GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to two petitions.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. Paul Zed (Fundy—Royal, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Government Operations.

Pursuant to an order of the House dated Wednesday, November 8, 1995, the committee studied Bill C–101, an act to amend the National Housing Act, and has agreed to report it without amendment.

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the 101st report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding associate membership on the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food.

If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in this report later this day.

FOREIGN AID RESTRICTION ACT

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–357, an act respecting restriction on foreign aid.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is designed to stop the flow of financial or other aid to any foreign country that refuses to accept re–entry of its nationals or former nationals deported from Canada.

Far too often when foreign born criminals are ordered deported from Canada, deportation is hampered because some countries do not want to take back their nationals. The foreign aid restriction act addresses this issue by freezing aid to countries that frustrate the Canadian deportation process.

The bill is a strong measure to ensure effective deportation policy in Canada. If a country will not take back its citizens who have committed criminal acts in Canada or who have misrepresented their past involvement in organized criminal activity, terrorism or other activities as noted under section 19 of the Immigration Act of Canada and are ordered deported, the bill would then direct the Department of Foreign Affairs to suspend all foreign aid to that country.

COMMEMORATION OF THE BIRTHPLACE OF CONFEDERATION ACT

On the Order: Private Members' Business:

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage of Bill C–292, an act to commemorate the birthplace of Confederation—Member for Hillsborough.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is with great regret and lack of support by my Liberal colleagues that I ask you to seek unanimous consent so that I withdraw my private members' bill, Bill C–292, an act to commemorate the birthplace of Confederation.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Order discharged and bill withdrawn.)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, with leave of the House I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga South, that the 101st report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs tabled in the House today be concurred in.

PETITIONS

TAXATION

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating across Canada. This petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Estevan, Saskatchewan.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society.

They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill and the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

BELL CANADA

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of over 500 Bell pensioners.

These pensioners believe that Bell Canada, which was responsible for the choice of Confederation Life as an administrator of its group RRSP funds and which encouraged its employees to participate in it, has an obligation to ensure that its employees do not suffer economically from their pensions being placed at risk due to the collapse of Confederation Life.

They ask that Parliament initiate an investigation.

"ON TO OTTAWA" TREK

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Madam Speaker, it is an honour today to present a petition concerning the "On to Ottawa" trek.

These petitions are historically important in that they bear the signatures of some of the original 1935 "On to Ottawa" trekkers, including Mr. Robert Savage, the last living member of the delegation of eight to meet with the then Prime Minister R. B. Bennett.

• (1010)

Sixty years ago Prime Minister Bennett ordered the arrest of the "On to Ottawa" trek leaders at a public meeting, hence provoking the Regina riot. The trekkers, citizens of Regina who witnessed the riot, family members and other Canadians draw the attention of the House to the "On to Ottawa" trek and its abrupt end in Regina on Dominion Day 1935, and the then federal government's role in the police riot in Regina.

These petitioners call on Parliament to extend to the 1935 trekkers, the Regina citizens and their families its unequivocal and official apology for its part in provoking the police riot.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

DEPARTMENT OF HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT ACT

The House resumed from November 21 consideration of the motion that Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to speak on Bill C–96.

The bill has a single and fairly simple purpose, integration. The government is setting out a solid legislative process for integrating Canada's social and labour market programs. With these changes, the Department of Human Resources Development brings under one roof all of our efforts to help Canadians achieve their full potential in society and in our economy.

Within this single department are all the programs and services that help people looking for work find and keep jobs, help employers find workers they need, help workers and employers under federal jurisdiction to maintain fair labour standards and a safe working environment, help people between jobs, Canadian seniors, families with low incomes and people with disabilities to get the income support they need.

It will help people get training and develop new skills for a changing economy. As well, it will help local businesses, communities and entire industries to target the skills for the future and build a skilled workforce that will help Canada be competitive and prosperous in a changing world.

By bringing all of these different programs into one department, we have taken an important first step toward ensuring programs work together, providing meaningful, co–ordinated solutions for the real world.

By taking this step the government has helped set the stage for real integration in the way programs and services are delivered to Canadians. Let us face it, when people come looking for service, they could care less which program branch delivers that service. The last thing they need is to be sent running around from one office to another.

One of the most fundamental goals of the government's approach is to ensure that integration takes place at the local level. To do so we must focus on locating the decision making and design of services at the local level. Instead of highly centralized decision making, we need to allow a much greater degree of discretion and judgment in the field.

