes of 1935. This act, having been declared to be ultra vires by majority of the supreme court, and subsequently by a judgment of the privy council delivered January 28, 1937, was repealed in 1940 by section 103 of chapter 44 of the statutes of that year, being the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940.

The competency of parliament to legislate in regard to unemployment insurance has been now settled by the amendment to the British North America Act of 1940. It is highly desirable to reintroduce these health provisions into our dominion law.

Mr. POULIOT: This is a waste of time.

Mr. HOMUTH: Not as much as you have wasted.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DIVORCE

AMENDMENT OF ACT OF 1930—JURISDICTION OF COURTS IN PROVINCE OF MARRIED WOMAN'S DOMICILE

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to amend the Divorce Jurisdiction Act, 1930.

He said: This bill was passed by the senate at the last session and given its first reading in this house, but because government business was given precedence all through the session, public bills were not reached. I may say that I discussed this bill with the late Minister of Justice before introducing it. We went over it carefully and he agreed that it was necessary and wise legislation. Therefore I introduce it again.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

RECOGNITION OF SOVIET UNION

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. What decision has the government reached regarding the recognition of our present ally the U.S.S.R.?
2. If recognition has been decided upon, will the government exchange representatives with the Soviet Union?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has been advised as to the reasons which make it desirable to let this question stand for the moment.

Question stands.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister has stated that he has communicated to the hon. member who asked this question the reasons why it was not being answered at the moment. Is there any reason why the house should not also be given the reasons now? This is a matter of considerable public importance.

Mr. POULIOT: Say it with flowers.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my hon. friend will realize that there may be public reasons why it is inadvisable to answer a particular question at one time rather than another. There were reasons why it was thought inadvisable that this question should be answered at this moment, and those reasons were communicated to-day by the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to the hon. member who has asked the question. The Under-Secretary having communicated those reasons to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and the hon. member having agreed that they were sufficient reasons for not answering the question at this time and being quite satisfied that it should stand for the reasons given, I think that ought to have sufficed. I do not mind telling my hon. friend what the reasons are. The government has undertaken negotiations in this matter and at the present time we are awaiting word from the Russian ambassador in London who unfortunately I understand has not, because of illness, been in a position up to the present time to send the desired information. I think it would have been as well if I had not had to make that explanation. I would ask my hon. friend and other hon. members of the house, at this time of very delicate relations between different parts of the world, that the government be allowed to reserve its answers to certain questions where it may be assumed it is in the public interest to reserve them without its good faith in the matter being open to question.

Question stands.

PUBLIC INFORMATION—COST OF PAPER AND PRINTING

Mr. BRUCE:

1. In what way is the mailing list compiled for the distribution of speeches and information?

2. Must application be made for the material before it is sent out?

3. What is the cost in paper and printing per month of the information service?

4. Has the question of economy in paper been considered? If so, will this service be, (a) discontinued, or (b) greatly reduced?

Mr. THORSON:

1. Generally speaking, the distribution of printed matter by the office of the director of public information is based upon either direct or indirect requests. There are some twenty main lists—some large and some small—arranged to provide the most economical and most efficient distribution of different types of material. The basic request list originated with some 50,000 letters asking for copies of the let's face the facts broadcasts (summer, 1940). Since that date many thousands of additional letters have been received from individuals asking that their names be added to the mailing lists. Indirect additions to the mailing lists result from requests made by individuals, corporations, associations, churches, the army, schools, boards of trade, etc., etc.

2. Generally speaking, yes. An exception is one list of important government officials, dominion and provincial, who are assumed to have a natural interest in the material sent out. On rare occasions, when it is decided that wider distribution is desirable, the post office departmental list—based on professional and business addresses—is used.

3. The cost varies greatly from month to month. An average for the first nine months of the current fiscal year is $15,000 per month.

4. Yes.

4a. No.

4b. Yes.

WORKING HOURS IN FACTORIES PRODUCING WAR SUPPLIES

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow-River):

1. How many factories in Canada, producing war supplies are working 24 hours per day, 365 days in the year?

2. How many factories in Canada producing such supplies are working 24 hours a day, 6 days a week, throughout the year?

3. How many factories in Canada producing war supplies are working less than 6 days a week, 24 hours per day?

Mr. McLARTY: Except in connection with certain industrial disputes the hours of labour in industrial employment are a matter of provincial jurisdiction and no comprehensive statistics exist to answer the above questions.

Under the recently established national and regional war labour boards, however, the dominion and provincial governments are cooperating in the handling of most matters relating to employment conditions.

In this connection there is being established a joint system of inspection and reporting which is designed to produce the data requested.

PRICE CONTROL

Mr. BRUCE:

1. What is the estimated cost of administering the price control board?

2. What are the estimates of deficits to be absorbed by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. It is impossible at this time to furnish a complete estimate of the cost of board's administration.

2. Cannot foretell.

GOLD PRODUCTION AND EXPORT

Mr. QUELCH:

1. How many men are employed in the gold mines of Canada?

2. How many in all other branches of the gold mining industry?

3. What was the value of gold produced in Canada in (a) 1940; (b) 1941?

4. To what countries was this gold exported and what amount to each country during each of these years?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, before tabling the answer to this question I feel it advisable to make a statement to the house concerning questions of this kind. It will be recalled that during the last session members sought information with regard to our exports to various countries. At that time I stated that it was not in the public interest to reveal certain information, but I added that if any hon. member desired information for his own personal use and accepted it upon his own responsibility, I was prepared to give it to him. With reference to part 4 of this question, it would not be in the public interest to make public the information asked for. Otherwise the whole question is answered, as follows:

1.—Auriferous quartz mining industry, 1940

	Number
Underground	18,760
Surface	7,648
Mill	2,339
Salaried employees	2,658
	31,405
Alluvial gold mining	840
Total	32,245

2.—Answered in No. 1.

3.—(a) 1940 ..... $204,479,083
(b) 1941(*) $204,906,000
(*) Preliminary estimate.

4.—Not in the public interest to release this information.

THREE HILLS, ALTA., 1941 VICTORY LOAN

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

1. How much was subscribed to the Victory loan of 1941 in the Three Hills, Alberta, area?
2. What was the amount of commission paid in this area?
3. To whom were commissions paid and how much to each individual?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I ask that this question be dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

CANADA'S OVERSEAS AUXILIARY SERVICES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has any interim or final report been received from the commissioner appointed, in 1941, to visit Britain and report on Canada's overseas auxiliary services in war time?
2. Was any overlapping found, and is there anything in the report regarding delivery of parcels to soldiers in Britain and prisoners of war, and what changes, if any, were recommended?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. A full report was submitted by Colonel Manion on his return to Canada.
2. Some duplication of effort was reported due to the following reasons:

(i) The fact that in the field the four organizations operate independently despite a great deal of cooperation and mutual assistance;

(ii) In the case of some of the organizations there was an absence of preparation or training of the men chosen to be supervisors for the units in the field;

(iii) The fact that certain of the organizations felt that they could not carry out as extensive a programme of service as could others;

(iv) The failure to pool supplies of certain articles such as sports equipment (for example), of which some organizations had provided themselves with a greater supply than had others;

(v) These causes led to an unevenness of service and resulted in some units being better cared for than others;

To overcome these inequalities the report recommended that:

(i) A joint board of organization headquarters officials, in London, be set up to deal with all problems affecting the services in the field;

(ii) That supervisors selected for service with the organizations be given preparatory training in Canada before being sent overseas;

(iii) That equipment and comforts distributed by the organizations be pooled and an equal distribution to all units be made.

These recommendations have been followed out and the joint board composed of organization representatives, and the pooling of available facilities has led to a more even distribution of supplies, to better cooperation and more unity of action by the organizations.

Organization supervisors are now given experience in the militia and air force camps in Canada before being selected for overseas service, and this has resulted in better service to the men in the units.

There is no mention in the report regarding delivery of parcels to soldiers in Britain or to prisoners of war. These matters come under the Canadian postal corps.

OTTO STRASSER

Mr. REID:*

1. Has the attention of the government been drawn to Mr. H. G. Wells' statement that one Otto Strasser is now in Canada raising an armed force to save Germany from bolshevism, and that he is getting arms while many of Britain's air fields are still short?
2. If so, what action will the government take in the matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, may I answer this question orally? With reference to question 1, "Has the attention of the government been drawn to Mr. H. G. Wells' statement", I should like to say that much depends upon what my hon. friend means by the attention of the government being drawn to a matter. His question, of course, draws the attention of the government to the matter, otherwise I am not aware that the attention of the government has been drawn to the point which he has raised. In that connection I would like to point out that it is very difficult to answer questions of the kind because, without conferring with all departments of the government to ascertain whether any communications of the character mentioned have been received, it would not be possible to give a definite reply of yes or no. I would like to suggest with reference to questions where a particular point of information is sought that the specific matter on which information is desired be set forth. The indefinite form, "has the attention of the government been drawn to certain communications" invariably creates some difficulty in the preparation of a reply.

Answering question 2, Mr. Strasser is not receiving any arms and he is not raising any armed forces, so there is no action which the government could take or will take in the matter. While I am speaking of this question I should also like to refer to question 36.

Mr. MARTIN:*

1. Under what conditions was Otto Strasser permitted to enter Canada?

2. Is the government aware that Otto Strasser applied for a visa to reenter the United States and that his application has been refused?

3. Is it true that Otto Strasser is raising an armed force in Canada in connection with his leadership of a so-called free Germany?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Part 3 of question 36 is practically the same question that I have just answered, "Is it true that Otto Strasser is raising an armed force in Canada in connection with his leadership of a so-called free Germany?" If I might be permitted to answer that question now, I would say that it is not true.

Answering questions 1 and 2 I would say that there were certain reasons of public policy which governed the matter of Mr. Strasser's admission to Canada, and if the hon. member who has asked the question would seek an interview with the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Robertson will be pleased to let him see the confidential correspondence on the matter.

[Mr. Reid.]

CANADIAN ARMY—ENLISTMENTS, ETC.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a return showing:—1. The total number of men, by provinces and/or military districts, who have enlisted with the Canadian active army as of the latest available date;

2. The total number of men, by provinces and/or military districts, serving overseas with the Canadian army as of the latest available date;

3. The total number of men, by provinces and/or military districts, who are attested for overseas service and who are now serving in the Canadian army as of the latest available date;

4. The total number of men, by provinces and/or military districts, who are serving with the Canadian army reserve as of the latest available date;

5. The total number of men, by provinces and/or military districts, included in the statistics in question number 4 above who were posted to reserve units after receiving training under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Mr. RALSTON: This raises a question which I have had up with my hon. friend; that is to say, whether we should disclose the number of men serving. I have tried to meet the convenience of, and provide information for, hon. members as far as possible, by giving round figures—that is to say, upwards of so many, rather than giving actual figures. I trust the house will accept that as being sufficient in connection with matters of this kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the minister takes that attitude at this time, but I would suggest to him that this is a substantial change of policy, and possibly of very recent date. On November 12, 1941, as reported in Hansard, page 4322, in answer to a question relating to the total number of men now serving in overseas theatres of war, the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), then acting as Associate Minister of National Defence, gave the exact figure, indicating that, as of October 25, 1941, 110,209 were serving in all theatres beyond Canada. As a matter of fact, the minister himself, in the course of a speech on November 5, and in reply to a question from my colleague the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman) stated that there were over 110,000 serving.

If the minister mentions that these figures can only be given in round numbers, I should like to point out to him that his margin of inaccuracy was only 209.

Similarly, at page 4323 of Hansard, November 12, 1941, the Associate Minister of National Defence gave the exact figures of the total number of men then serving in all branches of the Canadian Army.

It is apparent that the objection which is now taken to furnishing statistics of strength represents a very recent change of policy, and I do say that the minister should give us a reason for that change. I should like to make it clear that I am not at the moment quarrelling with the policy; I want to know what it is, and the reasons therefor.

While I am about it I might also refer to Nos. 8 and 9 under Motions for Papers on the order paper. No. 8 deals with the air force, and No. 9 with the navy. I might say that I helped draft these motions, and in these cases inquiry has not been made regarding the number serving overseas, because I understood it was the policy of both the naval and the air force departments which they have consistently taken and maintained, that these figures should not be furnished. Now there is a change of policy on the part of the Department of National Defence regarding the army. I should like to know the reasons for that change so that they may be considered, having regard to the fact that heretofore we have been given exact figures.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows that in only the one case to which he has referred were the actual figures given.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I may say to my hon. friend that that was a slip. That should not have been done. The house will realize, I am sure, that you can no more get those figures in England than you can fly to the moon. They won't give them at all. Unfortunately we adopted in the one instance the policy—which I think was wrong—of giving figures. I am willing, although here I may be going too far, to give figures of enlistments even. I only want hon. members to realize that in withholding figures we are acting simply in the interests of security. I do not see why we should publish on the pages of Hansard the exact size of our army, our navy or our air force. It is all very well for the enemy to guess about it, but there is no reason in the world why responsible ministers should stand up in their places and give that information. I do not believe that precise figures were ever given before. The hon. gentleman cited the case in which I spoke of "over 110,000". If it had not been that the previous figures were given there might have been a wide margin and that would have been the minimum, whereas, if you give the exact figures it discloses of course the maximum as well.

It might not be objectionable to give hon. members individually the exact figures, although there, perhaps, I may be going farther than I should. Let me say that I would have no objection to giving exact figures to some hon. member who wishes to check them to make sure he is not being misled, and I do propose to give the house "upwards of so-and-so", or, as I said in that case, "over so-and-so".

I hope the house will accept that suggestion as being, to say the least, not too restricted, and going perhaps further than ministers would go elsewhere.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no desire to pursue the matter: I have asked the minister for his reasons, and he has now given them. I may point out, however, that in the United States the policy to which he takes exception is being followed; the nation is being told from time to time what the strength of the army is.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, then, I do not read the newspapers aright.

Mr. RALSTON: The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) reminds me—I had thought it applied only to the air force—that we had representations from the British government in regard to this very matter of giving the strengths of our various forces. The Prime Minister tells me that that was with regard not only to the air force and the navy but with regard to the army as well.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE—ENLISTMENTS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a return showing:—1. The total number of men by provinces, who have enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force as of the latest available date;

For a return showing:—1. The total number of men, by provinces, who have enlisted in the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve and the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve since the outbreak of war;

2. The total number of men, by provinces, who are now serving with the Royal Canadian Navy, the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve and the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve.

4. The number of men, by provinces and/or military districts, who have received training under the National Resources Mobilization Act and who have been permitted to return to their civilian occupations.

ENLISTMENTS IN CANADIAN FORCES BY MONTHS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

For a return showing:—1. The number of men enlisted for active service (a) in the army; (b) in the navy, (c) in the air force, during each month since the outbreak of war;

2. The number of men serving overseas in the Canadian army at the conclusion of each month since the outbreak of war.

Mr. RALSTON: The answer to No. 2 will be subject to what I said with regard to the other motion of the hon. member.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In that connection may I point out to the house that in this booklet which is issued monthly by the director of public information, under the authority of the Minister of National War Services, there is a statement progressively of the numbers who have enlisted voluntarily for service anywhere and for home defence. As revised to December 1, 1941, the statement is made on page 15 that the Canadian army has expanded greatly since the outbreak of war, as indicated "by the following figures", and then it gives the pre-war and to-day's figures under both headings, showing voluntary enlistments for service anywhere, more than 240,000, and enlistments for home defence, more than 160,000. These figures are approximately correct, I assume, and I do not see that there is very much force in the minister's statement. I do not see why the exact figures cannot be given.

Mr. RALSTON: The only alternative is for me not to give anything. I am going as far as I can and I do not think my hon. friend should complain.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried, as qualified by the Minister.

PUBLICITY OR PUBLIC RELATIONS—EXPENDITURES—STAFF APPOINTMENTS, ETC.

Mr. MacKINNON (Kootenay East):

For a return showing:—The total expenditures incurred by the Department of National Defence, the Department of National Defence for Air, the Department of National Defence for Naval Services, on publicity or public relations work for the fiscal years ending March 31, 1940; March 31, 1941 and the present fiscal year to date.

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

For a return showing: (a) name; (b) date of appointment; (c) previous occupation; (d) salary, honoraria; living allowances and allowances for travelling expenses of each person engaged in publicity or public relations work for any department of government, or any agency of the government including government-owned corporations.

NATIONAL RESOURCES MOBILIZATION—ORDERS IN COUNCIL

Mr. MacKINNON (Kootenay East):

For a copy of all orders in council passed pursuant to the National Resources Mobilization Act.

CEILING ON PRICES AND WAGES

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

For a copy of:—1. All orders in council dealing with the ceiling on prices and wages;

2. All orders, regulations, rulings or formal decisions of any kind made by the Wartime Prices and Trade Board and/or any official thereof in connection with the ceiling on prices;

3. All orders, regulations, rulings or formal decisions of any kind made by the Minister of Labour, the National War Labour Board, the Regional War Labour Boards, the Department of Labour and/or any official thereof with reference to the ceiling on wages.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT AMENDING REVENUE LEGISLATION

Mr. AYLESWORTH:

For a copy of all orders in council passed pursuant to the War Measures Act or any other act which amend, alter, suspend or in any way affect the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff Act, the Excise Act, or the Special War Revenue Act, together with any regulations, rulings or formal decisions made by the Minister of National Revenue and/or any official of the Department of National Revenue or the War-time Prices and Trade Board or the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and/or any official thereof, pursuant to such order in council.

CANTEEN FUNDS

Mr. BENCE:

For a copy of the report made by the committee appointed under order in council P.C. 7520 for the purpose of inquiring into the utilization and custody of canteen funds, together with a statement of the action which has been taken by the government to implement such report.

CANADA PACKERS—DISMISSAL OF ADAM BORSK

Mr. GILLIS:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Department of Labour and Canada Packers Limited, Toronto, and between the Packing House Workers Organizing Committee and the Department of Labour, relative to the discharge of Adam Borsk, an employee of Canada Packers, on December 23, 1941.

CANADIAN FORCES—RELIGIOUS AFFILIATIONS

Mr. HOMUTH (for Mr. Church):

For a return showing the number of officers and men serving in the active service forces of the army, navy and air force, with their religious affiliations as set out on their attestation papers.

Mr. RALSTON: I wonder if my hon. friend, who moves this for the hon. member, will allow the motion to stand. This means another running through the Hollerith machines of all cards with respect to attestation papers, having regard particularly to religious affiliations. The hon. member will see how serious this is, and I should like to consult the member in whose name the motion stands to see whether he thinks this time, labour, expense and material should be incurred for the purpose of this particular return. As my hon. friend can see, it means that they have to go over all the cards, mark them, and go through the Hollerith machine, and it does take a great deal of time. Unless it is urgent, I would ask that it stand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has this been done up to a certain point of time?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no objection to the minister's request, but I have an idea that it has been done up to a certain point of time and it only means coming from that time to the present. I had no communication with the hon. member for Broadview about this question.

Motion stands.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. MARSHALL:

For a copy of all recommendations made to the Canadian wheat board or the government by the advisory committee of the wheat board for the year 1941-42 and the year 1942-43.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I should like this matter to stand until I look into it further. It may not be in the public interest to table all the papers that have been requested.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

Mr. HOMUTH: Shall we have a plebiscite on dollar wheat?

WARTIME HOUSING—PREFABRICATED HOUSES

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

For a copy of all correspondence and telegrams exchanged during 1941 between Hon. J. H. MacQuarrie, Attorney General of Nova Scotia and the Hon. Mr. Howe, or the Department of Munitions and Supply, and Hon. Mr. Ilsley or the Department of Finance, and Hon. Mr. Macdonald or the Department of Defence Naval Affairs in connection with the proposed building of prefabricated houses in Pictou county, Nova Scotia, by Wartime Housing Limited.

Also a copy of all correspondence and telegrams exchanged during 1941 between Warden F. H. McNeil, chairman of Victory loan committee for Pictou county and the Hon. Mr. Ilsley or the Department of Finance in connection with the Victory loan and the proposed building of prefabricated houses in Pictou county by Wartime Housing Limited.

INCOME AND CORPORATION TAX—CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams or other documents, exchanged between the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, or any official of the government, and the provincial treasurer or other official of any provincial government, relating to the proposed vacation of the fields of income and corporation tax.

DELEGATION OF MINISTERIAL AUTHORITY

Mr. TUSTIN:

For a copy of all instruments or other documents signed by any minister of the crown purporting to delegate authority vested in such minister or any act of parliament, or otherwise, to a deputy minister or person holding the rank of deputy minister or any other official of the government.

Mr. McLARTY: This motion is an extremely broad one. I am advised that the amount of work entailed will be very large and the delay will be very great. I was going to suggest to the hon. member in whose name the motion stands that perhaps we could limit it. For example, it requires returns from all departments, and a motion could be made which would doubtless give the hon. member the information much more quickly than he would obtain it if this motion were to pass as it stands at present.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot appreciate the minister's statement that it would involve a lot of work. I think every minister could ask his deputy to get this. I happen to know one department where this has been done, much to my astonishment. I think it was without any legal authority or justification. If each minister would ask his own deputy he would soon get the answer. I do not think it is universal in all departments, but I know of one or two where it has been done. Well, I limit it to since 1940.

Mr. McLARTY: I wonder if the hon. leader of the opposition has given consideration to the provisions of the Interpretation Act with regard to the delegation of authority by ministers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a legal question.

Mr. McLARTY: I think a motion could be framed which would elicit the information required without being nearly as broad in its terms, because this as it stands could, I suppose, go back to confederation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motion stand.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—AGREEMENTS WITH GOVERNMENT-OWNED CORPORATIONS

Mr. BENCE:

For a copy of all agreements entered into between his majesty and/or the Minister of Munitions and Supply and any government-owned corporation created pursuant to the Department of Munitions and Supply Act.

KIRKLAND LAKE LABOUR DISPUTE

Mr. MacINNIS:

For a copy of all orders in council relating to the dispute at Kirkland Lake, Ontario, dated from October 14, 1941, to date, as well as a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents in connection with this dispute, during the same period, passing between the Minister of Labour or any officer in the Department of Labour and, (a) any officer of local 240 of the United Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers' Union; (b) any officer of the Canadian Congress of Labour; (c) any one of the owners or management of the mines concerned; (d) any officer or representative of the Mine Owners' Association or Federation.

Also a copy of the minutes of any meeting of the national war labour board at which the question of the said labour board acting as the arbitrator in the said dispute was discussed.

[Mr. McLarty.]

EXPENSES OF UNIVERSITY STUDENTS TRAINING FOR MEDICAL SERVICES IN H. M. FORCES

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, briefs, statements, memoranda and all other papers passing between the medical profession, any medical society or any university medical faculty in Canada, or any officer or officers or members thereof, or of any students of medicine, or any other person, and the government of Canada, or any officer thereof, regarding a loan or grant towards the annual expenses of medical students in university who are also training for medical services later in his majesty's forces.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON SHIPBUILDING—LABOUR DISPUTES

Mr. MacINNIS:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, orders in council and other documents in the possession of the government, relating to the appointment of the Royal Commission on Shipbuilding in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, as well as a copy of any recommendations made by the said royal commission, and any report or reports of boards of conciliation and investigation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act in relation to disputes between any or all of the companies mentioned in order in council P.C. 629, January 26, 1942, and the employees of such companies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) whether facilities will be arranged for the later consideration of notices of motion for the production of papers which it has been asked should stand? Under the order, as I understand it, these might not be reached again without some special facilities being granted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It might be understood that if as the result of conference between the hon. member asking the question and the minister concerned with the order any agreement reached between them might be regarded as equivalent to the order being passed. The papers could be made ready and the order formally passed at another time.

MILITARY SERVICE

PROPOSED PLEBISCITE—PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct some questions to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) with respect to the proposed plebiscite. My questions arise out of a press report which appeared in the Ottawa papers, stating that the machinery for holding the plebiscite is already being set up, presumably in anticipation of legislation which will be introduced to give effect to the government's proposals, if, as and when they are approved by this house. The report divides this into two major portions:

First, that the proposed vote is to be taken on the lists used in the last general election, without any revision. I can scarcely believe this, as these lists are two years old, and many thousands of young men and women must have come of age since the last election. Also many thousands of persons eligible to vote in March, 1940, are now deceased, and in addition, thousands have moved from a constituency in which they voted in 1940 to other constituencies, in many cases too far distant for them to return to vote.

Second, and more startling to me, is the report that the ballots cast from all over Canada are to be brought to Ottawa, dumped into a huge national pool and counted without reference to province or other locality. May I ask the Prime Minister if there is any truth in either of these reports?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If I were to begin to answer questions relating to reports with respect to the plebiscite appearing in the papers, I should have nothing else to do. The house will be informed in due course of the procedure the government intends to adopt. May I say that I think the procedure we shall take will commend itself to hon. members on all sides.

"COMMITTEE FOR TOTAL WAR"

PRESS ADVERTISEMENT—BY-ELECTION IN SOUTH YORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I hold in my hand an advertisement which was widely publicized in the press. It is entitled "Total War".

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, that is old.

An hon. MEMBER: It is old and dead.

Mr. POULIOT: It is signed "Committee for Total War". I would ask the government whether it is possible to ascertain how many of the two hundred "Tailors of Tooley Street" who signed that proclamation are qualified voters in South York.

CANADIAN ARMY

ENLISTMENT IN NAVY OR AIR FORCE OF MEN IN TRAINING UNDER MOBILIZATION ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I am advised that in one of the basic training camps a notice was posted on the bulletin board to the effect that those who were called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act would not be permitted to enlist in the navy or air force. I made some inquiry and I understand that men who have passed the first basic training period, shall I say, of two months, and are in the second basic training period, are now not given the option of applying for enlistment on the completion of their four months' training, or whatever it may be, in the navy or the air force. But has a rule now been promulgated under which young men in the first basic training period no longer have the option of going into the navy or the air force? The bulletin to which attention was directed does not make that clear.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I have no knowledge whatever of any such rule having been promulgated or order made. I do not know whether it is an individual case, concerning some particular basic training centre. But I may tell my hon. friend that there has been some difficulty on one point, a matter between the services. That is to say, I think there was a feeling that officers from the other services come to the basic training centres at inopportune times and perhaps interrupt the training in order to find out whether there are any recruits for them. This has now been cleared up, but I should be very much surprised if any such order as my hon. friend referred to had been issued with regard to the first basic training period. The situation is different with regard to the advanced training centres. The army feels that it has done its share for the other services when it has given the basic training and then allows the men to transfer to the other services. When the men have gone on to advanced training it is felt that they should remain with the army.

"COMMITTEE FOR TOTAL WAR"

PRESS ADVERTISEMENT—BY-ELECTION IN SOUTH YORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Owing to the fact that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) butted in before my revered leader could answer, would the Prime Minister be kind enough now to reply to my question about the two hundred "Tailors of Tooley Street" in Toronto?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If I understood aright the purport of my hon. friend's question it was whether this advertisement, which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of Monday, January 12, 1942, and which has appeared in a number of other newspapers throughout Canada, was not really intended to be part of the literature of the present campaign in connection with the by-election in York South.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And, as such, whether it should not bear on its face something to identify the parties who were responsible for having it issued.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no doubt that is probably correct. However, the Election Act deals with that matter and provides means whereby action may be taken with respect to any violation of its provisions, if that is thought advisable.

HONG KONG

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER WORD CONCERNING CANADIAN CASUALTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Could the Minister of National Defence indicate to the house when the country may expect further word regarding the casualties sustained at Hong Kong?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I am sorry that I cannot.

CHEESE

QUESTION AS TO THE SHORTAGE OF BOXES AND MILK CANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): On January 28 I was asked a question by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), which I agreed to answer at a later time. The question was:

It has been drawn to my attention that there is danger of a serious shortage of cheese boxes, owing to the failure of the controller to release material for manufacture. It has also been drawn to my attention that the same condition exists in regard to milk cans. It is pointed out that there is an insufficient quantity of tin to coat the cans. Have any representations been made to the minister on this subject, and if so, does he intend to take action?

The answer is that there may be a temporary shortage of cheese boxes at some points during the present winter, owing to the heavy increase in the production of cheese as compared with the same period one year ago. The total gradings of cheese last week exceeded those of the same week one year ago by 889 per cent, while the increase in the accumulative gradings since December 1 last is 207 per cent. Many of the cheese box manufacturers had not provided for the manufacture of any quantity of boxes during the winter months, and, owing to the increase in the production of cheese, there is a temporary shortage of properly seasoned material for making boxes in some sections. It can be stated, however, that officials of the timber controller's office, also officials of the dairy products division, have investigated the cheese box situation in Ontario and Quebec with reference to a supply of boxes for the coming season, and it is expected that there will be sufficient boxes available to meet the requirements throughout the year.

With regard to milk cans, the tinned iron used in the manufacture of large thirty-gallon milk cans is imported from England, and it is understood that supplies of such material in Canada are satisfactory. The heavy black iron used for making milk and cream cans of five and eight gallons, also for reinforcing the large milk cans, comes from the United States. The General Steel Wares Limited and the Canadian John Wood Company, Toronto, placed orders in the United States for material some time ago, and while only part of their orders has been filled they expect to get priority rating, which will enable them to secure the balance of their orders. The tin situation in Canada is tight; meetings have been held between the agricultural supply board and the officers of the metal controller's office, and action has been taken in an effort to secure the necessary tin to meet the requirements of the dairy industry.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): If I am not accused of infringing upon the rules of the house, I should like to add for the minister's information that the condition I spoke of in regard to cheese boxes prevails in western Ontario. The condition which prevails in regard to milk cans, particularly the smaller sized cans of five to eight gallons, is due partly to the fact that they are unable to get tin with which to re-tin and recondition these cans. I just draw this information to the minister's attention so that he can deal with it.

WHEAT

PRAIRIE FARM INCOME PAYMENTS—ORDER IN COUNCIL P.C. 8126

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): On January 29 the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked me a question, as follows:

I should like to draw attention to order in council P.C. 8126, dated October 22, 1941, but published only on January 23, 1942, in an extra edition of the Canada Gazette. My first question to the Minister of Agriculture is, why was the publication of this order in council so long delayed? What other steps were taken to bring its provisions to the attention of the interested public?

The answer to that question is that the War Measures Act does not require the publication of orders in council passed under the act. The practice in this department has been to publish such orders in council when it is desired to bring, through the Canada Gazette, the information contained in the order to those to whom it is intended to apply. In the case of this order more direct communication was the means of conveyance. This took the form of press and radio announcements and press advertisements. Following this publicity a number of applications were received for copies of the order and, since it was apparent that a considerable number would likely be required for distribution through this department and the treasury department, it was decided to have the order printed in the Gazette and the necessary copies obtained for distribution.

The next question was:

The order in council provides for the expenditure of $20,000,000 by way of additional payments to increase the income of farmers in the spring wheat area of western Canada. I should like the minister to explain the real purpose of this order in council, and the relationship of the payments to be made under it to the $35,000,000 provided under schedule B of Appropriation Act No. 4 of 1941.

The answer is that the amount of money, $20,000,000, provided in the order in council, was for the purpose of supplying additional income to wheat farmers who had harvested a much lighter crop during the past year than was expected at the time the policy was laid down last spring. There is no direct relationship between the $20,000,000 and the $35,000,000. The $35,000,000 provided under order in council last year was for the purpose of encouraging a reduction in wheat acreage. That reduction was made, and there was also a reduction in the crop because of the unusual weather conditions this summer, which cut down the revenue from wheat sufficiently, as we thought, to warrant the government in voting an additional $20,000,000 for that purpose.

The last question was:

May I also ask him to tell this house why those provisions were made by order in council instead of being brought before parliament at its November sitting in the usual and proper manner.

As is indicated, the order was issued on October 22. The regulations under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act require that all applications for payments be in before December 1; and in order to get information out to the farmers in sufficient time to allow those applications to be in by December 1 it was considered necessary to take this action immediately rather than wait for a sitting of the house.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Pursuant to the reply of the minister to the leader of the opposition with respect to orders in council providing for certain bonuses, I wonder if the minister would indicate to the house what percentages of these bonuses have been paid already? I have had many inquiries as to when the balances of the wheat acreage bonus would be paid and also when the first payment would be made on the $20,000,000 bonus. Would the minister care to indicate where these bonus payments stand now?

Mr. GARDINER: I think it would be better if a question were placed upon the order paper in order to get the exact amounts, rather than my attempting to recite them from memory. I would say that by far the greater part, approximately five-sixths, of the money under the wheat acreage reduction plan has been paid. Probably more than that has been paid; I have not the recent figures. In so far as the prairie farm income payment of $20,000,000 is concerned, a considerable amount of that has been paid out. Only 60 per cent is payable after December 1, and 40 per cent is not payable until after March 1, so that a considerable part of this would not be paid up to the present. As far as prairie farm assistance is concerned, payments have been going out since some time in December. I am not in position to state exactly how much has gone out, but if a question were put upon the order paper I would get the figures up to date.

"FAIRMILE FUDDLE"

REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN THE JANUARY-FEBRUARY ISSUE OF "BOATING MAGAZINE"

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): On Friday the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), as reported in Hansard, page 193, addressed a question to me orally in the following words:

I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services to an editorial appearing on page 4 of Boating Magazine for January-February of this year, under the caption "Fairmile Fuddle." I shall not read the editorial, because I presume the minister has a copy of the journal. I should like to ask these questions: First, where are the five boats which are reported to have left Midland early in November, 1941, and, second, was a qualified officer in charge of those boats?

I stated to my hon. friend when he asked the question that he had not given notice of it. I find now that he had written to me. His letter reached my office about one o'clock on Friday, but at that time I was in attendance at a meeting of the cabinet council and did not return again to my office before coming into the house at three o'clock. So that I did not have my hon. friend's letter when I answered his question. I have it now, and having looked into the matter, I should like to make the following statement.

In late November, arrangements were made for two Fairmile motor launches from Midland and two from Penetanguishene to sail in company to Toronto, a distance of approximately 600 miles. One great lakes pilot was employed for the Midland group and another for the Penetanguishene group. All four motor launches had commanding officers who were lieutenants, Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, who had experience ranging from two years' war service in a Canadian destroyer to one year's service in motor torpedo boats, as well as peace time experience in handling small craft. In addition, a senior officer was appointed in this group of four Fairmiles for the passage. This officer, Lieutenant-Commander McQueen, R.C.N.V.R., has a master's great lakes ticket and was a great lakes pilot for vessels in his own company during peace time. In addition this officer served during the last war as an officer in the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve, originally in submarine chasers and later in the salvage branch of the Admiralty. Therefore, it can be taken that this officer was not merely competent, but was an officer of very great experience.

The two Fairmile motor launches from Midland, Q-058 and Q-051, sailed at eight a.m. on November 24. Q-058 had on board a great lakes pilot and Q-051 was instructed to follow close astern. Unfortunately a very heavy blizzard set in almost immediately. Q-051 lost sight of Q-058, got into shoal water and struck one propeller on a rock. There was no damage to her hull and she eventually proceeded in company with the other three vessels. This Fairmile was eventually hauled up for repairs at Sarnia, which is roughly half way between the point of departure and Toronto, where it was found that a new shaft and propeller would be required. The total cost will not exceed $1,200. The remaining three Fairmiles proceeded to Toronto where they arrived safely on November 30.

On this date the weather conditions in the lower St. Lawrence were so severe that it was considered that no further Fairmile launches could be sailed to Halifax this season owing to the probability of damage from ice. Instructions, therefore, were given for these three to be laid up at Toronto for the winter and the fourth at Sarnia. Slight damage to Q-072, not exceeding $270, occurred while she was being hauled out at Toronto. The total repairs will cost less than $1,500, it is estimated, to ships that are worth $600,000, or a repair cost of about one quarter of one per cent. These repairs are not properly classed as "extensive and costly", the words used in this editorial.

The Fairmile motor launches are of wooden construction and could not be employed where they would encounter ice. All thirty-six Fairmiles will be in commission by early summer. They will be extremely usefully employed in anti-submarine patrols off the coast of Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Labrador, and in the gulf of St. Lawrence. It would not be possible to spare any for use in the Mediterranean.

PRICE CEILING

APPLICATION OF REGULATIONS TO SPECIFIED COMMODITIES—SEASONAL GOODS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence) asked a question on Friday about a report that 100 commodities are not affected by the price ceiling. This report was incorrect. Seasonal goods are definitely under the price ceiling, as the board and its administrators have repeatedly stated, and there is nothing that this board has said or done to warrant any misunderstanding in this connection. The report has no foundation whatever.

Seasonal spring and summer goods, not similar to goods sold during the basic period, September 15 to October 11, 1941, are subject to the general rule that they may not be priced higher than they would have been priced if they had been sold in the basic period. This means that in the spring of 1942 seasonal goods may not be sold at more than the price charged in the spring of 1941, plus an increase equivalent to the increase between the spring of 1941 and the autumn of 1941, in the price of year-round goods of the nearest similar classification and intrinsic value.

For the practical application of this general principle, the board has issued a list of seasonal goods, has advised manufacturers that their 1942 prices must be approved by the administrator of their industry in consultation with the administrator of retail trade, and has advised wholesalers and retailers that they may buy at approved manufacturers' prices and add the same mark-up as they did during the corresponding season in 1941.

DAYLIGHT SAVING

APPLICATION OF ORDER TO EASTERN SECTION OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): On Thursday last the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked what effect the order in council advancing time one hour would have upon the Atlantic standard time zone. He pointed out that in that portion of Canada within the Atlantic standard time zone already the mean or sun time was in advance of the actual time and suggested that a great portion of the people of Nova Scotia and all the people of New Brunswick would be ninety-six minutes ahead of true sun time.

Generally speaking, the width of a time zone is 675 miles. The farther westward a point is within this zone the greater the amount by which the mean time varies over the actual time. To illustrate this: Halifax, for example, is 14 minutes ahead of mean time; Moncton, 19 minutes; Saint John, 24 minutes; Fredericton, 27 minutes, and Woodstock, 30 minutes.

This situation, of course, applies not only in the case of Atlantic time but throughout the various time zones in Canada. For example, Ottawa is 3 minutes ahead of sun time; Toronto, 18 minutes; Windsor, 32 minutes, while Fort William is 58 minutes ahead of sun time. Such a situation exists in every time zone, and to attempt to reconcile mean and actual time would, of course, obviously create an impossible situation.

In his question the leader of the opposition correctly stated that other factors, such as transportation, might affect the position. I communicated with the Railway Association of Canada as to the transportation problem which would be involved if any changes were made in the order. On Friday afternoon I received the following reply:

> Your message yesterday re adoption daylight saving time in maritimes. Deflection from true sun time at points in maritimes would not be any more excessive than deflection at many other points throughout Canada. Transportation difficulties resulting from adoption new time in maritimes are not any greater than in any other time zone. Would point out that in 1941 Halifax, Saint John, and Moncton voluntarily adopted daylight saving time from May 4 to September 27. In circumstances we urge that there should be no modification of order in council 547 exempting the maritimes as such modification would result in voiding all public time-table and working time-table arrangements already completed on basis of order in council. Also modification would result in disruption of through and local train connections and railway arrangements cannot now be altered.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY

POLICY RESPECTING PUBLICATION OF LISTS OF CONTRACTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. K. HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. A Canadian Press dispatch which appears in one of the morning newspapers states that the Department of Munitions and Supply announced on Saturday that it has decided to discontinue the practice of issuing individual lists of contracts awarded by the department, either as press releases or in printed form. I presume that statement is correct, and my question is (1) will the Prime Minister or the Minister of Munitions and Supply tell us why it has been decided to change this practice, and (2) what means the public and members of parliament will have of knowing what contracts have been let and how and where the country's money is being spent for munitions and supplies?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The new policy adopted in relation to the publication of lists of contractors is as stated by my hon. friend. The change of policy was made in Canada as a result of representations made in a letter by the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Canada. At the same time the policy of the United States was changed, also I believe on representations from Great Britain. It has not been the policy in the United Kingdom to publish lists of contractors for war munitions, and Great Britain herself has objected to either Canada or the United States doing so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the second question?

SUGAR

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TAKEN TO INCREASE BEET SUGAR CAPACITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, on January 28, in answering a question which I had asked with respect to beet sugar, the Minister of Finance indicated that he was taking steps to cause an increase in beet sugar production during 1942. Would he tell the house (1) how many acres of beets have already been promised to him in Canada in excess of last year's sugar beet acreage; (2) how many new sugar factories have already been planned with his consent to be opened in 1942, and (3) how many new factories are already planned to be opened in 1943?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that questions of this kind be put on the order paper. We are taking a large part of every afternoon in answering questions which under the rules should not be asked in this way. Before the hon. gentleman puts his question on the order paper I would suggest that he read again what I said on January 28, because I certainly did not give any basis such as he indicated for the questions he has just now asked.

Mr. BLACKMORE: After the long list of questions that have been asked this afternoon, I think Mr. Speaker, that my question ought to be answered. Why should my question be picked out and I be told to put it on the order paper?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was the first question of the kind asked me.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is a question which the country wants to have asked and answered right now.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ADDRESS IN REPLY—NECESSARY OCCASIONAL ABSENCE OF PRIME MINISTER FROM CHAMBER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that my hon. friend the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) is to be the first speaker in this debate this afternoon. He is, as I think hon. members are well aware, a close personal friend of my own and I had hoped to be in the house while he was speaking, but I may say to him that I have not yet had an opportunity to-day of so much as looking at the mail that has come in over the week-end. The morning has been taken up with other matters, among them the representations of important delegations which occupied my time exclusively from 10.30 this morning until after two o'clock this afternoon. I have been in the house from three until now twenty past four. I am trying to give all the time I possibly can to the very important matters immediately connected with the war effort of the country. That involves of necessity my absence from the house a good part of the time during the course of the debate. I know my hon. friend will excuse me if I am not present when he is speaking. I raise the matter because I noticed that by some of the press attention had been drawn to the fact that one day of last week when the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) was speaking I found it necessary because of an engagement at the time, made before I knew at all that the hon. member was to speak, to leave the house and keep that engagement along with others which I had for the afternoon. I hope the house will realize that I am anxious to be as courteous as I can be to every hon. member, but it will be recognized that in addition to all the matters in connection with the war effort to which the government is obliged to give attention there is a good deal in the way of political controversy both in and out of parliament. I hope it will not be thought that any actions of mine are intended to be a reflection in any way upon those who may be taking part in political discussions.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I very briefly make a somewhat similar statement. The members of the wheat committee of the cabinet have an appointment at four o'clock this afternoon to meet the Saskatchewan wheat delegation, which will necessitate our absence from the house.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, January 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I must first thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for his very kind reference to myself and assure him that I know he has a tremendous load to carry and cannot be in the house at all times. I must also thank the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) for his kindly remarks.

There has been enough said during this debate to convince me that many of the members of this house and many outside this house apparently are not yet seized of the stern and grim realities of this war and of the fact that this empire of which Canada, in my opinion and that of many others, is an indissoluble part, irrespective of the statute of Westminster and any other statute, is engaged in a life and death struggle which can have only one ending, either victory, freedom and life, or defeat, bondage and death.

We are receiving from all across this empire reports from the generals commanding our armies on the far-flung battle-line that more fighting battalions and more munitions are required if the empire is to be saved. I have heard here, from men in high places, that fighting battalions are not now and have not been the matter of major importance. I will ask each hon. member to cast his thoughts across the seas. Last year our armies retired from Libya. Now they have again retreated. Why? Our armies evacuated Greece and Crete. Why? Our men were captured at Kowloon and Hong Kong. Why? Our troops have now retired from Malaya. Why? To me the answer is very clear: our armies have not had, and have not now, sufficient fighting troops and munitions.

The speech from the throne, as I read it and understand what is behind it, lays bare the stern fact that more fighting battalions and munitions are required. But it does not say that these battalions and munitions will be rapidly provided. It proposes that there shall be a delay, at least as regards the provision of the battalions, until a plebiscite is taken—a matter of perhaps three months—a plebiscite which will be both costly to the country and heart-rending to the people.

My honoured leader in a brilliant speech pointed a way to relieve the situation I have mentioned, which, at least to me, is clearly indicated in the speech from the throne. He advocated an amendment to the speech from the throne in which he called for a prompt mobilization of all our material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation. I am not in favour of a plebiscite but am in favour of the amendment. According to the press—which may not have the facts—a plebiscite will cost this country anything between $800,000 and $3,000,000, altogether too large a sum to spend when the government itself is asking the people of this country to economize in every way they can, and has even ordered the cutting down of sugar rations; when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is going out for one of the largest loans in the history of this country—a loan which must be subscribed; nothing should interfere with that—and when nearly everybody in this country will shortly have to pay the most staggering income tax which they have ever had to meet, and that a month earlier than on any previous occasion. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, this is not a time to spend up to $3,000,000 in taking a plebiscite.

When I was home a few days ago I was greatly alarmed as to what might be the effect of the decision to take a plebiscite on the minister obtaining, from several sources, contributions to the war loan. A number of parents told me that their children, school children, had said that if the government is going to squander $3,000,000 or so in taking a plebiscite, they will refuse to buy any more war savings stamps. I hope it does not have that effect on the school children of Canada, because one of the things on which I can congratulate the government is their having persuaded children to buy war savings stamps. It has three good effects. It teaches school children thrift at an impressionable age; it inculcates patriotism, which they learn in contributing their pennies for stamps; and it turns a lot of money into the treasury of this country. Returns from the Toronto public and secondary schools show that subscriptions by children between September, 1940, and December, 1941, both inclusive, amounted to $434,641.08. That is in addition to contributions by them of almost $50,000 to some thirty-eight other war service organizations, of which amount $16,929.25 was given to the Toronto Telegram war victims fund, and $13,271.43 to the Red Cross fund. I hope the controversy caused by the taking of a plebiscite will not affect children's donations, because, if it does, I would fear it would affect the purchases of war savings certificates by their parents—purchases which have had a good effect on the average humble parent, teaching him to save his money against the rainy day which may come. I hope that the government will not proceed with the taking of a plebiscite, but will find some other way to accomplish what is required to be done.

We are told that the government will have to break a promise. Well, a bad promise is always better broken than kept; and it was, in my humble opinion, a bad promise. It is bad because it was made, years ago, to retain political strength in this country; it is bad because it should not have been made, particularly in war time, for none can tell how war will go. Generals who expect to win for their side endeavour to place the most men and the most machinery at the point of fighting, first; but we are now undertaking to enrol an army for the purpose of taking a plebiscite across the country, while we should be enrolling men and providing fighting battalions, to be sent wherever the fight is taking place.

A bad promise, as I have said, is much better broken than kept. It is humiliating for a government that has the great following behind it that this government has, the largest in the history of the country, to be placed in the position, through a political promise made in war time, of being compelled for a time to cease its work in the raising of battalions and the making of munitions in order to take a plebiscite. It makes me think of the giant of antiquity, made of metal but with feet of clay. Here we have a government, the strongest government the country ever had, throttled by a promise. Its feet are so tangled up by its promise not to enrol men for overseas, either on a selective or on a compulsory basis, that it can do nothing in that regard.

Let me discuss for a few minutes something else in connection with the government's prosecution of the war. I refer to the high cost of recruiting under the present system, which would all be saved under a system such as that in force in the United States. I was in western Ontario recently and spent a couple of days in a small village. There I saw on the lawn of the town hall a tent and a couple of recruiting officers—there may have been more. There were two during the day, but whether that was the total number I do not know. I engaged them in conversation. I asked them how many recruits were coming forward, and they told me that they had been there ten days and had obtained two recruits. What a big price to pay to obtain two recruits! They told me that in a town ten miles west of that point there was also a tent on the lawn of the town hall with two officers in charge of recruiting, and that in the space of two weeks they had obtained only one recruit.

I have seen a similar situation in many towns across Canada, and I have no doubt it is true of the country as a whole. We are paying a staggering price to obtain small results. I saw a long cavalcade of trucks—I do not remember exactly how many—going up Yonge street, Toronto, on one occasion, and I inquired where they were going. I was informed that they were on their way to northern Ontario to carry on a recruiting campaign. Well, that was a large number of men and trucks to send to northern Ontario for that purpose. It would be rather expensive, for there were billboards here and there as well as advertisements, and there would be the cost of the trucks, the gasoline and so forth.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend think it would be justified, however, in connection with the victory loan campaign for the purpose of getting money? Does he think a long cavalcade of transport on the road would be justified for that purpose?

Mr. MacNICOL: I am talking about the conduct of the war by the department.

Mr. RALSTON: I am talking about this war too.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was informed afterwards, when I made inquiries as to what results had been obtained from that costly northern Ontario expedition, that the number of recruits obtained was not very large. I stood one day in front of a large plant in the town of Mount Dennis, adjacent to Toronto, and there I saw two recruiting officers cajoling young men in front of the plant when they were out having their lunch at noon and resting. These young fellows kidded the officers, and more than one observed "When you make it universal, we will all join." They are not slackers. Many of them sincerely resent the present system of enrolment.

I have in mind a widow with four sons. Scottish blood runs strong in their veins—the martial blood of old Scotland. Every one of these four sons enlisted. This lady's husband was a veteran of the great war and he has passed on. Not far away there is another family with four sons and none of the four has enlisted. But they are not slackers; I spoke to all of them. They all said to me, "Mr. MacNicol, we are not going to leave our jobs for Tom, Dick and Harry to take them over, and this and that, but we will go when the government calls us all to go." There is something there. You cannot call a young fellow a slacker under those circumstances.

A young man came to see me the last day I was at home. He was an expert toolmaker—and I know something about toolmaking because I have made tools myself. He was a very valuable man. He told me that he had enlisted in the artillery. "What," I said, "you a toolmaker enlisting? I know the government wants expert toolmakers." "Well," he said, "I may be conscripted if I don't enlist now, and I will enlist now."

I am sure that a selective system of enrolment would not have taken all the four sons of that widow because they had martial blood in their veins, nor would it have taken that young toolmaker from his toolmaking machines.

I do not want to say anything unkind. I know what a load the government is carrying, and there are many things upon which I could compliment them. While I am criticizing at the moment, I am not doing so for the purpose of passing censure. I want to try to improve rather than to obstruct. I know the government are doing a good deal, but I am convinced from what I have seen that the present system of recruiting is all wrong, and it is extremely expensive. If I had not been convinced of that before the minister made his statement on Hong Kong, I would have been convinced then.

What did the revelations with regard to Hong Kong show? They showed that on September 19 the British government asked for only one or two battalions. That is a very small number of men to ask for, but they did not get word for ten days thereafter—on September 29—that we could send them two battalions. If the British government had asked for ten battalions, to be sent immediately, that would not have been anything out of the way, after two and a half years of war, when we are told that we have enlisted for overseas—some here and some overseas—240,000 men, of which number over 100,000, between three and four divisions of fighting men, are in the old land. Why did they take ten days to scurry around, in that hectic time, trying to find two battalions? Worse than that, I know some of the boys who were among the 138 men—about seven per cent of the less than two thousand—who were trained for less than from three to four months. I saw some of the names in the newspapers, and I went to see their fathers to console them. I went to see six families altogether, and from five I learned that their sons had not been in the army for more than three to four months. Yet they were sent to one of the most vital bastions of this empire, which, before it was captured, I and every other hon. member felt was perfectly safe. I do not know that the fact that seven per cent of our men were largely untrained had anything at all to do with its loss, but perhaps if we could have sent these battalions immediately, it might have helped in prolonging the fight there, and every day counted. Frankly I was surprised. The minister has great ability, and I could not help believing, when I looked at him and heard him talk, that if only he could have had his way, with the experience and knowledge he has behind him, he could have done a great deal better job than he was able to do under the circumstances. Others have the same opinion.

Hon. members cannot discount the statement of the premier of Manitoba when he comes all-out against taking the plebiscite, for various reasons. Nor can they discount the importance of the legislature of Manitoba which has come out for an immediate all-out war effort. Nor can they discount as much as some perhaps would like to, the fact that the premier of the greatest province in Canada, the richest and most populous in any event, Ontario, denounced the plebiscite and comes out for an immediate all-out war effort. I cannot predict what the Ontario legislature will do, but I shall be much surprised if it does not come out one hundred per cent behind the stand of the legislature of Manitoba.

On Saturday last I read a report that the premier of Alberta and his party were altogether opposed to the taking of the plebiscite. The opinions of all these men, great men, and these three legislatures, are certainly worthy of some consideration, and I do not feel that I am in very bad company when I say that I, too, am opposed to the waste of time and money for taking this plebiscite.

Then two statements were made in this house to which I wish to refer briefly. I shall not say much, because I like both of the men concerned very much. The first was made by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray). All I can say about him is that it took courage to do what he did. I commend him, whatever that is worth, for what he did when he came out definitely in this house for an immediate all-out war effort, and opposed the plebiscite. I am very sorry that I cannot also commend the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald). I was greatly surprised at his attitude because, just a few days before he spoke here, he had made a ringing address in the town of Waterloo—it will soon be a city, judging from the way it is growing—to the board of trade there. He came out very strongly there for compulsory selective enlistment, but in this house he hedged to the extent of delaying it for the period of three months—

Mr. HOMUTH: He swallowed himself completely.

Mr. MacNICOL: —which will be required to take the plebiscite. A few days ago I saw in the Toronto Globe and Mail a picture of the Ridley family in the city of Brantford—one of our best industrial cities. This picture showed two sons and two daughters, all four of whom have enlisted and one of whom is in the army in Great Britain. I was surprised that the hon. member for Brantford City, having seen what he saw in Great Britain, could come back and take the stand he did, not to send without a plebiscite immediate help to Lieutenant Kenneth Ridley, his townsman, whom he perhaps saw or who, in any event, is in England. I was surprised and sorry, because I have a very warm feeling for the hon. member for Brantford City.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) recently made a statement that I endorse. I cannot say very much about the Minister of Agriculture at any time, because I know little about agriculture. I am not like some hon. members who know a great deal about agriculture and at the same time know all about what it took me thirty years to learn, the manufacture of iron and steel.

An hon. MEMBER: You are not a lawyer.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was not referring to lawyers; I was referring mostly to certain hon. gentlemen to my left.

The Minister of Agriculture, in a speech delivered, I believe, on January 10, stated that this government would not fail to send strong support—let me quote his words:

> We are also going to take our part in manning the bastions of empire in any part of the world.

I was pleased to read that, and I hope the minister will speed up the sending of support to these bastions of empire, not delay it as in the sending of it to the great bastion of Hong Kong.

Last summer I was in Saskatchewan, and on the day I was in Regina, September 11, I was affected by reading a page in the Regina Leader-Post giving the pictures and names of heroes of that province, of whom twelve were killed in the navy, sixteen in the army and forty-nine in the air force. We have always thrilled with pride at what our army has done, and I have on more than one occasion read of some famous fighter from Saskatchewan, whose name has slipped my mind for a moment, but across the skies over France and Germany these Saskatchewan fighters have blazed a bright trail of glory that will never fade. I could say the same about my own province and every province, but as I come from Ontario perhaps it is not out of place for me to say a word about my own province, because we hear so many unkind things said about it in this house—it rolls off my back like water from a duck's back; the most sticks are always under the best apple tree, and I take it in that way. My own city of Toronto with its suburbs has sent more men to the army in this war, as it did in the last war, than any other equal community in this country. My own riding sent more men overseas in the last war than any other riding bar none, and to-day the sons of the heroes of 1914-1918 of Davenport riding have enlisted in their thousands to fight anywhere in the world. Most of their parents, I might say, are old country stock.

Something has been said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and I was sorry he said what he did, because I have a very warm feeling for him, for reasons about which I do not care to speak. But the other day he said something about the so-called committee of Two Hundred. And they have been spoken of contemptuously by an hon. gentleman on my right who did not know anything whatever about them, and by an hon. gentleman to your right, Mr. Speaker, who perhaps knew less. That committee consists of two hundred or more outstanding men and women. They come, not from Toronto alone but from most of the towns and cities of Ontario and perhaps every county of lower Ontario at least, if not every county in Ontario. They did not sign as Conservatives or Liberals. I have not looked to see what they are politically; many of them I know, and I give them credit for being sincere. We are all entitled to be regarded as sincere. Many of them have sons overseas. I do not blame them a bit for doing what they can to shake the government out of its complacency; someone has to do it, and I am sure that if the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) could only have his fling, he could do a much bigger job than he is doing to-day. It is no fault of his; I will add that.

I see my time is going. I should like to talk a little now about munitions, because iron and steel have been woven into my very fabric from boyhood. A couple of years ago I offered in this house the suggestion that this government at once initiate measures to increase the production of iron in this country. At that time I said the day would come when Canada might not have the iron it needed to make munitions. I hope that time is not approaching, but the situation looks very serious. For some time we have had a delegation at Washington coaxing the steel controller there to permit us to get some iron and steel, and at last he has consented to give us two million tons of iron and steel. That is not very much for the programme outlined by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe); but what about next year?

I beg this government to delay no longer but immediately to promote the production of pig-iron. My suggestion two years ago was that this government grant a bonus to encourage that production, but I was turned down; my words fell on deaf ears. But thanks to Premier Hepburn, who has been denounced here so frequently, some action was taken. He carried out the programme first initiated by the Ferguson government, and granted a bonus of $2 a ton on the production of pig-iron. I am happy to say that in the county in which I lived when I was a young man, the county of Algoma—it was the district of Algoma then—the Algoma steel company at Sault Ste Marie is now producing considerable quantities of pig-iron from a low grade ore possessing, I believe, less than fifty per cent iron content, and requiring to be beneficiated. I have not been able to obtain the latest figures, but I believe the annual production is something like four or five hundred thousand tons. That is a substantial production. I ask the government now to do what it can, by means of a bonus to the Algoma steel company or any other company, to double the production of pig-iron, because next year we may not be able to obtain any from the United States, whose reserves are being rapidly depleted. I made a careful study of this matter some years ago, and according to the best figures the reserves in sight in the United States amount to about five billion tons. This year they are producing some eighty-five million tons, while the production next year probably will be double that if they carry out their vast programme. We may not be able to get any iron from the United States if this war continues and they go at it as they are planning to do.

We have plenty of iron ore in Canada. We have a high grade of hematite at Steep Rock. I do not know what is being done about that, or how soon we may take advantage of it; but the government should see to it that Steep Rock comes into operation just as soon as possible, because that is a really high grade ore. Then we have billions of tons of low grade ore as well. In the United States they are now looking for low grade iron ore, because the Ford company has developed an electrolytic process by means of which iron can be economically produced from ore with a content of from twenty to thirty per cent, which heretofore has been considered of no account. In the Hudson bay basin we have billions of tons of low grade ore; and if they can use it in the United States, we can use it here. So I urge the government to take steps to bring about a much greater production of iron in this country.

There is one other item about which I should like to say a word, namely, magnesium metal. I raised that question on June 14 last. At that time the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) did not seem to know much about it; he said some company was going to build a plant on the Gatineau river, but that plant was for making magnesium oxide, not for magnesium metal. The United States is going into this in a big way, and Germany has been producing large quantities of this metal. It may be that their planes have been able to do the things they have because they have so much magnesium metal in their construction. It weighs one-third less than aluminum and has approximately the same tensile strength. A plane made of magnesium metal will go faster and carry a larger load of bombs further. I urge this government to get into the business. We have one of the greatest deposits in the world of dolomite limestone, from which magnesium metal is made, together with any amount of electrical horse-power, which is essential in the manufacturing process.

I want now to say a word about Canadian manufacturers, because they deserve the unstinted praise of this house and this country for what they have done, commencing even before the war. At their annual spring meeting in 1939, before war broke out, the Canadian Manufacturers association decided to send a committee overseas to consult with the British government and British manufacturers in order to demonstrate what Canadian plants, Canadian workmen, Canadian technicians and engineers could do. And they did go overseas, at their own expense, and, I am glad to say, with the blessing of the government. When they came back, the Prime Minister was very kind; he spoke very nicely of their efforts and gave them due credit. On September 8, in a press release, the Prime Minister said:

> With the concurrence of the governments of Canada and the United Kingdom, a delegation organized by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and widely representative of Canadian industry recently visited the United Kingdom to study on the spot all forms of armament and munitions production with a view to the expeditious adaptation of Canadian industry to these forms of production.

They came home and went to work, and they played a major part in organizing this country for the production of munitions. As the Minister of Munitions and Supply has said, Canadian industry did a wonderful job with his help in providing orders, I am happy to say. I have not time to mention the names of all these outstanding men, but I think some of them should appear on our records; I believe they deserve that recognition. Among these business men were: E. Holt Gurney, Toronto; H. G. Bertram, Dundas; E. Winslow-Spragge, Montreal; John E. Goodison, Sarnia; A. R. Goldie, Galt; Victor Drury, Montreal; and Chester Hamilton, Toronto, and John T. Hepburn, Toronto, who were over in Britain, and many others.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I believe every man or woman in this house is ready to do what he or she can to support the government and the country in order to win this war. It is imperative that we do this. As far as I am concerned, I will go anywhere and do anything the government feel my long experience in industry and manufacturing qualifies me to do in order to assist our war effort. I do not suppose I could go to fight, though if I were placed in a fort, behind a parapet, I might be able to shoot as straight as most people, because in my day I could shoot pretty straight. We have wonderful examples to inspire us. On Sunday, January 25, I went to Grove preparatory school at Lakefield, where a window was unveiled in memory of Sergeant Stuart Dunn, W.A.G., R.C.A.F., a young hero from Quebec city who served over Germany and France for months but who lost his life on a return trip. I liked the spirit of the ceremony. This boy's father, Major C. G. Dunn who had gone to this school also as a lad, and a large number of boys attended the service. Those young men sang most earnestly the following words, with which I shall conclude:

I vow to thee, my country—all earthly things above—
Entire and whole and perfect, the service of my love.
The love that asks no questions; the love that stands the test,
That lays upon the altar the dearest and the best;
The love that never falters, the love that pays the price,
The love that makes undaunted the final sacrifice.

In memory of what the glorious young heroes from every province of this country have done, it is our duty to send fighting battalions and munitions as speedily as possible to the armies of the empire, no matter where they are.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I must first of all commend the government for the announcement in the speech from the throne regarding the contribution to Great Britain of vast quantities of munitions, foodstuffs and supplies, estimated to be worth at least one billion dollars. May I at the same time commend my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and his advisers for making the financial arrangements necessary for this transaction. I should like to point out to him and to them that I am pleased to see that they are at least moving forward and to the left. I trust they are beginning at last to realize how restricted and narrow so-called orthodox finance has been in the past. I would remind them also of an age-old truth, that so long as the sun shines and the rain falls, so long as we have labour, land and materials in abundance, many things which were deemed impossible a short time ago are now possible. I trust that after this war these will include social justice and social security for all our citizens.

I have listened with a great deal of interest and care to the speeches which have been made so far in this debate, and I have wondered why, in speeches made by the opposition, so little has been said about the great contribution which Canada has made in this war of men, munitions, food, ships and money, as well as other war materials. In the eyes of impartial competent observers, such as the New York Times, this is considered as one of the most astounding accomplishments arising out of this war. This is the way in which they refer to Canada's great contribution of munitions, supplies and other materials.

Prior to coming east for the session, I visited Seattle in connection with a meeting of the international Pacific salmon fisheries commission of which I am chairman. I found many of the people in the state of Washington to be loud in their praises of what Canada has done and is doing, but they were extremely critical about their own President Roosevelt. Coming back to Canada, I found numbers of our own people enthusiastic about President Roosevelt, but critical of our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and of Canada's war effort. I am coming to the conclusion that many persons in Great Britain, the United States and Canada are to-day suffering from an affliction which for lack of a better name might be called "far-off pastures look greener affliction," and which, to quite an extent, is affecting their vision of the actual accomplishments of their own country. I suppose others would diagnose this condition as war nerves.

Speaking about leaders, I am not altogether surprised at the attitude of the Conservative party toward the Prime Minister, the leader of this government, especially when I consider the number of leaders the Conservative party has had during the past number of years and how harshly some of them were treated. Let me take one example only. The best and most capable leader they had in late years, one for whom I have still some admiration, the Right Hon. Viscount Bennett, they forced to leave Canada. No one will deny that the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett was and still is a great Canadian. The hearts of that party, however, now incline toward Meighen, but in my estimation Meighen cannot equal Bennett in ability. In passing, may I compliment the present house leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Hanson). Personally I think he has done well as leader. He has certainly worked hard and ably since assuming the responsibility of leader of the opposition; his speech last week was a splendid one, and I wish to compliment him upon it.

In paragraph (c) of his amendment the leader of the opposition regrets that additional measures for the post-war period were not recommended in the speech from the throne, and before dealing with the question of the plebiscite I should like to remind him that Canada has given more thought and extensive study to post-war conditions and is now further ahead on plans for the post-war period than Great Britain, the United States, or any of the other dominions.

Regarding the matter of holding a plebiscite, may I say at once that I do not like it. When, however, one looks at this matter from a national viewpoint instead of merely a provincial or sectional one, when one faces all the facts he must be convinced that the action proposed by the government, with all the circumstances and facts before them, is the logical one to take. Whether or not we like the plebiscite, its taking has been definitely decided upon by the government, and so the matter should be expedited as speedily as possible. It is unfortunate that at this particular time so much feeling should be aroused or stirred up throughout Canada over the taking of this plebiscite. I do not agree with those who say that the taking of the plebiscite is retarding our war effort.

My personal view on this matter is that there should be complete mobilization of every resource we have in Canada, including finance, natural resources and man-power for service anywhere when considered necessary. So far, the only real sacrifices which have been made by any of our people in this war have been made by those who have given of their lives, who have offered their services to the army, navy or air force, or who are the wives or parents of these boys. Equality of sacrifice is to-day spoken of freely, but we have much further to go in this direction before it becomes an actual reality in Canada. The government have to-day, under the National Resources Mobilization Act, all the powers they require to mobilize finance and industry as well as man-power. I am pleased that the government have intimated to parliament that they are going to do more under these powers than what has been done, splendid as that has been. In my opinion it will require a total all-out war effort to bring victory.

Whilst we are turning out munitions and supplies of all and every kind in commendable quantities and of splendid workmanship, in my opinion we have not yet reached our maximum effort. In certain ways we could do much more than we are doing, and this is especially the situation in British Columbia. In saying this, I have particularly in mind our shipbuilding programme. It is true that we have a programme providing for about $500,000,000 of steel merchant ships, corvettes, destroyers and other miscellaneous boats, but this is not nearly the total Canadian capacity for producing new ships provided the government, and particularly the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), would only consent to the building of wooden vessels. Will anyone deny that the allies are in need of ships?

It may well be said that the losses at sea so far in this war have not been as heavy as they were during 1914-18, but we should not forget that our ship tonnage is less to-day than it was during the last war, and we have the further disadvantage of a war in the far east with Japan against us. It is well known that lack of shipping has considerably handicapped Britain's war effort. More and more ships are required to carry vital military supplies and food, not only to Great Britain, Egypt and the near east, but now also to the far east. It is my opinion that Canada's present programme of steel ships cannot now be much further expanded, if at all, owing to the United States war expansion programme recently outlined by President Roosevelt for 1942 and 1943, which programme will require many more million tons of steel than the United States herself required in 1941. Great Britain is crying out for more ships. Great Britain is at the moment short of lumber, to mention but one of her many requirements. Great Britain is at the present time getting lumber from Russia by way of Archangel because she cannot procure all the Canadian lumber on account of lack of ships. Let me read a recent article in the Commercial Intelligence Journal of the Department of Trade and Commerce, of January 17, of this year. The article is headed "Canadian Timber Favoured" and reads:

> Examples of the dislike of timber men in Britain to change when once they have become accustomed to certain materials or certain methods of trading are always occurring. When this country began to change from the almost exclusive use of European softwood to the importation of British Columbia pine and hemlock, criticisms about the qualities of this Canadian wood were almost abusive. Many importers stated that they would not have it in their yards; that it was not suitable in building, that it split when nailed, was liable to rot, et cetera. Further, that their workmen disliked it. However, prejudice was gradually overcome, the import grew by leaps and bounds, and owing to circumstances over which the trade has now no control Canadian wood has since the war constituted our main source of supply. The trade has, in fact, become well accustomed to the wood. Now after a long interval Russian wood is beginning to arrive, but so used to British Columbia pine and hemlock have importers and merchants become that there seems to be no urgent wish to change again. The Russian wood is dearer and this may, of course, have something to do with the disinclination to purchase when British Columbia pine or hemlock are available. When joinery quality is required, No. 2 common and better British Columbia pine seem to answer all necessary purposes.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that after getting the British people used to our Canadian lumber and after building up our lumber trade with them, we are at the present time faced with the loss of this trade as a result of the lack of boats. Allow me, sir, to inform the house what we did with regard to ships and wooden shipbuilding during the last war. During those years a total of sixty-nine wooden steamers were built in Canada, twenty-seven of which were built in British Columbia. Every one of these ships carried lumber to Great Britain, taking one and a half million board feet of lumber on each voyage. They were built at a cost of $150,000, compared with five or six hundred thousand dollars, which is the cost of the steel merchant ships being built in Canada at the present time.

When the hon. Minister of Munitions and Supply tells us that wooden ships are too slow, I wonder whether he is overlooking the fact that the wooden ships built for service during the last war, and which we could build now, made an average speed of 10 or 10½ knots an hour. When one considers the average speed of convoys, and the time we had to wait before a ship was available to take military equipment necessary for the Canadian troops for the defence of Hong Kong, and that when that ship was procured her average speed was only 8½ knots an hour, one wonders what really is the chief reason for the opposition to the building of wooden ships. The story of Hong Kong might well have been a different one had we, prior to the fall of Hong Kong had Canadian ships available.

Another instance of where Canada is losing out for lack of ships is in connection with available trade between Canada and South American countries. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) paid a visit to south America last year with a view to bringing about better trade relations and better relations generally between the peoples of south American countries and Canada, and his mission was, I believe, an unqualified success. He did a great work for Canada on that occasion. However, like many other things we do, we sometimes fail to follow the matter up, and we made a mistake, I believe, in not sending one of our highest officials to represent Canada at the Pan-American conference held a short time ago instead of sending or designating someone to sit in at that conference with what is known to the lawyers as "a watching brief" only. What I want to mention particularly, however, is the fact that although good trade results were obtained through the visit of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, manufacturers and others in British Columbia cannot carry out the orders which are on their books from south American countries because there are no ships available to transport the goods and articles ordered. In the light of all these facts, I plead with the government, and particularly with the Minister of Munitions and Supply, as earnestly and sincerely as I can to proceed with the building of wooden ships to augment the programme of steel ships now being built. In British Columbia there are hundreds of idle men ready and competent to work on these ships, both carpenters and caulkers, the two chief types of artisans used, and we have likewise the lumber and other materials in abundance in my province for this class of ship, which is something that cannot truthfully be said with regard to steel.

Since we last met, Canada has declared war on Japan, which now brings the war to Canada's Pacific shore as well as the Atlantic. We in British Columbia are perhaps more directly faced with this menacing situation than are those in the central provinces of Canada, and so, Mr. Speaker, I would like at this time to devote a few moments to dealing with some of the problems confronting Canada generally but affecting particularly the people of British Columbia, who to-day are faced not only with the possibility of attack but also with the problem of a resident Japanese population totalling, according to the recent registration, 23,461. First of all, I want to assure the house of my desire to be fair and tolerant in all I have to say in connection with the Japanese dwelling within our country, and I should like to point out that so far I have endeavoured to refrain from making any public statements which might in any way incite racial feelings amongst our own people, realizing, apart entirely from a sense of common justice to the Japanese, how dangerous such feelings might become, realizing also that one had to remember that many Canadian citizens were still living in Japan, likewise the fact that numbers of Canadian soldiers were prisoners of war at the hands of the Japanese in Hong Kong.

First of all, let me commend the government for the speedy action it took, following the declaration of war with Japan, of ordering every Japanese fishing boat to be taken into custody. Over, 1,100 boats have been collected by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the naval authorities, close to 900 of these boats being moored in the Fraser river at New Westminster.

While it would only be fair to say that the standing committee appointed by the government did some good work, in conjunction with officials of the external affairs department and others, under the chairmanship of the hon. Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), it was unfortunate, I believe, that members of parliament from British Columbia, particularly members from the coast districts, had not been consulted in the matter. It was certainly strange that their advice was not sought on such an important matter.

The government is perhaps not so much to blame as are some of the Ottawa officials in the government service who, it would appear, were determined to ignore any advice or help from the people's elected representatives, who are more aware of the facts of the situation than were most, if not all, of these officials.

May I say to the government that the decision not to issue any fishing licences to the Japanese was well received by the people of British Columbia; but no sooner had it become known that the Japanese fishing fleet was being taken into custody and that no fishing licences would be issued to Japanese for the duration of the war, than representations were made by certain interested parties asking for the release of the boats to the Japanese again.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who were those interested parties?

Mr. REID: Well, I can name one. My information is that the head of British Columbia Packers, Limited, who is also chairman of the wartime merchant shipping board, was one who was very active.

I want to warn the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) against what I believe might happen under the present policy whereby all Japanese are being allowed to sell their individual boats. These boats are worth from eight hundred to five or six thousand dollars, according to the size and class of boat; and any sales made, so we understand, must be on a strictly cash basis. The fleet consists of about eleven hundred vessels, and worth, in the aggregate, between two and three million dollars. It is hardly likely that all of these boats will be sold, especially when actual cash for them has to be found, and so we might again witness some of the fish packing companies acquiring ownership, through finance, of large numbers of these boats and, with this ownership of both boats and fishing gear, largely controlling the fishing industry in British Columbia. This is at least what happened in the past and, it is to be hoped, will not be allowed to happen again.

It has been intimated that the government intend to move certain numbers of able-bodied male Japanese between certain ages only, and from certain designated military areas. The age limit proposed is between that of eighteen and forty-five years. What the designated military areas are to be has not yet been made known publicly. My advice would be, if the government is going to move every able-bodied male Japanese citizen, not to leave any over the age of forty-five; and further, the entire British Columbia coast as well as Vancouver island, Queen Charlotte and other islands should be military prohibited districts for the Japanese and enemy aliens. Considerable concern is felt in British Columbia concerning where the government intends removing the able-bodied Japanese to, and I believe most people in British Columbia would agree with the statement that no community in British Columbia really wants them. One suggestion would be that in view of the shortage of farm labour in Ontario and other eastern provinces, the government send three or four thousand east and so provide farmers in the central and eastern provinces with all the farm help they require. This would save considerable expense to the country compared with the proposed scheme of road work in British Columbia whereby the government proposes to pay them for this work. The people of Ontario, especially round Ottawa, and other provinces have always evinced a more kindly feeling towards these people than the people of British Columbia. We in that province would not mind their departure. I feel sure that if they leave British Columbia, there is one song we would not sing, and that is that splendid old Jacobite song, once sung for Prince Charlie, and now sung when dear friends are departing, "Will ye no come back again?"

The problem of the Japanese in Canada has been principally one of British Columbia's problems, and one which should never have occurred but for the action of the federal government in days long past. From information which we have it would appear that in the year 1894 Great Britain concluded a commercial or trade treaty with Japan. It was simply a treaty for trade purposes only, but one of the clauses of that treaty was to allow Japanese citizens to enter, travel or reside. This particular clause did not affect Great Britain, and at that time she had little interest as to whether the Japanese settled in the British colonies or not. Objection to the clause was made by Australia, so Great Britain offered to negotiate a new trade treaty without a clause of this kind being inserted, and restricting the entry of Japanese nationals into the various countries of the self-governing colonies. Canada preferred to accept the clause as it stood; Australia would not. The acceptance by Canada of that clause in a trade treaty has been a most unfortunate one for British Columbia, and I believe for Canada generally, for the people of that province have had forced on them an unassimilable race of people, who cannot in the strict sense become truly Canadians. The people of British Columbia have long been protesting to Ottawa against the peaceful penetration of the Japanese in that province, but all protests have been of little avail. In fact, apart from some changes made in the gentleman's agreement from time to time, our appeals to the federal government have been met with almost complete indifference.

At one stage of our history British Columbia endeavoured to emulate Australia, which country successfully defied the attempts of Great Britain to force the entry of orientals on them, but the action of British Columbia was vetoed at Ottawa. It is well known that the pressure of certain Montreal financial interests had something to do with the matter, for back in those years they wanted to have plenty of cheap labour on tap, especially in British Columbia.

There are no doubt many loyal Japanese in Canada, but who can tell the loyal ones from the others? Would anyone say regarding any of our missionaries, or of other Canadians of British stock who have lived from upwards of twenty to sixty years in Japan, as some of them have done, that after living there all those years they or their children born in Japan would be now more loyal to Japan than to Canada or Britain? Of course they would not. Then why assert, as some do, that the Japanese are any different in this regard than our own or other races would be? I am not finding any fault with them in this regard. I am merely reciting what is, after all, only a natural human characteristic and which would seem to be part of the make-up of man and woman in almost every race.

Another fact which should be mentioned here is, why have so many of the Canadian-born Japanese gone back to Japan to complete or carry out their military training in that country? Contrary to what one would imagine or expect from Canadian-born children of certain foreign races in this country, and which is not generally known, many of our so-called new Canadians born in this country are more intensely nationalistic for their parents' homeland than are the parents themselves, and this applies to many of the university class of Japanese born and educated in British Columbia. Do not forget that almost all of them are registered in Japan even though born in Canada and that Japan looks upon them as still being her nationals.

The trouble to my mind with many people—and this includes many round Ottawa—is that they refuse to face the facts on this oriental question. Personally I see no great hope of a permanent solution for the Japanese question in British Columbia other than by way of repatriation.

Perhaps the question would not be so great and might partly be solved were the Japanese spread out over the entire nine provinces. But as the policy seems to have been for the Japanese to congregate almost entirely in one province, the problem in that province becomes a very great and perplexing one. I would, however, treat all Japanese in this country fairly and without hatred. Remember, when we speak of repatriation we should think in terms of the future, looking towards the solution of a better and more united Canada. It is worth noting here that Russia, that country from which much can be learned to-day, took action immediately Germany attacked her and removed some 387,000 persons of German descent whose forbears had lived in Russia as far back as 1817. Russia believed, "once a German always a German," and removed every last one of them, lock, stock and barrel, to Siberia.

With regard to the Japanese situation, if wise steps are not taken now to deal with the problem, looking towards a satisfactory solution, the problem will be an ever-recurring and contentious one, and it is my plea now to the government that it should be dealt with in the light of British Columbia's experience rather than, as in the past, from an entirely Ottawa and far-away point of view.

There is one other matter which I should like to mention at this time before closing, and that is the question of defences on the Pacific coast, which was discussed by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) the other day. Let me say at once to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) that it is not my intention to raise this question in any carping way or from any alarmist point of view. I do, however, warn the minister as earnestly as I can that the people on the Pacific coast are greatly perturbed with respect to Pacific coast defences. Who would have thought three months ago that the Japanese would be in control of the Hawaiian islands and in control of possessions in the south Pacific now menacing Australia itself, some 3,500 miles distant from Japan? If Singapore falls—and who can say with any certainty that it will not?—where, I ask, will Japan strike next? For in that event it will then control almost the entire Pacific.

Since the war started, so many optimistic reports have been made by high military men and authorities, which later events showed were certainly not justified, that people to-day can hardly be blamed for being rather sceptical. We are aware that certain defences are being constructed on the Pacific coast, but our people out there are wondering whether most of these principal defences have not been for protection against attack from sea, similar to those of Singapore, rather than against attacks from the air. It is all very well for our fears to be pooh-poohed or laughed at by the higher command here.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend must not say that. There is no suggestion of pooh-poohing or laughing at anyone's fears.

Mr. REID: I am glad to hear that, but the reports that reached us in British Columbia before I came here led me to make that statement.

Mr. RALSTON: I assure my hon. friend it is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. REID: The majority of people in British Columbia believe that an attack, when and if it does come, will be chiefly from the air; hence the reason for the haste on the Pacific coast in perfecting blackout regulations and air raid precautions. Here let me commend the splendid voluntary efforts of great numbers of our citizens who are giving of their time so willingly and who belong to the various air raid precaution organizations. Necessary, however, as these precautions are, still they are not actually a protection from an attack by air. Especially does this apply to towns or cities situated on the seacoast or located close to rivers. As evidence of this, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to remember that the bombers attacking German cities now fly at heights of 25,000 to 30,000 feet, so high, in fact, that no object below is visible from that height, and also the fact that smudge or smoke fires are now used in England to black-out rivers such as the Thames.

In case someone accuses me of mentioning military matters openly in the house, let me tell them that in so far as coast defences and military operations on the Pacific coast are concerned, these are and have been known to the Japanese in British Columbia right along. Although we from British Columbia have complained, ever since 1939 when war first started, against the promiscuous taking of photographs of military defences and other important sites by Japanese and others, no attention was paid to our protests. Make no mistake about it, Japan has all these photographs now, and has also complete information of Pacific coast waters, bays and harbours, it being well known that the Japanese had up-to-date charts, the data for which were obtained during fishing operations.

Last year I protested against allowing five Japanese families to live inside one of our military compounds and defence areas, and the only answer I got was, that all these were loyal citizens. Well, Mr. Speaker, they could not all have been loyal citizens, for the day Canada declared war on Japan the Royal Canadian Mounted Police deemed it advisable to pick up some of them and intern them as enemy aliens. Nothing, however, has been done as far as I know about the others who are still living there, and whose residences are but a few feet away from the very defence guns we are depending upon for protection at the mouth of the Fraser river.

To my mind the high military command here at Ottawa are responsible for allowing conditions such as I have mentioned to prevail, and which are inexcusable. No other country in the world would pussyfoot around in these matters or act quite as foolish. Do those in high military command here really understand the Japanese situation on the Pacific, or have they any idea at all of the workings of the oriental mind, which is as different as night from day when compared with that of the occidental? Is the hon. Minister of National Defence, or are members of his staff aware, or do they just laugh at those of us from British Columbia who are earnestly and sincerely endeavouring to warn them about Japan and the Japanese people?

It is my opinion that Japan's real object is that of world domination. Japan, whilst helping Germany, is playing her own game in this war—and make no mistake about it—and this idea of world domination is no new sudden desire on the part of the Japanese. Plans for this ambitious scheme were formulated in Japan many long years ago, and her policy throughout these years has been with that definite purpose in mind. It is part of Japanese philosophy to believe in her own destiny of world domination, and might I point out in this regard that Japanese immigration to British Columbia and all other Pacific coast territories has all been a part of that plan looking toward Japanese world supremacy. The Japanese government assisted her nationals to settle on the Pacific coast of north America, and according to Japan's own records, between fifty and sixty million yen were received by her each year as payments from Japanese nationals who had been assisted in becoming established in other lands bordering the Pacific, which lands included British Columbia.

Mr. RALSTON: In what respect did I understand my hon. friend to say the Minister of National Defence or the army officers treated the Japanese situation lightly? Was it anything that had to do with military matters, or is he speaking about Japanese nationals?

Mr. REID: I gave it as my view and the view of others that the Japanese should have been removed from military defences.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is speaking about Japanese nationals in Canada; I thought he was speaking about the preparation of defences against attack. My hon. friend knows what he speaks of is a civil matter.

Mr. REID: It is all very well to say that, but surely the Department of National Defence is in command of defences there and surely they should request the removal of Japanese from such defence areas.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will look at the defence of Canada regulations, he will see that there is a line of demarcation. I do not appreciate being made the subject of attack in connection with the internal situation in relation to the Japanese.

Mr. REID: Well, I must accept the minister's statement, but I tell him it is high time that some of these regulations were changed.

Mr. RALSTON: I can say to my hon. friend that the Department of National Defence has gone a very long way in making a protective area just because of representations made. My hon. friend ought really to deal with the department that has the matter in hand. The Department of National Defence deals with the matter of attack from the enemy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the minister allow a question? When I was in British Columbia I saw something of this, and I think I had occasion to call attention on one occasion to a group of these suspected persons near a fortified position. Were they allowed to remain in defence areas?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know what my hon. friend is referring to. I am talking about a protected area under the defence of Canada regulations, which have been recently amended. There has been a great deal of loose thinking and talking about the matter of defence areas. This matter of protected areas was formerly under the Minister of Justice and was always dealt with by that department until a few days ago. I was willing to take it over, and I made an order specifying the protected area in British Columbia, although I felt it was more a matter of civil administration.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. REID: The minister is in the fortunate position of knowing what the protected areas in British Columbia are, whereas members of the house are not, but I notice he did not contradict the statement about those five families living close to the guns. I visited that district the day I left for Ottawa, and but for the fact that I am a member of parliament I could not have got into that area, but the Japanese and their relatives and friends could come and go inside that military compound.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend know that that is a defence area established by the military authority?

Mr. REID: I do not know, but I know there are four guns there at the mouth of the river, and if it is not a defence area it should be.