Having been in the field of psychiatry and mental health for 30 years, I know what it means to tailor programs to individuals; it is very important and this bill accomplishes that.

Over the last two years I have developed a close working relationship with the Canada Employment Centre in my riding of Annapolis Valley—Hants. I have had many opportunities to meet with the employees, listen to their ideas and watch these professionals do their jobs. I am convinced more than ever that decision making power must rest with the local level.

Decisions about what kinds of programs make sense in a community should be made by the community, in partnership with local businesses, trade unions, community and municipal organizations. If it is going to work we have to completely rethink the way we define programs and services.

• (1015)

As my hon. colleague from Burin—St. George's stated, we cannot say to communities across Canada: "Here is a program and here are all the rules you have to follow. Do it our way or not at all". He also went on to say that individuals need programs and even though it is not what they need, this is the only program we have money for so take it or leave it.

Instead, we want to say to communities and individuals: "Here are some basic tools that we know have worked. Here is the money and the available resources. Now you the client decide which tools make sense and how you can use these resources most effectively". Just do what needs to be done. That is the motto of this bill.

That is what integration means, bringing it down to the local level. That is what we are trying to do with Bill C–96. The government is also bringing this approach to the largest single social program in Canada, unemployment insurance.

For years now, we have had two separate tracks going for people who are unemployed. On the one hand there is the UI system, an absolutely vital program providing temporary income support for people between jobs. On the other hand we have developed an increasingly sophisticated and effective set of employment programs, a set of tools to help people develop new skills, gain work experience and in the end find jobs.

Our challenge in this bill is to integrate these two components, to build a single integrated employment service that people can turn to, not just for a cheque but for help to get back into the workforce. This means finding a way to combine that essential system of income protection provided by UI with an active system of employment, a system that gives people the resources and the opportunity to make choices about the kind of skills that are required, the kind of future they want to build for themselves.

For example, we are experimenting with a form of internship with small businesses. There are companies that desperately want to hire new workers but cannot afford to provide the training new workers require. With this program we help them hire young people, older workers and women returning to the workforce. We provide some support to pay for the learning curve, the time it obviously takes for new workers to become fully productive in their new jobs. The experiment is getting good results. Small businesses are creating jobs for unemployed Canadians, real permanent jobs.

Over the past year we have developed a program for self–employment under unemployment insurance. We want to give people a choice. Rather than simply collecting benefits while they look for a new job, we want to give people the opportunity to create their own jobs. The department provides some financial support, monitoring and counselling to help participants get their businesses started.

Over the past year 30,000 people have started their own businesses this way through the unemployment insurance system. They have not created just 30,000 jobs but rather 60,000 jobs. That is the kind of positive initiative that can happen when we think in terms of integration.

Another example of integration can be seen in our government's strategic initiatives program. This program is important since it provides the government with the unique opportunity to experiment with program design that will support future policy development.

In September 1994 the government in partnership with the Government of Nova Scotia announced the launching of such a program. Success Nova Scotia 2000 will assist 3,000 young Nova Scotians to gain valuable work experience in leading industries using internships as an important part of their learning culture.

It is part of our commitment to find better ways for young people to secure jobs. By bringing together a full range of Canada's social and labour market programs, we are setting a new course and making a positive difference in Canada.

Bill C–96 provides a strong basis for this new direction. It ensures the structure that is in place for the federal government continues bringing programs and services together while working with our partners in the provinces and the communities across the country.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Madam Speaker, ever since the Bloc Quebecois arrived in the House of Commons, Ottawa has treated us to power plays of every description. First, it created the Department of Canadian Heritage. In so doing, Ottawa denied the existence of the Quebec people and the government gave itself a mandate to defend and promote Canadian culture and Canadian identity.

Then came power play number two: the Department of Health. With this decision, the government expanded and consolidated its control over an exclusively provincial jurisdiction.

And now for Ottawa power play number three. This time, it is about human resources. I am referring to the bill before the House today, the act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts. With this bill, the department blatantly ignores the existing consensus in Quebec on manpower training and directly intrudes in this provincial jurisdiction.

A fourth power play is now looming, and I am referring to reforms in programs connected with income security for seniors. Of course for the past two years, every time he had to field a question in the House, we saw the Minister of Human Resources Development rise indignantly and play the same tape over and over again: "The document is wrong, you misread, and you do not understand".

However, there is every indication that Ottawa will use this reform to save money, again at the expense of the seniors, and the minister responsible seems to be the only one in this House who is misinformed.

In the February budget that was supposed to reshape Canada, using a Tory recipe with a Liberal label, the Minister of Finance announced a reform of programs relating to income security for seniors. This reform was to take effect in 1997. According to the Minister of Finance, it will be based on the following five principles: first, undiminished protection for all seniors who are less well off, which means there will be no increase in benefits, but payments to the less well off will be maintained at present levels.

Second, a continuation of full indexation of pensions. Third, eligibility for OAS benefits will be based on family income. People should realize that this will significantly change the present system. In fact, OAS has always been universal, but after the Chrétien government's reform, the amount of the OAS cheque will depend on family income.

Fourth, benefit levels will be reduced as income levels rise. Ottawa's so–called positive approach carefully conceals its plans to lower the ceiling for the clawback.

Fifth, control of program costs. In other words, administration of the OAS system will have to cost less.

This sketchy outline of Ottawa's intentions received a stinging response from Ms. Blackburn, Quebec's income security minister. In a press release dated March 2, the minister commented that the federal government was launching another attack on the incomes of seniors and that the reform announced in the Martin budget would permanently destroy the balance of the current OAS system.

The minister also pointed out that the decision to provide OAS benefits on the basis of family income would mean that more seniors, mainly women, would have to turn over their benefits to the federal government. The minister went on to say that women had won recognition of their independent status in society, but now, because of budgetary cutbacks, once they were retired their status would depend on that of their spouse and their family income and that, considering the measures proposed by Mr. Axworthy and Mr. Martin, one wondered if women's rights meant anything at all to the federal government.

The minister's final conclusion is that such a change in calculating old age pensions makes them no longer a foundation for financial security in retirement but a social assistance program.

Seniors will be entitled to an old age pension if their income places them in the category of persons with modest means. We must therefore acknowledge that the federal government did not have the courage before the referendum to clearly and precisely inform Quebecers of what was really in store for them in connection with old age pensions, because it knew what an impact that knowledge could have had on the final outcome of the vote.

Jean–Robert Sansfaçon, an editorial writer for Le Devoir, saw the announcements of old age pension cuts by the Minister of Finance in more or less the same light as Mrs. Blackburn. In his editorial last February 28 he wrote as follows: "If Ottawa goes ahead with this, it will mean an end to universal old age pensions, which might end up being reserved only for households with modest incomes. This is a really new concept, one more closely related to social assistance than to a pension plan, and would encourage everyone to save money during their working years".

In another editorial on March 4 he wrote: "Although this was not in the least what was expected of it, the present Liberal government is preparing to axe the plan. As early as 1997, we will see the end of basic benefits for everyone regardless of income. The amount received will no longer be the same for everyone but will be calculated according to total household income. Instead of being the base of the retirement income pyramid as it was in the past, the old age pension will become a kind of welfare payment. This is more than a reform, it is more like a revolution".

Before the House adjourned for the scheduled parliamentary recess, my colleague for Mercier got hold of a document called Serving Canada's Seniors.

This document confirms the government's intentions of changing the old age pension into a plan reserved for only the poorest in our society. Page 5 of this document states: "The old age pension system, the guaranteed income supplement, the spouse's allowance and the senior citizens' tax credit will be combined into a single new program requiring an income test".

In short, all programs will be rolled into one, and pensions will be paid to seniors according to family income.

After she obtained this document, the member for Mercier asked the Minister of Human Resources Development how he could reconcile what was revealed in this document with the Prime Minister's statement that the best way to protect our social benefits was to vote no. With his now legendary arrogance, the minister replied that the document in question was a mere invention by the Bloc Quebecois.

I would like to inform the people of Canada and of Quebec officially that no one within the Bloc has time to waste in writing such a document. And let me particularly point out that, if it were really a document from the Bloc, it would have been available in both of this country's official languages, and not just English.

If the minister sincerely believes that the Bloc authored this document, I must reach the conclusion that, on the one hand, he does not know what is going on in his own department, and on the other hand, it may be one of two things. Either he has not read the budget of his finance colleague, or he read it without understanding it, for the document Serving Canada's Seniors contains the income security program reform promised in the Minister of Finance's budget last February. I would add that I am amazed that the Minister of Human Resources Development would point the finger at our party, when it is the Bloc that has been trying to cast some light on the coming changes to the various programs relating to income security for Canada's and Quebec's seniors.