Mr. RALSTON: Who was it kept my hon. friend out, a sentry?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: And allowed the Japanese in?

Mr. REID: Yes. Five families in all.

Mr. GREEN: Some of them are between the camp and the guns.

Mr. RALSTON: I assure my hon. friend that it was not a defence area such as set up under the defence of Canada regulations that he is talking about.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then what is it, if it is a gun area?

Mr. RALSTON: What the hon. member is talking about is in the vicinity of some guns, but is not a defined defence area.

Mr. REID: Well it should be. Coming back to the remarks I have to make regarding the war in the Pacific, it is evident now that Japan fooled the allies prior to December, 1941, in her war with China, making them believe she was not as strong as she really was. It is interesting to note that both Russia and Japan adopted a like policy in relation to their military strength and preparedness; for it is evident now that Stalin put it all over Hitler regarding the strength of Russia. Japan, using similar tactics, hid her real military strength from the rest of the world in preparation for her fight against the United States and Great Britain, both of which countries she is endeavouring with all her military might to drive out of the Pacific. My prayer is that our war cabinet and high military command will accept these statements about the Pacific situation more seriously than they seem to have done in the past, and in speaking as I have about this matter, I do so because I feel it to be my duty, and to warn the government and the country against the possible danger which I believe exists. We on the Pacific coast would like to see in all important centres more anti-aircraft guns, searchlights and other military defence measures. The people on the Pacific coast, however, are not asking the impossible and are well aware of the enormous demands for military equipment of every kind which is urgently required to-day to meet the enemy in all the widely flung battle fronts. I urge the Minister of National Defence, for whom I have the greatest regard, that when he speaks he tell us, as frankly as the situation will allow, of the steps which have been taken for the protection of the British Columbia coast. In the light of the actual war situation as it exists to-day, we do not expect him to reveal any military information which might help the enemy or jeopardize the safety of our people, but we do ask that he take us into his confidence as far as deemed advisable, believing that a frank statement of the situation will be of inestimable help, looking towards the prevention of any possible war hysteria or panic which might arise.

I have one suggestion to make in closing. It is that the minister bring back General McNaughton from England and have him inspect the defences of both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts, and in the light of his experience advise the government in connection with the defence of Canada against possible invasion. General McNaughton has been in England now for some considerable time and not only has witnessed enemy air attacks and bombardments but is in the unique position of knowing what the actual fortifications are in Great Britain against invasion either from the sea or from the air. He is fully conversant also with modern military tactics to be employed against the enemy should invasion arise. He has first-hand experience, information and knowledge such as few of the military staff in Canada possess. General McNaughton is the most experienced man we have for advice on how modern warfare should be conducted, and apart altogether from the respect in which he is held in Great Britain, the fact that prior to the fall of Dunkirk he stood out against allowing Canadian troops to go to France because of the lack of adequate mechanical military equipment, shows the calibre of this general, who merits, I believe, the thanks of all Canadians.

It is my opinion that if something like this were done, and any recommendations made were carried out, it would not only allay to quite a considerable extent, the fears of many of our people but also have the effect of placing us in a better position to repel any possible invasion or attack from air or sea on either the Atlantic or the Pacific coasts.

In closing, may I say that like every hon. member I realize the seriousness of war conditions to-day, and so have endeavoured in my remarks to be as fair and tolerant as possible, trusting, however, that some attention will be given by the government to the suggestions made with regard to the problems I now bring to their attention.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, during the past two sessions of the present parliament our task has been directed toward a solution of the problems which confront us in our national life, particularly those which arise in the prosecution of the war. Considerable progress has been made in this initial period, but no effort could have been too great while the destiny of free peoples was at stake. From now on, and until a decisive victory is ultimately won, both on the battlefields and at the peace conferences, not only must we further mobilize, equip and maintain our armed forces as our chief contribution to the cause of freedom, but we must of necessity go beyond this primary requisite.

We must not only win the war, but we must also make certain that we shall win the peace. To achieve less would be to fail in the trust bestowed upon us, the sacred privilege of delivering to future generations the hard-won liberties of our forefathers. It is our duty, therefore, to study and prevent the weaknesses and recurring dangers of past adjustments—or, shall I say, the lack of proper adjustments—of world problems which gave rise to the present world conflagration. This should be one of our many immediate concerns.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members will agree with me when I say that we are faced to-day with problems of first magnitude. Many of these problems have arisen with the present conflict, but multitudes of them find root in the past. We cannot, therefore, shirk responsibility in the solution of this chaotic state of affairs. World problems are our problems; for they have either a direct or an indirect bearing upon our national life—yes, even upon our individual lives.

We must necessarily realize that it is not the war alone that we are fighting to-day; we find ourselves also in the grip of two of the greatest revolutions of all time. Nationally we are fighting a war; internally and internationally we are engaged in two prodigious revolutions—one economic, one political. We are therefore endeavouring to survive one of the most critical and dangerous of transitional periods.

Let us, then, examine the role that we Canadians are playing in this struggle, and let us envision the role that Canada is destined to play in the future.

We are now in the third year of war. To what extent have we crystallized our views on Canada's foreign policy? What plans are we prepared to advance or adopt as the basis for post-war reorganization and reconstruction of the world? How many hours have we devoted in this chamber to the discussion of this problem during the last two years? If none, why not? Can we afford to be caught unprepared in this respect? For, as we know, this war will also end sooner or later as all other wars are supposed to have ended.

Now, when we consider the position that Canada occupies among the nations of the world at this time, it does seem that we have underestimated her importance. As a matter of fact, until recently Canada's position was unique in that it was second only to that of Great Britain; indeed in many respects, even with the entry of the United States into the conflict, Canada still remains a number one ally of Great Britain. I say that with all due respect and consideration to the material aid given to Great Britain by our good neighbour directly to the south of us, and with all due respect and consideration to the entry of the Soviet Union into this conflict on our side.

To amplify my statement: Canada's strategic position makes her the logical mediator between Great Britain and the United States. Her geographical location makes her an ideal arsenal for the turning out of tools of war for the allies. She is admirably situated for the training fields of the empire forces, and especially the empire air training plan. And lastly, because of her limitless potential natural resources and her vast, rich wheat fields, she will undoubtedly be the key to post-war reconstruction of Britain. It is only fitting, therefore, that Canada's foreign policy should be commensurate with her important position.

It is gratifying indeed to find that the broad principles which are intended as the basis for post-war reorganization of the world have been enunciated. I refer, of course, to the now historic Atlantic charter, proclaimed by two of the world's men of destiny—the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Churchhill, and the President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt. I am more than pleased, Mr. Speaker, to hear reference made to the Atlantic charter in the speech from the throne.

Then again, there are the four great human freedoms proclaimed by the President of the United States—freedom of speech and expression, freedom of every person to worship God in his own way, freedom from want and freedom from fear.

These declarations deserve all the acclaim they have already received from all parts of the world, particularly for their universality and noble purpose. We, of course, welcome and accept these principles just as we had accepted the fourteen points of President Wilson after the last war. We may be proud at least of the fact that the democratic world recognizes that world stability and enduring peace can be achieved only on the basis of freedom of all peoples capable of shaping and directing their own destinies.

Further, in his address of January 6, 1941, President Roosevelt had this to say on the subject:

> No lasting peace can be bought at the expense of other peoples' freedom.

Again, in his speech delivered at the annual dinner of the White House Correspondents' Association, he said:

> Humanity will never permanently accept a system imposed by conquest and based on slavery.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, not only are these statements true, but they are expressions of foresight and vision. We can no longer tolerate a short-sighted plan or settlement. There must be built a new world citadel of freedom and civilization. If we ever hope to have stability and enduring peace, the principles of freedom must constantly be kept in mind and incorporated into the post-war settlement. If this basis is ignored, let us then not expect a peaceful world in the immediate future; the lives spent in this and the last war will then have been given in vain.

Let us look a step further. Should not the democracies, of imperative necessity, formulate a more definite and detailed set of proposals which will give the needed promise of release to all peoples under the domination of the aggressor nations? Should not our proposals be more positive, more dynamic, so that they may add more inspiration to the explosive force of the temporarily subdued peoples? I venture to suggest that in this manner we would change the whole course of the war very much more in our favour. I make this observation because it can well be assumed that the axis powers are bound to offer some enticing formula to subdued nations for the express purpose of giving themselves a breathing moment before they begin tightening the reins on those unfortunate countries. Germany is already trying desperately to consolidate her position in the overrun regions. She is organizing these areas into zones which are to operate in complete subordination to her, and she is totally ignoring all racial and ethnographic lines. It is a sort of forced federal union. It would mean an eventual and permanent enslavement of millions of people. It would become a new and horrible prison of nations.

In view of this increasingly dangerous threat, the allies should, therefore, take it upon themselves to become the guardians of sovereign ideals and sovereign nations. Can we not promise all of them their national sovereignty, which would be in accordance with the spirit of the Atlantic charter, and which would make a revolutionary rebellion on their part worth while? It would be an inspiration and a challenge to them. For, as we know, there is no stronger force and incentive than that manifest in the defence of personal and national existence. I cannot, therefore, emphasize too strongly the immediate need on the part of democracies to make known their foreign policy in as complete and definite form as time and conditions permit. The issues at stake are too important for us not to make use of the incentive of confidence in the future—instead of vague hopes and wishful thinking.

Allow me now to draw your attention to the three items relevant to national sovereignty as outlined in the Atlantic charter. They are points 2, 3 and 6. Here is what they say:

> Second, they desire to see no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned.
> Third, they respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them.
> Sixth, after the final destruction of the nazi tyranny, they hope to see established a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries, and which will afford assurance that all the men in all the lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want.

These three points deal generally with the phase of the problem which I am discussing. They read well, but I found numerous interpretations of them. One outstanding United States publication interprets the Atlantic charter as being opposed to the setting up of any new organisms. Of course, much depends on how the word "new" is interpreted. But are we to understand that nations who were not fortunate enough to liberate themselves during the last war shall remain in bondage? More clarification of this point is definitely needed. Then, again, the charter was interpreted as favouring the federal union proposals. Personally, I fail to find in the document any trace of expression of these views. As a matter of fact I find that the charter upholds the sovereignty of all peoples in accordance with their expressed will, which is definitely contrary to ideas propounded by federal unionists.

From what I have said thus far, it is evident that this question of foreign relations policy is an extremely broad one in scope. I wish, therefore, to confine my following remarks specifically to the discussion of a Ukrainian independent state and its importance to the British commonwealth of nations.

The question may arise in the minds of some hon. members as to why should we Canadians be interested in an independent Ukrainian state in Europe. Is it because Ukrainian-Canadians constitute a large group of our citizens, and we owe them that courtesy? Is it because they are so generously enlisting in great numbers in the Canadian armed forces and are ready to give their lives for Canada? Is it because of the heroic contribution of Ukrainians on the battlefields of the Ukraine against Germany? Or, is it because it is in the very blood of the English-speaking people always to stand up for the rights of others as well as their own? Yes, but there is a much more important reason than those I have already given.

Above all, a Ukrainian independent state in eastern Europe would be important to the British commonwealth of nations and the United States as a balance of power. I venture to suggest that in the not distant future the British people and the principles for which they stand will be more closely associated with the Ukrainians than they have ever been before.

Furthermore, Ukraine is important because of the extent of its territory, the richness of its natural resources, the size of its population, and its strategic position with reference to the Black sea, the Dardanelles, Iran, Iraq, the Persian gulf and India. Professor G. W. Simpson, of Saskatchewan university, has this to say in his "Atlas of History and Geography of the Ukraine":

> Thus the Ukraine constitutes a wide assembling place which could be used either by ambitious dictators as the starting point for sweeping military conquest, or by wise statesmen as a strong wedge-like area of defence which would stabilize all these regions tributary to the Black sea.

Consequently, it is definitely contrary to the interests of Britain to permit Germany to take and hold the Ukraine and exploit its people and its resources for aggrandizement and greater power. Again, it would not be in the best interests of Britain to see any other power enslave the Ukrainian people and, with the use of their territory and natural resources, become a dominant power holding this strategic position in eastern Europe.

Finally, a division of the territory after the fashion of the division made after the last war would only complicate the problems of Europe, and the dangerous situation would remain unchanged. Hence the problem of a Ukrainian independent state in eastern Europe is of extreme importance to the British commonwealth of nations and to the stability of the world.

I have before me a handbook prepared under the authority of the historic section of the British foreign office, entitled "The Ukraine", the topic which I propose to discuss briefly. This booklet is numbered 52 of the series of such authoritative information prepared and collected for the sole purpose of having this information available for those who were to participate in the peace conferences. It may be observed from the series number that there must have been at least fifty-one others of the kind, dealing with various important problems. This booklet contains information having to do with physical geography, political history, social and political conditions, and much other useful material. One cannot help but admire the British for their thoroughness in dealing with important matters such as these; on the other hand, the total lack of similar preparation on our part in Canada stands out in striking contrast.

True, many Canadians show a keen interest in the Ukrainian problem. Many of them seek information on the subject, but it is essential that they obtain their information from authoritative and unbiased sources. All those interested in the subject must remember that there is a great deal of distorted information emanating from people who are not totally disinterested in the possession and the control of the Ukraine. This information is usually disseminated with the purpose of obliterating the authenticity of the ethnological and ethnographical existence of the Ukrainian people. For example, any aspiration manifested by Ukrainians looking to freedom and independence in their own native land is immediately given the interpretation of being instigated by an enemy of the British. This method of propaganda is by no means new, but unless one guards against such sources of information he may be hopelessly misled.

[Mr. Hlynka.]

For the benefit of those who may be interested in the subject I wish to place on record just a few authoritative sources of information: "Ukraine, an Atlas of its History and Geography," by G. W. Simpson, professor of European history, university of Saskatchewan, published in 1941; "History of the Ukraine," by D. Doroshenko, professor of Prague and Warsaw universities, which was edited by Professor Simpson, and published in 1939. The third and perhaps the most comprehensive study is "A History of Ukraine," by Michael Hrushevsky, one of the world's outstanding historians. This book was edited by O. J. Frederiksen, professor of history at Miami university, and published by Yale university press in 1941.

May I now give this house, so far as my humble ability will permit, the fundamental facts concerning Ukraine and the Ukrainian people? First let me deal with the land they inhabit and claim.

Ukraine is a vast rich territory lying in the southeastern corner of Europe on the threshold of Asia, immediately north of the Black sea. It is the second largest ethnographic territory in Europe and fourteenth largest in the world. This territory comprises 362,200 square miles.

Immediately prior to the last world war the whole Ukraine was held by Russia and Austro-Hungary.

By 1923 the Ukraine was dismembered and divided among the four neighbouring nations. The largest portion, comprising 298,610 square miles and containing 35,026,000 Ukrainians, called the Great Ukraine, was assigned to Russia, and was incorporated as one of the republics of the Soviet Union. The western Ukraine, comprising 51,042 square miles and containing 7,500,000 Ukrainians, was made a Polish "protectorate". The provinces of Bessarabia and Bukovina, comprising 6,795 square miles and containing 1,500,000 Ukrainians, was placed under Roumanian rule, while Carpatho-Ukraine, comprising 5,753 square miles and containing 600,000 Ukrainians, was assigned to Czechoslovakia.

At the moment almost the entire territory has become the battlefield of the German and the Soviet Union forces. It has been for many months and still is being torn by destructive forces of war, and the Ukrainian people are undergoing the most cruel ordeal of their history. In addition to this tragic fate that befell the Ukrainian people, the scorched earth policy of the Soviet government was mainly applied to the Ukraine. The land which is capable of providing freedom and life to its people has brought nothing but extreme tragedy, with slavery and death.

To one who has not the facts about the Ukraine it may seem confusing why so many nations are forever determined to grab a piece of this land for themselves. The answer is that it is one of the richest regions in the entire world. Ukraine is often referred to as the granary of Europe. It is more than that. Her mineral deposits are the envy of all her good neighbours. The 1932 Encyclopaedia Americana points out that in 1928-29 Ukraine supplied the Soviet Union with 80 per cent of its coal, 60 per cent of its iron, 95 per cent of its manganese, 80 per cent of its sugar, the bulk of its wheat, vast quantities of mercury, copper and gold. The striking fact is that its rightful owners share little in this wealth.

There are now in the neighbourhood of 50 million Ukrainians in the world. Numerically they are the third largest group in Europe and ninth largest in the world. They first appeared in history in the fourth century. My time will not permit me to deal with the ethnology and the general characteristics of the people at this time; suffice it to say that C. S. Coon, professor of anthropology at Harvard university, states in his book, "Races of Europe," that Ukrainians are a distinct and separate people.

Perhaps the greatest contribution made by Ukrainians to the world was that of staving off the Asiatic hordes for many centuries from invading Europe. That is what Lord Tweedsmuir meant when he said on September 21, 1936, at Fraserwood, Manitoba, "for it was your race which for centuries held the south-eastern gate of Europe against the attacks from the east."

Again, it was through Kiev, the capital of the Ukraine, that Christianity was introduced into eastern Europe in 988. Let me mention one or two other contributions in art, music, and literature. Alexander Archipenko, one of the world's foremost contemporary sculptors, now living in the United States, is a Ukrainian. The immortal Tschaikowsky, in the field of music, was of Ukrainian origin. Taras Shevchenko, the Robert Burns of the Slavic races, was a Ukrainian. These are but a few indications of Ukrainian contributions to the world.

When national states were established after the last world war it was held that the basis accepted was not some remote appeal to historic claims, but rather a clear and unmistakable determination of the people to rule themselves. With regard to the historic claims of many peoples, some, like Finland, had not known complete political independence for many centuries; some, like Esthonia, had never known political independence in the modern sense of the word.

The Ukraine, however, has had a continuous historic tradition extending back for over a thousand years, and three times, at least, this tradition incorporated itself in terms of political independence. First, there was the Kievan state, existing from the ninth to the middle of the fourteenth century; then the Cossack state, established in 1648, which lasted to the middle of the eighteenth century, and lastly, the United Ukrainian Republic of 1918-23.

At the time when Alfred the Great of England was attempting to maintain his Saxon state against the Danes, the ancestors of the Ukrainian people were establishing a large and flourishing kingdom with its centre at Kiev. This Kievan state, with its Slav-Byzantine culture, was the outstanding political state in eastern Europe. It is the fountainhead of the Ukrainian historical tradition. When it disintegrated into principalities and suffered the devastating blow of the Tartar invasion its traditions lived on in the southern principalities, particularly in the western Ukraine. Although the western Ukraine fell to Poland and the other principalities to Lithuania, which was later joined to Poland, the ancient Ukrainian laws, customs and language persisted and developed.

Again when Oliver Cromwell in England, in the seventeenth century, was striking a mighty blow for that liberty which we are to-day defending, Bohdan Khmelnitsky created on the basis of Ukrainian tradition a free and independent Cossack state. Unfortunately Khmelnitsky had not the advantage of a sea wall, which Cromwell enjoyed, and the state which he had erected was torn between Poland and the rising state of Muscovy which was then becoming the modern empire of Russia. So firmly entrenched, however, were the institutions of self-government in the Ukraine, that it was more than a hundred years after the death of Khmelnitsky, in the latter half of the eighteenth century, before the imperialist regime could root out the last remnants of these institutions of self-government.

But the love of freedom which is an undying part of the human spirit was again awakened in the nineteenth century among the Ukrainian people as well as among the Czechs, the Poles and others who had been suppressed.

Finally, in the first world war, when the Russian empire fell, then from its ruins, for the third time in the history of the Ukrainian people, there emerged a Ukrainian independent state, proclaimed on January 22, 1918. Nine months later the Austro-Hungarian empire fell, and from its remnants there was created the Western Ukrainian National Republic, proclaimed on the first day of November, 1918, ten days before the armistice. These two Ukrainian areas were proclaimed united on January 22, 1919, forming a United Ukrainian Republic.

The Ukrainian patriots fought desperately to defend this state so that they might live as free people among other nations of the world. They lost this freedom, and one element in their misfortune was the fact that their cause was so gravely misunderstood and misrepresented. By 1923 the Ukrainians found themselves divided among four states, as I have already pointed out.

It seemed that it was the original intention of the Paris peace conference to give the Ukrainians the right of self-determination in the western Ukraine. In 1923, however, the Council of Ambassadors granted to Poland the title to this area, on the distinct understanding that she would eventually grant autonomy to this part of the Ukraine under the stipulated clauses of the Minorities treaty of 1919. Finally, in 1934, Poland formally repudiated this obligation.

The results of these minorities treaties present many interesting angles. It may be granted that it was not easy to divide the territory in question into national states, since there were many conflicting claims; but, allowing even for that, all were not treated with equal consideration. For instance, in the territorial revision after the last war some eleven states were created that were not on the map in 1914. Some of these were: Poland, with some 20 millions of people; Yugoslavia, with about 15 millions; Finland, with 3,600,000; Lithuania, with 2,500,000; Latvia, with 2,000,000, and Esthonia, with 1,100,000. I strongly uphold the granting of sovereign rights to all these nations, because I am a firm believer in the sovereign rights of all peoples in accordance with their will. It does seem inconsistent, however, that Ukrainians, with over 40 millions at that time, came out of the struggle empty-handed, in spite of the fact that they had been an historic unit in the past. Were not the Ukrainians entitled to the same privilege as others? If not, why not?

Another error in the settlement arose out of the fact that minorities created by this division constituted a dangerously high percentage. According to Mr. C. A. Macartney, a recognized authority on European affairs, in Czechoslovakia thirty-three per cent were other than Czechs or Slovaks; in Poland over twenty-five per cent were non-Polish; in Roumania over twenty-five per cent were other than Roumanians. The important question is, can we afford to ignore racial lines in the future?

[Mr. Hlynka.]

The present collapse of the state structure in Europe has again involved the Ukrainian people, along with other peoples, in utmost misery and desolatiou at the hands of the aggressor nations. The Ukrainians have again joined hands with other liberty-loving peoples in a fight for freedom. In Carpatho-Ukraine they fought against the axis partner, Hungary, in 1938. In western Ukraine and in Poland they fought against Germany in 1939, and they are now fighting against Germany with the Soviet Union forces.

Ukrainians fought for their freedom throughout their long and tragic history. They fight for it now, and they will continue to fight for it until they are free. Ukrainians believe that they are just as much entitled to their sovereign rights as any other people are; they wish to contribute their maximum share to culture and civilization of the world. This will be possible only through the restoration of their own independence. A nation can give its best only when free from bondage. These are the tenets of the Atlantic charter; these are the tenets of Christian civilization.

It may be pointed out by some that there appear to be two obstacles in the way of realization of Ukrainian sovereignty. In the first place it may be suggested that after this war there will be no sovereign states; that some sort of federal union will take their place. Personally I do not believe that the British people would favour any plan that would require the forfeiture of their sovereignty. If they did, they would not be fighting this war.

The second obstacle which may be suggested is one with reference to the Soviet Union. It may be said that, since the Soviet Union is our ally in this war, any suggestion of an independent Ukraine might endanger our relations with the Soviet Union. Let me remind hon. members that, according to press reports, the Soviet government favours the proposals embodied in the Atlantic charter. That this is so, was indicated by the British Foreign Secretary, Mr. Eden, after his recent return from Moscow. In addition to that, article 17 of the Soviet Union constitution (1936) says that "Each union republic is reserved the right freely to secede from the U.S.S.R." This should be sufficient assurance that the Soviet Union would be inclined to favour a recognition of the principle of the sovereignty of nations.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to leave with the house the following suggestion. In view of the fact that all the subdued countries that had been sovereign nations prior to this war are now privileged to form their provisional governments in exile in order that they may carry on the work in the interests of their respective peoples, and in view of the fact that Ukrainians, who form a larger group than any of these, have not now that privilege simply because they were not an independent nation immediately prior to this war, I humbly submit that steps should be taken by the allied governments to make it possible for the Ukrainians to be represented at the various conferences now being held from time to time. In Great Britain, the United States and Canada, there are in existence United Ukrainian committees, whose primary object is to assist the governments in Britain, the United States and Canada in the successful prosecution of the war. I do suggest, if I may, sir, that since all the allied nations are fighting for a common cause of freedom, that Ukrainian committees to which I have referred be also invited to delegate their representative or representatives to express the view of 50 million Ukrainian people at conferences held by the allied nations.

I believe I have sufficiently pointed out that the stability of Europe and of the world can be achieved only on the basis of universal justice. The European madhouse will remain a madhouse until Europe is reconstructed with freedom written into every word of its constitution. When that is done we may expect a lasting peace.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, before I proceed with my remarks I want to compliment the previous speaker, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) upon presenting so lucidly and forcibly one of the great problems which his people living in Europe are facing now, and which we shall have to face and try to solve after the present conflict is over.

It is with a certain amount of trepidation, realizing that all hon. members are alive to the seriousness of the situation, that I dare to speak on this occasion. I believe, however, that this is the time, in the course of the debate on the speech from the throne, as the floor of this House of Commons is the place, for a member of parliament occasionally to express his sentiments on great matters which are agitating public opinion.

I was not here when the mover (Mr. Fournier, Hull) and the seconder (Mr. Macdonald, Brantford City) spoke, but I made it a point to read their speeches, and I join with others in complimenting them sincerely upon the splendid presentation they made. I also listened attentively to the excellent address given by that true Canadian, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) last week, and I might say the same about the speeches given by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore).

There is one feeling that, I am sure, animates this house. We are all in agreement on the fact that a total war effort is desirable at this time and until full victory has been attained. We all want to do everything we possibly can to prosecute the war successfully. One party may think differently from another with regard to certain phases of our activities, but surely it is possible in the present serious situation, in this critical time in our Canadian history and of the world, for us all to get our hearts and minds together and bring about unity in our own ranks so that we may forge ahead successfully with our war effort.

Let me address sincere felicitations to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). In my opinion he gave a splendid, illuminating address, and I hope it will be possible for every Canadian to read, to scrutinize and carefully to analyse that speech. The Prime Minister showed what we have done in prosecuting this war. He made it known to the Canadian people, to the people of the British empire, and to all the people of the civilized world that we in Canada are willing to go further than we have gone and to make still greater efforts, and sacrifices, in time, energy and wealth in order to preserve all those things that Canadians cherish. There is one thing that surprises me—I have wondered at it ever since the war began—and that is the fact that many members of parliament find it possible to say, generally speaking, that Canadians do not realize the seriousness of the situation. Indeed, some hon. gentlemen go as far as to say that the Canadian people did not realize the situation at the time of the election in 1940. I suggest that anyone who has read at all carefully the history of the first great war, from 1914 to 1918, as well as some military works depicting not only the horrors of that war, but the horrors of the war which historians at that time foresaw would take place in the future, in other words, the war in which we are at present engaged; anyone who listened at all carefully to some of the speeches that were delivered at that time in the House of Commons by such men as General Ross, who represented Kingston, and who gave so vividly, from personal knowledge, accounts of what had taken place in the last war, and predicted what might happen in the future, does not rate the intelligence of Canadians very high if he stands up in this forum and declares that the Canadian people to-day do not realize, or did not realize, at the time of the election in 1940, the seriousness of this war. Our people knew and know of the meaning of this horrible conflict. We all knew how serious it would be. We could not help realizing it after Germany had conquered Poland in a few weeks. We knew what was in store for all the freedom-loving democracies unless we prepared ourselves accordingly.

I protest against this attitude on the part of certain people. There is scarcely a Canadian family that has not some representative in active service on the European side, and if for no other reason that that, I am sure we are all fully conscious of the gravity of the situation and the necessity for combining all our energies so that we may make sure that we shall be absolutely victorious.

May I say a few words now about the plebiscite? I represent a riding in which there are all the nationalities known to the civilized world. Ever since the total war movement started, I have been receiving letters, in some of which I have been definitely told that unless I am absolutely for conscription I should resign. As far as I am personally concerned, let me say that on this important question I shall follow primarily the dictates of my own conscience and what I believe to be in the interests of my own country and of the British empire. I will not be led astray, or I will not be led one way or the other, by other considerations. I believe that every member of parliament must accept responsibility not only for his own political actions, but, to a large extent, for some leadership in his own constituency, and advance his ideas earnestly and sincerely.

Before coming to this session I was sincerely convinced that this government had done almost as well as it could do under the circumstances. I believed that it was fully aware of the situation, notwithstanding that in the last three or four months there has been a vicious attack from a small section of the country, of which attack of necessity parliament must be cognizant. I am absolutely in favour of holding a plebiscite at this time, and my chief reason is this. I think that when we read the history of Canada we realize that at all times we have had reason to believe implicitly in the fairmindedness, the logic and the intelligence of Canadian voters, and they always realized and accepted the fullness of their responsibilities.

Some members of the opposition this afternoon criticized severely the fact that the plebiscite would cost some money. If I mistake not, I heard almost the same sort of criticism a few months ago about national registration, and only a year ago, before the census was taken, there was a section of the press as well as of the opposition deploring the fact that the government was going to spend money on a census. Everyone now realizes that it is of national service. I do not wish to assume the role of prophet, but I suggest that when the history of this particular episode which we are now discussing comes to be written, the general feeling will be that the government acted rightly in asking the people to pronounce upon this important question.

I have not time to go over the achievements of Canada in this war. Any Canadian who wishes to get the facts can find them not only in the speech delivered by the Prime Minister at the beginning of the session, but in the press of the country. The Canadian achievement has been little short of miraculous. I am the last man to suggest that everything has been done exactly as it should have been done, or that we have done all that we could possibly have done. But we have learned a good deal from the last war; we are learning in this war too, and I have no doubt whatever that our activities will be greater as we go on.

Some of our colleagues on the other side seem to make light of the promise with regard to conscription that was given to the Canadian people in the election of 1940. In my constituency, which was typical of 244 others, conscription was not an issue, for the simple reason that I as Liberal candidate, my opponent Mr. Crumb, the Conservative, and Mr. Teeple, the Labour candidate, were all in agreement, and decidedly so, that conscription of man-power for service overseas should not be implemented in this parliament. We have to render an account of our stewardship on that question, and our position in this regard has not changed since 1940. I believe that our young men would always answer to the call of duty voluntarily wherever their services would be required.

Let me quote what was said by Doctor Manion, who became leader of the Conservative party in the last election, on the floor of the House of Commons on March 30, 1939, as reported at page 2440:

> In the last war the conscription of men to go to the front caused violent racial antagonisms, much disharmony, bitterness and misunderstanding—conditions from which as yet we have not wholly recovered; and on top of that I believe I am expressing the opinion of authorities when I say that it was of no real military value so far as the empire was concerned.

That statement was repeated on the floor of the house. Doctor Manion stated that as far as he could ascertain, only 10,000 men at the most got into the fighting line. He went on to say:

The policy that I suggest is the one which I gave three days ago in an interview: First, that there should be no conscription of Canadians to serve outside the borders of Canada; second, that we should have full cooperation with the British empire short of the conscription of men to serve outside our borders.

Of this I never heard any contradiction from the Conservative party. That was prior to an election. Perhaps there was some personal reason for Doctor Manion making such a statement. But we had an election during 1940, and in the city of Quebec during the campaign Doctor Manion, addressing a very large meeting, faced a large banner on which was written:

I am absolutely opposed to conscription.

These are the words of Doctor Manion concerning that great issue on that occasion:

I stated on March 30, 1939, just about a year ago, in the House of Commons, that I was opposed to conscription because of its failure in the last war—

Mark you, "failure" is the word he used.

—and because it had stirred up misunderstanding and strife in our country when the duty of our public men is to hold this country together rather than to break it up. I have not waited until I came to the province of Quebec to make this statement. I made it a month ago at Brockville in the opening speech of my campaign.

When I read the report of that meeting, the newspapers were all in agreement that it was a wonderful omen of Conservative victory. He continued:

I have made it more than twenty times since then in almost every speech which I have delivered as far west as Victoria, B.C. Thus I have set forth my attitude in five provinces of Canada before coming to Quebec, and I state here again to-night that I am against conscription, and that a national government such as I propose will not put in conscription.

These are words for which hon. members have to take some responsibility. It was words of their leader that they all accepted. I am taking some responsibility myself because I stated then and I state now that I was against conscription in the election of 1940, and no matter how much white-washing you try to do, the Conservative party and other parties without exception appealed to the Canadian voters on that basis in 1940.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The Conservatives will still be muddled.

Mr. BRADETTE: Well, I am no judge of muddling. During that campaign—and I do not say it was done purely for political purposes, but during this time of crisis we must start our discussions on an even keel—I remember that the late hon. member for Parkdale, Mr. David Spence, for whom everyone had such a high regard on account of his sincerity and integrity, when the Conservative party said they were going to burn their bridges behind them and run as a national government party, stated he was going to remain a Conservative, but they overruled him. They ran as a National Government party and were defeated.

On February 24 last in this house the then Minister of Justice, the late lamented Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, asked the sitting members of the Conservative party whether they were adherents of the National Government party, and every one of them most definitely answered "No." At the present time they have a leader in the house, and I know his modesty will not be offended when I say he is a real Canadian and a real statesman. But if Mr. Meighen is elected in York South next Monday, what kind of following will he have? Because at the present time he is running as a National Government man, something that was absolutely repulsive to the Canadian electorate in the spring of 1940, and denied by the present sitting members.

I repeat that if we go at it in the proper way we could get by the voluntary system all the young men required for service overseas. In saying that, I am thinking not only of the whole of Canada but of my own constituency as well which has responded magnificently. We may have to put more glamour into the militia; we must improve our approach; but if proper methods are used, they can get the men that are needed. We know that at present great numbers of young Canadians want to get into the Royal Canadian Air Force. If it were possible for Canada and for the United States at the present time as well as Great Britain to send 10,000 young flyers with the proper equipment to Singapore, that great outpost of civilization and of British power could be saved.

But I will go further—and I do not want to be misquoted; it seems it is always possible during a time of passion for certain newspapers to misquote everyone. During a recruiting campaign in my own constituency last fall I made it a point in speaking with the officers of that recruiting convoy to tell them that the onus and the responsibility rested primarily on their shoulders; that so far I was satisfied that the response had been not only spontaneous but unanimous and very loyal, but that the day might come when more sacrifice would have to be made and that if many did not answer the call of national need for the defence of civilization and Christianity, then the question would be left for themselves to answer; there could be no avoiding of responsibilities.

I want to say a few words about the new leader of the Conservative party. I believe I can do no better than give the charter that has been given to him by his own party by quoting from an article in Saturday Night of November 22, 1941, by the well-known editor of that paper, Mr. B. K. Sandwell, who is well posted on our Canadian life and affairs. This is what he has to say about the new leadership:

> The terms of Mr. Meighen's acceptance of the Conservative leadership have revealed in a very clear light the nature of the strategy upon which the authors of the Meighen movement are relying, and which goes considerably further than was at first apparent. It is essentially a repetition of the strategy of 1917, and its design is to split off a sufficient fraction of the normal Liberal strength (first among the leaders of the party and members sitting in parliament, and then among the rank-and-file voters), partly by considerations relating to the vigour of the war effort, and partly by considerations relating to the country's railway problem, to ensure a popular vote against that party as soon as an election can be forced.

Those people who are against the plebiscite know well that their leader at the present time would be in favour of splitting this parliament to have a general election. Would they tell me that a general election would cost less than the plebiscite? I want them to be fair when they discuss such an important question, and tell the whole story.

This article continues:

> The possibility of such an achievement, negligible in times of peace, becomes considerably greater in time of war when the dependence of the party on its solid Quebec support compels it to courses which many of its English-speaking members find it difficult to tolerate.

And again, further definition of that new charter of the great Conservative party:

> One of these was the long-standing disagreement between the Liberals and Sir Clifford Sifton, which dated back to the establishment of separate schools in the newly constituted prairie provinces. But the overwhelming advantage which practically guaranteed the ability of the conscriptionists to win the election, and therefore made it easy for the dissident Liberals to come over to their camp, was the fact that they were already in control of the government and could manipulate the franchise as they wished. The War Times Election Act, of which Mr. Meighen was the author, conferred the franchise upon women relatives of members of the armed forces—

That was fine; that was the only redeeming feature of the whole thing, the only act that was not almost a criminal act.

> —withdrew it from a considerable number of naturalized aliens, and authorized the chief returning officer—

I want parliament and this country to note this; I want those who were not old enough to vote in 1917 to listen to this:

> —and authorized the chief returning officer to distribute the soldiers' vote among the constituencies at his own discretion. With these instruments at the government's disposal the result, even with a solid Quebec against it, was not in great doubt.

And they expect the Canadian people will fall for that again, as they fell for it in 1917. Once is enough. Some returned men told me personally that when they were in England they did not know their votes were going to be pooled; they did not know a reservoir was to be created, to be distributed at the whim of the chief returning officer, in any way that would suit the orders which he would receive. In my section of the country we do not want a repetition of that horrible thing, which occurred in the infamous election of 1917. During that election the fine farmers and citizens of the parishes of Moonbeam and Fauquier were entirely deprived of the right to vote. These parishes were fully nine miles apart, but had no road connection except the Canadian National right of way. The voters in Fauquier were told that they had to go to Moonbeam to vote; those in Moonbeam were told they had to go to Fauquier, and most of them spent all day walking back and forth, without being allowed to vote. In Porquis Junction there were twelve Liberal votes cast. Men wearing the uniform of the constabulary took those twelve votes and tore them up, so they were never counted. And they called that democracy. While the country was fighting to destroy the principles of autocracy, we were suffering from the worst kind of autocracy this country ever experienced; trying to destroy the principle of free, universal suffrage; and as far as I am concerned, it will never be repeated. A good friend of mine, Eddie Lapierre, was elected in my constituency—it was my constituency at that time, taking in the two Cochranes and Nipissing—by over 1,200, by his own duly qualified electors. But after votes had been taken from that reservoir of soldier votes, he found himself defeated by forty. These are things we must remember at this time. I know no Conservative sitting in this House of Commons would be a party to any such unjust, unfair practices during the present crisis; however, this is the charter, drawn up by a man who is supposed to know, and appearing in a national newspaper read in every section of this country.

I should now like to say a word about the total-war committee. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) who said this afternoon that among the two hundred people present at that meeting were some fine gentlemen and fine ladies. But I could also tell the hon. member that many of those people went to that meeting without knowing why they had been called. In some cases—and this was told to me personally—they thought they were going to a meeting to promote the next war loan. Many of them did not even vote on the question; they remained in their seats, because they did not want to have anything to do with it. To me it smacks very much of Canada's wonder boy, who started that idiotic leadership movement which was still-born a few years ago, the young man who was going to run roughshod over every parliamentarian, making us all appear to be crooks and so on, and who eventually would become prime minister of this country. I have no fear of that last eventuality ever coming to pass.

I have tabulated each of these full-page total-war committee advertisements that I received from my constituents; and instead of these fine men and women of that committee spending large sums of money in a foolish effort to poison the minds of our electors in this province of Ontario, I think they should have found it possible to insert full-page advertisements in all the newspapers of Ontario in an endeavour to put over the new war loan, which is to be issued during the course of this month. In doing so, they would have been following some wonderful examples. For instance, I have in my hand a full-page advertisement appearing in that fine magazine Canadian Business, entitled "I Am Resolved." Resolved to do what?

I am resolved to be cheerful and uncomplaining at all times, sympathetic to those who work beside me, and to those in authority over me.

That is a much better principle than any enunciated by the total-war committee. Not long ago some ladies of the town of Timmins called me up and said they wanted to see me. I asked what it was about, and they said they wanted to start a total-war committee. I said, "I do not want one. I am converted to that principle and have been converted to it ever since the war started. Every citizen of this country is in favour of it." Then I added, "You must have some other work you can do, and that is helping the new war loan." Then this advertisement goes on to tell the Canadian people some other things they may do:

I am resolved to be tolerant of the shortcomings of others, realizing that to make an effort is commendable, to attempt nothing is deadly.

I am resolved gladly to do without some of those things I am accustomed to enjoy, for it is good to deny oneself—even to suffer in a noble cause.

I am resolved that if I am fitted to serve my country best in the fighting forces, I will take my place proudly beside my comrades.

I am resolved to strive with all my power, to press on in my daily task to the limit of my endurance. It may be that my modest effort will tip the scale, and set a great shout of deliverance echoing 'round the world.

In this January number appear similar advertisements sponsored by the Northern Electric Company, Limited; Canadian Industries, Limited; British American Bank Note Company, Limited; Howard Smith Paper Mills Limited; Rapid Grip and Batten, Limited, and others; and on several occasions I have also received some wonderfully elevating, loyal Canadian and British literature from The Universal Life Assurance and Annuity Company of Winnipeg. I take this opportunity of thanking these people, and many others, that slip my mind at the moment, for their constructive work. I know that at least some of them are not political supporters of the present government, but they realize the duty of the moment.

We have a fine newspaper service in my constituency. We receive the Toronto morning papers as soon as they are available in Toronto itself; we know more about Toronto than they know about our section of the country. More than that, in my constituency I have one daily paper, one bi-weekly paper, and two weekly papers. In all these newspapers these full-page advertisements by the total-war committee appeared; and all told, I received forty-three letters as a result. This was in a constituency with a population of over eighty thousand, and these letters would represent about 170 people. I acknowledged each of these letters, thanking the writer for the interest he was taking in our national affairs, in most instances making no comment. Neither did I make any comment when a mining engineer by the name of Stevenson took it upon himself to send an open telegram abusing the Prime Minister of this country. I do not intend to reply to that sort of abuse, because it is un-Canadian, it is unpatriotic. In our section of the country one man, whether he is a mucker working in the entrails of the earth, a farmer or a lumberman, is just as loyal as the next man. We know that this government is not perfect; but we also know that no matter what government is in power, we shall give it the same loyal support we gave the government of this country during the first great war.

I said the letters I received in response to these advertisments represented a total of about 170 people. Hon. members will not be surprised, I hope, to learn that without propaganda of any sort I received communications from more than three hundred people during that period of time, telling me they were absolutely against conscription; because the only thing they could draw from that advertisement was that the answer to all our problems in connection with the war lay in manpower only. It is an important one, but there are also others. To me that is one very important subject, but there are other very important subjects as well. Canadians have cheerfully accepted many curtailments, and if they should be called upon to make further sacrifices, I know they will cheerfully do so. So far, casualties have been relatively low, but I resent the statement made both in parliament and outside parliament that in order for some to realize that we are in a war, we should have some bombing from the air. Perhaps for some people that might have a salutary effect; but no one who has seen or read or heard of what has happened in Europe, more particularly in valorous old England, is without fear in his heart and his eyes. We know what is going on. I say in the name of my own people that no matter what the government may ask of us, be it bacon rationing, sugar rationing or egg rationing, we shall be willing to cooperate.

Mr. JACKMAN: Why not?

Mr. BRADETTE: Why not? Does the hon. member put the question?

Mr. JACKMAN: The hon. member speaks of sacrifices, but those are not sacrifices.

Mr. BRADETTE: I said that we are willing to do whatever we are asked to do. I do not want to be misquoted. I do not want the spirit of misrepresentation trying to speak here to-night. I am speaking with all sincerity. I never interrupt the hon. member when he is speaking, and I think I should have the same treatment from him. Last fall I listened to a broadcast by Mr. Donald Gordon of the price-ceiling board. I do not have the pleasure of knowing that gentleman, but anyone listening to him would never doubt his sincerity. I should like to quote the last two paragraphs of the broadcast he gave when the price-ceiling policy was started. They are:

> All of these probable hardships and mistakes and difficulties I fully realize and freely admit. I wish you to realize them too, because ten days from now, on Monday the 1st of December, you are going into a battle. You, wherever you may live, old or young, rich or poor, man or woman, are a soldier in this army. . . The board of which I am chairman is only the army headquarters. You are going to be the soldiers on the firing line and you must meet and conquer doubts, fears, uncertainties, rumours, and alarms. You must keep always before you the one clear objective—prices must not rise; the price ceiling must be held; inflation must be beaten.
> Forget the reasons why this policy will not work. Remember only that it must work, for there is no alternative except disaster.
> This is your part in the war. In every home in Canada there is now a fighting part to play. I believe you can and will save yourselves and your country in this crisis. I predict that the historian of a future day will record that when this call to duty came to you, you responded, not only with your loyalty but also with intelligence, imagination, and resource.

All Canadians should do whatever they possibly can to prevent inflation. We do not want inflation similar to what we had in 1917 and which brought ruin to every section of the country. If inflation should occur, then the help we are giving so generously and cheerfully to England will be absolutely meaningless, because our Canadian money will have practically no value whatever.

I should like to mention two or three matters with reference to my own section of the country. First of all I want to say that I am an upholder of the law; I believe in the principle of British and Canadian justice that when a man commits a crime, no matter who he may be, he should be brought before the courts. There are hundreds of thousands of young Canadians in training camps all over this country. Some of those from my section of the country are in camps located over a thousand miles from their homes. These boys sometimes go out on larks and do things not absolutely according to Hoyle. I hope it will be possible to have no publicity given to these pranks. I want to be clear on this. If a criminal act is committed, such as manslaughter, highway robbery or anything of that kind, or wilful damage to property, then I want the law applied. However, many boys from the district of Cochrane are in camps at Ottawa, Camp Borden, Toronto and so on, and they sometimes get into a little trouble. The first thing we know this is spread all over the press in our section of the country. This is not the right kind of publicity to give to these boys. It is bad, not only for these young men but for their fathers and mothers living at home. They worry about this situation. Perhaps it would be possible to have these cases tried by a military court, at least they should be dealt with the same as military discipline is dealt with, and no publicity given to them.

I have one request to make. Like all members of parliament, I have always followed explicitly the lead that was given to us in the fall of 1939, that no political influence would have any bearing upon military matters. I believe, however, it is my duty to mention some anomalies that exist. The divisional registrar for our section of the country is a Mr. R. A. Irwin, located in Toronto. I am told, and I believe that this gentleman is most competent, but the fact that he resides in Toronto makes it necessary for young men in my section of the country who want to lodge appeals to go a distance of 880 miles. These young men want to do their duty, but there are instances where it is felt that an extension of time should be given. Because of the distance they must travel, many of these men do not get the extension and through correspondence the real situation cannot be known. I maintain that our rural, mining, industrial and pioneering population should have the same right of being heard before a divisional registrar as people living in any other section of the country. Again I want to say that I have nothing against this registrar, but I believe that some injustice is being done to those living in my section of the country.

During the debate I have listened attentively to such hon. members as the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and other hon. members who live on the Atlantic coast. I realize that all these hon. members were most sincere in what they said about the defence of the coasts of Canada. My section of the country is nationally and geographically the centre of Canada. Hudson bay and James bay cut this country almost in twain. I do not believe I am divulging any secret when I say that there are some defence works in the Bering strait. I am not going to state here what I stated a few months ago when some officers—these were not Canadian or British but allied officers—came to my section of the country and said that conditions there were not suitable for an air training school. I think that such judgments should be given by members of our own administration. Such a school should be possible in our section.

I should like to say a few words about criticism. We all maintain, and no doubt quite rightly, that criticism is absolutely necessary in a democracy under our parliamentary system. I believe it is, as long as it is constructive and not destructive. Certain sections of the press, however, seem to be deliberately trying to poison the minds of our Canadian people in connection with our war effort. They are not at all fair to our government. I should like to quote briefly what Mr. Churchill said during a discussion last July. I quote:

> I should like to give some facts and figures to show how the improved organization and the smoother running of our machines has overcome adverse currents.
> This is rather easy money for critics who can oil a two-day debate with disparaging charges against our war effort.
> Over-ardent or disaffected sections of the press can take it up and the whole give cry to a dismal cacophonous chorus of stinking fish all around the world.

Those are the things we have to fight against. I have in my hand what in my opinion is one of the most vicious, unfair and dastardly articles ever written by a newspaper. I am referring to the Toronto Globe and Mail of January 31, 1942. The heading of the article is, "A disgrace to parliament." This article has reference to a speech delivered by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), and I believe he will highly resent this sort of editorial against our parliamentary system. I quote:

> Shortly after he began his address, however, Prime Minister King motioned to his leading Quebec lieutenant—

Was there ever anything so sinister? Trying to intimate that the Prime Minister motioned deliberately to his leader from the province of Quebec to do an unfair act to my hon. friend. The article continues:

> —and they showed their contempt for parliamentary procedure by walking out.

At the present moment there are only about half a dozen young men in the press gallery, but I would be the last one among the members of parliament here present to think for one moment that those who are absent are not carrying on their duties in their offices. No one will think of any other motive. It has never come to the mind of any member of parliament to doubt for one moment that the members of the press gallery, as well as the members of parliament, have duties to perform both inside and outside parliament. I continue:

> Half the Liberal members present took the cue and followed. Among those remaining the small fry—

We are thankful for that expression.

> —got so busy with conversation and heckling. . . .

I took the trouble to look up the record of the speech made by the hon. member for Parkdale, and I found that there was not one single bit of heckling from this side or any other part of the house.

There were several questions asked by the ministers, and I know the hon. member for Parkdale gladly answered them. The report in the Globe and Mail goes on to say:

Among those remaining the small fry got so busy with conversation and heckling that the Speaker had to call for order more than once. It is plain that what bothers these worshippers of party first is that Colonel Bruce has been so constructive in his suggestions that he has called the turn repeatedly and accurately on indifference and neglect.

We all agree with that. It goes on:

Not one of those who abused him has anything comparable to show for the time spent keeping the benches of the house warm. It would be difficult for them to indicate that they have done more than serve as rubber stamps.

The article winds up by saying:

This does not detract from the high character of the speech, a quality members of parliament must have learned to look for when the Toronto-Parkdale member gets on his feet. So they walk out lest they hear it, or heckle him in the hope he may falter. It is about as cheap a display of petty politics as could be found in the worst governed country.

If ever democracy is in danger, it is from attacks by that kind of article, the unfairness of which seeks to undermine and poison the mentality. I have been in this house for several years; I have always greatly enjoyed my associations with all the parliamentarians, and I know that I am voicing the sentiments of every member listening to me when I say that it would not occur to any of them to think a member was not true to his duty because upon some occasion he was not present in the house. A member is often called upon to leave the chamber to do something for his country or his constituency, something strictly pertaining to his own office, to attend to committee and departmental work, and that applies with all the greater force to the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet.

I took it upon myself, following this report, to find out what had actually occurred, and the Prime Minister will forgive me for mentioning that when he left the chamber he had an interview with the Governor General, Lord Athlone. I can assure the Globe and Mail that there was no sinister motive in the actions of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), a great Canadian and a fine parliamentarian. Hon. gentlemen opposite are frequently telling us to be easy on Toronto. I know a lot of Toronto people, and ninety-nine and one-half per cent of them are fine, but this kind of journalism from Toronto is a shame to that city and to the rest of Canada.

There is another matter I want to mention, but I do not want to trespass on the time of the house.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I hope the Liberals from Alberta will take a lesson from what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. BRADETTE: To sum up my conclusions, Mr. Speaker, this conflict has now been raging for nearly two years and a half. It has developed into the most gigantic war conflagration that the world has ever witnessed, and nearly all the nations are embraced in its deadly grip.

I ask myself if at the present time we are not witnessing in our national and individual lives, some signs of lassitude, jagged nerves and destructive impatience. We must absolutely shake ourselves out of those unhealthy reactions, because a lot of effort and energy wasted on biased and destructive criticism could be much better employed in helping in the accentuation of our war activities and the surmounting of the problems emanating from them.

At a critical time like this no one should question the motives and sincerity of his fellow-Canadians. Let us put, in all our actions, the best that there is in us, so that the things we cherish so much will be safeguarded.

We have differences, we shall likely always have some, and the right to express and discuss them is one of the main pillars of democracy, but surely if we realize the fullness of our duty, we shall never cultivate in our minds the destructive virus of questioning our neighbours' loyalty and profound attachment and love for Canada and the British empire.

To come victorious out of this conflict all the lovers of democracy will be required to unify their forces, and then, when the hour of victory strikes, we shall have a strong and unified nation that will be in a position to face the problems of our country and also of the post-war world.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with much interest to the speech which has been made by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). He has told us that he favours the plebiscite which his government proposes to take, but he has not told us during the course of his long speech whether or not, if the plebiscite is taken and the government is relieved from the promises or pledges which it formerly made, he is in favour of national selective service. He has not told us whether or not he is in favour of the conscription of our man-power for service overseas in support of our forces over there. If I were to ask him that question to-night he might find it a little embarrassing. Perhaps he would not care to tell us this evening whether or not he favours national compulsory selective service in this country to-day.

I have observed, Mr. Speaker, since I entered this house that it is the usual custom of members who take part in the debate on the speech from the throne to congratulate first the mover and the seconder of the address upon the excellent speeches they made.

I do not wish to appear unappreciative or impolite, but it is my intention this evening to depart from that practice and in the first place to extend my congratulations and sincere thanks to the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) for the speech he made in this house last Tuesday afternoon.

Not only was that speech well constructed and well delivered, but it exhibited a courage, an intellectual honesty, a freedom from partisanship and a clearness of understanding that have not since I have been a member been equalled by any other speech to which I have listened.

No doubt that speech was not well received in all quarters, but I believe, sir, that it was acclaimed by the country, and if the hon. member for Lambton West received black looks from some he can find consolation if he needs it, although I doubt if he needs it, from part of a speech which was made on the same day in the British House of Commons by the Prime Minister of Great Britain, who said:

> I have frequently voted against governments which I have been elected to support, and looking back on it I sometimes felt very glad I did. Everyone in these rough times must do what he considers his duty.

It requires courage, Mr. Speaker, and visceral valour to place duty ahead of party but the hon. member for Lambton West has shown us that he possesses both these manly qualities.

A gentleman who once occupied a very prominent place in the press gallery of this house, not a very long time ago wrote a book in which he expressed the opinion that Canadian politicians, with few exceptions, put party politics first and other considerations nowhere. The hon. member for Lambton West has proved that he is one of the few exceptions.

I concur in almost everything he said. I wish I could have said it as well.

This plebiscite means delay; it means heartburning; it means bitterness.

It means also unjustifiable expense.

And when it is all over and the government is released from its pledge, the issue, as he says, still must be faced; and the bogy of national unity will again rear its ugly head.

In fact it has already commenced to do so.

I was particularly impressed with that portion of his speech in which he said:

> Much has been and will be said of broken pledges. . . .
> Does the hon. member forget that in the mother of all parliaments, Westminster, on April 27, 1939, while the nation was still at peace, and only four weeks after the then Prime Minister, Mr. Chamberlain, had renewed a pledge made by his predecessor, Mr. Baldwin, that compulsory military service would not be adopted, Mr. Chamberlain introduced a motion in these words:
> "This house approves the proposal of his majesty's government to introduce as soon as possible a system of compulsory military training as announced on the 26th of April."
> In the debate which followed the introduction of that motion, the prevailing opinion was the same as it should be here in Canada: The facts are there and we must face them as they exist to-day. Let me suggest to the Prime Minister that whatever his declaration may have been, as our first minister in this hour of peril he is bound to act in accordance with what he believes is required for the national safety. That is the supreme pledge which he made, though perhaps not in words, when he assumed the high office which he now holds. What of the solemn pledge given by President Roosevelt during his last election campaign, to the effect that the forces of the United States would not be sent overseas? Within one month of the declaration of war we find the president telling congress and the nation:
> "We cannot wage this war in a defensive spirit. As our power and our resources are fully mobilized, we shall carry the attack against the enemy. American land, air and sea forces will take stations in the British isles—"
> Has there been any outcry in the United States of America against broken pledges?

I might tell the hon. member for Lambton West that I have heard no such outcries, but I have heard in this country a great outcry against the taking of this proposed plebiscite. I have received from my own constituents a number of communications protesting against it. I do not propose to read them into the record to-night, but one of them comes from the surviving members of the 26th battalion, a New Brunswick unit that had a distinguished record in the last war. It expresses strong disapproval of the plan, and states that the expense and time taken are unjustified and the spending of money for this purpose will have a decidedly adverse affect on the forthcoming war loan. With that opinion I am in hearty accord.

When I entered this house, Mr. Speaker, for the first time, a little over two years ago now, I ventured to express the opinion that it was no occasion for us to indulge either in platitudes or recriminations about past achievements or past failures of the government, nor was it a time for us to play party politics, but it was our duty as Canadians to unite and, in our own interests, to do everything that lay in our power to bring this war, in which we had entered as a free nation, and in which our allies had suffered great reverses, to a victorious conclusion.

As time passed, I found no reason to change that opinion. As time passed I became more firmly convinced that party politics should be set aside if we were to make an effective all-out war effort, and that this war should not be carried on under any form of party government, but that it should be carried on under some form of union government which would have the support of all the parties in this house and would be free from petty partisan criticism, which has an adverse effect on our war effort.

As time passed, Mr. Speaker, the German army overran Denmark, Holland, Belgium and France. The British army, after sustaining heavy casualties, was forced to leave Dunkirk without arms or equipment. Italy declared war. France collapsed. The battle of the Atlantic was joined. Japan became a member of the axis. Italy invaded and Germany conquered heroic Greece. The allies were forced to withdraw from Crete. Germany, Italy and Roumania declared war on Russia.

This is a very brief outline of the cavalcade of events which had presented themselves to members of this house before parliament reassembled in November last. It was not a reassuring picture. The situation that we faced as one of a group of nations fighting for our existence and the freedom of mankind afforded no ground for placid satisfaction. The situation demanded strong and courageous leadership. It demanded united action if an all-out effective effort was to be made.

On Wednesday, the fifth day of November last, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) made a report to this house on the work of his department. He had recently returned from England and had not had time to prepare a written address, but he made an excellent statement, and it was apparent to those who listened to him that he was a serious and determined man—two qualities which a minister of national defence should possess in war time. He told us—and to me this was the most important part of his address—that in the previous four months 37,000 men had been required for our army overseas and only 24,000 had been obtained. This meant that there was a shortage of about thirty-five per cent in the numbers required to support our army overseas, and that at a time when there were no battle casualties.

Since then—if I may divert for a moment—our army has suffered heavy casualties at Hong Kong. But the courageous battle put up there by the Royal Rifles and the Winnipeg Grenadier Guards will rank, I believe, with the heroic defence made by the Rifle Brigade at Calais prior to the evacuation of Dunkirk. It was not a defeat, but it was a contribution to ultimate victory. The government was asked to send that force overseas on the 19th day of September last. It decided to do so ten days later, and I want here to-night to congratulate the Minister of National Defence and the government on the fact that they so promptly sent that force overseas when asked to do so by the army command.

A special committee of this house is to be set up at the request of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to inquire into the reasons why untrained men were sent with that force, why those battalions lacked universal carriers, why their mechanical equipment, which means so much in this war, did not reach them in time. This should be done without delay, and if the committee find that there was negligence, complacency, military inefficiency, or lack of proper organization, appropriate action should be taken. But, sir, plans seldom work out perfectly in war time, and the work of this committee can in no way detract from the fact that the government sent that force when it was asked to do so; nor can it becloud the glory of these brave men who unflinchingly went forth and courageously did their duty. The people of this country and the members of this parliament must be firmly resolved that the sacrifice which those men made was not made in vain, and that we shall go on at all costs and all sacrifice until the evil thing which they fought against is destroyed. We cannot let our army that is overseas down. We must keep faith with those who die on foreign fields.

But to return to the report made by the Minister of National Defence on November 5 last; it was apparent from his report that the voluntary system of enlistment for overseas had fallen down, that it was not furnishing the men required. It was apparent that the situation should be reviewed and that a new policy should be adopted if we were to play our part as a nation of free men and women, if we were to hold our heads high in the world and meet total war with a total effort.

I realize that a new policy could not be brought about without courageous leadership, for it meant the breaking down of some political friendships and some old political ties. It meant also that certain old political ideas would have to be abandoned.

While we sat here in November I lived in the hope that something would be done. I hoped that the majority of the members of parliament, irrespective of party and of politics, could get together, forget party prejudices, and solve the problem of man-power for our army overseas.

Whatever hopes I had were dashed to the ground on the afternoon of November 12 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), late in the afternoon, came into the house—there were not many present at the time—and said that the people had decided against conscription at the last election and that, so far as he was concerned, without any consultation with the people on the subject, he did not intend to take the responsibility of supporting any policy of conscription for service overseas.

That statement put an end to any hopes I had that action would be taken when action was needed.

I felt after that statement that I, as a Canadian, could no longer walk with pride among the nations of the world who were fighting for the freedom of mankind.

On my way home after the house adjourned on November 14, I had two experiences that did not raise my spirits. I met in Montreal an officer from the city in which I live, who was stationed at camp Petawawa. He told me that a short time previously a call had come to that camp for a draft of men for overseas service. The officer commanding the camp had about 600 men paraded. He told them of the order; he explained to them the situation; he asked for volunteers, and just nine men volunteered—nine of those men who were in uniform.

The same day in Montreal I met a young man, a connection of mine by marriage. His father was an Englishman, and his mother an American. When war broke out he was sixteen, living in England, and he came with his mother and sister to New York. When he was eighteen he came to Canada to enlist. He was turned down by the air force, enlisted in the army, was stationed at a camp near Montreal, and he expected to go overseas soon. He told me that soon after he arrived at that camp a draft for overseas had marched off. Eighty men had been called for to compose that draft, but eighty men did not leave that camp. If I remember his figures correctly—I did not write them down, but I think I have them approximately—that draft consisted of two English-speaking Canadians, twenty French-speaking Canadians, and thirty Americans. He told me the hut he was in held sixty-four men, and thirty of them were Americans.

Those Americans had joined the Canadian army when their own country was not at war, with the intention of going overseas to take part in the battle of freedom.

What could they have thought of those Canadians in uniform who held back after Canada had declared war and was fighting for her very existence?

And what would they have thought of those Canadian students in Montreal, who the other night, at Premier Godbout's meeting, opposed compulsory selective service, and kept crying, "Canada, Canada only"?

There has been something very wrong in this country in the last twenty or twenty-five years. There has been lack of leadership of the right kind. There has been lack of clear thinking. There has been too much appeasement. There has been too much of the north American complex in some quarters.

But this is no time to rehash these matters. As I have said, I do not think we should indulge in recriminations about the past. I will put on the record no quotations from public men which are better left unsaid at the present time. This is a time when it is our duty to get on with the war and make an all-out war effort.

We adjourned here, as I said, on November 14 last. We reassembled on January 21, not very long ago. But modern war moves fast, and during that period while we were at home Japan treacherously attacked the United States and seriously damaged its navy; Germany and Italy declared war on the United States. Japan invaded Malay, attacked the Philippines, sank two of our capital ships, invaded Borneo, captured Penang, Wake island, Hong Kong, the Celebes, Tarakan, invaded Burma, the Bismarck archipelago and other islands and threatened Australia. The war in the east was going badly, and it is still going badly.

When we came back here we were told in the speech from the throne that this was the time of greatest crisis in the world's history. We were told also that unless the enemy were defeated, the free people of the world, one after the other, would be reduced to a state of bondage.

I find no fault with those statements; I agree with them.

But what did the government propose doing in view of the situation?

It proposed to take a plebiscite! It proposed to ask the people of this country, after a certain amount of time has passed, a question to this effect:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

Does the Prime Minister of this country take that course because of a pledge he has given? Does he take it because he has to be scrupulously consistent in all things? It has been pointed out during this debate that English and American statesmen did not let consistency stop them from taking immediate action when the safety of the state was in danger. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that he ponder the words of one of America's greatest teachers and writers; it was Ralph Waldo Emerson who said that a foolish consistency was the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen, philosophers and divines. And I might say that I once read somewhere that the only completely consistent people are the dead.

The Prime Minister in the statement he made on November 12 last said:

I do not intend to take the responsibility—

There have been other occasions in the past in which he got out of taking responsibility by referring his difficulties to a royal commission or a judicial tribunal. He cannot do that on this occasion, so he proposes to take a plebiscite. I protest against it. I consider it unwise; I consider it dangerous.

I appeal to hon. members, irrespective of party, and particularly to those who served in the last war, and who are willing to serve again, to the members who are in uniform, to the men who have sons overseas and relatives overseas; to the men who want to make an all-out war effort. I appeal to them and ask them if there is no way that we can go to the Prime Minister and ask him to abandon this plebiscite that he proposes taking.

There are a number of reasons why this idea of a plebiscite should be abandoned. The most important one I think is that if it proceeds we run a very grave danger. That danger is this, that it is quite possible it will seriously injure the object that all of us, or almost all of us, have in mind and want to achieve; that is to have Canada make an all-out effective war effort, and support our army overseas. That danger should be avoided. The government should take a firm grip of the situation, tell the people what they have to do and then see that they do it. All that loyal Canadians are asking for in this crisis is leadership.

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): As a member from the city of Winnipeg I think it both natural and appropriate that my first words in this chamber during this session should be a tribute to those fellow townsmen of mine who fought the Canadian fight in the city of Hong Kong. I wish publicly to pay my respects to them and to offer my sympathy to those who wait with anxious hearts to know the fate of those whom we sent there.

I should like to say to the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Power) that I believe anybody in Canada faced with the decision that he had to make would have agreed to send two battalions to Hong Kong and I am quite sure that that decision was a matter of complete agreement on the part of the government and would have been completely agreed to by any hon. member.

While I am on the subject of those men in Hong Kong, I should like to say further that I think it is contemptible that the agony of heart and mind which the loved ones of those men who went to Hong Kong are suffering should have been aggravated to help in a by-election, by what I consider unwarranted assumptions about the inefficiency of at least one of those battalions. However, the matter is being investigated, or will be, and I hope that when the investigation comes, it will not be trial by newspaper as has been the situation in some instances in Canadian political history. I hope that if anyone was culpable in the preparation for sending those men to that far-off battle field, the culpability will be made apparent and suitable punishment meted out, not in a spirit of revenge, but in order that that type of thing, if it happened, shall not happen again to the thousands who will follow them to the battlefields of this war.

I wanted to begin that way rather than in the conventional way of addressing congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, because naturally that expedition and the fate of those men are uppermost in my mind. But I should like to say to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply that I have at least paid them the, for me, unusual compliment of having read their speeches, as I was not in the chamber to hear them.

It is, however, not of the glory of the dead, or of the accomplishments of the living that I wish to speak for a few minutes to-night, but rather of the Canadian soldiers, and not so much of what we can rightly expect from them, but of what they in my opinion have a right to expect from us. I have a special contempt for the cheap, shoddy device of the demagogue, the type of parish-pump politics by means of which any man in parliament, or in a newspaper, or anywhere else attempts to further his own ambitions or those of his party, or to give expression to his own malice, in the name of service men.

I have some recollections of the last war. As a youngster of nineteen or twenty I remember those all too infrequent occasions when we got hold of newspapers from Canada and read some of the profound remarks of the barber-shop strategists; I remember something of what we thought and felt. I am sorry to say that not only in some newspapers, but also in places where they should know better, we still encounter some of that same kind of platitudinous tripe. I think I speak for all the nearly a quarter of a million, perhaps more—we do not give figures—of Canadian-born soldiers who are on active service in this war when I say they share the feeling of distaste which I experience when I consider the antics of certain people in Canada who I think are best described as "Little Canadians." I refer to those belittlers of Canada and Canada's contribution to the war effort. People of this kind thrived and multiplied during the dirt and despair of the depression; and with the outbreak of war they multiplied again. They see only the efforts of someone far away and turn a jaundiced eye, if they look at all, toward the miracles of accomplishment that have taken place in their own country.

I am not one of those who think we need fear to boast a little about what we as Canadians have accomplished. If I have any fear at all, it is only that some of us, looking at those accomplishments, may fall into the equally dangerous and perhaps more natural folly of being too easily satisfied. Neither am I one of those who think the government did it all, even though I would include in that the whole House of Commons. I realize, as I think it is realized by every thinking person in Canada and everyone outside Canada who knows of our effort, that what has been done could not have been accomplished without a high degree of cooperation between the ordinary man and woman on the street and the government. It would have been simply impossible; and when we brag a little, as I think we might, we should remember that. It is the work of all Canadians. And if, instead of making a cult of criticism, we would look about us once in a while and see how we can help our general effort, then magnificent as it has been, that effort might be made much greater yet.

If I might make a personal reference, Mr. Speaker, I have worn his majesty's uniform for nearly five years. I do not profess to be a soldier. I do not know that my personal loyalty has been attacked, nor would I stoop to defend it if it were. What I have to say is of my own determination, the result of my own experience and thought. I begin by saying that in my considered opinion most of the organized—and I ask the house to note that word "organized"—effort for the adoption of the slogan "selective service" is pure humbug. I do not question the sincerity of thousands of persons who have been caught by the unanswerable reasonableness of that slogan. To them it has become a sort of magic formula, and many of them have the thought that without that formula being brought into operation, Canada cannot measure up to that other slogan. "an all-out effort."

I do not pay very much attention to the clamour of some public men, or to the propaganda of a subsidized press. I am of opinion that much of the effort behind this slogan of selective service is either an insincere political effort or a sort of half-hearted sabotage, not of Canada's war effort but of those who are attempting to administer that war effort in these trying times. The promoters of the current political ramp—because we are all well aware that this is just what is in the process of organization to-day—are all much too well informed to believe that this catch-phrase can accomplish those things which are promised for it. They know as well as any member of this house knows, and better than most, that a big army policy for Canada, for instance, is pure lunacy; but they make an emotional appeal in order to cloak their real motive, which is to tear down a government which believes, and practises the belief, that a generation which makes war should pay for it.

There are thousands of men in this country who fought during some part of the last war and who came home to help pay for it. They have made a magnificent contribution in helping pay for it. Perhaps at times they have been a bit cynical about it, but during troublesome times in every part of the country they have been a sort of safe and sane centre, a hard core of realism and reality. They have paid generously and generally willingly, but many of them have also determined that as far as is humanly possible they will go along with the policies of the present administration to the end that the legacy of debt and depression may be at least less than it was after the last war.

Then in times like these we hear a great deal about equality of sacrifice. I do not propose to say a great deal about that, but once or twice before in this house I have made the remark that the expression has no reality.

War is not cricket or baseball; it is not a sporting event, or anything of that kind. War is the brutal business of destruction on the one hand and self-preservation on the other. The only possible sort of equality of sacrifice in a situation like this is when every man and woman in the country is voluntarily giving everything he or she has to give. And because that definition does not admit of realization is no reason why we as Canadians should not strive toward that goal. There is no reason why in our individual and governmental enterprise we should not do what we can to level the burden. War is not a question of taking what one can get with the least possible sacrifice. It is a question of taking what one needs wherever he can get it, and not paying for it unless he has to. That is the spirit of it; that is the ruthless basis of war. It is extermination or survival; and if that was perhaps only figuratively true in other wars, most of us should be convinced by now that it is literally true in this one.

I said that this ideal was perhaps not capable of realization, because the rich young man of biblical times who turned sadly away, has too many descendants in this modern, imperfect world. The poorest and most unhappy of his descendants are not blessed with worldly goods, as he was, but are poor. But, though poor in worldly goods, unfortunately their greatest poverty is of the spirit; and any conception of an all-out sacrifice, about which we talk so glibly and of which the editorial writers and even some of our newsmen speak with such facility, is simply meaningless, because we have not reached the point where mankind is equal to it. If we are realists, selective service boils down to conscription for overseas service. I know that many earnest, well-meaning people will disagree with that statement. They will argue that selective service means taking the right man and putting him in the right place, eliminating all square pegs in round holes. We may not have another five or seven years of war to accomplish that, and in the meantime the war is catching up with us.

I should like to make one or two personal statements with respect to the policies enunciated in the speech from the throne and the methods undertaken by the government to carry them out. First I want to say that as a member of this house, as a soldier with some experience in the last war, as one who was born in this country of purely British descent, I am perhaps one of the most reluctant conscriptionists. Further, should I be convinced, or when I am convinced—I admit freely that I foresee the probability, or at least the possibility of that time coming—I would take the last son from the last widow in Canada and send him away if I were convinced that, by doing that, Canada would be making her greatest contribution to the winning of this war.

I do not believe that there are many people in this country who disagree with what I have just announced should be done in that circumstance. There is an honest difference of opinion as to the desirability of conscription now. I am prepared to give to those who believe that there is an all-out urgency for conscription for overseas service now—that is what I am talking about—the right to their opinion, but at the moment I stand unconvinced. If we were all agreed that we did not need conscription now, it might happen that within forty-eight hours we would be shown that we were wrong. If we have learned nothing else as a result of the progress of this war, we should have learned that there is no finality of decision with respect to how we should proceed. Only amateur historians or those who have been called barber shop tacticians have the effrontery to assume any finality for their plans in a conflict which is world-wide and ever shifting.

I should like to say to the members of the cabinet here to-night that the government should give us an inventory and a plan of our man-power, and it should be given to us now. It must be elastic, but it could be given within reasonable limits. They must know our resources, and it is only when we know what our potential objectives are with respect to production, that we can measure the success or the failure of the methods which we are presently employing. As far as I am concerned, my only assets are a good name and the respect of my fellow men. In my election of 1940, either through what I said myself or what was said on my behalf, I believe that conscription was not a factor.

If I agreed, which I do not, that to-morrow, or within a matter of days or hours or short weeks, conscription was essential and that had been the decision of the government, speaking for myself my conscience would be perfectly clear in supporting the government in that decision. But, because my leader elects to trust those who have trusted him so often, I shall not help to throw him to the political jackals, if you like, who thirst for his political blood. I think I speak fairly when I say that my constituents would favour conscription to win the war, and I believe I am correct when I say that many of them favour it now.

Speaking in this place to which they have sent me, I have this to say to them: Make your support of the plebiscite overwhelming. In the hour when my judgment and conscience says that we must change any policy so far as I am concerned no sense of loyalty to person or party will deter me from what I conceive to be my duty. I say to them that such a majority as I have requested from them, and from all Canadians, will clear the way for any eventuality.

Because war is a function of government it does not necessarily follow that members of parliament are military strategists. One of the first and most important things which we who attempt to give some guidance to the new recruit coming into our army have to do is to teach him to think as a soldier. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the difference in thinking between the man who is a good citizen as a civilian and the man who is a good soldier is as wide as the poles. The measure of our success and of the usefulness of the recruit who comes into the service is very often the measure of the degree to which we succeed in teaching him to think as a soldier. I think some of us have forgotten that there is a difference between the thinking which goes with military effectiveness, with campaign effectiveness and that which goes with civilian effectiveness.

Some of these military strategists have spoken to us of sending a division to Australia. I should like to address a few questions to those who hold that view. Have they ever determined how many ships it would take to transport one division of men and their equipment, to say nothing of how long that tonnage would be tied up in transit? I should like to ask them, where are the ships to take them, and where are the ships to convoy them? Then I would ask them: Have you discovered for yourselves where the equipment is? Then I think we might add one more question: Who has asked for the men?

Remember France, Greece, Crete, Libya, Hong Kong and now Singapore. I think in each and every case the reverses which our forces have suffered have been due not so much to lack of man-power as to lack of an aeroplane roof over their heads and lack of communications. I wonder how long Australia would be worried about a Japanese invasion by sea if she had at her disposal a really adequate air force. I wonder how many strait of Macassar battles the Japanese invading forces could stand up to if that was their daily dish. I wonder what Australian cities would be bombed, even from aircraft carriers of the Japanese fleet, if Australia had the formidable air support which she will need, and which, please God, she will have before this battle is over. I wonder when people with the best intentions in the world will stop expecting the miracle of David and Goliath to be reenacted on every fresh front. I wonder when we are going to stop asking our brave and courageous soldiers to step into the breach with only their courage and rifles and small automatic arms and stem the mechanized might of our enemies who have a preponderance of attacking air force.

I doubt the wisdom of any considerable expansion in the Canadian overseas army. In this war of wide sweeps and deep objectives, with failures of communication and mechanical failures and casualties, such as we have seen in Hong Kong, one hundred per cent losses are not an impossibility. I wish I could think that they are not even a probability.

I urge that the government decide now whether our young men between the ages of nineteen and twenty-nine, which is the age when they are most valuable, shall serve Canada in the armed forces of Canada or whether they can make a greater contribution to the war effort of our allies and ourselves in the air. I do not know the answer, but if the government has not determined it, I do urge that they determine it and then let us know what their policies are. Having decided in which branch our young men shall serve, we should then determine what strength of forces we can raise and equip; and having determined that, I would expend every ounce of Canadian energy to see that those men were given the chance that brave men deserve in the way of providing them with proper equipment and adequate reinforcements so that they can meet on equal terms men, no matter whether they be lesser men than we are, who, if they are better equipped than our forces, will present difficulties which will make our losses out of all proportion to what they should be. Some day somebody in this country will have to do a little simple arithmetic. Why not now? Let us know the objective with respect to our military development and what our maximum effort can be. That can easily be determined if one takes out of this question all the sentiment and emotional drivel with which it is wrapped up, and look instead at the vital statistics. Then tell us what the answer is in terms of war effort with respect to our army, air force, and navy, and with respect to our industrial effort and the production of food. These facts are not unobtainable. Just a little simple arithmetic would give us all a better idea of where we are going than we have now. When this is determined I am prepared to support a policy which will stop at nothing to see that these men have everything that is necessary to achieve our share of victory with honour. But I want to know where I am going. I am not willing to trust people who have no authority for their super-patriotism and super-efficiency as statisticians but their own testimony. I repeat again, we should take stock of our man-power and make that inventory public.

I should like to amplify a remark I made when interrupting the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) the other day. I do not conceive it to lie in the mouth of any hon. member to describe as a failure a system which has already sent twice as many Canadian-born men into active service in this war, in the army, navy and air force, as we sent into the last war. I realize the difficulties in dealing with figures. I was a member of the first Canadian corps, and I will be the last one to detract one jot or tittle from its record or glory or reputation. But when I hear people comparing unfavourably Canada's contribution in this war with its contribution in the last war, I am reminded of figures which we sometimes forget, that of all those gallant gentlemen who went in the name of Canada in the last war, I believe only about 125,000 were Canadian-born. I remember my associations with the men of Scotland, England, Ireland and Wales who had come to Canada and claimed it as their home, and who made their contribution in the last war in the name of Canada, but who would have made their contribution nevertheless if Canada had inconceivably stayed out of that war. Consequently, when I realize that, and remember that the age of the Royal Canadian Air Force to-day is between nineteen and thirty-one, and the same for our reinforcements which go to the Royal Air Force, and remember, too, that during the years of their lifetime practically no immigrants have come into Canada, I realize, as the minister told us last October and November, that these men are in a peculiar sense a strictly Canadian body. When I remember the age limits in the Canadian navy, I realize that there we have a parallel situation and the same thing obtains, and in almost the same degree in the Canadian army. I have not much sympathy with those belittlers of Canada and Canada's sons who forget that in this war already we have half a million men working in war industries who were not working before, and in spite of that we have twice as many Canadian-born sons in our active service forces—and we are just getting started.

But let no one urge for any reason whatsoever, because we can take pride in what Canada has done already, that therefore we have done enough. Let no one think that any voice raised in this house would urge on the people of Canada, for the world to hear, that we have done enough. Let no one say unjustly and unfairly and in dishonour to these men who have volunteered that up to this point we have failed, because to do so would be a shameful calumny of the volunteers who have gone so gladly from this country.

Having said that, I am happy to join with the hon. member for Waterloo South in something he said in his speech the other day, and that was, if I understood him correctly, that we did not use in Canada's war effort, to anything like the full extent possible, the man-power in this country between the ages of fifty and sixty-five. We are training young men in Canada to do essential war tasks, but we have also at our disposal many men in the older age brackets with trained hands and experienced heads who are willing and anxious to serve and are only awaiting the opportunity to make a contribution to our war effort. We have sold ourselves that slogan, an unfortunate one, I think, that we are all in the front line, and the result is that we have earnest people who are carrying out their regular duties in the economic and social set-up of Canada who feel that, in so doing, they are not making any real contribution to the war effort. I think no one of us has done enough in the way of telling these people that just by carrying on their ordinary tasks they are pulling their weight and making their contribution to our war effort.

Having said that, I come to this other factor. It is my considered opinion that there is a reservoir of man-power available in this country for the replacement of people who are engaged in other occupations, a reservoir which could be made use of. I realize that those who differ with me as to the urgency of the hour will tell me that under their scheme of selective service all these things will be taken care of, but I am a little sceptical, Mr. Speaker, whether that will work as fast as they think it will or whether it will work at all, because we are not living in a country where everybody is within a few hours' train ride of every other place. We have a territory which extends for three thousand miles, and we have a diversity of occupations. Perhaps it would never be possible to make a shift in population to reach that idealistic one hundred per cent, but certainly in almost every hamlet and town, and certainly in every city, I am sure that there is a residue of unused labour which I urge the government to take into consideration if and when—and I hope it may be soon—they let us know their considered and deliberate policy of man-power for carrying on this war.

Mr. LIONEL BERTRAND (Terrebonne) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in March, 1940, six months after the declaration of war, the Canadian nation gave the Liberal party a majority unprecedented in our political history. On that occasion the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was elected on a platform whereby Canada, engaged of its own free will in war at the side of Great Britain, was to provide a voluntary and moderate co-operation commensurate with its resources and financial capacity. This platform also contained a pledge that no union government would ever be sought by a Liberal administration and that compulsory military service would never be enacted for overseas. This programme obtained the overwhelming support of the Canadian people.

For the past two years the Prime Minister has conducted the ship of state with a mastery which does honour to his great qualities as a parliamentarian and to the confidence placed in him. Together with the late Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe, whose passing is still deeply regretted, he has worked to keep the country united and to guard against the errors and abuses of the last war. Never has the Canadian nation been more united than during the past two years. Never has there been enacted legislation better fitted to paralyze the appetites of war profiteers and to protect the lower classes of society. The system of voluntary enlistment, endorsed by the electors, has given excellent results, since 400,000 Canadians are at present ready to serve voluntarily in any theatre of war anywhere in the world. In the face of the Hitler menace which was spreading even to the new world, the Prime Minister proposed in 1940 his National Resources Mobilization Act for the defence of Canada which was accepted if not with alacrity, at least with the patriotism which every citizen owes to his country in time of peril. When this act was brought down it produced certain reactions. But the Prime Minister is able to say now with pride that he gauged the situation correctly. If this act had not been passed at that time and if measures for the defence of the country had to be placed in hand now, what a problem would we not face to-day?

The Prime Minister asked of the people of Canada for sacrifices of all kinds in contributions and in taxation; the Canadian people accepted these sacrifices with pride and patriotism. Millions of dollars have been spent in direct aid to the allies. Canada has generously exceeded the collaboration she promised. Millions of dollars have been expended to levy and equip troops for service overseas. I greatly admire those volunteers who are serving abroad and I salute those who have died, less for their own country than for the great cause of world freedom. Millions of dollars have been spent for the construction of immense munitions plants and for the organization of our own defence in every domain. The free, voluntary and moderate effort promised in 1940 has certainly broadened out, but can the government be blamed for that? I voted as a free and honest man in favour of the mobilization for the defence of my country.

In refusing to form a union cabinet, the government respected a solemn promise. It would have been a sacrilege to allow the politicians of the last war, on whose policies the people have already passed judgment, to share in the administration of the country without having received a mandate therefor. I consider that the government have accomplished a great task for the allies, a task so great that I sometimes wonder if it has not jeopardized our national defence. However, we must to-day face the fact that we shall have, from now on, to look more carefully after our own defence. Canada has a vast area to defend and has by no means a large population to do it. We shall soon enter the fourth year of war, with the spectacle of a convulsed world. Whither are we going? No one can tell. We are told in the speech from the throne that this is a time of gravest crisis. I believe that. I also believe that Canada is threatened. It is possible and even probable that our country may soon feel the horrors of war. More than ever Canada must think of the defence of her own territory, and proceed at full speed with the work in hand. I for one am not prepared to support any measure or legislation which would not have that primary object in view.

Can I, then, accept the idea of a plebiscite, as expressed in the speech from the throne, and especially the question which is to be put before the electors? In all frankness I say no. Is the question as asked a clever move on the part of the government to dodge the attacks of persistent enemies and perhaps also to silence those who, even in the government itself, oppose the 1940 programme? The question looks so much like camouflage that, in spite of the deep respect I have for my party, I cannot accept it. There is perhaps no member of this house—I do not say it boastfully—who, during the last two years, has contributed more than I to the war effort of this country. I have given my active and unqualified support to all war organizations: loans, war savings certificates, Red Cross, Canadian war services fund, salvage campaign, and so forth. I have given my full moral support to the soldiers who have been trained in my constituency, and I have frequently visited and encouraged them. During the last year, I have given all my attention to the creation and organization of extensive shops at Sainte-Thérèse. The Allied War Supplies Corporation and Defence Industries Ltd. can vouch for the unselfish cooperation I have given them. My paper has been used in the furtherance of the common cause, and everywhere in my constituency I have never ceased to advocate cooperation with the allies and the defence of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I am neither a nationalist nor a separatist. I love my province, and I am proud of it, but I consider myself above all a Canadian. I hate racial strife and prejudice, which in the past have only served to destroy the harmony necessary to the national development. That is why any movement based upon a narrow nationalism is contrary to my conception of true patriotism.

I admire Great Britain, which for the last two years has given the world a wonderful lesson of courage, steadfastness and patriotism. In her misfortune I sympathize with France, and I still admire her. I believe in her resurrection, because France, like England, can not die. That resurrection will come through the united effort of all the democracies. I do not begrudge the old world the ammunitions, the food, and the volunteers we have given it during the last two years; we have done all that because we wished to see democracy survive as the leading force in the world.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, 400,000 of our men may, through the terms of their enlistment, serve anywhere in the world. In two years only, we have spent many billions of dollars for war and our national debt is increasing at such a rate that we shall perhaps never be able to straighten it out again. What of it? I would rather see my country come out of this war impoverished but proud and free. That conscription in Canada for overseas service will change the world situation is something I do not believe. That conscription for overseas, at this critical stage of our history, can prove advantageous, I believe still less. To impose it would be a crime. The defence of the country calls for our undivided attention. Being vulnerable on every side, has not the country first claim to our solicitude? Our country needs all its man-power for national defence, at home, on the farm and in the factories. Must we have to face invasion without sufficient military strength to defend our shores and our land? What has Australia done? The world over, to every battle front, for two years now, she has sent her best soldiers; to-day, lacking sufficient man-power to meet impending danger, a stern reality to-morrow, she calls out for help. What a mistake!

Conscriptionist Conservatives, indeed, have not departed from their wonted doctrine. The members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are almost fully in accord with them. They will not get my vote. Nor will the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). For this is 1917 all over again. For with these Conservatives, ten times more conservative than the ordinary Conservative, we find ourselves, just like in 1917, before the same setting, the same programme, the same zeal, the same enthusiasm. They hold the same prejudices and the same fanaticism. Indeed, we find the same faces and the same interests. Had this party been in power, conscription for overseas service would have been on the statute books long since. What is unity to them? Why should they not approve voluntary service? Were it a good thing, still would they turn away from it and endeavour to prevent it. Nevertheless, they are aware of the opposition existing against conscription for overseas service in every section of the country.

The only objective of their whirlwind campaign is conscription and power with a return of the shameless patronage of 1917. Instead of propaganda for overseas service, instead of millions to win over public opinion, why should not Mr. Meighen, Mr. Hanson and their friends devote the same zeal, the same enthusiasm, the thousands of dollars in publicity for voluntary service, to promote it and improve its results? Their bad faith stands out too clearly to require that it should be unmasked now. Conscription? Why, it would set Canadian against Canadian in every province of this Dominion; it would at one fell blow destroy national unity forged through years of concession, effort and mutual understanding; it does not add anything to the valour of our troops, for experience teaches that ten conscripted men are not worth one voluntary soldier. I intend voting, therefore, against the sub-amendment proposed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and against the amendment presented by the hon. leader of the opposition, because conscription for overseas is a measure both unpatriotic and contrary in every way to Canadian security.

Nor am I in favour of the question proposed for the plebiscite. A plebiscite is indeed a democratic form of consultation and the government shows, in taking such a course, a desire to know public opinion in the land. We are invited, however, to release the government of its commitments. This I cannot do, because I am satisfied with them. I am requested to obtain release from my own commitments; my constituents, whom I know well, are opposing this already. The government wishes to be released from its obligations. Why? Does not its term of office extend to three more years? Or should it abdicate to please certain dissident Liberals? Has it weakened under pressure from the imperialistic group from Toronto who, without mandate, wish to govern the nation? Do they wish to gain time? The government states they desire release from previous commitments in order to be free to adopt all necessary measures dictated by circumstances. I understand that it is not implied that the present administration will necessarily enact conscription if released from its commitments; however, there is always the danger and the possibility that it will be enacted.

What will be the result of the plebiscite? If the Canadian people answer "No", so much the better. If the answer should be "Yes", the imperialistic press campaign, imbued with prejudice, armed with threats and invectives, will be revived, stronger, more irreverent, more audacious than before. What then? The government, released from past commitments, may have to yield to renewed pressure both from within and without. This is giving the government a blank cheque together with the power of filling it at discretion. If this cheque were handed personally to the Prime Minister or the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) or some other minister, I state, for the benefit of my constituents, that I would be willing to take the chance. But, who could be sure that the war will be over in two or three years? Who will promise that Mr. King will still be with us in six months? Who will give assurance that Mr. Cardin will be there? Men may disappear suddenly and this truth has been brought home to us only recently. Those men gone, could I be positive that the new incumbent, armed with the blank cheque, would not be too willing, with the consent of a parliament become amenable, or a parliament transformed and favourable to him, to use it at will? I cannot risk such a contingency. I will possibly be accused of forsaking my party. Still I should have the satisfaction, which neither fame nor honours may replace, of having been faithful to my mandate and my conscience. I am a Liberal and a Liberal I shall remain, for, in my opinion, this party stands for freedom of speech. Moreover, I am convinced that my frankness will be useful to my party. I was elected in 1940, because I was supporting a certain political platform; the sincerity of those who elected me left no room for doubt. I am not going to organize a new party, nor to join any new group whether under the name of "Canadian" or "National" party. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to support sub-amendments which, after all, would have the same effect as the main motion and are consequently useless—and above all, when they are moved by hon. members sitting on the other side of the house.

Mr. Speaker, I shall return to my constituency, but I am too well acquainted with the opinions of the voters there to ask them to release the government from its past commitments. I am already too positive that they have enough faith in Mr. King to answer the plebiscite in the affirmative and that he is the man whom they wish to see in power. However, I shall say to my constituents: "consider first your country which you are bound to defend. Remember Australia. Do not repeat the same mistake. What you must defend is your homes and your rights, every inch of Canadian soil, from Vancouver to Halifax," and they will not fail to understand. I shall say to them: while some of our sons stand guard over our country, ready to make the supreme sacrifice, our soil must produce food for our armies and those of our allies; I shall say to them that farmers and their sons must stick to their ploughs and furrows and they will understand. I shall also tell them that our factories must have men to produce the tools of victory, and everyone, man, woman, girl and boy will understand. I shall instruct the young men to rally to the defence of their country, worthy of the best we have to offer, even life itself. If you wish to try your luck, if you think that it is your duty to go over there, overseas, if you want to go into action, do not hesitate, enlist voluntarily, and they will understand. All my people of the "highlands" whose courage has been sung by Valdombre know that the defence of one's country is a sacred obligation. They will not say that their country ends with the confines of the province of Quebec, but that along with their own province they hold dear all of their country from the granite boulders of the Rocky mountains to the sod of the plains of Nova Scotia.

I shall therefore vote against the address in reply to the speech from the throne and express the wish that the country's answer to the plebiscite be "No." I hope that from this negative answer will be born the sincere desire to serve our country better. I hope that the Prime Minister will continue to stand by the platform of 1940 which, to my mind, expressed the true aspirations of the Canadian nation. Let us collaborate with the allies but with all our will keep our man-power for the noble task of defending Canada first.

On motion of Mr. Turgeon the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.53 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

CITY OF OTTAWA AGREEMENT

AUTHORIZATION OF PAYMENT OF $100,000 FOR THE YEAR ENDING JULY 1, 1942

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (for the Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the Minister of Public Works on behalf of His Majesty to enter into an agreement to pay to the corporation of the city of Ottawa the sum of $100,000 for the year ending July 1, 1942.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

"COMMITTEE FOR TOTAL WAR"

PRESS ADVERTISEMENT—BY-ELECTION IN SOUTH YORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, at page 211 of Hansard, I asked a question which was perhaps not clear enough or was not well enough understood. It was about the "Committee For Total War." My question was: Is it possible to ascertain how many of the two hundred "Tailors of Tooley Street," Toronto, who signed that proclamation are qualified voters in South York? What I should like to know from the government is how many of these peacocks have a right to vote in South York. I think it is possible to know that.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that I am afraid he will have to frame his question in different words if he wishes to have an answer, but I imagine, no matter in what words his question were expressed, that it would not be possible to secure the information.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO WHEN 1941 FORMS WILL BE READY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance when the income tax forms for 1941 will be ready? Will they have to wait until the tax agreements with the provinces are signed?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): All I can do is to bring the question to the attention of my colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson). The matter is in his department, not in the finance department.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATIVE PROGRAMME FOR THE SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister when we may expect a statement of government legislation for the session, inasmuch as there is no indication in the speech from the throne that any legislation will be brought down. I think he should tell the house as soon as possible what the legislative programme of the government is and, generally speaking, its nature and extent. I assume, of course, that there will be an appropriation bill, but what else will there be?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I shall endeavour to give my hon. friend a reply in due course.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, will you permit me first of all, on rising to take part in this debate, to tell you that I am particularly nervous, not only because of the strain which naturally comes from the necessity or thought of making a speech, but also because of the stress which surrounds everyone who takes part in this debate owing to the bitterness which has been aroused, not so much in this house but in the country at large, in connection with the subject matter of any speech made to-day by an hon. member on the motion to present an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to the speech from the throne.

It is my intention to deal frankly and bluntly with some of the questions at issue and with some of the agitation which is being aroused outside of this house.

First of all, however, may I deal with a more pleasing thing. May I join with other members who have spoken by paying a tribute to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) for the excellent addresses with which they opened this debate. I feel that they did better because of the experiences they had among the people of the British isles. It is too bad that it is not possible for every hon. member to do what these hon. members were able to do—visit Great Britain during this time of stress. I did not have the honour of hearing the mover and the seconder, but I read their speeches, and one who heard them or one who read them can tell that both hon. members spoke not only from their own points of view but also from that emotion which was aroused in them because of what they saw among the people of Great Britain. They found men and women like ourselves protecting their lives and their homes, and looking after their children—who after all are like our own children. May I leave this thought with the house and with certain sections of the people of Canada, that these hon. members found in the British isles a people who were not fighting for the spreading or for the maintenance and perpetuation of imperialism, but against the most ruthless expansion of imperialism that the world has ever seen. Neither we nor the people of the British isles are fighting for imperialism. We are defending ourselves against it. And the courage which has been shown by the people of Great Britain is precisely that quality which Doctor Johnson said was the first condition of virtue, because without it there can be no virtue. They were fighting, as some day we may have to fight, for home, for fireside, and for children.

To turn now to another matter, I have noticed lately, in spite of this demand for conscription, of which I shall speak later, that county councils and other organizations are demanding of this government that it stop taking men from agricultural communities into the armed forces of Canada. That demand has been made not only in the province of Quebec—which I mention because it is on the lips of nearly everyone outside this chamber who has taken part in the discussion of this question—but also in Ontario and other parts of English-speaking Canada. In my own riding of Cariboo there is a shortage of farm labour. Our cattle men do not know how they will make their hay next fall. Our grain growers and our farmers who are dealing with ordinary agriculture are in exactly the same position. I do not want anyone to misunderstand me. I feel that at a time such as we are now entering it is the duty of every member of parliament, not only to argue this matter and try to create public opinion, although that is a supreme task, but also to make his position clear so that the people whom we directly represent, and the people of all Canada whom also each one of us represents, shall have no doubt as to where we stand.

It is therefore my intention to state clearly at the outset, though probably I shall return to it later, that I have every intention of supporting the plebiscite proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I voted, when in uniform overseas, against conscription in 1917. I had not the faintest hesitation in voting against it, not because of conscription in itself, but because of the dastardly associations which surrounded it at that time. To-day I am not unmindful of the same associations that some people are trying to weave about it, but I am quite ready to trust this government, and, naturally, particularly the Prime Minister, in dealing with the various situations as they may arise. Again without hesitation, so that everybody will know where I stand, I say it is my intention, after this plebiscite is taken and the people vote favourably upon it, as I sincerely hope they will in every province of Canada, to support every measure of compulsory service—I am not afraid of the word "conscription"—that the Prime Minister and those who are surrounding him in government may think it necessary to bring to the people of Canada.

Wendell Willkie, speaking some time ago, said that democracy rises to its greatest heights at its worst moments. I am afraid that to-day we in Canada are entering upon one of the evil moments, if not the worst moment, of democracy. We talk of leadership. I wonder if hon. members who speak of leadership every time they make a recommendation which is not accepted, realize that we are so formed that sometimes we recognize leadership only when leadership agrees with our own opinions, and that we are inclined to say there is lack of leadership when a leader goes in a direction contrary to that in which we want him to go.

I intend to say something to-day about leadership, with particular reference to leadership at the present moment, having in mind among other things, naturally, this plebiscite and the leadership that is being given us so that from time to time we may be able to continue the total war effort which we have been making without arousing too many of those basic prejudices which of themselves, when brought to the surface, interfere with our full effort—leadership at the present moment, which after all merges so fast into the future. In speaking thus, one must not forget the immediate past, in spite of the fact that it has been streaming so swiftly by us that all of it to-day is obscured and most of it forgotten.

I remember something of the fateful session of September, 1939, which authorized this government to declare war on behalf of Canada against Germany. As I remember, we met on Thursday; we started the address on Friday, and we closed the house on Saturday by adopting the address, which gave authority to the Prime Minister to advise the crown to declare war on our behalf. I ask any member of this house to-day, who was in parliament then, if he will rise in his seat now and say that if the Prime Minister had suggested conscription at that time we could have finished that debate in time for the declaration of war by Canada on Sunday. There is not a member of this house who does not know that, if we had talked of conscription then, that debate would have gone on interminably.

Speaking of leadership, I want to ask hon. members what would have been the position of Canada in the eyes of the world, if through lack of leadership the Prime Minister had permitted this country to pass that fateful week-end without the declaration of war. Talk about what is being said to-day! He would have been eternally damned, and he would have deserved it if he had allowed that to happen.

Continuing then with the question of leadership, I would ask you to let your minds go back again. There is without question one man who has captured the imagination of the world to a greater extent than any other man in history, whether in times of emergency or in times of peace. That man is Winston Churchill, the Prime Minister of Great Britain. But I ask you this. Next to the things that Winston Churchill has done for us, next to what he has done in the marvellous encouragement which he gave the people of Great Britain after Dunkirk, is there anything that was greater, as a means of helping Great Britain and ourselves in the conduct of the war, than the magnificent material help supplied to us by the people of the United States through the leadership of President Roosevelt?

I think I am safe in saying that, next to what was done by Churchill, the help that was given us by the United States has been greatest. Now, where did our own Prime Minister come in? Unfortunately, and I say this deliberately, when you listen to some people speaking, when you read some of the newspapers of the day, with reference to the question of leadership, you have to wonder, as I have often wondered, whether some of them hate Adolf Hitler most, or Mackenzie King. I say that deliberately. There are groups of men in this country who are anxious for total war against Germany; but they are anxious for total war against Germany only to the extent that it will not interfere with their total war against Mackenzie King. That is one of the truths of the situation which it is necessary for somebody to bring to public notice—and you will note, I say it is one of the truths of the situation.

I was speaking of Churchill and Roosevelt, and I spoke of the past slipping away so rapidly from us that we are inclined to forget it. To-day we talk about the Atlantic charter, which came from the conference between Churchill and Roosevelt, and we take for granted that help which went to Britain through the lease-lend agreement before the United States was actually in the war in consequence of attack from Japan. What brought about these things? To-day, I venture to say, even in the minds of many hon. members, there is only at best a dim recollection of Ogdensburg, the historic meeting between our Prime Minister and the President of the United States, which took place in August 1940. From that meeting at Ogdensburg have flowed all the things for which to-day the people of the allied nations are thanking President Roosevelt and the people of the United States; and if it had not been for the leadership of our own Canadian Prime Minister, there would have been no Ogdensburg. The lease-lend agreement would never have become an accomplished fact, the meeting between Churchill and Roosevelt would not have taken place, the Atlantic charter would still be a dream of some of us, the aid that has gone since then to Russia would not have been sent. And every part of that is attributable to the man who sits here to-day as leader of this government.

I come from the province of British Columbia, and many who sit here know that in northern Alberta, in northern British Columbia and in the Yukon, there has been constructed a series of airports designed to protect western Canada—both British Columbia and Alberta—against attack from Japan across Alaska or the waters surrounding Alaska, and the Yukon territory. I will say more about that later. But who in this house forgets that the hon. member who then occupied the seat of the Leader of the Opposition, as soon as war was declared, rose in his place, properly so, and asked for some protection against air attack or attack in any other form across Hudson bay. You do not hear much of that to-day. Why not? We have our airports in western Canada, constructed or largely under construction, to protect us from attack from the west. The reason you do not hear much demand to-day for further protection against attack across Hudson bay is that United States troops joined in the occupation of Iceland.

Again I ask you, if the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada had not given to the President and the people of the United States that inspiration which was the foundation of the leadership given us by that president, would there have been an occupation of Iceland by the troops of the United States? There is not a member of this house who will rise and say that he does not see a direct connection between Ogdensburg and the occupation of Iceland by United States soldiers.

There is nobody in this house or outside who will not see in the occupation of Iceland a direct connection with the winning of the battle of the Atlantic. Talk about leadership! What could have been better either for Great Britain or for Canada—and especially for us in Canada—than to save ourselves from defeat in the battle of the Atlantic? That perhaps has been the greatest thing that has yet been done since war was declared in September, 1939. And the saving of the battle of the Atlantic is traceable directly back to the meeting between the Canadian Prime Minister and the President of the United States at Ogdensburg; there is no doubt whatever about that.

I said, Mr. Speaker, I was going to support the plebiscite, and that I was prepared to accept whatever measure of compulsory service may be deemed necessary from time to time by our competent authorities, both civil and military. I spoke of our attitude towards leadership. I have made recommendations to this government which have not been carried out. But am I to rise up and say that because my recommendations were not accepted I am opposed to the government and do not believe in their leadership? What right have I to say that? Yet I have as much right—though none at all—as any other citizen of Canada or any hon. member of this house. But I should be foolish if I thought every recommendation made by me must be accepted, otherwise I would consider it lack of leadership.

On the day on which Japan made her attack in the south Pacific I telegraphed the Prime Minister of Canada as follows:

> As member of Commons House of Parliament I strongly recommend that Canadian government take all possible action against Japan through executive authority without awaiting special session of parliament. I also urge that your government take favourable action upon my previous recommendations, first that ministry for war be created and secondly that National Mobilization Act be extended to include military service in any part of western hemisphere and in Siberia and that further extensions be considered from time to time as circumstances warrant.

That recommendation has not been carried out, but I sincerely hope that in time it will be carried out. In the meantime I am accepting the leadership that says "the time has not come to accept your recommendations." I made that recommendation some considerable time before Japan entered the war; I wanted the National Resources Mobilization Act extended in that manner, first, because I thought it would be of general help, and secondly, because I could see, as every hon. member in this house could see, the coming of war with Japan.

We in British Columbia and those who come from Alberta—the people of these two provinces particularly—are in a dangerous position. I am not so much afraid of a direct attack, unless it be of a sporadic nature, against Vancouver and Esquimalt, as I am of positively planned attack across Alaska or over the Aleutian islands. If I may be permitted to bring to your attention, Sir, the geographic situation of the western coast of Canada, it will be seen that the Pacific coast does not run, as people generally in the east think it does, north and south, but northwesterly. The Yukon and Alaska are considerably west of Vancouver and Victoria, and just across the straits from Alaska are islands leading to the Asiatic mainland, Siberia and Manchukuo, and to Japan. Therefore I say it is our supreme duty to make it certain that we have every possible line of defence available for the Pacific coast.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What about the military road?

Mr. TURGEON: I am coming to that. I have suggested—and I know this could not be carried out by us alone even if our own civil authority thought it wise—that Canada and the United States should thoroughly train and arm a large force of troops prepared to step into Siberia the moment Russia and Japan become entangled. Because I am warning the government—I do not have to; for we are represented here by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) who naturally has given this same warning—I am warning them again that from the moment Russia and Japan become embroiled that moment will see Japan occupying bases in Siberia and Manchukuo, which are only minutes of time, not hours, distant from Alaska—the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Black) knows that—only an hour or two from northern British Columbia, and only four or five hours at the most from Edmonton and Prince George and Vancouver. Incidentally in 1939 when Japan was making her good-will flight to the United States the plane flew around over the town of Prince George, where there is now one of these protective airports, spoke by radio to the then airport, asked for directions and came right down over Cariboo country and across the city of Vancouver and on to her destination in the United States. That was the line they followed.

Now may I say a word about criticism. I read a speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) the other day. I have the quotation here but I do not need to turn it up. He criticized this government because we did not have an air force available immediately to take its stand on the Pacific ocean for the protection of British Columbia. The hon. member knows that we have not the air force ready.

Mr. GREEN: The hon. member had better read my speech again, because I did not mention that.

Mr. TURGEON: We have not got it ready because every available airman and every available aeroplane has been dispatched to Great Britain, which in the conditions that then existed was the proper thing to do. No hon. member of this house will criticize the government for having done it. I do not want the people of British Columbia to be needlessly alarmed, and I am sorry for another statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver South, for whom I have—I do not need to tell him, but I am telling the house because of him—a very high personal regard. I refer to a statement about the command on the Pacific coast. I feel certain that our military chiefs know what they are doing, and I think if any hon. member of this house is doubtful of the capacity or the efficiency of any officer commanding it is his duty first to consult the higher military authorities in order to make certain that his doubts are correct before he help create panic among people who know they may soon be attacked by public expressions of doubts about the capacity of the men in our military command.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. TURGEON: Certainly.

Mr. GREEN: Does he believe in a triple command on the Pacific coast such as there is at the present time?

Mr. TURGEON: What I was talking about then was not what my friend said about the triple command but what he said about the man who is actually general officer commanding in chief on the Pacific. I can mention names; I was thinking of General Alexander, as the hon. member was.

Mr. GREEN: How does the hon. member know whom I was thinking of?

Mr. TURGEON: As far as the Pacific command is concerned—

Mr. GREEN: He should be supreme commander, shouldn't he?

Mr. TURGEON: All right, but is the hon. member going to blame the military authorities in Canada if through the whole military world it is the custom that there is an army command, a naval command, and now an air force command? I am convinced that there should be a supreme commander. I have not discussed the matter with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), but I have an idea that he will deal with this question himself. Just the same I feel positive that every possible means of coordination has been carried out, so that when the general officer commanding the Pacific command gives an order, that order will be carried out by every branch of the armed forces. If that is not so, the minister will correct me when he deals with the matter in this house.

A few moments ago someone asked me about the military aspect. Well, I have spoken of the danger of attack from the north and northwest, and of the airports that have been constructed in that part of the country. I am not a military man, but I feel that Prince Rupert should be made a joint naval base by the United States and Canada. It would be presumptuous for me to say that this must be done, but I believe it should be done. I believe that the projected road from Prince Rupert to Prince George should be built by this government immediately, without asking the provincial government to contribute one cent toward the cost. I believe that to be a military road, the cost of which should be borne by this government. I believe the airport at Prince George should be connected by road with the airport at Edmonton. Again, speaking from a military rather than a peacetime point of view, I believe an alternative route should be constructed between Vancouver and Edmonton, taking advantage of what is called the Blue River highway; and I believe the whole line of airports north and east of the Rocky mountains should be connected by highway with Edmonton. Those are my recommendations to the government with regard to highway communication in that great northwestern area of Canada which, make no mistake about it, is apt to be attacked.

Thinking again in terms of conscription, and this plebiscite, I remember that in his very good speech a few days ago the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), speaking of Australia, at page 21 of Hansard for this year, used these words, with which I quite agree:

> Every able-bodied man in Australia has been called to the colours. I pray to God that it is not too late. I am afraid that it may be; for how can these men be trained in time for the defence of their shores, men who have never had previous training?

Apparently my mind likes to go back to the immediate past, for when I heard those words I remembered when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), then Minister of National War Services, returned from England, where he saw devastation in the extreme. He spoke in this house, and again on the radio, demanding that more men be trained, and suggesting that industry should be able to carry on without insisting that its employees be exempt from such training. I remembered the uproar that followed. The leader of the opposition condemned the minister for making that statement, and other hon. members did the same thing. We were told that the minister was making threats against the patriotic captains of industry; that he was going to upset the whole industrial programme; that there was no need to train more men, but that the greater need was in industry itself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never said anything of the sort.

Mr. TURGEON: Naturally I accept the hon. gentleman's word without question, but I should like to be quite clear. Is he saying that he offered no objection to the statement made by the then Minister of National War Services?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I criticized the statement of the Minister of National War Services, but on no occasion have I ever said that there was no necessity for trained men. I have tried to hammer that into the minds of the Canadian public and of members of this house since the day I took my seat here.

Mr. TURGEON: I had in mind particularly what appeared in the Ottawa Journal, but the hon. member did denounce the minister at that time. My very good friend the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) had spoken of the matter before the leader of the opposition rose. The hon. member for Parkdale, if I might quote him from memory, said he was shocked at the statement made by the minister, and later the leader of the opposition rose in his place and joined in the condemnation of the then Minister of National War Services because of the statement he had made. There is no question about that; and now I say that the very newspapers which are condemning the Prime Minister to-day are those which a short time ago said that industry should come first.

I have before me two resolutions passed by great organizations of returned soldiers. I refer to these organizations not only because they are great, not only because they both create and express public opinion, but also because throughout this time of stress, particularly during the period when we were working by means of voluntary effort, this country received its greatest support from the men who gave their services in the last war, and their dependents. It seems to be an instinct of nature that makes us love most that for which we have suffered most; perhaps that is why, since the beginning of this war, we have been given more assistance by the returned soldiers than by any other group of men or women in the country. One of the resolutions to which I referred was passed by the Canadian Legion, the other by the Army and Navy Veterans' Association in Canada. Perhaps I may be permitted to put on record first the resolution passed by the army and navy veterans, because I happen to be a member of that organization. This resolution was passed at Toronto on December 1, which, it will be noted, was before this government announced its intention to hold a plebiscite on the question of compulsory service or conscription. Here is the final paragraph of the resolution:

> Be it therefore resolved that the Army and Navy Veterans Association in Canada in dominion convention assembled places itself on record as being in favour of some form of compulsory selective service for all men between the ages of twenty-one and forty, such service to embrace not only the armed forces, but all branches of the war effort.
> And be it further resolved that the government of Canada, through its Prime Minister, be advised of this resolution and be requested to institute some form of compulsory selective service, or in the alternative to obtain the opinion of the people of Canada on the matter by means of a plebiscite at the earliest opportunity.

Here is the recommendation of the Canadian Legion, or that part of it which is pertinent:

> Canada should bring about the complete and scientific mobilization, organization and utilization of all our resources in such manner that our country may be geared to produce essential foods and munitions and to wage war to a maximum capacity.

I say without hesitation or doubt in my own mind that I am completely in favour of those two resolutions. I am completely in favour of them personally as a citizen of Canada. But as a member of parliament I cannot blind myself to the fact that if, as I pointed out a while ago, this government had previously indulged or were now to indulge in immediate conscription of men for overseas service, without dealing with other things, such action would retard rather than advance our war effort.

I see some of my hon. friends smiling, and I know what they are thinking about. I say with the greatest respect that naturally they are thinking, first, that I am wrong. They are thinking, as some of them have lately made themselves believe, that the taking of this plebiscite is the reason there is discord. The taking of the plebiscite is not the cause of the discord at all. The cause of the discord is the discontent, the terrible discontent, of those men who are making the agitation. I ask any hon. member if he is prepared to rise in his seat and say that a government motion to-day for conscription of men for overseas, without dealing with all the other things which are generally meant when you speak of the subject of wealth, would pass the house any quicker and with any less discussion or discord than it will take to pass the plebiscite against which they are objecting.

Every hon. member knows that a motion of that kind would smash this house. It would be discussed through amendment and subamendment for weeks and weeks, and perhaps would not pass at all. What about delay?

An hon. MEMBER: Nonsense.

Mr. TURGEON: I hear some hon. member say it is nonsense. All right, let us see whether it is all nonsense. What about delay?

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he say that this house is opposed to the conscription of wealth?

Mr. TURGEON: I said nothing of the kind. I referred to a motion to conscript men for service overseas without dealing with total conscription of wealth and other things that are associated with it. No hon. member over there will say that the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition means the total conscription of wealth.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The total mobilization of wealth.

Mr. TURGEON: I will digress and say this, that if the leader of the opposition will rise in his place and officially pledge his party to the total conscription of wealth—

Mr. STIRLING: Nobody knows what it means.

Mr. TURGEON: —the new leader who has been impressed upon them will withdraw. There is no question about that. There is no use fooling ourselves.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. TURGEON: I thank the house for the privilege. I shall not detain hon. members very long. I was going to speak of other things which in themselves are contentious, but since I have the unanimous consent of the house to continue with my closing observations I will leave all further contentious matter aside.

I was speaking about delay and discord. In connection with delay I was going to quote only one sentence from a speech made by the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen in 1925. This was the speech in which he made his famous suggestion that there should be no declaration of war without a general election. With the courtesy of the house, I should like to deal with that. He said:

> This would contribute to the unity of our country in the months to come, and would enable us best to do our duty. It would not mean delay.

That was the sentence I wanted to leave with the house in that connection.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But that was taken out of its context. It was that the country should go on and make its preparation for defence, and the government of the day would stake its whole existence on the election.

Mr. TURGEON: You are right. But, thank God, the country is going on in waging the war, and the government of the day has staked its whole existence on the waging of the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a plebiscite.

Mr. TURGEON: The Prime Minister has announced it. And the most that the plebiscite could possibly deal with is whether we are going to have conscription of everything for overseas service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Heads I win, tails you lose—that is the plebiscite.

Mr. TURGEON: Mr. Speaker, I express my thanks to you, and through you to hon. members, for this courtesy which for the first time has been tendered to me. May I conclude with an expression of friendliness. We have been told that discord would follow from this plebiscite. Let me give hon. members a little personal experience. The other day my old friend, the former chief government whip, the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) spoke, and took a course quite different from mine. If any hon. member thinks that the friendship which exists between him and me is going to be impaired because of that difference of opinion in connection with the plebiscite, then that hon. member is foolishly wrong, because it is not.

In closing I should like to leave a simple message from the grave—and I give this not only to the people of Ontario and of other English-speaking parts of Canada, but also, and particularly, to the people of Quebec who, naturally, are ill at ease because of what might be done in connection with the further prosecution of the war. I was honoured and privileged to enjoy an hour and a half with Sir Wilfrid Laurier only six weeks before he died. He spoke of his approaching death, his passing to the land beyond, and as he spoke, tears welled in his eyes. We had been referring to the conscription issue of 1917, and to the men who had left the Liberal party and joined the Union government. He said to me, "Some of my colleagues are angry with me because I did not become bitter against those who left us." He continued, "Turgeon, I can speak to you; you are younger than I. There is no greater blessing in life than that of forgiving—not that of being forgiven." With that impetuosity which goes with lack of experience and lack of knowledge of fundamentals, I blurted out, "Sir Wilfrid, that is all right; it may apply to those who left us with sincerity; but it does not apply to those who left us from ulterior motives." He said, "Turgeon, do not forget that those who left us sincerely require no forgiveness, neither from you nor from me. If you wish to taste that which I tell you is the greatest joy in life, the act of forgiving, then there is nothing left but to forgive those who left us from what you are pleased to call ulterior motives."

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the mover and the seconder of the address have been congratulated and complimented so often that I do not believe it is necessary for me to deal with that point. Both hon. members were lawyers, and my only comment would be that they made out a very good case for a poor client.

We have just listened to an eloquent address by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon). The hon. member always holds the attention of the house, because he speaks so fervently in that language which is not his native tongue. To-day he excelled himself in the eulogies he showered upon his leader and upon the government. In the early part of his speech he made reference to total war, and said that many of those in Canada who were so anxious to put forth a total war effort—I have no doubt he was referring more particularly to the opposition, and to the public—were more anxious for total war on Mr. King than on total war against Hitler. I resent that. It ill becomes him or any other hon. member to question the loyalty of any Canadian, particularly of any hon. member of this house. I resent what he said in that connection.

The hon. member made special reference to the part the Prime Minister is playing in the war—bringing the United States into it, so to speak. He referred to the Ogdensburg agreement and to various measures passed by the United States government. You would almost think from his remarks that the Prime Minister of Canada was directing the war effort of the United States. I am just wondering what the President of the United States thinks of the latest action of this government in asking for a plebiscite to release the Prime Minister from certain of his pledges.

The hon. member also spoke of the battle of the Atlantic, and took credit to the Canadian government, in association with the United States, because that battle was going successfully in the matter of convoys and so forth. I wonder if the hon. gentleman ever heard of the British navy.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): And the Canadian navy. Don't leave that out.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), true to form, is beginning his interruptions early in the game. He has not been here very often during this session, but I see he is here now, and perhaps he will be good enough to sit and listen.

The speech from the throne usually sets out the legislative programme of the government, but the speech on this occasion is remarkable in that it mentions a plebiscite which the government wishes to submit to the people in order that it may be released of certain election pledges. I shall not take time to read the reference; it has already been put on Hansard, but I say that this action on the part of the government is making Canada appear ridiculous not only in the sight of our own people but in the eyes of our allies.

I wish to refer briefly to the last session of parliament. It was a lengthy session and was devoted almost wholly to war measures and other government measures, and rightly so. Private members' days were taken away so that the private members had no opportunity to introduce resolutions and discussions upon them. I think at this session private members' days should be restored. There are about 230 members of the house outside of the cabinet, and if private members had the privilege of introducing resolutions and discussions, many constructive and helpful suggestions would be made to the government. I hope that that will be taken into consideration.

I am sure there is no member of this house who desires to discredit Canada's war effort. We do not belittle it. Far from it. I am prepared to say that I think Canada's war effort has been very substantial in many respects, perhaps even greater than some of us expected. We have been passing through trying times, and I am going to give the government credit for what they have done. Some, however, think that still more can be done. We boast in Canada of the morale of our people. We are going about many of our affairs as usual, and I think we should take up the challenge which the Right Hon. Winston Churchill gave from the very floor of this house when he said that the morale of the people will not produce guns and tanks and planes. It is men who are required for that, and it is men we want. We are facing a crisis which challenges us all. In due course I shall make further reference to that.

Hon. members will recall that at the time parliament was dissolved in January, 1940, after one day's sitting, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had a majority of over one hundred in this house, and there was no need for any election at that time. But the Prime Minister plunged us into an election; he came back with the very substantial majority which he has at the present time, and now after twenty-two months in office he brings forth this plebiscite to be submitted to the people to release him from certain pledges he claims to have given to the Canadian people in the last election campaign.

As I said, the government has a very substantial majority in this house. We all know that the war situation has become very much graver in recent months. We believe, and I think the majority of the Canadian people believe, that this is no time for a plebiscite, in view of the crisis facing Canada and the world. It would have been more courageous for the government to bring in a resolution for the complete mobilization of all our resources in finance, industry and manpower, and I venture to say that such a resolution would have the almost unanimous support of this house and of the people of this country.

I wonder what our soldiers overseas think about this plebiscite. From my own little town of Wolseley, with a population of 830, sixty-four of our boys have gone overseas, and I have an invitation card on my desk to all the boys from Wolseley overseas to get together at the Beaver Club on March 15 next. I wonder what those boys overseas will think of the action of this government in submitting a plebiscite to the people and what they would think of us if we supported the submitting of a plebiscite to release the Prime Minister of his pledges with no understanding of what he will do afterwards. Outside of the man-power available in Canada there are no forces to support our boys overseas. I think I know where they stand, and they know where I stood during the election. They know that I stood for complete mobilization of all our resources, in man-power, wealth and industry, in order to support our boys overseas no matter in which theatre of war they might be engaged. If we fail to do that, we are breaking faith with them.

I said a few moments ago that I wondered what the President of the United States thinks of this plebiscite. The President of the United States received a majority at the last election, after he had given a pledge in the election campaign that no United States troops would be sent outside of that country. But when the war with Japan came, did the President of the United States ask for a plebiscite to release him from the pledge he had given? What did Chamberlain do? What was his record following Munich? Did he think he had a birthright at stake, as our Prime Minister says he has? I think that was a childish reference. The Prime Minister said that he was being asked "to sell his birthright for a mess of their pottage", referring to the opposition to the plebiscite in the press and among the public. But Churchill and Chamberlain did not ask for a plebiscite—and there you have the difference between statesmen and a politician.

One of the reasons advanced for the plebiscite is that it will preserve unity in Canada. The position I take is this. Surely there is not an honest-to-God Canadian citizen who does not want to win this war, and if there is going to be any disunity, we had better see just where those people are. We should know about them.

It has been stated in this chamber, I think rightly, that from time to time both parties have made mistakes. We have heard much about the period of 1914-1918 and the conscription issue of 1917. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, that is all under the bridge; we are dealing with the present situation. But in referring to that period mention has been made of certain charges to the effect that the government of that day was corrupt. I know that Right Hon. R. L. Borden "cleaned house" when there was corruption. I recall statements about old horses which were sold down in Nova Scotia, and so forth, but the Prime Minister of the day, as I have said, did a thorough housecleaning. I suggest that before hon. members on the government side make any more references to this subject, they start and clean house too; and if they want to know where to start, we over here can tell them of a few things.

Mr. McNIVEN: Tell us now.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, we can do it now. I would hate to put on record some of the letters I have received and some of the things I have heard this session, even at this early stage. Something may be said about it a little later, and some of these things will come very near the bailiwick of the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven).

Mr. McNIVEN: Let us have them now.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member may get them before very long.

Mr. McNIVEN: Let us have them now. No veiled references.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: A little later we may give you some. If the hon. member will sit quiet in his seat, we shall get along all right; he will have his opportunity a little later.

Referring to the demand for release from pledges, I can recall many pledges made by the Prime Minister. I remember his speeches following the convention in Winnipeg in 1919. He stated that he was in favour of lower tariffs; he went down to the maritimes with a promise of reduced tariffs and said he intended to carry it out. Did he do so? I have in mind a speech he made in 1926 undertaking to restore responsible government in Canada. Did he carry that out? In 1936 he pledged a greater battle against the moneyed interests. Has he carried that out?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: Well, I am glad the hon. member is satisfied. A great majority of the people of Canada do not think he has. Also he made a statement that he would not declare war without asking parliament. Has he carried that out? I say he has not. And now it ill behooves him to come to this house, at this critical stage in the affairs of the war, with the request for a vote to release him from a pledge. He should come out with a courageous policy and he would receive the endorsation of all members of the house. We represent the people who sent us here; we keep in touch with our constituents; we know what is in their minds, and I venture to say that a vote of this house would be as good a criterion of public opinion as any plebiscite can show.

I might commend to the Prime Minister the memorandum, referred to by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Boucher), presented by the Canadian Legion and the Navy League. I have a copy of it here. It contains some good and worthwhile suggestions. When they declare for all-out war they set out quite definitely what they mean. What they suggest is contained in the amendment to the present motion. It calls for the mobilization of all our resources of man-power, wealth and industry, for a complete war effort. I will not read the memorandum and recommendations of the Canadian Legion, but I recommend them to the notice of all hon. members; if they were followed, I do not think there would be any difficulty.

There must be some reason for the government asking this release or taking this plebiscite. Whatever the facts are, the government know them better than any of us. Why do they not give us the facts and let us discuss the matter here? The Prime Minister said in a statement that the conscription issue should be fought out on the floor of parliament. Why, then, does he not fight it out here? Every one of us is prepared to take the responsibility of doing what he considers to be his duty. I believe that if the subject were properly presented and discussed here it would be unnecessary to take any other vote.

Let me make a brief reference to the question of enlistments. If the rate of voluntary enlistments is not satisfactory we should know about it.

Mr. THORSON: May I inform the hon. member that voluntary enlistments in the armed forces have been at the rate of almost 20,000 per month during the past seven months —that is, in the army, the air force, and the navy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the army?

Mr. CASSELMAN: How many were coerced in?

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister say that the enlistments are satisfactory?

Mr. THORSON: They have been, over this period of time.

Mr. PERLEY: Satisfactory?

Mr. THORSON: Quite satisfactory.

Mr. PERLEY: Then why need the government be released from any pledge?

Mr. HOMUTH: Why a plebiscite at all?

Mr. PERLEY: I repeat, why, if everything is satisfactory, need the government be released from any pledge?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They will decide in the light of what the future may hold.

Mr. HOMUTH: The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said it is not satisfactory.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We were 13,000 down in a four-month period.

Mr. PERLEY: I wish to mention the voluntary enlistments in the constituency I represent. I referred briefly to the matter in my own home town. In the constituency of Qu'Appelle we have a record of which we are proud. In the matter of enlistments our constituency stands about as high as any in Canada. We have no industry other than agriculture, and I want to pay a tribute to the farmers who allowed their sons to go—young men who enlisted early in this game, before there was any thought of a plebiscite. The sons of the farmers in the Qu'Appelle riding have done nobly, and great credit is due them. But the supply of farm help is greatly depleted. There should be some selective scheme of service under which every farmer and every man in western Canada would be in a better position to carry on. Some farmers are now in a very critical position with regard to labour. What we want is equality of sacrifice. A great many of our boys are fighting for $1.30 a day, yet we know that in other parts of Canada young men are getting as high as $7 and $8 a day. There are some from our district who have gone east and got jobs at that rate of wages. Such conditions do not represent equality of service or sacrifice.

There are two fronts on which we are fighting, the economic and the military. On the economic front we have achieved much. I am ready to give credit in that respect to the government. Great quantities of munitions, materials, guns and tanks have been produced. But I am not satisfied with what has taken place with respect to agriculture. It is playing a very important part but not getting a square deal. The agriculturists of the west are as loyal as any class in the country. They have made a great contribution; they have done their part up to date, and they will continue to play their part in the winning of this war, but they want a fair and reasonable degree of consideration. Western wheat has played a very important part in maintaining the volume of Canada's exports. After the war, if it is saved, and it must be saved, agriculture will play a greater part than almost any other industry in the rehabilitation of Canada. That is one reason why we want a fair deal and equal sacrifice, so that we shall be able to carry on. We want a parity of prices with the products of other industries which the farmer has to buy in order to carry on his business. After twenty-two and a half months, I think we should have what I would term a food production board to give direction. Represented on that board should be farmers and others, who would direct in the production of different commodities.

The Prime Minister has stated, quite correctly, that the wheat surplus will prove to be a great asset in the winning of the war. While the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), may have had a policy in 1940 to reduce wheat acreage, growing less wheat in order to win the war, when he came back from Britain in 1941 his first pronouncement in Canada, and in the west particularly, was to the effect that all this wheat would be needed and that even much better prices than we were receiving then would be obtainable. Why therefore is there a change of policy now? Why not have prices on a parity with other prices in order to give the farmer a chance?

In the last two or three days we have seen in Ottawa a delegation from western Canada numbering 430 strong. They represented 185,000 signers of the petition. Why did they come to Ottawa? They represent the pool of western Canada and practically every other industry or interest in the country that depends on farming—the merchants, the boards of trade, the municipalities, from the standpoint of taxation, and so on. They are representative of various organizations, and I know that hon. members who attended the banquet given last night in the parliamentary restaurant, and who saw that vast crowd, must have been impressed by their appearance. They are a splendid lot of men. The Prime Minister at least paid them that tribute. They came here because on former occasions when they have sent delegations—and they have done so many times—those delegations have not been properly received and have not been given the fair consideration which is due them. In order, therefore, to put their case squarely before the government and the parliament of Canada they decided to send this large delegation of 430. There is no reason why they should not come here.

Some people have been a little critical of the delegation; they have asked why they should come here and spend all that money. May I point out that taking the subscriptions at twenty-four cents each, that is not very much from each subscriber, and I think the trip was coming to these men. They will appreciate their experience here, even though I cannot say they will go home satisfied with the reception they got yesterday. The Minister of Agriculture more or less tore their brief to pieces, and possibly they will go home a little disappointed. They have not received all that they were asking for. But they were eminently fair in the brief they presented. I have it here but I will not read it. It contains a good many figures, and I am not going to quote figures to-day. I will only speak generally on this occasion, because on a future occasion I shall put the case of the western farmers fully before the house and bring forward such figures as are necessary to substantiate the arguments that I will then advance.

I cannot see why they should not get proper consideration. Their brief asks for a better price, a dollar a bushel. I do not think that is unreasonable. It asks that the 1942 crop be segregated and kept by itself on a quota basis, if you like. That is not unreasonable. It asks that the present surplus, beginning with the 1941 crop, be kept as a reserve following the conclusion of the war or when it may be needed later on—and we know it will be needed. We know what is happening in Russia, where the great wheat-growing plains are being devastated. We know what has happened to their machinery of production. Very shortly they will need this surplus wheat. I have never been concerned about a great surplus of wheat, because we have seen wheat pile up in Canada and then disappear almost over night.

I might refer to another brief presented to the government to show that western Canada is unanimous in the demand for a dollar or better for wheat. We have from the Northwest Line Elevators association a demand for $1.02 net or a parity price of $1.22. It is interesting to me to read this brief and to know that it has been presented to the government, because I can recall this organization's attitude to the farmers of western Canada, especially during the period from 1930 to 1935, when they were not very favourable to us in our effort to boost wheat prices. We did not get very much support from them. It is interesting to note now that that organization is asking for a little more than the pool, through their representation, are demanding. I was wondering if there was any significance at all in the fact that the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) has played an important part in that organization and is close to it now. I do hope the government will give consideration to at least one of these briefs and give the farmers a fair deal, a parity of prices.

In the brief presented by the pool organizations reference is made to Canada's national income and the fact that twenty per cent of the population of Canada is in the west, in the three prairie provinces, and receives only five per cent of that income. There is something wrong there, and their argument is sound. Many hon. members will forgive me if I make a personal reference to my own record, though the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) may resent it.

When I came to this house in 1930 I was imbued with one idea—that if with my wide experience in farming and also having been in the grain business for a number of years, I could not do something to help western Canada, and the farmers of western Canada particularly, my time would be wasted. Some of my time may have been wasted, but I have a clear conscience in this, that never have I failed to take advantage of every opportunity that has offered to put up a case for the western people. I regret that on many occasions I have failed to receive the support that I had expected when I sat for three sessions as the sole representative of the Conservative party from western Canada. Hardly a Liberal supported me, though Doctor Motherwell did. He supported suggestions I brought forward, and some of them were good, if I may be allowed to say so. I am glad to say that that gentleman, with a great deal of experience in his favour, and having the welfare of Canada at heart, did see eye to eye with me. But in 1934 and 1935, when the wheat board act was being passed, I fought—I think I may use that word—to have certain clauses inserted. It so happens that only one hon. member of this house was a member of the committee to which that bill was referred, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). I am sure he would bear me out when I say that time after time I insisted that certain clauses be put into that bill, taking in coarse grains, providing for price-fixing by a board, and so on.

Again in 1936 hon. members know what happened when I moved certain resolutions. Again in 1938 I suggested the processing tax, suggested a long-term price of ninety cents, possibly a dollar a bushel. I was right then because it is proven now that had we had that we would have been in a much better position and it would not have cost the country as much as it has already.

I made representations from time to time for a reduction in freight rates. In 1940 I had a resolution on the order paper, a copy of which I hold in my hand, calling for at least 90-cent wheat and the processing tax. I have a resolution on the order paper now which I hope will be reached in due course, and at that time I shall give some figures to show that we should have consideration and have a parity price fixed not for one year—this fiddling with the price each year is no use, because a review of the history of the past and of the prices over a period of ten or fifteen years indicates clearly that we can have a price which is nearer parity than the present price.

The Minister of Agriculture, even in 1939, speaking in this house on May 5, on Bill No. 83, as reported at page 3647 of Hansard, quoted Professor Hope to prove that farmers should have an average price of 95 cents to give them a decent living. That 95 cents he agreed should be net to the farmer, which would be about $1.15 at Fort William. He has changed his mind somewhat since, but I have here a quotation showing that he agreed with Professor Hope when he said that the farmers in order to carry on and have a reasonably decent living should have 90 to 95 cents net on the farm. Conditions are worse now; there is even greater reason for it than there was then.

I have here a comparison of the cost of living on the farm and in the cities and towns, taken from the Economic Annalist. Taking 1913 as the base year, 147 items, products of industry that the farmer has to buy, stand now at 143. But wheat is 14 per cent less, at 50 cents, than it was that year taken as the base. To-day industry is working on cost plus; we know what happened to labour, increased wages and a cost of living bonus; but the farmers are still expected to produce at less than cost.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Is that the Searle Grain Index figure?

Mr. PERLEY: No, the Economic Annalist of October. The Searle Index gives the 147 items which stand at 143. I have a number of figures here which I might put on record but I will not take the time. I suggest that the government consider adding a processing tax to a fair price; that they consider saving storage that they are paying to-day that they should not be paying to the grain companies, in terminals, annexes and in box cars—that is something I protested against; the average farmer in western Canada does not realize that he is paying for storage on a certain amount of his wheat in box cars; that they save interest by rebating the storage or making it possible for the farmers to store their grain on their own farms. What better asset could a farmer have than a thousand bushels of wheat in a bin secure on his own farm, on which he could realize sooner or later? It would be a splendid thing if the money paid by the government, some $26,000,000 for storage in other places, were to go back to the farmer. It would also result in a considerable saving in interest if the grain were stored on the farms rather than go to the market where it has to be paid for with consequent interest charge.

This is a national emergency, a national crisis that we are facing. This surplus will be needed, I am not worried about that. The government is financing purchases of food for Britain—cheese, bacon, butter, eggs, and so forth. I am not criticizing that at all, but I say they should go further and finance the purchase of wheat and deliver it to Britain at a fair price. That would be a splendid thing; it could come under that splendid offer made the other day by the Prime Minister to give a billion dollars or more to Great Britain.

I am going to support the amendment. It is far-reaching; it calls for complete mobilization of man-power, wealth, resources, industry and everything in Canada in order that we may have a complete war effort in any theatre of war. I trust, however, that the government will take into consideration the suggestions of the pool delegation. Their case was presented in a moderate way: they were fair and their representations deserve consideration. I believe the Minister of Agriculture is meeting with them now. In fact he sent me a note just before I started to speak, saying he regretted he had to attend that meeting. Well, I regret it too, because I wish he had heard a few of the things I have had to say. However, relief assistance and marketing are two different problems and must be considered from different angles.

All we want is a long range policy which will give the farmers the security and parity of prices which will bring them into their own once again. I trust the government will be courageous. I trust that the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) will make an announcement within the next few days—it would be splendid if they could make it while the delegation is here—to assure these men before they return to the west as to what is going to happen next spring, so that they can know what is to be the policy with respect to acreage reduction and what payments they will get for the 1942 crop, and so they can go home ready to prepare for the spring work with some heart. I hope they will get favourable consideration, and I think an announcement should be made at once.

I have a resolution on the order paper that I hope will be reached in due course. I shall then be glad to present figures to show that the case presented by the pools is fair and reasonable.

Mr. P. E. WRIGHT (Melfort): I did not have the privilege of hearing the addresses of the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, but from the many compliments which I have heard from all parts of the house I realize that they made their usual able contribution to the discussions of this parliament.

It is not my intention to-day to try to deal with the many problems which are opened up by the speech from the throne, but rather to confine my remarks to one or two which I believe to be of paramount importance at this time and which should be dealt with without delay if our war effort is not to be seriously impeded.

First I should like to deal with the matter of the plebiscite, and secondly to say something concerning agricultural production in this country as related to our war effort.

With regard to the plebiscite, in many of the speeches in this house I think there has been too much emotion and not enough appeal to reason. It seems to me that the less we raise sectional differences and strife in this country at this time, the better it is going to be for the country as a whole. I do not agree with the idea of a plebiscite. I think this parliament was elected during war time to carry on this war to a successful conclusion. In my own constituency some of my best friends came to me after the last election and said they had voted against me and for the government because they believed in a strong government that could carry on the war effort. I wonder what they are thinking to-day. I believe if the Prime Minister had come to parliament, placed all the facts before it and asked to be released from the commitments which were made by hon. members on all sides with regard to conscription, this parliament would have given him that release and accepted the responsibility.

After all, when we were sent here to Ottawa we assumed certain responsibilities, and I think we should be prepared to carry them out. I believe the ordinary man on the street to-day is saying, "What are those fellows doing down there? Why don't they get on with the job? That is what we sent them there to do." I believe the sooner we do that the better it will be for Canada. I freely admit that this would have been a serious responsibility to assume, but I think most of us would have been prepared to go back to our constituents and defend our action. That procedure could have been carried through very quickly and with a minimum of expense. Various estimates have been made as to what this plebiscite may cost. In my view the greatest expense will be the time and labour that will be involved. It is not the money itself but the effort, the wasted energy, which might be employed to better advantage at this time.

I should like to deal with the three suggestions before the house at the moment. The government say, "We have already mobilized wealth and industry in this country. We have conscripted men for home service, and now we are asking you to release us from our promise not to conscript men for overseas service." I have no patience with those who go round the country belittling our war effort. Let no one be mistaken; we in Canada have made and are making a very valuable contribution to the carrying on of this war. The statement made in this house by the Prime Minister proves that. But I do not think any hon. member can state honestly that we have made our maximum effort, that we have used every dollar, every man and every woman to the greatest possible extent. Only when we have done that can we say that we have a total war effort. The government have conscripted men for home service, but as yet they have not conscripted wealth or industry; they have merely organized them. It is true that we have high taxation, but as yet that taxation is far from being confiscatory. I believe we should measure our taxation in this way: that we should take in taxes in this country all income which enables any person to employ, either directly or indirectly, the services of any man or woman to do for him something which he is physically able to do for himself. When that point is reached I think we will find a great reservoir of labour and money made available in this country.

Let us look at the distribution of the last war loan, as set forth by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). The total number of subscriptions was 968,259, and the amount subscribed $836,820,250. Subscriptions of $50 and $100 numbered 661,282, or 68·3 per cent of the total number of subscriptions. The amount subscribed in this way was $45,302,650, or 5·4 per cent of the total. Subscriptions of from $50 to $500 numbered 861,046, or 88·9 per cent of the total number. The amount subscribed in this way was $115,300,950, or 13·7 per cent of the total amount. In other words 68·3 per cent of the subscribers invested only 5·4 per cent of the total amount, while 88·9 per cent bought only 13·7 per cent of the total loan. In other words 11·1 per cent of the subscribers took 86·3 per cent of the total loan. This shows those who were able to subscribe to that war loan.

I wonder what the men serving in our army, navy and air force are going to say when they return to Canada and find this situation. Are they going to be satisfied, when the war is over, to find that a small percentage of the people of this country will be able to sit back, clip coupons, and through those coupons, demand the services of the men who fought to make those coupons worth the paper on which they were written?

Mr. McNEVIN: If the hon. member would permit an interruption, I believe there is one point which should not be overlooked. Included in that smaller percentage of subscribers were several large insurance companies which invested the funds of a very large number of people.

Mr. WRIGHT: I quite agree, but even taking that into consideration I believe I am more than fair in saying that less than thirty per cent of those subscribing took more than seventy per cent of the last war loan.

I believe the sooner we in this house take a more realistic view of what is happening in Canada to-day, the less trouble we are likely to have in the post-war period. Only when we have conscription of accumulated wealth and industry, as well as of man-power, shall we have a total war effort. Let us take two men who started out thirty years ago. The one man raised a family; the other did not. To-day we say to the man who has three sons, under our selective service system—and I believe in selective service—that his boys must serve where they can make their greatest contribution. To one we say, "You must serve in the army;" to another we say, "You must serve in the air force," and we allow the third to remain at home. What do we say to the man who did not raise a family and who, perhaps partly because of that fact and partly through fortuitous circumstances, was able to accumulate a certain amount of this world's goods? Do we say to him that he must give his money to the government? No; we institute expensive war loan drives and advertising campaigns to coax it out of him. This is entirely unnecessary. We should conscript wealth as well as the young men of the country. If we have compulsory service, it is necessary that we have compulsory interest-free loans, levied according to ability to subscribe.

Let us now consider the amendment moved by the Conservative opposition. It reads, in part:

> This house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have not seen fit to recommend to parliament without delay additional measures designed to
> (a) completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war;
> (b) supply the imperative needs of agriculture, industry, and the fighting forces of the nation; and
> (c) prepare for the post-war period.

This sounds very good. I could support that amendment myself if I were sure just what is meant. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) stated the other day that the substance of the amendment and that of the amendment to the amendment moved by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation were practically the same. I am afraid he was not using his usual keen sense of perception, otherwise he would not have made that statement.

To begin with, to mobilize means to organize. To conscript means to control and to operate. There is a vast difference between organizing an industry to produce as efficiently as possible, but for a profit, and controlling and operating that industry to produce as efficiently as possible, without profit, and for the state. That is the difference between the amendment moved by the Conservative party and the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The hon. member for Lake Centre said the only difference was in the method. As I said before, I do not agree with the method being used in connection with the plebiscite. I believe the question being asked is not a fair one. We believe that along with that question there should be another one, as outlined in our amendment.

First let us consider the mobilization of wealth and industry. The government states that it has already done that, and I have not heard one of the leaders of the Conservative party state publicly that he would go farther in that respect. In fact I have seen reports of speeches by Right Hon. Mr. Meighen in which he has stated that we have gone too far. The present leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has stated in the house that he believes the excess profits tax is as high as it should be at the present time. He objected to many aspects of the succession duties tax. Yet they do not believe that we have gone far enough in the mobilization or, should I say, regimentation of labour, and the conscription of man-power. With regard to the second and third proposals may I say that I am in entire agreement.

Let us now consider the amendment to the amendment moved by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. It states:

> This house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have used the sweeping powers conferred by the National Resources Mobilization Act mainly for the conscription of men for home defence, and in the opinion of this house no total effort adequate to meet the present needs of the war, domestic problems and the preparation for post-war conditions is possible without total mobilization of wealth, industry and finance, as well as human resources.
> Therefore this house respectfully requests that the forthcoming plebiscite should seek the support of the people of Canada for the complete and effective conscription of war industries, accumulated wealth and financial institutions, at the same time and on the same basis of sacrifice as the suggested extension of the conscription of man-power.

There is no pussyfooting about that. We say, in effect, that we are realists. This is a total war, and the way to meet total war is by total effort. Let us put everything we have into the conflict—every dollar, every factory, every resource, every man and every woman, on an equal footing, at the same time and on the same basis of sacrifice, without hesitation and without quibbling. And when the war is over and victory won, let us start on an equal footing to build a better Canada, a better and saner world to live in. That is what the people of Canada want, and that is what the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation stands for.

We do not believe that when this war is over any individual or group of individuals, through holding accumulations of war bonds, or by owning the factories and natural resources of this country, should be able to say to the people of Canada, "You must work for us. We own the tools with which you must work, the materials you must use. We control the tokens you must use to provide yourselves with the necessities of life. You must pay tribute to us."

For a short time I should like to deal with the matter of agriculture. Speaking in this debate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is reported to have said this, at page 34 of Hansard:

> A vital aspect of Canada's war effort is our contribution to the food supply of Great Britain. This contribution has grown steadily in importance. Britain cannot feed herself, and her own great and growing armed forces. Still less can she feed the ever-increasing numbers of men we are sending from Canada to add to her armed strength. In the present war, unlike the last, her sources of food on the continent of Europe have all been closed off by enemy occupation. Canada is the nearest source of food left open. Without our food the people of Britain might starve. Without our food the Canadian army in Britain would be a handicap instead of a help. In a literal sense the very lives of the British people and our own armed forces overseas depend upon the exertions of Canadian farmers and fishermen. In prosecuting the war, theirs is no secondary role. As time goes on, the demands upon Canada for supplies of food for the allied forces and, later, for the peoples of the now subjugated countries are certain to increase.

I would call particular attention to these last two sentences:

> I have mentioned food production separately because I doubt whether the country is fully aware of the vital importance of food regarded as a munition of war. Otherwise, it might well have been included as a phase of the productive aspect of our total effort.

Whose responsibility is it that it has not been included as a phase of the productive aspect of our total war effort? Whose responsibility is it that Canada is not aware of the vital importance of food, regarded as a munition of war? We have in the government a Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) who is in charge of publicity. If the country is not aware of the importance of food in our total war effort, then it is the responsibility of the government to make it aware of that fact. Knowing all the facts, why is it that the government has not made the production of food a phase of our total war effort?

Every hon. member who has been in Great Britain has stated that Great Britain needs all the concentrated foodstuffs we can produce. Nevertheless for the last two years the government has continued to treat agriculture as an industry of secondary importance. It has by economic pressure deprived agriculture of its labour, and has increased the cost of the tools it must use to produce. We have not reached the maximum of our possible production in Canada, but I believe we have reached the limit of our present possible production, unless we are to supply either more labour or better tools with which the farmers may produce.

We have been asked for more dairy products. The only way in which we can have more dairy products is to pay a price for them which will enable the farmers to compete in the market for the available labour, and also to provide the necessary labour-saving devices. When the government wants more munitions, more guns, more aeroplanes, more tanks or more clothing, it assists the manufacturers to re-tool their plants and to produce those commodities as effectively and economically as possible. All agriculture asks is similar treatment.

During the past war there was a demand for wheat. Large areas in western Canada which never should have been broken up were put under cultivation. Farmers under the stimulus of increased prices bought equipment and assumed obligations which they could never fulfil. What guarantee has the farmer to-day that if he equips himself to produce dairy products, hogs and other requirements, he will not again be left holding the bag?

Industry has stated in no uncertain terms: If you want more plant or equipment than we can use in peace time, then the government must build it and we will operate it for you. This government and the British government have accordingly erected some 600 million dollars' worth of such plants. How much assistance has been given the farmer to construct new plant or equipment to produce food? How much assistance is to be given him this year to see that he is able to procure labour-saving machinery to replace the men going into the army and into industry? These are some of the questions the government must answer if they are to get greater production.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is asking the western farmer to grow more coarse grains. I will tell him how he can get more coarse grains sown. Just guarantee to the farmer that he will receive the full cost of production, including depreciation, replacement and a fair return on capital investment. At the present time there is a maximum price on coarse grains but no minimum. Every farmer knows from sad experience over the past twenty-five years that if he grows a bumper crop of coarse grains this year and the speculative market is left open, the price will go below the cost of production. What incentive, is there, then, to increase production?

If the government want greater production of coarse grains, all they have to do is to close the Winnipeg grain exchange, announce that the present maximum price will also be the minimum price and that the premium on malting barley will be increased to ten cents a bushel. If they do that, they will get greater production.

Last fall there was a demand for malting barley in the United States, and considerable quantities were being shipped. Then this government stopped the export, and immediately the price in this country dropped. The government stated that we needed for feeding purposes all the coarse grains we had in Canada. Anyone knows that wheat can be substituted for barley for feeding purposes, and we have plenty of wheat. The breweries are using large quantities of barley. They cannot substitute wheat. Did they bring pressure to bear on the government to stop the export so that they could get cheaper barley? If there is a real shortage of barley for feeding purposes, would it not be better to use it to produce bacon for Britain rather than beer for ourselves? The speculative market, whatever may have been said in favour of it in peace time—and I do not think there was anything to be said in favour of it then—certainly in war time serves no good purpose. It only confuses and discourages the producer. We are told that the law of supply and demand controls our prices, but anyone who has followed prices in this country of agricultural products in particular knows quite well that that is not the situation. Let me give you an instance.

In July of last summer a neighbour of mine shipped two animals, a two-year-old heifer and a herd sire, to the Winnipeg market. For the heifer he received $8.25 per hundred pounds, and for the sire $6.50 per hundred. Six weeks later, another neighbour made a similar shipment. He received $8.20 per hundred pounds for the herd sire and $6.50 per hundred for the heifer. I am sure that the people of Canada had not changed their eating habits during that short interval. The government to-day are the largest purchasers of a number of products, and the only basis there could be for assuming that the demand had changed would be that the government needed more boloney to feed to the Canadian people through its propaganda department. How is the producer to know what are the requirements, with the market jumping in this manner?

We have had in Ottawa this week a large delegation from Saskatchewan to present to the government what the farmers believe to be the just demands of western agriculture. Their demands have received the approval of the organized farmers in both Manitoba and Alberta and have been approved by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. They have also received the support of the towns and cities of the west. The requests of the farmers are moderate—the minimum, in their opinion, on which western agriculture can continue to produce. If the Prime Minister's statement, that food is needed and will be needed in increasing quantities, is correct, then I believe this government should see to it that necessary action is taken to give effect to their requests. I consider that there is something seriously wrong with our democracy when any section of this country finds it necessary to send such a delegation to Ottawa. Either we who represent them have failed to place their case fairly before the government, or the government, knowing the case, have refused to pay any heed to it. Surely the government knew of these conditions.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture both represent Saskatchewan constituencies. Last summer I attended in the Prime Minister's constituency a public meeting called for the purpose of protesting against the present price of wheat. The largest theatre in the city of Prince Albert could not hold the crowd, and hundreds stood on the street listening to the loud-speakers. The chairman of the board of trade, the mayor of the city, along with the reeves of the municipalities, stood on the platform and openly supported the demands which the present delegation are bringing to Ottawa. The farmers of Saskatchewan do not want to be paid treaty money; they want a price for their products that is equal to the cost of production. They would like to see the present Prairie Farm Assistance Act so amended that it will become a comprehensive crop insurance plan. After our experiences over the past twelve years in Saskatchewan, we realize that crop insurance must be a part of any plan for the rehabilitation of western Canada.

Three things I believe are essential if we are to get increased production: (1) a parity price; (2) the labour situation must be rectified, and (3) provision must be made for supplying up-to-date machinery and repairs at reasonable cost. If these things are done, I am sure that we can materially increase our present production of needed food.

First, as to the parity price, I would ask the Minister of Agriculture what formula was used in determining maximum prices for agricultural products. We know, according to the bureau of statistics, that over thirty-three per cent of the population of Canada were engaged in agriculture in 1939 and that they received only eleven per cent of the national income that year. We also know that since the war our national income has probably doubled, but agricultural income has not kept pace with this advance. Using as a base 100 in 1926, we find that grain products to-day stand at 57·9. Animal and dairy products have reached an approximate parity. There is certainly no equality in such a situation.

This government, instead of developing a balanced, equitable programme for agriculture during the war, has simply drifted along trying to deal with each separate situation as it arose. We have an agriculture committee of this house. The first time it was called together during the life of this parliament was when it was invited to the banquet of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture last Thursday. We enjoyed the banquet. We heard there a speech from Mr. Evans, chairman of the AAA farm programme in the United States, who outlined the comprehensive programme which they have adopted. They have been developing it for the last eight years. When war was declared last December, it found agriculture in the United States prepared to take its place in the war economy and do its full share on an equal basis with labour and industry. Agriculture in Canada asks similar treatment.

I would advise every hon. member who is interested in agriculture to-day to make a study of what they are doing in the United States. I am sure there are points in their programme which can be copied in Canada to our advantage. Their price is based on an equality with wages of labour and retail prices. In the United States to-day they have a guaranteed price of $1.17 a bushel for wheat, while they are able to buy their implements and tools of production at from fifteen to twenty-five per cent less than we can in Canada. They have an ever-normal granary programme whereby thirty per cent of the normal crop of non-perishable foods is kept in reserve. They have a land conservation programme and a comprehensive crop insurance plan.

Second, with regard to the labour situation in Canada, if we are to increase the present production of the foods we need for Great Britain, some form of selective service draft will have to be introduced immediately. I believe that we have drawn from the farms of Canada all the men that we can by our present methods without seriously affecting production. If it is essential that more be called, then we must make provision to replace them by other labour.

Now, just a word with regard to agricultural implements. Their price has for years been out of line with the price of agricultural products. The government have known this. It is ancient history. They appointed a commission, spent thousands of dollars, ascertained all the facts, and then took no action. I am not going to enter into a discussion of this matter this afternoon. I should like to point out a greater danger at this time. Last year it was becoming increasingly difficult for the farmers to get repairs for farm machinery. Unless the government see to it that companies make proper provision for this, I am afraid many of them may concentrate on the more lucrative production of war materials. Now is the time to take steps to prevent this. If we wait until the situation becomes acute next fall, it will be too late. I would ask the government to make the necessary investigations at once and to see that this situation does not develop.

I know the farmers of Canada; I have farmed in both eastern and western Canada. They are willing and anxious to do their share. They ask for no special privileges. They demand equality. Given that, they are prepared to make all the sacrifices which may be necessary to secure victory.

Mr. G. T. FULFORD (Leeds): Like so many hon. members who have preceded me, I wish to take this opportunity of complimenting the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is indeed fortunate that the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) are men of superior intelligence and modesty, otherwise I fear that enlarged heads might require new hats, at a time when we are asked to limit our purchases as much as possible.

It is my desire to-day to plead with this house for tolerance and a better understanding in this great dominion of ours. Often, however, in attempting to be tolerant, one becomes impatient of those who are intolerant. This I shall attempt to the utmost of my ability to avoid.

We must all strive to understand that each section of Canada has its own particular problems. We have one of the longest and, thank God, the most friendly boundaries of any nation in the world. But the very fact that we have such a long boundary, stretching well over three thousand miles from the Atlantic to the Pacific, means that we have more than ordinary problems to face. In the maritimes they have difficulties which are peculiar to those three provinces. Quebec has its own difficulties. Ontario has questions which are of vital importance to that province.

We know that the three prairie provinces find themselves in a dilemma to-day chiefly as a result of world conditions affecting wheat. We know also that British Columbia is facing great difficulties. It is therefore, during time of war, more important than ever that we try to understand each other, that we bury our differences, that we comprehend Canada not in a narrow sectional way but as a nation as a whole. In that way we can overcome once and for all, for the duration of the war and, I hope, for all time, sectionalism and distrust.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has consecrated his life to the task of unifying the dominion, and up to the immediate present no other man has succeeded to the same extent that he has. When he assumed office in 1921 Canada was disunited and resentful, but through his indefatigable perseverance a degree of unity was approached such as this country had never known. Some weeks ago I was telephoned by a member of the committee of two hundred which was meeting in Toronto at the time with the alleged object of advancing Canada's war effort. I was asked if I favoured the policies advocated by this committee. I said in reply that if what they were after was national selective service with complete mobilization of all our man-power and resources, I was heartily behind them, but that if it was only conscription of men for overseas service, I was diametrically opposed to that. Unfortunately, as time goes on, the only issue which appears to be advanced is that of conscription for overseas service. It is being used as a smoke-screen to hide all other Canadian achievements and problems.

Some had high hopes that with the second coming of George McCullagh and his two hundred prophets a great deal might come out of Canada. I said "some", not all of us, because all too many of us remember his leaderless—I beg pardon, Mr. Speaker—his Leadership league and how it evaporated into the mists.

More recently another voice a few blocks away from the office of the Globe and Mail has been heard not only across Ontario but throughout the length and breadth of Canada. I refer to the premier of Ontario, who has on several previous occasions tried to split the Liberal party, but who to-day is trying new and far more sinister tactics and, with his uncalled for, unjustifiable and contemptible remarks, is in danger of splitting Canada. Well do I remember when he referred to Ontario as the milch cow for the rest of Canada. I wonder how the other eight provinces felt about that. As a citizen of Ontario I did not feel happy about the remark. I remember sitting in this house when he scuttled the dominion-provincial conference on the Sirois report, a little over a year ago. Whether one believed in the recommendations of that report or not is beside the question; the fact remains that these delegates were asked to stay when the report was thrown out and discuss any problems of vital importance concerning each province in the dominion in relation to the dominion as a whole, and this same man who sets himself up on a pedestal in Ontario would have nothing to do with it. Instead of listening to reason and trying to contribute something to the conference, he caught the first train back to Toronto in a huff.

To-day we see him in Welland, and I shall quote a few remarks of his as published in the Ottawa Citizen of this morning, Tuesday, February 3, 1942. I quote:

> The premier criticized the federal government for what he said was a "policy of appeasement in every critical issue before and since the war began", termed the calling of the plebiscite a "criminal act" of reneging on the government's commitments and declared "this government at Ottawa has been a sham government."

Compare that with the remarks made by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill, probably one of the most outstanding men of to-day, leader of the British empire, when he said in this very house on December 30 last:

> The contribution of Canada to the imperial war effort in troops, in ships, in aircraft, in food and in finance, has been magnificent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was talking about the people of Canada, not the government.

Mr. FULFORD: But the government are regulating the affairs of the people.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The people are supplying the money and brains.

Mr. FULFORD: The people would not have had an opportunity to make this contribution had it not been for the policies of the government. Whose opinion are the people generally of Canada to take, that of a little man in Toronto who desires more power than his mental capacity is equal to, or the opinion of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill?

I wish to quote some more remarks of the premier of Ontario.

> The calling of the plebiscite, Mr. Hepburn said, was the "crowning instance" of the federal government's appeasement policy. . . . Mr. King had attempted to appease the west as well, Mr. Hepburn said. "To appease the west we speculated in wheat and the wheat board announced the other day that we had lost nearly $80,000,000 on our speculations. Then we bonused the west to grow wheat and after that we bonused the west not to grow wheat."

Does that sound like a man who is trying in this time of crisis to unify the country—pitting one section against the other. Further:

> "The trouble is that we've been loaded down with a policy of appeasement", the premier declared.

He referred also to appeasing the province of Quebec—another jab at another province. I do not believe that even Mr. Hepburn's most intimate friends and associates are in sympathy with the stand he is taking to-day. He has let his party down; but worse, far worse, he has let his province and his country down.

At the beginning of my remarks I pleaded for tolerance, but there is one thing that no tolerant person can overlook or forgive, namely, betrayal and treachery; and that is what we see in the premier of Ontario to-day. To those sitting opposite, I should like to offer a word of advice regarding this political chameleon. At present he professes to back the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen; but let me read what he had to say at the nomination meeting at a by-election in the provincial riding of Hastings East, in the village of Madoc, on Thursday, December 2, 1936. I have no doubt the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) will remember that day. I remember it because, when Mr. Hepburn rose to speak, bedlam was let loose. I have never heard so many people shouting so loud in so many different veins, some boos and some cheers, but always to a general confusion such as one seldom sees anywhere. Allow me to read what Mr. Hepburn thought of Mr. Meighen on that day. This is reported by the Canadian Press and comes from the files of the Montreal Gazette. It is dated Madoc, December 2:

> Premier Hepburn, speaking here to-day in a joint debate with Conservative leader Rowe, reiterated Liberal charges made in the 1934 Ontario general election about Senator Arthur Meighen dealing in Ontario Power Service Corporation bonds while a member of the hydro commission.
> "Meighen had $300,000 of these bonds" said the premier. "He violated his oath of office. He bought $90,000 more."
>
> The reference to Mr. Meighen was made in the course of a criticism of administration of Colonel George Drew, former Ontario Securities' Commissioner.

I want hon. members to get this tie-up:

> "During Drew's administration of his office there was more graft and corruption practised in Toronto than ever before," the premier said. First act of Colonel Drew's successor, he added, was to oust 91 "high pressure" stock salesmen from a Toronto hotel.
> Colonel Drew, Conservative campaign director, sat on the platform and heard the premier repeat last night's challenge that he get any responsible mining men to endorse the Drew administration of the commissioner's office.

"I telephoned Mr. McCrea (Charles McCrea, former Ontario mines minister) to-day and he declined to comment," the premier said. "His very silence is its own condemnation of Drew."

Mr. Hepburn charged $12,000,000 had been taken from the Ontario investing public because Colonel Drew failed to act on information placed before him in connection with investment trusts with which Mr. Meighen allegedly was associated.

"Western shareholders asked Ontario to investigate manipulations by the trust and made charges of fraud," Mr. Hepburn said. Attorney-General Price sent the file to Drew who was being paid $10,000 a year. He reprimanded the shareholders publicly and said the matter was not in his jurisdiction.

"After that Meighen met Price and you can't tell me Drew didn't have his ear to the keyhole. The Tories stick together in milking the public. These custodians of justice—Drew, Price and honest George Henry (former premier) got together. They said, 'What will we do for little Arthur? He's in a bad way'. And they decided to buy Ontario Power Service bonds. Meighen was on the hydro commission and the commission took over at $18,000,000 bonds which had a market value of $6,000,000.

"Meighen had $300,000 of these bonds. He violated his oath of office. He bought $90,000 more. He was reprimanded by Mr. Henry who himself was a participant in the worst swindle ever put over on the people of Ontario."

I understand that Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, Premier Hepburn and Colonel Drew are all to be on the same platform to-morrow night. Strange bed-fellows!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You used to sleep with them, didn't you?

Mr. FULFORD: Yes, and I have regretted it ever since. I notice, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen to-day, Mr. Hepburn said he had hung his head in shame when the announcement of the plebiscite was made. I hang my head in shame when I think that I was the chairman of the meeting that chose Mitchell F. Hepburn to lead the Liberal party in Ontario. I further hang my head in shame to think that I was a member in the Ontario legislature for three years and four months suffering the indignities imposed upon the private members of that body by the dictator of Ontario. I believe that the people of not only Ontario, but of all Canada, of the other eight provinces that he has insulted time and time again, will realize, once and for all, the calibre of man that he really is, and stop listening to his silly palaver.

The remarks of Mr. Hepburn regarding our Prime Minister are beneath contempt and an insult to the intelligence of the electorate of Canada. The Prime Minister has been spoken of as a coward. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that no man is a coward who can withstand the tirades and insults emanating from certain sources in Toronto. He has conscientiously and courageously withstood those taunts from that section, taunts that are unwarranted, unnecessary and unbelievable. When the voice of the people is heard through the plebiscite, those hysterical screams and screeches will be drowned for now and for all time.

No one in this house, or, for that matter, in Canada, can help being thrilled when he reads of Australia and the deeds of her soldiers, sailors and Royal Australian Air Force, many of the latter of whom were trained in Canada under the empire training plan. History will acclaim for all time the bravery of Australian soldiers in Libya, Greece, Crete, and, more recently, Singapore. The defiance by Australian sailors of the enemy throughout the seven seas, and the exploits of her airmen over Germany and the conquered nations of Europe, over Libya, Singapore and the Dutch East Indies, and over the Japanese and British mandated islands in the south Pacific have covered them with glory.

The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe has referred to the plebiscite as being un-British. But Australia had two referenda in the last war. I shall quote from Chambers' Encyclopedia the definitions of "plebiscite", "initiative" and "referendum":

> A plebiscite is often used in Britain for an attempt to secure an expression of opinion on some special point of local interest by all the inhabitants of a district.
> An initiative and referendum—the political institutions under which the people of a nation may initiate measures to be enacted by their own votes into laws.

The fundamental difference between the two is that a plebiscite allows a government to change acts or laws, whereas a referendum requires that the laws be changed; but in principle they are very similar and in no sense can either be termed "un-British".

In this war Australia has no conscription for overseas service. South Africa has no conscription; India has no conscription, and the people of northern Ireland are just talking about it now. Is it not an insult to our sister dominions and other parts of the empire for us in this country to condemn the government of Canada for not introducing it here when it is not introduced generally elsewhere within the empire? Let us remember that every time a thrust is given this government, there is also given a thrust against the government of south Africa, northern Ireland, India and Australia.

Now that Australia's position is desperate, she is mobilizing her man-power up to the age of sixty for home defence.

I should like to suggest that even before the plebiscite, Canada begin total mobilization of man-power and resources. I know that this is under consideration, and I have no doubt that before many months have passed, it will be brought before the public in concrete form. We have heard from several hon. members from British Columbia of the danger in which the west coast finds itself, and we know that German submarines are operating off the Atlantic seaboard. I believe that before the coming of summer even greater dangers will assail us from the powers of evil. We must be prepared for any emergency. We must even accelerate our industrial and agricultural production. But, above all, we must be ready to meet, to the extent of our capacity, any and all demands made on us by the empire and the United Nations.

The outposts of the United States have been struck; Singapore and our sister dominions of New Zealand and Australia are in grave peril, and our own seacoast may be and can be invaded. We must, therefore, be ready to strike and strike hard. But this we cannot do unless Canada is united as never before. Let us, therefore, back this plebiscite to the limit of our ability—and I appeal to all parties in this respect—to assure the Prime Minister and the government that the voters of our dominion are fully conscious of the gravity of the situation. The Prime Minister, his ministers and supporters, must be released from a pledge made before the subjagation of Europe by Germany, before the entry of Italy into the war, and before that most treacherous of all attacks made by Japan in this most gigantic and horrible of all wars.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Fulford). He made a wonderful speech; in fact I think he must have been taking lessons from the Prime Minister, because his speech was 99 per cent politics.

No matter where we go to-day all we hear is the plebiscite. We hear it on the streets, on trains, and everywhere else. I have been speaking to men in the navy, the air force, and the army, and that is all they are talking about. Many questions are being asked: Is the Prime Minister in earnest about this plebiscite? What will be done if the answer is yes; and what will be done if the answer is no? Will he go through with it, or will he just get the machinery for a plebiscite in shape and then, at the last moment, spring a general election? If he does that, the people of Canada will not only rebel; they will be very much disappointed in the Prime Minister and the government. They want to know the reason for the delayed action. Why does the Prime Minister continue to play politics? Does he know something he is not telling the people? Will the plebiscite create unity or lunacy? That was asked me by a soldier. The other day I was speaking to a lady who has three sons in England. She said she did not think the mothers, fathers, brothers, sisters, wives and sweethearts of the men in the armed forces would appreciate the fact that here in Canada we shall be marking crosses on plebiscite ballots while crosses are being raised over the graves of those brave men who are fighting for us.

Instead of taking a plebiscite, I wonder whether it would not contribute more to the unity of Canada, about which we hear so much, if the government raised the pay of the armed forces to a level equal or nearly equal to that of the men and women in our munitions plants. If that were done, I believe, after talking to a number of men working in those plants and also talking to soldiers, that there would be absolutely no need to talk about conscription because all the men needed could be got without it. They would sign up to fight in Canada or anywhere in the world they might be needed. At the present time they get $1.30 a day, with $20 a month deducted for their wives or mothers. Then, if a man from my city, for instance, wants to go home on twenty-four hour leave, it costs him $5.50 to go from Ottawa to Peterborough. The other night I picked up two air force boys at Port Hope. They had paid $5.50 for a ticket from Ottawa, and there they were left stranded, thirty miles from Peterborough. The rate seems to be the same whether they go to Port Hope or Peterborough, and there they were left with thirty miles to walk. One of these air force boys said that if the government paid the soldiers more money, eventually the government would get it all back again. The soldiers spend their money on train fare, for one thing, and the government owns the railway. Every time they buy anything the government gets part of the money in taxes, and those taxes are pyramided, what with the corporation tax, the excess profits tax, the sales tax and everything else. Certainly that money would come back to the government not once but perhaps twice over. The munitions worker gets a bonus, but the pay of the soldier has not been raised. The men and girls in the munitions factories believe they are getting something extra by way of the bonus, but in reality their purchasing power is not increased at all.

I have a little verse, written by a member of this house, dealing with the plebiscite. It reads:

> Oh, Mr. Churchill, don't you fear,
> Canada is voting again this year.
> Voting for to fight the foe?
> Oh, no, Mr. Churchill; just to spend > the dough.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): From what kindergarten did you get that?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The one down in Northumberland.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Well, you have been around there enough to learn something.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is perfectly true; I have been around Northumberland a great deal lately, and I hope to be there again soon.

One person suggested to me that if the plebiscite is to be taken, it should be held on April 1, because anyone voting on the plebiscite, whether they vote yes or no, would be fooled, because the answer they would never know. It has been said that, relatively speaking, the civil service is growing faster than the army. Most of those in the civil service have been given bonuses, but that is not the case with the soldiers.

I have been speaking of the soldier and his pay, but now I should like to mention the dependents of those in the armed forces. They should get a bonus also.

Mr. MARTIN: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Thank you for agreeing; I know many hon. members will agree with that. The government has allowed the dependents of those holding the rank of warrant officer and under to obtain extra allowances if they have three or four children; the dependents of a soldier holding the rank of lieutenant or higher do not get it. That is right, perhaps, because the officers are receiving higher pay. One hon. gentleman says what they get is scandalous, but the soldiers get a scandalously lot less. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the dependents of our soldiers should receive this bonus. I believe the increase in soldiers' pay would take care of any shortage in men. The men already in the armed forces would know that we have not forgotten them, and the men who are enlisting would know that they had been treated fairly. I hope the government will increase the pay, and also forget about this plebiscite.

I believe we should have complete mobilization of all our natural resources, both material and man-power. When I refer to material resources I have in mind what is commonly known as the conscription of wealth. But by that I do not mean that the farmer should have his farm or his cattle taken away from him. I do not mean that the workers should have their homes taken away from them. Some farmers have homes, but they are mortgaged to the hilt. As I have said before in the house, the farmer is the forgotten man. I do not mean that the worker who has saved a few dollars should have those few dollars taken from him, as some hon. members to my left seem to think. He should be allowed to keep what he has.