I would like to conclude with an invitation to the Minister of Human Resources Development to re–examine his old age pension strategy. To pay off the deficit at the expense of seniors, especially women, is an unacceptable decision. When there is a budget in excess of $160 billion, one is entitled to think that all of our social benefits could be preserved, including old age pensions. The government must have the courage to make decisions that will enable all citizens to do their part to improve the collective well–being, and not make the least well off among us pay the price on their own.

• (1030)

[English]

Mr. Peter Thalheimer (Timmins—Chapleau, Lib.): Madam Speaker, thank you for this opportunity to speak on Bill C–96, which seeks to establish the legislative framework for the Department of Human Resources Development.

I have been amused throughout the course of the debate on this issue by the comments of some opposition members, which suggest either a misreading of the bill or an overactive imagination. For instance, some members of the official opposition claim to detect a sinister plot by the government to usurp areas of provincial responsibility. Indeed, some have even gone so far as to suggest that we might seek to sabotage existing educational, training, and manpower programs in the province of Quebec. This rather odd scenario was perhaps best articulated by one Bloc member who suggested that this legislation might be part of some hidden agenda by the government to demolish all the educational tools Quebec has developed.

Members of the third party seem equally confused. Many Reform members have expressed disappointment that the bill will not usher in the millennium and solve all the country's problems in one fell swoop. This would be a miracle were it to occur, since the bill from its inception was designed simply to take care of some legislative and administrative issues.

It is difficult to determine whether such opposition concerns are real or simply represent mere political gamesmanship. However, it seems only fair to give these members the benefit of the doubt.

I would like to take a few moments to address some of the misconceptions clearly plaguing some opposition members and explain why passage of the bill is so important for assuring further progress in providing even higher levels of service to Canadians.

Let me state what this bill is not designed to do. It is not, as some opposition members have suggested, a power grab or an attempt to raid areas of provincial jurisdiction. This should be clear from even the most cursory reading of this bill, which makes no significant changes to the statutory elements of the founding departments that are being brought together under this legislation.

Equally important is the fact that this bill does not change the powers of the federal government or the provinces. Nor does it seek to grant new powers to the federal government, as some have tried to suggest. The department's mandate is clearly limited to just those matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction. Nor will there be any new powers granted by clause 20, which empowers the minister to sign contracts with agencies and institutions other than the provinces. This authority already exists and therefore represents no change whatsoever.

If such concerns are unfounded, what does this bill really seek to do? Simply put, it seeks to recognize in a legislative, unified way the restructuring already under way, which is bringing together under one umbrella organization portions of the former departments of employment and immigration, health and welfare, secretary of state, and all of labour.

This consolidation is critical, since it will allow us to take a more holistic approach to the social, economic and training issues that have traditionally been addressed by these departments. It will allow us to provide better service at lower cost and develop the flexible, imaginative, and highly targeted approaches needed to adequately address the challenges facing Canadians now and in the future.

Of course this process of renewal has been under way for some time. I am pleased to say that this new department has had a number of successes in developing new approaches so Canadians can better cope with an increasingly demanding labour market.

As gratifying as this is, more remains to be done. That is why the changes contained in the bill are so important. To begin with, it will help us build on these initial successes by clarifying the role of the department and the responsibilities of the minister to both Parliament and Canadians generally. It will simplify the current complex trail of statutory powers, many of them going back to the original pieces of legislation that set up the founding departments, by providing one act that sets out the mandate and powers of the department. Such a change will clarify the identity of the department by laying out for both employees and clients the department's goals and the resources it will have to achieve them.

As well, the legislation will give people and organizations working with the department a clear idea of just who it is they are working with. As incredible as it may seem, many departmental officials still use old letterhead bearing the names of their former departments for legal and contracting purposes. This is confusing for partners, since in their minds those old departments no longer exist.

Of course these are not the only administrative problems to be addressed. For instance, without the proper enabling legislation simple tasks such as transferring personnel can be costly and time consuming. This is also the case with large and detailed contracts, which often involve a number of former departments.

Most important of all is the need to bring the current transitional phase of restructuring to a close and then move forward. We need to build on our recent successes and undertake exciting new initiatives aimed at investing in our most important asset, people. To do this we need to clear away administrative obstacles so we can further undertake new initiatives such as UI reform, develop new programs and services under the human resource investment fund, and improve programs for our most vulnerable citizens, including seniors and the disabled.

Finally, this legislation will improve service to Canadians while at the same time ensuring taxpayers' dollars are spent in the most cost effective manner possible.