When I refer to conscription of wealth I mean just that. We should use absolutely everything necessary to the winning of the war. If you and I have to do without an extra shirt, then we should do without it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be a small thing.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know that because of heavy taxation many hon. members have had to plan their lives much differently from last year, and if this year's budget is anything like what I expect, every hon. member will have to cut down to an even greater extent.

An hon. member to my left said to-day that any one who is employing a person for work he could do himself should fire that person. I would understand from that observation the hon. member meant that domestic help should be discharged. I believe that is practically what was said to my left this afternoon, and that is the meaning the people throughout the country will take. His statement meant that domestic help should go. I do not believe in that principle.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member who is reputed to have made that statement is not at the moment in his place, but if the hon. member who is now addressing the house will read Hansard to-morrow, he will find that his interpretation of the statement made by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) is not correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. GILLIS: The statement Wright made—and I was listening to him—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Just a moment; I am making the speech.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member's statement is incorrect, and should be corrected. The hon. member for Melfort said that anyone who has some one working for him should let that person go, and do the work himself. The hon. member should stick to that statement, it seems to me. That is what was said.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I am not going to have any hon. member contradict me on that, while I am talking.

Mr. HANSELL: Read the statement.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): As soon as I get Hansard. I wish to say here and now that Canada has done wonderfully well in the production of munitions and supply.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): All right, all right. Men for the armed forces? —they have got them in the navy and in the air force. I will acknowledge that, and I give due credit to the ministers of those departments. But at the same time those same ministers should allow criticism in the house. If they do not want criticism we should be permitted to have a secret session before which they could give us the facts, instead of keeping members of parliament in the dark.

One hon. member from British Columbia said yesterday that he was not allowed to go where Japanese were allowed to go. That is not fair, and hon. members have not been treated fairly by the government. Hon. members on the government side have not been treated fairly, either.

An hon. MEMBER: We are not complaining.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know; hon. members on the government side are afraid to say anything. They have a taskmaster who makes them behave and toe the mark, every time. The hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) had some views which he expressed—and then he made a speech at the opening of the session when he expressed views which were just the opposite. "Toe the mark"—I have not the words, and I do not think old Dan Webster ever had the words to express that sort of thing. I am not even going to try to.

Hon. members should not resent criticism, and the House of Commons is where it should be made. In the British house Winston Churchill said that he did not want to listen to any mealy-mouthed persons. I do not think we should have mealy-mouthed people in this chamber, either. We should have facts before us all the time. Politics got France into a jam. Yes, it even got Norway into a jam, and it will get Canada into the soup if we don't watch out.

An hon. MEMBER: We are in it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): One hon. member says we are in it now. That soup is boiling: watch out.

Resolutions have been passed across the country with respect to the plebiscite. I have one before me, addressed to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) from the county council of Peterborough. It reads as follows:

The following is a copy of the resolution passed by the council of the county of Peterborough, November session, 1941, which I have been instructed to forward to you:

"Whereas Canadian agriculture is an essential war industry charged with the vastly increased responsibility of producing food for the people of Great Britain.

And whereas munitions industries have been attracting farm help to the cities, depleting the man-power of agriculture to the extent that many farms are now lying idle, causing a steady reduction in farm products.

And whereas the government of Canada assumes for the agricultural industry greater contracts for the supply of foodstuffs to Great Britain, a duty which farmers wish to fulfil to the utmost extent of their ability, but which they know cannot be accomplished under the present loss of farm help for military service and city employment.

Therefore be it resolved that this council petition the federal government to give immediate consideration to this agricultural problem, especially in stopping at once the drafting of necessary farm help for military service; that we favour the mobilization of man-power, so that the greatest use may be made of available labour; that foodstuffs be placed on a higher price in order that agriculture be placed on an equality with industry; and that agriculture be represented on any boards set up to deal with the matter of obtaining men for active service."

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

HONG KONG

REPORTED STATEMENT OF REVEREND B. C. ECKERT WITH RESPECT TO CASUALTIES

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the house, if I may have its unanimous consent, I should like to make a statement with regard to an item which appeared in a Toronto morning newspaper this morning respecting the report of an address made by Reverend B. C. Eckert, of London, at Welland. It has to do with casualties at Hong Kong, and I feel that it makes a rather serious charge. But what I am more concerned with is that I am afraid it will have the effect of seriously adding to the distress of those who are waiting for news from Hong Kong. I should like to make a statement with regard to it.

I have noted the statements said to have been made by the Reverend B. C. Eckert, as published in a report in a Toronto paper this morning. The report reads as follows:

> The initial address was made by Reverend B. C. Eckert of London, who charged the King government with deliberately withholding the Hong Kong casualty lists until after the February 9 by-elections.
> Ottawa knows them, and more are buried in the blood-stained soil of Hong Kong than are in Japanese prison camps.

The statement made by this reverend gentleman at Welland, to the effect that information regarding casualty lists was being deliberately withheld until after the February 9 by-election, is absolutely false.

I can state that no casualty lists have been received respecting the Canadian expeditionary force at Hong Kong except those which have already been published by the press.

Regarding the statement which directly implies that the number of dead exceeds the number of prisoners of war, the government has no information which would afford foundation for any such statement In view of the distress which this statement will cause, I have thought it advisable to give the house the following circumstances: We pressed the embassy at Chungking for information regarding Canadian troops from the reporter, MacDougall, who was reported to have escaped, and received a reply that casualties were difficult to estimate, particularly due to the fact that communications had ceased with the Royal Rifles, and the message then said:

> Guess but only guess one-third of fighting strength killed, wounded or taken prisoners during fighting, remainder presumably taken prisoners on capitulation.

I consulted with the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Power) who, as the house knows, is personally and very intimately interested in this Hong Kong expedition, and we considered that what was emphasized as being a pure guess was not the sort of speculation which ought to be given to the public, at least without further efforts to get something reasonably definite and reliable.

Since then we have been straining every nerve to get further information, and what we finally got yesterday was another message which had been sent to the War Office. It stated:

> Casualties whole British force Hong Kong "very rough guess 4,000 killed and wounded."

I may say that we estimate that the whole British force would number nearly 12,000. You will note that this message was even less informative to us than the previous one since it made no reference to Canadians, and it was also emphasized as a very rough guess.

I again consulted with the Associate Minister of National Defence, and we decided that no good purpose could be served in making public such unsatisfactory and inconclusive reports. Neither of these statements gave any particulars whatever; there would be neither definiteness nor reliability in the statements; they would give no genuine information to Canadians and might needlessly increase the distress and anxiety which is now being endured.

Even in view of the statement by the reverend gentleman, I have hesitated to give these uninformative and possibly misleading reports. However, his statement means in effect that more than half the force were killed. What basis he has for this I cannot imagine. We have nothing whatever to indicate any such situation. The guesses to which I have referred certainly do not.

But after consultation with my colleague we have decided that a statement of this kind made by a clergyman would, if left unanswered, only add to the terrific burden which the friends of those who were in the Hong Kong expedition are now bearing, and that is why I am now giving the house the substance of the indefinite messages, guesses though they are.

Actually, I am afraid we have erred too much in the direction of giving information without confirmation. As a result of this, in one deplorable case a cable which appeared to show an officer as killed proved, on our receiving further word, to give good ground for belief that this conclusion was incorrect.

I deplore deeply the occasion which has made it seem advisable to give the wholly incomplete and unverified surmises contained in these messages. Only a desire to counteract as far as possible the additional distress which will have been caused by the statement made by the reverend gentleman would have led me and my colleague to change the considered view which we arrived at that we were not justified in publishing these guesses without verification and where they might only increase needlessly the anxiety which we all share.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to thank the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) for his frank statement with respect to Hong Kong. I think it will clear up a lot of misunderstanding.

When the house rose at six o'clock I had just finished reading a letter from the county council of Peterborough in which mention was made of the mobilization of man-power. There should certainly be a check-up of our man-power throughout the whole country to ascertain just who are doing their bit, and who are not doing their bit but want to do it. Some of these latter have applied for work at a good many plants but have been turned down on the ground that they are not young enough. They are as old as I am, perhaps a little older, fifty years of age and older. These men want to help, and women of that age also want to help, but they are turned down because they are too old. Something should be done to put these people in places where they can help.

Places should also be found for men who have been thrown out of work because the jobs which they have held for years are now no more—automobile salesmen, for instance, tire salesmen and salesmen in other lines which have been absolutely cut out. They should be placed in positions. They should not have to go hunting for them. The government should find places for them in industrial plants or elsewhere. There should be a thorough organization of all our man-power and woman-power in Canada so that each can be put in his or her proper place.

Last Sunday a man came to see me. He usually employs fifteen people, but at the present time he has only five employees, including his wife, daughter and thirteen-year-old son, who help him run his business. He is carrying on and will carry on. He has one son in the air force and another likely to join. There are many of these people who are willing to carry on, and there are some who could have had good jobs but find them taken by people who are not naturalized. Quite a number of people in Canada who are not naturalized hold well-paid jobs. Mobilize man-power for the munition plants and for the farms and pay a decent wage to the soldier, and we shall have not only an army, but the supplies to keep that army going.

I noticed in the paper the other day that the dairy farmers in Ontario are organizing. The cheese producers have already organized; we have an Ontario federation of agriculture; and I sincerely hope that before long there will come into existence a real farm organization from one end of Canada to the other, taking in all lines of agricultural products. Let dairymen, cheese producers, hog and cattle raisers and farmers unite in one big union, as the factory workers have done, and so get their rights. One farmer said to me, "The trouble with the farmer is that he does not stay mad long enough to make the politicians think. All he gets are promises." Agriculture at the present time all over Canada needs a new set-up, with a new scale of prices. There should be a new wage scale for labour on farms, because the farmer does not work just eight hours a day; his day begins at five or earlier and ends when he is through, which is generally not before eight or nine o'clock at night, while his returns are much smaller than those of the man in the factory.

Personally I believe that this plebiscite is the government's baby. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) should know if we need conscription. He should know if we do not need conscription. If we need it, why the plebiscite; and if we don't need it, why the plebiscite? The "baby", or the decision, is the government's. Does the Prime Minister know just how to look after this baby?

Mr. HOMUTH: How could he? He is a bachelor.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If he is a bachelor, why should he ask the public to play nursemaid to this baby? During the last few weeks I have received hundreds of letters with reference to the plebiscite. Only three were not opposed to it, and each of the writers said, "Why talk against having a plebiscite, because the government will have it no matter if fifty, sixty or a hundred voices are raised against it in the house; they will do as they dashed well please."

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Why not! You have 180-odd members—

Mr. HOMUTH: Mostly odd.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Speak for yourself.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They can put through anything they want. Why not do it by one more order in council?

Because I believe it would require a good tabulating machine to calculate how many orders in council the government have put through, and I doubt whether there is any minister who could tell you what is in half of them.

I should like to read the following extract from one letter I received:

> Yesterday I overheard an elderly widowed lady, who has a son overseas, discussing the plebiscite, and she wept bitterly because of the unequal sacrifice she is enduring under the present situation and the needless delay in obtaining needed reserves of man-power.
>
> The views expressed here are not only my own but are held by the majority in my circle of friends and acquaintances, who represent both major political parties. You have my support in opposing the taking of this plebiscite.

The writer is a well known business man in the city of Peterborough.

Many hon. members have mentioned during this debate the cost of taking this plebiscite, but it did not really come home to me until last Saturday, when a schoolteacher in my riding asked me these questions. First of all, she said, "How can I ask the children of my class to buy war savings certificates? They have been buying them every week since the campaign started; and now the government is to spend some millions on a plebiscite. How many bombers could be built with the money which this plebiscite is going to cost? How many tanks would this money buy? How many armoured units would this money equip? How many guns for the Pacific coast would it provide? How far towards building the Pacific coast highway would it go?" She asked also, "How many candy bars will the children have to do without in order to pay for this plebiscite? What extra taxes will the already tax-burdened people of Canada have to shoulder in order to provide for it? And how are the children of Canada going to feel about this?" I say, how are we all going to feel about it?

I have seen in the different military camps young ladies in uniform, and I am pleased that the government has at last recognized women in the service. It has taken them a long while to wake up, and I hope they will remain alive to the importance of this branch of service, because the women can help. One suggestion I have to make concerns munitions factories. I believe that in each of these factories there should be a woman in charge of interviewing the women applicants and checking on them. I believe that this would lead not only to an increase in the number of applicants but would attract some whom one would never get otherwise. There is a reason for this, which I cannot explain in the house, though I should be glad to do so to the Minister of Labour at some time. There is a definite need of having women in the factories to interview women applicants.

The other day the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) spoke about the proposed highway from the United States border to Alaska. I am glad he did, because I mentioned it some time ago in the house. It is a subject which interests me, partly because I have travelled on south American, central American and all United States of America coast highways, and I have studied the project as far as it affects the other end of the highway. The hon. member for Macleod is anxious, of course, that the highway shall pass through Edmonton. Personally I should like to see it go through Peterborough, but I know that is out of the question.

Mr. ROWE: Not very much out of the way!

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Well, it is a long way out of the way. For military purposes, which is a main object of the road, you should have a highway which, though not too far from the coast, will be far enough to prevent its being wrecked by gun-fire; which can be a feeder for the different airports, and which can be used by the United States government as well as by the government of Canada. I mention this road because at the present time the government has available labour to build it. I refer to the Japanese in British Columbia. They can do the work. We do not want one Japanese in Ontario for the logging camps or for anything else, because if they got in here, they would find that Ontario is such a beautiful country they would want to stay here. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) told us that he has seventy-five per cent of them in his riding—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, I didn't.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): —and I do not think he wants them any longer. Nor do we in Ontario want them. They should be put to work and kept under the eye of the police. They could do the rock-cutting and other digging on that roadway. At the present time the government, I know, cannot secure machinery to build a road. The road machinery is all engaged in the building of airports in Canada and the United States, and I do not believe there is any machinery available at the present time. I say we do not want the Japanese in Ontario. One reason is that we already have enough people coming into the province from outside and taking jobs without having any more.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): They would not stay in Ontario anyway.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Well, it is the most beautiful province of Canada, and we do not want them. The Japs should be taken from the Pacific coast at once. I know that an order in council has been passed for the purpose, but I do not know whether it has been acted upon. The other day I asked a question with regard to radio transmitting sets, cameras and firearms. I wanted to know whether they had been taken away from the Japs. I doubt whether even to-day this has been done. I know that the day I mentioned it, Thursday, January 29, it had not. I wonder what would happen to us if we were in Japan. Would we be allowed cameras, transmitting sets and radios? We would be lucky if we had a coat to cover us and enough food to eat.

A military road built at the present time would be of service not only to-day but after the war. Its construction would help to take care of soldiers returning from the war, because there would be work for them. A road built now would be a purely military road, with no fancy trimmings, and it would eventually become one of the tourist highways of the world. It would draw tourists not only from the United States, but from central and south America as well, and if hon. members have studied the road maps of those countries, they will know what is being done there. There is only one spot, in Ecuador, and another in the Panama section, that are really stickers. In the Panama section there is a stretch of 300 miles not built yet, and only one white man has ever made the continuous trip through it; but it can and will be straddled. That road would open up all the natural resources of the country.

The other day I asked the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden) whether he could name one man who had reaped a fortune out of this war, and he said, "any coupon-clipper who to-day reaps profits out of this war." The hon. gentleman sitting directly in front of him then said, "saboteur".

I do not think that any man or woman clipping dominion government war bonds is a saboteur. Many of these bonds are bought by widows and soldiers' wives.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes; they are bought by widows and soldiers' wives.

An hon. MEMBER: How many?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Many.

An hon. MEMBER: How many?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Ask the government how many. They are bought by widows and soldiers' wives.

An hon. MEMBER: There are eleven of them.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Eleven what?

An hon. MEMBER: Eleven widows.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): These widows should be praised for buying war bonds and certificates instead of being ridiculed by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, and I say that because some of these women helped their husbands to save when they were alive, amassing what to them seems a fortune, perhaps $1,000—and all they get from clipping coupons is $30. Yet they are called saboteurs because they clip coupons worth $30; whereas hon. members to my left get that much in a day and a half in government indemnities, as members sitting in the house, though the other day for an hour and a half there was not one Cooperative Commonwealth Federation member in the house. These people will wonder why the government has asked them to buy war bonds and certificates when a member of this house says they are saboteurs.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out to hon. members that the hon. member who has the floor may not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. HOMUTH: We don't mind it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): These people will wonder what's what; but knowing that it comes from the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, as an hon. member in front of me suggests, we pay no attention to it, and I hope the widows and orphans will not. The party to my left pretend to stand up for the man who is down and out. Do they? I do not think there is a man in this house who knows more about the working people, the men who are down and out, than I do—and many others are in the same boat. They go among these people in their ridings and try to help, and they do not relish such criticism from any hon. member.

In closing, I sincerely hope that the government will forget the plebiscite and get down to business and constructive work. In fact I would say, have a secret session so that we can all get together.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): It seems to be customary in this house for a member who rises to speak to compliment first of all the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and then for those on the opposing side to break his nose or black his eyes or to do something of that kind. I am not going to do that to-night. I reserve the right to break noses if necessary, but I am not extending compliments in that direction. I should like, however, to compliment the hon. member behind me, the member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka). I am not competent to pass judgment on the subject matter of the address he gave, but his presentation was excellent. As regards the people on whose behalf he spoke, I have only the highest commendation to offer, having lived among them and worked with them since coming to this country a number of years ago. I found them to be hard workers, people who have been doing their share to build up the country, and who have been playing their part in the effort to defeat the enemy overseas.

Let me now refer to the old age pensioners. We have heard a good deal in the past in this house and on the street, and we have read in the press, about the condition of our old age pensioners. The question was dealt with by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on November 14 last. After giving a number of reasons why the government could not do anything for these people, either by way of a bonus or by an increase in their monthly pensions, he went on to say, as reported at page 4429 of Hansard of that date:

> Indeed the government is prepared to consider going further than this. It believes that, for the reasons already outlined, it would be impossible to justify an increase in the maximum rate of pension payable if the whole cost were to be assumed by the dominion, and that such cases as appear to present immediate difficulties can be met by the provinces on the basis of established individual need. If, nevertheless, all, or substantially all the provinces should make representations to the dominion government in favour of some increase in the maximum amount of pension payable, the additional cost to be shared between the dominion and the provinces on the same basis as the present cost, I can assure the committee that the government will be prepared to give consideration to such representations.

I do not think it would be very hard for any of us, if we were inclined that way, to find reasons why old age pensioners should be given a cost of living bonus, or a permanent increase in the rate of pension. This legislation I believe went into effect away back in 1927. At that time the cost of living index stood at about 120; to-day it is close to 116; and the minister gives this as one reason why they are not entitled to a cost of living bonus. I would point out that in arriving at the cost of living index, quite a large number of items are taken into consideration, whereas in the old age pensioners' buying of supplies a very limited number are involved, and we find that the price of those goods which are purchased by old age pensioners has increased much more than the average

Then, again, I would say to the minister that if he wants to find excuses for giving something to the old age pensioners, he might look over the living allowance paid to some of our dollar-a-year men. That runs anywhere from $10 to $15 or, in some instances, more a day. Then, again, we find that others who are on very large salaries get up to $35 a day living allowance. That has happened in the past. Surely something along that line, although not that much, could be done for the old age pensioners. Some of our judges who give service for a certain number of years and are pensioned off get pensions ranging from $5,000 to $15,000 a year. This means that they have a pension of from $13.70 up to as high as $27.40 a day, and we were told not very long ago that this cannot be reduced. Perhaps that is because we have so many lawyers in parliament.

There is another group of pensioners, I would call them, not very far from here; I do not know what their qualifications are for their positions, but they are on the pension list. It is not called an old age pension or relief list, but they get a pension of almost $11 a day for life as well as other things that cost the country quite a lot of money. Perhaps the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) could take some of these matters into consideration when again dealing with the question of cost of living bonus or increased pensions for old age pensioners.

I consider that this government and governments that have been in office in past years are responsible for the condition of many old age pensioners to-day, because these governments have passed and supported legislation which permitted exploiters in Canada to take advantage of and legally rob these people who to-day find themselves in need of old age pensions. Therefore I am of opinion it is now the duty of the government to take care of them in at least a reasonable manner.

In connection with that part of his statement in which the minister said that if all or a substantial number of the provinces want to do something about it, the government will give it consideration, I believe a start along this line has already been made by Alberta and British Columbia; and I hope the other provinces will see that a start is made in the very near future and that this government will give it the consideration to which it is entitled.

We go on to another group of Canadians who, I believe, are also entitled to a cost of living bonus. I refer to our teachers all across the dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We have been told in the past that teachers are working for very low salaries, and that condition still exists to-day. I do not know whether hon. members all realize that we are entrusting the training and education of our children to these teachers for the greater part of the day during at least five days a week. We expect the teacher to live and dress respectably and when setting their rate of salary, seldom think of the many other duties for which the teacher is made responsible. In order to bring them up to the same level as some of our industrialists and civil servants who to-day are receiving a cost of living bonus—about which I am not complaining—I think we should at least extend the same privilege to the teacher.

The provincial governments are having quite a hard time at present to pay the cost of education, so I suggest that the dominion make a grant to each province in order that they can pay a cost of living bonus to the teachers. The teacher's position to-day, I believe hon. members will realize, is not any better than that of a great number of civil servants, and not as good as that of many common labourers in industry at the present time.

There is another group that I might mention. There are many people employed in the smaller stores. In the larger establishments I understand the help receive a cost of living bonus, but in the smaller stores, where only a few are employed, the cost of living bonus is not paid, or at least it is not compulsory. But if we look around we find that employees of all stores buy on practically the same market, so that if those employed by the large firms are entitled to the bonus, why not those in the smaller stores?

Then there is another group that I believe is also entitled to a cost of living bonus. This group comprises about one-third of the population of Canada. I refer now to the farmers. I am wondering whether some people believe that the farmers are entitled to a cost of living bonus. I remember when I came here first in 1936, we were told by someone who perhaps knew better, that the majority of farmers went to California or some other better climate in the winter, that each family had two or three cars, and a number of other such silly statements.

An hon. MEMBER: He must have been a Liberal.

Mr. FAIR: The gentleman to whom I have reference did not sit very far from here at that time. He is not in the house now, and I hope he is happier than many of us here to-day are. Taking farmers and their families as a whole, I think the delegation that came here from Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba is a very fair sample of the average farmer of the west—and, I believe, the east as well. I think you will not find any of them lying around the streets drunk. I have not seen any. You do not find them wearing expensive clothes or doing anything that a respectable citizen of Canada should not do. Many compliments have been paid as to the calibre of these farmers and their wives. I believe they are entitled to great consideration at this time.

In the cities and towns we find that the man usually makes the living, while his wife looks after the home. That is so on some farms, but in many instances we find that the wife and children must get out and work so that the family may eat, pay their taxes and retain their home. Many of those farm homes are not as good as they should be; that is true in a large percentage of the cases. Some people on farms seem satisfied to do with less, and they are expected to do with less than people in the towns and cities. Why this should be so, I cannot understand, because, after all, farming is the basic industry of this country, and if you took away our farming, you would take away the lifeblood of the whole country.

Dealing with the question of wheat, we find that away back in 1935 the initial payment was 87½ cents a bushel, basis No. 1 northern at Fort William, with participation certificates. That figure remained unchanged in 1936, with the restriction that the farmers could not use the wheat board unless the price of wheat fell below 90 cents a bushel. The same condition existed in 1937. In 1938, however, for some reason or another, the price was reduced to 80 cents a bushel. Perhaps the farmers were getting a little too prosperous; perhaps they were painting their homes, or something. Whatever the reason, the initial payment was reduced to 80 cents. In 1939 the first legislation brought in cut down the price to 60 cents a bushel; but after a great deal of controversy, with many speeches made in this house, over the radio and at meetings throughout the country, that was increased to 70 cents a bushel. At the same time there was introduced in this house the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which provided for a bonus if the crop was less than twelve bushels to the acre and the year was declared by the government to be an emergency year. That policy was continued in 1940, but that year we had the additional payment of storage on wheat kept on the farm. In 1941 the same situation continued, except that the storage applied only to that undelivered portion of the quota which was held on the farm. In that year we also had regulations brought down under which farmers were encouraged to cut down their wheat acreage, and those doing so were given a bonus called the wheat acreage reduction bonus. I am not going into that to-night, but only a couple of months ago another bonus was announced. People call it by different names; I call it a general relief bonus, and I believe it was paid because the government felt so guilty. They must have felt guilty for a number of years past, but this year, because farm income was so low, they gave another general relief bonus to all farmers, grain growers, stock raisers or anything else.

This, it seems to me, is an open, frank admission by the government that their agricultural policy is not one on which Canada can live. I do not know of any body that should realize the plight of agriculture better than the government, and now they come along with another little hand-out to keep us dragging on a little longer. I would point out, however, that the latest bonus of 75 cents an acre, even with the other two bonuses to which I have referred, will not solve our wheat problem. There are two distinct problems. In the first place, the man who has no crop at all will not benefit in any way from a higher price for wheat. He will benefit through the payment of bonuses, provided they are high enough, but they are not high enough at the present time. On the other hand, a man who has a crop averaging more than twelve bushels to the acre does not benefit by any system of bonuses that may be put into effect. Therefore, to satisfy the man who has an average crop of twelve bushels or better, a higher price for wheat must be put into effect.

During past years several delegations have come to Ottawa trying to get something of benefit to the farming industry. It is realized by everyone in Canada that agricultural conditions are not satisfactory, and this applies to eastern as well as western Canada. I am not speaking of the west alone, as in the past some of us have been accused of doing. I believe the eastern farmers understand that their plight has been realized by the government also, since the government has agreed to pay the freight on feed grain coming from Fort William or points further west. So eastern farmers also are on the relief list. Let them not forget that; let them not think we in the west are the only recipients of aid. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture and the wheat pools have come to Ottawa on various occasions, and each time I believe they were told that their demands were reasonable and would be given consideration by the government. But that consideration does not put any money into the pocket of the farmer. It does not pay his taxes; it does not buy shoes for the baby, or bread for the family. We must have a little more than consideration. During the time the government has been giving our problems consideration, our debts have been piling up, and no attempt has been made by the government to cut down interest rates on the money we owe in bank loans, mortgages and so forth.

We find also that the cost of machinery has continued to go up. This government held an investigation into that matter; the government of Saskatchewan also looked into it. On one occasion threats were made by the Minister of Agriculture, on behalf of the government, that if the machine companies did not bring down their prices, the government would take drastic action. The response of the machine companies was: one increase during the investigation, another immediately after it, and a number of others since that time, of which I have not kept track. Therefore the government does not mind at all if the farmers' costs go up.

Again, in some provinces, and particularly the province from which I come, attempts were made to ease the burdens of the farmers. But as soon as legislation was put on the statute books for this purpose, it was either done away with by the governor in council or referred to the courts, and there destroyed. If we look back to 1937 we remember that the President of the United States had to take certain action in connection with the supreme court of that country. He could not get his legislation into operation, and had to take action to make way for progressive legislation. I am not sure whether it may not be necessary to resort to action of that kind in this country in the near future.

Looking back over a period of sixty-four or sixty-five years, we find that the average price of wheat at Fort William was $1.17 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern. In the United States I understand the farmers at present are being paid $1.17. That is what they are guaranteed. We are guaranteed 70 cents. The Minister of Agriculture told us that the farmers could not expect to get rich during the first two years of this war. Now we are getting into the third year, and some of us think it is about time we started at least to make our expenses. During the third year of the first great war the average price of wheat was $2.06 a bushel, basis No. 1 northern at Fort William. As I have said, to-day we are guaranteed 70 cents, or approximately one-third the average price during the third year of the last war. We find that at that time, in the third year of the first great war, we could buy a binder for $167. To-day the same binder costs $347, or more than twice as much as it cost back in 1916. I believe this illustration will serve to show that the farmer has been caught both going and coming.

Conditions are not improving; they are gradually growing worse. At the present time there is a delegation in Ottawa seeking parity prices for agriculture, as well as other things. We wonder why we are not getting treatment similar to that received by other people in Canada. I believe most hon. members will recall that back in 1939 a limit of 5 per cent was placed on profits to be derived from government contracts. Because that was not sufficient for the industrialists, we find an order in council passed in the third week in August of 1939 which destroyed that legislation. To-day labour enjoys the same level of wages as obtained between 1926 and 1929. It has also an additional cost of living bonus. I am not objecting to that. In my opinion the workers are entitled to good pay. They work hard, and I do not object to the pay they receive. But I certainly must object when we as farmers are placed in a position where we have to produce at about half the cost of production. If industry is entitled to a removal of profit restrictions, if labour is entitled to the same wage level as existed between 1926 and 1929, with a cost of living bonus added, then I suggest that surely the farmer is entitled to the same level of prices as existed at that time.

The high price for wheat, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William between 1926 and 1929 was $1.61 a bushel. The average price in that same period was $1.35. Yet, although we have been told on different occasions that we are seeking equality of sacrifice in Canada, we are receiving a guaranteed price of only 70 cents a bushel. We find that in 1937-38 the average price for the year was $1.31⅝ a bushel. Perhaps we would not mind so much if those low prices were necessary. But, looking over some of the literature I have, I am led to the conclusion that it is not necessary. I find this at page 14 of a booklet issued by the Searle Grain company:

> It is interesting to note that one of the most eminent world authorities on the international wheat situation, Mr. Broomhall of London, said in an editorial in the Corn Trade News of August 27 as follows:
> "Farmers in producing countries would have legitimate cause for complaint if, in creating reserve supplies the price level were allowed to suffer by an artificial disparity between supply and demand."
> With Mr. Broomhall's conclusion we most heartily concur, for we all know that the disparity which exists to-day between supply and demand has not been brought about by the free and open market, but is entirely the result of highly artificial conditions.

Again I ask: Why does the government allow that condition to exist? Again, by way of comparison: in 1928 the farmers of Canada received for their wheat crop $441,000,000; and in 1941, even with the addition of the wheat acreage reduction bonus, the prairie farm assistance bonus and the general relief bonus, we receive approximately $150,000,000

The delegation in Ottawa at the present time advocating, as I said before, a higher initial payment for wheat, and other matters along that line, are supported by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the western wheat pools and several other organizations. We find also that the northwest line elevtors' association has sent to the government, on at least two different occasions, briefs advocating an initial price or payment of $1.22½ a bushel basis No. 1 northern, Fort William, and the Searle Grain company advocates $1.20 a bushel.

Some people wonder whether we are entitled to that. I believe we are. As is known, at the present time the government is giving orders for the manufacture of certain war materials, and so forth. The people of Canada will have to pay for those things. They will have to pay the profits to industry, and the high wages now enjoyed by labour. We as farmers either directly or indirectly will pay a large percentage of those costs.

We find that on February 19, 1941, by order in council the government made an agreement with the grain companies whereby their handling and storage charges were guaranteed until the end of July, 1943. Was any such policy laid down or guaranteed to the farmers of Canada? No. In this connection I would add that this was asked for by the grain trade, but was not asked for by the wheat pools of western Canada. The pools were asked to come in on this, but refused to have anything to do with it. To-day the Saskatchewan pool is responsible for a large delegation which, I believe, the government should be ashamed to allow to come here to make its demands known, or try to do something about it.

We are producing food. I do not think there is any need for anybody to complain that that food will not be needed. Prime Minister Churchill has been quoted in the house on different occasions, and I intend to quote him again. On August 20, 1940, Mr. Winston Churchill said:

> We shall do our best to encourage the building up of reserves of food all over the world so that there will always be held before the eyes of the people of Europe, including the Germans, the certainty that the shattering of nazi power would bring to them all immediate food, freedom and peace.

And the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on October 18, 1941, said: "Wheat held in reserve constitutes an invaluable war asset." The farmers of Canada are willing to produce. They complain at home, through their members and now by delegation. But we have not found them going on a sit-down strike. They continue to produce, anyway, and they are doing everything possible in the war, even to the extent of sending their last son over there to fight. I know that is true in dozens of instances. Why are we treated in this way? I believe that since the delegation came to Ottawa, it has been successful in meeting the government. I hold in my hand a clipping in point. It appeared in yesterday's Ottawa Journal, and states, in part:

> "Renewed, helpful and I believe fruitful consideration" will be given the representations of prairie wheat farmers, Prime Minister Mackenzie King to-day promised four hundred farmer-delegates who came to Ottawa. . . .

And so on. Let us hope that this consideration will be far more fruitful than some of the other things the Prime Minister has attempted in earlier days. We hope that will happen. Then, later in the article:

> Finance Minister Ilsley—he was one of those who heard the farmers' submissions—had to meet financial requirements and consider petitions like that of the wheat growers, with relation to the broad financial needs of a dominion at war, Mr. King added.
> The Prime Minister, speaking in confidential manner to the men of the west, said the government had not given any closer attention to any question than agriculture. He felt that Canadian farmers would agree no branch of agriculture had experienced more difficulty than the wheat-growing branch represented by Saskatchewan.

We are to get fruitful consideration.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): We hope the tree bears fruit.

Mr. FAIR: Yes, and that the fruit does not disappear before it reaches the farmer. Both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) agreed that the requests were fair—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): And reasonable.

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. FAIR: —and reasonable. It is up to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to find the money. During the past two and a half years the Minister of Finance has been finding a lot of money, much of which has gone for purposes of destruction. We are also told that we shall be called on for far greater sums. If the Minister of Finance can find money to pay cost-plus to industry and to pay wages, through industry, to labour, he should also make it his business to pay at least the cost of production plus a small profit to the farmers. If the minister has not learned enough about money to know how to do that, I would suggest that we forgo the services of our member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) for a little while so that he may advise the minister how and where he can get this money. The minister, no doubt, has a fountain pen, and he will find out that it will work just as well for the Bank of Canada, to create credit, as it does for the chartered banks.

In the Western Producer of January 29, 1942, there are one or two items in a letter in the open forum, which I should like to read. Here is the first one:

> About 1912 the Grain Growers' Association sent a delegation of 400 men to Ottawa to lay our demands before the government of that day. After we had dropped all our bombs, Wilfrid Laurier only talked to them for three minutes and in other words told them to go home and the government would run its own business. In 1920 our demand for a wheat board became so urgent that we built a new political party known as Progressives. Every candidate was pledged to support a wheat board policy when he took his seat in the house at Ottawa. We swept this province (Saskatchewan) clean save for one Liberal (Mr. Motherwell). During the last week of the campaign he figured his seat was slipping so the paper with the people's viewpoint, the Leader Post, came out with a front page advertisement: Vote for Motherwell and return of the wheat board. When he got to Ottawa Mackenzie King made him minister of agriculture and he proved to be an enemy to a wheat board. The Progressive party landed in Ottawa after the 1921 election with 64 members, mostly all from the west.
> The Liberal high command had seen this storm brewing in the west, so Tom Crerar was sent out in the guise of a believer in this new movement. He led his army right into the battlefield at Ottawa and then deserted us. In the terms of to-day he would be known as a fifth columnist and was just twenty years ahead of King Leopold of Belgium, who also turned his army over to the enemy.

I believe there is one way in which the farmers can get something better than they are getting at the present time. They have been promised consideration for a number of years, but their plight is becoming worse the farther we go along. My suggestion to the farmers is to organize. During the last election some were quite satisfied to vote for 70-cent wheat, but to-day the farmers of the west are coming here with a petition in the one hand and a hat in the other pleading: "Won't you give us something better?" As soon as they send true representatives here, they will probably get some place. We are not satisfied to-day with 70 cents a bushel for wheat, either on the farm or at Fort William. For some years past the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) has had a resolution on the order paper asking for 95 cents a bushel, basis one northern, at the local elevator, and he has now a resolution on the order paper reading as follows:

Whereas the prices of farm machinery, all costs of living and farm wages have increased due to the war:

Therefore be it resolved that in the opinion of this house parliament should immediately take such steps as are necessary to ensure the farmers of Canada a fixed price of not less than one dollar ($1) per bushel for number 1 northern wheat at their local elevator for a farmer's delivery quota, as defined by the Canadian Wheat Board.

And to take care of the man who does not have a crop, I have the following resolution on the order paper:

That in the opinion of this house the government should introduce such amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act that it will become a sound crop insurance scheme.

In conclusion, might I suggest that the first duty of any government is to look after the welfare and happiness of its people? In this I believe this government has failed miserably. Since this government came into office in 1935, there have been great numbers of men and women who could not get work, and there are still thousands to-day who cannot get a job. The farmers have been allowed to work, but we cannot get the cost of production. So what is the use of working, some people say. The government has failed to prevent production costs from going up. In view of the fact that farmers directly or indirectly pay most of our Canadian taxes, I think something should be done on their behalf, and done right away.

I believe the government should also take better care of the soldiers of the last war and their dependents, as well as the soldiers of this war and their dependents. I believe a completely new deal should be given the soldiers of the last war who are still labouring under the policies of the Soldier Settlement Board. I shall deal with this later.

There are several other matters I should like to mention, but I have not the time to-night. I would, however, ask that the organized farmers' representatives be given a place on all boards having to do with farmers' problems, and when I say "organized farmers", I do not mean that any political party friend, whether or not he is a success on his own, should be given a place on these boards.

Parity prices for wheat and all other farm products should be guaranteed, and there should be an amendment to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to provide a sound crop insurance scheme, which is badly needed. In addition, I believe that the Winnipeg grain exchange should be closed because it is a gambling den that has no place in Canada to-day.

All these things and more can be done by making proper use of our financial system, whereby credit and currency will be issued in terms of public need, as advocated by the Prime Minister prior to the 1935 election when he said:

A national central bank is necessary in order that currency and credit may be made available in terms of public need to meet the domestic and industrial requirements of the Canadian people.

If ever that time has arrived, it is now. The farmers of Canada are not asking for charity and do not want it. All we want is treatment equal to that given to other Canadians, and we must be granted that treatment. We cannot have Canadian unity, so often pleaded for by the Prime Minister and others in this house, as long as one section of the population feasts while another goes hungry. Hitler of Germany must be licked at all costs. But we have Hitlers in Canada who must also be licked if the Canadian people are to enjoy to the fullest the liberties to which we are entitled and the abundance at our disposal.

Mr. G. A. McLEAN (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the motion before the house has now continued for about eight days. But, as I am sure hon. members will agree that nobody has shown less inclination than I have to prolong debate or to indulge in tiresome and vain repetition, I am impelled on this occasion to crave your indulgence, sir, and that of the house while I try to give expression to a few thoughts.

The first words I would utter would be words of tribute to our fellow citizens who at our call and on our behalf have undertaken the heavy, heavy task of combat—the men of the army, the navy, the merchant marine, the air force, and the women of the nursing services. This is not the place, I know, where hon. members are wont to give expression to their deepest feelings, and I am not going to indulge in heroics, but I do think it is due to these valiant men and women that from our place as members of the parliament of their country we tell them, not once, or twice, that we remember them; that we recognize that the task laid on them is different, very different in kind from that of all others. I believe that the words which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) used in this house on May 20, 1940, could well be repeated time and again. He said, as reported at page 49 of Hansard of that year:

> Everything that we can do, every help that we can give, every contribution that we can make, every comfort, great or small, that we must surrender is as a grain of sand compared with the treasure which they offer on the altar of humanity.

Or the words of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), spoken when he was Minister of Finance. I do not remember whether it was when he was delivering the budget speech or the speech on the war appropriation bill, but on some such occasion he gave expression to words which I have never forgotten, and which I think should be heard and remembered throughout the war by every citizen of Canada. I am not sure that I can recall the exact words, but they were to this effect, "I shall not disgrace the word 'sacrifice' by applying it to anything save the gift of life itself."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McLEAN (Simcoe East): I wish, Mr. Speaker, that it were possible for the response to those words from every corner of the house to be heard by every member of our armed forces, wherever he or she may be found. I wish it were possible that they could penetrate to those who are languishing in prison camps and in hospitals far across the sea. For those who have passed forever beyond the reach of all human expression, we can only offer tribute to their memory, and to the homes from which they have gone, sympathy, for which I shall not try to find words.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the question of the method of enlistment for service in our armed forces overseas should have become a contentious one. I believe that this question has been magnified out of all proportion to its importance. There is no use, however, in indulging in vain regrets over what we would like to have had; we must take the facts as they are. I am bound to recognize that, in the words of the speech from the throne, our war effort is being impaired by controversy raging over what has now become a contentious question. Up to date I have refrained from discussing this question either in Ottawa or in my own riding. I have felt that no good could come from my stirring up questions on which people were likely to have sharp differenees of opinion. During my election campaign I intentionally and resolutely kept it from being made an issue in my riding, largely for the sake of the character of the riding. I thought it would have been unfair, perhaps unfair to my opponent, if I had tried to make that an issue in my riding. But I must confess that, in common with nearly all members of both Liberal and Conservative parties, I am bound by the speeches which were made by the leaders of both these two parties prior to the last election. It is under these circumstances that I wish to take a few minutes to make my position clear to the members of the house and to my constituents.

I want to say a word first about the compulsory selective service in connection with civilian occupations. I am only going to touch on it, because I do not think there is very much difference of opinion, certainly on the principle. As the Prime Minister pointed out, authority for this was given by the National Resources Mobilization Act. The only question is how soon, in what manner, and to what extent that ought to be put into effect. Personally, I think that prompt action should be taken. In my section, as in many others, the farmers are having a very difficult time. I find men enlisting from some of our factories whom I think it would have been better to keep in the factories. On the other hand, I even know of toolmakers—mechanics who are perhaps scarcest of all—who during the depression went out to operate little farms and are still on those farms. As I say, I am not going to dwell on this question, but I shall await with great interest the statement which I expect we shall hear from the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) as to the plan he has in mind. I would suggest this, however, that the temporary postponement in connection with farm help is not sufficient and not satisfactory. A farmer must be able to plan his work somewhat ahead. There are some farms where population is fairly large though they are not very good farms and not producing very much. On the other hand, there are very good large farms where production is very high; the farm is well operated, but help very, very scarce. The same treatment should not be given in both those cases; and I do not think it is possible for a man in the office of the district registrar to deal with these; I think there ought to be somebody closer to the farmer, closer to the community, in a better position to judge of the circumstances surrounding each case. As I have said, however, nearly everything I have to say on this question is merely repetition, and I do not want to weary the house by repeating what has already been said better than I can say it.

Coming to the question of compulsory service for the armed forces overseas, I always have believed and I still believe that the voluntary system is best. I have listened with great attention to the arguments of those who take a different view. I respect their opinion, and I do not for one moment question their sincerity, but, for reasons which I shall give, I still retain my preference for the voluntary system.

Having said this, however, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the preservation of our country and our empire, freedom, everything which is now in imminent peril, must be placed before any and all other considerations; and if and when, in my judgment, based on facts which become apparent to me or on information that I receive from those I consider best able to judge, whether inside or outside the cabinet, I consider the time has come when we can more effectively prosecute the war by compulsory enlistment for overseas in our combatant forces, I shall not hesitate to change my position and shall support it. Because I want to be free to take that changed position if and when circumstances warrant it, I am in favour of a plebiscite by which the people will free me and the government from the solemn pledge given under very different circumstances.

I am in favour of the voluntary system because of the effectiveness of the army itself. After all, victory is what we want—victory in a fight. All considerations of what is fair or logical must be subordinated to that—victory in a fight.

Our army must be trained, it must be well equipped, it must be given arms and munitions, and all that. But after you have trained it, supplied it with equipment, and given it proper leadership, it still has to fight; and it seems to me that in our discussion far too little consideration has been given to the fact that the men have to face the terror, the horror, the bloodshed and the violence of battle. They must face dismemberment and even death, and still go on and fight and fight and win victory. That takes something that is simply not in the coward; it takes something that is simply not in the slacker; it takes something that is simply not in the sort of man of whom I have heard some member speak, the man who says, "I am willing to go, but I am going to wait until the government tells me." It is not in the type of man or the man who hangs around for a year or more trying to get a commission or some other preferment.

I speak from experience as a private soldier in a Canadian infantry battalion, and as a platoon commander and company commander in a British regiment, commanding both volunteers and forced recruits; and I say that when a unit finds itself in a desperate position, its members do not want to feel that, scattered among them or supporting them on their flanks, are men who have had to be forced to fight. They want to feel that they are supported by men who are imbued with the same spirit as themselves, men who will come promptly, quickly and voluntarily when their country calls them.

When men tell me that because I am in favour of the voluntary system as against the compulsory I am not true, not loyal to the men who are at the front, I sometimes wonder whether these people have any conception of the sort of job we have given these men to do. We admit that as far as the air force and the navy are concerned, and especially the air force, we shall not have compulsion. Why? Well, I suppose it is because it is thought that men in the air force should be of the very highest type of valour and daring. Will any man tell me, however, that of the humblest private soldier who carries a rifle and bayonet into battle there is not going to be demanded the utmost in the way of human valour and endurance? And those qualities are required in a much higher degree in this war in which men are acting very much on their own—much more so than in the last war when to a large extent men fought in large masses.

I have heard it said by some members of the house that the voluntary system has been a failure. I do not admit it. I cannot give exact figures to date, but I believe that between 400,000 and 430,000 men have volunteered in the various armed forces for service in any part of the world. I believe that during last year somewhere between 150,000 and 180,000 men similarly volunteered. These were accepted in both cases, after those were rejected who were unfit physically or otherwise. I have not the total figures for my own riding, but I have approximate figures for my own home town, of between nine and ten thousand. In that town almost if not quite 800 men have voluntarily enlisted and been accepted for active service in the various branches of the armed forces. Of these, 200 at least are now overseas and about 200 in the air force.

But, Mr. Speaker, if enlistment has not been all that some might have expected, I do not put the blame for this on the young men of the country. I do not, I cannot, and I never will believe that our men are so lacking in patriotism that they will not respond when their native land and the native land of their fathers is in peril, if that call is made clearly and in a proper manner to them.

A number of factors have militated against enlistment. In the first place, in some districts there was quite a long delay before the local non-permanent active militia units were mobilized. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that a different system was adopted in this war from that which was followed in the last war—and a much better one. In the last war units were mobilized without identification except for a number, and men were enlisted in them from all over the province. In this war the late Minister of National Defence, Mr. Rogers, instituted the system of retaining the identity of the non-permanent active militia units in the establishments of the active force in order to preserve the county spirit, the town spirit, the regimental spirit in the active overseas units. That was a good idea. But the necessary result was, of course, that in some districts men waited sometimes months and more than a year before their unit was mobilized. They waited with a good deal of impatience, and many men lost a good deal of the zeal and fervour with which they were imbued when the call to arms first came.

I remember very well the situation in the counties of Grey and Simcoe. The Grey-Simcoe Foresters were mobilized finally as a unit of the 4th division. These men pleaded with members to ask the Minister of National Defence that they be mobilized. They begged for months and months to have this done. The same thing happened in connection with many other units, and this was one of the factors that did have an effect on enlistment.

Another feature was the opinion, pretty commonly held before and for some time after the war, that because of a change in the nature of warfare it was very unlikely that there would be any occasion to send a large expeditionary force overseas—not as a matter of policy at all, but as a matter of war strategy, or whatever the proper military term is. There was also the idea that Canada was to be the arsenal of the empire, and that idea naturally turned men's minds to the duty they owed the country to remain in the occupations in which they found themselves, agricultural or industrial.

I have heard the suggestion that the government itself did not give that clarion call for enlistment to arms which it might have given. I am not going to enter upon any debate on that point, but I do say that the Minister of National Defence, the Prime Minister, and others, did make very strong appeals which I thought did not receive the attention and the publicity in headlines in various sections of the press which they might have been given.

Be that as it may, however, there were other voices in influential positions which did not speak in the accents that we heard in 1914. Let me give an example. The president of one of our large universities was reported, shortly after the war broke out, to have advised his students not to be in a hurry to enlist, but to finish their courses. I am not saying he was wrong, but I cannot help contrasting that with the attitude adopted by the president of the great university of Toronto in the autumn of 1914. I well recall how Sir Robert, then Doctor Falconer, called his students together in the autumn of 1914. He did not speak to them of the value to themselves or the country of their academic career or the places they were going to fill in civilian life. He put the issue clearly before them; he told them that they, of all classes, owed more to the country and to the way of life that was threatened, and he pointed out very clearly and forcefully that to them first of all the call to arms came. And how they responded! The voice was different from that of 1939. They enlisted in very large numbers. There was no waiting for commissions; there was none of that. Scores of them never came back, and of those who did very many never realized aspirations of their student days. There are hon. members of this house who were members of the classes of 1914, 1915, 1916, and I am sure there is nothing of which they are more proud than the lead given by their president in those days and the way in which those men responded to it.

Another feature is the popularity of two branches of the armed service—the navy and the air force. Someone may say that this is not an important matter, but I think it is. Men in the navy and the air force have been in action much sooner than those in the army, and naturally ardent youth is more anxious to get into the branches which are in action first. I suppose there is something more spectacular about those two branches. If all those who have been waiting to enlist in the air force and the navy should be added to those who have enlisted in the army, the figures would look very much better.

While speaking of that, I want to compliment the Minister of National Defence very highly upon what I understand is a proposal to give a dress uniform to the men of the army. I sincerely trust no single voice will be raised against that on account of the expense. The battle-dress no doubt is a splendid dress for battle, but it must be admitted that it is not a dressy uniform; it looks rather slouchy and does not do justice to the men when they are on the streets of our towns and villages. It is not fair that when men of the air force or of the navy come home for a week-end and go out to some social function, they have smart, neat-looking uniforms of which they are proud, while the poor chap in the army has to wear this slouchy-looking battle-dress. When men come out of our factories and off the farms or out of the mines and attend some social function, they can take off their working clothes and put on a collar and tie and a neat suit; and if civilians can afford to dress up in that way, I hope there will be no voice raised against the expense of giving to these men who are going to fight our battles a dress of which they may be proud and which will encourage them to hold their heads higher when they are off duty.

There is another factor which has had a great deal of influence on recruiting. Ever since the first voice was raised in this house—on the eve of a recruiting campaign, as it was—calling for conscription; and as that voice was taken up by the press, by public speakers and, in some instances I am told, even by military officers assigned to the duty of recruiting, the chilly, deadening effect of that cry was felt on recruiting from coast to coast. It was felt in every meeting called for the purpose of organizing recruiting campaigns. I am sure every hon. member who has had anything to do with trying to assist in recruiting knows the truth of that statement.

It was my privilege some two or three months ago to attend a dinner meeting. The auspices were very favourable. We were in a comfortable room, had a splendid guest speaker; there was a large and expectant audience. The speaker had recently returned from England, and he gave one of the most magnificent addresses to which I have ever listened. He told of the valour of the people of Britain, the suffering of the men, women and children, the magnificent organization of all resources; all these things were pictured in words that held that audience thrilled. I was sitting near the back of the room looking over that audience, and among them were quite a number of men of military age who were not in uniform—business men, professional men. As that speaker told of the marvellous fight that the people of Britain were putting up for us, I fancy that some of those young men felt a little uncomfortable; I fancy they were beginning to give pretty serious consideration to where their duty lay. The speaker ended that wonderful address with a strong appeal. What was the appeal? Was it an appeal to those men to get into uniform? Not at all. He ended with a strong statement that the responsibility of deciding who should go into the army should be laid on the government of the country. I fancy those young men settled back into their comfortable chairs a little more comfortably when the responsibility was taken from their own conscience and placed on some other body.

What, in effect, are all these voices saying? To the young man to whom the call of his country, the voice of duty, is strong and insistent, the voice which he is about to obey, they are saying, "That stern voice of duty with which you have been wrestling for the last few days or weeks is not the voice to which you should listen. Wait; wait; we are going to create another voice. We are going to put a man-made law on the statute books of your country, and that is the voice to which you are to listen. Never mind about that voice which calls you, that powerful impulse in the life of every young man; never mind that; that is not the voice. Let us have another authority; wait until that man-made law is put upon the statute books of your country."

I am not sitting in judgment on any other man; I respect the opinion of every other man, and I would be the last to impute any improper motives. I know that many of my friends who want conscription are actuated, as I am, by the very highest and best patriotic motives. But I say that during the last year, in so far as the voices of which I have been speaking have had the effect I indicate, they have sinned against the spirit of a whole generation.

I recall some twenty-six years ago, Mr. Speaker, getting into conversation with an old shepherd up in the highlands of Scotland, where I had gone to spend ten days leave and to look up some relatives. During the course of our conversation the question of compulsory service came up, since that legislation had been enacted only recently. The old shepherd said to me, "As far as yon village is concerned, and all up the glen, we are not subject to the draft." I was puzzled for a moment, until I realized what I ought to have known, that in this particular region, where men had always sprung to arms at the first call, whether of king or of clan, long before compulsory service had been considered every able-bodied man had joined the colours. No wonder the blood in German veins often ran chill when they learned that across from them was the famous 51st Highland division! That is the class of man we need in our armed forces if we are to achieve victory.

As I have said, if and when I am convinced that we must have compulsory service, I will support it; but I know that in my riding, as in many ridings, there are families that will not be subject to the draft; and it is my hope that in my riding, as in many ridings throughout the country, there may be whole communities whose men already will have answered the higher call of duty, without waiting for the draft. I believe with all my heart that in peace or war the motive behind all heroic or unselfish action is not the compulsion of man-made law but the more compelling force of noble impulses, which are the natural gift of youth; and I have not lost faith, as I will never lose faith, that the young men of our country, when the call is put to them clearly and properly, will respond in sufficient numbers to fill up every establishment that may be decided upon by the Department of National Defence in order to carry on the war. I must say, however, that I do object most strenuously to making synonymous total war and compulsory training for overseas service. These are made synonymous by many public speakers and in the press. I am not in favour of compulsory service for overseas, yet I take second place to no man in my desire that Canada should prosecute the war to the very fullest extent possible.

In the short time left to me, I want to deal with a matter that is rather distasteful. I have tried to make my position clear to the house and to the people of my riding. I have not been driven to do so by the gibes or threats of any newspaper; nor have I refrained from doing so until now because of the motives which have been attributed to me, and to all other Liberal members from Ontario, by a Toronto newspaper. I heard the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) give the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), I think it was, some good advice on one occasion. He said no one should ever get into an argument with a newspaper, who does not own one. Well, I do not own a newspaper, and I am not going to get into an argument with one. As a matter of fact, I have every reason to possess a high regard for the press. In my riding we are fortunate in having a very high-class weekly press. One weekly newspaper is edited by a life-long Conservative, a good friend of mine, who nearly always opposes me in politics, but I want to say that the news items in that newspaper are always absolutely reliable. That man would no more think of selling coloured news to his readers than an honest merchant would think of selling contaminated food to his customers; and the editorials appearing in that newspaper, though they usually disagree with the leader and members of the party to which I belong, are always fair argument.

I would that the same standard of journalism characterized some of the daily newspapers which serve our section of the country. For some time past the Toronto Globe and Mail has contained offensive references to Liberal members, culminating on December 12, 1941, in this article:

> There are 82 Ontario seats in the dominion House of Commons. Fifty-seven of these are occupied by Liberals. Not one of these Liberals has yet risen to lay before the house the clearly revealed opinion of his constituents on this all important question of compulsory selective service. This is a shocking state of affairs. We all know very well that Mr. King is cooking up some emasculated form of mobilization ingeniously contrived to appease, palliate and placate some without offending others. We all know that, true to his long established technique of enforcing party discipline, he is holding over the members' heads a number of unfulfilled appointments which each of his followers thinks he has a chance of filling. There are vacancies in the Senate; there is a rumoured shuffling of the cabinet, there are committees needing paid chairmen, and commissions whose members have not yet been named. The carrot is being held before the nose of the donkey as an inducement to that greedy and fatuous animal to walk soberly in the straight and narrow path of political opportunism.

I might indulge in an angry, recriminatory attack on that newspaper, but I am not going to do so. I am too much in earnest to adopt any such course; but I do say that every hon. member possessed of a spark of self respect; every hon. member who prizes the good opinion of his friends and his countrymen as to the integrity of his intentions, public as well as private; every hon. member who has a proper conception of the duty he owes to maintain the reputation as well as the character of the institution in which his people have honoured him with membership, every such member has not only the right but the duty to make an indignant protest against such an editorial. I heartily agree with the desirability of preserving political independence, and hon. members know full well that there have been ample evidences of it in this house. Members of both the Conservative and Liberal parties have repeatedly voted against their parties without being disciplined for so doing. Every hon. member knows, as our constituents may not know, that the popular characterization of a party whip is simply grotesque. I need not repeat the duties of the whip; hon. members know them. One of the duties of a party whip is to assist Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the other whips, in the orderly arrangement of debates in the house. He has minor duties to perform, such as seating and office arrangements, and he also performs the very important duty of acting as liaison between private members and the cabinet. He keeps the cabinet informed as to the views of hon. members on various questions, something which cannot always be done between caucuses, and cannot always be done even at caucuses, when the membership is very large. I hold that the popular characterization of a party whip is simply grotesque, and it is unfortunate that once in a while even hon. members in the house, quite innocently I think, will slip into the jargon of the street and talk about the crack of the party whip, thus giving force to the opinion popularly held.

One word more about party independence. Political independence is an important, a precious thing. But let me say to people outside the house, and to the newspaper in question, something which hon. members know quite well, that political independence, like all precious coins, has its counterfeit. Sometimes it is difficult for the public to distinguish between the genuine and the fake. There are times when it takes a good deal more courage on the part of a member to vote for his party than to rise in his place and vote against it. Every hon. member knows that.

There may be, and there are times when the position of a party is sound and wise; but considerations of passing popular public opinion, considerations of the safety of a member in his own riding at the next election, and consideration of the desirability of laudation of headlines in the newspapers—all these things make it a great deal easier, and indeed offer quite a temptation to vote against one's party. There you have the false, the fraud; there you have the counterfeit.

And, Mr. Speaker, to get back to the metaphorical donkey and carrot, let me point out that there is more than one kind of carrot which is supposed to make the teeth of the donkey water. I am not so sure that the editor of the paper in question, or the news editor or the gentleman who arranges the headlines, has not a few carrots stuck away in his pocket which he thinks are very, very sweet to the palate of certain politicians. He does not just hold them before the nose of the animal; he feeds them to him. And he does not feed them in half-pint measures, either; he feeds them in bushel basketfuls. In fact, I think sometimes he feeds them in such large doses that the effect must be somewhat nauseating to the creature to whom it is fed.

My time is almost up, but before resuming my seat I should like to refer to one other editorial in this paper. I shall not take time to read it all; the general public has read the editorial to which the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) referred last night. Speaking about the speech of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) in the house, the editorial states:

> And he was rewarded for his effort by some of the most disgraceful evidence of petty political spleen that the house has ever witnessed. After such an episode it is hard to have much respect for parliament.

Lest I might seem to be prejudiced, I should like to say that I have the very highest regard; indeed I have reason to have the very highest regard for the hon. member for Parkdale. I want to pay this tribute to him. I was a little annoyed when, in his first speech he suggested a change in leadership; but I have not formed my opinion of him because of the speeches he has made in the house. I have formed my opinion from the work he did in a committee on which I served. I know the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) and the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macmillan), who was chairman of the committee, will agree with me when I say that although the committee was one in connection with the activities of which this member might have been expected to have had a great deal to say, the attitude of the hon. member for Parkdale was most modest and helpful. No member on the committee did more to assist in having its work carried on successfully and free from party bias than did the hon. member for Parkdale. That is my opinion of the hon. member who made the speech to which reference is made in the newspaper editorial. I pay him that tribute, because I do not want anyone to think that when I take objection to the editorial, I have any feeling against him.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Why did you not keep him on that committee?

Mr. McLEAN (Simcoe East): He is still on the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The committee is dead.

Mr. HOMUTH: The government ought to be.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, no.

Mr. McLEAN (Simcoe East): The man who wrote this editorial knew perfectly well that the actions of the Prime Minister and other Liberal members in the house did not constitute an insult to parliament. I was not in the house when that speech was delivered—and no one has a higher regard than I have for the hon. member. As a matter of fact, very often when he is about to deliver a speech, in order that I may hear him better I go to the other side of the chamber and stand behind the curtains, so that I may be in front of him when he is speaking.

Since the last election in my constituency there have been practically no Liberals or Conservatives, as such. The people there work together. They do Red Cross work, act on committees for the sale of bonds and war savings certificates, and on committees for recruiting—Liberals and Conservatives together. None work harder on those committees than some who at election times oppose me. I would hang my head in abject shame if I were to go back to that riding knowing that the people believed that the conduct of this house and the motives actuating the members were such as depicted in the Globe and Mail of Toronto.

We may be a mediocre lot. God help us, I know we are. When I am no longer a candidate for my constituency I hope the Liberal party in that constituency will be able to persuade the very best, most honest, capable and respected Liberal in the riding to accept the nomination. At the next election I hope the Conservative party will be able to choose as our opponent the most capable, honest and upright among their group in the constituency of Simcoe East. I should like that no matter who is elected, the people in that constituency will have confidence that they are well represented in the House of Commons. But, Mr. Speaker, we are not going to be able to persuade such men to run for office; they will not do it, if they believe that the conduct of the House of Commons and the motives which actuate members are such as have been depicted week after week, week after week by the Globe and Mail. No, you will not be able to get such men to enter politics.

I endeavour not to be angry, but I do plead with that paper: Write as strong editorials as you like, either in favour of or against any policy; condemn the action of any man you think is wrong; but, in the name of democracy, which has been falling in country after country, country after country, and which is falling into disregard even in our own country, do not continue to aid and abet those who hold democracy in contempt and who unintentionally, if not intentionally, are doing their utmost to banish democracy from our country.

I should like in closing to quote one paragraph written by a man whom I am proud to call a fellow townsman. I refer to Doctor Stephen Leacock, late of McGill university who, in the Canadian Spokesman of January, 1941, wrote an article which I commend to all hon. members. I commend it particularly to his very dear friends and admirers in my own riding which has been his home all his life, although he has journeyed down to McGill university every winter to give his students there the benefit of his wisdom. He is speaking of "The whole duty of a citizen," and says:

> With all this in mind the word at the moment is "my country right or wrong." It may be a poor maxim in peace time but in war time there's nothing like it. Turn yourself into a pig-headed patriot and support all those in authority without criticism or quibble. If our Prime Minister and cabinet are not the biggest men in Canada, I'm going to think so till the end of the war anyway. After that I can turn back into a Conservative and look for some fun again.

He ends up with these words:

> There it stands. To submit and to obey: To pay gladly: To applaud the brave: To honour the fallen, to aid and comfort those bereft. In that lies a united nation. You and I can at least be a humble part of it.

Mr. A. R. ADAMSON (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to congratulate the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. McLean) who has just taken his seat. I am not sure, but I believe it was his maiden speech in this house; and while I disagreed with almost every part of it, I should like to congratulate him on the excellence of his presentation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me make myself clear. I oppose this plebiscite with every power at my command. Bad as is government by order in council; bad as is government by a vast majority; bad as is a government by statements to the press and over the radio, nothing can compare in infamy with the dodging of responsibility by the method of the plebiscite. After hearing and reading the impassioned speeches of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) against Prussianism and dictatorships, it is indeed a revelation to find that same Prime Minister going to the dictators for his inspiration, because, while the plebiscite is not and never has been a recognized institution in the realm of democracy and parliamentary government, it has been a most effective weapon wielded upon frequent occasions by the dictators in the past ten years, and an instrument which usually the dictators have been able to use to their own advantage. "Eine Volk, Eine Land, Eine Reich, Eine Fuehrer—Vote Ja —Heil Hitler!"—have been the methods Hitler used to settle matters in Germany.

The time has long passed when compulsory selective service for any part of the world has been of paramount necessity. This parliament should have enacted the necessary legislation after Dunkirk and the fall of France. The need now is even more imperative than ever. It is possible that it may already be too late. I believe that the declaration of war on Germany should have been preceded by a selective service act. Had this been done, all the trouble, all the bitterness, yes and all the violence that we may yet see would have been avoided. If there is one thing the last war has taught us it is that there can be no half measures in waging war. This war has also shown us that half measures mean defeat, degradation, humiliation and the infestation of our country by the enemy. Let it not be said of us in this House of Commons that we were incapable of seeing and doing our duty.

There is at present before this house a bill advocating a distinctive national flag for Canada. If we lose this war, we shall have a new flag, but it will contain the swastika or the rising sun of Japan. If this war is won for us, and the other united nations consider that we have not done our full part, they may themselves decide on alterations in the flag of Canada, and the alteration may contain the stars and stripes or some other emblem. Let us be worthy of the flag we have before talking about getting a new one.

While considering Canadian nationalism and basking in the Statute of Westminster, it might be interesting to see what other nations think of us. We have heard much talk about Canadian-United States unity. Let us see what is happening in the United States this month, February, 1942. On February 16 a large number, several millions of men, are required to report to the United States authorities for service with the United States armed forces anywhere in the world. My United States friends tell me that there are over 400,000 Canadians registered in the United States, and they estimate that over 100,000 more have failed for various reasons to register. A high percentage of Canadian citizens in the United States are single men of military age, and it has been estimated that between 30,000 and 40,000 Canadian citizens will find themselves in one or other of the vulnerable categories, and that half of them will be in category A 1. I am informed by United States friends that this means single men who would be in our medical category A, men who are not employed on work of national importance. Probably some 15,000 to 20,000 Canadians will find themselves called on February 16 to join the armed forces of the country which gives them protection, namely, the United States of America. What a fine position for a great sovereign nation like Canada to be in! We are unwilling to call up our own nationals inside Canada, but our realist neighbours the Americans have no hesitation in calling up our nationals resident in their country. In this war the United States is not a safe place to be.

The normal procedure under international law is to give allied nationals the option of serving with their own forces, if they can join up with them. However, the terms of service must be similar. The Canadian army is better paid than the United States army, and dependents' allowances and other advantages are granted in the Canadian armed forces. A number of Canadians caught in the United States draft might therefore elect to serve in the Canadian armed forces. Unless, however, we have conscription for overseas service, the terms of service in the United States army are much more onerous than in the Canadian army under the National Resources Mobilization Act. Our good friends the Americans know this and, I feel sure, will not look with favour on Canadians called for service in the United States anywhere in the world who elect to join the Canadian army for service in Canada only. As one Washington reporter put it to me, "We are not going to let your men shirk their responsibilities and return to Canada and become home defence units." He called them "campfire cuddlers." Is it a great thing to be a Canadian; or is it?

I now come to the reasons why I so strongly advocate the course I do.

The recent announcement as to the Canadian army to be formed overseas is of great interest. It, however, cannot come as much of a surprise to anyone who has given any thought to the problem, nor can it, in the light of the situation in the Pacific, be considered excessive. Indeed, in comparison with the efforts put forward by our sister dominions of Australia and New Zealand, it is very meagre.

I am pleased to see, however, that the government has followed very closely the formations I recommended in a speech made in this house on May 8 last, as reported at page 2687 of Hansard. I suggested, in the light of the battle of Greece, that we needed:

> . . . four infantry divisions, and with each division a complete armoured brigade and complete artillery units. Besides that, I suggest that we need two complete armoured divisions. We must be able to maintain in Canada in training complete reinforcements for these formations, assuming an annual wastage of one-third. That I submit is, in the light of recent events, the minimum commitment that we can be called upon to complete.

That was last May. I went on to discuss what this would mean in man-power, and I estimated an active army overseas of 200,000 men. Add to these the air force and the navy, 100,000, and you will have an overseas force of approximately 300,000. With the exception that I suggested an armoured brigade with each infantry division, and the proposal now is for two armoured brigades with the infantry army corps of three infantry divisions, my proposals in May, 1941, and the government's proposal of January, 1942, are identical, the tragic difference being that the government waited nine months to give birth to its plan, a plan which must now be considered to impose but a light burden indeed on our man-power, because it will require enlistments of but between six and seven thousand a month for the army.

The present situation, which has mobilized every able-bodied man, woman and child in Australia, calls for equally drastic action from Canada. A force such as the Canadian army, small as it is in comparison with those of the other belligerents of the united powers, will call for an even greater force on the home front and in the munitions factories. It is because of the necessity of maintaining a proper balance between the fighter in the field and the fighter in the factory that I so strongly recommend compulsory selective service.

From the military angle, in the middle of October, 1941, we were unable to supply even the small number of men needed to provide first reinforcements for two battalions sent to Hong Kong without including 138 men who had not received their full advanced training.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend makes that statement, but he knows perfectly well that there were plenty of trained men in Canada for that duty. Nobody knows that better than he does.

Mr. ADAMSON: Is the minister suggesting that there were trained men available and they were not sent?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly I am suggesting there were trained men; and my hon. friend knows it, too.

Mr. ADAMSON: Well, why were they not sent?

Mr. RALSTON: That is a matter which is to be discussed and inquired into. But my hon. friend makes the statement that there were not trained men. He knows better. An officer in his position particularly—

Mr. ADAMSON: Then why were they not sent?

Mr. RALSTON: I say that that is a matter to be inquired into. It has nothing to do with the incorrectness of the statement which my hon. friend made a moment ago.

[Mr. Adamson.]

Mr. ADAMSON: The minister said in his own speech that there were required for overseas duties these reinforcements, and that 138 were below the standard.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not say that there were not trained men in Canada, which is what my hon. friend said a moment ago. And he knows better.

Mr. ADAMSON: Well, then, there were trained men, but they were not sent.

Mr. RALSTON: Exactly. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON: Very well—

Mr. HANSELL: That makes it all the worse.

Mr. ADAMSON: Then I just want to say that there must have been a great shortage of men if for that small force 138 were sent who had not completed their training.

Mr. RALSTON: I say that my hon. friend knows himself that there were trained men.

Mr. ADAMSON: If they had been available they would have been sent.

Mr. RALSTON: That is matter for an investigation. I am asking my hon. friend if he does not know himself that there were 138 active trained men available in No. 2 district. I will let him say yes or no.

Mr. ADAMSON: Then they would have been sent.

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend answer that question? He does not have to if he does not want to. The important thing is that he says there were not trained men, when there were.

Mr. ADAMSON: Well, I am amazed at the minister making that statement.

On January 29, 1942, the minister stated that 10,000 had volunteered for the active army during the month of January, 500 of whom had volunteered the previous day. It is obvious that this great increase in enlistments, gratifying as it is, must seriously congest the training centres, trade schools, and other military establishments for the training of troops. Accommodation is at a premium, and the duties of military instructors will no doubt be severely taxed.

The situation, therefore, is that in October we could not raise a small number of reinforcements for two battalions without including a number of untrained men, and in January our training establishments are overcrowded because of the glut of enlistments. Surely this house must realize that to have called men up on a scientific basis, as they were needed, would have been the most efficient way to handle the military man-power required.

In this connection, I quote the experience of the United States armed forces where General Lewis B. Hershey called on Secretary Henry L. Stimson and Secretary Frank Knox to wind up all recruiting of volunteers for the army, navy and marine corps and rely entirely on selective service. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will quote the dispatch:

"America faces the disruption and dislocation of its supply of essential man-power," General Hershey contended.

The army suspended recruiting in December but resumed subsequently after congress had lowered the limit for selective service to 20 years rather than 18 as favoured by the war department.

In his letter he said the appeal for volunteers had lured skilled men from vital production jobs.

General Hershey asserted also that recruiting services were building up a belief that volunteers would be favoured in the military service and commented "such practices are not conducive to good morals."

"An appropriate agency of government should decide where the individual could best serve his nation in total war, rather than leave the decision to the individual who is not a free agent in the matter of such choice," General Hershey contended. He proposed that the recruiting of volunteers be brought to an end gradually to avoid difficulties.

A complete parallel of the position we find ourselves in is to be found in New Zealand where in 1938 the Labour party was elected to power, one of its pledges being "no conscription." In 1940, after the fall of Dunkirk, public opinion became so alarmed that the government of our sister dominion very wisely altered its stand on this question and brought in the national service emergency regulations. These were passed on the 18th of June, 1940, and made public on the 24th of June, 1940. All voluntary enlistments ceased on the 22nd of July, 1940, except in the Royal New Zealand Navy and Royal New Zealand Air Force. The ballot system was introduced for all men between the ages of twenty-one and forty-five, and the bill enacting this measure passed the New Zealand house without a seriously dissenting voice.

As an example of what a small country, whose population is but 1,636,000, can do, I should like to quote the following figures for the record, taken from the New Zealand War Record, an official publication of the government printing office, Wellington, New Zealand: After two years of war, that is in December, 1941. New Zealand had 80,000 men on active service, overseas or in training, 138,000 for home defence enlisted on conditions somewhat similar to our reserve army—

Mr. RALSTON: I have been endeavouring to get the figures about New Zealand. Will the hon. member give the source of them? Are they from the New Zealand handbook?

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes. This book I have is issued by the director of publicity, Wellington, New Zealand, 1941, and as far as I can judge it is an authentic government document.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not suggesting that it is not.

Mr. ADAMSON: Ninety-five thousand enlisted in civil defence units, making a total of 313,000. Besides this, she had 33,000 applications for enlistment in the air force, of whom 13,500 are, or were at the end of two years of war, actually serving in the Royal New Zealand Air Force. Her operational and air crews overseas were 4,300, as well as 6,000 men volunteered for the navy—4,000 of whom were serving in the New Zealand navy in September as well as 1,000 more New Zealanders in the Royal Navy. To recapitulate: 80,000 active service army overseas or in training; 138,000 home defence units—reserve army; 13,500 air force; 5,000 navy. Total military personnel, 236,500 at the end of September. To this must be added 95,000 in civil defence units, bringing the total for this gallant country, whose population is but one-eighth of ours, to the magnificent figure of 331,000. This was of the date of September, 1941.

New Zealand is, however, not an industrial nation, there being but 11,000 persons engaged directly in munitions manufacture. Therefore it would be unfair to say that on the basis of comparative population Canada's contribution should be 2,650,000 men. It is just this sort of argument and petty mental arithmetic that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) uses when he takes the Canadian enlistments and multiplies by ten to show what the United States army should be compared with ours. You cannot apply the multiplication table to the raising of armies. That is not the way in which an army is raised, and it is this sort of dangerous oversimplification that causes so much ill-feeling and misunderstanding. The way to consider Canada's war effort is to see to it that every man will be called upon to do the job he is most capable of doing. Surely there is no disagreement with that statement.

The unfairness of the present system is that men now doing one job and doing it well can and do alter their calling or occupation almost at will, frequently to the great disruption of industry. I will give one example. In the manufacture of Bren guns there is a very highly technical and skilled job of straightening out the barrel prior to its assembly. This is done by hand and by eye, the barrel receiving a series of bumps until it is perfectly true. The trueness of the barrel is judged by the eye of the operator, who observes a series of concentric rings or shadows formed in the barrel, which is highly polished. A great deal of the final accuracy of this magnificent weapon depends upon this operation.

The operators are all young men with peculiarly gifted eyesight. When they engage in this work they are trained for a period of four or five months, and they agree not to go to the movies, not to read, not to smoke, to drink very little, and to do practically no work by artificial light. I am sure the house will agree that these men are working at considerable sacrifice, no matter what they are paid, and that if they change their occupation, it is harmful to the Canadian war effort. Surely it cannot be good to have these very highly trained men who are doing this excellent work change their position and enter the armed forces unless they can be replaced. Several of these men have enlisted in the Canadian armed forces, against the wishes of their employers, their reasons being those of any red-blooded young Canadian. I suggest that to use these men in the army is not in the best interests of the country's war effort at the present time.

I come now to the present application of the National Resources Mobilization Act. My objection to the present policy of the government is that under the present regulations you have two types of soldiers. This is undignified and entirely foreign to the nature of the Canadian people, and in my opinion Canada believes that the soldier should be a soldier to go where he is sent, to do what he is told to do, to fight the enemy wherever the enemy may be found. To have an active army battalion in which there are men whose service ends with the three-mile limit is the evil outcome of the mind of a political contortionist, and I warn this government that to continue this policy may have the most serious consequences not only on the morale but on the internal discipline of the unit so affected. A regiment of volunteers which finds itself with an admixture of home defence recruits immediately thinks its fighting days are over. Morale decreases and resentment against these unfortunate young men grows rapidly.

A regiment is a sacred thing, full of long traditions of great service, full of esprit de corps; and to destroy this fighting spirit is criminal folly which must rest squarely on the shoulders of the government. To have some members of the unit proudly wearing "Canada" on their shoulders and their regimental badges, while other members do not wear these proud emblems, is a disgrace to our military history. It is not only a disgrace to our military history, but is a slap in the face to men of a previous generation whose bravery and endurance contributed so much to our safety here to-day.

The Prime Minister spoke long and loud about the need of preserving national unity. What has he been doing in the past eighteen months? In this very matter of dividing the armed forces into active and home defence bodies he has sown within Canada seeds of disunity and discord which will bedevil posterity with the fomenting of hatred long after he and the rest of the government have passed from the scene.

The great Grecian patriot Pericles, in his immortal speech, bequeathed to the world the conviction that freedom was the right only of those who had the courage to defend it. Those deserve to be free. Yet under our present system it is also given to the faint-hearted and to those who live sheltered lives; they expect the courageous to provide freedom for them.

I have a word to say on the question of a war council of the united powers. It is essential for the prosecution of this world-wide war to act in conformity and jointly with our allies. We have in Washington to-day a United Nations war council for defence on the Pacific; we have in London an imperial war cabinet. Is it for the Prime Minister to say we are not interested in joining both of these bodies? Certainly our highest possible and most accredited military and governmental representatives should be sent to these councils. Not to do so is to accept colonial status. Admittedly we have a joint defence board with the United States, but that is not enough. What goes on in the south Pacific, the fortunes of Singapore, the battle of Libya and the magnificent defence of their country by the soviets are of immediate concern to us. We must be prepared; in fact we must demand, that we be informed of what is being done, and say what we can do and what we are prepared to do about it. If war can be kept at these safe distances, we shall indeed be fortunate. But we cannot expect other nations to be interested in us should we be invaded, unless we are interested in them.

The whole tragic history of the defeat of allied arms in this war has been caused by this narrow nationalism and this inability of nations to act together as a unit. For any responsible Canadian not to jump at the chance, nay, demand that we be included in all of the councils of the United Nations is an exhibition of that parochial spirit and an example of the petty political mind that destroyed France.

If, however, we demand this, as I believe we should, we must be prepared to do our part equally and without the slightest hesitation or reserve along with the other United Nations. The government must get out of its mind that Canada is merely contributing something towards the waging of someone else's war. This manifestation of an inferiority complex puts us in a false light. The fact that many of our allies are numerically stronger than we are does not necessarily mean that we have to accept an inferior position all along the line. We must have a say, and an important say, in how the war is to be conducted. And we must be prepared, as I have already said, to perform whatever tasks are assigned to us.

There are some who consider that Canada's war effort in this titanic struggle must be of a minor nature. I do not agree with that view. We have a country of twelve million people, a quarter of the population of Great Britain. We have a skilled manufacturing and agricultural manhood. We have natural resources in great abundance. The Prime Minister is prone to talk of Canada as a nation, but every time we are expected to behave as one we immediately revert to the status of a colony. It is essential that we take our active part in both Washington and London and that we do it without delay. But we must remove the one barrier to ourselves as a nation before we can sit in these conferences of great men, and that one barrier is the lack of an all-out war effort, which includes selective compulsory national service.

Now I come to one more question. I see by the press that there is a movement on foot to take away the wet canteens from the soldiers and to restrict the sale of beer throughout Canada. Let me warn this government that if it wants to create bad feeling and to strike a deadly blow at the morale of the Canadian army, the first and surest step to take is to restrict the privileges of the wet canteen. I will ask my friends who are so anxious to interfere with the lives of others to remember that the gallant garrison at Tobruk when they were relieved stated that one of the reasons why their morale remained so magnificently high was the fact that a wise United Kingdom government had seen to it that they had a constant supply of beer.

The discipline of Canadian troops in the city of Toronto during this war has been exemplary. To close the beer parlours or to restrict the sale of beer to his majesty's forces would shortly bring about the deplorable conditions of the prohibition era and lead to the eventual break-down of respect for law. To do this would be criminal folly.

I have just one word to say to those good people who will accuse me in making that statement. I state that I do not drink beer, nor do I smoke; I do not own any stock in any brewery; I do not know any brewer, and there are no breweries in the riding I have the honour to represent. I merely wanted to make that statement for the record, so that it may be seen that what I have said was said in the interest of the forces and not because I am interested in any other way.

There is one final point that I wish to raise about the speech from the throne, namely, that it contained no mention of Russia. To-day our soviet allies are providing the one bright spot in the picture of world-wide catastrophe. The Russians have been the first people to meet and defeat the blitzkrieg. It is to them we must look for the initial destruction of the German land forces. Their magnificent heroism has sent the brazen horde reeling in disorder from their capital. To-day the soviet power is the second or third most important in the world. Soviet Russia and Canada are near neighbours; we are both northern people living in an extreme climate; we both have a great country to develop. Yet one would think it was almost indecent to mention Russia. I suggest that we should immediately take steps to recognize the government of the Soviet Union. I am glad we had the statement concerning that of the Prime Minister yesterday. We should welcome in this country a soviet military mission, and should send one of ours to Russia. I believe we have much to teach them, and it is more than likely that they have much to teach us.

I am not afraid of the spread of communism in Canada, if we treat Russia as a full ally and welcome members of her armed forces in the same way as we do those of any of the other "united nations." I should like to see a soviet legation at Ottawa; the hammer and sickle should fly proudly at the masthead instead of being considered an emblem of somewhat questionable morality. I realize that in saying this I may be accused of being a communist or of having communist leanings. I am no communist and no socialist. Some of my friends and all my enemies consider me a reactionary Tory. But to refuse to recognize this great power is building up trouble for ourselves and is going to give great aid to subversive elements which are even now at work trying to undermine the security of the state. We are going to have to admit that the soviet philosophy exists and that it has done great things; let us admit it openly and above the broad tables of government rather than have snivelling, subversive agents peddling anarchist literature to the adolescent minds of the students in our schools, universities and training camps We have seen what anarchy has done in other countries. It can happen here.

Listening to the desk-thumping at the close of the Prime Minister's apologia on this plebiscite question, I thought of the words of the poem, "The Fall of the City", by Archibald McLeish:

> The city of Masterless men
> Will take a Master.
> There will be shouting then.
> Blood after.

Country without leadership; government without direction; parliament without authority.

Canada without leadership.

> Shouting now.
> Blood after.

Mr. F. G. HOBLITZELL (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on a subject of vital importance. First, however, I should like to say that the views I am about to express are my own, and are the result of deep personal convictions. I am quite aware that these views are not shared by many hon. members on this side of the house, but this matter is of such grave importance that it far outweighs any party considerations. In what I am about to say I am considering first of all the interests of the whole country, certainly not those of any political party.

I believe the time is now ripe to wage total war with total war effort. Does anyone here suggest that we have total war effort? How is it possible to have total war effort without the mobilization of all our man-power, wealth and material resources, under a plan of universal compulsory selective service?

As member for the constituency of Eglinton in Toronto, I have received thousands of communications from my constituents, both Liberal and Conservative, with regard to the vital question of selective compulsory service of man-power, wealth and material resources. I greatly welcome the interest taken by my constituents, and at this time publicly thank them for communicating their views to me. I should like to say, however, that prior to receiving this widespread expression of opinion, I had already taken the opportunity of giving to the press my views as a member of parliament on this vital question. I stated then, as I do now, that I believe the only fair, honest and efficient way to wage total war is by the allocation of our man-power, wealth and material resources, that is, by introducing a measure of universal selective compulsory service.

I have not arrived at this conclusion hastily and without consideration for the views of others. On this matter, however, which concerns the life and security of every one of us, I felt the time had arrived for me to add my views to those expressed in this house and elsewhere.

I should like to say something about Canada's war effort up to the present. In many spheres it has been a most creditable and substantial contribution. When we consider the difficult task of changing a nation from a peace-time economy to an active war-time economy, I think it becomes us all to pay tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the members of his government for the good work that has been done. In fact I believe it is the utmost pity that in this one most important sphere, the issue of man-power, we should allow the splendid efforts of the government to be overshadowed by the resultant depreciation in civilian morale throughout the land. I realize that this is a job beyond the strength of any one man or group of men to carry on without the cooperation and unity of all men and women in this country.

If we are to carry our full weight forward to victory, it is of the utmost necessity that the people be given inspired leadership, so that our military and material contributions will be supported by a high state of civilian morale. Nazism is a horrible disease which has been allowed to run rampant too long. It must and will be destroyed. But let us use every expediency, everything within our power and knowledge to destroy it as quickly as possible before it destroys too many of us.