The bill before us will allow us to achieve all these goals. It will create the architecture required to implement the reforms needed to support Canadians with the job training opportunities they need to enter the next century with confidence. I would encourage members to support Bill C–96.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts, is basically just reorganization of the department and does not offer any substantive changes.

It amazes me that with the number of people who are currently dependent on HRD for their welfare, some legitimately and some not, with the country in economic doldrums, with the debt increasing, with the IMF recently downgrading our country's rating by 50 per cent six weeks ago, the government persists in serving up bills that nibble around the edges of these problems, which affect us all.

Here is another opportunity lost. Never at any other time in recent history has this country required strong leadership in so many different areas. HRD is no different. HRD affects the lives of those who are in the lowest socioeconomic situations within our country.

We sympathize with the government in the position it faces. Indeed it is a difficult one. However, it is not an excuse for inaction, particularly since we as a party have put forward strong solutions to address these very important areas. Our HRD areas are in critical shape. They are in effect ready to fall apart.

On the one hand, we have an increase in demand. On the other hand, with an increasing debt we have less money to spend on social programs. An important fact is that by the year 2010 the combination of payments on the interest and all the payments on social programs will consume every single dollar and every penny that comes into the federal coffers. What is the government going to do when that day comes? It is only 15 years from now. What is it going to do?

We need intelligent plans in order to put social programs on a firm fiscal footing. The consequence of not doing that is to face collapse. Those who are going to suffer the most are those who are in greatest need. It is not the people in this room who are going to suffer; it is the people in soup kitchens, the people who cannot feed their children anything but macaroni and cheese, the people who are unemployable and the people who are not making ends meet. They are the ones who are going to hit the wall. They are the ones who are going to have to pick up the pieces, but they will not be able to pick up the pieces.

The Reform Party has been accused of being a slash and burn party. I would not have joined this party and my colleagues would not have joined it if that were the case. I believe that every member of Parliament is committed to ensuring that social programs will continue in the future. We do not want to see people suffer. However, to sit around and do nothing is the single greatest threat to social programs. Inaction threatens social programs. It is causing them to implode. Health care is being rationed. Social programs are being rationed. There have been cuts across the board in welfare. That is what is preventing the people who truly need the programs from being able to live a healthy life.

Those who suffer the most are the children. They are not receiving the proper nutrition. They do not have the ability to grow up to be healthy and strong.

We spend $19.1 billion on old age security. The cost of that is increasing rapidly. It is out of control. Within the next 15 years the number of seniors will increase by 40 per cent. How will we pay for this? There is absolutely no plan for providing OAS to these people.

The Canada pension plan is $500 billion in debt. This is not accounted for in the debt figures. It is not actuarially sound, and there is no plan to change it.

The Reform Party has put forward a plan for super RRSPs. I hope the government will seriously look at that plan and work with us on the program to ensure that the people who need it will receive both the OAS and the CPP.

I would like to make some constructive suggestions. First, we have to decrease duplication and decentralize. It was a tragedy that the referendum was based in part on decentralization, because that is going to have to happen in every province across the country. For the country to be carved up partly over decentralization is a tragedy, because it is inevitable.

In fact clause 6 of the bill does the opposite. It strengthens the hand of the federal government rather than decentralizing powers. Decentralizing powers does not mean that people will suffer. By doing that, duplication will be decreased and more money will be provided to the end user.

The government can take a leadership role by working with the provinces in providing a minimum standard across the board to create similar standards for the provinces and ensure that those provinces that are the most impoverished will not suffer. It is a challenge, but it can be met.

Second, we have to prioritize spending. It makes no sense to me that when we are prioritizing spending we cut across the board. That cuts from everybody, those who are abusing the program as well as those who are not.

In British Columbia they looked at welfare. They looked at 780 people. Of that number, 280 were flagrantly abusing the system and did not need to be on welfare. They stopped after looking at 780 people; it was too inflammatory for them to continue. That is a lot of people. That money could be better spent in bringing down the debt and also in ensuring that the people who need it will get it. Cutting across the board only makes those who are the poorest suffer more.

We should focus on skills training. Let us make sure there is enough money in the pot to provide skills for the unemployed.

We also need to decrease the tax load. We have heard much about taxing the rich and corporations. However, the reality is that small and medium sized businesses are creating the jobs in our country.

• (1045)

What are these businesses telling us? They say that we cannot compete with other countries with our existing tax load. Many of the closed shops and closed industries and much of the exodus of companies south are in large part due to the fact that their tax load is too great. Who suffers? It is mostly the people who are employed by them. Therefore our unemployment rates go up.