I should like to state exactly what universal compulsory selective service means to me. It is the complete mobilization of man-power, wealth and material resources, as has been said so often. In the words of the Prime Minister, total war must be met with total-war effort. To that effort there are four parts which go to make up the whole. No two or three parts are of any use or can make up the whole or total effort without the fourth.

First, proper allocation of all Canadians, manhood and womanhood, and proper use of all material resources will do this.

Second, men and women who are on the farms, or have knowledge of farming must be kept on the farms. This department of a total war effort I believe to be in a critical stage right now. Farm lands must be kept up to strength, for the food question is equally and as vitally important as the other three parts which make up the whole of total effort.

Third, our industrial plants and munition factories must not lose their specially trained and skilled labour. Where women can do the work as well as men, they should be conscripted for this work, leaving thousands of men free for the armed services; and all men of the proper age, and fitted to serve in the armed forces, must be trained and equipped to serve anywhere and at any time.

Fourth, all material resources must be wisely appropriated and properly used for the functioning of our war effort.

In my opinion, the voluntary recruiting system has not been a success, particularly in connection with the army. This is not my opinion only; we have the expressed view of our own high military authorities, including Brigadier General Panet and Major-General Vanier, and of course the figures given to this house by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) at the end of the last session, which in themselves were a complete admission that the voluntary system of enlistment was not doing the job. The figures to which I refer were those which he gave the house as to the results of the campaign for 35,000 recruits, which fell short of its objective by approximately 10,000. This speaks for itself.

I despise the backdoor methods, which are a disgrace to our country, of gaining recruits for our armed forces. I wish you could tell me, Mr. Speaker, how to answer the boys who are constantly coming into my office. These are loyal, patriotic Canadian citizens, anxious to do their duty and ready to serve equality of service. Some tell me they help in or are even the sole support of their families. Even so, they are ready to enlist and do their duty; but, why should they enlist when so-and-so over there, who has no obligations, who is earning good money and enjoying all the comforts of our country, sits back and waits for good opportunities left open by our volunteer recruits? Nor do I approve the disgraceful methods used by some of our recruiting officers, which constitute a system of coercion. Many of these stalwart youths, being just underage for service, are the constant objects of ridicule, sneers and badgering by these same officers. I believe universal compulsory service would be received happily and with deep satisfaction by all the young men of our country. Equality of sacrifice and of service, which far transcends any economic policy, is the only method by which we can defend the system under which we live.

It is true that in the beginning of 1940 our Prime Minister and others gave a pledge to the people of Canada not to instigate conscription for our armed forces for other than home defence, without consulting the people. But was any government or any prophet in the world at that time able to foresee the sorry and horrible mess into which all the freedom-loving peoples of the world would be thrown by the end of 1941? As I said before, nazism is a disease, and we must keep healthy the place where it is not lest that part also be destroyed. We must go and fight it where where it is.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is my considered judgment that the majority of the people of this country desire that the Prime Minister keep the pledge which goes with his high office, that is, to take whatever measures he and his government feel are wise and necessary to protect the lives and property of the people in the light of whatever perils face the nation. I implore him not to besmirch the honour and dignity of this great dominion by substituting the uninformed opinion of the people for vigorous, courageous and honest leadership. We have seen evidence of the disunity that the proposed plebiscite is going to create among our people. I therefore plead, Mr. Speaker, through you to the Prime Minister, that it is the course of wisdom for him to arrest this ever-growing dissension of which we all have ample evidence. The simple way would be to provide legislation that will bring into force universal compulsory selective service, both for manpower and material wealth. In this way everyone, regardless of race, colour or religion, who shares the privileges of this country, will equally be called upon to share the responsibilities that go with those privileges.

On motion of Mr. Church the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the war is Canada's only business at the present time; it overshadows everything else. Nothing else matters. There are a large number of domestic problems which at other times would be very important, but in the face of war nothing else amounts to very much until the war is won.

I have read over the various addresses which have been made in this house since the beginning of the session; and it is altogether too bad for parliamentary government in Canada that the real issue, the war, which is now not far from Canada's shores, cannot be discussed without many of the personalities and some of the arguments which have been used in this particular debate.

After all is said and done, principles are bigger than individuals. Criticism is to be expected in times like these; and those who sit on this side of the house have given the government pretty good support since the war started. I believe that it is the desire of every good citizen in this country from coast to coast to cooperate with the government so long as it does its duty and tries to achieve a full war effort. But this is not the first government which has failed in time of war. The Asquith government went out of office in 1916. Why? Because it tried to conduct a war on a political basis, the way the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is trying to conduct this one—on a Liberal basis. So Mr. Asquith went out of office. The present government is carrying on in the same way. I defy anybody to successfully contradict that statement. Not one hon. member from the Toronto district who is a Conservative has been invited since the day the war started to see a thing, either in the army, the navy or the air force. The first letter of invitation we received was yesterday, from the army council, to members of parliament—who did not need any invitation to go on government property, notwithstanding all the restrictions imposed by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). By the way, if the Prime Minister cannot be here, I hope that his assistant, the deputy leader, will sit in his seat, because I believe that some criticism is necessary in reference to statements which have been and are being made in this chamber and outside it. I have said that the first invitation which hon. members from the Toronto district got was from the army council, to go down to some building—the Jackson building, I believe—have their photographs taken, receive some card and obtain a passport, if they wished to visit some ships of the Royal Canadian Navy and some air force establishments and various camps in the Toronto district. For myself I do not intend to accept this invitation, because I believe that the certificate of a member signed by the respected Clerk of the House of Commons to each member of the house should be sufficient for the purpose.

[Mr. Church.]

I was not able to go to the last war, but I tried to do my duty to all classes of citizens, no matter who they were; politics did not enter into it at all.

I say that this belated invitation effort is very much out of place. Criticism is a tonic which stirs governments to action. So long as it is founded on fact and is not influenced by political bias, it helps and encourages an administration and often assists it, even against some of its own friends. Of course criticism should be based on fact and be impartial, and critical comment, if it is to be valuable, must be fair. Before one makes a speech containing any criticism, he should look around him; he should try in some degree to discern the future; he should be sure of his facts, because facts are facts, and history always repeats itself.

It is true that the government is not alone responsible for earlier reductions of military estimates. It had to assume the consequences of inadequate appropriations made by itself and other administrations as well, as a result of the depression and refusal to face the facts. As I have contended frequently in this house, all parties are to blame for the present situation, for listening to the pacifists and refusing to arm before it was too late.

The opposition has a duty to perform; and I may say that in my opinion the government have not acted fairly towards us in the house in the matter of the war effort. We as Canadians and members of the British empire have no divine right to expect victory. The path is not going to be an easy one. The government seem to think there is a royal road to victory, and have neglected to prepare for this war on land and sea, and in the air. Victory can only come out of resolute leadership, total war effort, service and real sacrifice. There is no use boasting about victory and talking as if it were our right by divine law. We can gain victory only by telling the truth to the people, facing the real facts, and building up from the worst of the facts. The hour has come, the men were ready, but machinery and mechanization are not ready. We are now going to take a plebiscite, and that gives the country plain evidence of the fact that we have not yet learned any lessons either from the last war or from this one, and that we refuse to act. We are getting farther away from the main object of the time—to win the war. We have been outbuilt by the Germans and outwitted by them in diplomacy and strategy.

As a member of the House of Commons I believe in certain principles, and one of them is that we should always tell the people the truth. That is a very important thing, and I say to the Prime Minister now that the policy he has enunciated on behalf of the government is not satisfactory. I say to him that he should not be afraid to tell the people that he has made a mistake. The Canadian people do not expect its leaders to be gods, nor do they expect hon. gentlemen opposite to fulfil their pledges. I say to the Prime Minister: "Don't go with the multitude to do wrong." Since this war started, the Senate and the House of Commons have seemed to be like the two lost tribes of the children of Israel, and the altogether forgotten agencies of any parliamentary government. The Senate has been given no new duties. One pledge which the Prime Minister made to me at the last session and the session before was that during the recess of parliament he would consider the question of what should be done to bring about closer cooperation between the two houses of parliament with a view to getting more work done by the Senate in connection with our war effort. One body says it has been here only four or five hours since last June and since the war started, has done nothing to aid the war effort. This is not its fault.

The House of Commons seems to be the forgotten agency of government. The session seems to be a sort of "on again, off again, on again." The doors are sometimes locked and the Senate goes home itself because there is no work for it to do. If there were a reallocation of duties a greater war effort would be effected. I think the less said about pledges, the better for all concerned. The Prime Minister and some hon. members seem to be very much afraid of the newspapers. They are worried by the newspapers. As I said when I first entered the house in 1921, "you can never answer a newspaper because it always has the last word."

In my opinion, the plebiscite is just a box-office appeal to the cash customers—the voters. That is all it is—a box-office appeal at a late hour. And under the plebiscite for the next four months Canada will be off the track altogether as far as its war effort is concerned.

In the speech from the throne there is nothing but a lot of evasion and platitudes and all that sort of thing. The speech has left out any mention of those things that should be done, and it has forgotten the things that should have been done long ago but have not been accomplished. The speech declares:

> The conflict can have but one of two outcomes. Either tyranny, based on terror and brutality, must be overthrown; . . .

I do not think tyranny will be overthrown by a plebiscite, by taking a vote of the people while failing to protect them. Hitler will not be bluffed by any plebiscite on our part. There was no plebiscite when he invaded Norway, Poland and Czechoslovakia. There was no chance for those people to take a plebiscite. There was no plebiscite in Holland and Belgium. With his savage, mechanized hordes he swept through those countries, and France also, with the result that the whole of Europe collapsed. He beat them to a standstill in diplomacy and strategy, because his war and foreign policies and his strategy have all been a united part of a consistent, considered system, with great preparation and foresight.

In this house for the past ten years I have championed some causes when it was neither fashionable nor popular to do so. For instance, I have always been firm in advocating the British connection, and I have argued for rearmament and cooperation with Great Britain, but this did not appeal to the house because I was one of the last left of the die-hards of British imperialism. The House of Commons and the government of the day thought it was all right to depend upon disarmament, pacifism, and they preferred to associate themselves with peace pacts, protocols, the discredited League of Nations, the Monroe doctrine, the Kellogg note, Locarno, Pan-Americanism, and things of that sort. The time that should have been spent in rearming and preparing for what we have to face now was spent in listening to peace pacts and disarmament, and to the declarations: "We have no commitments; parliament will decide." Every nation that wanted to write a note would find a willing reader in the Canadian government. From 1935 to 1940 I repeatedly urged upon the government the importance of rearmament, and of taking definite steps looking towards defence. I deprecated the habit of hon. gentlemen opposite of building castles in the air instead of facing realities. You need only look at the index of the debates in the house from 1935 to 1940 to see the position I took in that period with regard to defence and foreign affairs.

The greatest sin which Canada has committed is that of unpreparedness in the face of the greatest disaster in all history. That is the first and gravest sin of this dominion. We thought we had all eternity to prepare for war. The government of the day, I suggest, instead of hoisting its patron saint, the plebiscite, might far better put up in front of the parliament buildings a bust of Canada's patron saint. And who is Canada's patron saint? Ethelred the Unready. He should be installed as the patron saint of Canada and of this government. We have been too late in everything we have done in connection with this war, even in the present policy of the plebiscite. I suggest also that the government might erect a statue to Harold, who left Hastings and by forced marches arrived too late to meet William the Norman.

Canada has been too late in everything since this war began. It has been the same thing in the army, the navy and the air force; and owing largely to the urging and promptings of this country before the war, Britain parted with her defences, throwing them to the four winds of heaven, and also parted with her friends. At the end of the last war she had the finest army, navy and air force the world had ever seen, but Canada was not anxious to maintain the defences of the empire. Instead, we built castles in the air, like the league, Pan-Americanism, the Monroe doctrine, and so forth.

In my opinion it is no discredit and no disparagement to some hon. gentlemen opposite who have served the country admirably in days of peace to find themselves unfitted for leadership in war, because peace and war are two entirely different conditions. The political executives in Canada have not done well since the war started, and it could not be expected that they would.

They have supported peace pacts, peace agreements, protocols and the like, and believed that these could take the place of service and sacrifice, something in the history of the world never possible. Some of our peace political executives in Canada have lacked the element of courage, decision, the first essential, and the country has not been given the vigorous leadership it needs.

Party politics should be put into cold storage, as I said before the war started, until the war is won and for one year after; for if we lose, Hitler will not only put it there but will make life not worth living for our people.

Now Hitler seeks to capture the future by the present; Canada's policy is the opposite; it seeks to capture the present by talking about what it will do later. We are all along talking of what we are going to do in 1942, 1943, 1944. I predicated in 1937, 1938, 1939 that if war came, it would take two years to train a man and two or three to get munitions. The government are making a great mistake; they are not ready and they do not intend a total war, so they have resorted to delays and vacuum and coma and fear and doubt of a useless plebiscite to kill time. As Tennyson says in the early part of his "In Memoriam":

> Our little systems have their day;
> They have their day and cease to be;
> They are but broken lights of thee,
> But thou, O Lord, art more than they.

[Mr. Church.]

I say the policy which the Prime Minister has announced is a follow-your-leader policy, "your leader is your policy," a "me-too" policy. Did you ever hear of such a policy in any country that prizes its liberty or in a free parliament?

In Ottawa and in Ontario the Conservative party went out of office on the follow-your-leader policy. Ontario will never tolerate it. I opposed the general referendum in 1924 and 1925. I said in this house—it is on five or six pages of Hansard—that in time of war I would never as a member of this house allow Mr. General Election to become commander in chief of the British forces; that I would never allow Mr. General Election to become admiral of the British fleet, because before Mr. General Election could open his ballot boxes the enemy might proceed up the St. Lawrence by land, sea or in the air and bomb the citadel at Quebec and bomb this very chamber in which we are meeting. That is the policy I then announced regarding the referendum and do now.

I have here many pages of Hansard. I had a motion on going into supply because I was very much dissatisfied with the government, and on March 21, 1939, on a motion to go into supply, I moved a want of confidence motion in the government's foreign policy and defence policy. I said that the true facts were kept from the people of Canada; that we were not given any information regarding the real picture, and I took a stand in the house on that date regarding the British empire, rearmament and this war. I quoted the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Chamberlain, where he said in the British House of Commons:

> If the people are not allowed to know the facts; if they are only allowed to know what their rulers choose them to know, then that people are in danger of being led to embark upon a course which may presently lead them to disaster.

That is found on page 2095 of Hansard for 1939. Again, on the opening of parliament on February 14, 1938, I had twenty-two questions on the order paper with reference to Canada's pacifist part in the war that seemed sure to be coming. My questions dealt with the Washington conference, that ill-fated conference at Washington in 1921 and 1922, which drove Japan into Germany's arms, and the mission of Lord Halifax to Hitler, the Tokyo legation, the Sino-Japanese conflict, Canada and the Nine Power conference, the Prime Minister's visit to Hitler in Berlin in 1937. The Prime Minister was not satisfied for the British government to deal with Hitler, and he went to visit Hitler himself to let him know

Canada was a nation. My question is found on page 391 of Hansard for February 14, 1938, and was as follows:

1. On whose invitation did the Prime Minister visit Berlin and the German government of Herr Hitler in 1937, and on what days was the visit made?

2. What were the subject matters discussed and was the government of Great Britain advised or consulted about this visit?

3. Will a summary of the matter discussed be laid on the table of the house?

4. Was the subject of establishing a Canadian embassy to Germany under discussion?

5. Did the Prime Minister of Canada make any proposals during said discussions, and if so, what were they?

6. Was the subject of the ceding of the German colonies by Great Britain discussed?

7. Were any economic or international questions in their relation to Canada discussed, and, if so, what questions?

8. What is Canada's foreign policy with respect to Germany?

9. Is such foreign policy a Canadian policy, or is it in harmony with the foreign policy of Great Britain?

The Prime Minister replied with a reply that was no reply at all.

Then there was a Nyon conference to prevent piracy on the Mediterranean and on aid to Britain in the Pacific by funds for the Singapore base. I had urged for many years in this house that for maritime freedom in the Pacific a grant should be made by Canada; also the adoption of the Jellico report and a vast empire shipbuilding policy; the training of 5,000 cadets a year; that Singapore meant more in Pacific protection to Canada than to Australia or New Zealand. And what was the policy of the government? They would not give a dollar, even on Lincoln's birthday, 1938, when the Singapore base was opened four years ago this month. The Australian and New Zealand fleets were there and the United States fleet and the British fleet. But where was Canada? Canada, which was first in the diamond jubilee procession, was the last to send a contingent to South Africa; the government of that day, 1897, said it was against the constitution and against the British North America Act. Canada refused to protect our Pacific coast lines in 1935 to 1940 as it did in 1938.

They have carried out that policy from that day to this, and what has been the result? There was an imperial conference in 1937; the question of shipping and the Pacific question were up, but Canada used the old hackneyed phrase as to the Pacific, "We have no commitments; parliament will decide." They refused to join New Zealand and Australia in an empire shipping plan or enter the shipping conference; they refused here the programme I offered of a large shipbuilding policy for the empire (1936-38), or to train some of the men who at that time were riding the rods, or a national register for national service.

Then we come to Canada's navy. On the same date, February 14, 1938, I asked, as reported at page 392 of Hansard of that year:

1. What does Canada's navy consist of, and where is it now located?

2. Did the Department of National Defence, on January 5 or 6, 1938, release the schedule of good-will cruises, 1938, for this fleet, in navy orders?

3. Has part of the fleet already set out to sea, and to what destination?

4. Have any of the fleet gone to Sino-Japanese waters?

5. Did part of His Majesty's Canadian navy go to sea, on January 1, on a three-months' cruise to Bermuda, St. Kitts, Barbadoes, St. Lucia and Granada on the Atlantic?

6. Who is the present admiral of the Canadian fleet, and where are his headquarters?

7. What is the total per annum cost to maintain this fleet, and how many officers and men have they?

We have it that Canada's navy then had a tonnage of only that of one large tramp steamer.

Many other questions were asked and replied to, and there were many other occasions on which I brought these matters to the attention of the house, urging naval protection for Canada and our empire.

On March 31, 1939, I talked out the bill of the present Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), who would not even support a small increase in the military estimates and whose policy was that if war came, Canada would be neutral; and although I talked his bill out, it was applauded from a large majority of the house.

On Friday, March 17, 1939, I asked this question:

Will the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) be in a position at the first of the week to give the house any information on the foreign situation, in view of its great importance to the people of Canada?

That is found on page 1991 of Hansard for March 17, 1939. The Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe replied:

The government will take notice of the question of my hon. friend, and I have no doubt the Prime Minister will satisfy his legitimate curiosity.

I wish to compliment those hon. members who have asserted the rights and privileges and functions of members of parliament. Burke has stated what our rights and privileges are:

Theirs were formerly the feelings of Mr. Hampden when called upon for the payment of twenty shillings. Would twenty shillings have ruined Mr. Hampden's fortune? No. But the payment of half twenty shillings, on the principle on which it was demanded, would have made him a slave.

Then, as to the rights and functions of members of parliament, Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Churchill have given the same opinion. Burke had this to say in his address at a time of grave danger in 1774 to his electors and to the sheriffs of Bristol which he represented in parliament:

Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion, high respect, their business, unremitted attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasures, his satisfactions, to theirs; and above all, ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interest to his own. But his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or to any set of men living. These he does not derive from your pleasure; no, nor from the law and the constitution. They are a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion. . . .

You choose a member, indeed; but when you have chosen him, he is not member for Bristol, but he is a member of parliament. If the local constituent should have an interest, or should form any hasty opinion, evidently opposite to the real good of the rest of the community, the member for that place ought to be as far, as any other, from any endeavour to give it effect. . . .

We are members for a free country; and surely we all know, that the machine of a free constitution is no simple thing; but as intricate and as delicate as it is valuable.

Mr. Churchill reasserted that principle of free assembly, free debates, in the British House of Commons last week, in these words:

I don't see why this should hamper anyone. If a member has helpful criticisms to make or even severe correction to administer, that may be perfectly consistent with thinking that in respect of the administration such as it is he might go farther and fare worse.

If a member dislikes the government very much and feels that it is in the public interest that it should be broken up, he ought to have the manhood to testify to his opinion. Nobody need be mealy-mouthed in this debate.

Then Mr. Emmanuel Shinwell, labour member for Seaham, interjected:

Is it to be a free vote?

To this Mr. Churchill replied:

It is to be a free vote under all conditions which have made the conduct of parliamentary government possible. Surely the honourable gentleman is not a man to be frightened of the whip.

[Mr. Church.]

Then he went on to say:

It may seem silly to us, but in those minds abroad it is mischievous to our common interests and efforts. I am certainly not asking for any special favours in these circumstances, but I am sure the house would wish to make its position clear.

Therefore I stand by the ancient constitutional and parliamentary doctrine of free debate and faithful voting. . . .

That was his opinion. And when Mr. Churchill speaks he tells the plain truth; his speeches are his own; he does not mince his words, and the people listen to him. He reasserted the rights and privileges of the private member; and the British House of Commons supported him because he believes in free parliamentary and press criticism as part of the British democratic system. What a difference here in this house and in Canada! The first duty of yes-men in Germany is to find out what the fuehrer wants and then to make the planets dance to his desires. Yes-men are not all astrologers; it is a pity they are not, for they would be the better for it. They exist in all classes of society and in all communities, and their mark everywhere is the dread of freedom. These authoritarian governments, Germany, Italy and Japan, exist only because of yes-men and nodders. When a leader emerges he is acclaimed by them, and he drives the country to ruin to their resounding cheers. No opposition is possible in the dictator-ridden countries, it is true, but the evolution of tyranny in Germany and Italy has been possible only because of those who were ready to surrender to usurpation. Once these dictators are installed, they cannot be unseated without a general upset accompanied by force and revolution. In Canada, fortunately, we can speak our mind. There are grave dangers ahead, and reasonable criticism is necessary.

I spoke in this house on March 14, 1927, at page 1168 of Hansard as to the functions and duties of a private member. Those functions and duties are still more important in war time than in peace time. At that time, speaking as a private member of the house, I said, although a strong Conservative:

Unplaced, unpensioned, no man's heir or slave. I neither look for nor care for honour or the patronizing approval of any party. . . . There is only one consolation for a public man, and that is the approval of his own conscience, a sense of duty done. . . . I will not knowingly and conscientiously offend any man either by word or deed, but I will stand by the principles of public rights as I see them, which I have supported for twenty-five years in the province of Ontario. But if I am placed in the position of having to defend these principles and must speak, I will speak what I at heart believe to be the truth, moderately, kindly, temperately, but yet plainly, and will call a spade a spade. . . . But while I wear the party uniform,

I will never wear its plush. I will take my position among the rank and file, however humble it may be, but it will be as a volunteer and not as a "flunkey".

With reference to the situation at Hong Kong, the people of this country do not want any more talk. They want to know the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. The story of Hong Kong goes back twenty-one years to the ill-fated Washington conference of 1921. It starts when Britain, urged by Canada, decided that Hong Kong no longer should be a first class base but should become a second class base.

This plebiscite or referendum has all of us at sea, and it is not going to be any help in obtaining recruits. I believe the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has worked hard; I think his heart has been in his work. I do not wish to criticize him or anybody else; but if we had had proper recruiting methods we would have had a million men under the voluntary system. We did not follow the proper method. Our young people had the right spirit; they were bent on giving service, but they were discouraged. They went to the recruiting stations; they had the real spirit of service, but they were not properly dealt with. All the respite after Munich, and even after war began, went for nothing. The patriotic fervour of our people was not properly directed. The old phrase, "Strike while the iron is hot," was forgotten; and as a result, a little later on we had the most direct methods of conscription and insult used on our young people in these thirty days' and four months' training camps. The vaulting ambition of youth was dampened; the government did not take the initiative, and as a result voluntary recruiting fell down. The navy and air force, however, have had no difficulty in securing recruits.

As I said in this house on November 7 of last year, as reported at page 4175 of Hansard:

In the first year of the war the mechanized hordes conquered Norway, Czechoslovakia, the low countries, Belgium, Holland and, last but not least, France. In the second year of the war they swept over Jugoslavia and Greece, and the mechanization still goes on. What is the position in Canada? We are now in the third year of the war and the government can give us no definite war programme for the next twelve months. As I said when this war began, the big question was man-power. I was told it was not, but it was food and munitions. Has there been any war in the history of mankind in which man-power has not played a major part? I say there has not; and if the government of the day had taken the right stand at the start, voluntary recruiting would not have reached the state in which it is to-day. We should have had a million men. During the first months of the war the country was willing to give the ministers time to become war-minded instead of believing in pacifism and disarmament; but two years of armed warfare should be sufficient to bring about that changed mentality. We should be taking active steps to see that in this third year of the war ours should be a total war effort from coast to coast. Now we find the government without any concerted, coordinated war planning for the coming year, to deal with the demands of the military services and the other demands in connection with production, shipbuilding, agriculture and so on. Home defence will never win any war; there is no possibility of that. We should take stock of our military position. The people want to know the facts, but they cannot get them. As I said in 1937, are we to wait until the enemy comes up the St. Lawrence by air, land and sea, and bombs the citadel and this very building? All the protection we have is provided by Great Britain, and the United States would be attacked also but for the British navy. The small nations of Europe have been enslaved by this mechanized army; they have endured the spies, the sergeant-majors, the concentration camps, the loud speaker, the tramping of feet, the gestapo, the whips, the spirit of barbarism, brutality and savagery; and but for Britain we on this continent would be compelled to suffer the same experiences. Yet we do not pay her tribute.

What are we going to do about it? Sooner or later there must be another Peninsular war on the continent, and what is Canada doing to prepare for it in man-power to aid the mother country? New Zealand and Australia were represented in Africa, Greece, Syria and other countries. Canada was not. Now we have been told by one of the ministers, within the last day or two, that no Canadian troops can be moved out of England without the authority of this government. That is just what I said in this house last June, that not a man could be sent from England without the permission of the government of this country. That is a fine state of affairs. That is not a total war effort, or coordination with Britain; that is not showing cooperation with the other parts of this empire. The time has now come when there should be a change. I think we need something more than words, something more than the essays and all that sort of thing we have been getting. The people should know the extent of our war effort and exactly what our position is.

I have been told by some of the ministers in the last few days that no Canadian troops have been moved out of England without the authority of the government. I said that last June, that no man could be sent from Great Britain without permission of the government of this country. It is a fine state of affairs when, in a total war effort there is no guarantee to Britain that there will be full cooperation of other parts of the empire. The time has now come for a change, and the people should know the facts.

I may say that we are living in a world to-day where force is the only argument. Then, how is civilization going to be preserved without an army? The Prime Minister, speaking in Quebec city a few days before the 1935 election, said that Canada is never going to be carried into another war without a plebiscite. Yet in 1939 he carried this country into war without a plebiscite. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin) said the same thing in 1935, namely, that never again would Canada send troops overseas. But Canada has sent troops overseas, and he is still a member of the government.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the people at the Pacific coast. But this plebiscite does not help them at all. This pompous measure may preserve the dignity of a few people in Ottawa, but in my opinion there is no authority for the plebiscite. It is a hollow mockery. There is no mandate for it. There is nothing in it with which to fight Hitler. It will be a plebiscite without any act, or any way to see the cause and effect of it.

The people are very much dissatisfied with the conduct of the war as it has been carried on so far. They wish to support the government, if they can. Then, with respect to a war cabinet may I point out that in my opinion, in not having a war cabinet the government has made a fatal mistake. One thing which we noticed before the outbreak of the war was the tremendous popularity of the monarchy, the decay of parliament and the decline of the House of Commons. I say there has been a decline, because our functions have been taken away from us by outside boards and bureaucrats. His Majesty the King is beloved the empire over, and we admire the courage and cheerfulness of the king and queen. We must remember that our king is the King of Canada. There should be a war cabinet, with some one beside him, as was the situation in the great war to represent Canada before him.

I believe the Prime Minister would have been well advised to have a war cabinet. That is an absolute necessity. New Zealand and Australia want a war cabinet. In the great crisis of the last war the war cabinet proved to be a great success, and I believe that Canadian sentiment is behind it. I hope it may yet develop. It created comradeship among empire troops, and that is something which should be extended. I repeat that I believe the people of Canada are behind it.

I say this because to-day London is the centre of Christendom. We have the battle of London, the battle of the Pacific and the battle of the Atlantic and I believe that such a war cabinet is necessary. I believe all such questions should be dealt with at an imperial conference. I gave reasons for this on May 7, 1941, as follows:

1. Empire shipping and trade policy.

2. Eire bases and the battle of the Atlantic, and increased protection on this ocean for Canadian trade.

[Mr. Church.]

3. The creation of a long-distance defence and foreign policy.

4. Trade, defence, migration and refugees.

5. The lease-lend bill and its application to Britain and empire policy.

6. The Pacific question; also re the leasing of bases in Newfoundland, the West Indies and Canada's foreign policy therein. She will find herself bound by it.

7. The financial adjustment of cost—

And all that kind of thing, and—

8. The giving away of parts of our empire and Atlantic ports and bases from Newfoundland to British Guiana, in exchange for 52 obsolete warships.

I believe all these questions should be dealt with at an imperial conference.

At the present time the government has violated nearly all its pledges. It violated tariff pledges for ten or fifteen years, and in addition to that it has violated many other pledges I need not mention.

There is one pledge which has to do with bureaucracies. I see the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) in his seat. He has established what is known as a transit commission, headed by a transit commissioner. What is that official going to do? I say to the minister, "Hands off Toronto's public utilities." They are operating at cost, and doing something in the war. I repeat, "Hands off those utilities." Then, he has a transit commissioner from Quebec city.

I find this article in a newspaper (Toronto Telegram, February 3rd):

> Public transportation is approaching critical conditions in every city on this continent. . . . The T.T.C. has even been asked by the federal transit controller as to whether any cars could be spared for other cities in Canada, where the situation is very bad. He has the authority to arbitrarily take them, if absolutely necessary, and some buses intended for us already have been diverted to war plants.
> We wish, of course, that we had been able to obtain the 60 new street cars ordered in 1940 for use this winter. The old Toronto Railway cars that are being used are not efficient or comfortable. We know it, but the authorities at Ottawa would not even consider granting permission to buy new street cars as long as any old cars could be used at all.
> Nobody knows what the effect of gasoline rationing on April 1, and the tire restrictions, will have on public transportation.

And so on. Those are the words of Mr. Patten, General Manager of the Toronto Transportation Commission.

All of these bureaucratic boards have been established. And so the House of Commons is only the forgotten appendage of government; there is no more security.

I have some other matters in mind, but I shall take an opportunity to refer to them later on. With particular reference to the Pacific question, however, I believe the danger is not far from Canada. The Japanese have submarines which can cross the Pacific ocean, and I believe the day is not far distant when we may be in actual danger.

I am not opposed to the policy of building a road to Alaska. The United States should build that road, if it is to go through to Alaska. In addition to that the government should use lease-lend funds, because it is a matter of home defence. After all is said and done, there is no such thing as home defence. If the British fleet goes down, and if the Royal Air Force fails, the enemy will be on our shores very soon.

I must commend the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Hoblitzell) who is my representative in the House of Commons. I commend him particularly for his refusal to support the policy of "follow your leader," and the principle of making a member of parliament just a "me-too" for anything the government may propose.

On a later occasion I hope to have an opportunity of dealing with the Pacific question in detail, and I want to deal in further detail with all the boards which have been established under the auspices of the government.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the principle of government solidarity is fairly well understood in the country. The people generally know that when the speech from the throne states government policy, that is the policy of the whole government and has the concurrence of every member of the government. This fact, however, does not prevent questions being asked as to whether this concurrence is reluctant or formal, on the part of certain members of the government, or wholehearted and sincere. My main purpose in speaking in this debate is to make it clear beyond doubt to my friends in my own province, and members of the business community, with which the Department of Finance brings me constantly in close contact and to everyone else who is interested in the matter, that my concurrence in the plebiscite policy is based on conviction, and is given without any doubt or reservation whatsoever.

I would not take part in the debate unless I felt it to be my duty to make this fact perfectly clear. I have been surprised by the confusion of thought which exists in the country on this matter, and I have been amazed by the extent to which thought has been submerged by emotion. Even after allowance is made for the extravagance of language, which is attributable perhaps to by-elections, I can hardly believe that such words as have been used and are being used should be used about a policy which appears to me to be natural, honourable and desirable.

Words such as cowardly, dastardly, contemptible, shameful, humiliating, crowning indignity, and so forth, have been used. I must say that the members of this house have shown a sense of their responsibility in regard to the use of language far greater than that which has been exhibited outside. They know, I think, as a result of their association with their fellow members from all parts of Canada, that violent language is inappropriate to this situation. But some of the members and certain spite-infused and hate-inspired enemies of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) have simply let themselves go. They have let themselves go in a way that will make them ashamed of themselves in future months and years.

On the other hand I am convinced that however the step that this government is taking now may appear to these individuals at the moment, it will be looked back upon after a lapse of months and years as the right thing to have done and the best thing to have done in all the circumstances. At times such as these ministers and members should express themselves with simplicity and sincerity. Every syllable they utter should be the truth as they see it, nothing more and nothing less. If they do this, if they pour out their true selves, so to speak, they cannot dissociate themselves from certain fundamental factors such as their heritage and their environment.

My own background is that of the country districts of Nova Scotia. I represent people whose ancestors for the most part left the British isles centuries ago, people whose loyalty to the British empire, whose belief in the British empire and its institutions, are deep-seated, and for that matter taken for granted. They call it the British empire, not the British commonwealth of nations. They do not think too much about home defence. Through the centuries their sons have fought in distant parts of the world and they know that the defence of the British isles is their defence. The distinction between serving in Canada and serving overseas is a distinction which for them has no meaning whatever. They would consider it their duty to defend what they call the British empire, and what I call the British empire, in any part of the world in which the continued existence of the empire was in peril. Their young men are serving in great numbers, proportionately to the population, in the army, in the navy and in the air. These brave young men, the finest and best of Nova Scotians, are being killed. To-day one is missing in Libya, to-morrow another is shot down over the North sea or in France. Casualties bring still more enlistments. The whole population is determined that the war shall be won and be won as speedily as possible. In the minds of some there may be something old-fashioned about this environment, about this attitude, but can anyone deny the inspired soundness and nobility of it?

These are the people whom I have had the honour—and I mean the honour—of representing in this house since 1926, and whose view-point, which is my own view-point, I reflect in the cabinet. I want to make this perfectly clear so that my remarks upon the plebiscite may be more thoroughly and completely understood. These people believe and I believe that this government, without too much regard for remotely distant consequences, should adopt the most efficient and effective methods now of carrying on the war. I believe that the programme which we plan should for the immediate future, the coming year, be a programme which will strain the human and material resources of this country to the limit. I have, therefore, agreed as Minister of Finance to a war programme for the coming fiscal year which in my opinion, and in the opinion of my advisers, is the extreme limit of what this country can do, having in mind its human and material resources. I am in favour of pursuing a policy which will make for the fullest possible measure of success for that programme.

One issue between the government and its more sincere opponents seems to me to be this: Will the continuation of the voluntary system for overseas service, at least for the time being—we have the compulsory system in many other lines of the war activity—make for a greater success in our programme than would its abandonment? I wish to say that neither as a member of the government nor as a member of the war committee of the cabinet, nor otherwise, have I been able to find any evidence that the abandonment of the voluntary system and the substitution of the compulsory system in respect to that part of our war effort represented by overseas army service would help at this moment in our war effort.

Surely no one can deny that the voluntary system to date has functioned magnificently. In what single respect has it fallen down? Any question as to the success of the voluntary system for overseas service is not as to its success at the moment but as to its success in the future. No one can tell what methods, what degree of compulsion may be required in the months and years to come, but this government, in my judgment, having in mind its commitments at the last election, would not be true to its trust if it allowed the situation to drift in directions not now possible to foresee without appealing now to the people, when we know that the appeal can be made without sacrifice of military advantage, to release the government from its commitments so that the government will be completely free to lead this nation wherever it is necessary for this nation to go and by whatever methods it is necessary to adopt to bring about the successful and earliest possible termination of the war.

Mr. HOMUTH: What if they do not release them?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall come to that. The other course is to leave the commitments outstanding, and then, if the necessity for more compulsion should arise, disregard the commitments, break our promise on the plea of necessity. If we do that, imagine the situation that would result. The other day I heard one of the members—I think he made a speech in this house—a member from one of the western provinces, say that during the last election he read the pledges of the government leader at seventy-one meetings which he held in his constituency. Bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that these pledges were made not only by the leaders of the government but by the opposition leaders with just as much definiteness. He said truthfully that those electors, many if not most of them of central European descent or central European birth, believe now in democracy and in democratic methods, but they would never believe in democracy again, would never believe in the government again, and would never believe in any public man again if those pledges were broken.

This is the time for the government to get a release from its pledges, not to break its pledges. This all seems so elementary to me, it seems so clear to me that when I hear hysterical screams against the plebiscite in parts of the province in which I am now speaking, from some of the people of the province in which I am now speaking, I wonder whether I can believe my ears.

I should like to deal with a few of the arguments which are advanced against the plebiscite. In the first place it is said that it is a cowardly negation of responsible government. This charge is repeated loosely by many critics. But surely there is nothing in this charge. Surely the essence of responsible government involves not only a government responsible to parliament, but a parliament responsible to the people; not a government which breaks its solemn pledges to the people who elected it, but a government which, if elected on a particular pledge, seeks the consent of the people to free it from that pledge, if changing conditions seem so to require. Surely, also, the cowardly government or parliament is one, rather, which fears to ascertain the views of the people.

Then it is said that a plebiscite involves a dangerous delay. The argument is specious but fallacious. As I have said before, there is no evidence whatever that within the next three months the voluntary system, in so far as overseas service is concerned, will not function with complete efficiency, in my opinion with more efficiency than a compulsory system in its early stages, with its endless exemptions, its tribunals, its appeals and its delays, would function.

Then it is said that a plebiscite will make Canada a laughing stock in the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia and elsewhere. Perhaps it is not necessary to say much about this argument.

As to the United States I am willing to let the New York Times, which is a representative and a great organ of public opinion in the United States, speak. In its editorial of January 26 it says:

> On this matter it would be impertinent for outsiders to give an opinion. But when the opponents of the plebiscite utter their fear that, unexplained, the plebiscite will throw doubt upon Canada's exertion of her full power in this war, her friends—and we are all her friends—must protest. In this very speech from the throne she plans an even wider, a total effort with her armed forces, munitions, supplies. The patriotism of Canadians has been demonstrated by their efforts in this war.

As to British opinion, I am willing to let the London Telegraph and Morning Post speak. What did it say? It said this:

> When the time comes for an historian's sober estimate of realities of the British empire's participation in this war, the performance of Canada will bulk large in the picture. The addition to that record announced by Mr. Mackenzie King is one of the finest things in the history of inter-imperial relationships. His government propose to make a free gift to this country of food and munitions to the value of some £225,000,000, and to place at our disposal an immense sum free of interest for the duration of the war.
> On any showing it is an astonishing demonstration to all the world of solidarity within the British commonwealth of nations. It is but the latest, of course, of a multitude of such proofs. Canada threw herself into the battle against the forces of evil of her own unanimous will. Her whole national economy has been transformed in arming herself to fight beside us by land, sea, and air, and in organizing from the outset her enormous additions to our own war effort. To-day some forty per cent of her national income is devoted to war purposes. Both her forces and output of her war industries have been and are being steadily expanded. Wherever we may look in appraising the value of the service done to the cause of freedom by the allied peoples, we shall find nothing more splendid than the record of Canada.

Let those who think of the effect on Australia remember that Australia did not have conscription for overseas service during the last war; that on two occasions during that war a referendum was held on this issue, and both times it failed to secure the majority vote; and that conscription for service outside the commonwealth is not in effect in Australia to this day.

I hope I shall not cause offence if before I leave this argument I take occasion to point out that the greatest source of misunderstanding in other countries in regard to Canada's war effort arises from the unrestrained criticism in certain quarters in Canada of nearly everything the government has done or is doing. Our own efforts to tell the world what Canada is doing may fall short of perfection, but to read much of the comment in the Canadian press and in this parliament would lead the uninformed to believe that Canada's war effort amounts to nothing at all. It is time that we ceased smearing Canada. Canada's war effort—and it is the country's effort, not the government's—is one of which every Canadian can be proud. That is the verdict of foreign observers who have studied what we are doing. I do not suggest for a moment that there should not be criticism, and strong criticism, of our failures and our shortcomings. Constructive criticism is indispensable. But if Canadians are helped to see in true perspective the real accomplishments of our war programme, they will have a well founded pride and an improved morale which will spur us all to yet greater efforts.

Then, to some members of the house, the objection to the plebiscite is that the plebiscite is likely to receive a majority vote and consequently the government will thereby be relieved from its pledge not to introduce conscription for overseas service, and they are so strongly opposed to conscription for overseas service that they even oppose the release of the government from its past pledges. Their position is that never, never under any condition, should the government compel Canadians to serve abroad. They do not deny that service in Canada is a fit field for compulsion. The underlying assumption seems to be that service here in Canada is more vital, more effective, more important, more necessary to the defence of Canada than service abroad. Now these hon. members are, I am convinced, mistaken. In spite of what has happened to Norway, Belgium, Holland, France, Jugoslavia, Greece and so forth, in spite of Pearl Harbour, they fail to see that in a world where international gangsters with enormous military striking power are running amuck, no country is safe which withdraws behind and seeks to defend itself behind its own borders. They fail to see that the war we now fight is not a war for imperialistic aggrandizement but a death struggle between two types of civilization. They fail to see that for us it is a war of survival, survival of our integrity as a state, of our free institutions, of our democratic way of life. They fail to see that Canada's destiny as a free or a slave state may be decided not on her own soil, but in far distant parts of the world, and that the magnitude of Canada's contribution to the struggle may readily tip the scales.

However mistaken their point of view may seem to us, it is one which we must recognize. It is one which is held by minority groups in several sections of this country. It is strongly held, charged with emotion. It is one which has its roots deep in the past. It is, at least in part, due to incredible blunders made by ourselves during the last war. Surely we should not repeat these blunders by attempting to ride roughshod over opinions which differ from ours, by breaking pledges, and using the powers we undoubtedly have to force a measure through this house, with no attempt first made to assure that there is for it the maximum amount of understanding, and therefore of sympathy and consent, throughout the country. Surely we should not jeopardize the gains we have made since the last war and sacrifice the substantial measure of national unity which has been achieved in this war by adopting the arbitrary, unrestrained and provocative methods which the vehement advocates of conscription now would have us use. Certainly those of us who believe in a total Canadian effort for total war should avoid such methods as they would the plague.

Then there is the attitude of another class of opponents, those represented by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) who interrupted me a few minutes ago, who base their objection on the fear that the plebiscite may be defeated. This is the argument of those who are all-out for conscription whatever the consequences, whether it wrecks national unity, whether it helps or hurts the war effort. This is the argument of those who do not trust the people, the argument of those who would have parliament put through conscription without consulting the people, whether the people approve or not. Their position seems to me to be wholly untenable.

Conscription is only a method. The efficiency of any method is to be measured by how it works. I am free to confess that in my opinion, if it were strongly opposed by a majority of the Canadian people, it would be a far less efficient and effective method of providing reinforcements for our troops overseas than the continuation of the voluntary method. Its adoption under such circumstances would, I believe, impede and retard the war effort, not to mention any other disastrous consequences which it would have to the fabric and unity of the state. But I for one wish to express emphatically my belief that the plebiscite will result in an overwhelming majority of the Canadian people voting to release the government from any past pledges which might now prohibit it from using its discretion to fight this war by any method that seems necessary to win it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then what?

Mr. ILSLEY: I need not say that I personally will do my utmost to bring about that result.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then what?

Mr. ILSLEY: We shall be free to act and we will act in the best interests of the country and of the war effort.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Free to do nothing.

Mr. ILSLEY: The first outcry was that this was a plebiscite on conscription; the second outcry now is that it is not a plebiscite on conscription. There is, in my opinion, only one possible danger which need cause fear about the result, and of this I speak with some trepidation. That danger is the possibility that some of the advocates of conscription may go so far in their use of unrestrained, abusive and provocative language, may so let their emotions run away with their intelligence, as to provoke an equally violent emotional resistance on the part of those who do not now believe in or may not yet have made up their minds about selective military service.

Then it is said that the plebiscite is a costly process. Estimates running all the way from a million and a quarter to five million dollars have been made, some of them gross overestimates. This argument, Toronto Saturday Night said, is put forward by people who raise no objection to the continued expenditure by Canadians of vastly greater sums every week upon light entertainment, imported luxury foods, sport, travel and other non-military objectives. They translate the cost of the plebiscite into terms of the bombers and corvettes it would buy, as if the limitation of our supply of these military articles were the amount of money we can spend, whereas it is really the plant capacity and skilled labour available for their production, none of which would be diverted by taking a plebiscite. Despite this rebuttal of the argument, I as Minister of Finance am interested in saving every dollar that can possibly be saved. If the cost of the plebiscite could be saved; if, in other words, taking the plebiscite represented wasted effort, I would be the first to want that money saved and that waste eliminated. But I cannot believe that it represents waste or needless expenditure of public funds. If so, it might be said that the prolonged debates in this parliament represent waste. That is the charge that Hitler makes, that all costly and time-consuming processes of parliamentary government represent needless waste and inefficiency—that a dictatorship is cheaper and more efficient.

I do not think I need labour this point. We who believe in democracy are willing to pay the price of democracy. We believe that the values received are worth the price we have to pay. If as a result of the plebiscite we can bring home to all our people what this war really means; if we can spread a better realization of the fact that Canada is being defended and must be defended not just on its own shores but in England, on the sands of Libya, on the Russian steppes and in the far-off islands of the south western Pacific; if we can help to dissipate any lingering remnant there may be of the doctrine of isolationism, then probably no price will be too high to pay. If we can accomplish these results, as I believe we can; if those who believe in total war and in the principles of a comprehensive selective service, seek loyally and fervently, and without ulterior motives, to achieve their aims by democratic rather than by fascist methods, then I verily believe that the result of the demonstration of a united national will be of immense value to the country's war effort, a striking contribution to the cause for which we fight.

Then there is the threat of a strike against the victory loan. It is in connection with this controversy over the alleged costliness of the plebiscite that a development has arisen which has shocked me immeasurably. I refer to the letters addressed to myself by several persons, published in certain newspapers, threatening to cancel their regular purchases of war savings certificates and to boycott the new victory loan, in order apparently to scare the government into abandoning the proposed plebiscite or to punish the government for deciding to take it. I cannot believe that the writers of these letters can have given a moment's consideration to the significance of their irresponsible action; and to the credit of the press, some newspapers which believe strongly in immediate conscription for overseas service have written editorials of protest against this type of opposition.

If the individuals concerned will stop to think, they will realize that their threatened action means nothing less than a strike against the state, a strike against our men in the armed forces, a direct sabotaging of the country's war effort. It is fascism, the attempted use of force to bring about a change in government policy. No doubt these individuals feel strongly as to the soundness of their own opinions, but unless I am greatly mistaken they would be the first to condemn a labour group which threatened to strike in a vital war industry. Their own position is even less defensible.

Surely there is no justification for fascist methods in this country. Surely we still believe in the democratic process. Let such individuals express their opinions as strongly as they will. Let them attempt to convert their fellow-citizens, their members of parliament. Let them seek by any democratic means to overturn the government if they disagree with its policies and decisions. But no Canadian should strike against the state.

No Canadian should boycott a vital part of the war effort. In our war financing activities we have received the unstinted support and cooperation of men and newspapers of all parties and all shades of opinion. I have repeatedly expressed my warm appreciation of that cooperation, and I now do so again. I am confident that however much we may disagree on methods and policies in other fields we can continue to work in complete harmony in the enormously important task of raising the vast sums of money required to pay our soldiers, sailors and airmen and their dependents and to provide them with the best equipment which we can buy or produce.

In conclusion let me appeal to all Canadians for moderation, restraint and reasonableness. In some cases I know my appeal will fall on deaf ears, for example in the case of the premier of Ontario. He would laugh at me, he would laugh at my appeal. But this is not true of most Canadians. Unity is still possible in Canada if we take ourselves in hand. The other day when the Prime Minister was speaking, appealing for unity, I understand that an hon. member interjected, "What unity?" Well, let no one scoff at unity or despair of unity. We can maintain unity by the course we are taking. But we would shatter it into a thousand bits if we followed the course advocated by any single faction of extremists in the camps—not the camp—against us. The objective of all of us is a total war effort in the interest of the earliest possible termination of the war. Surely no one doubts that this is the objective of the government. Surely these wild men who accuse us of having some sordid motives, of thinking of our political futures, do not believe what they are saying. I have no sons, but look at almost any danger area in the world, at almost any theatre of war, and you will find there a son or sons of some minister of this government.

Well, if we have no ulterior motives, and if our opponents have none, surely there is no unscalable barrier to agreement on methods to unity and understanding.

I close with Mr. Churchill's words on unity, which he uttered in the British House of Commons last Tuesday. He said:

> We should not allow ourselves to be rattled when this or that other place has been captured, because once the ultimate power of the United States is brought into play it will move forward remorselessly, provided we fight with the greatest vigour and tenacity and provided we, above all, remain united.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I am sure that every hon. member listened with a great deal of interest to the statement just made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). Coming from Nova Scotia also, from another section of it, and perhaps representing a totally different environment, I am going to endeavour to express my opinion on the matter now under debate.

Before I proceed to discuss the plebiscite I should like to refer briefly to a statement or statements made last evening by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser). At the time he made the statements I endeavoured to correct them and was ruled out of order, and if this debate closes there will not be another opportunity of setting the record straight on that matter.

It is not my intention, and as a rule this group does not waste the time of the house in placing our political views before the house; we endeavour to stick to the issues and to be as brief and explicit as possible. However, when statements are made obviously for political effect, directed at this group, and those statements are not correct we must of necessity answer them.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It was in answer to a political speech made by a member of that group.

Mr. GILLIS: The matter to which I wish to refer is the statement made by the hon. member as reported on page 276 of Hansard of February 3 when he said:

> An hon. member to my left said to-day that anyone who is employing a person for work he could do himself should fire that person.

I take it from that observation that the hon. member meant that domestic help should be discharged. He continued:

> I believe that is practically what was said to my left this afternoon, and that is the meaning the people throughout the country will take.

That is that domestic help should go. I do not believe in that principle. At the time that statement was made I endeavoured to correct it as it was not the statement made by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) to whom the hon. member for Peterborough West was referring. What the hon. member for Melfort did say, as reported by Hansard, is this as reported on page 268 of yesterday's Hansard:

> I believe we should measure our taxation in this way: that we should take in taxes in this country all income which enables any person to employ, either directly or indirectly, the services of any man or woman to do for him something which he is physically able to do for himself.

The hon. member for Melfort was dealing directly with the question of taxation. The hon. member for Peterborough West was dealing with the dismissal of domestic help and made a very broad and sweeping statement which could very easily have been misunderstood. We realize perfectly why he was making that statement.

I should like to draw attention to another statement which is not in accordance with the facts. The hon. member for Peterborough West said, as reported on page 281, that "these widows should be praised for buying war bonds and certificates, instead of being ridiculed." He went on to talk about widows and coupon clippers. What I am concerned about is this statement:

> . . . though the other day for an hour and a half there was not one Cooperative Commonwealth Federation member in the house. These people will wonder why the government has asked them to buy war bonds and certificates when a member of this house says they are saboteurs.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The hon. member who is speaking said "saboteurs".

Mr. GILLIS: Correct. I am going to explain it. The hon. member for Yorkton made an observation with respect to coupon clippers, bond holders, those who conducted a sit-down strike to remove the five per cent limitation on profits, and so forth, and I interjected in that connection "saboteurs". I consider the people who at such a time put a gun to the head of the government when the British empire with its back to the wall was being driven towards Dunkirk, and who demanded their pound of flesh and retarded necessary production in this country to supply Britain with the machinery necessary to defend herself, were saboteurs. I said that then and I say that now.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The hon. member said "any coupon clipper" and you said "saboteurs".

Mr. GILLIS: Exactly. As to members of this group not being in their seats for an hour and a half on a certain day, there is no foundation for that statement. The hon. member cannot name a day when at least some of the members of this group were not in the house. No party in this house attends the sessions more religiously than the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and social credit groups. For two days this week, while the delegation from the west was in Ottawa, the five members of this group from Saskatchewan were meeting with that delegation, endeavouring to assist them in ironing out their problems. But at no time while this house has been sitting have we all been out of the chamber; at least either the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) or I were here listening and paying attention to what was going on.

Then the hon. member referred to an indemnity of $30 a day, a statement which was also misleading and which might be misunderstood.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I said $30 for a day and a half.

Mr. GILLIS: That statement might very easily be misunderstood. The hon. member may have understood what he meant, but no one else would understand it from reading Hansard. The indemnity may mean just that to the hon. member who made that statement, but certainly it does not mean that to the members of this group. We work for the people we represent three hundred and sixty-five days a year, and if you divide the indemnity by that figure you will see what it means to us. In addition at least fifty per cent of our indemnity goes into the work we do for our people, maintaining offices, endeavouring to assist them iron out their problems and helping them understand some of the legislation that goes through this house. And of course taxes eat into it as well.

With respect to the question before the house, almost every hon. member who has spoken, particularly from this side, has made the statement that the people are going to be badly confused, and that the taking of the plebiscite will delay the war. I guess a great many of the people engaged in the fighting would not mind if that were true, though I cannot see it in that way. I can readily understand why there should be so much confusion throughout the country. I have sat in my place listening to the speeches since the opening of this debate, and practically every hon. member who has taken part in it has added to that confusion. Each speaker has had a different conception of what the proposal means. No one seems to have any clear idea as to just on what the plebiscite is to be taken, and I am in that position myself.

So far as that goes, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the principle of consulting the people on any matter as serious as requisitioning the lives of our people. I believe the people are the most important element in any order of society, and I see governments merely as administrative bodies, carrying out the wishes of the people. So far as I am concerned, therefore, I have no quarrel with the government in the taking of this plebiscite. For the past twenty years I have attended labour conventions; and at most of these meetings the stand of organized labour has been that before Canada engaged in a war, the opinion of the people should be taken. So, in regard to the plebiscite itself, I believe it is the proper thing to do. The question, however, of just on what the plebiscite is to be taken is another matter. I have read the Prime Minister's speech; I have searched through it very carefully to see if I could get some indication of just what the people would be asked to vote upon at that time. So far as I was concerned I could not get any clear conception of just what is to be the issue. He would say something in the first paragraph; he would change it in the second; he would say almost the same thing in the third, and by the time you had gone completely through the speech you were left in doubt as to just what it all meant.

As I see it, there are three specific matters before the house. First there is the government's proposal, which is vague and uncertain and which must be clarified before this debate closes. Then there is the Conservative amendment, and finally the amendment to the amendment moved by this group.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would not the hon. member give us his opinion on the plebiscite? Is he for it or against it?

Mr. GILLIS: I have already done that. I said I was perfectly satisfied with the principle of the plebiscite; that I believed any issue as important as requisitioning the lives of our people should be voted upon by the people who are to be dealt with in this way. I believe the principle of the plebiscite is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And if the people say "no" the hon. member is quite willing to have the country overrun by Hitler?

Mr. GILLIS: May I say a little on that point as I go along? At the moment I am trying to waste no time and to deal specifically with the matter before the house. I would have no hesitation in voting for anything introduced by hon. members at that end of the chamber if I thought it was right. I believe the only failure a man has to fear in life is the failure to stand up for the things he believes are right, and as long as I am in this house that is what I shall do.

The part of the Conservative amendment to which I refer particularly reads:

(a) completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war;

(b) supply the imperative needs of agriculture, industry, and the fighting forces of the nation. . . .

We all agree with the last paragraph; what I am concerned about are the words:

. . . completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation. . . .

I have a great deal of respect for many of the hon. members to my right, and I have no quarrel with the leader of the opposition who sits in the house. Since coming here I have found him to be fair. He places his views before the house very capably; when necessary, he stands up and defends himself, and he is courteous to everyone to whom he speaks. He has a right to his opinions; but, in the light of the statements made by the new leader of the Conservative party, I am very much concerned as to exactly where he stands on this question of mobilizing the wealth and resources of the country. As a worker, I see the wealth and resources of this country mobilized now for certain purposes by certain people; yes, completely mobilized to be used for their own ends. So that this aspect of mobilization must be very considerably clarified, as far as I am concerned, before I would be prepared to support this amendment.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am also concerned about men who make pledges, as to whether or not they are prepared to stand behind those pledges once they are made. The only guide we have in this connection is to make an analysis of the background, integrity and stability of the persons making these promises. The leader of the Conservative party does not now sit in the house; he is endeavouring to obtain a seat. If we accept at face value the amendment before the house from the Conservative party, then we must make an examination as to who leads that party now, and as to whether he is prepared to stand behind the mobilization of the wealth and resources of the country in order that we may prosecute the war as we think it should be prosecuted. I find that in the past with respect to questions of this kind he has been more or less of a contortionist.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mostly more.

Mr. GILLIS: He has made statements with regard to these matters, and those statements appear in public documents and in the press. For example, the latest one came over the radio at ten o'clock this morning. It is contained in a Canadian Press dispatch of February 4, and is in these words:

Toronto, February 4. Acceptance for himself and the Conservative party of the principle of "conscription of men, if conscription of wealth and industry is imposed on an equal basis" was announced at a meeting here last night by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, the Canadian Conservative leader, and candidate in the York South federal by-election on February 9. Mr. Meighen said:

"Mr. M. J. Coldwell, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation leader in the House of Commons has said his party will accept conscription of men if conscription of wealth and industry is imposed on an equal basis. I accept his offer. I speak for myself and the Conservative party."

Mr. NICHOLSON: Oh, oh, oh.

Mr. GILLIS: It continues:

The Conservative leader said he always had favoured the type of conscription of wealth now advocated by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation—

Mr. NICHOLON: What do you know about that!

Mr. GILLIS:

—and would accept any measure of conscription that could assist in winning the war.

"I have been quoted as saying I only favoured conscription of wealth as the last gasp," he said. ". . . I never made any such statement. What I did say was that wealth must be conscripted just as thoroughly as man-power just so long as it is necessary to win this war. I said we are taking it nearly all now but if it all goes, that is the last gasp."

Mr. BRADETTE: The road to Damascus.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not sure whether we are going to accept this latest recruit into our party, but I would say that that is not only the last gasp, but it is a death-bed repentance.

Let us see what he had to say a week ago on the same question. I am sceptical of people who can change their minds so quickly. It is an indication that there is not any mind to change. Just a week ago, on January 30, according to the Toronto Daily Star—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, well,—

Mr. GILLIS: —he stated this, on the same question:

Conscription of wealth, Mr. Meighen declared, would "shackle the enterprise and efficiency of our industry." To get the most out of men you have to give them an incentive, he argued. He called conscription of wealth "a foolish suicidal thing" until absolutely necessary to finance the war.

Mr. MacINNIS: Or win an election.

Mr. GILLIS: It continues, under the heading, "Urged in last war":

"In the last war men who are now the government in this war called on us to enact conscription of wealth. 'Why don't you conscript wealth?' they asked. Now they're in office and they haven't done so. Why? Because they realize now it wouldn't work and they are right," Mr. Meighen declared.

Just a week ago that was his opinion on the conscription of wealth. It was suicidal, he said. But a week later he is prepared to commit suicide. I said a moment ago that I am always concerned about people who change their minds so fast. It sounds to me very much like Mr. Hitler's non-aggression pacts—"Lull you to sleep until I get the appropriate opportunity to take a shot at you."

One reference, which goes away back to 1926, might be worth while mentioning at this time. This was a speech made at Quebec on December 1, 1926, and that part having to do with the subject matter now in hand was as follows:

"I declare that so long as I shall be in power in this country no troops—" Mr. Meighen halted for a moment to recall the French phrase. Then he went on— "no troops will be sent out of the country without the people being consulted." There was an outburst of applause at the words. Mr. Meighen went on, that at the outbreak of the last war, no party had been of this view. Both parties were unanimous in parliament that aid should be given without delay. But it was the opinion of the Conservative party that, in the future, the people should be consulted as well as parliament.

Now he is in opposition to the plebiscite. He says that the people should not be consulted when there is no stability, or continuity of thought. I am very sceptical.

Mr. JACKMAN: The house is on fire.

Mr. GILLIS: And these are the people who helped set it afire. In addition, there are the telegrams which were placed on record by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), and which appear at page 179 of Hansard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose the hon. member knows that those things were all threshed out in parliament and denied, and the whole story fell to the ground. If the hon. member will go back and consult the parliamentary debates, he will find that there is not a tittle of proof in them. He should consult the records of parliament, in connection with the Mackenzie resolution.

Mr. GILLIS: These press dispatches certainly are not wrong. They are recent statements, and are an indication of just how much dependence can be placed upon people who change their minds so rapidly. It looks to me as if the statements were made merely for political expediency. I make reference to them at this time only because of the seriousness of the war situation. I believe the men who to-day have the responsibility of directing the Canadian people, and prosecuting the war in the light of the international situation, should not have any doubt in their own minds as to where they stand, nor should there be any doubts in the minds of the Canadian people.

Mr. JACKMAN: There should be no doubt in Mr. Meighen's mind, and never was.

Mr. GILLIS: These press dispatches show exactly where Mr. Meighen stands.

A further matter to which I wish to make reference is the amendment offered by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I believe there is no necessity for me to read it. It is clear, concise and explicit. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation stands now and always has stood for the all-out prosecution of the war. We realized at the outbreak of the war that in order to defeat Hitler we had to defeat the forces in this country which make Hitlers, in addition to defeating the Hitler in Europe. We are prepared to go all the way.

There is strong sentiment throughout the country to-day. I get around the four eastern provinces quite a bit, and I can say that with the exception of the Toronto area one does not hear this urge for the conscription of man-power only. The sentiment in the country to-day among the working people, the common people, who in the final analysis will do the fighting—the arm-chair generals will not fight the war—have expressed their opinion about conscription. If and when the ballot is taken, I say that the Canadian people should have the right to speak on the question of the total conscription of finance, industry, wealth and man-power, on the same basis, at the same time and with the same degree of sacrifice as man-power is asked to make.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does the hon. member mean by the conscription of wealth?

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Meighen agrees with it.

Mr. JACKMAN: What do you mean by it?

Mr. GILLIS: Ask Mr. Meighen. I have thought a great deal about this plebiscite and its clarification. My own opinion is that there is no intention to conscript man-power. I think it will be found before this question is settled finally that someone will pull a rabbit out of the hat. Conscription of man-power and selective service are two entirely different things, as I undertand them, and they must not be confused. You can have one without the other. Perhaps the reason the government is so evasive and mysterious about it is that they have no intention of conscripting man-power.

I agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who says that there is no necessity at this time for the conscription of man-power. To conscript man-power without having the necessary equipment to fight and train with, without having all the materials necessary to put the men in the field, would be a waste of time and would bring about a continuation of what is happening now, a back-paddling on every front.

What is necessary is the mobilization of industry under proper direction. When this government is relieved of its pledge in connection with the conscription of man-power, instead of conscripting men for overseas service I believe what we will get—they are promising it, and the Conservative amendment promises it—will be selective service. That will give the government or those in authority the right to regiment further the working people of this country.

As I understand it, selective service gives the government full authority to decide where every man and every woman in this country shall work. That is proper and has considerable merit in the light of the present situation, but what we are concerned about is who is going to control it. How is it going to work? What representation will the working people of this country who are going to be mobilized and regimented have?

An hon. MEMBER: None.

Mr. GILLIS: None. We see the government's policy reflected in the setting up of war boards headed by captains of industry and the heads of our large financial organizations. There is no representative of the common people upon these boards which now control the economic resources of the country.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. MacNICOL: The heads of these companies—I am one myself—have worked up from the very bottom to the top. We were all common people but through our ability we got to the top.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: What about the new Minister of Labour?

Mr. GILLIS: I am sorry the hon. member brought that up. I did not want to refer to it, but I shall. I agree with the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) that quite a number of people have climbed to the top. But they are not sitting on these war boards, nor is the hon. member for Davenport. Hitler climbed from the bottom to the top, but what has he done? It is the use of power by the individual who reaches the top that is important.

I am afraid of this growing control of the management of the country by certain groups. Take H. R. MacMillan, for example. He owns and controls practically the whole lumber industry of Canada and yet he sits on a board that sets prices for his own industry. If you follow this thing through you will find that in 99 per cent of the cases these men are simply acting as super-sales-agents for their own organizations to see how much of the money being spent on the war can be directed back to their own organizations.

I have met the people and discussed this matter with them in their unions and have tried to arrive at some understanding as to what selective service means. I believe in the first analysis that what is in the minds of those who will conduct this plebiscite is the organizing of the industry of this country on the basis of selective service. The conscription of man-power is secondary to that. Those who will make the greatest contribution should have representation upon these boards which will be set up to regiment further the working people of this country. The working people should be represented in order that their interests may be safeguarded now and in the aftermath of the war.

The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman) has asked me what I think of the new Minister of Labour. I am not personally acquainted with him, but through thirty years' association with the labour movement I know of him. I know his record. What his activities will be in the house if he gets in—we are doing our best to stop him—is problematical and I cannot make any forecast. It has been heralded throughout the constituency in which he is running that he is a labour man. He represented labour in this house, but my recollection of the acting Minister of Labour—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Not acting; he is the minister.

Mr. GILLIS: The people will have a say in that. My recollection of the record of the temporary Minister of Labour is that he was elected first on a labour ticket, but with the assistance of the Liberals. According to my information, all the time he sat in this house he was very nice to our friends across the way. I understand that the last speech he made in this house was a tirade against the people with whom he sat. He went back to his constituency of Hamilton East and ran again on the independent Labour ticket. The Liberals did not contest the election; they gave him their official endorsation, but he was defeated. The people had got wise to him. He is said to be a trade unionist, but everyone who carries a trade union card is not a trade unionist, just as everyone who preaches the gospel of the Tory party is not a Tory, as is exemplified by their leader, who is now a socialist. That is all I have to say with respect to Mitchell. He has done quite well for himself—

Mr. BRADETTE: We know what labour thinks of him.

Mr. GILLIS:—but not very much for the people who sent him to the house in the first place and gave him a start.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GILLIS: We have this kind of person in the labour movement. In the final analysis we are all human beings. I may say a little more on this question for the benefit of the hon. member for Edmonton East. I am going to say a little about the administration of the department since the new minister took it over, with relation to Kirkland Lake.

We hear a great deal about planning of industry and the necessity for such planning. It is part of the programme of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. We believe that the industries of this country should be planned and directed in order to give their maximum production. I do not believe maximum production is being achieved at this time. I do not say that because I want to belittle what is being done. We of this group have stated many times that as far as we are concerned we recognize the difficulties of transferring Canada from a peace-time nation to a war-time machine. The Canadians are not a warlike people. They love peace. That was exemplified in our complete disarmament during the years when Hitler was preparing for his onslaught. We realize the difficulties; we know that ministers who have the direction of the war effort are pretty much in our own position; they are ordinary, average people with not very much knowledge of war or the war machine, or of industry or the planning of industry or its operation; and perhaps they are doing a better job than some of us expected they would. But there are times when we are concerned about the situation.

Take the question of aircraft production. It is admitted that on every front aircraft will be the decisive factor in the war. Yet there is a shortage of planes. We have lost two of our largest battleships in the Pacific because there was not sufficient air support when those boats were out in the narrow straits. So it is rather alarming when we find right here in Ottawa the state of things set out in the Ottawa Journal on January 17. It reads:

> Ottawa Car and Aircraft Limited has laid off almost 500 employees in the last six weeks, and many more will be let out soon. Redmond Quain, K.C., president of the company told The Journal Friday night. While large numbers will be laid off, this condition must not be assumed to be permanent, he said.
> Reason for the suspension, Mr. Quain said, was the complete lack of aircraft orders. Drastic reductions in personnel have been made and will continue to be made because at this particular time the company has no more aircraft orders to fill. . . .
> He pointed out that the situation at Ottawa Car and Aircraft Limited was not an isolated case, and that there are other large aircraft factories and companies in a similar position at this time.

Surely, in view of the seriousness of the war situation and the lack of adequate aeroplane support in every area where battles are taking place, a condition of that kind should be inquired into. Why are there no orders for aeroplanes? They want them in Britain; they need them in the United States; we want them here in Canada; they are required in every section of the globe where war is being waged to-day. Yet on January 17 a responsible official connected with aircraft production in Canada makes the statement that there are no orders for aeroplanes and he is laying off men. It is something which should be inquired into and rectified.

Mr. MacNICOL: It should be censured.

Mr. GILLIS: It should be. It appeared in the Ottawa Journal.

These are factors which enter into the question of the conscription of man-power. If you have a job and you are comfortable, and appeals are being made over the radio and in the press for you to enlist, put on a uniform, go to Malaya or some other section, and fight, what is the effect of statements such as the one I have read? I am asked to put on a uniform and shed my blood in some foreign country for the protection of Canada. At the same time statements are made that the machines necessary to protect me and enable me to fight that battle are not being produced in Canada, not because of lack of equipment, of factories, or of employees, but because there are no orders.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are too many factories idle.

Mr. GILLIS: Exactly. That is not an inducement to voluntary enlistment. The tendency rather is for one to stay at home where he is safe—as long as he is safe, however long that may be. There is only one way, in my opinion, to overcome this. I do not say that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) can do it; he is only one man; I do not say that partisan politicians appointed by the government are in a position to do it, because they are partisan politicians, small-time ward-heelers, and so forth, interested in jobs. These are not the people to step up production and see that these conditions are remedied. You must get someone who is interested in the job, who has some knowledge of what is involved, and who is free from political or any other kind of pressure. I think what should be done is what Ernest Bevin, the British Minister of Labour, did when he took over his portfolio. It took him just about nine hours in conjunction with his labour advisers to lay down a set of regulations governing war production, and he appointed forty inspectors, men who were capable and competent and could be depended on.

Mr. MacNICOL: He picked practical men.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes; and he sent them into the factories to step up production.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): He is an organizer.

Mr. GILLIS: We, too, have them, but they won't let them organize.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes; that is the trouble.

Mr. GILLIS: Some attention should be paid to that. No factory in Canada should be closed which can produce aeroplanes. Every factory should be turning them out.

Mr. MacNICOL: They should be working twenty-four hours a day.

Mr. GILLIS: Right. And it is essential that we take care of the small details among the people themselves and demonstrate to them that, while we are fighting a war, we still realize that the common people at home are human beings.

An hon. MEMBER: And have to be looked after.

Mr. GILLIS: And have to be looked after. I do not believe that there would be any difficulty in getting men on a voluntary basis in this country if we took care of matters of this kind affecting war production and the everyday needs of the people whom we want to do the fighting. In the final analysis it is the fellow who works who is going to do the fighting. It is not the cabinet minister or the member of parliament. Nor is it the little pin-headed local politician who wants to stay at home and work his machine to death and get what he can out of the war; he should be pushed aside.

There is another matter I should like to bring to the attention of the house, because I think it is retarding enlistments. A committee on pensions sat during the last session of parliament. It was largely composed of members of the government, but two members of our group, of whom I was one, had the privilege of serving on it. A supplementary report was presented to the house, tabled, and, as I understand it, accepted, containing certain recommendations in the interests of men actually engaged in making war. Those proposals were never implemented; they were changed.

One question to which I would direct your attention is the rehabilitation of the soldier after he returns. There is nothing worse, nothing that affects a community more injuriously, than that a man who has made some contribution to the war, who has served perhaps a year, having gone over to England and been returned as physically unfit, should be found walking the streets unable to get a job. He goes to an employer and is told, "Your certificate of discharge is not worth the paper it is written on; you are physically unfit and we do not want men who are unfit." That man is a living example to the other fellow as to why he should not volunteer, and there are many such men. I have run into many of them in my section of the country.

Mr. MacNICOL: Far too many.

Mr. GILLIS: Far too many. The welfare officers working on rehabilitation do the best they can, but they do not get cooperation on that question from the employers, at any rate so far as my part of the country is concerned. We made a recommendation to the pension committee at that time, based on the regulations as they exist now in Britain. It was to the effect that a soldier returning from the war should be retained in uniform for at least six months and given some vocational training and pay and allowance for himself and his dependents in the meantime, and that he should be rehabilitated and fitted for some gainful employment. That was the committee's report. Now he is put on relief. Under the new regulations he can make application to the welfare officer and be given so much a week for so many weeks or until he is employed.

Mr. MacNICOL: There should be no necessity for such relief in a country with the resources that Canada possesses.

Mr. GILLIS: That is a state of affairs that should be abolished. If we got rid of that condition there would be no necessity for conscription for overseas service. The committee made another recommendation—and these are matters that relate to the war—that the desirability should be considered of extending the provisions of orders in council P.C. 3359 and P.C. 3492 of November 10, 1939, with reference to Canadians serving on ships of other than Canadian registry operating from Canadian ports. That is a question that we considered very carefully. Wherever there is a seaport there is a good deal of trouble in this connection. This has reference to boys serving on convoy ships; and there is no branch of the service that is more essential. They are taking greater chances on old ships than they otherwise would. A lot of these old ships are held together by paint, and they leave these ports loaded with war materials. That is true; hon. members can check it up.

An hon. MEMBER: A little more than paint.

Mr. GILLIS: I have seen them in Sydney and even the paint was not holding them together. Everything that will float is put into service, and perhaps that is necessary. But these boys go on board these ships and whereas they have protection if the ship is of Canadian registry—they get the protection of the Canadian pensions regulations—there is no protection whatever for them if they are on a ship of foreign registry—and eighty per cent of the ships leaving Canadian ports are of foreign registry. If they drown, leaving families in Canada, their dependents are out of luck. As I say, there is no protection whatever for them from the Canadian government. I have received two letters since coming here, one from an old lady of eighty-seven. She brought up a boy from the age of five and he was her only means of support. He tried to enlist in the army but was rejected because he was physically unfit. As his contribution to the war effort he went on board a ship and two days later it was torpedoed and the boy was lost. There is no compensation for this old lady. Now she has to depend on charity. I have dealt with twenty-five or thirty cases in my own area, because there is a large number of boys from that end of the country going into that service. And without that service there would be no war in England or in any other part of the empire, because they are getting foodstuffs, machinery and other supplies, everything that is produced on this continent which is necessary to carry on the fight over there, by means of these ships. I submit that these boys should be protected by the Canadian government regardless of the registry of the ship.

I have a letter in which I am told that a woman whose husband was lost should look to the Norwegian government for consideration. The Norwegian government is responsible for any compensation to which she may be entitled. But that government is in exile, and that means that this man's dependents are now thrown upon charity—and we know what that is to-day. Something should be done with reference to these little matters, because whether we realize it or not, while people do not publicize these things—and they are not vocal; they have no press in which to publicize them—it is this sort of thing that is eating the core out of the war effort. There is no doubt about that. It is talked about in lodges, in local unions, in fraternal societies and in every avenue through which people congregate in communities. It is reflected in the homes. Boys who should be in uniform, and who would be in uniform perhaps, use this argument. We do not want a repetition of Hong Kong through the closing down of factories. These are problems that we shall have to take care of.

Then there is the question of war-time housing, another important matter. I have had considerable correspondence with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and with those responsible for war-time housing. In one city I know, the city of Sydney, about a thousand men have been added to the steel plants. There is a steel plate mill opening this month which will require 600 more workers. That port is full of ships, and there are thousands of people there who were not in the place prior to the outbreak of war. The result was that when war broke out there was a shortage of housing. They require 500 additional houses. It is impossible to get rooms. The plate mill and the steel plants are essential means of producing war materials and there is resentment in that city in consequence of the overcrowding and the conditions under which people are obliged to live—fifteen persons in two and three rooms.

Prior to coming here the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and myself, in Sydney, met the mayor and the council and emphasized the seriousness of the unsanitary conditions under which the people were obliged to live owing to overcrowding. That is something that should be looked into and remedied. It retards the war effort and builds up resentment in the minds of the people.

As I have stated on several occasions, the Department of Labour is one of the most important war departments of government. If you will look up the record of the Minister of Labour in Britain you will find that he is the biggest factor to-day over there in the prosecution of the war. The Minister of Labour must have the confidence of those for whom he legislates, and that confidence can be built up only on the basis of his activity and his approach to the people who have to turn out the machines of war.

To date, the Department of Labour has not been functioning as it should have been. I just want to refer briefly to the situation at Kirkland Lake.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: With unanimous consent.

Mr. GILLIS: I will finish as quickly as I can. The Department of Labour bungled the Kirkland Lake situation very badly. The men in that section canvassed all the legal machinery laid down by the government. A government-appointed conciliation board recommended recognition of their union. They were not looking for higher wages or shorter hours or anything impossible. Such matters would have been ironed out later through their agreement; all they asked was the right to sit down round a conference table with the employers and bargain with them as to conditions under which they would work and what wages they would work for. The statement has been made by the new minister that order in council 2685 sets out the principles which the government is supposed to stand for, that labour should be a partner in industry. That is all these men ask for. After canvassing every legal avenue, the operators—they are the saboteurs I talk of—took the position that as far as they were concerned they were not recognizing the government-appointed conciliation board; they were not concerned about the loss to the country; they were a law unto themselves. I pleaded here with the government to take some action to stop what was bound to happen at Kirkland Lake, the men forced into a strike, that strike with a ballot taken previously, everything done to offset it. Nevertheless the Department of Labour—and I hold them responsible—did not take action with regard to an entire community of between 4,000 and 5,000 people who were earning wages, making a contribution to the war effort of this country, prepared to do anything they could to assist. All they asked was the right to do what the operators had done many years ago, band themselves together for the purpose of mutual understanding and in order to work out their problems on a cooperative and collective basis. That was denied them.

The new Minister of Labour took charge, and his first official act is one that is not going to stand to his credit, no matter how long he is in that department, if he is lucky enough to go there. He started to handle that question. These men had been on strike for months, living on nothing, there being sent there from other sections of the labour movement to support them money that could have been very well used somewhere else. The heads of the Canadian Congress of Labour in conference just a few days ago with the Minister of Labour thought a solution had been arrived at. The whole matter as far as the union officials and the congress officials were concerned was put up to arbitration, but immediately after coming to that understanding to which the miners of Kirkland Lake agreed, the Minister of Labour did a right-about face and added a proviso that the men must go back to work in the mines before the dispute would be arbitrated. He did that without any understanding or consultation with either the officials of the union in the Kirkland Lake area or the congress of labour who have offices right here in Ottawa. That thing is being further prolonged. I want to make this clear, that while the men have lived up to the laws of this country 100 per cent, the operators have yet to state where they stand on this question and get these men back to work. They are sabotaging that industry; they are violating the laws of this country; they are interfering with the war effort, and as far as I am concerned, if the Minister of Labour was doing his job they should be in an internment camp. That is the unfortunate part; I said, if he was doing his job. There are many men in internment camps in this country for nothing who, if released, would be willing to come out and do some useful job in connection with the prosecution of the war. These people stand out as saboteurs, interfering with the entire life of a community, building up in that section antagonisms and hate and prejudices which will not be erased as long as that generation is living there. The men who have gone into the mines against the wishes of the majority of the men with whom they work will never be forgiven or forgotten in that section; I know, I have gone through that. It will be handed down to them and their children. Laxity on the part of the Minister of Labour and the government in not seeing that something was done there is responsible for that situation.

I am sorry to have exceeded my time. I have more to say, but I shall reserve it for some other time.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): As I listened to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), my mind went back over the past ten years, when the movement with which I have the honour to be associated, the Social Credit movement, was so bitterly assailed on all sides. The minister's speech was a masterly defence of the actions of this government. I have a great deal of sympathy for the government now, for we Social Crediters too have borne the burden and heat of the day for an idea. As the Premier of Alberta has said on many occasions, "Truth and Right will prevail." Time alone will prove the wisdom or otherwise of this government's attitude. Posterity will judge.

I should like to compliment the previous speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), on his splendid presentation.

Three questions, all of them of major importance, have been exercising the minds of the people of my constituency for a long time. The first is, old age pensions, or, Where do the old people go from here? The second is agriculture, or, Where do the farmers go from here? The third is Canada's war effort, or, Where does the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) go from here?

On the question of old age pensions I should like to make just two brief remarks. I hope that ample opportunity will be given early in this session to discuss the Old Age Pensions Act. The action of this government in placing obstacles in the way of bringing some additional measure of happiness and contentment to a section of our people is neither appreciated nor deserved. We can find money for mass produced massacre. We can find none for increasing old age pensions. We wrap our cloaks round us and hide behind the law. In Mr. Dunning's time as Finance Minister, lack of money was the excuse for holding up pensions for the blind. Because that excuse would be laughed out of court to-day, we are told that the law stands in the way. I wonder what excuse will be given next, when this one is finally overcome. I wish to tell this government that this matter of old age pensions is a really live issue. The feeling that a "New Deal" is due for old age pensioners grows and gathers strength. It cannot be lightly brushed aside. It must be faced in the very near future, and faced realistically.

The second problem, that of agriculture, is equal in importance to Canada's war effort. We have been told that we are all in the front line to-day, the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker, the business man, the professional man, and the farmer. An analysis of the economic situation will show that the farmer has appeared in the casualty list more frequently than any other member of organized society. Ninety-nine per cent of the farmers are still on that casualty list. When will this government assume its proper responsibility by taking the farmer out of the casualty column and placing him where he rightly belongs, namely, in the front line with the rest? I believe now is the time, and this is the place for all members of parliament, particularly those who hail from western Canada, to rise in their places in this house and serve notice upon this government that the wishes of more than 150,000 residents of western Canada who signed a petition, and who are backed by the prayers and good wishes of hundreds of thousands of other Canadians, shall not go unheeded. It is not enough for us as members to offer simply lip-service on behalf of these farmers. We must back up our talk with action, the only kind of action this government in general, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in particular, understand; that is, political pressure. A new deal for our farmers, or else! You may read into this expression what you wish. I mean just what the words are intended to convey; a political threat. We must serve notice that we mean business, serious business. We must not sit complacently in our seats; we must rouse ourselves to action. To me it would be a serious calamity were all the energy, all the labour and all the money poured out by these people to be spent in vain. Ours is a grave responsibility. It will take real courage on the part of Liberal members, particularly, to fight this battle. It must be faced. It must be fought. It must be won. Agriculture must survive.

The third question is the most important one of all. It transcends all others both in magnitude and in importance. The evacuaquestion of Canada's war effort. The evacuation of Dunkirk; the ebb and flow of the tide of battle in north Africa and Russia; the fall of Hong Kong; the appalling disaster at Pearl Harbour, the onward rush of the Japanese hordes in the far east, have done much to awaken our people to a realization of the dangers which we are facing and which, as Mr. Churchill says, we must face in the future. Our people are stunned by the complacency, by the overconfidence, by the bungling of high military officials, by the red tape, by the departmental jealousies, by the liquor and by the languor, as one financial newspaper puts it, which have brought us time and again to the edge of the abyss. We have made many trips to the edge of that abyss; I hope we shall not fall in.

Is it not time that a thorough house-cleaning was made of those who have been directly responsible for all this bungling? On many occasions in this house we have heard it said, "Let us forget the past." Why should we? We must punish those responsible for our humiliation as an example to those who follow after them. Those in authority at Pearl Harbour were not forgiven. We have had our Hong Kong. Many brave men lost their lives there. No one, as far as I am aware, paid the penalty for the bungling methods employed. Bureaucracy rules this country, but seemingly bureaucrats are never punished. They have power, with no responsibility. We cannot afford to take chances while the enemy knocks at our gates. I am upset, just as many other hon. members are, at the incidents which have occurred in British Columbia. The dead hand of bureaucracy is seen everywhere. It is little wonder that our people are stunned by the smug complacency in high places.

On every hand people are asking for a total war effort. We, upon whom rests the responsibility of giving the people those things which they demand, must pay some heed to the people. It is not entirely the outbursts of the press that concern me, but rather the smouldering anger of the people who all these years have been kept in the dark.

What is meant by a total war effort? The Prime Minister gave us his definition. It is a thousand pities that he shuns with studied design the question of conscription or national mobilization of finance. My conception of a total war effort is one in which finance and material resources are put into the melting-pot before man-power. May I say, too, that this concept is held by a very large body of public opinion in my constituency. Had finance and material resources been conscripted in the fall of 1939, when we urged this upon the Prime Minister and his government, we would not be in the unhappy position in which we find ourselves to-day. Finance rules the war effort, ably aided and abetted by a bureaucracy which is growing stronger every day.

[Mr. Marshall.]