We need to decrease government red tape which is severely restricting the ability of companies to function properly. We must also decrease the debt.

We are not a slash and burn party. We have put forward constructive plans to enable us to decrease the debt, to get the deficit to zero, to priorize social programs, to provide alternatives to social programs, to priorize spending and to give people the skills to take care of themselves.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I too should like to speak to Bill C–96.

The bill is simply a housekeeping bill that brings together a number of departments under one roof. Yet it has inflamed the emotions of both opposition parties. Their criticisms are so completely unjustified that I must wonder if in making the accusations both parties are really speaking to their not so hidden agenda.

Some members opposite see Bill C–96, particularly clause 6, as a power grab. I have no idea how they came to this conclusion because clause 6 simply states:

> The powers, duties and functions of the Minister extend to and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction and relating to the development of the human resources of Canada not by law assigned to any other Minister, department, board or agency of the Government of Canada, and are to be exercised with the objective of enhancing employment, encouraging equality and promoting social security.

Any reasonable objective analyst not fixated on a separatist agenda or decentralist ideology would see that clause as a statement of purpose. It lists clear and legitimate limits for the minister, whose mandate is and always has been to devise policies that enhance employment, encourage equality and promote social security.

Bill C–96 does not change federal or provincial powers at all. It does not tip the balance one way or the other. It neither increases nor reduces the minister's range of authority. The statutory powers of the department in place now are unchanged. I am sure members of both opposition parties who have basic reading comprehension skills must know that.

The bill does not establish new initiatives or alter existing ones in any way. Only those members opposite who have chosen to play the victim role to the hilt and who apparently see a potential humiliation in every act of the federal government would see a power grab in the bill.

The three objectives set out in clause 6 of the bill, enhancing employment, encouraging equality and promoting social security, have always been key objectives of the federal government, especially of Liberal federal governments.

If a national government is not in the business of creating jobs, promoting equality of opportunity and establishing a social safety net, what is its business? Any federal government on the globe that is not totally anaemic, corrupt or viciously insensitive must have these fundamental objectives, especially the government of a country that has been named for the third year running the best country in the world in which to live. If the Canadian government were to drop these objectives, the official opposition would be the first to scream unjust and declare yet another humiliation of Quebec.

The Canadian government is constitutionally responsible for unemployment insurance and for creating and operating programs that help unemployed Canadians find employment no matter where they live in the country. In my riding in British Columbia COAST and FOCUS YWCA have provided and continue to provide invaluable services, especially for single moms on welfare. Currently many of these programs do not receive funding from the B.C. government when they are actually saving tens of thousands of dollars in welfare payments.

The federal Government of Canada has an international obligation under a convention of the International Labour Organization to provide national labour market information and exchange for all Canadians. The federal government is responsible for national economic growth and development. Therefore it is common sense that it must be involved in training.

If we have learned one thing over the past decade it is that a well trained workforce is absolutely essential if we want to remain competitive in the global marketplace and to maintain our standard of living as number one in the world. The strongest most innovative economies in the world today, Japan and Germany, have become what they are largely because of their national policies that emphasize training.

The federal government must be able to assist those affected by special situations that go beyond the jurisdictions of any one province, such as workers in the fishing industry, older workers displaced by restructuring of the economy or the dispossessed youth of Canada. In my riding Youth Service Canada projects have benefited youths very directly.

The federal government has absolutely no interest in having powers just because it wants them. The Minister of Human Resources Development said it very well when he said that we must combine resources across the country so that when one area is facing high unemployment another area helps to support it.

That is the Canadian way. That is why we have a federal country and a federal government. One part of the country supports another when it is undergoing trouble. It is a family in which we all help each other in times of need, because we know one day we may in turn be in times of need. That is the fundamental concept of sharing. The more we fragment the country as the third party opposition would have us do, the more we divide it, separate it, decentralize it and balkanize it into a series of fiefdoms, the less capable we are of helping individuals that no longer have the benefit of that sharing. That is why the federal government must continue to play an important role in this area.

We have always been open to discussions with provincial, territorial and municipal governments about who is the best suited to deliver certain programs. We have negotiated that because we know we do not always deliver the best programs and that things must be done at the community level.

Because clause 6 of Bill C–96 sets out the department's mandate in terms of general objectives, we must have the flexibility to serve Canadians better. I do not want to sidetrack the debate by raising non–issues and reading into clause 6 things that are there. It is really a disservice to the thousands of Canadians in all provinces who benefit from job creation and training.

The other clause in Bill C–96 about which concerns have been raised is clause 20. It reads:

> For the purpose of facilitating the formulation, co–ordination and implementation—

Words like co–ordination mean that we work together to make something work. It is so simple and fundamental to a clear understanding of how teamwork is accomplished, of how we pull together, that I cannot understand the problem. Anyway the clause continues:

> —the Minister may enter into agreements with a province or group of provinces, agencies of provinces, financial institutions and such other persons or bodies as the Minister considers appropriate.

Any reasonable objective observer would see in this clause no hidden agenda to intrude. It merely provides a way to formulate co–operation with all groups with which we must form partnerships if we are to make the changes.

Without the authority that clause 20 gives the minister the department would have difficulties conducting its simple mandate and its simple business. However the Bloc is bent on getting more power for the political elite in Quebec, while the Reform Party is bent solely on getting more power for the provinces and fragmenting and balkanizing the country.

In 1994–95 the department of human resources signed more than 50,000 labour market related contracts in Quebec which were worth $700 million. Among those 50,000 contracts were 9,600 contracts with non–profit organizations, 9,300 contracts with private sector enterprises and 25,000 contracts under the fee payer trainee program, all in Quebec. It is the authority granted to the minister under clause 20.

It allows us to enter into agreements with financial institutions for student loans. How are we to create a country of young people who can take over from us and carry on if those who cannot afford to go to school are not allowed student loans?

It enables the federal government to sign agreements with provinces to help displaced older workers. When 45 or 50 year old people lose their jobs, especially in the emerging communication technology era, they need training.

This kind of section empowered Ottawa to enter into a partnership with Quebec to help entrepreneurs and to help workers affected by the closing of the Hyundai plant in Bromont last March. The whole bill helps the department of human resources to create a national vision for Canada. It is not for British Columbia alone. It is how we work together as a country to achieve the kinds of things that make us the envy of the world.

We are a unique country. I continue to hear people talk about how another country does it and why we are not doing it the same way. Wherever we go we hear people saying that Canada is a unique country. We have learned how to work together in peace. We have learned to do what we are supposed to do, that is to create peace, order and good government.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Madam Speaker, Bill C–96—and this may surprise you—seems to me to insult Quebec federalists. A lot of federalists in Quebec still felt, in the last referendum, that the federal government deserved one last chance to demonstrate its desire for change. Bill C–96, which was tabled before the referendum and which the federal government is still having debated in the House simply as if nothing had happened, represents the federal government's decision to interfere more systematically and with a basis in law—a new approach.

The bureaucratic powers in Ottawa have now decided to incorporate into legislation the intrusions by the federal government over the past years in the area of manpower through its control over the unemployment insurance fund. This is particularly significant and a bit of a blow to Quebec federalists and to the consensus in Quebec on the question of manpower.

There is, for example, Ghislain Dufour, the spokesperson and chief executive officer of the Conseil du patronat du Québec, who is not exactly considered a separatist or a sovereignist in Quebec. He says that now is the time, following the close result in the referendum, for the federal government to make it clear it is in favour of change and therefore acknowledge the consensus in Quebec on training and manpower. It is time the federal government agreed to give Quebec full responsibility for manpower to put an end to the duplication and unnecessary expenditure in this sector.

We hear the same message from Gérald Ponton of the Association des manufacturiers du Québec. In the days that followed the referendum, he said it was absolutely vital that one level of government withdraw, if manpower practices were to be effective. For this to work in Quebec, it is the federal government that will have to withdraw. We must not forget that the whole matter of training is part of government activity, it does not simply come out of thin air.

As Quebec is already responsible for the labour code, which covers the vast majority of Quebec workers, for occupational health and safety, for minimum labour standards and for all regulations on professional qualifications, professional conduct and mass layoffs, giving Quebec responsibility for the entire area of training is like giving it an extra piece of equipment in its tool box. The Government of Quebec already has the networks, like the education network, for it to get involved in occupational training, among other areas, in order to ensure that young people coming along and workers needing retraining receive what they need efficiently and appropriately.

The auditor general, in his latest report, concluded that employee training costs were highest in Quebec in terms of the money spent by the federal government.

This is further proof, with the numbers to support it, that the federal government should withdraw from this sector.

But, instead, it forges ahead with Bill C–96; it insists on interfering everywhere, and on signing agreements with municipal governments, various agencies, and even the provinces. But nowhere does it say that these agreements will be in keeping with the provinces' policies.