One of the speakers earlier in this debate, a member supporting the government, said that this war cannot be carried on without finance. Twisted and distorted thinking hinders rather than assists our war effort. Does my friend not know that, all our leading economists, including such individuals as J. Maynard Keynes, are acknowledging to-day the fact that finance must be made subservient to the wishes of the people. Let my hon. friend go out any day and wave a Canadian government bond for five thousand dollars in front of a Japanese tank, and then come back—if he ever would—and tell us which he found to be of greater importance.

Cassandra, writing in the London Daily Mirror, has this to say about the question of finance:

> The news that America is to spend a billion dollars, or is it ten billion?—to suppress Hitlerism is unlikely to send a chill of fear down the Fuehrer's spine.
> These vast financial bombshells were impressive about the year 1933, but when Hitler began to demonstrate that fighting power really depended on work, machines and raw materials, the sting began to disappear out of the wads of bank notes and share certificates that the democracies brandished so vigorously.
> I don't think any nation can "buy" the defeat of Hitler with its accumulated wealth. You have got to go in and fight the creature.
>
> A thousand-dollar bill may be a fearsome thing, but I'd be much more scared of a dime's worth of lead coming at me at a thousand miles an hour.

Do not let us lose sight of this simple, realistic fact. We are fighting this war with men and machines, and not with money.

Another speaker—I think he was a member of the Conservative party—remarked that instead of the Prime Minister asking the Canadian people to release him from his 1940 promises, all members of parliament should individually ask their electors to release them from promises made in 1940.

Well, I for one would not wish, nor shall I ask, to be released from any pledges I made in 1940. Early in the war, September, 1939, to be exact, we as a group foresaw that eventually we must face the question of conscription. We might have side-stepped it, but instead we took a determined stand and came forward advocating conscription in the following order: First, finance, second, material resources—these before man-power.

What was the consequence of our stand? Seven seats were lost, because we had the intestinal fortitude to proclaim what actually must be done if we are to give of our very best.

Subsequent events have proven that we were on sound ground. I wonder what the Liberal senator, who campaigned so vigorously in my constituency during the 1940 election, and who in an unguarded moment told a sympathetic band of Liberal workers in one of our leading hotels that the Camrose constituency was in the Liberal bag because the Social Credit candidate could be tied up to conscription, is thinking about now. If these few remarks meet his eye, I hope he will go back to Camrose constituency and tell the people he was just playing party politics.

This plebiscite is nothing to get excited about. We are overemphasizing its importance. The main thing is, plebiscite or no plebiscite, to get on with the war. From present indications—as witness the appointment of one Charles Bothwell, an ex-member of parliament to the position of chief electoral officer, pro tem, for this plebiscite—it is playing politics. It is a simple means of placing a little more money into circulation by adding to the purchasing power of needy Liberal camp followers. It is a pretence to draw the minds of the public away from the sterner facts of life. It is the simple plan of "spoofing the public," as the Englishman would say.

There is no question about the intention of the Prime Minister. To consult the public on some important issue is a worthwhile thing, and is to be commended. To fiddle while Canada is in flames is an entirely different matter. It seems to me it is the government's desire to draw the attention of the people away from such items as the fiasco of the last victory loan, the war savings racket, the blunders of shipping wheat and scrapiron to Japan, and the present unfortunate situation at Kirkland Lake.

For months past, with the assistance of a high-powered sales organization, we have been bearing down very heavily on those people who have scanty means and slender pocketbooks, to get them to invest part of their meagre incomes in war savings certificates and bonds. This branch of our national war effort is bogging down. The sale of these little "two plus two equals five" pieces of paper, which one may see advertised by the brewing industry of Canada on every hoarding in the land, is not going very well. It will take a great deal more persuasion, added to the high-pressure and shady tactics employed by certain types of individuals in the last war loan drive to put the next one over.

The people are becoming educated to this financial racket very quickly.

Leslie Roberts, writing in the January issue of the Montrealer said:

> If we are to move away from the voluntary system under which one man elects to do his bit by dying in a ditch, and the other by investing his money in war loans at a comfortable rate of interest, only one destination is open to us. That is total war.
>
> Total war means the giving of everything that we have and are, not men, materials and tools, but money, profit and all things which, when added together, comprise the Canadian state. It means the placing of every man and woman in the land on an equal economic footing for the duration of the war, the throwing of everything into the pot.
> That is not what the conscriptionists want. What they want is compulsory service for somebody else. Well, until such time as they are ready and willing to give this and more, apoplectic gentlemen whose hardening arteries render them unfit for battle, and ladies who inundate the letters to the Editor columns (including that great self-naturalized Canadienne, Miss Thompson) would be well advised to sing low. By all means give us total war. But let's be done with half-measures designed to restrict sacrifice to age groups.

While I do not agree entirely with Leslie Roberts in all that he has said, yet he has spoken some truths which cannot be glossed over lightly.

By all means give us total war, but do not permit it to become a racket designed to enrich the few at the expense of the many. It is not enough to ask a man to offer his life in the service of his country, only to find on his return that some financial institution has taken possession of his property, and moved his relatives out into the road allowance, as actually happened during the last war.

These financial institutions—soulless organizations—must be made to understand they are in the front line, too. They must be herded there, first, and the sooner this action is taken the sooner shall we have a total-war effort.

The voluntary system of enlistment has not been allowed to function, from the very beginning. It has been hamstrung. Our whole war effort has been marked by blundering, inefficiency, stupidity, sprinkled lavishly with political patronage of the most bare-faced character—bureaucracy on the rampage. From the very beginning recruiting for the army particularly was seriously impaired. Some moron handed the army a battle-dress which the soldiers had to wear on all occasions, especially when off duty. The air force and the navy were both given uniforms of smartness and neatness. I am not quarrelling about the battle-dress, but it was no parade uniform. Everyone knows that. Some person is now endeavouring to remedy matters after two and one-half years of war, but the damage has been done. It is almost irreparable. It was an asinine regulation.

Stepping up the pay and allowances of all the forces has not yet been tried. We speak bitterly about the man earning from $5 to $10 a day in industry. We compare his lot with that of the soldier. We do nothing about it. Suggestions are made that the worker in industry must be brought down to the level of the man in the fighting forces; never do we suggest raising the pay of the man in the fighting forces to that of the worker in industry. This type of thinking, the destructive type, is encouraged by those who control the destinies of our nation. They do not sit in the front benches of our government either. Their desire is to keep the people in that state of penury and destitution which will render them more tractable. Increases in pay and allowances will come only when we as members of parliament forcibly demand them.

In 1938 a debate took place between Lord Snell and Mr. Amery over the British Broadcasting Corporation's network. The subject of that debate was, "Should national service be compulsory," and I should like to quote what Mr. Amery said on that occasion:

> I am sure that you will agree that nations in the long run depend quite as much upon their civic as upon their military strength, and that the development in their citizens of ever higher spiritual values, is even more necessary to their permanent welfare than are millions of conscripted men with guns and bayonets in their hands. Now those who advocate conscription appear to assume that nations live by guns alone. They wish to take a young man's body and train it for one definite and very limited purpose, while they ignore his other needs as a responsible human personality.
> Let me examine very briefly your statement that national defence is a common obligation. I do not deny this obligation, but there is also an obligation to the individual on the part of the state which is rarely remembered. I admit, of course, that all of us as free citizens have some obligation—physical, financial, moral—to the community which has nurtured us and whose social institutions and liberties we have inherited, and historically, of course, there are precedents for enforced military service. In the ancient Greek cities every citizen was compelled to give military service; but the Greek citizen was himself a proprietor who had a direct interest in defending the soil of his fathers, for the land did actually belong to him. The slaves were never called to arms, and no one who had nothing to defend was ever asked to share the risks and burdens of war. Rome acted in the same way. Her armies were armies of citizen proprietors. Nearer our own time, the French revolution was the first to decree a general levy on the ground that the fatherland was in danger but before doing that, the convention enfranchised the serfs and gave to all the right of property.

[Mr. Marshall.]

If the state considers that there is a responsibility due it from the individual, surely it is not too much to expect that the individual has certain rights and privileges which must be recognized by the state.

The Prime Minister should tell the country, even at this late date, that in future all the men in the fighting forces and their dependents shall be forever economically secure. A statement of this sort would be most assuring to our young men in the armed forces and, in my opinion, would stimulate recruiting to a remarkable degree. You must offer them more than a farm mortgaged to the hilt and controlled by the financiers of Toronto, or a home where the bailiff's shadow casts gloom and despondency around. It is not enough.

Parliament exists to carry out the wishes of the people. If I interpret the wishes of the people of my constituency correctly, they are for a total-war effort. Thus far these wishes have been thwarted by the bureaucrats of the East block who have given the people what they (the bureaucrats) think is good for them.

For a long time I have entertained the feeling that we must hear what our experts have to say about the whole business—McNaughton of the army, Breadner and Bishop of the air force, Nelles of the navy, and not what the bureaucrats have to say. General McNaughton is now in Canada. Let us summon him before the bar of this parliament to give us a frank statement as to Canada's preparedness and Canada's need for men. This and this alone will satisfy and perhaps allay the fears of our people.

In conclusion, let me summarize briefly. First, this plebiscite will settle nothing, not even the question of compulsory national service. Second, we are playing politics when in reality we should be fighting a war. Third, total-war effort must include conscription of finance and material resources before man-power. Fourth, the bureaucrat must give place to the expert who alone knows how wars are won and lost.

If we do not insist on a programme which will give us an all-out war effort, then the letters which we have a right to affix to our names, instead of standing for member of parliament will take on their true significance, a mess of pottage.

On motion of Mr. Fraser (Northumberland) the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, February 5, 1942

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

MILITARY SERVICE

REPORT OF SPEECH OF MR. ST. LAURENT IN QUEBEC CITY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to direct a question to the Prime Minister based on the report of a speech made by the Hon. Louis St. Laurent, Minister of Justice, at Quebec city on Monday the 2nd instant, in which he is reported to have said in a radio address that "at the moment and probably for a long time to come conscription for overseas service would harm our war effort."

I now ask the Prime Minister if that statement of the Hon. Mr. St. Laurent represents the government's views, and may it be taken as a statement of government policy? Was Mr. St. Laurent speaking with the authority of the government, and does the Prime Minister support or repudiate this statement of the Minister of Justice?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have been trying to avoid political controversy and give my thought and time to the effort of the country in the matter of the war, and I do not intend to be drawn into any controversy by the leader of the opposition.

CANADIAN ARMY

RECONSTITUTION OF ROYAL RIFLES OF CANADA—REFERENCE TO RECRUITING POSTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Notwithstanding the profound feeling of admiration that we all have for our glorious dead, and in view of the statement made by the Prime Minister on the very first day of this session that the government would grant a committee of investigation in the matter, and in view of the fact that such committee has not yet been named, also in view of the fact that our volunteers should not be on active duty anywhere unless fully equipped and trained, may I be permitted to call the attention of the government and of the house to a poster which may be seen anywhere and which is the worst possible appeal for recruiting volunteers:

Remember Hong Kong. Royal Rifles of Canada will be reconstituted 100 per cent. Follow their glorious example. Enlist now. Apply to the nearest recruiting station in your district.

My question is this: Is it the intention of the Department of National Defence to give immediate and definite instructions that such posters shall be removed at once from anywhere and taken away from the sight of the only ones who have the right to forget—I mean our gallant soldiers, airmen and sailors. It should be for them to forget Hong Kong, although we shall remember it all our lives.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I did not know of the poster. I do not know who designed it or put it out, but I know this, that a group of very fine patriotic citizens, not only of Quebec, but of Montreal as well, made representations to the department asking that we reconstitute this battalion, with its magnificent tradition, and we gave authority so to do; and recruiting is going on for that battalion. At the moment I do not see what my hon. friend's objection is to the poster. The insinuation that he makes, the reflection which he makes against the department, I quite understand; but that is a matter which will be investigated and inquired into in due course. As regards this poster, I presume it was got out by the local recruiting committee, whether by the district officer commanding I do not know, but I am sure with the full consent and approval of the officers of this newly reconstituted battalion, a number of whom at least have relatives and friends among those who were in the Canadian Hong Kong expedition. It seems to me that what was considered by them to be appropriate would be considered by the house and the people generally to be equally so.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege. I made no insinuation whatever, and besides that, the minister is my colleague in this house; but I protest strongly when he calls me his friend.

SOVIET UNION

RECOGNITION BY CANADA—ARRANGEMENT FOR EXCHANGE OF CONSULAR SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A few days ago the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) asked the following question:

1. What decision has the government reached regarding the recognition of our present ally the U.S.S.R.?

2. If recognition has been decided upon, will the government exchange representatives with the Soviet Union?

I explained the reasons at the time why it was not possible to give an immediate answer to the question. I am now in a position to give the house the following information:

De facto recognition of the U.S.S.R. was accorded by the United Kingdom government following the signature of a trade agreement at London on March 16, 1921. Canada adhered to this agreement on July 3, 1922, from which date extends Canada's de facto recognition of the U.S.S.R.

On February 1, 1924, the United Kingdom government granted de jure recognition to the U.S.S.R., while formal recognition by Canada may be dated from March 24, 1924, at which time a communication from the Canadian government was forwarded to the government of the U.S.S.R., stating that Canada was prepared to recognize the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

Up to the present time, therefore, the Canadian government has maintained diplomatic and commercial relations with Russia in exactly the same way as is done with many other countries with whom direct diplomatic relations have not yet been established, that is, through the British diplomatic and consular services.

In reply to the second part of this question I would like to inform the house that an agreement was signed in London to-day at 3 p.m. London time between the government of Canada and the government of the U.S.S.R., providing for the exchange of consular representatives between the two countries. The Canadian High Commissioner in London, the Right Hon. Vincent Massey, signed on behalf of Canada, and the Russian ambassador, M. Maisky, signed on behalf of the U.S.S.R.

I may say that it is the belief of the government that the establishment of direct relations, pursuant to this agreement, will greatly facilitate the solution of common problems arising out of the war efforts of our two countries.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, February 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. A. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I realize, on rising to offer some contribution, I hope, to this debate, that as a member of this house I am endeavouring to speak at the most serious time in the history of Canada, the empire and the future of civilization as we know it. I want it clearly understood at the outset that, supported by the stand I have taken in this house since 1936, I am absolutely and irrevocably and determinedly for an all-out war effort on the part of Canada.

Before proceeding with the observations I have to make this afternoon I should like to make reference to the speech made by my good friend the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray), which I considered a well-developed and well-delivered oration. But I can only say to him, as I can say to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Hoblitzell) who spoke two days ago, that as Voltaire said:

I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it.

The first thing we should do, Mr. Speaker, in considering Canada's position is to consider the position of Great Britain at the present time; to consider the position in which the people of Britain have found themselves from the beginning of this war, but particularly as developments have taken place from day to day; to consider the position of Britain to-day as compared with the position she was in during the war of 1914-18. Then there were many places to which Britain could turn for supplies; there was Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Spain, and it is not necessary for me to mention, except to ask hon. members to visualize, the supplies she drew in raw materials from the countries accessible during that conflict.

At that time also Britain had available for her war effort the raw materials and food supplies of Australia, New Zealand and the other parts of the empire.

To-day Britain's position is such that Canada is not only the most important but practically the only reservoir for the supplies she needs not only to carry on her war effort but for the very existence of her people. Situated as we are on the shortest sea lane across the western ocean, we must be ready, as we have been, not only to supply Britain with her food and raw material requirements, but to supply her to the limit of our ability with the implements and equipment so necessary to carry on this conflict. In that regard Canada, a highly industrialized country, a vast agricultural country, with over one-third of her people engaged on the land, occupies an outstanding and essential position in the matter of enabling Britain to maintain her people and to carry on this war.

It has been necessary for the government and the people of Canada, in consultation with the people and the authorities, military and civil, of Great Britain, to work out some plan whereby Canada could extend to Britain the maximum contribution to the achievement of our common objective, that is, the defeat of our enemies, the defeat of that school of thought, the defeat of the totalitarian dictators. That is Canada's duty to-day as it has been in the months that have passed.

Anyone who has not had the opportunity to survey Canada's war industries, to go into the shipyards, the gun plants, the aeroplane plants, the plants producing parts, plants producing the things that Britain has not been able to mobilize to produce even to this day, cannot realize the tremendous effort that has been made and the great results that have accrued from Canada's industrial mobilization under the direction of the efficient and tireless and experienced Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). If hon. members could, as I have done, spend a month going over the industrial development of Canada, taking into full consideration the time required to turn industry from peacetime production to wartime production, the time required to tool up, to produce dies, jigs, machines, to procure from the only available source the requisite precision tools to produce guns, planes, parts and equipment and munitions, they would marvel at the contribution Canada has made in that respect to the war effort of our empire and our allies.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer for a moment or two to a recent issue of the Monetary Times, in which appear page after page of names of those who have been brought into the service of the nation in order to mobilize Canada's industry for our war effort. I hope hon. members will not consider it out of place if I read into the record the names of these men, of all political complexions, from all walks of life but leaders of various branches of industry, who have voluntarily entered the service of the state, to give of their time and experience in the organization of Canada's war industry and the alignment of Canada's economic and financial position in this world struggle. These are the names:

Donald Gordon, chairman, wartime prices and trade board.
R. C. Berkinshaw, chairman, wartime industries control board.
Allan H. Williamson, controller of supplies.
G. R. Cottrelle, oil controller.
D. B. Carswell, director general of naval construction.
John H. Berry, motor vehicle controller.
S. W. Fairweather, director general, economics and statistics.
Colonel D. E. Dewar, director general of arsenals and small arms.
Shirley G. Dixon, K.C., artificial silk administrator.
H. G. Smith, administrator of knit goods.
Hon. J. G. Taggart, food administrator.
F. B. Walls, coordinator of textiles and clothing.
Edgar G. Burton, administrator of retail trade.
Robert F. Chisholm, administrator of wholesale trade.
D. J. O. Meyers, director of purchase branch in United States.
R. B. Whitehead, K.C., deputy administrator of retail trade.
Thomas Arnold, machine tools controller.
W. D. F. Drysdale, director general of industrial planning.

I understand this gentleman has made an unparalleled contribution to Canada's tank production.

F. M. Ross, director general, naval armaments branch.
Colonel D. Stairs, director general of defence projects.
J. P. D. Malkin, joint director general of purchasing.
Desmond A. Clarke, director general of shipbuilding.
F. H. Brown, assistant director general of munitions production.
Wilfred Gagnon, joint director general of purchasing.
J. G. Dodd, administrator of cotton.
Ralph P. Bell, director general of aircraft production.
J. D. C. Forsyth, administrator, men's and boys' furnishings.
Allan S. Nicholson, controller of timber.
E. P. Taylor, president, British supply council in North America.
D. M. Farish, director general of personnel, munitions and supply.
H. J. Symington, K.C., controller of power.
C. Blake Jackson, controller of construction.
H. M. Long, special assistant to the Minister of Finance.
Michael Morris, administrator of furs.
Harry J. Carmichael, director general of gun production.
Frederick B. Kilbourn, controller of steel.
Doctor R. J. Manion.
John A. Marsh, Hamilton.

I had the honour of sitting in this house with Mr. Marsh, who is doing one fine job of work on behalf of this dominion to-day. And then day after day we see in the daily press lists of men who have been asked or who have volunteered to give their services to the country to do necessary work in the prosecution of the biggest business in the world to-day, the business of war. These men are not chosen from any political rank or for any particular colour or stripe; they are chosen by the government, and in particular by the department under the administration of the Minister of Munitions and Supply because they are the best men in Canada to carry on that work.

I should like to refer for a moment to statements made in the British House of Commons by Mr. Churchill on January 28, only last week, in connection with Canada's financial contribution to the empire war effort.

This quotation is from the Montreal Star of January 28, 1942:

Mr. Churchill himself praised us when he was here, and yesterday in the British house he referred to "Canada's great and growing contribution to the common cause in men, money and materials," as part of his expression of thanks for our financial offer, which he glowingly termed an offer "unique in its scale in the whole history of the British empire."

I wish to place on record also another statement, this time from the Globe and Mail, made at the same time by Mr. Churchill, in these words:

We are conducting this war on the basis of full democracy, and this attempt has'nt been made before in such circumstances.

A variety of attacks are made upon the composition of the government. It is said that it is formed upon a party political basis, but so is the House of Commons. It is silly to extol the parliamentary system and in the next breath say, "Away with party; away with politics."

I have mentioned this statement because I want to make reference to it a little later.

Before proceeding further I feel that as a member representing a constituency in the province of Ontario I would not be taking full advantage of this opportunity if I did not make some reference to the "total war committee" of the city of Toronto. If I were not firmly convinced that mine was the right stand; if I were not firmly convinced that I had a duty to perform, as a humble member of this House of Commons, to express my innate convictions, I should not be speaking this afternoon; but, since I am speaking, I believe I would be unmindful of my duty if I did not make particular reference to this so-called committee. My roots are buried deep in the soil of Scotland. When the war of 1914 broke out my dear old Scotch father called his three boys into the living room and said, "The empire is at war. Choose what you are going to do, the navy or the army, but get into it." That is but an expression of the loyalty I hold not only to Canada but also to the British empire. I make reference to this incident because I take second place to no one in this chamber, or out of it, in my loyalty to my country. But I am going to maintain that loyalty without subterfuge, without fear, without appeal to emotion, prejudice or class. I am going to maintain it in fair, manly language; I am going to do my duty as I see it, regardless of party, race or creed. And I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I consider the methods used by the "total war committee" of Toronto embodied subterfuge, deception and hyprocrisy.

I want to place upon record this afternoon the original telegram—"the" original telegram —sent out by J. Y. Murdoch, Fred K. Morrow and Charles Burton, inviting two hundred people from Ontario to attend a luncheon for which they paid in the Royal York hotel in Toronto. I shall place the full wire on record.

This wire was sent to Mr. O. G. Alyea, at Trenton, Ontario. Please take particular note of the phraseology of it:

Would appreciate if you would join us at luncheon at Royal York hotel on Saturday, January 10, 12.30 p.m. to a limited number influential citizens to discuss a matter of urgent national importance which in the meantime must remain confidential. Please telegraph acceptance immediately care of Royal York hotel, Toronto.

Why did they not tell those people what they were there for? Why did they not tell them why they were invited? The great majority of those two hundred people went to the city of Toronto expecting that these outstanding men were inviting them to have luncheon in order to organize on behalf of the Dominion of Canada the new victory loan. They did not expect they were going to be placed under the obligation of accepting a luncheon at somebody else's expense. They did not expect that within the confines of formal etiquette they would be placed at a disadvantage by their hosts. They were invited there to discuss a matter which must be kept confidential. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that anything which has to do with the welfare of Canada is not confidential with me. I can say it from my place in the House of Commons or say it publicly on any platform or at any luncheon, paid for or otherwise, in the Dominion of Canada.

Now, let us analyse the records of these gentlemen. I make this analysis because I shall have something to say about it before I have finished. I make the analysis because I detest underhand methods. Last night I sent down to the parliamentary library and obtained a copy of "Who's Who", which contains the record of every industrialist and financier in Canada. Every industrialist and financier in Canada who wishes to have his picture or photograph published pays $200 to get it in. Let us read it—

An hon. MEMBER: And writes it himself.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Yes, as I was going to say, writes it himself. Listen to this:

Murdock, James Y., K.C., LL.D.; President, Noranda Mines; President, Canadian Copper Refiners Limited; Waite Amulet Mines, Limited; Amulet Dufault Mines; Pamour Porcupine Mines, Limited; Hallnor Mines, Limited;—

And then there is a company the name of which is in Spanish. The list continues:

Kerr-Addison Gold Mines, Limited; Goldale Mines Limited; The Office Specialty Manufacturing Company, Limited; Vice-president, Aunor Gold Mines Limited; Director: The Bank of Nova Scotia; The Mutual Life Assurance Company of Canada; The British American Oil Company Limited; Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines Limited; Canada Wire and Cable Company Limited; Wright-Hargreaves Mines, Limited; Quebec Gold Mining Corporation; Rolland Paper Company Limited and Maple Leaf Gardens; Director, Allied War Supplies Corporation.

That is the industrial position of one of the men who issued the invitations for that luncheon.

Mr. MacNICOL: A very great man.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): I shall deal with that later. Now I am going to read to the house what "Who's Who" has to say about Mr. Morrow. This is it:

Morrow, Frederick Keenan, Chairman, Wilsil Limited; President, Essa Securities Company Limited and Loblaw Groceterias Incorporated; Director, Bank of Toronto; Consumers Gas Company Limited; Reiss Premier Pipe Company; The Ogilvie Flour Mills Company Limited—

Yes, Ogilvie Flour Mills—

—Consolidated Bakeries of Canada Limited; Massey-Harris Company Limited; Robinson Consolidated Cone Company Limited; Federal Fire Insurance Company; Hiram Walker-Gooderham & Worts Limited; Maple Leaf Gardens Limited; Ward Baking Company and Remington Rand Limited.

An hon. MEMBER: Read Charlie Dunning now.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): If there is any hon. member who wishes to speak, either I will sit down or he can wait until I finish.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are enjoying it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Now, Mr. Speaker, these are the gentlemen who make this statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, don't forget Mr. Burton; let us have him, too.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Well, I have not time to get into a price-control argument debate on the floor of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Don't renege on him. Don't forget Mr. Burton.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, will you ask hon. gentlemen to write me? I cannot hear them.

Now, listen to what these gentlemen say:

There is only one way to meet total war,—by total effort—that is to mobilize all our man-power and material resources under a plan of universal compulsory selective service. Those who can serve best on the farms must work on the farms. Those who can serve best in the factories must work in the factories. And those best fitted to serve in the armed forces must be trained, equipped, and available for service in Canada or overseas anywhere at any time. That is the only way that our farms, our factories and our armed forces can wage total war. No half measures are consistent with national honour.

And this is what they have suggested should be told to members:

Tell him to inform parliament, and through parliament the whole of Canada, that the people of his riding advocate and will support any measures, however drastic, which will assure the last ounce of effort of which they are capable.

I might add that out of 21,000 voters in my constituency, only 62 took advantage of the opportunity of writing me in this connection.

National honour and the safety of our people demand that every man who wears the uniform of Canada be ready at all times to go overseas to hit the enemy wherever and whenever he can be reached.

Let these gentlemen, who signed the invitation under subterfuge and hypocrisy, if they want to contribute to the war effort of Canada, take advantage of the non-interest-bearing loan offered by the Dominion of Canada. Let them say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) "We wish to have equal sacrifice. We wish to have universal compulsory service, but if you wish to take our money away from us we will give it to you, without interest." That is the suggestion I make. It is a grand suggestion, and it would be some indication that these honourable men are sincere.

Let me go further and say to them, that if I owned an empire such as "Who's Who" says they own, I would want to conscript everybody in Canada to defend it. And, Mr. Speaker, if I had their mentality not only would I wish to conscript—insist upon conscripting—every man in Canada to defend that empire, but I would go farther and spend every dollar I could to create in this country in the minds of the people a situation which would delude and deceive them into conscripting people to defend my empire.

It is not often that I agree with my hon. friends who are led by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), but standing here in my place in the House of Commons I want to say that I agree with many of the fundamentals which he has expounded in the last few weeks. I want to say to these men who advertise to the public, that their financial empire will not continue. These people not only want to conscript men to defend their empire; they want to sit in at the peace table. They want to dominate the government and the people of Canada in order that when we win this war, which we surely will do, they can defeat the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and myself and anyone else who is trying to make sure that they will not have that kind of empire after the war.

Let us see how far these people go. They do not just go to the extent that a business man would go; they do not just go to the extent that a true citizen of Canada would go; they do not just go to the extent that people would go who understand that to-day we, like our allies and the rest of the empire, have our backs to the wall. They do not do that; they are not satisfied with that. They are not satisfied to spend their money upon cheap paltry engraved cards; they are not satisfied to sell their country short; they are ready to do what my hon. friend the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation detests, what is detested by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by myself; they are ready to besmirch the ballot, to take away the right of free people to stand behind a curtain and put an "X" on a ballot, the right that we won under the Magna Charta. They are not satisfied in their contracted mentalities where a common stock dividend is the most beautiful thing in the world. People with this type of mentality are ready to spend money to besmirch the ballot box and take away the rights of the common people in this democratic country. Not only do they do that; they want to attack democratic government from the pulpit. They want to go farther than that and use the loyalty of hon. members of this house, which I am ready to admit, taking advantage of their sincerity, and attempting to ridicule democratic government. I am sorry the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) is not in his place, because there is no one I would rather face than him. I should like to quote what he placed on Hansard, January 29, 1942, at page 131. He was quoting the words of a certain person, as follows:

> I ask you to request our Prime Minister to beg Churchill, Wavell and Prime Minister Curtin to hang on. Canada is voting in three months.

Did the hon. member for Parkdale contribute anything to Canada's war effort by placing that on Hansard? Did he help things by repeating that evidence of cheap prejudice and sabotage of Canada's war effort? If he were sitting in his place there are one or two more references I should like to make, but because of my respect for him I shall not use them now.

[Mr. W. A. Fraser.]

But they go further than that. According to last night's press a discredited candidate, a man who stood up on the platform in the city of Ottawa to speak in the most emphatic language against the great Conservative party and tried to advise them what to do, has something to say. He nearly sabotaged them at that time. Here is this fellow Herridge, the Honourable Mr. Herridge, stating in London, in the centre of this empire of war, that the safety of Canada depends upon the resignation of the Prime Minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): Before this war is over my hon. friends who say "hear, hear" will hang their heads in shame. This man was Canada's representative in Washington, and yet he makes that statement in the heart of the empire. I feel that I can say without fear of contradiction by hon. members of this house, even by hon. members who have disagreed with me, even by my many sound-thinking friends in the Tory party, that everyone will reject that kind of attitude toward Canada at this time.

I should like to make one or two other references. First, let me refer to a statement made upon a public platform, during a by-election campaign, by the premier of the province of Ontario. The premier of Ontario has been a friend of mine of long standing. Perhaps there is no one who has cooperated as much with him, who has done more to have him adopt a moderate attitude than I. Here is what he said on January 28:

> —"deliberately attempting to set the French against the British on the issue of compulsory selective service".
> "I charge Mr. King with deliberately trying to set the French against the British through his chief lieutenant in Quebec, Mr. Godbout," said Mr. Hepburn.

I read that simply because I intend to refer to it again in a minute or two. Let me say this to my hon. friends in this house: Make no mistake about it, there can be no equality of sacrifice in a war. Anyone who uses that phrase is not stopping to analyse its meaning. I ask my good friend, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar: would the union men of Canada leave the production lines to go on our farms? Canada is a highly unionized country; I ask him if they would permit themselves to be pushed and shoved around. Obviously the answer is no. They are doing a wonderful job. They are just like the senior civil servants in Ottawa; they are giving all they have to Canada's contribution to the war effort. There can be no equality of sacrifice during a war. It is with a knowledge of Canada's contribution to the empire war effort that I am proud to say that 565,000 Canadian workmen are producing the implements of war for the air force, the navy and the army, not only for service overseas but in Canada. I am ready to depend upon the loyalty and the understanding of Canadian citizenship to put this job over without endeavouring to create dissension by conscripting people.

I am watching my time, Mr. Speaker. I have great respect for every member of the House of Commons, but if I did not know them all personally, if they were all strangers to me, I would still have the same respect for them because somewhere, in some part of Canada, they have offered themselves to their fellow Canadians to do the best they could for them as their representatives in this assembly of a democratic country. I have much less respect for men who pile up millions and have never offered themselves for service, men who try to browbeat and influence by prejudice and hate the good people of the Dominion of Canada. I have even less respect for those who have been rejected by the people of Canada as a whole but who insist on trying to dictate the policies of the government of Canada, and I want to spend the next three or four minutes appealing to my hon. friends opposite in this house.

This is going to be an appeal for unity, for understanding, cool heads and clear thinking, and appreciation of the facts. The first thing I want to say to my good friends in the Tory party in this house is that no one has ever suffered to a greater extent than they from the consequences of a house divided against itself. It was the Bennett-Stevens catastrophe of a few years ago that resulted in the position in which they find themselves to-day. Surely that is an example to prove that unity is necessary.

This government is running a three per cent war and a loan without interest war, not a five and a half per cent tax-free war for the plutocratic financiers of Canada under Arthur Meighen. No, this government is running a three per cent war. These are the facts, these are the realities I ask you to take into consideration.

This is a democratic assembly elected by all the people. We have in this house sixty-five members from the province of Quebec. I have not the Reverend Mr. Shields' hatred of religion and race. I have not and never could have the feeling of hate that was demonstrated by Colonel George Drew and Doctor Shields platforms in the East Hastings by-election when they said that the French-Canadians were a conquered race and must expect to be treated that way. I have not that hate and could not have that hate for my fellow Canadians. They elect their representatives to this democractic assembly; they are our fellow Canadians, and you cannot get away from that. I do not care what bitterness, what hate, what passions and emotions others may appeal to, but my appeal to-day, Mr. Speaker, not only to those to your left but to every member of this house, regardless of race or creed, and to my fellow citizens everywhere, is to trust Canadians and the government of Canada by Canadians. This is a time to trust Canadians. You can turn the dial of your radio and listen in to the United States. There you have a government, not as the hon. member for Parkdale states, but a party government, and not universal compulsory service, as the hon. member for Parkdale stated. But there you have a highly-unionized country, a country where recompense and compensation and loyalty are the incentives—not the Hitler labour camps, but unity, loyalty, compensation, understanding, education. That is the guide and slogan in the United States, where you find Mr. Willkie speaking on a platform and over the air, appealing to the people of the United States, and standing shoulder to shoulder with Mr. Roosevelt.

While my hon. friends opposite may not realize this—and I have read or listened to every speech that has been made in this debate—I want to tell them that Mr. Mackenzie King is the Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada in accordance with the wishes and the voice of the people of Canada. The hon. member for Parkdale, who came into this house after the 1940 election, day after day has stated that we need a new Prime Minister, but the people of Canada with an unmistakable voice said: Mackenzie King is the safest man to conduct the affairs of this country and to conduct the war. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that he is still Prime Minister of Canada, and all the dastardly—and I say this for the record—all the dastardly attacks and all the unspeakable epithets that have been hurled against William Lyon Mackenzie King by his enemies cannot change the fact that he is Prime Minister of Canada and the leader of responsible government in Canada. We had an example in Spain of rebellion against constituted government there which cost over three million lives. We had a similar thing in France, a people divided against themselves—and not only in France but also in the low countries. It was Pearl Harbour that cemented the people of the United States. Do not let us as Canadians require a Pearl Harbour or a Dunkirk to make us united. I will join with every man in this house and with every citizen of Canada who will take as his slogan: Don't sell Canada short, because that would be selling your own country short. You would be sabotaging your own country. When you do that, you are not damning the man who is the Prime Minister and the head of responsible government in Canada; but you are damning and sabotaging your own country.

I know that to-morrow morning my name will be on the back page of that sheet, the Globe and Mail, but I trust that the sincerity of my voice and of my determination will go across this country from one end to the other when I appeal to my fellow Canadians to be Canadians, just as the Americans are Americans, and to back the Prime Minister and constituted government.

My time, Mr. Speaker, is up.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland, Ont.): I have much more that I could say from the very altar of my honesty and sincerity. This government has brought in a measure as a result of the deliberations and conclusions of the cabinet. There may be features about the plebiscite that are not as we would all like, but I have studied it. I went home and for three days did nothing but turn it over in my mind, and I came to this honest conclusion. I was convinced that if ever in my life I should stand as I have stood this afternoon and appeal to my fellow Canadians to stand behind the man who for five times has been elected by the ballots of the people of Canada to lead this country, now is the time. If an offer was made to my hon. friends opposite to-day to come and join a national government under Mackenzie King they would not do it. They would want a national government of their own making, of the making of the Murdochs.

In closing, I would express my appreciation of the splendid hearing which my fellow members have given me this afternoon, and thank them for the extra time they have allowed me. Finally, I appeal to every hon. member, as I would appeal to my brother: For God's sake get behind Canada. Don't sell her short. Get behind the Prime Minister, and let us put this thing over. We will do it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a point of order, I did not wish to intervene while the hon. gentleman was speaking, but the rules are there; they should not be violated without the consent of this house, and no consent was asked for. Had the hon. member asked for overtime I personally would have cheerfully granted it to him, but I do not think the rules should be used for the purpose of abusing political opponents or of putting on a burlesque in this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: When the hon. member mentioned the fact that he was exceeding his time I looked to see if there was opposition, but as a matter of fact the expression that was given by those on the left was that he should continue, and I assumed that he had consent.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): It is not my intention to emulate the scene that has been enacted in this house within the last forty-five or fifty minutes or perhaps an hour. Apparently the theories propounded by the previous speaker have met with general approval among the followers of the government. I have not at any time attempted to minimize the war effort of this government, but I rise in my place at this time to urge them on to greater things.

None of us question the loyalty of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser), who has just spoken, and I want to assure him that there are just as many loyal subjects in Canada to-day as there were in the last war, as is shown by the fact that they have sent sons overseas.

I am not particularly interested in digging up from among the archives anything that might appear to discredit men who have, in fact, been a credit to Canadian public or civil life. Those men on whom a vicious attack was made to-day will be able, I am quite sure, when the last account is taken to measure up with anyone, whether he be Speaker in this house, member of the house, or among those recited in the great list which have given of their best.

I received no telegram; I attended no banquet; but I think it would be interesting to have a comparison made between the records of the men who were viciously attacked in the preceding address, and, perhaps, some of those who are members of this house. This is no time for us to indulge in recriminations. This is a time when every member should express to the best of his ability his point of view and the views of his constituents. A strange spectacle has been enacted in this house in the last week or two—yes, and it is being enacted in many parts of Canada to-day. The daily papers are to-day reporting incidents which I believe it would be better to have deleted from the records of the nation. Canada, the empire, Christian civilization itself is rocking on its foundations, and in my opinion the spectacle which is being enacted in this house—within the last hour—is not a credit to the parliament of Canada in this time of crisis.

I listened the other day to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) denouncing his friends. Not long ago the lion and the lamb lay down together in peace. How things have changed! Then we have another hon. gentleman, the member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), appearing on a public platform in the city of Toronto supporting the candidate of my hon. friends to the left, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, and the next day appearing in the constituency of Welland and urging before the electors the defeat of that same candidate. I say that strange spectacles are being enacted throughout Canada as well as in this house.

We are the elected representatives of the people of Canada, and I think that every representative has a sacred duty to perform at this time. It was hoped, at least I had hoped when I came to the house at this session, that we would be given an opportunity to accomplish something with alacrity in the interests of Canada and of the empire. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) as a private member spoke to us yesterday at length; as a minister of the crown, a member of the war cabinet, he has also expressed his views. I for one respect those views just as I expect him to respect the views of my constituents or any views I may advance.

He has approved of the expenditure of money on a plebiscite. With this I have to disagree. He has likened it to the spending of money by people on amusement. I would point out that the spending of trust money, raised by the sacrifices of the taxpayers of this country, on matters such as a plebiscite is far different from people spending the small pittance they have left after paying these taxes to get a little amusement and recreation for themselves.

The speech from the throne deals specifically with few matters but more particularly with the plebiscite suggested by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). In respect to that I had hoped we would have something definite placed before us. The leader of the group with which I have the honour to be associated pressed for that, and others have pressed for the definition of what this plebiscite would contain. The answer given by the Prime Minister is found on page 32 of Hansard:

> When my hon. friend goes on to ask me what I am going to do with respect to any expression of view which may be made by the people in connection with any reference which will be made to them, may I say to him that in seeking to get relief from past commitments I am not going to begin by making new and fresh commitments. In seeking freedom on the part of the ministry I am not going to start in by seeking to tie my own hands.

Later on the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 60:

> May I add that such attitude as I shall take at the time will be taken in the light of all the circumstances as I may know them as a member of the government, and of all conditions as I know them in regard to this country and, as far as I am able to know something about them, conditions in other countries as well.

This, with some more words, was the answer to a request for more explicit information and direction on this plebiscite. This evasion of responsibility is not acceptable to the voters of my constituency, and I do not believe it is acceptable to the voters of many parts of Canada. It seems to me the Prime Minister is following public opinion entirely, following and listening to see what the effect of his pronouncements may be, without giving the leadership desired in this hour of crisis. I am sure that has been made manifest in the press throughout the country.

I state here publicly that at least one thousand of my constituents have sent me individual messages of protest. Collective groups comprising 75 to 100 signatures each have also sent me communications in considerable number. I have received thirty or more resolutions from municipal councils, service clubs, church organizations and all kinds of kindred groups, which totalled up would represent at least two or three thousand names. These people have protested most definitely against the vagueness of the language used by the Prime Minister in referring to the plebiscite and what he proposes to place before the people at this time.

They urge a complete and total war effort. They urge compulsory selective service, and in no uncertain words they tell me what my duty is as a member of this parliament, sent here as their representative. I am urged to do all in my power to prevent a plebiscite being taken. The reasons given by them, in which I entirely concur, are that the saving of time and money in this hour are essential. I voice, therefore, the opinions of my electors as expressed in the messages they have sent me. And what is more, as a member of this parliament, in making these utterances I am prepared to take my full share of responsibility to see that they are carried out.

I must in fairness say that I received one message, signed by one individual only, said to be representing an executive group, but from an organization I have not heard of before, endorsing the plebiscite but definitely calling for compulsory selective service. That is the extent to which the hundreds, yes, thousands of messages that have reached me approve of this plebiscite. I am urged to do everything I can to put a stop to what they call putting square pegs in round holes in this war effort. I am urged by returned soldier organizations to get more fully behind the thousands of lads who have gone overseas, to make definitely sure that reinforcements will be provided in the hour of need. I am quite sure that other hon. members have received similar communications from returned soldier organizations.

These organizations point out the need of trained recruits. They point out the necessity that might arise following such tragedies as Hong Kong, Dunkirk, Greece and Crete, and all these disasters that have been referred to by other speakers. Who knows, they say, when the next demand may come? We may have to go to Alaska or points close to Canada.

In this connection I think we as members of this house must have appreciated the observations made here by hon. members from British Columbia as to the critical situation there. We cannot be unmindful of the words of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) when he pointed out the position our troops would be in if overnight the treacherous Japs were to strike in the dark, perhaps on the shores of Alaska. What would be our position if we had to go to our armed forces and pick out the men who could leave Canada from those who could not go? This has been brought to our attention by messages received from returned soldiers' organizations in my city. If on the other hand Vancouver turned out to be the vulnerable point, how quickly could United States forces respond to our help? I plead with this government to see that we are placed in the same position as the armies of the United States so that we can give one hundred per cent support whether it be in our own Canada or on shores perhaps not too far distant—yes, even in the remotest parts of the world.

I was home over the week-end, Mr. Speaker, and during that time I received a great many telephone calls; in fact the wires on my telephone were almost burning up.

An hon. MEMBER: Too bad they didn't.

Mr. LOCKHART: Too bad they didn't? Perhaps the hon. member who interjected that remark had better go home himself. That is just another example of the cheap performance we hear in this house all too frequently.

I was repeatedly asked if I would define the proposed plebiscite. Among the questions I was asked was this: Is there any commitment, or what is the commitment, as to what will be done following the taking of the plebiscite? Many people told me they were sick and tired of the delay in parliament and were not even going out to vote. That is something I greatly deplore, that the electors should be placed in the position of not being sufficiently interested or informed to exercise their franchise. But the onus for that situation rests entirely upon the Prime Minister and this government.

What could I reply to that question? I could only read the Prime Minister's evasive words in response to direct inquiries. Then I was frequently asked another question, which I commend to the attention of the hon. member who interrupted me a moment ago and to other hon. members who were so vociferous in their applause following the address of the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Fraser). I was asked: When this vague proposition was presented to parliament, was the press report correct in stating that about 175 supporters of the government in this chamber supported the proposal and applauded to the housetops? I had to say that the answer was yes.

I cannot pass on without making a brief reference to the courageous stand afterwards taken by a few hon. members opposite, who seemed to feel that their responsibility was not limited to applause, but who felt they should express their individual views and the views of the people whom they represent. I want to pay my tribute to those hon. members who had the courage of their convictions.

Inquiries came to me from the adjoining constituency, the county of Welland, which is so much in the limelight to-day. The late esteemed member for that constituency was elected to this house by one of the larger majorities that returned this government to power. He was very well thought of, and we regret his passing. But that majority now is split asunder. The plebiscite is the only issue in that by-election; and we have seen the nomination of an independent supporter of the Liberal party in protest against the plebiscite. The electors of Welland who were in contact with me over the week-end not only reminded me that the plebiscite had destroyed unity in that part of Canada, but they also directed my attention to other parts of this country. Only to-day I have been in receipt of three or four letters, containing clippings, referring to statements made in Quebec last Tuesday evening by one of the principal speakers campaigning in that province in the interests of the government candidate. I believe these were the words used by Mr. Taschereau, of Quebec:

> There are events happening in Australia at present which more than ever would not only justify Prime Minister King's non-enforcement of conscription for overseas service but which might even oblige him to recall troops now stationed in England.

This clipping was given me by an elector of the constituency of Welland. On the same evening the present Minister of Labour, speaking in Welland, is reported in these words:

He expressed the opinion that the vote of the Canadian people "will relieve Prime Minister King of his non-conscription pledge in the coming plebiscite." Quite plainly the collective responsibility of cabinet ministers, as well as the principle of responsible government, is being scuttled in Canada.

Such was the direction given me by the electors of Welland. The plebiscite is not only causing national disunity in that part of Canada. We recall that in connection with these by-elections there was supposed to be some mutual understanding; new blood was to be brought into this parliament, and that mutual understanding met with more or less general favour. The electors of Welland stated to me that they accepted that principle; and to hon. members of this house I want to say that members of this party more or less accepted it also. As a result no attempt was made by the Conservative party to place anyone in the field to oppose the Minister of Labour. Who is to blame for the upset that has occurred in that county? I ask this house on whose doorstep can be placed the responsibility for causing this disunity. Do not blame it on the Conservative party. Do not blame it on any members from more remote parts of Canada. The responsibility rests with the Prime Minister and his ministers for foisting on the public such a vague proposal as a plebiscite.

What may be the outcome in that by-election no one can say. It was suggested by one gentleman in that county that perhaps even yet the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, who is not at the moment in his seat, may have the opportunity to become Minister of Labour, as has been suggested in this house. In any event, the Prime Minister may yet have to make his selection from the membership of this house, and whom can he thank for the mess he has made? That is what I ask this house.

Then on Saturday evening I crossed into New York state, where I have many friends whom I hold in high esteem and with whom I have had many things in common over a long period of years. I looked up some of them to see what was their view of the present situation, now that a menace has sprung up in the southern Pacific. What were their views? I will try to express them. I found a changed attitude on their part. Yesterday the Minister of Finance quoted an editorial from one of the New York newspapers. Perhaps I might be permitted to quote an editorial from a newspaper published much nearer the Niagara peninsula and the constituency of Welland than the New York Times. The clipping was in the hands of my friends in New York state. When I asked their views, one gentleman produced the clipping which I shall read to the house. He said it expressed their views, and I believe it expresses the views of many people in the United States. This article appeared in the Buffalo Courier-Express in its issue of January 24, 1942. I assume I have the same privilege as was accorded the Minister of Finance; namely, that of reading at length. This is the article:

Announcement by the Earl of Athlone, governor general of Canada, of a plebiscite on raising troops by conscription means that our brothers north of the border have determined to meet squarely their toughest political problem . . . Canada is now faced with the same problem which confronted the United States only a few weeks ago. Our draft law called for the training of men for service within the United States. Pearl Harbour changed all that and congress immediately authorized the use of United States troops in any theatre of war. To-day Canada drafts men, 21 to 24, for full-time defence duties with the active army, and these men, after four months' training period, are posted for home defence duties, releasing volunteers for overseas duty.

The natural question which arises on this side of the border is that if we can do it overnight why does Canada hesitate?

Let me point out that this editorial reflects the feeling of many of my friends in the United States, and a great mass of public opinion in that country.

A full explanation of the political reasons would take this entire page and several succeeding pages, but the answer is always the same—French Canada.

That is what is being said along the border where one of the most bitter by-elections ever fought in the country is being waged. While these spectacles are being enacted, not only in the house but in different parts of Canada we, the elected representatives of our people, sit here and twiddle our thumbs for the next few weeks waiting for some vague plebiscite to decide an important issue. That is the point which strikes me most forcibly. Faced with the same dangers, faced with the same possibilities of attack, why cannot we in the parliament of Canada deal with this matter now, the same as the parliament of Great Britain and other parts of the empire and the United States have done?

Some of my people call it political expediency. Other letters I receive describe it as a political blunder. Others call it lack of leadership. Whatever those opinions are, certainly Canada is being divided over this plebiscite, at a time when more than any other in our history national unity should be our objective.

So, Mr. Speaker, I say that while we twiddle our thumbs the voice of parliament is still. We go on with this spectacle. Let me urge hon. members to frown on all this cheap political—

Mr. MacNICOL: Burlesque.

Mr. LOCKHART: Yes, burlesque, if you wish to call it that, which is so evident in the house.

We are faced with a desperate situation. Let me say a word at this point about the effect of national compulsory service on the farmers, a subject which has had some consideration in the house. Let me give a specific example which indicates the extent of the problem in my section of the country. One man came to me recently and told me that he had just returned from one of the largest food processing factories in that vicinity. The manager of the plant had asked this farmer to sign again this year the contract he had signed in past years calling for the production of certain lines of foodstuffs. The man said to me, "I visited that factory about three weeks ago, and learned that I had to buy five tons of a particular type of fertilizer, involving an investment of considerable money. When I came home my only son met me at the door and produced a notice to serve in the army." The father was in a dilemma. On the following morning he and his boy drove to Toronto to discuss the matter with the regional director. The result of their trip was nothing but evasion. They were promised a deferment.

I have no doubt other hon. members have heard similar stories. This is not a new problem, and I could give many other examples. That man urged upon me that his only son was needed at home. I told him that he might obtain a deferment, but he would have to use his own judgment. The man said to me, "The manager of the processing plant is urging me to take this contract, but I cannot sign it if my son is to be taken."

The time has come when each one of us in Canada must be told what he is to do and how he is to do it. The farmer must be told what he is to produce, and he must be given guarantee that at least an only son will be left to help carry through his obligation to produce for Great Britain and our lads overseas.

I shall not detain the house, but when hon. members discuss these matters with their constituents, and when they learn about the chaos in the present set-up, surely they should stand in their places and tell the house that we must have selective service of every man and woman in Canada. Every industry and every resource must be mobilized in the most effective way—and now. Evidence of that is apparent on every side. And so I ask: Why do we delay? Canada is one of the granaries of the world. We have become one of the chief sources of supply of foodstuffs for Great Britain. We have become one of the main sources of supply for those thousands of our boys who have gone overseas. A clear, comprehensive and constructive policy must be given to the farmers by the government, and given without delay.

I pass on. Thinking back over the references which have been made in this house I realize that there are many hon. members who are too ready to dig up dead horses. They have been ready to go back into the history of the last war and attempt to discredit the public life of men some of whom have long been dead. They bring in all kinds of inferences which have no bearing upon the crisis which now confronts us. I urge hon. members to cease this idle twaddle; let us get down to present realities and accomplish something. When the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon) was making his defence of the plebiscite he told us what he thought of compulsory service two years ago. We know how the President of the United States was swept into power; we know that a few weeks afterwards he went to congress without any plebiscite and said that he must have compulsory service in every part of the world where the enemy might be met.

Why can we not have the same thing in this country? That is what I am urging should be done. We read the newspapers, we know what is happening, we realize the possibilities in Australia and we see the reverses that our armed forces are encountering. Surely the crisis is just as great now. Why should we sit here and talk idly about technicalities or make inferences which have no bearing upon the present emergency?

The Prime Minister must give some thought to the definite demand in this country for compulsory selective service. Let us try to guide him; let us tell him the views of our own people on this matter. That is my duty this afternoon, to try to show him exactly what my own constituents are saying. We should not have any differences of opinion about this, because that is all it amounts to in connection with this plebiscite. It is just a case of one man thinking one thing, and another man thinking something else. But it has created a lot of disunity. If the elected representatives of the people would deal with this question here in the house I believe it could be settled just as well as it will be three months, six months or a year hence. The men who are now overseas are demanding it. Surely all hon. members are receiving letters daily urging that this action be taken, demanding it. These men are wondering, if they have to go to Hong Kong or some such place, whether there will be somebody to step in should they have to make the supreme sacrifice. I say this advisedly because I am receiving scores of letters from overseas.

There is only one important step to be taken—compulsory selective service. What have we in Canada to-day? Industry has been regimented and our money has been conscripted. You may call it what you like, but the fact is that it is being taken from us. Our young men were called up for thirty days' training and they had to go. That training was found to be totally inadequate; some people made what was termed a "war shout" over the cost, and then young men were called for four months. That also proved entirely inadequate for the situation which was becoming more acute. The defence of our own shores began to loom up, and these men were then called in for the duration of the war. Call it conscription if you like, but it is compulsory selective service. They had to serve.

There is only one more step we need to take in this parliament. Instead of calling for service in Canada, we should call for service anywhere in the world. We should not be frightened about compulsory service. The only difference is as to where we have to serve. I am not afraid of its being said that I have been conscripted. I am prepared to assume whatever share of the burden I am asked to take. Those who are overseas are calling for assistance, and there is just one more step which the Prime Minister and this government have to take in order that we may have all-out compulsory selective service. Why hesitate any longer?

We are in the midst of a mad race for supremacy with a ruthless enemy. I think that must be conceded. Let us stop pussyfooting in this parliament which is supposed to be the last word in directing this country. The world is looking upon us at this time, with parliament in session, to give some kind of lead and not play for political positions, not trifle with the great questions that confront us. Never before to my knowledge has there been such a demand upon the courage of men, that they act like men. Surely we have an example in the men who have gone overseas. They stand out because of their courageous action. We, the elected representatives of this country, must have the courage of our convictions. I say again that it is a race for supremacy, the supremacy of all that is right and decent. This supremacy cannot be won if we do not strain our resources to the last ounce. Otherwise we may lose. That is the tragedy with which we are confronted. That is what may happen if we do not measure up, if we are not courageous.

I urge upon the government, I urge upon the Prime Minister as leader of the government, as leader of the war time cabinet, that these possibilities be seriously considered. I urge upon him that he come frankly before parliament and place upon every hon. member the responsibility of doing his duty. In this race he holds the starter's pistol. If he pulls the trigger, we have to go. I say to hon. members: if the Prime Minister will just pull the trigger, let every one of us go to the last ounce of our strength before it is too late.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it is with much diffidence that I rise to take part in this debate. The issues confronting us are so many and so complex and the war itself is on such a world-wide scale that it is next to impossible for the human mind to grasp its full extent and implications. But this much I think is clear. We know much better to-day than we did two years ago, or in September, 1939, who our enemies and who our friends are. Yet as I go among the people I find that there are many things which are not clear to them, and some of these will, I believe, have to be clarified before we get a full war effort.

We are being told by the radio, the press, the churches and a hundred and one other agencies that we are fighting for freedom, for liberty and for democracy. Yet we can see every day that there is a never-ceasing struggle, and sometimes I think a losing struggle, carried on in our midst during this time of war. Instead of class conflict becoming less as we prepare to meet increasing difficulties, it is becoming more intense and more bitter. As anti-social employers gloat over victories gained over their workers, with the assistance of a servile and anti-labour government, smouldering bitterness grows in the hearts and souls of beaten and sullen workers. These are some of the important issues in this war, and they are some of the issues that are preventing us from getting a full war effort. As I shall show before I finish, the government of to-day not only has ignored labour, but is fastening more and more tightly the shackles of big business control on the people of this country. The speech from the throne says that this is no ordinary war but a conflict between irreconcilable forces. The government uses these words but seemingly does not understand them. Cannot the members of this government see that the very same conflict is going on in miniature in our very midst? If, however, they do see it, are they doing anything to remove the causes of that conflict in order to leave us more free to fight the common enemy?

I think, Mr. Speaker, we shall have to realize, before we fully understand the nature of this war, that it did not begin in September, 1939, and also that it is, as the speech from the throne says, more than an ordinary war; it is a world revolution. This war began in January, 1933, with the destruction of the German trade unions and socialist parties by Hitler. It was continued and has continued on a score of different fronts, and in a thousand different ways, before Poland was invaded in September, 1939. It was continued by the destruction of the Vienna socialists in 1934; it was continued in 1936 and 1937 and 1938 in Spain, as the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont., (Mr. Fraser), already pointed out this afternoon. In Spain the women and children of Madrid, Barcelona and Burgos were bombed by the war planes of Hitler and Mussolini, and we helped them destroy the loyalist government of that country. I remember speaking in this house on May 26, 1938—and what the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont., said to-day brought it to my mind—and I tried to get parliament to reverse the attitude which this government had taken in the Spanish civil war. But no one cared. I should like to read a few words of what I said on that occasion. It is important now because the democracies could just as easily have had a democratic Spain as they have a fascist Spain. I said as reported at page 3246 of Hansard of May 26, 1938:

> I am going to confine my remarks to one aspect of our foreign policy which seems to me to transcend all other aspects, even at this time when we are beset on all sides with questions of very great import. I refer to our policy with regard to Spain. To me our policy in connection with the Spanish situation has been and is devoid of every semblance of equity, justice, fairness or the application of international law.

I do not wish to quote more, but that much was apparent then. I pointed out that the result of our policy would be that either fascism or communism would become dominant in Spain. I have often wondered how some of the members of the cabinet of that day could stay in the cabinet—the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), for instance, or the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie)—realizing as they must have done what the consequences of the policy they were endorsing would be. I may come back, if I have time, to the question of the labour policy of the government.

First, however, I want to say something with regard to the plebiscite. The announcement of the plebiscite is the most important item in the speech from the throne. For myself I am not finding fault with the principle of referring matters to the people for an expression of opinion, but in referring such matters to a popular vote there are, it seems to me, two essential requirements before an intelligent verdict can be given or expected: (1) there must be a clear-cut question which can be answered yes or no and from which predictable results will follow, having regard to the popular decision; (2) the people who are to decide must have reliable information on which to form an opinion. In the proposed plebiscite the first essential consideration is missing, and, so far, there is no indication that the people will get reliable information as to the need or otherwise of compulsory military service for overseas.

No member of the government, as far as I know, has yet said that compulsory military service for overseas is urgently needed or that it is not needed. I was not in the house when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke on January 26, but I have read his speech with great care. It is a good speech until he begins to deal with the matter of the plebiscite. I admit that he has made a good case for a reference to the people, but he has not made a case for the kind of reference proposed—and I reiterate that my objection is not to the principle of a plebiscite even in times of national crisis. My objection is based on the fact that the question to be placed before the people, on which they will be asked to vote, is not the straight question yes or no on conscription, the only question at issue at this time. The question on which the people will be asked to vote was stated by the Prime Minister and has been read in this house a number of times. It is this:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, in all sincerity that that is not a proper question to put before the people of Canada at this time. There is only one matter on which the government feels its hands tied. The government, if it wants to be released, should ask for release without any beating about the bush. A vote taken on the question proposed will in some parts of Canada be a vote on conscription; in other parts of Canada it will not be a vote on conscription. It will depend in what part of the country one happens to be. In places where sentiment is favourable to conscription, people will be told that a favourable vote will result in the government introducing a conscription bill; in parts of the country where there is opposition to conscription, the people will be told that a favourable vote will not mean conscription. The premier of Quebec, as well as other speakers in that province, has already stated that a favourable vote will not be followed by conscription.

This plebiscite, then, is neither fish, flesh nor fowl, but it is a good red herring. It is about as clever—or as clumsy, whichever term you choose to use—a piece of subterfuge as has ever been perpetrated upon a people.

During the past two months the acting leader of this group and I have crossed this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We stopped at all the larger centres of population and at some not so large. We met and spoke with thousands of people in all walks of life. I think we are both convinced that the people are more ready for conscription to-day, if it is necessary, than they were for the declaration of war in September, 1939. I say that they are more ready, but I say it with a proviso. They are ready provided it is not only conscription of flesh and blood, but also conscription of the amassed wealth, industrial capital and financial resources of the country as well. They want an all-out war effort with all the resources which the people of Canada possess.

The fathers and mothers of the youth of Canada are not prepared to sacrifice their sons to safeguard the wealth and special privileges of the Crabtrees, the MacMillan's and the McLean's, who already own too much of Canada for Canada's good. Indeed, the Canadian people are disturbed over the complete control of the economic life of the country which has been given since the war began to these exploiters by the Prime Minister and his cabinet.

The group with which I sit are, as we have already stated, in favour of a vote on the clear issue of conscription, because we believe it is the real issue confronting the people of Canada to-day. We favour a vote on two questions: (a) conscription of man-power; (b) conscription of material resources, industry and finance. If both questions were given to the people for endorsation or rejection, I feel convinced that they would approve both provided they were told it was necessary.

The Prime Minister in his speech said that there were three ways by which the government could seek release from past commitments—with respect to the methods of raising men for military service: (1) a general election; (2) a referendum on conscription; (3) a plebiscite in which the government would ask for release from past promises. Two of the means mentioned by the Prime Minister are, in my opinion, clear and definite, namely, a general election or a referendum on conscription. The third means, a plebiscite, woolled up in words, is not clear, and true to form, it is the means by which the Prime Minister asks the people to decide. He asks them to decide without furnishing them with the information necessary to an intelligent expression of opinion.

The Prime Minister rejects the idea of a general election, although he admits that conscription would be the main issue, but other issues might enter. He rejects the idea of a referendum because the vote would be a definite vote on conscription. He rejects the one because it would not be clear; he rejects the other because it would be clear. It does not seem to me to make sense. I think, really, it is juggling with an important issue, and that is not desirable at this time.

The Prime Minister knows, as every member of this house knows, that only one commitment or reservation was made with regard to military service, namely, that there would be no conscription for overseas service. That reservation, surely, was based upon conditions as they existed in Canada at the beginning of the war; but if those conditions do not apply to-day—and the Prime Minister indicated in his speech that they do not apply—it is the duty of the Prime Minister and his ministers boldly and clearly to tell the house and the people of Canada what the real situation is. There is no other way by which either members of parliament or the people of Canada can make wise decisions. Let us then be done with this humbug. Let the people of Canada decide whether they want conscription for overseas service and also whether they want effective conscription of industry, accumulated wealth and finance for an all-out war effort.

I wish to make brief reference to our situation on the Pacific coast because of recent happenings. The question has already been covered fairly well by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and also the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). Three main questions are disturbing the people there. The first is, Are the defences on the Pacific coast adequate? I do not know; I imagine no one here knows. But I support the suggestion made by the hon. member for New Westminster the other day, that the government should ask General McNaughton, who is now in Canada, to go to the Pacific coast and make a thorough inspection of the defences there. I am sure that because of the knowledge he must have of the defences built in Great Britain, he will be able to advise the military authorities and the government here wisely.

Another question that is disturbing the minds of the people on the Pacific coast is the question of Japanese nationals and Canadian Japanese. I have made some investigations on my own behalf of what the government has done and is doing in that connection. I am satisfied that the government has the situation in hand. We must always keep in mind that most of the Japanese in British Columbia—the people of Japanese origin—are not Japanese, they are Canadians. Today we heard a plea for tolerance for another minority in Canada, a much larger minority, of course. But minorities must be treated fairly not because they are large but because they have certain rights as Canadians. In considering this question we should remember that we are Canadians and that we also are British, and in dealing with minorities we must not adopt the policies either of Japan or of Germany or of any other country that are not as good as ours. I was pleased with the very reasonable way in which the hon. member for New Westminster dealt with this question the other day, and I do not wish to say a word that would take away from the good effect of his speech. But I was rather surprised to hear him put forward as an example of what we should do with the Japanese in British Columbia the fact that the Russians moved a whole population of some 350,000 people to Siberia. Moving people to Siberia is a habit in Russia. The czars moved tens of thousands of people to Siberia, and thousands of them died there.

Mr. REID: For the protection and safeguarding of the state.

Mr. MacINNIS: It was always for the protection of the state.

An hon. MEMBER: For the protection of the czar.

Mr. MacINNIS: The czar moved them for the protection of the state, but we cannot save the state by means like that. We save the state by justice or we do not save it. As an hon. member suggests, it is not worth saving if we cannot save it in that way.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

I have as I say discussed this matter with the people in charge. After discussing it with the Royal Canadian Mounted police, I am inclined to think better of the government, because I have a feeling that a police force can never be better than the government which directs it, and I am satisfied with the attitude taken by the Royal Canadian Mounted police with regard to our Canadian Japanese.

Then there is the question of air raid precautions. I agree with what the hon. member for Vancouver South said in that regard. I believe that while to a large extent this work may be done by civilians, the government must furnish the larger direction and also the funds to provide the equipment. I do not believe that is being done at the present time. In fact I believe it is in a very bad muddle indeed.

I now wish to turn to labour matters which I referred to in my opening remarks. I have been trying, trying, trying for the past two years to get this government to take a democratic attitude towards labour. And I have failed. The situation is getting worse. I am going to try now, and I believe I can convince even hon. members opposite that the situation is getting worse. The hon. member for Edmonton East (Mrs. Casselman) asked yesterday, when the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) was speaking, if we would not consider the appointment of the new Minister of Labour as something on the credit side of the ledger as far as the government's attitude toward labour is concerned. I am going to try to give this house a picture of what about two months' administration of the Department of Labour under the new minister amounts to. I regret to have to do it, but I do it because there is no other way by which the people concerned can get access to the government of this country. They are double-crossed by the Department of Labour, and they cannot get access to the Prime Minister.

For lack of understanding of working-class needs, and for the most colossal ineptitude in dealing with labour problems, I thought the former Minister of Labour was in a class by himself; I thought he had no equal. But without being yet long enough in office to be elected to parliament, I believe the new minister has already shattered the record of my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) in the Department of Labour for doing the wrong thing at the wrong time.

I shall submit to this house two cases and let hon. members decide for themselves as to the fitness not only of the new Minister of Labour to hold that office, but also as to the rightness of the policy that has been followed by this government.

First, I want to refer to the Kirkland Lake strike. It was referred to yesterday by the hon. member for Cape Breton South. In that strike the miners used every avenue provided by law and usage to get a conference with the employers, but they failed.

I have before me the report of the conciliation board which heard the dispute between the miners and their employers. This is a unanimous report, signed by the chairman, Mr. Justice C. P. McTague, Mr. F. Wilkinson, the member for the employers, and Mr. J. L. Cohen, the member for the employees. This board had experience; it had tried previous cases; and in making its report on the Kirkland Lake dispute it quoted some paragraphs from a report which was made by the same persons sitting as a board in another dispute and which appeared in the Labour Gazette of February, 1941, from which I shall read briefly:

> As industry has grown and developed, the right of work people to organize into collective associations or trade unions, and through such organizations to bargain collectively with their employers as to the terms and conditions of their employment, has been increasingly emphasized. It is a right asknowledged by law, by industrial practice, and by public policy. It has been verified by many important public pronouncements.

That is what the miners were asking. Then the report goes on:

> The abstract rights which it is now conceded belong to labour, can only be said to exist in a concrete sense if collective bargaining is practised and collective agreements are concluded.

Then they point out that the employers in the present dispute based their refusal to negotiate with the miners' organization on the fact that its headquarters are in the United States. On that point the board has this to say:

> It is our view that this is an erroneous and illogical approach to the matter. There is no law that we know of that prevents any group of workers from joining an international union and constituting it as bargaining agent. In fact it seems to have been recognized policy for a great number of years to encourage the activities of international unions in Canada. Otherwise it is hard to explain section 2 of the Immigration Act—

I need not give the reference.

> —in force as far back as 1921, placing accredited representatives of international unions entering Canada for the temporary exercise of their calling within the class of persons entitled to entry without restriction.

Then the board continues:

> The problem, if there is a problem, would seem not to consist in discrimination against particular international unions but rather in making sure that international unions, national unions and employers as well, conform to the laws of this country while carrying on their activities here. In this particular matter the board was denied, on account of the course followed by the mine operators, any opportunity to conciliate the differences betwen the parties at all. At a comparatively early stage in the proceedings counsel for the mine operators informed the board that his clients were unalterably opposed to recognizing the union and wished to withdraw from any further participation in the proceedings. Manifestly, the use of such technique makes completely futile the appointment of conciliation boards to deal with questions of recognition.

I have been telling the Minister of Labour and this house that the question of union recognition should not be a matter for conciliation boards. I find now that this board agrees with me. I quote:

> As a matter of fact, it is more than doubtful that the question of union recognition falls within the purview of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act at all. The employment of such a technique, together with a doubt as to jurisdiction under the act, would seem to leave the broad question of collective bargaining to be dealt with by parliament or cabinet council rather than by the old process of conciliation boards under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

This government never hesitates to use an order in council when it wants to do something, but it would not use an order in council to compel those employers to bargain collectively with their employees, according to the principles laid down by the government.

Now, just for a moment, I am going to show the position of the present Minister of Labour with regard to this dispute. On Friday, January 16, there was a meeting of the war labour board, and Mr. Mitchell proposed that this board act as arbitrator in the Kirkland Lake dispute. This proposal was immediately sent to the miners, and it was supposed that it was also sent to the mine operators. The miners dealt with the matter on January 18, and informed the minister that they had accepted the proposal. Nothing being heard from the employers after several days, inquiry was made as to what they intended to do. The first reply was that they had not received any proposal at all. Some time later Mr. Mitchell sent another letter to the miners outlining a proposal altogether different from the one he had submitted formerly, the one they had accepted. I should like to read to the house a few words from a letter written by Mr. Mosher, president of the Canadian Congress of Labour, with which the Kirkland Lake miners are affiliated, just to show exactly what Mr. Mosher thinks of the Minister of Labour, and I think Mr. Mosher is right:

I acknowledge receipt of a copy of your letter of January 21, to Mr. William Simpson, president of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers, local No. 240, Kirkland Lake, and I should like to point out, as I did in my conversation with you yesterday, that I regard the contents of that letter as embodying a proposal which is at variance with that which you requested me to submit to the miners, and which I informed you subsequently had been accepted by them.

Then Mr. Mosher says:

It seems to me that, in the circumstances, I should have been consulted with regard to any change in the original proposal which might be contemplated by you, and that your action in submitting a new proposal direct to the miners was most objectionable from the standpoint of both courtesy and ethics.

It is important that there should be no misunderstanding on the part of the miners or the public in this connection, and I must, in fairness to myself, make the facts known to all concerned.

That is signed by Mr. A. R. Mosher under date of January 24.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I take up another case, affecting another union. The C.I.O., or the unions affiliated with it, may be just as bad as Premier Hepburn says they are; but from what has been said about Premier Hepburn in this house during the last few days by his "friends", perhaps Premier Hepburn's word is not worth much, or is worth just as much as his morals, and that is not very much. The union concerned is an American Federation of Labour affiliate. The facts, however, show the same ignoring of organized labour and the same kowtowing to employers' interests, regardless of whether the head of the Department of Labour is a lawyer, financier or an ex-trade unionist.

In the summer of 1941 the boilermakers and plumbers and steamfitters employed by Morton shipyards in Quebec made application for a board. The board sat and heard both sides in the dispute; but before it had finished its deliberations, the then Minister of Labour, who is now Secretary of State had set up a royal commission to investigate all shipbuilding industries in Ontario and Quebec. Despite the fact that a national labour supply council had been created by the government, and was supposed to be consulted in matters of this kind, the appointment of the royal commission was not referred to it. Three lawyers were appointed to act as commissioners.

Lawyers may be the best sort of people to act on commissions of this kind, but I do not see how lawyers would know so very much about shipbuilding, and the wages of shipyard workers. I do not believe they have much experience in that kind of work. The fact remains, however, that the commission was composed of lawyers.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

The Minister of Labour, Mr. Mitchell, invited Mr. W. J. Coyle representing the boilermakers, and Mr. J. W. Bruce, representing the plumbers and steamfitters working for the Morton yards to come to his office to discuss wages in the Morton shipyards. At that interview wages and bonuses were agreed upon which were acceptable to labour representatives, the Department of Labour and the Department of Munitions and Supply. That is stated in a letter forwarded to Mr. Bruce by Bryce Stewart, Deputy Minister of Labour. The letter is dated December 23, and in it Mr. Stewart suggested that the proposals were made without prejudice to any reference to the national war labour board, in the event of any dissatisfaction. They agreed to vary the findings of the arbitration board, and there was agreement to accept a lower scale—five cents an hour less than the board's award. The representatives, Mr. Bruce and Mr. Coyle, put the proposals before the employees of the Morton shipyards and induced them to accept.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired. Unless there is unanimous consent he cannot continue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. MacINNIS: I shall try to be as brief as possible, and I thank hon. members for permitting me to finish.

Under date of a communication dated December 29, 1941, Mr. Bruce advised the Minister of Labour that the workers concerned had accepted the proposals of the department. Then there is another telegram dated December 31 from the Minister of Labour thanking Mr. Bruce for his wire. In the meantime it appears that there had been consultation with the employers, and that the employers did not like the agreement made by the labour department. The next thing Mr. Bruce and Mr. Coyle learned about the matter was the passing of an order in council on January 26, while the house was in session, repudiating completely the agreement already agreed to by the Minister of Labour, and attaching a new scale of wages and bonuses to the order. Not only that, but the order in council placed the setting of wages in the hands of the Minister of Labour, without reserve.

Order in council P.C. 269, dated January 26, 1942, contains this paragraph:

2. The Minister of Labour is hereby authorized to adjust the basic wage rates for other classifications of employees of the aforesaid shipyards in such relationship to the basic wage rates specified for mechanics and in such amounts as in his opinion, having regard to all the circumstances, are fair and reasonable.

Mr. Bruce then replied in a telegram dated January 29, 1942. I draw the attention of hon. members to the similarity of this wire to the letter from Mr. Mosher which I placed on record. The wire is addressed to the Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, Minister of Labour at Ottawa, and is in these words:

On December 22 you requested vice-president Coyle and myself to come to Ottawa to discuss report of the board of conciliation in the Morton shipyards. After considerable discussion with Deputy Minister Stewart and director of industrial relations Crawford it was agreed, and a proposition submitted to us in writing on December 23, that was to be submitted to the men with rates of wages based on reports of the royal commission on shipyards and other provisions of the report of the board of conciliation would be accepted acting on your suggestion and as a war measure this proposition was submitted to the men with our endorsement and adopted and notification was conveyed to you by telegram from myself under date of December 29. I was considerably surprised to-day to receive word that Morton company had posted notices repudiating our agreement vice-president Coyle informs me that Deputy Minister Stewart has informed him that the department had repudiated the conditions we agreed upon. If this is so without any recognition of our rights or consultation with us is an outrageous and unwarranted violation of our agreement and a breach of faith by a department of government and will warrant the disapproval of the workers throughout the whole dominion and bring the government into disrespect for repudiating a written agreement thereby placing myself and Coyle in a very unsatisfactory position as the men accepted our endorsation in good faith. We would appreciate some explanation of the situation.

No explanation was given. Is the Prime Minister going to stand for that sort of thing in the Department of Labour? Does he agree with that kind of double-crossing by his ministers? If he does not, then he had better clean house in the Department of Labour.

As matters stand to-day, wages are regulated by order in council. The government which in 1940 put itself on record as favouring collective bargaining has virtually abolished collective bargaining. Order in council P.C. 8253 abolished the previous order in council P.C. 7440, which recognized collective bargaining. Under order in council P.C. 8253 a national war labour board was set up, with an elaborate system of regional boards. Before this system had properly begun to function, the government abolished—in this case at any rate—the manner of appeal for which they had made provision.

This is a matter that calls for the condemnation of every member of this house. Unless we are able to deal with the small matters at home, we should stop trying to bring a better world into being, because we cannot do it.

He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much; and he that is unjust in the least is unjust also in much.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) absolved all lawyers from any special knowledge of labour problems, and I shall take that as my excuse for not following him in the remarks I am going to make. I should like, however, to refer to another lawyer who addressed this house yesterday, making a magnificent speech that appealed to hon. members in all parts of the house as well as to thousands and thousands of Canadians in every province of Canada. It is exceedingly difficult to follow him with any speech this afternoon. In showing his love of Canada the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) took us right back to the beginning of this debate, which was opened by two hon. members who also showed a similar love of our country.

I am glad to add my quota of congratulations to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) upon opening this debate. They are two of the most popular and respected members of the house, and their speeches were worthy of them. One is of French descent from my own province of Quebec; the other is of Scotch descent from the province of Ontario, but they both spoke only as Canadians. In love of their country, in devotion to its service, in appreciation of its problems they are second to none in this house. They are representative of the great body of Canadians who stand between the two extremes referred to yesterday by the Minister of Finance. One extreme may be said to be represented by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), and the other by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe). The one appears to want conscription for overseas service no matter what it costs; the other appears to want no conscription for overseas service no matter what it costs. There is no hope for the unity or for the future or safety of Canada in either of them.

In what I have to say I hope to follow the hon. member for Hull and the hon. member for Brantford City and speak as a Canadian calling to all of Canada. I must do that because the constituency I represent is made up of people of every race and every station in life. It may be expected that the census of last year will show that Canada is less Anglo-Saxon than the United States. Every day in the week I am reminded that thirty per cent of the population are of French origin and twenty per cent are of neither French nor British origin. I am reminded that the one bond we have in common is our attachment to Canada, that we can make that bond as strong and no stronger than we preserve our unity and show our love for our country.

This debate is taking place at the most crucial time in the history of the world and of our country. It is in the minds of everyone that we should do our utmost to see that our country puts forth its greatest effort at this time, so that in cooperation with our allies we may defeat Hitler and Japan as soon as possible and gain the opportunity to work for a better world. I would have thought that this discussion would fall under three heads, that we would have discussed what we have done, what more we can do and how best we can do it. But there has been little criticism from any opposition group as to what we have done, and there has been even less suggestion as to what we should do. The Conservative opposition in the house and the mixed opposition outside the house have concentrated their attention upon how we should do one particular thing in our war effort, namely, the method of raising men for overseas service. They say that we should have conscription now. Why now? Because, they say, voluntary recruiting has failed. Because they want conscription now, they do not want a plebiscite. I shall have something more to say about the position taken by the opposition groups, but I should like to start my contribution to this debate at the right end and refer to what we have done and what we propose to do.

What have we done? One would think that at this time there would be no need to refer to what we have done, that it would no longer be necessary to tell the Canadian people of the effort that has been put forth by our country. However, the campaign of unlimited detraction that has been carried on makes it necessary that we should go over this again and again so that there may be no misunderstanding on the part of the public about it.

Canada with a population of eleven and a half million people probably has a higher man-power overhead than any other country in the world. By man-power overhead I mean that we have proportionately more people engaged in transportation and other essential services necessary to keep the country going. With our population we have to carry on the services of a country equal in area to the United States but with only one-eleventh of its population. Despite that, to-day Canada's fighting forces total over 400,000 men who have enlisted voluntarily for service anywhere in the world. We have four divisions in England, with over 100,000 in the army alone. We are told that in equipment, training, physique and morale they will stand comparison with any other armed force in any part of the world. They stand at the place of honour in Great Britain to-day.

We are more than glad to welcome back to our shores this week their gallant commander Lieutenant-General A. G. L. McNaughton, and to congratulate him upon his recovery from an illness due entirely to overwork in our cause. In his message to the troops under his command on the second anniversary of the arrival in December, 1939, of the leading elements of the first division, General McNaughton said:

> It now is two years since leading elements of the Canadian army arrived in this country. The equipment and training of these formations was completed and since then a steadily increasing force has been held ready for any service which might be required; meanwhile other forces have been organized by Canada and dispatched to the far east and to our own western shore, now menaced by a new foe.
> So far it has been our principal duty to stand guard in these islands. We recognize the need for this decision for, with the enemy's hordes within a few short miles of this vital centre of civilization, the reason is evident to all.
>
> Nevertheless, through long months on watch and in repeated routine training there have been many disappointments at action deferred and great patience has been required. It has been given without complaint and I count it a privilege and a satisfaction to be able to say so and to thank all ranks for the steady purpose and acceptance of conditions which they have shown.
>
> On behalf of all our force I thank the people of Britain also for their continued hospitality and friendliness, which have done so much to ease our path.
>
> From a very small beginning the Canadian army has now grown to many tens of thousands of men and women. New units and formations and reserves have come to us as quickly as ships could be found to bring them here, and as they have arrived the organization of our military headquarters, reinforcement units, hospitals, schools, repair establishments and many other needed facilities have been pressed forward; meanwhile our engineer and signal and forestry corps have made their contribution to the life and welfare of the community.
> Throughout this long period of preparation which circumstances has given us, the corps, divisions, armoured formations and other field units have been completed in equipment and trained together and with squadrons of the Royal Canadian Air Force assigned to army cooperation. These tasks have been pursued with unrelaxed attention and the whole has been made ready for decisive employment when the opportunity comes to take full effect on the enemy.
> That the future holds great difficulties and dangers and much hardship there is no doubt, but we go forward firm in our confidence in the ultimate result—the triumph of justice and right over the dark forces of evil which oppose us.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the house should have that message, and I count it a privilege to be allowed to read it to the house and put it on Hansard because, when in the last war General McNaughton was placed in command of the Canadian Corps heavy artillery, I was serving in one of the batteries under his command as a non-commissioned officer. The hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman), the Conservative whip, who was in the same unit with me will remember that General McNaughton was a fighting general. He was appointed a general at the age of thirty-one. He gained distinction as no other man on the western front did for work as an artillery officer. I am glad now, not only to welcome him back to Canada and to put before the house his fine message, but also to wish him and the forces he commands all possible success in whatever lies ahead.

I was speaking of our army in Britain. In addition to the men outside Canada, we have on the strength in Canada certainly over 150,000 men in the army alone, enlisted for voluntary service anywhere in the world; and including the air force and the navy we must have in Canada alone well over a quarter of a million men enlisted for service anywhere in the world. In the navy we have 28,000 sailors in 350 ships helping to keep the seas open. The air force has over 100,000 men in more than 100 establishments, producing thousands of air fighters a month to keep the planes in action in the air over the enemy. The air training plan has cost us more than the Canadian Pacific railway. It is a major factor in the war and a magnificent achievement.

Few people in this house and few people in Canada realize that in eight months we have increased our armed forces, voluntarily enlisted for service anywhere, by more than sixty-six per cent. Men have enlisted in that period for all the services at an average of 20,000 a month, and that, it may be noted, is more than the average for the whole war, so the last eight months are better than the previous period. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) announced in the house last week that January showed recruits for the army alone of 11,000 men, which I think would make January one of the very best recruiting months since the outbreak of the war.

There is no shortage of recruits for the navy. There is no shortage of recruits for the air force. Canadian boys do not lack courage, and they want action. For this and other reasons recruiting for the army did not compare as well during some months at various periods; but during the last few months, with the dastardly attack of Japan on Pearl Harbour and the possibility of action, recruiting has picked up, and I would not be surprised to learn that January will be among the best months since the outbreak of the war.

Men have been discharged at the rate of about 1,500 a month. But that wastage has been more than made up. Reinforcements have been built up in England and in Canada. The fact that we have only about 15,000 men called up for service in Canada for the duration of the war indicates that we are getting all the volunteers that we can equip and train at the present time.

I have spent a moment or two on the subject of our accomplishments with regard to the armed services. Think of what has been done in agriculture. Despite the loss of probably 150,000 farmers and farm labourers to the armed forces and to munitions work, the farmers of Canada have produced three-quarters of a billion pounds of bacon, two hundred million pounds of cheese and immense quantities of other foods for Britain. We have sent all the food that ships can be found to carry.

In thousands of factories, over six hundred thousand workers are producing planes and guns and shells and tanks, practically the whole equipment of an infantry division every six weeks. We are equipping our own forces and also equipping five times as many more.

Of course there are occasional shortages. Everybody has had the experience of going to a departmental store and finding that they are out of something. Our guns and planes and equipment are sent to the places where they will do the most good. A shortage in a training camp in Canada may be caused by equipment having been sent closer to the firing line, where it should be sent. I remember in the last war, after four months of service in Canada, we had not seen a firing weapon of any kind, and we were four months in service in England before we saw a modern gun. To-day we are sending munitions to every corner of the world.

The changed character of the war is shown most dramatically in motor vehicles. In the last war we had 153 motor vehicles for a division compared with 2,500 in this war, and those 2,500 develop a horse-power of 400,000, equivalent to that used in the city of Toronto. The difference between this war and the last is also shown by the fact that for every fighting man we need a motor vehicle and a fire-power weapon bigger than the rifle. It is a totally different war, and it is high time that all of us realized this.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CLAXTON: When the house rose at six o'clock I was speaking of our war effort and giving some figures. In addition to what I have indicated, we are shipping to Britain all the munitions and food that ships can be found to carry, and we are building the ships too. We are building this year one million tons of cargo ships, about as much as Britain will build herself. We are raising enough money in taxes to meet our own war costs, and this year we are borrowing from the Canadian people a billion and a half dollars to meet ordinary costs of government and the expense of what we are sending to Britain.

This year we are sending to Britain, without receiving payment except by way of a book entry, twice as much as we ever sold to her in any year before; and in proportion to national income or population the tax burden on the Canadian people is comparable with that in Britain to-day.

Mr. Churchill said not long ago that in the twenty-sixth month of the war Britain was employing her resources to a degree that was comparable with what she had accomplished in the forty-ninth month of the last war. In Canada, because our effort is relatively so much greater than it was in the last war, in the twenty-sixth month we are spending at a rate which is nearly ten times as great as it was in the forty-ninth month of the last war, in terms of the same money. This year we are spending on the war nearly twice as much as we spent in the entire period from 1914 to 1918, and we are getting more value for our money because the government had the foresight and courage to take steps to stop inflation and prevent profiteering by more drastic measures than had ever been taken before in any democracy.

There have been no disorders in Canada, no sabotage, no panics, no shortages, no scandals and no irretrievable mistakes. Canadian industry, Canadian labour and Canadian organizing skill have been equal to every challenge. It has been an orderly, steady march even though it has had no brass band. We have every reason to be proud of our achievement; we would have every reason to be dissatisfied if it stopped there.

So I come to the second head, namely, what it is proposed to do to-day, what policy or plan the government has laid out for the future. This was indicated in the speech from the throne and in the Prime Minister's speech. We are to have a Canadian army of two corps, one of three infantry divisions and two tank brigades, while the other corps will consist of two armoured divisions. The army will be a force of terrific hitting power.

Now, has there been any criticism of this plan in this house? Has there been any other suggestion put forward by the opposition? I have not heard any. They have said that we should have a much larger force—much bigger. How much bigger? We all know the "For God's sake do something" school of criticism, the people who say that we must do more, without saying how it is to be done or indicating what the inevitable limits of anyone's efforts are. They do not say how we can equip and train and reinforce a force in England bigger than an army and, in addition, maintain the air force with recruits at the rate of tens of thousands a year, and a navy and land forces to defend Canada, and supply munitions and food in ever-increasing quantities.

These critics do not strike a balance and say what is possible and what is not possible. They just say they want more, and more, and more. When this kind of pressure is put on, there is danger that we may be stampeded into biting off more than we can chew, stampeded into getting the war effort out of balance, so that we have an army when we have not the men to make the munitions to outfit that army.

The cry for conscription now is based on the assertion that we are not getting sufficient recruits by voluntary methods. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), in his speech, said that he was basing his plea on recruiting statistics, but if you look through his speech you do not see a single sign of anything in the way of recruiting statistics. There is not one there. If the facts and figures given us in the house by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), are true, we do not need conscription to-day because of any shortage of recruits, for the reason that we are getting them in sufficient numbers.

The leader of the opposition quoted speeches made by recruiting officers, and those speeches indicate that recruiting is going on. They do not indicate that recruiting has failed. In recruiting speeches would you expect the recruiting officers to say that they do not need men? They are asking for recruits because they need them, and recruits have been coming forward in adequate numbers. In support of his argument the leader of the opposition cited a comment which Lincoln is reported to have made—and "reported" should be put in quotation marks, because that was the language of the leader of the opposition, which will be found at page 25 of Hansard. I ask the leader of the opposition where that reference came from. It begins:

Voluntarism is the unprincipled dodge of cowardly politicians.

This language has been used in a number of newspapers, the first reference to it having been found in the Canadian Airman; and when we tried to track it down we found that the man who had written the article had lost his notes. I have in my hand a letter from the library of congress indicating that the most careful search has been made of Lincoln's speeches, correspondence and books, and there is no reference to any such statement in anything that Lincoln ever said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That does not detract from the logic of the statement just the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Synthetic logic.

Mr. CLAXTON: Let me, however, quote words that Lincoln did use in 1863. He said:

It is the people who in the end must decide.

The question of how Canadians are to deal with this matter is one for Canadians; and references, whether accurate or inaccurate, to what Lincoln said or may not have said in 1863 have not much significance for us to-day. We have to tackle this question as a Canadian question, and that is the way we are doing it.

The problem of conscription has hung like a cloud over Canada for twenty-five years, and the government is making an effort to remove the shadow of that cloud from Canada, to remove the method of raising men for overseas service from the emotional entanglements in which it has become involved. To accomplish this, the government proposes to ask the people in a plebiscite one question:

Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

It is said and said rightly that the mandate given to the government in the election of 1940 was a mandate to carry on the war. But that mandate was subject to the limitation, to the restriction made expressly by every leader of every party, that there would be no conscription for overseas service. The object of the plebiscite is to remove the limitation and restore responsible government. If the answer to the plebiscite is "yes", the question of the best method of recruiting our soldiers for service anywhere may be placed before parliament, free from any shackles should the question arise.

It is asserted that in resorting to a plebiscite the government is denying responsible government. The government say that the place to decide the question how to raise man-power is in parliament. It is not evading responsibility, but is asking for more responsibility.

The hon. member for Vancouver East said the question should be put in the form: Are you in favour of conscription? But that would be an abnegation of responsible government. Here we are seeking to be released from the pledge; nothing more.

The most extraordinary line of argument taken by the opposition and others outside the house is that we should not have given these pledges.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLAXTON: I hear someone say "Hear, hear." I ask hon. members to go back to the outbreak of the war. We have already heard references to that and to what happened then, made by the Prime Minister and others in their speeches. I ask hon. members to go on a step to the Quebec election of October, 1939. I ask them to put themselves in the position they were in then when Mr. Duplessis called an election for the purpose of testing whether or not the province of Quebec would cooperate fully in the war; I ask them to think with what relief they heard that the late Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin) and the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) were going to Quebec to fight out there the issue whether or not Quebec would fully cooperate in the war. Was there a word of protest heard throughout the land when Mr. Lapointe gave pledges and repeated the pledges already given? Was any person or any newspaper heard to say that he was wrong? And that was the same Lapointe who in a speech that I heard myself at the Montreal Forum on October 21, 1939, speaking to an audience that was almost entirely French-speaking, said:

In this campaign I am defending Canada, I am defending the future of our country, I am defending the future of my children and yours.

Je cherche à défendre, à maintenir, à soutenir, l'œuvre de Cartier et de Macdonald.

And switching into English he said:

I am trying to defend, to maintain, to uphold the work of Cartier and Macdonald. We want to preserve their work. We want to make this a great nation inhabited by a united people.

The crowd rose as one man. The election was won; every man in Canada was glad. I hold in my hand clippings from newspapers from end to end of Canada; every one of them was more than relieved. The Ottawa Journal said:

Let us accept it as a great healing, a healing of prejudices wherever they may live.

Not a word that Lapointe was wrong. The Winnipeg Tribune began its editorial with "O Canada" in French and English, and it said:

> Mr. Lapointe is the man of the hour. . . . If he were to die to-morrow he would be ranked, along with Laurier, among the greatest of Canadians.

The greatest monument to his memory is the contribution he made to Canada's unity and to Canada's cause in the last two years of his life. Are we now going back on that word? Are we going back on the series of most solemn promises ever given to any electorate? Some people say we should, that our word should be broken. In another place it was said:

> Their pledge is no more important than others that have been given in the past in election time and thrown into the scrap basket immediately after.

Can we break faith? How can the electors of Canada believe anything said by these people who now urge that such a solemn pledge should be broken? They do not trust the people, and the people will not trust them.

Conscription is no ordinary question. It is difficult to explain it to English-speaking Canadians from outside Quebec. It is no ordinary question; there is no other question in Canadian life that has been anything like this in the history of Canada. And the reasons are very difficult to explain; they go back three hundred years. For three hundred years the citizens of Quebec have been isolated; they have had to fight for their survival; they have had to fight their environment, and at times the fight has been bitter, made bitter often by the people they had to fight to preserve their integrity. They are a different race. It is exceedingly difficult to explain how they feel about a question like this, particularly to a Conservative opposition that has not a single French-Canadian member in it. I could go back to 1917; I could go in detail through the terrible history of those years—

Mr. CASSELMAN: I would not suggest that.

Mr. CLAXTON: —if it were not for the fact that then I would be accused of raising passions and prejudice.

Mr. CASSELMAN: What else would you be doing?

Mr. CLAXTON: I would be disclosing what happened.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the things you have kept alive ever since.

Mr. CLAXTON: What are they trying to do? They are trying to get us to break our pledges in the same way they broke their pledges in 1917. If the government broke its pledges now, who would believe a politician again? Who would believe a political leader again? People have faith in their leaders if their leaders keep faith with them.

Mr. MacNICOL: "Politician" is right.

Mr. CLAXTON: It looks sometimes as if Hitler and some extremists in Canada want to save us from the horrors of self-government. They talk about the delay in recruiting. Recruiting is going on; I do not believe the people know what the figures are. I have said something about that. But if there were conscription to-day, how many more men would be taken into the armed forces? The Minister of National Defence may answer that, but I would be surprised if there would be any more. They talk about the expense. We are spending three billions to defend democracy; surely it is worth spending a few cents per capita to maintain democracy, and the basis of democracy is faith in the integrity of public men.

The hon. member for Parkdale asked: "Are we going to abandon them now?" Colonel Cockeram, a former member of this house, said: "We are telling our men overseas that they need not expect reinforcements, that they are left to fight the battle alone." Where do you find that? How can you possibly read that from the fact that we are holding a plebiscite? Those statements condemn themselves. The strain, this emotional tension that has been built up in Canada, has not been created by Hitler or by any crisis of the war; it has been created in Canada by Canadians, and it has been created for the purpose of upsetting public confidence in this government.

We are going to have this plebiscite, and the question is what we are going to do about it. If we want to get on with the war, then I suggest that we should vote "yes". I am very glad indeed to see that the vice-president of the Canadian Legion in Montreal, Colonel Nicholson, a friend of mine, in a speech yesterday urged that everyone should vote "yes".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did he approve of the plebiscite?

Mr. CLAXTON: He said nothing about that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has already said he does not approve of it.

Mr. CLAXTON: He said to vote "yes"; he is not reported yesterday as saying anything about the plebiscite itself. I will ask my electors, and I urge the people of Quebec to vote "yes". They have reason to know, from what I said in this house last year, that I am sympathetic to them and that I am trying to understand and to explain them to our fellow Canadians in other parts. I do so for reasons I set forth in a letter to Le Devoir, part of which I should like to read:

> We are in this war, not as a satellite, but as a principal. We are fighting this war not because some other country is in danger but because Canada is in danger and because the welfare of Canada is bound up with the defeat of Hitler. Wherever there is a front against Hitler or Japan, there we are defending Canada, as surely as we would be on the ramparts at Quebec.
> This is why Canadians of all races and creeds and ages want Canada to do her utmost in the war for Canada and for humanity. Differences of language, differences of background and outlook, make it difficult for all Canadians to feel alike and to act as one. But to-day we are all challenged. Everything Canada has stood for through three centuries is at the hazard.
>
> If there ever was an occasion when all Canadians can have the same feeling and act together it is in our desire to defeat nazism. We may differ on the means. There can be no room for uncertainty that we are united as to the end.
> Quebec is a vital part of Canada. Quebec's history and distinctive character make what it says and does in the war of supreme interest to the world. For three hundred years people who speak the French tongue have kept their integrity in a fight against their environment. At times the fight has been bitter. The lingering recollection of that bitterness must not be allowed to blind any Canadian as to where their interest is to-day. It is of vital importance to all of us that there should be no misunderstanding anywhere in our fundamental attitude in the array of civilized feeling against Hitler.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I may ask the hon. member a question, has Le Devoir replied to that letter?

Mr. CLAXTON: As far as I am aware, the only comment by Le Devoir was made in a footnote to the letter, which I should be glad to show my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that Le Devoir says, "No; never."

Mr. CLAXTON: It was because I knew their attitude that I wrote what I did.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my time has gone.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carry on.

Mr. CLAXTON: If I had not devoted so much time to this question, perhaps I might have dealt more usefully with some other aspects of the war. I should like to have said something about man-power and the means of organizing it; about the difficulties yet the necessity for making the utmost use of our resources, and of ways in which we might do that. If I had time, I should like to have said something about the better mobilization of parliament itself, following along the line of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Bence) and the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I think there is a good deal in their suggestion that we can do far more useful work if we get down to business in committee, and that we do creative work in committees of parliament. I should like also to have suggested that we might do something more in connection with the organization of debate. The Minister of Finance will remember the debate last year on the war appropriation bill, on which we spent twenty-eight days. During that time there were usually nine or ten cabinet ministers present, among them always the Minister of Finance. I think something more should be done in the way of organizing debates in order to prevent a recurrence of the free-for-all which took place on that occasion. It may interest hon. members to know that in the course of those twenty-eight days the leader of the opposition had no less than 954 separate innings.

I should like to remind the house to-day, Mr. Speaker, that this year is the seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation. Seventy-five years ago to-day the delegation representing the two provinces of Canada and the two colonies were in London working out the draft of the bill which was to be presented in the House of Lords on February 12, 1867. This year we celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation. It is a challenge to us, a challenge to meet the emergencies, the urgencies of this terrible time with the same courage, the same foresight that the fathers of confederation displayed back in those early days.

Ours is a great country. Good people came before us, all from across the seas. They discovered, cleared and settled the land, harnessed nature, brought the colonies together, built railways and industries. Nothing stumped them; but before this war we were not responding so well to Canada's challenge. We were putting our problems on the shelf. Now and then we took them down, dusted them off before a royal commission, and put them back on the shelf again. We were zealous in finding reasons why things should not be done. Every time we failed to deal with a problem we lost faith in ourselves. Some of us became frightened of freedom and disliked new ideas because they were new. We need now a new birth of the democratic faith; belief in the people; belief in each other; faith in our own ability to hoist ourselves by our own boot-straps, if we have to do it. "A vital democracy is a community of people working out its own salvation." We must change frustration into creative, buoyant enthusiasm, and give Canadians everywhere the joy of achievement again.

Concluding a speech made in the debates in the first session of the first parliament in Canada, in 1867, the Hon. D'Arcy McGee made certain remarks which I am now pleased to repeat because the constituency he then represented, namely that of Montreal West, was the seat which is now divided between the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) and myself. His words on that occasion might be applied to-day to that class of people described by the Minister of Finance as "smearing Canada". These were his words:

> The policy of self-abasement I cannot see in the light of policy at all. I trust this first parliament of the dominion will stamp its reprobation upon every mention of such a policy, and that while avoiding all bravado on the one hand, as unbecoming men in our position, we will in this place endeavour to elevate, and not to depress, the public spirit of the country. Mr. Howe said the other night he would not take back anything he had said as to the extent of these provinces. He leaves us, unabridged, our square miles, and I trust also that he will leave us unshaken, what is more essential the faith of our people in their own future, the faith of every man, of every Canadian in Canada, and of every province in its sister province. This faith wrongs no one, burthens no one, menaces no one, dishonours no one. As it was said of old, faith moves mountains, so I venture reverently to express my own belief that the pure, patriotic faith of a united people will be all-sufficient to overcome and triumph over all difficulties that lie ahead.

The fathers of confederation left us a legacy of courage. They moved the frontiers back. The only new frontier now is what lies ahead. We are fighting for the chance to make the future not Hitler's, but our own. We are united with our allies in our determination to save humanity and set it on the forward march again.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, speaking in support of the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), which states that this house regrets that his excellency's advisers "have sought to evade their responsibilities by holding a plebiscite, which, in the view of this house, is the negation of responsible government," I wish first to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address, my very good friends the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald). They, like myself, had an unrivalled opportunity last November to see Great Britain at war. They have seen the peril which that nation is facing, and they have seen the sacrifices which every British man, woman and child is called upon to make. They have come to a visual realization that the defence of Canada lies on the coast of Dover. While I might not agree with the action which they would immediately take to face the common danger of nazi domination, nevertheless I compliment them upon the able manner in which they expressed their point of view.

The main aspects of the unshackling measure, called a plebiscite, mentioned in the speech from the throne, are, as I see them, two in number. First, will conscription for military service overseas become necessary and, second, how is it best brought about? As to the latter aspect, I can only say at this time that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had, under constitutional practice, no right to bind the hands of parliament. What, under section 106 of the elections act, he could not do in writing, he has attempted to do orally. It is a breach of the spirit of the act, if not the letter. Under the greatly changed circumstances admitted by all, he is not even morally bound by any alleged pledge. On the other hand he is morally bound to provide leadership and security to the state.

I believe it is the duty of every representative to speak for his constituency. Lord Asquith said that a referendum would impair, if it did not destroy, the sense of parliamentary responsibility. To quote from him, he said:

> It would really destroy the law of government by representation.

The armed services are only one form of contribution. As to the industrial side of our war effort, time will only allow me to say here that I believe in the mobilization of industry and resources, which is referred to by some as conscription of wealth, to the utmost extent necessary to the winning of the war. I believe our industrial effort is notable, but it is impossible that we should have increased civilian consumption as measured by retail sales 20 per cent in 1941 over 1940, and claim that we are having a full-out industrial war effort.

This government has not seen fit to put in the address anything in black and white which would suggest conscription for military service overseas. Even the microscope used by the Prime Minister when reading the Conservative amendment fails to disclose it. But since conscription for overseas is the only limitation placed on our war effort by a so-called party pledge, and the Liberal government wishes to be relieved of that pledge, the purpose of that release must be in order that compulsory military service for overseas will be contemplated, should the need arise.

This government desires to be released from any obligations arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service. Their request is for a blank cheque, when in the opinion of many, none is needed. Nevertheless I am alarmed by the preamble to the speech from the throne, which states:

> My advisers believe that the magnitude and balanced nature of Canada's war effort is being obscured and impaired by controversy concerning commitments with respect to the methods of raising men for military service which were made prior to the spread of the war to all parts of the world.

Surely the Prime Minister is not asking to be relieved of the so-called pledge in order only to remove the cause of controversy. If the government would place on the statute books a measure for compulsory service wherever it believes the defence of Canada lies, it would do much to remove the feeling of national dishonour. Examination of the requirements of total war might then be made, if it has not already been made, to determine where our man-power can most effectively be used.

What are the present military proposals of this government? According to the administration's figures there are now more than 260,000 men enlisted in the army for overseas service anywhere. Of these, 120,000 are already defending Canada outside Canada. The Prime Minister has laid down the programme for the army overseas, for the year ending March 31, 1943, which will require the services of 200,000 men. This figure includes reserves and reinforcements. If there are any casualties, the figures may have to be increased. But is this programme a really full-out contribution by Canada even allowing for the greatly increased contribution through our navy and air force, now amounting together to more than 130,000 men? March 31, 1943, will have seen us in this war for a period of three and one half years. In the last great war, what was the contribution of Canada in man-power after three and one half years? By the end of 1917 Canada had serving overseas 258,893 men, and the Royal Air Force was noted for the numbers and quality of its Canadian pilots. In addition, casualties who did not see service again, probably amounted to another 100,000 men. These comparative figures would of themselves be startling enough; but when one recalls that the population of Canada has grown in the interval between the two wars by no less than 43·6 per cent, or from 7,879,000 to 11,315,000, it looks as though the scales were out of balance. The size of this proposed army overseas requires a most careful examination by a committee of the house aided by military experts.

What answer is there to the contention that the Prime Minister is playing politics, which he dignifies by the terms "national unity" and "not getting on with the war." Has he evaded the issue by wasting a month's time in debating whether we are to have a plebiscite, with another three or four months to find out the results. He has thrown the total-war supporters a sop, and now they need only trust in him to do the right thing. Other parts of the country are free to expect him to follow the opposite course. He has done something; he has held a plebiscite; surely that will keep them quiet for a few months longer while he thinks up other dodges to placate the people, while the nazi-Japanese hordes draw ever nearer to our Canadian shores. Is it to be the policy of the government to keep down our military contribution overseas so that the need for conscription will not become clamant, because if the need for reinforcements becomes urgent and is unsatisfied, as in the last war, there can be only one answer? The Prime Minister knows it, as does the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), as well as every member of this house.

The Prime Minister has made some caustic and uncalled for remarks about the committee for total war, which committee has its headquarters in Toronto, a city truly great in spirit and in stature. Two incidents with respect to opinions held about this total-war movement have been highly amusing. A group of my fellow Conservative members, seeing a preponderance of Liberal names on the committee, felt that the movement was a sly and cunning Liberal trick to embarrass the Conservative party or to help the Liberal party in some way or another. Then to hear from the lips of the Prime Minister that it is a political move against his government is to reel with laughter between the pillar of suspicion and the post of cynicism. The truth is that there never was a committee more non-political, there never was a committee more Canadian, there never was a committee better apprised of Canada's danger, Canada's need and Canada's duty. The Prime Minister, in setting an example for the members of the house, referred with innuendo to the fact that the movement was highly financed. In looking over the names of those who instituted the movement, I find that most of the highly financial ones are personal friends of the Prime Minister.

I was amazed this afternoon to hear the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Fraser), saying things about the various members who signed that petition. I recall that one very good Liberal friend of mine from Toronto who signed the petition has no less than four sons serving in the forces, and yet men of that character have to be subjected to such things in this house.

In order that they might realize the true nature of Canada's peril and the fact that England, ten hours flying time away, is Canada's outer rampart, I wish every hon. member of this house could visit the beleaguered isle of Great Britain. Only to refresh our memories may I point out that in area Great Britain is no greater than a narrow strip of land running from Windsor to Montreal and contains 46,000,000 people. In this overcrowded little island country which is the workshop for those from whom she imports raw materials and foodstuffs, the members of the empire parliamentary association delegation, drawn from all parties in this house, as well as the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), and others who have recently visited that country, saw for themselves, in the brief time at their disposal, something of what a country once totally unprepared can do to meet total war.

Here may I pay a tribute to the United Kingdom branch of the Empire Parliamentary Association for having the foresight to give to the representatives of our various parties an opportunity of seeing how our only line of defence was being maintained. My special thanks are due to the secretariat of the association, Sir Howard d'Egville, Sir Drummond Shiels, Mr. Spencer-Hess, to Doctor Beauchesne, and to our Prime Minister for wishing us godspeed.

Only viewing the situation with our own eyes could make us realize how near the forces of freedom came to defeat at the hands of Germany when France fell and the evacuation of Dunkirk by a miracle saved the lives of 300,000 British soldiers, including Canadians; with what intrepid bravery and valour the battle of Britain was won when the pilots of the Royal Air Force, single-handed, attacked whole enemy squadrons and beat them off; and how Britain must remain guarded by a great army, with our own Canadian troops holding one of the most important positions facing the enemy. One realized as never before that if England fell, nothing, not a thing, stood between the shores of Canada and slaughter and worse by the nazis.

There on the coast of Dover we saw the enemy in occupied France, only twenty-four miles away, with his guns pointed on that city, and we saw where his shells had killed many of its defenceless citizens. Twenty-four miles is but a step in an age of modern transportation, and one wondered where and when on that coastline the enemy might land in the darkness of the night, or in the thickness of a fog. One trembled not alone for England, but for Canada; and when one saw the steel work defences in the sands with the barbed wire entanglements behind that, and the cement blocks staggered to prevent the landing of tanks, one said: Is this all that stands between Canada and the hun?

In Great Britain all hearts and all hands are directed against the nazi invader. Food, clothing and shelter are limited to the minimum human requirements, thus releasing all possible man-power. In agriculture, farmers cannot sow their lands to crops which are unsuitable, and labourers cannot leave the farms for the factory, if their services are required for food production. There the state has called upon every man and woman to serve wherever he or she is best fitted. Is Canada willing to do less in a common struggle?

On June 18, 1917, as reported on page 2392 of Hansard, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, discussing the principle that the state has the right to call upon the service of every citizen in its own defence, and the particular application of that principle to the laws of Canada said:

> That is the way I understand the existing law. And in this the law of this land is not singular, for such has been the law of civilized nations everywhere. It was the law of France when Canada was in possession of France; it was the law of England when Canada came into possession of England. In France that law remained unaltered until 1798 when compulsion was introduced for the first time; it remained the law of England until last year. If ever there was a principle which was embedded in the very soil of Britain, it was that the king could demand no service of his people except for the protection of their land and the repelling of invasion. It is well known that the King of England could not for any other purpose claim the service of any of his subjects. The English people were always afraid of permanent armies; the English people again and again have fought against their kings, to vindicate the principle that large permanent armies be not established in Great Britain.

Further on, at page 2393, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> I say that he could not under the act as it is, send anybody across the ocean to serve in the war. He said the other day, and he has just repeated it, that the first line of our defence to-day is in Flanders and France. I claim against him that there never was any danger of invasion of Canada on the part of Germany. If I have taken the position I have hitherto taken it is not because I feared an invasion of Canada by Germany. Nobody could say consistently that at this time, or at any time within the three years of the war, Canada was for one instant in danger of invasion. If I have taken the position I have taken, if I have been, as I was and as I am, in favour of our participation in the war, it was not because I feared invasion but because I believed that the victory of Germany would mean for Canada, as for the rest of the world, envelopment in the black shroud of German hegemony with its insolence, cruelties, and barbarities.

Surely in essence Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that he was in favour of Canada's participation in the great war because of the disastrous effect a German victory would have on Canada, but he limited our participation overseas to the voluntary system, and in support of that position he said:

> I claim against him that there never was any danger of invasion of Canada on the part of Germany. If I have taken the position I have hitherto taken, it is not because I feared an invasion of Canada by Germany. Nobody could say consistently that at this time, or at any time within the three years of the war, Canada was for one instant in danger of invasion.

Would Sir Wilfrid Laurier or any thinking man or woman to-day say that Canada is not in fear of invasion, not only by Germany but by Japan? Those who were privileged to hear the great speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) know how imminent is that danger on the Pacific coast. I have endeavoured to show how imminent is that danger to our maritime provinces and to Quebec unless we help to hold the Japanese and the Germans at bay. It would be futile to wait until the enemy is on the shores of Canada if we can stop him across the Atlantic or across the Pacific. We must be realistic and destroy the enemy abroad before he destroys us. Canada is fortunate because our allies have fought and held the enemy on their own home lands, fortunate that the forces of righteousness have been saved from defeat by the forces of evil. The road ahead is long and hard. We are far from victory unless all the allied nations wage total war. We must not minimize our potentialities. Great Britain, with 46,000,000 people, has held the fort against Germany's 85,000,000, Italy's 45,000,000, together with the industrial production of France's 40,000,000 and Poland's 37,000,000, to say nothing of the industrial production of Czechoslovakia, Belgium and Holland.

How can we expect our friends to answer our cries for help if we refuse to put ourselves in a position to go to their help when needed? Should the enemy attack us on Canadian soil, let us entitle ourselves to call on our friends, both in America and abroad, by first fighting the common enemy on their homelands. He who does not put out his neighbour's fire, his own house shall be consumed.

Are we still going to follow the policy of "divide and be conquered"? Belgium, Holland and Norway are all examples of countries that refused to throw in their lot with France and Great Britain until it was too late. At the very moment that Norway was being overrun by the nazis, the Norwegian foreign secretary was drafting a note of protest to Great Britain over some alleged technical violation of her neutrality.

May I appeal to my French-Canadian compatriots to realize that this is Canada's war as well as Britain's. I could not help being startled when my friend the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) stated, in describing his visit to Great Britain, that he came back with some impressions, the strongest of which was the love of king, flag and country shown by those people. Then he said: "They do not speak about aggression." It seemed incredible that anyone should have thought that this was a war of aggression on the part of Britain. I do not suggest that my hon. friend ever entertained such an idea, but it does give one a conception of the background held by some of our French-Canadian compatriots. There was an age, but certainly not in this century, when new lands of the world were subject to exploration and conquest, but that age has long since passed, and force as an instrument of national policy gave way to disarmament programmes until Germany made it otherwise.

One is always learning something new in parliament, and I was struck when the hon. member for Hull said in relation to the plebiscite:

> I am supporting the policy of the government. I will say to the people of my province: "If you want national unity now, make this sacrifice." I do not know whether those who have spoken against the French-speaking people in Canada would make the same sacrifice.

I am sensitive to his feeling, but not to his logic. Possibly we fail to understand each other's backgrounds, but may I assure him that the people of British origin in this country have no desire but to live in peace and harmony and cooperation with their fellow French-Canadians, and have nothing but the sincerest wishes for their welfare.

We fail to understand why the element of sacrifice in conscription is peculiar to them. We would never ask them to do anything, to assume any obligation or perform any duty which we would not first exact of ourselves. We believe we are fighting in a common cause and that just as the enjoyment of Canada is as much their right as it is ours, so is the protection of Canada as much their duty as it is ours. Rightly they will say that such a principle goes without saying, and it does. Whatever difference of opinion there may be between us arises because of different conceptions of wherein lies the defence of Canada.

There is a feeling on the part of some French-Canadians that those of British origin still have close associations with friends and relatives in Great Britain. To some extent that is true, but it can be greatly overestimated. I confess that when the Prime Minister was in England and was given a banquet at the Mansion House and he said that Canada would never have entered the war for the sake of Britain alone, a shiver of shame ran down my spine. It was not something to boast of at a public dinner.

French Canada has not the affinity of racial ties that those of British origin have, but it has the same strong attachment to British institutions, which are to everyone of us the surest guarantee of liberty and freedom.

June 18, 1940, was a very revealing day in this house. I am wondering what the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) would report as the present opinion "of the entire rural population where there exists a strong sentiment in favour of annexation to the United States, or at least of a formal alliance with our powerful neighbours." Are his constituents who were willing to join the United States willing to be led by their laws now just as are the million or more French-Canadians in the New England states? What is the opinion of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) who stated:

> Why not continue with our voluntary participation and wait at least until the United states enact conscription of men?

He was then taking shelter under the Monroe doctrine. Is he now willing to fight for it? National unity is a phrase which has arisen in the province of Quebec to describe an attitude, the attitude of one player in a game who says, "If I cannot make the rules I won't play." We have had war forced upon us, whether we like it or not. We cannot make the rules; we must conquer or be conquered.

One great reason for the difference of opinion which still seems to obtain between Quebec and the rest of Canada on the question of conscription lies not so much in what should be done under a given set of circumstances as in the appraisal of what the present circumstances of the war are. Undoubtedly because of historical background, suspicion, prejudice and failure to understand the issues at stake, there are many in the province of Quebec who believe the present war to be an imperialistic war and that the vital interests of Canada are not at stake. Does the loss of lives, including those of their fellow-French-Canadians at Hong Kong, stimulate them to a feeling of revenge upon the Japanese? They look upon Hong Kong as a British colony in which Canada should have no interest. They look upon the magnificent contribution which Australia has made to the Libyan campaign as a colossal mistake, particularly now that Australia is herself in fear of imminent invasion. Do the people of Quebec not realize that if northern Africa and the Suez canal were to fall to the axis powers, a short way would be open for the German hordes to invade the island continent of Australia?

We have lived together, we of British and French origin, in happy harmony for generations and centuries. We are struggling against a common foe who would change the lives and institutions of everyone of us. I cannot help but recall a story which I read when I was struggling with the French language to pass my examinations. It was called La Dernière Classe, by Alphonse Daudet, a great French author. In it were described the feelings of the old schoolmaster and the little French children at school in Alsace after the Franco-German war of 1871 when, on the following day, all the lessons had to be taught in the German language. Those hon. members who have read the Black Record by Sir Ralph Vansittart well know that the brutal German methods of 1871 are the same to-day, only worse.

Hitler's promises to Vichy are as all the false promises he made to all the other countries; the supremacy of the German herrenvolk is the supreme objective, and, in his view, the end justifies the means, however base, however cruel.

Is Canada going to subscribe to the theory of all those peace-loving and neutral nations of Europe who succumbed to the siren song of Hitler, allowing themselves to be divided and conquered? Only by meeting force with greater force can the enemy be overcome. What possible hope have we in Canada of successfully meeting an invasion? Consider the extent of our coastline. Consider the smallness of our population. Consider the extent of the enemy's forces. Should they once break through the island fortress of Britain or be able to maintain their command of the Pacific ocean, we are lost although hundreds of thousands of us may die in the losing.

Let me say to my French-Canadian compatriots, that no Canadian, no Britisher wants war. Nobody wants to sacrifice his material possessions. Nobody wants to have to fight; nobody wants to have conscription; nobody wants to lose his life. But these things are forced upon us. They are not of our making, but we are prepared to die rather than to become a slave race. Only a quisling could prefer otherwise.

To no one is his own way of life dearer, more precious, more sacred than to my fellow Canadians in the province of Quebec, and no one is more willing to fight and to lay down his life for what he considers vital. During the special war session of 1939 the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 22 of Hansard:

> My hon. friend gave his impression of the prize the Germans would seek in the event of victory. He said the prize would be Canada.

Then later on:

> There is no portion of the globe which any nation would be likely to covet more than this Dominion of Canada. There is no other portion of the earth's surface that contains such wealth as lies buried here. Nowhere are there such stretches of territory capable of feeding for generations to come not hundreds of thousands but millions of people.

Even more forcible is the view expressed by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) on June 18, 1940, as reported at page 895:

> The people of my province possessed enough vision, enough intelligence to realize that by restricting their participation to the defence of the Canadian soil only, their participation should prove of no avail, that it would prove fruitless whenever Britain and France were crushed. At such a time rhetorical high-sounding speeches and empty words concerning the defence of Canada shall partake only of the theatrical and shall be devoid of any quality of true patriotism to be found among men whose main preoccupation is to forestall possible threatening dangers and to prepare, as intelligent men, for the defence of the country.

If our fellow Canadians in Quebec put anything like the same interpretation upon world events as does the rest of Canada, then there would be little difficulty about obtaining harmony and unity of policy. I believe that the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet put the same interpretation on world events as I do, namely, that Canada's vital interests are in imminent danger and that if they cannot be protected overseas, they cannot be saved on Canadian soil. Why is it not the first duty, then, of the Prime Minister and his cabinet, giving reasons for their conclusions as to why Canada's vital interests are at stake, to instruct the people of Quebec, as to why Canada's best and surest defence lies in defeating the enemy where the war is now being waged. Surely leadership of that kind, since it is required, is the first and most compelling duty of any prime minister and his cabinet. What has been the effect of Hong Kong? The Prime Minister would probably say his first duty is to keep Canada united. Why, then, is he not in Quebec telling the people something of the nature of this war, something of the issues at stake, something of the imminent danger this country is facing and something as to the best means of meeting that danger, something of the fallacy of falling into Hitler's trap and being divided and conquered rather than resisting and destroying the enemy by a great united effort? If our sister commonwealth of Australia was not being subjected to attack, it might indeed be ourselves. This war is everyone's war everywhere. Can we with honour ask the United States to protect us, as we surely must, if we are not prepared to levy every available man to fight for her protection? Can we face the powers that are fighting with us and refuse to ask our nationals to fight anywhere along with their nationals? Is Canada a country without honour?

The unfairness of the present method of recruiting, even if results were adequate, is manifest for reasons which have already been advanced in this debate. As the great United States nation has decreed, universal compulsory military service is the only fair and democratic method. Why should only the best of our young men go, those with spirit, those with courage, those who in future years would be the leaders of a greater Canada? Why enlist when no reinforcements are promised, when some slacker will take one's job?

The invidious differences between different parts of the country make for inequality and injustice. Legitimate differences of opinion as to medical fitness make the number of recruits accepted in one centre vary greatly from the number accepted in another centre, because the general war disposition of the people in the respective centres differs. Injustice destroys national unity.

Conscription is inevitable if our armed forces are to destroy the enemy and reserves and reinforcements are not forthcoming. Is there anything in the present record of recruiting for the active army which holds the slightest promise that we can maintain an adequate fighting forces overseas? Even if the rate of enlistment was continuously satisfactory, the method itself is unfair. Great Britain has had its Dunkirk; the United States has had its Pearl Harbour, and Canada has had its Hong Kong. Must we have our Halifax, our Quebec, our Victoria and Vancouver before

Canada is geared to total effort? If our soldiers get into action on a full scale, then I believe that, dislike it as we may, we shall have conscription. We are being geared to 1943 when we may be lost in 1942.

I have set my course only with the gravest consideration and with heart-burnings that all my fellow-Canadians do not at this moment think alike on the issue of conscription. I know it is unpopular in some quarters; but I believe it is necessary, that honour demands it, and that the people of Canada, if they once realized the necessity, would be prepared to make any sacrifice to achieve victory.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): For a number of days now, and probably for many more to come, we have heard and shall hear over and over again arguments for and against the plebiscite and other aspects of government policy. For the Conservative opposition the plebiscite seems to be the only topic which can be discussed. Why? For the sole reason that they think they have an issue to confuse and confound, to disturb and distress. Whether it does the same thing to the war effort is not as important to them as party strategy. Why party strategy? Well, there is a by-election to win; a gathering hope of national government, and the smacking of lips as the office-hungry Tories dream of a return to power; by the front door if they can, by the back door if they must. Even a hand-out through the pantry window would be appreciated.

We hear a lot about leadership, about courageous action. In fact the demand for "courageous action" seems to have been adopted as the party slogan by the Tories; Tories in name, Tories in nature, including the new mascot for the party, Mitch Hepburn. Speaking of Mitch, the mascot, here is what he has to say about the plebiscite:

Special to the Gazette.

St. Thomas, January 22.—"I was astounded by the announcement from Ottawa to-day in the speech from the throne that a plebiscite of the Canadian people is to be taken on the conscription issue. I think this is one of the most dastardly, contemptible and cowardly things ever perpetrated on a respected and dignified people by any government.

"I appeal to Grits and Tories of Canada alike to show their indignation quickly and forcibly against this cowardly suggestion from Ottawa to-day, which will make Canada and Canadians the laughing-stock of the allied nations fighting our battles for freedom."

There is a ringing declaration for you! Mitch the man of courage who is reported in this week's press as saying that he is "dropping the idea of lowering the school age to aid the war effort"—Why? Because there was too much opposition to it. Another courageous and ringing declaration!

[Mr. Jackman.]

Incidentally this is the same courageous leader, the only man in public life in Canada to-day whose courage is such that he employs, presumably at government expense, a personal bodyguard. Perhaps he is trying to emulate the late Huey Long of Baton Rouge further in his political life, or perhaps he got the idea from some of his stiletto-handling friends.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Maybe he is afraid some of his friends will stab him in the back.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes, he stabs many in the back. He is trying to stab your party in the back right now.

But we are used to Mitch's ringing declarations, to his high patriotism, to the subordination of his personal interests and those of his friends to the cause of country. I shall not take time to go over Mr. Hepburn's war record; it is pretty well known in this country. Put briefly, he talks big and acts small. While scuttling the Sirois conference he did his utmost to prevent the all-out use of Canada's financial resources in our war. Why? The reason is plain. He wanted to keep the money flowing into the treasury of Ontario, which he controlled. We all remember the speech he made last September in New York, when he dragged the name of Canada in the mud, to the delight of the isolationists of the United States. By that speech he not only hurt Canada, he injured the whole allied cause. Let me quote what was said about that performance by a leading isolationist newspaper, the Boston Daily Record, on September 30, 1941:

A great many correspondents ask: what will happen to us in case Germany wins the European conflict? That is a natural and legitimate inquiry. It seems at the moment to be within the possibilities that the Germans might defeat the Russians and completely occupy Russia, including the Ukraine. And since the rest of Europe is already in the hands of the axis powers, there is point to the query.

What would that complete control of Europe mean to Europe, to us, and the world? Mitchell F. Hepburn, the distinguished Premier of Ontario, Canada, is not dismayed by the prospect. He predicts a triumph of Germany over Russia, but sees as a result closer relations and collaboration between the United States and Canada until "ultimately there will be no boundary line between us, because of the need and necessity of national defence." . . . "Germany is going to overrun Russia," says Premier Hepburn, according to the dispatches, "and will have all Europe in a state of subjection." . . . "Germany will have at her command industrial resources, the mineral reserves, and the oil and the loot of a nation populated by almost two hundred million people. But," continued the premier, "we will win the war with our resources." . . . "We have resources—man-power, brain-power and money." . . . "Great Britain is the outpost of America," and "I speak on behalf of Winston Churchill, the great Prime Minister of Britain, who has asked us to supply him with the tools in order that he can carry on the war for us."

There is a good deal of sound sense in what the noted premier of Ontario says. We can give Britain the tools with which to fight. But there is not much sense in giving Russia the tools with which to surrender.

And further:

Why not save something to defend our own democracy if, as Premier Hepburn says, "Germany is going to overrun Russia" and "will have all Europe in a state of subjection"? To be sure, Canada and the United States and all the Americas "have resources", as the premier states, if we husband them . . . Finally, as the premier says, "we have man-power." . . . Yet we do not want to fertilize foreign battlefields with the blood and bones of our fine young Americans.

That is the comment which was prompted by a speech delivered by Mitchell Hepburn in New York, while this war was in progress. Does anyone think that helped the allied cause?

There is an old saying, that you may know a man by his friends. Here are a few of Mitch's boon companions: "Sell-'em" Ben Smith, Wall street promoter, arch-isolationist and appeaser, whose trail from Vichy to Wall street to Bay street to St. Thomas, Ontario, is well known to Mitch; Franceschini, ex-internee, reported to be the angel of Mitch's tour to Australia; and, as the latest bed-fellows, George Drew and Arthur Meighen, concerning whom Mitch has often held forth in his usual vigorous style. I need not repeat what is already on the records of this house on this subject, but I might add a bit by giving you George Drew: colonel, military expert extraordinary, world traveller, author, man about town, and what have you. There is little time to deal with "Gorgeous George" except as a military expert, and in that capacity chief adviser by remote control to the opposition. Let us listen to George, the expert, the man who wanted to close up the Bren gun factory as his contribution to the war effort. We all remember George of "the broken-down boiler factory, run by a friend of the minister." That "broken-down boiler factory" has turned out to be one of the greatest assets of Canada and the empire in this war. The excellent guns made in that factory are blazing at the enemy to-night on every front from Singapore to Libya. But even "Gorgeous George" should be allowed one mistake. He still claims to be an expert. Let us hear him in that capacity on Russia, as reported in the Toronto Telegram of January 21, 1939. Speaking at Sault Ste. Marie, "Gorgeous George" is reported to have said: "Russia would not be a vital factor in any war." He had seen the Russian troops when he visited that country, and in his opinion the Russian army was a "broken reed." Even after war broke out "Gorgeous George" was still an expert on Russia. At a meeting of the Toronto branch of the Queen's Alumnae on November 17, George said:

Russia's troops are disorganized, sloppy. The guns and tanks you see pictured in great display in Moscow's Red Square are mostly of German construction. Russian soldiers have no ammunition, except for the purpose of their own execution squads. The propaganda of Russia's might is merely amusing.

I have not time even to go over "Gorgeous George's" amazing record as an expert. But with such an adviser, it is little wonder that the opposition do so much muddling meddling in military matters.

An hon. MEMBER: You are an expert!

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): And now, spotlight, camera, action!—little Arthur himself the new leader, the white hope of the party! Oh, I am not going to be unfair to the right hon. gentleman. I shall not go back to 1914 and give R.B.'s reference to him—that is, R. B. Bennett—as the gramophone of the Mackenzie and Mann interests. I shall not bring up the speech—the "Ready, aye, ready" speech of 1922, or the semi-ready speech of Hamilton, in 1925. I shall not embarrass the opposition by reading the bitter denunciation of Meighen by the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson, the former Conservative Premier of Ontario at the Winnipeg convention in 1927 when, for the only time in history, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen stood before a great convention of Conservatives of Canada, and they discarded him as a leader—and those same Conservatives have never asked him to come back.

Even less will I go over the sordid tale of the Ontario power service corporation bonds, so ably set out by Mitchell Hepburn in 1934 and 1936, and referred to in this house the other day by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford). No; I will be kind to Mr. Meighen, and refer only to his record within the past few days, when he was reported on January 27 as having said, "If we have to conscript wealth to win the war, we will. But people of common sense do not advocate that until the last gasp."

An hon. MEMBER: Was it a Liberal who said that?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Arthur Meighen. There is a real leader for you! How the embattled barons of Bay street must have rejoiced as this knight in shining armour tilted his lance against the approach of total war toward their castles, and their money bags. The last man, certainly; the last dollar, never—until the last gasp.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Quote his last night's speech along with that.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Don't worry, I will finish with that. The bell-wether of Bay street! Well, they ought to know something about wethers up there. They have fleeced more people in Canada than any other outfit. I see that after ten days, as my hon. friend remarks, the effect of this statement has been borne in on the right hon. gentleman, and he has given a belated denial, terming it inconsistent with his by-election campaign. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps I have known the gentleman in politics as long as most people in this house. It may be inconsistent with his election campaign, but it certainly is consistent with the record of the man during his whole political career.

I for one believe the statement was made. In any event, the issue still stands. Let us see how our hon. friends opposite stand on the same issue—our friends opposite, who want courage, who want leadership, who demand clear-cut pronouncements of government policy and attitude! Where do they stand? It is a poor rule that does not work both ways. I ask them now: Do they endorse the "last gasp" speech of January 27; or do they slip out from under, on the inconsistent speech of February 3? Do they in their zeal for total war, and in what they claim to be the intent of their amendment, repudiate the amazing policy of conscription of wealth only as the last gasp? The people of Canada want something more than the denial of Arthur Meighen in a by-election campaign. They have a right to know whether the members of the Conservative party in this house are ready to conscript men, but consider the dollar sacred. Does their amendment clearly and unmistakably mean that they are prepared to urge, in fact demand, that the full conscription of wealth must come if and when we conscript men for overseas service; or do they favour total conscription of men's lives and voluntary methods of raising money? Let me have an answer from them. Do they join their leader in Toronto?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Which night?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Yes, which night—January 27 or February 3? What has the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) to say about it?

Mr. PERLEY: Read our amendent.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He cannot read yet.

Mr ROSS (Moose Jaw): Do you agree with your leader in Toronto, or do you not? Silence!

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Give him the same answer as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) gave this afternoon.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Will any member of the Conservative party answer?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The same answer the Prime Minister gave this afternoon.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No, they dare not answer. Yet these are the men who are pounding day after day at the government, and asking them to take a stand on matters.

Mr. PERLEY: Where do you stand?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): You sit; you say nothing; you do not dare take a stand. And if you did, from the speeches I have heard you make in this house—and others—in the last few days, could we consider that a pledge before the people of Canada, when you make it in the house? We cannot consider it when you make it in the country. These Tory leaders—first of all Arthur Meighen, who has again been given the leadership of the Conservative party, by a clique, not by Conservatives in Canada in convention assembled, with delegates from the people, and then these men who have been voicing views in this chamber—are not portraying the thoughts in the minds of Conservatives of the Dominion of Canada. There are many thousands of Conservatives in this country who are to-day taking their part in this war alongside Liberals and others. They are not endeavouring to cause turmoil and strife in the country at this time. They are serving on committees, working hard to raise money to buy bonds from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to carry on the war. They are in the was savings certificates drives, and they are in the Department of Munitions and Supply, as the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Fraser) said this afternoon. They are in the foreign exchange control board, in the war-time prices and trade board and everywhere else where they can aid in this effort. They have forgotten politics; they are not playing politics now, and all glory and power to them for that.

Then there are those who think they portray Conservative opinion in this country. They come to this house, and we see what happened the other day. We had just opened the sitting when an hon. gentleman rose in his place and suggested a parliamentary inquiry into the Hong Kong affair. Everyone knows there would not have been a Hong Kong if there had not been a Pearl Harbour. Everyone knows they are not playing politics to-day in the United States. Pearl Harbour was investigated by a judicial committee, and those who were found to be negligent are to be punished. That is what should be done with regard to all these matters. Hong Kong should be investigated, not by a parliamentary committee where political capital could be made out of everything, but by a judicial board. If any negligence or any guilt is found, then those who are responsible should be properly punished.

We are getting sick and tired of hearing gentlemen on platforms throughout the country and in this house running down Canada's army. Canada has a good army, one of the best. The men who are running it can be depended upon; they are as good as any other men running any other army anywhere. We are proud of that army. They are doing a first-class job, and we should give them every credit, not try to make out that we have not a large enough army or a good enough army or that it is deficient in either men or brains.

For some time I have heard talk of a total-war effort. A total-war effort for this country should be the effort that this country can make of every kind, the effort which will go farthest to aid in winning this war regardless of what direction it may take. Some people think we should have a blueprint of exactly what is to be done in the way of defence for the next six months. If we had had one, it would have all gone to pieces two months ago because this war is changing every week. Some men still say that there must be plenty of munitions and supplies now. In proportion, there are not as many munitions and supply as there were. The battle fronts of this war have opened up faster than the factories of the allies can keep up with providing munitions and supplies.

Since December 7, when Pearl Harbour was struck—this is not a secret because Winston Churchill has said it in the open—we lost command of the Pacific. Since we have lost command of the Pacific, it is quite likely that our sister dominions, Australia and New Zealand, will be unable to supply Great Britain with many of the things with which they have been supplying her up to the last two months. What does that mean? It means that the only countries which can supply Great Britain are Canada and the United States.

There is a bigger job to-day for the Canadian agriculturist than has ever before faced him in his history. All kinds of foodstuffs must be produced in greater abundance than they have been produced in the past to help to carry on and feed Great Britain during this war. The Canadian farmer will have to get up a little earlier in the morning and go to bed a little later at night, although at the present and in the past he has done better at this than any other citizen of the dominion.

The Canadian farmer should be given fair treatment. A few days ago we had a large delegation here from western Canada making a most reasonable request of the government. They asked for a fair price for their wheat. Surely the Canadian people should be able to give it, not for all that they can grow but for what can be sold. If you go into the facts and figures with regard to this matter, you will find that wheat is the only thing that the people of Canada are asking the farmers of Canada to give to the government in the war effort for which a reasonable and fair price is not being paid. I think grave consideration by the government, by this house and by the people of Canada should be given to this question.

I hope that this drive for political purposes will stop, that these people will realize finally that no matter how much they drive the Prime Minister, the more often he has gone to an election, the bigger the majority he has received from the people of Canada. I have every confidence in the Prime Minister as the leader of this country at this time. I have every confidence in the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and in the army officers under him. I have every confidence in the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), and in the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). I know that we could not get a better man as Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) than we have. Where could you pick up a man in whom the people have more confidence than they have in the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley)? Where could you get a man who has done more and will do more for the farmers of this country than the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner)? Yet these people have been saying day after day, "Throw the government out, get new leaders." They have asked the Prime Minister to bring men into the government from the outside. He has done that, and two of them are now fighting for all they are worth in by-elections. Why? Because the very people who asked him to bring them in from the outside are now trying to defeat them.

With regard to the plebiscite, I want to say that I gave my pledge in the last election, and as yet I have not broken the pledge to the people of this country, and do not intend to. I ask the people of my constituency and in other parts of Canada to vote "yes" on this plebiscite and relieve the government and hon. members of their pledges. I ask my people to do that in order that I may follow the Prime Minister and the ministers I have mentioned, all of whom have full knowledge and are in complete cooperation with the allied commands and will do what is right to win this war for Canada and the Canadian people.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne, explained and completed by the speech of the Prime Minister, defines the government's war programme for the present session.

The programme comprises a non-interest-bearing loan of $700,000,000 to England; an outright gift of $1,000,000,000 to England for war purposes; a war budget of $3,000,000,000 to be raised by taxation and loans; a national war effort extended to the country's utmost capacity, and, finally, a request to the people, by means of a plebiscite, to release the government from any previous commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service—in other words, a request for freedom to enact conscription for military service overseas if it sees fit.

This simple outline gives an idea of the extent of the war effort contemplated for a small nation of 11½ million still in the development stage.

If the two opposition leaders, the one who sits in this house and the other who is waiting at the door, have been able to call the $1,300,000,000 appropriation requested last year for certain war expenditures a "crushing burden, staggering in its proportion", what words will they find this year for the appropriations required by the programme I have just outlined? The least that can be expected of them is that they cease making unfavourable comparisons between our war effort and that of other allied countries, notably Australia —Australia which does not even pay the expenses of its own troops outside its territory, while we not only meet the expenses of our troops abroad, but contribute to the equipping and feeding of the troops of other allied countries. It is high time to start keeping criticism within the bounds of common sense.

Leaving all further comment on this subject for a later occasion, I shall deal at once with the question of the plebiscite on conscription, which is the most important question of all, because of the immediate consequences it will inevitably produce in the country.

The mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) has pointed out that the plebiscite represented "a reversal of policy" on the part of the government, and he added: "The three and a half million French-Canadians of my province are being asked to accept one of the greatest sacrifices that the country has ever requested of them."

It would be impossible to describe the present situation more tragically.

What are the facts?

A group of citizens calling themselves the committee of 200, gathered in Toronto, have decided to impose their will on the Canadian people. With little regard for the country's future, they have organized at great expense a campaign of propaganda and intimidation with a view to forcing the government to enact conscription for overseas service, in defiance of the plighted word and of the will of the people expressed on the 26th of March, 1940. And strange to say, while advocating the adoption of coercitive measures for the sending of men overseas in order to defend democracy and punish the violators of treaties, these people ask the government to violate the pact entered into on the 9th of September, 1939, at the time of the declaration of war, and to disregard the mandate received from the people on the 26th of March, 1940, not to impose conscription for overseas service.

I wish to recall briefly the circumstances and conditions under which participation in this war was decided and to draw the conclusions that necessarily follow therefrom as regards the plebiscite and the question of conscription.

On the 9th of September, 1939, Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe expressed in the following terms the conditions under which "a most important section of the country, comprising the province of Quebec", would agree to Canada's participation:

> But, sir, I believe that at this time there are two extreme sides of opinion which we should avoid and which would make for the disunity of Canada at a time when we need the very opposite. First, there are those who . . . say that Canada can and should remain neutral. . . .
> The other school consist of those who . . . are promoting courses which would disunite Canada—because such measures will never be accepted or enforced by and in a most important section of the country. The whole province of Quebec—and I speak with all the responsibility and the solemnity I can give to my words—will never agree to accept compulsory service or conscription outside Canada. I will go farther than that: When I say the whole province of Quebec I mean that I personally agree with them. I am authorized by my colleagues in the cabinet from the province of Quebec . . . to say that we will never agree to conscription and will never be members or supporters of a government that will try to enforce it. Is that clear enough?

Then he added:

Provided these points are understood, we are willing to offer our services without limitation and to devote our best efforts for the success of the cause we all have at heart. And those in Quebec who say that we will have conscription in spite of what some of us are saying, are doing the work of disunity, the work of the foe, the work of the enemy. (House of Commons Debates, second session 1939, page 68.)

Could anything be clearer? Participation without conscription.

Such is the compromise proposed by Mr. Lapointe and accepted without reserve by all the conscriptionists, including the whole imperialist and conscriptionist newspapers of the country, on the 9th of September, 1939.

This compromise was ratified by the people of all Canada on the 26th of March, 1940, at a general election. It therefore constitutes a pact, which cannot be set aside without the express and explicit consent of all the parties to the contract. And this pact was concluded not for a month, not for a year, not for two years, not even for the duration of a parliament, but for the entire duration of the war. For this "most important section of the country, comprising the whole province of Quebec", which Mr. Lapointe referred to, entered into the conflict for the duration of the war and would never have agreed to participation therein without the express condition which is: No conscription for overseas service at any time throughout the whole duration of the war.

It is therefore a compromise for the duration of the war, and it cannot be set aside until the war is over.

What is being sought is not the complete setting aside of the pact of September, 1939, ratified by the people in March, 1940—this being impossible, since one of the parties thereto has already fulfilled its obligation and the parties can no longer be replaced in their previous state—but the setting aside of the obligation of one of the parties, the sole condition which the abstentionists set to their participation, namely, that there should be no conscription for service overseas.

Now that one party to the contract, the abstentionist group, has unstintingly fulfilled and even gone beyond their pledge to participate in the war—for our participation which was to be moderate and commensurate with our means has become unlimited, and we know that Mr. Lapointe, as he had promised on September 9, 1939, "devoted to it his best efforts"—now, as I say, that one party has fulfilled its pledge, the other party to the contract, the conscriptionist group, would like to repudiate their sole obligation, which was to abstain from demanding conscription for overseas service.

To all the sincere advocates of conscription in this house I say:

On September 9, 1939, a compromise was made whereby you agreed not to demand conscription for overseas service, provided those who opposed participation in the war, especially in the province of Quebec, consented to participate in that war. On the strength of that agreement, the important part of our population which opposes war has consented to participate in it. Were you sincere at that time? I dare not question your sincerity. Did you wish to obtain that consent through false representations? I dare not believe it. Now that those who opposed war have liberally and generously fulfilled their pledge—and God knows how much fervour and devotion Mr. Lapointe brought into the fulfilment of his pledge—will you refuse to fulfil yours?

If I may ask you, would you consider that it would be fair and honourable?

You would conscript men for fighting overseas those who do not honour their pledge, while breaking yourselves the contract you made with an important part of the population, and you would claim to advocate national unity. No, no, that is not possible.

But the plebiscite implies something more unusual. Not only will the party towards which the pledge was made be asked to relieve the other party from its obligation, but those who favour conscription will be asked to relieve themselves from their obligation, for, mind you, the question bears on a single point: "discarding the pledge whereby conscription was not to be enforced". Since when is a debtor left free to decide himself whether he will pay his debt or not? A creditor may be requested to waive his claim, but a debtor is never asked to decide himself whether he must pay his debt or not. And in justice only those who oppose conscription and towards whom the pledge was made, should have the right to relieve the advocates of compulsory service, or the government, from the pledge whereby they agreed not to enforce conscription.

Apart from the fact that such a request would constitute a breach of contract, and the violation of a pledge, I can see no justification whatever for it.

In the first place, the reasons for which that pact or compromise was made still exist to-day to a degree even greater than in 1939.

The leaders of the two great political parties have many times stated those reasons: The necessity of preserving national unity, and inefficiency or failure of conscription.

In a speech broadcast on March 4, 1940, during the election campaign, the Hon. Mr. Manion, then leader of the Conservative party said:

In my opinion, conscription was a failure in the last war for it only added 10,000 men to our army of over half a million and it stirred up misunderstanding in this country. For the reason I have just stated; because conscription is not necessary in this war and because a public man is in duty bound to maintain national unity, as I have said on other occasions, I am absolutely opposed to conscription. I have made that quite clear a year ago, on March 30 in the House of Commons.

What he said on March 30, 1939, is reported as follows in Hansard, Vol. III, page 2440:

Remembering the strong views held by both extreme sides, I see a very grave danger to the dominion unless some fair compromise policy is adopted. It seems to me that persistence in either of these extreme views, to the ignoring of the very large group who have the other extreme view, means the disruption of Canada, possibly civil war in case there was an international war in which Britain was engaged, perhaps the ultimate break-up of the British empire. In the last war the conscription of men to go to the front caused violent racial antagonisms, much disharmony, bitterness and misunderstanding—conditions from which as yet we have not wholly recovered; and on top of that I believe I am expressing the opinion of authorities when I say that it was of no real military value in so far as the empire was concerned. Not long ago, I made it my business to ask an outstanding military authority how many men got into the line from Canada through conscription. He said that there were no absolutely authentic or indisputable figures, but he estimated the number at the outside as 10,000.

The recruitment of 10,000 men out of the half million Canadians who went overseas shows that, with all the ill effects conscription had in our country, it exercised but a small effect upon the war.

On the other hand, neutrality, or independence or even failure to co-operate with Great Britain, is as repugnant to a large section of Canadians as is conscription to another large section. It seems to me, therefore, that we must adopt a sane middle course in order to preserve a united Canada and, indeed, to maintain this empire.

He added:

There should be no conscription of Canadians to serve outside the borders of Canada.

The Prime Minister spoke along the same lines on different occasions, in this house and outside, especially during the 1940 election campaign, and solemn pledges against conscription were therefore taken by the two leaders. The same two reasons against conscription still exist to-day.

[Mr. Raymond.]

Opposition to conscription is to-day as great as it was in 1939 and 1940; it is even greater since Australia, after having withdrawn troops from her borders, has found herself unable to defend her own territory.

Here is what Mr. Lapointe said on June 18, 1940, as reported at page 877 of Hansard, during the debate on the Mobilization Act, after the invasion of Holland and Norway and the defeat of France:

I invite all my friends to read the observations I made in this house when war was declared. . . . I then said to my fellow-countrymen that the province, one of whose representatives I have the honour to be, was opposed to compulsory military service overseas, and that we would fight it . . . that I would fight it; that if it were proposed by my government I would resign from that government. That is what I said and that is what I repeat to-day.

National unity is as necessary to-day as it was in 1939 and 1940 and it is perhaps even more necessary.

It has not been proved that conscription will be more efficient to-day than in 1917, during the last war, when it gave such disastrous results.

Those are the very reasons that prevented in 1917 and that are to-day still preventing Australia, South Africa and Northern Ireland from enforcing conscription. The Prime Minister of Australia, Mr. Curtin, again made that statement less than two months ago. Then why should Canada have conscription?

Is it desired to divide this country forever? The leader of the opposition acknowledged in Toronto on October 29 last, that public opinion was not prepared to accept it and he was not referring to the province of Quebec. After all, is not the Canadian war effort outstanding? The Hon. Malcolm MacDonald, British high commissioner in Canada, said a few days ago, on January 26, that our war effort was extraordinary.

The outline of our war effort which the Prime Minister gave in his speech, on January 26 last, should convince the most obdurate that conscription could not make it any greater. It compares favourably with the effort of any allied country. What is needed is more food, clothing, airplanes, weapons, and munitions of every description. At Dunkirk, in Greece, in the island of Crete and in the Pacific, allied reverses were attributable to lack of war equipment. Proportionately speaking, no other country has supplied more material than Canada. Our land is both the granary and the arsenal of Great Britain; ours is the task of supplying still more for all theatres of war. Let us not forget, as General Ludendorff, former chief of the German general staff, stated in his book entitled "Total War", that the supply of foodstuffs for the army and civil populations is of paramount importance; that Germany was not vanquished on the battlefield, but through starvation.

It is not when we are requested to increase our agricultural production in spite of a labour shortage already noticeable; it is not when we are asked to step up our industrial production which requires more workers to supply weapons and equipment for our soldiers; it is not when the defence of our shores demands more soldiers that we should contemplate increasing the number of recruits for overseas service by the adoption of conscription in a country whose population is less than 1 per cent of the 1,200 million inhabitants of the allied countries—Russia having 180 million; Great Britain, 46 million; the United States, 130 million; China, nearly 500 million; India, about 400 million and the other countries many more millions.

The leader of the opposition would like Canada to police the world. No sooner does he learn that the fight has started somewhere, than he wants to know whether our soldiers are in the thick of it. He forgets that there are only 11½ million Canadians.

I fail to see any reason to justify the present campaign in favour of conscription. Its adoption would accomplish nothing useful; on the contrary, it would be calamitous.

As for the plebiscite, this measure can be interpreted in one way only. The government wish to be released from the promise they gave during the 1940 election campaign that they would respect one of the conditions of the agreement of September, 1939. They ask for complete liberty to impose conscription at whatever time and in whatever manner they might think best.

Besides arguments already advanced against the proposed plebiscite, I may add that, being personally opposed to conscription and, further, having promised to fight it, I cannot blindly approve a policy leading to it, especially when the leader of to-morrow might be some unknown man. Men are mortal and the end of the war is not in sight. It is all very well to put faith in the promises of a man, but it becomes somewhat disquieting when he requests to be released from past commitments.

In the present circumstances, although I prefer the present Prime Minister to any other known contender to his position as leader of the administration, I want him as he appeared before the Canadian people in March, 1940, bound by his promise not to adopt conscription, rather than possessed of a blank cheque, of the power to impose conscription if, in his judgment, he believes it to be the proper step. Therefore I cannot support his request, nor the address in reply to the speech from the throne, nor the amendment and subamendment as they all imply the principle of conscription of man-power for overseas service.

An agreement has been concluded between two parties, between supporters of two different schools of thought, abstentionists and conscriptionists.

This agreement, valid for the duration of the war, approves participation short of conscription for overseas service. The abstentionists have discharged their obligation resulting from the pact to the last iota and they have even gone further. (One minister has fallen on the way.) We simply demand that the other party to the agreement discharge its obligation. Is this out of reason?

More than national unity in a time of war is at stake. For us, it is a matter of knowing whether commitments mean anything, whether we may rely on the fulfilment of contracts.

We are not advocating separatism, but we should not be driven to it. We are willing to live in the same house as long as it is comfortable for all. We are advocates of national unity on certain fair terms and once our conditions, laid down in advance, are accepted, we demand that they be adhered to.

I greatly fear that the Toronto committee of 200 who are leading the struggle in favour of conscription for overseas service, in direct violation of the agreement of September, 1939, are forging the weapons that will slay national unity and possibly confederation as well.

PRIVILEGE—MR. THORSON

STATEMENT BY MR. PAUL BOUCHARD

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The newspaper La Presse of this date contains the following item:

> At St. François d'Assise, where he spoke last night in the crowded parish hall, Mr. Paul Bouchard, one of the candidates in Quebec East, read an extract from a letter written by Mr. Liguori Lacombe, member for Laval-Two Mountains, stating that Hon. Messrs. St. Laurent, Thorson and McGibbon—

He probably means Mr. Gibson.

> —are members of a subcommittee of the war cabinet which is at present studying the problem of conscription for overseas service.

I deny this statement. A subcommittee of the cabinet is at present studying the question of man-power.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries) (Translation): And it is not a subcommittee of the war cabinet.

Mr. THORSON (Translation): There is no subcommittee studying the problem of conscription for overseas service. No one is studying the question, neither Mr. St. Laurent, nor Mr. Gibson nor myself. If such a statement is contained in the letter from the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), it is entirely false.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

Mr. L. P. LIZOTTE (Kamouraska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to add my congratulations to those already tendered to the mover of the address, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the seconder, the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) on the high standard of their speeches.

More particularly do I congratulate the hon. member for Hull, who is a native of Kamouraska county, on the form of his speech, without insisting on the substance thereof. Every time I meet him and see once again his calm, smiling and restful countenance—typical of familiar faces at home—I indulge in the illusion that he still is an elector of the fine county of Kamouraska which I have the honour to represent. Because of the warm feeling I have for him I regret all the more not being able to share all the views he has expressed in his speech.

I am fully aware, Mr. Speaker, that we are going through one of the most momentous periods which our generation has known. The problems facing the members of this house are difficult, embarrassing and fatally dangerous for the internal peace of the country and for the national unity which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has so far been able to maintain at the cost of the most praiseworthy efforts.

Whatever action is taken by hon. members will have a profound effect on the present and future life of the nation.

We therefore realize at this time the gap left in our ranks by the death of Ernest Lapointe and the extent of the loss which the Canadian nation has sustained. In times of stress we of the province of Quebec used to turn to this great Canadian who is no longer here to strengthen our confidence and point out to us the road to follow.

Some days ago I heard the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) correct the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) by stating that Ernest Lapointe was born not in the county of Kamouraska but in that of Témiscouata. He was right. But it must be admitted that it is the electors of Kamouraska who were intelligent enough to adopt him as their own and give him to the country.

As the representative of the county which gave this great servant to the nation, may I pause for a moment in sorrow and in respect for his memory.

We now have to look to the Prime Minister, his companion in the battles of old, who, knowing through Lapointe the mentality of Quebec, has so far always been a friend to our province. I am confident that he will receive good advice from the present representative of French-Canadians in his cabinet, the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) and in the near future from the hon. the Minister of Justice. May Providence grant to the hon. the Minister of Public Works the health needed for carrying on his work.

Whether they come from Quebec or from other provinces, all the members of this house harbour the same feeling of loyalty towards their country, notwithstanding the fact that some may look to Canada and others to England. Our views may differ on the means to be taken, but all of us here agree that the victory of our arms must be ensured, and that whatever sacrifices are necessary must be borne with fortitude, so that good may triumph over evil, and democratic freedom may prevail over totalitarian slavery. But while fighting for democracy we should cause no one to lose confidence in it, and the people, who are the fountainhead of all authority, should not lose confidence in the pledged word of their leaders, to whom they have entrusted their most cherished interests.

The problem which this house faces today must be dealt with in the light of these facts.

The question with which I intend to deal as briefly as possible in the course of my remarks may be put as follows: is it advisable, at this time, that the government should consult the people in order to know whether they are willing to release the government from their past commitments with regard to conscription for overseas service, and authorize them to adopt whatever recruiting policy they may deem necessary?

It must first be clearly stated that in principle the government in power may, without any other formality than the concurrence of parliament, enforce at any time compulsory military service for overseas. That is what would have happened, many months ago, if the Conservatives had unfortunately been returned to power in 1940. The speeches of their leaders have made us aware—for those people seem to have lost all sense of decency —that in spite of the oath they have taken before the electorate in March 1940, we would have had conscription in May of the same year.

If the Liberals were to act to-day in such an arbitrary and high-handed manner, after the promises they have made, I would say that their party is no longer worthy of its great name and that my leaders deserve to be ranked among those undesirable people who are called "Tories".

Fortunately that is not the stand that was taken by our leaders. The policy adopted by the government is unquestionably a wholly democratic measure, since its object is to consult again the people, from whom all authority and power is derived in this country.

But is that measure necessary? Is it not obviously fraught with danger? Those are points on which I am not in agreement with the government. In my humble opinion, the government should continue to direct their policies in accordance with the mandate they hold. I believe that I can remain associated with my party, which is the party of free speech and free opinions while respectfully submitting that such a measure is neither necessary nor timely, that it is fraught with serious danger, and this for reasons different from those advanced by the opposition.

As far as I am concerned, I was satisfied in 1940 and I still am today with the opinion that was clearly and freely expressed by the electorate less than two years ago.

The Prime Minister himself had stated, on the floor of this house, in November 1941, that he was satisfied with the verdict rendered by the Canadian people at the last election.

In my estimation, it is not necessary to go back to the polls every season. On the other hand, do the people wish to be consulted? I have never heard anything to that effect.

When the elections of March 1940 took place, this terrible war was already in progress and the electors then gave the government direct authority to wage war, on condition, however, that, as long as they remained in power, compulsory service for overseas would not be resorted to.

Neither the shrieks of a few Toronto newspaper editors, royally paid to criticize through Mr. Meighen and his gang, neither the threats of a handful of financial barons, boosting Mr. Meighen's candidature in an attempt to realize scandalous war profits, as they did in 1917, will convince me that our people, courageously doing their share, silently accepting all sacrifices, voluntarily offering their sons to their country, request that they be consulted anew.

Would then that the government, fearlessly carrying on with the authority granted them, continue, as heretofore, to follow the lead given by our population.

I stated that, in my opinion, the plebiscite announced by the government is not necessary. I shall go further and say that it is ill-timed. Mr. Speaker, you may be sure that this expression of public opinion will create all the excitement of a general election, which the government is desirous of avoiding so as to concentrate on the war effort. I fear that this popular vote may, on account of the various and contradictory opinions expressed in different provinces, revive racial and religious controversies which we had been fortunate enough to quench. The next six months will show whether I am right or wrong.

I claim further that this plebiscite is dangerous. Anyone may foresee that, in the event the government is released from its past commitments—which personally I hope it will not—it then would be forced to adopt this useless compulsory method, in order to silence the criticisms, to block the intrigues and stop the blackmailing of the Tories. If the Canadian people do release the government from past commitments, this verdict will be interpreted as a request by the public for the immediate adoption of conscription for overseas service irrespective of its reactions on the effort made to protect our own shores; then you will witness all the astuteness of the Tories in exerting pressure on the present administration.

In certain financial quarters, if it be found necessary, subscriptions to the victory loan will be refused, in order to blackmail the the government: threats to that effect have already been made. Unfortunately, in this country, there are people who would risk even defeat at the hands of the enemy, to hoist themselves into power and slake their thirst for vengeance against our present leader and his friends. They camouflage under the cry for conscription their hunger for power and vengeance.

Personally, since the last war, and consequently for the past 25 years, I have been opposed to any form of compulsory service for overseas. This way of thinking has been inculcated in me by the leaders of my party, who have persuaded me that Canada should be my first and foremost consideration. Laurier, King and Lapointe have always refused to entertain the idea of conscription for overseas service. As the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Raymond) said a few minutes ago, there was a compromise on that subject between the different racial groups which make up the Liberal party. That compromise was the foundation of national unity. Is the destruction of that solid basis of internal peace now desired?

In 1940, along with the majority of the members of this house, I spoke against conscription for overseas service. I am still the same man and I hold the same view in 1942. I was, I still am and I shall remain opposed to conscription for overseas service.

With the prime minister of the province of Quebec, the hon. Adélard Godbout, whose courage is to be admired, I declare that our first loyalty must be to our country, Canada, the defence of which must be provided for right here. Now is the time to barricade ourselves within our coasts, just as England has barricaded herself in her island. Let us continue the building of airplanes and ships for the protection of our coasts, but let us also keep here the defenders of the country. I do not want to be pessimistic, but I fear that before very long we shall need here all our resources, all our munitions and all our brave soldiers. The countries we have equipped and armed, to whom we make contributions without regard to our means, may be slow in answering our desperate S.O.S. calls. Let us prepare for the worst, hoping that God will protect us.

The sentiments which I express with all the calmness and moderation at my command are shared by the vast majority of the electors in my constituency and I shall never have the audacity to ask them to modify their views when I have not yet altered mine.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. LIZOTTE: If they are called upon to vote on a plebiscite I know their answer will be "no". However, I intend leaving them perfectly free to express their views according to their conscience and I will ask them to avoid any useless agitation.

A Quebec newspaper, L'Action Catholique, in an editorial dated January 30, 1942, recommends calmness and peacefulness. I quote:

> There is, therefore—without the least thought of partisanship—nothing to gain by involving and jeopardizing King's position in the country, in parliament and in the allied councils. There is no need for agitation in Quebec province to fan public sentiment against conscription. In agitation lies the road to conscription.

Such reasoning, Mr. Speaker, is common sense itself, in my humble opinion.

Let us remain calm, but let us be fearless however, in a clear expression of our views.

In conclusion, I would remind the house, as a citizen from the province of Quebec, that there is one thing not to be overlooked in the heat of discussion. And that is that Mr. King is our only safeguard, that in no one else can we rest our hope, and that the greatest calamity that could befall the Canadian people and particularly the province of Quebec in this tragic hour, would be that power be taken from Mr. King to be handed over to our worst enemies, Messrs. Meighen and company.

Mr. J. W. McGIBBON (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, like practically all those who have taken part in this debate before me, I feel my first words must be those of congratulation to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I thought both the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) and the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) did exceptionally well, and I feel it is freely admitted in the lobbies that these were the best speeches of this kind for a long time.

I wish also to congratulate the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) upon his fine effort. There was a sense of restraint and moderation running through his discourse which I thought sounded just the right note for a leader of the opposition in war time. I wonder whether the man who so earnestly seeks his position would not have done a whole lot of harm to our war effort, had he been in his position.

As one who has not been active in the debates of the last two sessions, it occurs to me that many hon. members, and especially the newer ones, would not know anything about the historic old riding of Argenteuil which I have the honour to represent. Argenteuil is a happy combination of English and French-speaking Canadians, all working together, all working harmoniously. I think we set a model for many other electoral districts in Canada to follow. But no one can think of the constituency I have the honour to represent without thinking of one of my famous predecessors, the late Sir George Perley. Sir George represented Argenteuil for many years, and his sound judgment, sagacity and ability to deal with things directly, and, above all, the fine representation he gave to our constituency in parliament year after year, constituted an outstanding contribution to this parliament. I am personally as proud as a Liberal to pay tribute to the late Sir George Perley as any member of this house. When the people of our riding sent Sir George to Ottawa, they did not do so because he was eternally speaking, but rather because he was not. Sir George saw no need to be eternally speaking; he felt that there were many times when thinking rather than talking made a sounder contribution to the situation. Therefore I would hope in some respects to follow in his footsteps.

First of all, we do not believe in recriminations. It seems to me that there has been far too much talk of how Quebec feels about Toronto, and how Toronto feels about Quebec. In Argenteuil riding, where French-speaking and English-speaking people live in amity and spend their lives working with and cooperating with each other, all this controversy seems so needless, so useless. I am sure the people of Toronto want to win this war just as earnestly, just as sincerely, as we do. I am sure the province of Quebec and Toronto have the same aim in mind—the destruction of Hitler. I think no man can guarantee that we in this country could stand independently against the enemy, but on the other hand, we all agree that with united effort of this country along with that of our formidable allies we shall be successful. We all wish to travel to the same goal, but are arguing over the different routes.

It seems, too, that this debate has narrowed itself down to partisan limits. I do not think the war can be fought in that way. Nor do I believe that what we say will in itself settle the war. I think we are looking at too small a corner of the picture. This war has got beyond the narrowing frames into which some of the debaters would like to confine it.

In reviewing the war, I am bound to notice a few milestones. The first one I would mention is the Ogdensburg pact. Here surely was a strong contribution to our defence, and to our ultimate safety. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), because of his long and valued friendship with President Roosevelt, was able to arrange a mutual defence programme of immense value. Out of that came the joint defence board of Canada and the United States. Thanks to the efforts of this board, in cooperation with the two governments, we have made some notable achievements, not only in defence but as a means of offence also. But our government did not let it rest at that. The Ogdensburg pact was followed by the Hyde Park agreement, and the defence of the continent was further strengthened. I have no doubt, however, that the conversations of President Roosevelt and the Prime Minister ranged far beyond that, and I have no doubt, in view of what has happened since, that considerable thought was given to a war of offence as well as a war of defence.

Another milestone, perhaps the most important of all, was the visit of Mr. Churchill to this continent, during which visit at almost the same time that he described ourselves as the lynch-pin between Britain and United States came that outstanding document which was evidently in part the result of the labours of our Prime Minister and one which I regret to say has been little emphasized in this house. I refer to the Washington pact, of which Canada was a signatory power. This is a new magna charta of freedom, agreed to by twenty-six free nations of the earth.

The reason why I mention the Washington pact is this: out of that document has sprung a supreme war council in Washington. This council is planning the destruction of the axis, not on any small scale but with a panoramic perspective that takes in the whole world. If I may then jump from this broad conception of the war to our own House of Commons, does it not seem absurd that we should be trying to settle allied war strategy right here? Yet that is what some people are trying to do. I myself feel that it is no longer entirely up to us what we are going to do, it is up to this war council. With our relatively small number of soldiers, even by extending our present legislation far beyond its present limits, we may not have nearly enough soldiers to turn the scale. Mark you, I have not the information to argue this point at all, one way or another.

But I ask the house this: how do we know that it is troops the supreme powers want from Canada? Might it not be food, or munitions? Might it not be ships? Are our airmen a paramount consideration? Could it be that our contribution in tanks, guns, merchant ships, corvettes, or something else vital to the war is needed from Canada more than anything else? Again I say, I do not know, and I doubt if some of those who have debated so vehemently know either. I am told it would not be the first time that members of this house were not certain of what they are talking about. But there must be a few people who know better than others. In the light of the general success of our war effort so far, I consider that my chief, the Prime Minister, knows. He has been Prime Minister of this country for a long time. He has been Prime Minister of Canada for the past seven years. During that time, as a result of his position and his personal friendships with people in high places, he has gained an insight into the situation that ordinary members of parliament cannot possibly hope to have. He has been through many important historical moments, and these experiences have all been valuable to him and to the country. Then, too, from day to day, the Prime Minister is receiving the very latest reports on the situation all over the world, as it has developed up to the present. Surely no one has clearer vision and is better versed in the war situation than he.

In the light of all this background, having regard to the long experience the head of the government has had, remembering the personal contacts this administration has had with the great nations and great personalities of this war, it seems to me that the present government is in a better position to know what is best for Canada. Under those circumstances, and hoping to be able to face any future emergency, the government now asks to be relieved of its commitments of the 1940 election period, and I personally believe the government should be relieved of them. To ask the people, to whom the promises were made to relieve this government of those promises is the democratic way. To do it any other way is to emulate the dictators, whom to-day we are fighting with all we have, to destroy.

I have personally sufficient faith in the government to believe that if it wants to be relieved of its commitments, then that is the best thing for Canada. I have sufficient faith in them, too, to know that when the time comes to choose any new or different course, that, too, will be the right course. Again I have sufficient faith in the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to feel that he is the man to guide us through to victory. Talk of supplanting him with somebody else is idle and foolish. The farmers of our constituency have been taught from infancy the danger, yes, the folly, of changing horses in midstream. That applies in Ottawa just as much as it does back in Argenteuil and the rural constituencies.

Let us approach this question, then, without political bias. Here is a man who has been elected with an overwhelming mandate from the people, and elected not in the unthinking days of peace but when the war had been in progress for more than half a year. The Prime Minister asked at that time for a mandate to carry on the war, and the people of Canada gave him that mandate; indeed, it was the greatest mandate ever given to any prime minister in this country. This is not the time for petty politics. I think we should be put in a position to give our best, realizing our duty as a united nation in the allied cause to defeat the common enemy.

On motion of Mr. Bertrand (Prescott) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

CENSORSHIP

PRESS REPORT OF SPEECH OF CANDIDATE IN QUEBEC EAST BY-ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): My attention has been called to a press report of a statement by Mr. Bouchard, who is a candidate in the by-election in the constituency of Quebec East, in a speech prepared for delivery in that city a few days ago, in which he gave utterance to sentiments which were suppressed by the censor on the ground that they were a violation of the defence of Canada regulations. I have not seen the speech, but no doubt officials of the government and members of the government themselves have seen it. I ask the government if investigation has been made with respect to the contents of this speech. If it was in violation of the defence of Canada regulations it was properly suppressed by order of the censor, and if it was in violation of such regulations, what action does the government propose to take in the premises, having regard to what it did in the case of the mayor of Montreal?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I say to my hon. friend that I have no knowledge of what has been said or censored, but I shall look into the matter. I might say further to my hon. friend and to the house that it is a pretty difficult matter to decide what is the wisest course to take with respect to censoring political speeches. Men can be made martyrs of if their words are suppressed; on the other hand they are apt to convey an entirely false impression to others than themselves with respect to the significance of their words if they are allowed to speak freely. In these matters I think at this time we shall have to trust largely to the common sense of the people.

YUKON AIRPORTS

QUESTION AS TO DEFENCE MEASURES IN STRATEGIC AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I wish to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) whether any steps have been taken for the defence of the airports at White Horse, Dawson, Mayo and Watson Lake in the Yukon. The government have recently spent a good deal of public money on some of those airports, and they are worth taking care of. The airport at White Horse is in a particularly strategic position for the service of northern Canada and the territory of Alaska. I should like to know whether anything is being done towards the defence of these airports.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I will consult with my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) and give my hon. friend an answer later.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, February 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Alphonse Fournier for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): On Thursday, January 22, Mr. Speaker, you informed this house of the speech of His Excellency the Governor General. On Friday, January 23, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), seconded by the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald), moved that we "beg leave to offer our humble thanks to your excellency for the gracious speech which your excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament."

On that occasion both the mover and the seconder observed the finest traditions of our parliamentary institutions, and to the tributes that have been paid to them from all parts of this house I should like, in a spirit of deepest sincerity, to add my own.

Then, sir, on January 26, those who were privileged to be here had the pleasure of hearing two very able addresses, one from my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), which, although I did not have the pleasure of hearing it, on account of being engaged on important duties elsewhere, I read most carefully. And I am left amazed as to why the Conservative party in this country found it necessary to supplant him in the leadership of his party at this time. There was also that magnificent and comprehensive address of my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), probably one of the finest in his distinguished public career, which is going to continue for many years in the history of our dominion.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition outlined seven essential points in our war effort. May I say to him immediately that I agree with him in regard to every one of those seven points. The only question is as to priorities.

With one of his remarks I take leave partly to disagree. I quote him, as reported at page 21 of Hansard:

> The defence of the nation lies in Britain, in the English channel, in the North sea, in Russia, in the Near East, in the Far East; wherever the enemy may be found. There, overseas, lies Canada's defence her first line of defence. I think we are all agreed on that principle; at least I hope we are.

Well, sir, while that was definitely true some three months ago, I hold that it is not unqualifiedly true in Canada at the present time. I say that to-day the defence of Canada lies not only on those far frontiers, but also along the indented inlets of British Columbia, along our exposed Atlantic coast, along all the shores of the Dominion of Canada.

The other evening we had a speech by my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), pointing out the potential dangers to our Pacific shores. In parts—and I say this kindly—that speech may have been ill-considered and unguarded; yet in its essential thesis, which I took to be a waking up of Canada to the necessity of taking the utmost possible measures for the defence of the Pacific coast, I find myself in substantial agreement with it. As a matter of fact, quite unintentionally and without his being aware of it, the hon. member's address was a condemnation of most of the speeches we have heard from his colleagues of the Conservative party during the course of this debate. They have insisted, practically to the exclusion of everything else, on raising one issue and one alone in this house at this time; that is, compulsory selective service for the army overseas. As the Prime Minister very carefully and prudently stated in his address there is no real difference except on this point between the policies of the major parties in this house.

As reported at page 32 of Hansard the Prime Minister said:

> Freed from the emotions and passions aroused by the storm of controversy, it will be seen that the only difference that does exist is a difference with respect to the application of compulsion in raising men for military service overseas.

And again:

> The issue, therefore, between the government and its opponents narrows down solely to the question of the application of compulsion in raising men for the army. . . . It should be added that the issue thus narrowed to conscription for overseas service in the army relates only to a possible future contingency, since up to the present the active army has secured the necessary recruits on a voluntary basis.

The last quotation is from page 33 of Hansard. The new policy of the government was announced by the Prime Minister in what I have previously termed that magnificent and comprehensive address. I quote his words, as reported, at page 39 of Hansard:

During 1942, that is this year, up to March 31 next, it is proposed to create overseas a Canadian army of two army corps. . . . In addition, all necessary ancillary units to serve these two corps will be provided.

This involves changing the fourth division to an armoured division and raising another tank brigade, together with the necessary ancillary troops and headquarters staff organizations.

Then, sir, an amendment was moved by the leader of the opposition—an indictment containing four counts against this administration. If the house supports any one of these counts, it votes non-confidence in this government. The first count in the indictment is that the government—

. . . have sought to evade their responsibility by holding a plebiscite, which, in the view of this house, is the negation of responsible government.

The second count regrets that the government has not introduced additional measures designed to—

. . . mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man and woman power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war.

It is in the last few words that the only real difference which divides us is given expression. In the third count my hon. friend regrets that the government has not introduced additional measures designed to—. . . supply the imperative needs of agriculture, industry, and the fighting forces of the nation.

The fourth count is an expression of regret that the government has not introduced additional measures designed to—prepare for the post-war period.

I have yet to hear any hon. member on the other side suggest what the sponsors of the amendment had in mind with regard to the last two counts of their indictment.

I should now like to deal briefly with the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who is not in his seat at the moment. It is expressed also by way of a vote of non-confidence in this administration, and regrets that the government—

. . . have used the sweeping powers conferred by the National Resources Mobilization Act mainly for the conscription of men for home defence, and in the opinion of this house no total effort adequate to meet the present needs of the war, domestic problems and the preparation for post-war conditions is possible without total mobilization of wealth, industry and finance, as well as human resources.

Therefore this house respectfully requests that the forthcoming plebiscite should seek the support of the people of Canada for the complete and effective conscription of war industries, accumulated wealth and financial institutions, at the same time and on the same basis of sacrifice as the suggested extension of the conscription of man-power.

In regard to the various arguments introduced by my hon. friend under these headings, I regret that I cannot support them. In his address, however, he made one important statement to which I would give my complete support. It appears at page 56 of Hansard:

If we are to have this all-out war effort, it must be on the basis of national unity. Every discussion of these matters in this house and in the country ought to be undertaken with due regard to the unity of our people of all races, creeds and tongues. Had the nature and objective of our war effort been clearly placed before the people, our unity would not be endangered. This house has failed to realize that the greatest danger to our unity in war is exactly the same danger we face in peace, the danger from inequality of sacrifice and opportunity.

Let us now, Mr. Speaker, look back to other days; perhaps from the experience of the past we may learn some lessons for the present and the future. In 1917, when the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Hugh Guthrie, Fred Pardee and others in that memorable debate upon the referendum urged the conscription of wealth in Canada, they advocated measures which are in full operation in Canada at the present time. To-day we have no tax-free bonds in which the wealthy man can secure his riches under the guise of patriotism. At the time of which I speak there was not even a federal income tax, which only came, in its somewhat restricted form, largely as a result of the arguments advanced during the session of 1917 in favour of the conscription of wealth, by those great Liberal leaders, although they were severed in regard to that particular issue. In this war I submit that we have gone a great deal farther than anything dreamed of in those days by the most ardent supporters of the conscription of wealth.

The hon. member who moved the amendment to the amendment—and I am not holding this against him—is a socialist, and is completely within his rights in advocating socialism for Canada. But he has been doing so for many years, and the electors of Canada have not yet approved of his policy. When he calls for the conscription of industry, accumulated wealth and financial institutions, this might mean one of two things. If it means the conscription of large incomes, the prevention of profiteering, the utilization of our material resources, no matter to whom they belong, for the prosecution of the war, then I say that this government not only has been given the power to do these things but has done them, and is accelerating the application of its power at a rate that has amazed the entire world.

What is it that we have done? We have limited the profits of industry. We have taxed away a substantial portion of what is left under that limitation. We have done away with profits altogether in a tremendous proportion of our war industries, by setting up state-owned factories. We have taxed the personal incomes of the wealthy almost if not quite to the point of confiscation. We have told the people who have supplies of steel, copper, lumber, and a thousand and one commodities, that not the owners thereof but the Dominion of Canada shall decide what they shall do with their property, to whom they shall supply it and at what price. We have gone into industrial plants and told the proprietors what they are to make and at what price they are to sell it.

We have in control of our financial institutions a national bank which, with its many controls, is compelling the use of our national finances for the benefit of the nation. We have taken over private property, without compunction, when needed for national purposes. We have restricted and curtailed luxury spending so that private moneys shall be at the disposal of the state. We have told the grocers and the butchers that they shall not let scarcity be an excuse for increasing the price of the people's food. We took far-reaching measures for national security, such as the Unemployment Insurance Act and the post-discharge reestablishment plan.

These things we have done and are continuing to do with ever-increasing scope and severity. We have gone farther than any other country whose economy is based upon free enterprise. The marvel is that we have been able to go so far and so fast as we have, without impairing our national efficiency. These things which I have described are the conscription of wealth—conscription to an extent unprecedented in any state whose economy is based upon a system of free enterprise.

But, Mr. Speaker, if the amendment of my hon. friend goes farther than the limitations which I have described, then it asks this house to declare for the abolition of free enterprise and for the substitution of state socialism, a measure which would involve revolution in our whole economic system in Canada. In peace time I would indeed be prepared to debate that issue with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on its merits, and perhaps I might go very far along that road with him. I would disagree with him upon the main issues, and the public would then have an opportunity at recurring elections of deciding the merits and the demerits of the issues at stake. But I submit in the strongest possible way that such a debate in war time is a dissipation of energy. We must in this crisis use the organization which we have attained, use it to the best advantage, and with all the improvements we can make to it, in carrying out the purpose—which, after all, is the purpose of us all—of winning this war for Canada, for the empire, for democracy and for freedom itself.

I have heard arguments from time to time in this house about loss of time while we seek to ascertain the will of the people. But the loss of time and efficiency which would be involved in changing Canada from a system of free enterprise to one of socialism is such as to make any such proposal in war time, to my mind, grotesque and absurd. This amendment, therefore, is not a proposal to use socialism for the more effective prosecution of the war; it is an attempt to use the war as a justification for a socialist revolution. I humbly submit to my fellow Canadians in the house, to hon. members, that there has been too much of that sort of thing in Canada. Every party or clique with a hobby has been using the war as an argument to justify its particular theory.

I would, sir, with great respect suggest that it would be more in our national interest to throw our favourite political theories to one side and concentrate our energies for the time being on using our equipment—our present economic system—for the prosecution of this great and terrible war. Even if one were convinced that a socialist state would be better equipped to prosecute a successful war, a proposition to which the majority of members in the house and the people of Canada would not subscribe, this is no time to divert our energies from defeating the enemy to the confusing and colossal task of uprooting the whole system of private enterprise.

But, sir, on the broad principle of equality of sacrifice, in so far as we are able to adopt it, the present government has made greater strides in the past two or three years than we have ever known before in the records of our Canadian history. The government's programme is based upon the curtailment of luxuries and economic waste to the greatest possible extent. New measures in this direction are being introduced as rapidly as we can organize the procedure for administration. Greatly, therefore, as one sympathizes with the spirit which prompted the amendment to the amendment, one is forced to ask at this time that it be defeated in the house, because, in the first place, it expresses a want of confidence in the government; because, in the second place, the machinery for its accomplishment is already on the statute books of this country, and because, in the third place, underlying it is the demand for a socialist revolution in Canada, in the midst of a war.

I now come back again to the main amendment moved by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. In language which is far from being definite or specific, it refers to the question of compulsory selective service for overseas in the army. Before I discuss that issue, as I mean to do later on, fairly, freely and frankly, may I say a word about the last paragraph of the amendment. That paragraph refers to measures designed to meet post-war problems. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what exactly was in the minds of hon. members opposite when they drafted this particular amendment. I do say, however, that the government has submitted to this house a series of far-reaching measures dealing with post-war problems, and I am glad to be able to say that at least two further important measures will be submitted at the present session.

The Unemployment Insurance Act of 1940 was primarily a post-war measure. The post-discharge plan, which was passed by order in council, but tabled in the house immediately after it was passed, giving the benefit of the Unemployment Insurance Act to members of the armed forces, and providing other measures of assistance to discharged men, is a post-war measure of the highest importance.

At the last session a competent committee of members of parliament assisted in the revision and amendment of the Pension Act. At the same time that committee reviewed the work of a dozen committees of civil servants and others, covering the whole field of civil reestablishment of members of our forces. That committee submitted a report containing certain recommendations, and I should like at an appropriate time to place on record the actual action taken in regard to each of its specific recommendations.

Of the measures to be introduced at this session, one will deal with a system of land settlement which, I believe, will be found by all members of the house to be one of the most constructive and far-reaching proposals of its kind ever submitted to parliament.

In regard to the main problem of reconstruction, the government appointed a committee consisting of six of our most distinguished Canadian citizens—and I should like to place on Hansard at a future time, for the information of hon. members, the names of its personnel. When the opportunity presents itself, I intend to proceed with a comprehensive analysis of the work already carried out, both administratively and by research, but I submit it is not possible at the present time to introduce any further measure which could be effective. Therefore I fail to understand the exact significance of that point in the amendment moved by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition.

I wish now to revert to what is, after all, the main theme of this debate, and the main theme of the main and rather beclouded amendment. I must agree with my right hon. leader that it certainly is not definitely or specifically expressed. The government of this country had three alternatives before it. One was to disregard completely its solemn and sacred pledge given to the people and come out for overseas conscription, as a national policy. I ask hon. members in all corners of the house to envision what would have been the effect in the house and country. The result would be a divided and disunited nation in Canada at the present time.

The second alternative was, as a government, regardless of possible future developments and necessities, to come out against conscription. I ask hon. gentlemen to envision what would be the effect in this house or in this country—and I reply again: A divided and disunited nation. The government has, in my humble judgment, taken the only honourable course, that is, asking for relief from a pledge which was solemnly and sacredly given in the very midst of a war, and by which this government must stand until it is released therefrom by the people themselves, or until the government itself should fall.

We are not taking a referendum on the merits or demerits of conscription itself. We are asking the people to give us the authority, in case the nation's necessity demands it, to act, irrespective of previous pledges, in the best interests of this country and of the cause for which we are fighting to-day and must, I fear, fight for many years. Indeed, if we were asking for a referendum on the merits of the issue, there is nothing contrary to tradition in that. Australia took two referenda on conscription in the midst of the last war. Canada had a general election on the issue in the midst of the last war.

Let me trace history very briefly. In 1917 the issue arose in this house. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the then honoured leader of the opposition, that magnificent leader of the province of Quebec, moved in this house for a referendum on the issue and said that as far as his influence went, he and the province which he directly represented would be bound by the result of that referendum. However, his amendment was defeated, and the country was subjected to a general election under the iniquitous War-time Elections Act, which divided Canada and has been responsible for the division of Canada from 1917 until 1942.

Mr. Speaker, there was taken on the strength of the Canadian expeditionary force in the last war a total of 619,636 men. Of these there were obtained by voluntary enlistment, 536,281 men. The number raised by the Military Service Act, after all exemptions were dealt with, was only 83,355. When the Military Service Act became law, the total voluntary recruits were approximately 435,000. After the Military Service Act became law, the number who joined was 184,000. After the passage of the military service law, we obtained by the voluntary enlistment of all classes who did not come within the confines of that act, 83,355 out of 184,000. Therefore, even during the regime of the Military Service Act, the voluntary system produced more recruits than conscription, and of Canada's army in 1914-18, five-sixths were volunteers and only one-sixth were obtained by conscription. That issue passed, but there survived the grave national disunity which has never yet been completely suppressed in our dominion.

Then we come to 1925 when the present leader of the Conservative party, who is now seeking election in a constituency in Ontario, delivered an address in Hamilton on November 16. I am going to quote only one paragraph of that address. I have the complete speech here and if any hon. member wants it in full I am ready to make it available. He said this:

> The government would have to act on its judgment, but before there was anything in the way of participation involving the dispatch of troops, the will of the people of Canada should first be obtained.
> I have myself not the slightest fear but that, if danger threatened Canada again, this country would respond as it responded in 1914, but I believe, in future, it will be best for all that, before a government takes a step so momentous as the dispatch of troops, the will of the people should be known.

A few days later, at Actonvale, Quebec, during the course of a by-election in Bagot county, the same distinguished gentleman spoke as follows:

> If a crisis should occur in which our country's peace would be threatened, I declare, so long as the reins of power are in my hands, I declare this country will not send a man out of Canada without the country being consulted. Neither one party or the other was of that opinion when the last war broke out. Both parties agreed that immediate action must be taken, but the decision of the Conservative party to-day is that the people, as well as parliament, must decide such action.

The phraseology of my hon. friend's amendment is that this is a negation of responsible government, but the gentleman who is to-day the leader of the Conservative party went beyond the confines of parliament. Speaking in that by-election, he said that "the people, as well as parliament, must decide such action". That is all we are asking for to-day, that the will of the people shall prevail on a lesser issue, that is, to give the government the power, if necessary, to be free to exercise its authority to send troops by compulsion to serve anywhere. What we refer to the people is much smaller in its phase than what Mr Meighen declared in 1925 should be referred to the people.

Then we come to March, 1939, just prior to the outbreak of the present war. The then leader of the Conservative party spoke on March 28 as follows:

> Because of the danger of attack upon Canada itself and because of the necessity of maintaining Canada as a united nation, I do not believe that Canadian youth should be conscripted to fight outside the borders of Canada.

And again he used these words:

> Conscription in the last war led to violent racial antagonisms and much disharmony, and was of no real military value.

The leader whom they followed gave the same pledge to the people that we gave. At the special war session, on September 8, 1939, the Prime Minister made the following statement as reported on page 36 of Hansard:

> The present government believe that conscription of men for overseas service will not be a necessary or an effective step. No such measure will be introduced by the present administration.

Next came the challenge from Quebec referred to by my hon. friend who spoke yesterday afternoon. The four ministers in this administration from Quebec staked their political lives upon the issue as to whether Quebec should come into a total war effort with the rest of Canada. In that campaign the Liberal forces were returned by a tremendous majority on a policy of cooperation with the rest of Canada in regard to our effort in the war. Then came something which has become rather familiar in the last few years. The government was challenged by the government of Ontario. We have at the present time another challenge from the same Mr. Hepburn, from the same government which has been somewhat disrupted this morning. The challenge came from Mr. Hepburn and his government, a resolution made by the premier himself, supported by his companion Colonel George Drew, in the following words:

That this house has heard with interest the reports made by the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition of the result of their visit to Ottawa, to discuss war measures with the national government and this house hereby endorses the statements made by the two members in question and joins with them in regretting that the federal government at Ottawa has made so little effort to prosecute Canada's duty in the war in the vigorous manner the people of Canada desire to see.

The Prime Minister of this country immediately decided to challenge the condemnation by the government of Ontario of the policy of this administration by appealing to the people, and the Prime Minister and his supporters in this house were returned by the free will of the free people of this free dominion with the greatest majority in the whole history of our party. In that election campaign, the leader of the Conservative party used these words:

No one knows better than Mr. King my position against conscription, because he was present in the house on March 30 last when I made my position very clear.

What happened next? The present leader of the opposition—there have been so many leaders I have great difficulty in keeping track of them—was entrusted with his present responsibility, which I may say without hesitation he has filled splendidly in this house. He made a tour of the Canadian west. Speaking at Fort William at a luncheon tendered to him by members of the Lakehead Conservative clubs last summer, he indicated that he was not sure of the feeling in the west in regard to this question of conscription. He used these words, as taken from the press.

It is my considered opinion that mobilization will come, but not unless it has public support. It is the duty of the citizens of the country, if they believe in the right of the principle, to stimulate public opinion.

That was the stand of my hon. friend. If that was their duty, it is his duty and the duty of those who sit around him here to-day. But he did more than that. He spoke in Toronto, in one of the great resorts of those who are high up in the political and social register in that great city, the Albany club, to members of the Conservative party. This is the declaration of my hon. friend who is the acting leader of the opposition in this house:

I have been urged to declare for conscription of man-power. What would happen if I did? Immediately the Conservative party in parliament nailed conscription to its masthead, we would consolidate all those forces that have been opposed to us since 1917, and they would be marshalled against us.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

Conscription is bound to come to the front more and more insistently—

Then listen to this:

—but it must come from the people themselves.

Those are the words of the acting leader of the Conservative party, the leader of the Conservative party in this house, less than three months ago, when he was speaking in Toronto. He said:

. . . but it must come from the people themselves.

That is exactly the policy of this government and of all honest supporters of this government in this house to-day. He went on to say:

Some will disagree with this view. I have studied it from every angle. If it were put to a plebiscite, I don't know what would happen. I wish you could see the letters I have received —letters from mothers who say they didn't raise their boy to be a soldier.

Then he said: "Our sense of citizenship must be such that we will go out and tell the people what the situation is," but "if you make conscription a political issue, you'll retard its adoption."

Well, sir, they have certainly made it a political issue, but not for one second, I believe, at the urging of the leader of their party in this house but of that coterie outside who are the first cousins of the gold-diggers on the roof-garden. I wonder whether his own followers in this house will be satisfied to be classified, in the language of their own house leader, as amongst those who are retarding the adoption of conscription?

On November 13, 1941, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, after a curious conclave in this capital city of Canada, and after a week's peculiar pondering, accepted the leadership of the Conservative party from which he was kicked out by Howard Ferguson and the group in Winnipeg in 1927. In accepting the leadership, after a certain amount of coercion by my hon. friends opposite, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen said:

I shall, therefore, urge with all the power I can bring to bear compulsory selective service over the whole field of war.

So that now, despite the pledges made by hon. members opposite in the election of 1940, pledges by which they are sacredly bound to-day, commitments to which they gave their solemn adherence—despite these pledges, just because the outside leader spoke as I have mentioned, conscription is now officially raised as a political issue in the Dominion of Canada.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it must be debated calmly and emphatically; but not now. It is not the issue before this house now. The issue now is to trust the people—now, as Mr.

Meighen said in Hamilton and in Bagot, and as my hon. friend opposite said to his loyal friends of the Albany club, in Toronto, on the thirty-first day of October.

Then, adding their voice to that of the new leader, there was appointed the other day at a sinister meeting on the roof-garden of an illustrious hotel in Toronto a committee of two hundred, who are opposed to the will of the people of Canada expressing itself. They are the people who are to decide on compulsory service. Are they more powerful, more influential than the mass of the voting people in this freedom-loving country? If that day ever comes in Canada, this will no longer be a free land, and it is to keep Canada a free land that our glorious troops are fighting to-day and will fight to-morrow and every day until peace comes again to us all.

William Jennings Bryan once said:

> You shall not press down upon the brow of labour this crown of thorn. You shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold.

But that is what the members of that committee, inspired by the great wealthy interests of Canada, would do. They are endeavouring to get control of parliament and to dictate its policies. Under compulsion and coercion they would, for the sake of imposing their special point of view on others, crucify the unity of Canada on a cross of gold.

So, Mr. Speaker, what are the alternatives now? What are we asking for? The speech from the throne has plainly stated that what we seek from the people of Canada is a release from our pledges, and just as truly as parliament controls the government, just as truly, at least in a democracy, do the people control parliament. We are, therefore, going back to the source of our power, to the people themselves and asking them to give us this complete freedom of action to act upon these great national questions in the light of the necessities of the nation as we see them, and our rights and responsibilities as God gives us the power and the strength to see them and to assess them.

There were certain obligations mentioned by my right hon. leader and certain obligations mentioned by the leader of the opposition. To my mind it is entirely a question of priorities. This war is entirely different from the great war of twenty-five years ago. This war has changed in its aspect as far as we are concerned, very vitally indeed in the last three months. The leader of the opposition told us—and I must say he was expressing the orthodox military opinion—that the defence of Canada lay on those far-flung frontiers where the battle rages furiously to-day. I am inclined to think, and certainly if I believe the assertions of the leader of the opposition, the order of priorities has changed.

Regardless of what our requirements may be for the defence of Canada, having committed ourselves already, as we have done in the past and we are doing here to-day in the speech from the throne, to certain obligations, of sending troops overseas, I have no hesitation in asserting that the first obligation upon Canada, the first priority, is to make sure that essential reinforcements to provide against wastage by battle or other causes must be provided for those we have trained or are training to send beyond our borders to fight for our country. That, Mr. Speaker, is the least we can do. That is an obligation of honour, and when hon. gentlemen opposite accuse us of not supporting our boys overseas, I wish to tell them now that not only will this government support them by providing the best equipment in all the world but will support them with essential reinforcements wherever they may be employed or wherever they may be engaged.

If we get a mandate in the affirmative from the people of Canada to release us from our pledges, and if voluntary enlistments should not be sufficient to provide these reinforcements, then as far as I am concerned my recommendation would be to resort to all measures and means that may be necessary to see that these essential reinforcements of trained men are forthcoming, and forthcoming in time.

Then I come to the second priority. Possibly it should be the first. I am sure that there are some of my friends who would put it first, and I am not saying they are not correct. A few months ago the defence of Canada was not the vital problem it is to-day. On account, however, of the shifting fortunes of war, the defence of Canada is a very vital problem at the present moment. I must say frankly that I do believe our duty is, at the moment, to use all our resources to see that our two coastlines have all the protection that the manhood of Canada can supply and the producing industries of Canada can equip. For that purpose we have the fullest authority under the National Resources Mobilization Act, and that authority we shall use, as was announced by the Prime Minister at the opening of this debate.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in seeking this authority from this house at the moment by way of the adoption of a resolution, and by seeking this authority from the people later on, as fast as we possibly can obtain it, if there is to be any delay in obtaining the authority, the delay will not be occasioned by us, and the responsibility for that delay shall rest elsewhere.

We are appealing, in my humble judgment, to the altitudes of truth and to the high ways of honour.

Next we come to our contribution—I can only mention it briefly as I go along—in munitions, in supplies and in food, already well described by several speakers in this debate. I believe most definitely that, for us, man-power is not the greatest problem in this world battle. If man-power alone were all, then the teeming millions of China would be decisive. I believe that our most effective contribution most certainly comes from our factories, our farms, our fisheries and our fields.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have raised the question of delay. But this argument ignores two facts. One is that the government already has complete power to draft men for service in Canada. That authority has been and is being exercised to the maximum extent to which our military advisers say they are able to accommodate, train and equip the men so drafted.

As I have just stated, the problem of cooperating with our allies overseas is not entirely one of man-power. The demand from Russia, China, and Great Britain is for equipment, and Canada has used her productive capacity to the extent of sending at least half of her production of military equipment to other countries. Canadian guns and tanks and armoured cars, Canadian equipment of many kinds, have already seen service in Russia, Libya, Malaya and China. In so far as Canada's man-power contribution is concerned, we have sent the greatest possible force that could be equipped without depriving our allies of equipment needed on the vital battle fronts.

In this argument that a plebiscite involves delay, the suggestion has been advanced that we are not in a position to send reinforcements to the men already operating overseas. I say definitely and emphatically that that is not so. It has not been considered advisable to publish full particulars about the strength of our forces; but as we examine the figures that have been published, we are able to estimate the strength of the formations overseas. We know that substantial numbers of the troops now overseas are themselves reinforcements. We know approximately the numbers of men in Canada who enlisted voluntarily for service anywhere.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

Then, with regard to the question of national unity, which some regard as of little importance in connection with this issue, some, not in this house so much as outside, in their lofty pretensions and their exuberant protestations, scoff at this question of national unity in Canada. I humbly venture to suggest to you, sir, that if there is, during the hard, anxious and difficult days ahead for all of us, one thing in Canada above all else necessary in our dominion, it is the unity of our people from shore to shore. We have had in Canada nearly two hundred years of national life on the basis of a partnership between the French and the English, and, later on, of other European races. This is one of the greatest achievements in all history in the interests of peace. Twenty-four years ago, however, through gross mismanagement in this country, the seed of suspicion and distrust between the two major races was sown. Rightly or wrongly—it does not matter much at this stage—the feeling was definitely engendered in French Canada that the other great race was putting French-Canadians in a position of inferiority. We have endeavoured in the present war in every way possible to avoid any such situation.

We have had, up to the present time, a united effort, by representatives of the two races and of others, associated in the government, associated in parliament and associated in the armed forces in a common effort to exert Canada's maximum strength in the struggle against forces of evil, forces which are hated with equal intensity by all Canadians, no matter from what race they come.

If, sir, through the heedless overexuberance of fanatical extremists on both sides, we were to divide the component parts of our population and set up conflict between them, the loss of efficiency in our national war effort would inevitably be tremendous and irretrievable.

Certain old sores continue to rankle even now in the hearts of humble people on the farms and in the villages of one of our greatest provinces. Nevertheless, to-day, the leaders of French Canada in this parliament have undertaken to go out into the counties of Quebec and appeal to their people to free the government from a pledge which was given with honesty, with sincerity, and in the best interests of the nation.

As a Scottish-Canadian, I would pay tribute to the courage and patriotism of my French-Canadian colleagues in the cabinet and in this house for the courage and devotion they have shown in their willingness to give leadership to their people in overcoming ancient grudges and old prejudices. As a Scottish-

Canadian I may be permitted, however, to appeal to my fellow Canadians to hold their hands at this critical hour and to do nothing which will militate against the success of the noble effort which French-Canadian leaders have pledged themselves to undertake at this time. Let us rather seek paths of cooperation and harmony so that together, as Canadians, we may march as one united nation together to victory!

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to a brief discussion of the plebiscite.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has exceeded his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Proceed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, through you may I express my profound thanks to the house for its courtesy.

The challenge has been thrown across the floor of this house, the challenge has been reechoed in the editorials of leading publications of this country, "Why a plebiscite on this issue?" Let me remind this house that Australia took twice a referendum on conscription in the midst of the last war. Let me remind the house that Canada had a general election on this issue in the midst of the last war. The present proposal, therefore, although it has nothing whatsoever to do with the merits or demerits of compulsory selective service for overseas, is no departure from well-established practice.

The leaders of the Conservative party have no valid reason for professing to be shocked at the present government adopting a proposal which, in some form, they themselves have repeatedly advocated, and which they themselves utilized. Their policy is that whatever the government does is wrong, even when it does a thing which they themselves have previously advocated.

To the question, "Why a plebiscite?" let me give an answer, not in my own language, for the moment, but in the language of an eminent Canadian who is not to-day a member of this house. He said:

> Surely it is worth while in any British country to have the people understand once for all that they are in control of the great policies of that country and that their control is real and not merely a sham.

And then again this same gentleman, a former Prime Minister of Canada, went on to say in the same context:

> Now the next objection urged is this: that the very fact of submitting such questions to the electors contemplates the idea, possibly, that the electorate might decide adversely, and then the consequences would be terrible. . . . You can trust the people in this matter as in everything else, if you give the people the truth. . . . Bring that right down in the hearts of the people and you can trust the people of this country.

Those are not my words, or the words of the Prime Minister, or the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. They are the words of Arthur Meighen uttered in Winnipeg on October 11, 1927. They are the words of the man who is to-day the leader of the Conservative party. And his followers ask us across the floor of this house, "Why a plebiscite?"—the question which was answered by Mr. Meighen in that speech at Winnipeg: "Trust the people, because the people rule."

The present campaign, which is inspired by that group on the roof-top in Toronto is not so much a war against Germany and Italy, it is a war against this cabinet and against our revered leader, the Prime Minister of Canada. If these loose-talking, gold-digging Tories believe for one second that any member of this administration is not one hundred per cent behind our leader the Prime Minister, it is the greatest mistake they ever made in their lives. Our war against Germany, Italy and Japan is a war for freedom and democracy, the establishment of decency and honour, and the observance of pledges; and every Liberal or Conservative member in this house was elected on a platform that expressly stated that conscription for overseas service would not be adopted in Canada.

I go so far as to agree that circumstances have so changed in the progress of the war that the government and parliament itself, including hon. members opposite, should ask the country to be freed from this pledge. I do not, however, see in the immediate developments at this time—but this is a purely personal opinion—any reason for increasing our overseas commitments beyond those already made and those announced in the speech from the throne. On the contrary, there are arguments such as those used by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) which, in my opinion, strongly suggest the desirability of strengthening our Canadian defences within our own domain, the Dominion of Canada.

The time has now come, and definitely come, when the government should be free, without breaking faith with the people, from whom all our authority comes, to adopt any course which will most effectively contribute to the successful outcome of the war and the effective defence of our Canadian soil.

If taking the plebiscite involved delay in some vital phase of our war effort, I could sympathize with those who argue against taking it. But since, in my judgment, it does not and cannot involve any delay which hinders or hampers or retards our war effort, I now appeal to those who feel that the government's hands should be freed, to stop this noisy panic-mongering appeal and get out into the country and convince those who need convincing to vote affirmatively on this great plebiscite to ascertain the will of the Canadian people. In that way we have some prospect of maintaining national unity.

The method suggested by a small element, that the government should disregard its pledges, could lead to nothing but strife, dissension, antagonism and charges of betrayal. What would be the attitude of the opposition if this government, without consulting the people, had broken its solemn pledges and proceeded with measures that were definitely in defiance of those pledges? No one likes a plebiscite for its own sake, but I submit it is the only honourable way to deal with a situation which is as much the result of actions of hon. members opposite and of their leader who is not in this house, as it is of actions of this government.

I have heard during the progress of this debate questions hurled across the floor of the house: What will the government do after this vote has been taken? Well, if one were to accept the argument of the hon. member for Vancouver South about the situation existing on the Pacific coast, it would almost lead some people to the conclusion that we should not send another soldier out of the country.

Mr. GREEN: I did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not suggest that my hon. friend said it, but I suggest that what he said might influence some people to think no further soldiers should be sent out of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: I would say that we should do both.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am glad my hon. friend has amended his opinion.

On the other hand, if we listened to those who advocate another point of view, we might be led into a course which might greatly imperil the defence of our own Canadian soil. The situation on the Pacific coast we all know hinges on the outcome of the present battle in the far east, and the outcome of that struggle is not yet determined.

Now a word on the question of man-power. Some figures have come to my attention, but in their application I do not attempt to speak with final authority. Figures in regard to our man-power resources are undergoing most intensive study at the present time, in order that we may have the most complete and accurate information possible. That is the sort of information that any country must have before any final decision is reached in regard to the broad placement of its man-power.

Our duty in Canada is, first, to defend our own territory to the uttermost; and second, to contribute to the striking power of the united nations in such a way as, in the end, to destroy the enemy. This involves the best possible use of our man-power.

The census reveals that Canada's population is approximately 43 per cent greater now than at the time of the last war. But a detailed analysis indicates that the increase in the number of men of military age is not nearly as great as the increase in the general population. In 1914 Canada had just had a tremendous influx of young immigrants, mostly unmarried and of military age.

In the last war, when industry utilized less than half as many people as are engaged in war production to-day, when we had no air training plan and no real problem of home defence, Canada supported in the field four army divisions, and a fifth was mobilized but had to be broken up for reinforcements. The government were advised by their military staff in pre-war years that having regard to population and the claims of other services, the number of divisions which this country could maintain in warfare was seven. We have already formed six, and we have made demands upon our man-power for other purposes not fully anticipated when those estimates were made.

Let us consider how we have utilized our resources. Financially, Canada has declared that there is no limit; that what we have capacity to do physically we can and will endeavour to finance.

Industrially, we have undertaken tasks of a kind and magnitude never attempted in Canada before. Prior to the outbreak of this war Canada had never manufactured any weapons except rifles, although the manufacture of machine guns had been begun. We had made a small beginning in the production of modern service types of aircraft, never made in Canada prior to 1937. To-day Canada is turning out tanks, heavy and light artillery guns. We have the greatest machine gun factory to-day in the whole world—and for that, with some modesty, I may perhaps claim some credit—and we are manufacturing seven different types of service aircraft.

In the last war, Canada recruited into the Canadian expeditionary force, by the voluntary system and conscription combined, 619,000 men in four and a half years of war. She utilized also 275,000 in war industry, a total of 894,000 men. In the present war, in two and a half years we have built up the strength of our armed forces to over 400,000 men, and in addition we are utilizing in industry 625,000 persons of whom 550,000 are men.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister a question? While he is giving these figures, can he tell us how many men have been discharged from the forces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, in round numbers about 45,000. That number is approximately correct.

Apart from agriculture, therefore, we have harnessed to the war effort over a million men; that is, in a little more than two years we have exceeded under our voluntary system the total man-power effort of four and a half years of the last war. These are only round figures; they are not by any means exhaustive. But on the studies now in progress, our man-power policy must ultimately be determined.

Now I approach my conclusion, with the indulgence of the house.

Mr. CASSELMAN: No. The hon. member has spoken over an hour now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I approach the conclusion of this presentation by pointing out some of the possible disadvantages of introducing compulsory selective service for overseas. First, there is the risk of sacrificing that spirit of national harmony and unity which until very recently prevailed throughout our dominion. Second, there is the possibility of stirring up antagonisms as between those of different racial origin in Canada. It is only necessary to remember the situation that existed in the last war—some of us recall it now—to recognize the importance of racial accord in our dominion. We have lived together in peace and harmony in Canada for 175 years. The nearest approach to a breach was in 1917. I believe that only the calm, wise and prudent leadership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier prevented violence and bloodshed then. He confined his opposition to parliamentary and democratic methods.

I say again that before the war came, this government gave a solemn pledge that, in the event of war, service outside Canada should only be undertaken freely. When war came, this pledge was solemnly reaffirmed both by the government and by the opposition of the present day, by practically all hon. members of this parliament; not only in the general election and before the war but in the very midst of the war that policy of declaring ourselves on this very issue on which we are now seeking a plebiscite of the people was endorsed by the overwhelming majority of the free-voting people of Canada.

As to whether, at this time of all times, the spokesmen for a nation engaged in this war should disregard their solemn pledges, I cannot do better than quote the words of the Prime Minister in an address which he delivered at Vancouver on June 30 last:

> The present unhappy state of the world is, in a large part, the result of broken pledges. Bad faith, broken pledges and disregard of the popular will are the very forces against which Canada is fighting to-day.
> That being so, I wish the more emphatically to affirm the government's intention to keep the pledge repeatedly given to the people of Canada.

So, Mr. Speaker, I leave this issue to the house. I have endeavoured to make the situation as clear as possible. I have endeavoured to analyse the significance of the amendment to the amendment and why I cannot accept or receive it. I have endeavoured to analyse the significance of the amendment itself, and its implications in several respects. I have endeavoured to make clear to the house that both the subamendment and the main amendment are definite declarations of a lack of confidence in this administration. I must emphasize, therefore, with all the strength at my command, that any vote for the subamendment is a vote of non-confidence in this government. I must further emphasize that any vote for the main amendment is a vote of non-confidence in this government.

I believe I have fairly and honestly endeavoured to meet the arguments which have been adduced in support of their protestations. We are not seeking dictatorial powers. We are appealing to the people, who are the masters of parliament. We are appealing through parliament, who are our masters, to the people, who are the masters of us all. We are appealing to the people for a mandate, if you will, to be unrestricted and untrammelled, not impeded or retarded, in adopting such measures in connection with the provision of men for military service as in the government's best judgment are necessary for the fullest and most whole-hearted war effort by the Dominion of Canada. I would plead, if the plea would be of any avail, that to-day, if possible, we should unite our forces and remember only the dark clouds that hang over this nation, and the uncertain course of our sacred cause.

I fear, however, that we must have dissension. I trust that the conscience of every hon. lady and gentleman in this house is clear in regard to the course that he or she is pursuing. I do aver and strongly avow that in my judgment, at this stage, we should even sacrifice some of our convictions in order to get together, if possible, upon a common, united policy for the future of Canada, which we all in this chamber endeavour to serve and for which we have a deep-seated affection.

I trust that the great majesty of the effort we have made up until now may not be marred by bickerings or dissensions or discords among ourselves. I trust that we all may be prepared, as I certainly am prepared, to sacrifice much for the sake of a common unity and a common harmony, so that we may be privileged, in this dark period of our nation's destiny, together to work out a plan for Canada in this great struggle, which shall be a plan of purpose, a plan of honour, a plan of unstinted effort and a plan, I would hope in the end, of great achievement and proud accomplishment.

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), who has just concluded a lengthy address, has given a complete and extended review of the shortcomings, the sins of omission and of commission, of this party. I hope he has not omitted anything. If I were able to speak with the fervour, the fluency and the high-powered eloquence of the minister, perhaps I might be able to make some impression. However, I shall endeavour to keep below the boiling point, and to confine my remarks to the speech from the throne.

This debate is on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. That speech is brief and very carefully worded. In some respects it is as clear as it is possible for words to be; in other instances it is just about as vague as expediency could demand. During the last campaign the government gave this pledge against compulsory service outside Canada; and, at this time of gravest crisis in the history of the world, it is proposed to hold a plebiscite asking the people of Canada to relieve the government of that pledge. The National Resources Mobilization Act provides for compulsory service within Canada. The speech from the throne does not tell us what is going to happen whether the plebiscite vote is yes or no, but the basis of this entire discussion is simply: shall we or shall we not have compulsory service for overseas, to reinforce and relieve those young Canadians now voluntarily serving beyond Canadian shores?

The plebiscite is vague in this respect, that if the people of Canada vote against it the situation simply remains as it is. If they vote for it the government then is given freedom to act as its judgment may dictate. Well, this is a very live question right across the dominion. Some portions of Canada are calling for conscription; other portions are very much opposed to it. In the province of Quebec we have the Minister of Justice contesting a by-election. I do not say that he says outright that there will not be conscription for overseas service, but certainly he is creating an atmosphere of assurance to the people of Quebec that there will not be such conscription; and in that respect he is supported by the premier of Quebec, who simply says, "Well, you need not fear; Mr. King will not bring in conscription. He is opposed to it." That is the situation, whether or not the government takes exception to it. Then we also have a by-election in Welland, being contested by the Minister of Labour. I can tell this house that the government candidate there, and those speaking for him, are having the greatest difficulty in selecting words which will fit their endeavour to soothe the people of that district into the belief that the government will bring in conscription. So that we have two opposite views, and we cannot blame the people of this country for being a little concerned about it.

I am very much in accord with the suggestion put forward yesterday by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) that this parliament should be permitted to decide the question. Parliament is not deciding the question whether we shall have conscription; that is not the wording of it. Parliament is deciding only whether it will relieve the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government from its election obligations. As is stated in the speech from the throne, the government then reserves the freedom of acting as its judgment dictates. The progress of the war makes it necessary for one to change one's pledge. The Prime Minister himself has told us over and over again that the government has laid down the principle that there will be no participation by Canada in a war without presenting the matter to parliament. But we had a declaration of war against Roumania, one against Finland and one against Hungary, without the government's coming to parliament; we had a further declaration against Japan without coming to parliament, and I am sure nobody in Canada has taken exception to the government's action in those respects—not at all.

I believe the people of Canada would, without question, approve action by parliament to decide this matter, and which would relieve the Prime Minister of his obligations, thereby saving the time, money and discontent which would naturally be connected with a plebiscite, at a time when all the energy of our people should be directed to war activities, when the time of the government should be taken up with war measures, and when every interest centres around the putting through successfully of a loan for the purpose of carrying on our part in the war.

The other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) stated his position with respect to public opinion and the plebiscite. He comes from Nova Scotia. In the constituency of Kootenay West we have innumerable people who in the early days came from that province. There were lawyers, doctors and farmers, and they have done well in British Columbia. They form a creditable portion of the people in my constituency. A similar cross-section of the residents of every constituency in Canada would show a similar representation from the maritime provinces. The minister acts precisely as his conscience dictates, and I believe that is just the way every hon. member acts. He reflects the views of his constituents, and if he does not do it in a way that will retain the confidence of his electors he will have a successor at the next election.

In October last the executive council of the Canadian Legion presented to the Prime Minister an appeal for the total utilization of our resources and man-power in the prosecution of the war. That appeal was endorsed by 1,470 branches of the Legion across Canada. It has been endorsed by the fathers, mothers, brothers and sisters of the members of those 1,470 branches, and those people ask that the mobilization act be amended so that compulsory service will apply beyond the shores of Canada, as well as within Canada.

That must be accepted as the general opinion of the people in my district, even if hon. members are not willing to accept it as the opinion of people in the provinces east of Ontario. The appeal by the Legion has been endorsed by industrial, mining and agricultural communities in my district; it has been endorsed by boards of trade, by municipal councils, by school boards, by ministerial associations, by service clubs, by fraternal organizations, and others. I say that as a member of the house one must reflect and act upon the views of his constituents.

The speech from the throne contains the statement that the policy of the government is one of total national effort for total war. That is one of the vague phrases in the speech. What does it mean? Nobody knows what it means, and the government will not tell us. But surely any hon. member will admit that the man on the street interprets it to mean that there will be compulsory service to relieve those who have volunteered for service overseas.

On many occasions the government has made it clear that parliament is supreme. The speech from the throne points out that at this time of greatest crisis in the world's history the administration should possess complete freedom to act, subject only to its responsibility to parliament and irrespective of previous commitments, as its judgment dictates. Without being prejudiced, one might properly construe that to mean, as political expediency dictates.

I emphasize the fact that as members directly representing the people of Canada surely we have the power in parliament to relieve the Prime Minister of his obligations. We can pass laws; we can tell the people what they shall and shall not do; we can tell them where they shall and shall not go. We can tell them what price they shall or shall not pay for an article. The people at large have given us that responsibility; surely they will acknowledge our authority to relieve the government of an obligation which was not so urgent at the time it was made.

Last Monday the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) referred to useless extravagance in recruiting. I believe the Minister of Finance could not do better than see to it that there is some curtailment in general expenditures.

One of the branches of the Legion in my district sent in a resolution protesting against the holding of a general conference in Victoria early in November. Recruiting officers and citizens received invitations to attend this conference, as did many people in West Kootenay and other parts of British Columbia. The conference was called to discuss recruiting methods, notwithstanding the fact that every minister of the crown and other people whose services they could enlist had been speaking over the radio on the same matter. Some two hundred guests attended, and they had their travelling and living expenses paid. They were given a good time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Also a banquet.

Mr. ESLING: At the very least the cost must have been $10,000. This created so much criticism that the Rossland branch of the Canadian Legion protested against this extravagance. There is every reason why they should. The government is engaged in raising war loans, and the children and fathers and mothers of this country are being asked to purchase war savings stamps and certificates. Not a very healthy atmosphere is created when the public see such useless expenditures of money. I was interested in hearing the Minister of Finance say that he had received letters threatening a boycott of the war loan. I hope that these threats are confined to the few letters the minister has received. There is an old saying that a member of the opposition should never send a bouquet across to a cabinet minister unless it is followed by a brick. I have no bricks. I just want to say that in my district it is considered that the energy, the aggressiveness and the sincerity of the Minister of Finance have been the dominant factors in the success of the war loans.

I should like to quote two instances of what I would term absolute negligence in connection with recruiting. I do not think we can blame young men who have good jobs for not wanting to enlist. They feel that if they do, someone else will take their jobs. Take the Doukhobors for instance. They are absolved from enlisting or from undergoing training of any kind. The government laid out a piece of work and told them that if they would not go into the training camps they would have to do some public work, such as road building. They were to receive fifty cents a day and their board, and were to work under the control of guards appointed by the provincial government. Their reply was simply that "we are not going into training camps, we are not going to do road work, we are not going to do war service; so what are you going to do about it?" The government can do nothing.

I should like to give an illustration of indifference on the part of those who should be held responsible for men who have enlisted and then been discharged because of illness. Previously I cited the case of a young man from my constituency who enlisted in the 111th battery. He went to Edmonton with the rest of his battery and was not there very long before he had to go to hospital for one month. He was discharged from the hospital and also from the army. He was given a warrant for his fare back to his home in my district, but no provision was made for berth or meals. His mother was with him and she purchased a berth for him and his meals. When the train reached Nelson, the place of embarkation, he was taken to the hospital in an ambulance and he stayed there one month. After that he made his way to his home, some fifty miles distant. He was there only ten days when they had to send for an ambulance again to take him to another hospital, where he remained for four months. He had sold a service station he was running, and because of all these bills he and his parents found themselves out of pocket to the extent of an amount in excess of $900. He made his way to the coast in search of a job, and while there he applied to the Shaughnessy hospital for treatment but was told that there was no authority to give him treatment and he did not get it. He is now walking the streets of Vancouver. I should like to ask the minister if steps will not be taken to give better attention to such matters and provide more encouragement for enlisting.

I should like to ask the government what steps are being taken for the defence of the most vulnerable point in the interior of British Columbia, the city of Trail and the adjacent territory in which power plants are located. At this point is located the largest metallurgical plant in the world. It is really a munitions plant, and what it is producing there is for the British government. The only evidence of defence there is a partial unit of the Rocky Mountain Rangers which was organized a few weeks ago, and a company of the veterans guard. There should be some protection against aircraft.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are there no anti-aircraft guns?

Mr. ESLING: No anti-aircraft guns or protection of any kind. While I am on this matter of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company I should like to say that I think some of the remarks made by hon. members of this house about this company are most unfair. I am sure they would not be made if hon. members were more intimately acquainted with the operations of this company. I have seen it grow from a little slag pot plant to its present size. It is where it is to-day because of the work carried on by its research committee. It is able to furnish the British government to-day with lead and zinc at a price much lower than has prevailed in any average ten years in the history of Canada. This company is providing zinc for the British government at just one-eighth of what it was sold for by the United States companies during the last war. In the early days of that war there was no process available in Canada for separating the lead and zinc in the ore. Many people do not have a proper conception of the industrial relations which exist between this company and its employees. The company has provided non-contributory pensions for its employees. They provide their employees, free of charge, with a large amount of insurance, put a seventy-five dollar cheque in their pay envelope at Christmas time, and when you consider that they have loaned employees a million and a half dollars for housing purposes, and have given to employees company shares valued at one million and a half, the company is not doing so badly, and

I think there should be a greater sense of fairness than has been displayed in the disparaging remarks against it. I do not believe that the heads of industries in this dominion are all bandits and profiteers. They create industry and employment, and that is what we want. It is the only thing which can make this country prosperous.

In conclusion may I again appeal to the government to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Lincoln, and let this parliament release the government from its pledge. The Prime Minister himself has told us many times that parliament is supreme. This plebiscite does not require the government to bring in conscription. Parliament itself, as the direct representative of the people, can release the Prime Minister from his obligations, and I am sure that if this question were submitted to parliament it would release the Prime Minister, and the country at large would thoroughly approve such action.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Mr. Speaker, I have already extended my personal congratulations to the mover (Mr. Fournier), and the seconder (Mr. Macdonald), of the motion which we are now discussing, for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to the speech from the throne.

We are now well into the third year of the war. At this the opening of another session it is well that we should look back over what has happened in the past as well as study the present and plan for the future. The opening year of the war was fraught with almost overwhelming dangers. It is a fact, well known now, that if Germany had immediately followed Dunkirk with an invasion of Great Britain, all might have been lost. Even as it was, only the fortitude and bravery of the British people saved the world.

Since then Hitler's aims of world domination have become apparent to all, and now practically all of the democracies have banded together at Britain's side. To-day, while in certain countries the tide of war is still against us, we can rest assured that we are not going to lose the war. Democracies are peace-loving countries and do not lightly become engaged in warfare, but now that the decision has been made we find them all gearing up to end the war successfully and as quickly as possible.

Canada, though only a small country of eleven and one half million people, in the short space of two and one half years has made wonderful strides. Some of our people were impatient at the start and wanted us to throw everything into the struggle without any planning for the future. Some people quite sincerely thought that the war would be won or lost in a year. Your government had no such illusions and planned our war effort for a long struggle, planned our war effort so that each year it would become increasingly stronger, and in furtherance of this policy in the opening months of the war took the time and spent large sums of money to build new factories for the production of armament and equipment. They took the time and money to build and create the greatest air training establishment in the world. They enlarged shipyards and built plate mills to fabricate plates for vessels. They increased the production of steel and other necessary materials. As a result, Canada stands to-day as a living example of what foresight, courage and initiative can accomplish. We have seen our navy personnel increase from less than 2,000 all ranks to over 27,000. We have seen our air force increase from less than 5,000 to over 100,000. We have seen our army for overseas increase from 4,500 active soldiers to nearly 260,000, and we have a reserve army of over 150,000. On top of all this, hundreds of thousands of workmen are employed in war industries all over the country.

To sum it all up, the total cost of the last war to Canada, including the cost of demobilization, was just under 1,700 million dollars. We are crowding into just this one year of this war one and one half times the total cost of the last war. In the present fiscal year, ending March, 1942, we shall have spent 1,500 millions on our direct war effort, and we shall have sent to Great Britain over a thousand million dollars' worth of shells, guns, planes, motorized equipment and foodstuffs. It is truly a stupendous effort.

Now, what of the future? Our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has already advised us that the navy will be expanded in personnel as rapidly as naval ships can be built. Already we have expanded our navy from 20 ships at the outbreak of war to 350 ships. We have built in Canada over 120 corvettes and mine-sweepers. Just before the freeze-up we were receiving deliveries of these vessels at the rate of one every four days. These little ships will outride any gale on any sea. They are the answer to the submarine menace. They are just as effective against the submarine as destroyers are.

As to merchant shipping, if we are able to maintain our 1942 programme, by the end of this year we shall be turning out merchant shipping at a rate equal to that of Great Britain.

In the air our enlistments will be maintained to the capacity of our training schools, which are as yet unsurpassed by any country.

In the army thus far we are planning an additional armoured division and an additional tank brigade. This, added to the armoured division already planned, and the three infantry divisions and the tank brigade already in Great Britain, will bring up our army to three infantry divisions, two armoured divisions and two tank brigades, as well as all necessary ancillary troops for two Canadian corps.

As a private member with only slight military service in the last war I hesitate to express any military views, but for what my opinion is worth I should like to urge that for our armed forces overseas Canada should concentrate on armoured divisions and tank brigades. We are now industrially equipped for this type of work, and when the time arrives for an invasion of the continent I believe that the air force and swift-striking mechanized troops will be of paramount importance. Canadians in the air have shown tremendous courage, self-reliance and initiative. These same qualities will be of equal value in land operations.

There are some people who believe that industrially we have about reached the peak of our national capacity. In this I do not agree. I concede at once that we have very few skilled men out of work, but this country has not as yet really got down to business. We still have many men performing services which are not essential in war time. We still have duplication of services. Many of our people are still using luxuries we can well do without.

Let me illustrate. In my home town of Burlington, with less than 4,000 people, there are seven trucks and seven truck drivers driving up and down the streets delivering milk. In the city of Hamilton there are over three hundred coal dealers serving that city. I am told on good authority that four of the larger firms could amply supply the fuel needs of that city. We have thousands of salesmen still carrying on competitive selling which is unnecessary. Take life insurance, for example. There are thousands of life insurance agents going up and down this country. I think they could be well spared for the war effort. Then, too, we have many industries still engaged in the production of non-essentials. Thousands of men could be transferred from this non-essential work and placed in war production.

In addition to all these groups I have mentioned, we have hundreds of thousands of women in this country who are willing and anxious to work for war purposes.

For all of these reasons I would urge that orders should be placed at once which would substantially increase Canada's production of war equipment. There are still many small machine shops dotted over this country which are not being fully utilized.

Some may question Canada's ability to pay for any greater war effort. I have a suggestion to make in that regard as well. If I judge aright the temper of the Canadian people, they are not only cheerfully responding to the present demands that we are making upon them, but they are positively asking that we should request greater sacrifices on their part. There is a feeling abroad that we as a people are spending too much money and using up too much valuable material on non-essentials. In my opinion we should get down to business and stop trying to "keep up with the Joneses".

During the first ten months of this fiscal year we have collected nearly $500,000,000 in income tax, compared with a total of less than $10,000,000 collected in the entire period of the last war. This is a pretty good record, but to me it is not good enough. We have not gone far enough. At a time like this, why should we leave untouched $100,000 of income in the hands of any individual in Canada? To-day a man with an income of $500,000 is left with $100,000 in the clear. Coming down to the moderate incomes, why should we leave $15,000 in the hands of any individual as income, untouched?—and that is just what we are doing in regard to a man earning an income of $30,000. Roughly speaking, on $30,000 we take half. I wish to urge in all seriousness and with all the sincerity at my command that we should take all income over and above the living exemptions. It would mean that thousands of personal servants would have to be discharged, but these would be available for war work. It would mean that everyone would have to be his own butler and his own valet. When the safety of the world is at stake, when the flower of Canada's manhood is in the front line, or on the way to it, I ask you, should anyone at home complain if cut down to the bare necessities of life?

In the financing of this war I still have another suggestion to make. We do not hesitate to make a capital levy with respect to the estate of a deceased person. This is just exactly what we do under our succession duties acts. I firmly believe that the present situation is grave enough to justify serious consideration of the subject of a capital levy for war purposes. After setting up exemptions to provide amply for family responsibilities, for illness, and for old age, in my opinion any surplus capital over and above that should be taxed for war purposes. When a young Canadian gives his life in defence of this country, that is a one hundred per cent capital levy so far as that young man is concerned. Should wealth object to a partial capital levy?

Right here I should like to make a suggestion in regard to the armed forces. Many of those who have stayed at home have earned good wages. Some have spent them; others —many—have accumulated savings. I would urge, Mr. Speaker, that a savings fund should be set up for the armed forces. I would urge that every member of our armed forces while serving in Canada, should receive an additional $1 per day, and, while in active service overseas, an additional $2 per day. These savings should not be paid now, but at the end of the war. When the boys return, some will want to complete their education. Many of them will marry. Certainly all of them will find it difficult to get back into civilian life. None of the money would have to be paid now. This would not detract from the war effort. It would be no hardship to continue war-time taxation for a few years after the war. There is another feature about this. The proposed payments would establish a tremendous reservoir of consumer demand for goods at a time when this country will badly need a consumer demand for goods to start its industries going again in peace-time operations, turning over from war-time operations.

In some communities considerable harm is being done to the war effort through the high wages being paid, especially on piece work, in war-time industry. In this regard I have a suggestion to make. I want to say at once that these young lads who are making $7, $8, $9 and some as high as $10 a day are earning their money on a competitive labour market and should have that wage. I would not do anything which would tend to cut down the production of war material. But I do not believe that in time of war any workman in Canada should receive a greater cash wage than the equivalent of what he would receive were he in the army. In the army, a single man without dependents receives the equivalent of about $17 a week, that is, $1.30 a day, his board, clothes, medical and dental services. A married man with two children receives the equivalent of $30 a week, because you must add, in excess of the amount paid to the single man, the $35 per month dependent's allowance to the wife, and $12 a month for each of the children. I do not think that, during a war such as this, any workman in Canada should receive in cash more than the equivalent of what he would receive were he in the army. Of course it must be kept in mind that in the army there are varying rates of pay; non-commissioned officers and commissioned officers receive more money. In the factories, superintendents would have to get more money. But my suggestion is that, in the main, the cash wage to the worker of Canada should be the equivalent of the cash wage he would receive if he were in the army.

I said a moment ago that I would not deny any man the wage he earns. I would pay him the balance of his wages in a non-negotiable war savings certificate, which he could not cash, pledge, nor give away until the war is over. Thereby you would be doing two things beneficial to this war effort. You would be preventing that man from calling now for consumer goods, using up materials which should go into the war effort, and you would also be building up a postponed consumer demand which will come in very handy when the war is over.

I now come to a subject which I hesitate to discuss, because I frankly admit that perhaps sometimes I myself may have transgressed. The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth), who is now looking so seriously at me, may in a measure concur in that regard. A deliberate attempt is being made at this time to stir up political strife in Canada, to stir up sectional and racial strife, to pit French Canada against English-speaking Canada. I wish to protest against this practice with all the vehemence at my command. It is selfish, it is disloyal, it is doing a lot of harm to Canada's war effort. I suggest that I on my part should search my heart, and that every hon. member should search his at this time. I should ask myself: Am I doing anything at which my Conservative friends could take offence? Am I doing anything which will harm the morale of the Canadian people? If I am, then I am being disloyal to Canada. Before saying anything in this chamber or out of it I should ask myself the question: Will what I am about to say help, or will it actually harm, Canada's war effort? I am not suggesting that unfair attacks should not be answered; where the occasion demands plain-speaking we should speak our minds. Perhaps in the past I have on occasions been too vehement in my views, but notwithstanding all this I say to myself and to every hon. member: think of Canada's war effort before speaking.

I freely admit that I have already dictated and thrown away two speeches for this debate, and I am not satisfied with my speech to-day; it is not good enough for the times. It is a shame that in the midst of the present life-and-death struggle we should have to take time to discuss anything but the war effort. However, during the few days that this house has been in session, and throughout the country, so much has been said about the present government being a single-party government, motivated by the party spirit, that I feel I should frankly express my view.

At the outbreak of the war we had in office a government that did not have a mandate from the people to carry on a war. Everyone agreed that there must be a general election, that the Canadian people had a right to elect a government to carry on the war, and that that election should take place as soon as possible. The Canadian war effort had first to be set in motion. That was done, and as soon as possible, having regard to the exigencies of the war, a general election was called.

In that election there was only one issue, namely, Canada's war effort. Both parties were sincerely and honestly in favour of an all-out war effort. Both parties were sincere and honest in agreeing that if a maximum war effort was to be made we simply had to have a united Canada; we had to forget politics until the war was over. The Conservative party thought that the best way to take politics out of the war effort was the formation of a national government composed of leading men of both parties. This suggestion had considerable merit; it was a view honestly reached by the Conservative party, and no one has any right to question their sincerity or loyalty in arriving at that decision.

The Liberal party, though seeking the same end, took a totally different view of the problem. We thought the best way to take politics out of the war effort was to divorce the war effort from government, to let the army heads run the army, the air heads run the air force, and the navy heads run the navy. As to production of goods, we thought the best way to take politics out of Canada's war effort was to call in leading industrialists from across Canada, irrespective of political affiliations, and say to them: Look after Canada's war production.

Those two points of view, both seeking the same end, but in method as wide apart as the poles, were placed before the Canadian people. Both were eloquently argued, over the air, on the public platform and in the press. When voting day came, the Canadian people, fortunately for Canada, spoke very decisively; there was no room for doubt. The Canadian people had a right to choose the form of government they thought would be the strongest in time of war, and, rightly or wrongly, they chose a single-party government.

The promise made by the Liberal party has been fully carried out. I have yet to hear of one criticism, in this house or in the corridors, of political interference in regard to any of the armed forces. I have yet to hear one criticism on the floor of this house in regard to political interference in letting a war contract. It is a well known fact that well over three-quarters of all army, navy and air force officers are Conservatives. It is well known that a considerably higher percentage than that of the dollar-a-year men in the Department of Munitions and Supply are Conservatives, and they are doing a wonderful job. Take for example, Mr. Allan Nicholson, the timber controller. He comes from my home town of Burlington. He was urged to contest the 1940 election as Conservative candidate. He is to-day vice-president of the Conservative association in my riding. Will anybody suggest that he is a political appointee? And he has done a wonderful job for Canada in connection with its war effort. He has saved this country millions of dollars in the purchase of timber and lumber.

Every dollar's worth of goods bought for war purposes is bought on competitive tender, or, if a type where competitive tender is not possible, is purchased in a businesslike manner from the source that can best supply it. Though hundreds of millions of dollars are being spent monthly, we have yet to hear of any serious misconduct or any political favouritism.

Right here, with all these facts in mind, I implore the opposition to cease making the charge that this is a party government motivated by party feelings. The charge is not true. Hon. members who make such a charge are not being fair to themselves or to the Canadian people. It is harmful to our war effort to stir up in the public mind distrust of the war government. We have honestly tried to take politics out of the war effort. If some are still playing politics, I say to the opposition, denounce them; give us the particulars; let us smoke them out and punish them. So far as I am concerned I owe it to the Conservative party organization in my riding to say that they have fully cooperated with me in the past, and I am confident that this will continue in future as long as the war lasts.

Personally I renounced party politics the very day war was declared. Since September, 1939, I have not made one single political appointment. At the time of the national registration, after consulting with the defeated Conservative candidate I suggested for nomination the president of the Conservative association and the president of the Liberal association as the two key men in my riding to take the national registration. These men made fifty-fifty appointments in every ward in the riding; the entire work was done on a fifty-fifty cooperative basis, and not one man accepted one dollar for his work. The national registration in Halton county cost this country nothing except the cost of printing and advertising.

In this connection let me make a suggestion in regard to the plebiscite. Halton county is going to take the plebiscite vote in the same way; it will not cost this country one dollar in Halton county except for the printing and advertising.

As I have heard over the radio and read in the press the many ill-advised, unfair and bitter attacks which are now being made, I have asked myself this question: Do these men know that they are doing exactly what Hitler would want them to do? I have toyed with this idea: What would I do if I were a paid German agent, hired by Hitler to try to thwart this country's war effort?

In the first place, just as soon as a campaign was launched for voluntary enlistments, I would immediately sponsor conscription. I would tell of all the evils and weaknesses of voluntary enlistment, and I would be all out for conscription. Why? Not because I wanted men; not because I wanted to help the war effort, but because I wanted to harm the war effort and dry up voluntary enlistment.

In the second place, when a victory loan campaign was announced, I would at once charge the government with reckless and extravagant expenditures, with throwing away money in taking a plebiscite, and so on. I would charge them with anything that would undermine public confidence in the government.

In the third place there would be only one thing I could do, other than blow up a factory. I would try deliberately to undermine public confidence in the government by bringing about disunity among the people. I would charge the government with complacency. By doing this I would hope to alienate from the government all the impulsive and restless people who are never satisfied, no matter what is being done, unless they are doing it themselves.

Then I would take the other tack; I would also charge the government with being too ruthless and too energetic in the prosecution of the war. I would charge it with interfering with business; I would charge it with doing public business by order in council. I would charge it with failing to trust the people. By doing all of these things, as a paid agent of Hitler I would hope to overthrow the government and so disturb the public mind that unity would be lost.

The Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, is carrying a terrific load. The ministers of the five war departments are working to the extreme limit of their strength. Where, I ask, would you find five better men in Canada than Hon. J. L. Ralston, Hon. C. G. Power, Hon. Angus Macdonald, Hon. C. D. Howe, and Hon. J. T. Thorson? I sometimes wonder if the Canadian people realize the load these men are carrying, and the load being carried by our Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), and every other minister of the crown.

What about this complaint about lack of leadership? What man in Canada to-day other than Mackenzie King could have organized our war effort as successfully as it has been organized? What other public man in Canada to-day holds the confidence of all groups as he does? But, Mr. Speaker, the results speak far more eloquently than I can speak, so let us look at the results. What of Canada's morale? Are the Canadian people tired of this war? They are paying heavy taxes; they are making no profits; we are interfering with their private business, but notwithstanding all this what do we find? Instead of being tired of the war the Canadian people to-day are demanding a still greater war effort. If these results do not prove masterly leadership, then I do not know what leadership means.

The load being carried by the Prime Minister to-day in directing Canada's war effort is not by any means his sole task. It is fortunate for Canada, fortunate for the British commonwealth of nations and indeed for all the democracies of the world that at this time Canada should have as Prime Minister a personal friend of the President of the United States. Friend and foe alike agree that this fortunate circumstance has, during both peace and war, served as a valuable liaison between Great Britain and the United States. It is strange but true, Mr. Speaker, that no really great man is universally recognized as such during his lifetime. I believe history will record the fact that in our present war leader we have the greatest statesman Canada has yet produced. I do not for a moment expect my hon. friends of the opposition to concur in my views; but I do say, irrespective of the views they hold of the Prime Minister, that he was chosen by the people of Canada to lead our war effort. And, health permitting, he will lead Canada until victory is won.

Now just a word about conscription and the plebiscite, and I am through. We had conscription for ten months of the last war, and the total number of troops raised during that ten months' period was less than 85,000. If any hon. gentleman wishes to check that up I shall be glad to give him the reference. During the past seven months of this war we have had voluntary enlistments at the rate of nearly 20,000 a month. As long as voluntary enlistments can be maintained at this rate, conscription would do more harm than good to Canada's war effort. During this period when conscription is unnecessary, many people are opposed to it; and I want to say that they are not all in French Canada, as some would lead us to believe.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Then why the plebiscite?

Mr. CLEAVER: If the hon. gentleman will just possess himself in patience for a moment, I am coming to that. If the time ever comes when voluntary enlistments fail to supply our needs, all Canadians, French Canadians and those of British stock, will support conscription; make no mistake about that. Forcing the issue now, before it is necessary, will do untold harm. My hon. friend shakes his head. I am just as sincere in my views as he in his.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The Minister of Justice does not take that stand.

Mr. CLEAVER: This may be a long war. Voluntary recruiting may become inadequate. The government realizes that the time may come in the future when conscription may be necessary. At the general election of 1940 both major parties solemnly pledged themselves against conscription. Looking to needs which may arise in the future, the government is asking the people, by a plebiscite, to cancel this non-conscription pledge. This is a democratic means of seeking the cancellation of a pledge made to the electors. The pledge was given to them, and only they can release the government from it. Every loyal Canadian who wants an all-out war effort in the final analysis must support the plebiscite. The Duplessis rabble in Quebec are opposed to any war effort at all, and of course they will vote against the plebiscite; but the loyal French Canadians—and they form a large majority—will carry the plebiscite in Quebec. As to the rest of Canada, there are some disgruntled politicians who wish to embarrass this government. There are some selfish business interests who do not like to pay taxes, who yearn for the excess profits which they enjoyed during the last war. These people, in baffled rage—there is nothing else to call it—are to-day making statements of which I predict they will very soon be ashamed. The great middle class of this country will once again assert themselves, and will carry this plebiscite with a splendid majority.

The resolution I am about to read, which was passed at a caucus of Ontario Liberal members held yesterday. gives our answer to one public man in Canada to-day who thinks he is thinking but is only rearranging his grudges:

Whereas the Liberal members of the House of Commons from the province of Ontario, in caucus assembled, desire at this time to reaffirm their loyalty to and their confidence in the leadership of the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada;

And whereas the Premier of Ontario, Mitchell F. Hepburn, for some years has directed his efforts toward embarrassing and insulting the Prime Minister of Canada;

And whereas Mitchell F. Hepburn, the premier of Ontario, is now endeavouring to discredit and to undermine the present government of Canada by indiscriminate and ill-considered criticism of the measures taken for the effective prosecution of the war;

And whereas he is presently seeking to defeat a minister of the crown who would be helpful to the government and to the Canadian people at this critical time;

Now, therefore, the Liberal members of the House of Commons from the province of Ontario desire to record their loyalty to and their confidence in the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King as Prime Minister of Canada and as leader of the Liberal party.

It is with regret that the said Liberal members of the House of Commons record their disapproval of the actions of Mitchell F. Hepburn and express the belief that he no longer represents liberalism in the province of Ontario.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was that endorsed by all the Ontario Liberal members in the House of Commons?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Take it as read.

Mr. CLEAVER: I cannot invite my hon. friend to caucus; I think he would be out of place. I cannot break the confidence of caucus, so that I shall have to leave him in suspense.

Mr. MacNICOL: The hon. member said "the" Liberal members from Ontario. Apparently he includes them all.

Mr. CLEAVER: I must assure the hon. member that I read the resolution correctly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Curiosity killed the cat.

Mr. CLEAVER: I cannot help thinking what a wonderful thing it would be for our country's war effort if the Hepburns and the Drews of this country could have a change of heart, and would use their time in coining catch phrases to help instead of harm this country's war effort.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, in common with a large number of members in this chamber, and a considerable number of people across Canada who are thinking these days, my greatest concern is whether or not we are giving everything that we might in an all-out war effort. These thoughts are brought most forcibly to my mind, and they crowd out all else, when I remember what Winston Churchill said not so long ago with regard to the part that our own Canadian boys will probably play, and perhaps very shortly, in this conflict. Within a few months, when the invasion season returns, we may find our Canadians in the United Kingdom in one of the bloodiest battles the world has ever known. Surely that one expression of opinion, coming from the world's greatest statesman to-day, should do more to unite our people than some of the bickerings we hear across this floor. And when that great statesman further said that 1942 might see a clearing up of the skies, provided that we use our man-power—he said man-power first; brain-power was second —virility and valour in an all-out effort, and provided that we stay at our task, that great galaxy of English-speaking peoples would give a good account of themselves in 1942, he no doubt had good reason for making the statement.

So we have our task before us, and I implore each and all to apply themselves to the task. It was my pleasure to emphasize the same sentiment on armistice day, November 11, 1941, in this chamber. I felt a sense of frustration then, as to what we as individual members were doing. I still feel the same sense of frustration, that we are not doing enough to-day.

If the premise I lay down is sound, and if we should have this unity to accomplish the common goal, then I have no difficulty in endorsing the mild-mannered, calm statements made with respect to unity by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier). But without taking time to compliment him upon his speech—and he understands where I stand in the matter—I say to him and to all hon. members that the deductions he drew from the arguments he set up do not in their entirety meet with my views. And when I say they do not meet with my views I am thinking of what has happened both before and since he spoke. I call as my first witness the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). While appreciating the load he is carrying and the difficulties which surround his position in these days, I suggest that he take the keynote of the speech of the hon. member for Hull, the keynote of unity, and that in all his utterances he should see to it that no word comes from his lips which would tend to set our people one against the other.

I have in mind a reference made in this chamber by the Prime Minister when he was referring to certain people from Toronto, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). The Prime Minister did not see fit to withdraw his statement that some people from Toronto take too literally what they read in the press. Not a very serious statement, no—but you know, Mr. Speaker, and I know, that when tinder is as dry as it is now, waiting to be ignited to a flame of passion among the different elements of our people, it does not take much to set it off. And it takes very much less when responsible members in this chamber are the ones to light the tinder. How much faster does it rage when the Prime Minister is the one to set the match!

A word about Toronto in a moment or two, but a word first about one of the first citizens of Toronto. For seven years the hon. member for Broadview was first magistrate of that city. During those most trying years he took his place as a servant of the people, giving leadership in respect to matters of profound magnitude during the last war. What train came back with invalids from the last war, what train came back with returned soldiers, whether it arrived at two o'clock in the morning or two o'clock in the afternoon, did not find the hon. member for Broadview, Toronto's first magistrate, in company with his city clerk, Mr. James Somers, O.B.E., waiting to meet it? The city authorities were always given instructions to see that these men, their wives and families, were cared for. That service was given unremittingly for twenty-four hours of the day.

Since that time, what hon. member will gainsay the fact that on every occasion on which the question of empire connection of the great Anglo-Saxon race in Great Britain and throughout the empire has been discussed, the hon. member for Broadview has risen in his place and given voice to the maintenance of that connection which we all hold so dear.

Every time the opportunity presented itself he offered his empire views, which were largely the views of a great number of hon. members in this chamber as well as of the people of the city of Toronto. I say to these hon. members, and in a moment I shall recite whence they come, that they should remember that they are speaking of a great city. Toronto is no mean city. It is a city of industry, a city of intelligence and a city of integrity. This great city with its fine educational institutions, this great city with its extensive public ownership system, is always ready to rise up on every occasion of emergency to help out in war loans or anything else. The young men of that city are ready also to undertake the supreme job of work, that of seeing that the ranks of our different divisions are filled with men ready to serve the empire during this difficult time. I do not say that Toronto is in the premier position in this regard, but her record will compare most favourably with that of any other city.

So I say as kindly and as sincerely as I can that it ill behooves the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Turner) to rise in his place and say what he did. He comes from Manitoba, a province that we love as we love all Canadian provinces. I do not think he should drag in the name of Toronto for his own political purposes. It would have been far better for my hon. friend, before discussing the question he had in his mind at that time, to go into a caucus of the Manitoba provincial members and obtain their views as to what he should enunciate on the floor of this Canadian House of Commons on behalf of Manitoba.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) does not consider that any speech he makes is complete unless he is able to slam somebody or something. Because of his sense of humour, we try to forgive him his shortcomings. His depositing of the Japs in Ontario, however, is something with which I shall deal when the proper time comes. I would say to the hon. member for Fraser Valley that it does not help things in Canada to-day to single out one part of the country and say something about it which is absolutely unnecessary.

The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix) is a business man of some standing and a French-Canadian colleague for whom I have admiration as I have for all French-Canadian members. Their forbears came to this country in 1666; I would be proud if mine could date back that far. They are real Canadians, but I do not think they should drag in the name of the city of Toronto in order to support their contentions. I have been twenty years in this house, and I ask you to search the records to find one word that ever came from my lips which was in any way derogatory to those who were Canadians long before we were. The reverse is true.

I pause for a moment to make reference to the late Minister of Justice. I regret his passing. He was a great personal friend, and I should like to interject my tribute at this time. As my time is short I am sure you will understand why I do not enlarge upon it at the moment. In my younger days in 1922 I advocated the development of the Quebec harbour.

Moose Jaw cannot be very proud to-day of its representative because of what he read into the record. Mark you, I am not saying anything to the newer members of this house about reading things into the record, but when one of the older members reads into the record an essay of the kind read in last night by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), it does not make for unity in this country. We all understand that the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) must take a rise out of every question that comes along. I think he realizes that Toronto is a city of learning, and I forgive him for some of the things he said, but not all. The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) was fair when he said that 99½ per cent of the people of Toronto are sound and all right. I quite agree with him, as I think all hon. members do in their hearts. You all know that Toronto is a great city and that you should not stir up strife at this time. If my pleadings will have any effect upon hon. members in this chamber, the matter will be allowed to rest there.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is coming along with a war loan. The people of Canada must subscribe to it; they must oversubscribe the loan. I hope everything possible will be done to see that it is oversubscribed. The committee for total war effort will get behind this war loan. Too much has been said about those who signed that petition. I do not know them, but they are men and women of the ilk of those who sit in front of me. That is political history, and I do not want to drag in politics. I plead with the two hundred who signed: forget about what has been said about you in this chamber and see to it that everything possible is done to make sure that this war loan goes over. I know they will do that. In fact, they have accepted the challenge already. I endorse what they say in their resolutions and advertising. I should like to say something else: they have proved themselves to be greater Canadians than they are partisans. When the war loan comes along I am sure they will be greater Canadians than they are partisans, and I am satisfied that the loan will go over.

To my mind our people to-day are not fully conscious of their total responsibilities in the struggle that faces us. We have too many carnival makers. The theatres are crowded, the hotel lobbies are filled, our transportation facilities are taxed to their limit. We are spending money, a lot of it recklessly. Something is being done to curb this spending, but I say that these same carnival makers, these convention attenders and whatnot, will see to it that the enthusiasm they have for their country will put over our war loan. I am not fearful of the result.

What makes them slow down, as well as those of us who perhaps have more responsibility, is the sort of appeasement policy which seems to envelop particularly the Prime Minister. In history we have had the "wait and see" policy, which almost destroyed our effort in the last war. After that, we had a tendency to take too much for granted. In Washington, for example, we had the Japanese ambassador talking to a great statesman of the United States while at that very moment Pearl Harbour was being smashed. Then, before that, we had a gentleman with an umbrella. I do not say that disparagingly at all. These were great men. The "wait and see" man was a great man, so was the man with an umbrella, and so also the man who talked with the Japanese envoy while Pearl Harbour was being bombed. But the man with a dog—the dog is now dead—should take lessons from what happened on these other occasions and discontinue his appeasement policy. He should step into the breach and lay the whip on our backs, give us more work to do, expect more from us and get more from the Canadian people. I am satisfied that in such a policy he would be endorsed by the Canadian people.

The hon. member who seconded the address was Macdonald by name but not in stature. He read most of what he had to say, and the thought ran through my mind, as it did as I listened to previous observations, that it would have been far better if he had thrown his notes to one side and let his heart and mind co-ordinate so that he could give voice to what was in his very soul, instead of reading an essay, as is done by so many other members, Mr. Speaker, in violation of the rules of the house. It would have been far better if the hon. gentleman had let his heart and mind speak, instead of simply letting his mind read something which kills the soul and leaves it dead. This has happened on many occasions, and it must have happened to my hon. friend when he shifted his position on the question of the plebiscite. Surely after he had been overseas and seen what he saw there—some of us have not been so fortunate but we will get there yet—he must have realized that the position he took in this debate did not live up to the traditions of the British or his own record. I am sure the gallant gentleman must have had heart-burnings when his own Local Council of Women sent him a resolution denouncing the plebiscite, and when his own branch of the Trades and Labour Congress sent him a resolution in similar terms.

My hon. friend the member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon), who gave us such an eloquent address the other day, called in the Army and Navy Veterans, of which he was a member and quoted something they had said prior to the assembling of this house. Why did he not quote the resolution he had received from that body on that day, dated February 2, and tell us that the Army and Navy Veterans, and not only that body but thirty-two other veteran organizations and kindred bodies in solemn convention assembled, had passed unanimously and sent to the hon. Prime Minister a demand for conscription at once, and no plebiscite at all. It is so easy to pick out here and there something which suits your purpose. We all know the Legion. They are men of experience, honourable and gallant men, and there are some of them in the cabinet. There they sat on the treasury benches, sphinx-like for quite a while, but gradually one by one they have risen from their seats to give voice to the feelings within them, and little by little they are getting a little closer to the precipice, as I think some call it, with regard to compulsory overseas service which they want to get over. We had an example to-day in the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie). His address brought him a little closer to the brink of the precipice. Why not take the whole jump? But the Prime Minister says no. After that most eloquent address had been given by my leader in this chamber, in which he covered the ground so thoroughly, point by point, in the fashion of a learned gentleman in building up our case, the Prime Minister followed him to tear it down, and then after delivering his speech he caucused his members, and then caucused them again. The fuehrer had spoken, and the members of the cabinet sat dormant and silent. They seemed to be anaesthetized; they could not give voice to what was in their heart and mind. It was the war loan campaign which provided an excuse for the first minister to rise in his place and express his views, and to-day we have had another minister, the Minister of Pensions and National Health, as the second example. I began to think for a while that there was no war on except the war between the different elements within the Liberal party, but one by one the ministers are breaking away from the position they took in the earlier days of the session. But they are not yet giving full expression to what they really think about the plebiscite. That is verboten. The fuehrer has spoken to them, and the result is that we are not getting a free expression of opinion from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, we in this party shall vote for the plebiscite if it is forced upon us. We will vote "Ja" in the same manner as the Czechoslovakians and the Sudetens voted "Ja", but not for the same reason. They were afraid to vote against their plebiscite. We are voting for the plebiscite because we have been put in a position where a coin is flipped in such a way that heads you win and tails I lose. I do not say that disparagingly, but that is exactly how it stands. You know, Mr. Speaker, where we stand in this chamber. We would not let Canada down by voting no, and the present administration knows that. But had we no plebiscite at all, the Prime Minister and my hon. leader (Mr. Hanson) would have been in a much stronger position to vote on a resolution presented to this chamber on the question, and I am sure that it would have received almost the unanimous vote of this house.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but the sound people of Canada have provided us with this edifice in which to enunciate for them their views. Their views of two years ago have no bearing on the views of the Canadian people to-day. I took a note while my hon. friend the minister of pensions was speaking with regard to marshalling public opinion. To-day we find marshalled against us a common enemy possessed of a strength and force that we never even dreamed of in 1940 when the last election took place. Not only that: the common enemy is right at our gates. It is no time to stop and take a plebiscite.

Let me recite some of the other reasons, as briefly and hurriedly as I can.

I have been through six elections. Two hundred and fifty thousand people had the opportunity of voting in the different constituencies which I have had the honour to represent. The money spent by parties, by newspapers, by private individuals and by the candidates themselves, amounted to well over a dollar for each vote which was cast in those elections. Yet, with all the energy, the enthusiasm and the interest aroused over the many issues which have arisen during the last twenty years to excite our people and bring them to the polls; with the assistance of the clergy, of the schools, and all other agencies, the proportion of voters to those entitled to vote amounted to not more than 52·1 per cent—we will call it 53 per cent for easy figuring. The Stevens candidate got 1·4 per cent, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidate polled 1·6 per cent—he came in lately; previously the Labour party candidate got 1·4 per cent—the Liberal party, 13·2 per cent; and Conservative supporters honoured me with 35·4 per cent. And this, as I have said, as a result of much energy, effort and enthusiasm and all manner of means employed to bring people to the polls: we did not get anything like a complete expression of opinion. Nor will you get much of an expression of opinion by this plebiscite, for you will be unable to get the people to the polls. Of course you will get the malcontents. But do you want them? Of course you do not. Nevertheless the plebiscite is going to be held.

Let me give the government one warning now with regard to the temper of the Canadian people on this matter. Do not have dominion ministers publicize this plebiscite on the screen. Not long ago I was humiliated, while a newsreel was being run, to hear our Prime Minister booed and hissed when his picture was on the screen. That is bad business. I was ashamed of our Canadian people when I heard it. And it did not happen in the city of Toronto.

Mr. GOLDING: Where was it?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): That should not happen. I believe my hon. friend does not come from very far from where it occurred. It was when I was waiting for a train connection. I am not going to damn another Ontario town by mentioning the name. It could happen in Toronto. It could happen in Stratford. I think my hon. friend who recited one or two days ago correspondence and editorials which have come to his desk, might recite to this house the dayletter he received from the editor of the Stratford Beacon-Herald: he would know that the feeling of which I have spoken is rampant throughout his own district as well as in Toronto.

Mr. GOLDING: I did not receive any letter at all.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I will send the hon. member a copy.

I thought the Minister of Pensions and National Health would have said more to-day about his own province. To my mind there is a situation there the seriousness of which the people of Canada do not realize. Do you suppose that if 24,000 Canadians were living in a vulnerable point in Japan they would be left there? The danger to British Columbia of leaving the Japanese in their present locations is something to which the government, after the experience of our United States friends at Pearl Harbour, should give immediate consideration. True, a number of them are Canadian nationals. True, each of those Canadian nationals was registered by the consul when he came into the country. But you cannot be sure of them all. We can be kind to them. We can treat them in the British fashion. There are wide expanses in Canada where they can be placed, far away from the danger zone.

The Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) is not in his seat. I understand he is of Icelandic origin. Also I am given to understand that lake Winnipegosis and lake Winnipeg, in his province, contain a fine species of fish called gold-eye. These Japanese are good fishermen. I understand that the Icelandic people who fish for gold-eye could fish just as well for salmon. I would transfer those Japanese to the district of lake Winnipegosis and lake Winnipeg and put them to work and be kind to them, but I would get them out of British Columbia and replace them with Icelandic people. Some of them could be sent down to Quebec, where our friends could use them in the lumber mills and saw mills. Many of these Japanese know how to work in a saw mill. Some could be transferred to Ontario. But let us get them out of the coast province and show the rest of our Canadian people that we are prepared to do something on behalf of national security.

I was sorry to hear an hon. member refer to "gold-diggers." References of that kind are not very helpful to the Minister of Finance in his task of raising the war loan. Who are these gold-diggers? Have they hard cash? The minister knows that their assets are largely made up of bank overdrafts, employing the money of others. He knows they are respectable citizens.

Mr. MacNICOL: You have got to go to them to get money.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): When the hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Fraser), said so many things in such a burlesque fashion with regard to these people, I looked him over, and as he was talking about "Who's Who" I thought to myself, and who are you? He talked about—I thought he said Moloch.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mulocks!

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Then I thought it was Mulocks, and then I wasn't sure whether it could not be Mohocks, but I discovered it was Murdock, the same hon. gentlemen who by this administration was placed on the Canadian National railway board and is doing a good job on behalf of Canada. I say that, holding no brief for him and never to my knowledge having met him at any time. Nor do I know Charles Burton. I have met Mr. Morrow. He could have gone a good deal further with his "Who's Who," but what good does it do? What useful service did he give to Canada in that dia-