In a way, this is the continuation of the monolithic state, and this is the terrible insult to Quebec federalists who want to see the Canadian Constitution and the Canadian structure revamped so that the federal government assumes only those responsibilities which come under its jurisdiction and which would be acceptable to federalists.

I also believe that this is the proof that, after all, sovereignists are right. Even with the warning it was served on October 30, the government is unable to shift gears and proceed with the adjustments that would allow it to meet Quebecers' aspirations; the only way for Quebec to have the tools it needs will be for the province to hold another referendum and separate.

What could be said to get the government to reverse its decision to pass this bill? What could make the government withdraw from this sector? I believe it would take two conditions which will be easily attainable. First, the federal government must stop using the unemployment insurance fund as a cash cow; now that it can no longer borrow money abroad, it has discovered a domestic market, namely employee and employer UI contributions. As a result, this year, in 1995–1995, it has accumulated a five billion dollar surplus, while it cut the number of weeks during which beneficiaries are entitled to UI benefits and increased the number of weeks of work required to qualify for UI. It has some nerve.

This is quite a message for the workers of Quebec and Canada, especially seasonal workers; it says that in order to be able to encroach on a field of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, the federal government is going to squeeze money out of those who need it the most. Let us take a worker in peat production, forestry or agriculture in general; because of those measures, instead of becoming entitled to unemployment benefits after 12, 13 or 14 weeks and receiving them for the rest of the year if his job is to continue the following year, the worker will have to find work for 14 or 15 weeks; otherwise, he will not be able to fulfil the requirements and receive a full year's income from either work or unemployment.

We know that unemployment insurance is not financed by the government, but exclusively by employer and employee contributions. Let us try to transpose this situation into another type of insurance program. You pay premiums, but you have no control whatsoever over the contract which determines how you will obtain insurance benefits; the decision is entirely up to the government. Instead of being eligible for benefits for 30 or 35 weeks, you will receive them for 25 or 30 weeks only, and there will be a four or five–week waiting period during which you will have to go on welfare. That is what is happening in Quebec this year. Between September 1994 and September 1995, the number of welfare recipients increased by 20,000 because of changes made by the federal government and now they are announcing, for next week, a new reform which will raise eligibility requirements yet again.

This also sends a message to federalists who believe there can be a difference between Canada and the United States. This government keeps trying to copy the American model, but the expected result will never be achieved. Canadians, particularly those of the Maritimes and Eastern Quebec and all those who really want more balance in our society and an adequate distribution of wealth and expenses, will have to stand up and say: "No; we will no longer accept that kind of action on the part of the government. It will have to restrain its activities to its own constitutional jurisdiction and withdraw once and for all from such areas as manpower training."

That is why I think the government should listen to the provinces, take note of the consensus in Quebec and withdraw

Bill C–96 completely, because it already has rejected our amendment which would have given the provinces an opting out option.

Since that they have rejected the amendment, the only other solution is to withdraw the bill itself so that we can clarify the situation and so that Quebec can have sole jurisdiction in the area of manpower training and take all the necessary measures to face the challenges of our changing society.

Given the arguments presented, I hope the government will have the decency to withdraw this bill.

[English]

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Madam Speaker, on Tuesday we dealt with the amendment proposed by the member for Mercier, a motion that had nothing to do with Bill C–96. Now perhaps we can move forward.

As I look back over the various statements by members on this bill, it seems to me there are really two basic questions we have to answer. First, does Bill C–96 represent any change in statutory powers that would allow the federal government to interfere with the provinces? Second, is the department created by Bill C–96 the kind of department we want, a department that will provide the best possible service and the right kind of service to Canadians?

We can deal with the first question very quickly. It has been answered clearly by the Minister of Human Resources Development and it is answered clearly by the bill itself. There are no substantive changes to existing statutory powers. The bill itself in clause 6 limits the powers of the minister to matters under the jurisdiction of Parliament, so there can be no intrusion on provincial areas of responsibility.

That really is the end of the discussion. Some people may say otherwise. They may say the bill is a secret plot to invade provincial territory, but saying it is so does not make it so, no matter how many times you say it. In the end we have to base any conclusions on what is really in the bill in black and white, not what is in other people's imagination. What is there in black and white is very clear: There is no interference with the provinces, possible or intended, in Bill C–96.

The second question deserves more comment. Is this the kind of department we want to create?

Fundamentally, this bill draws together all the different elements, programs and policies of the federal government related to human resources development into one integrated, coherent system. It is the basis for a new approach to helping Canadians as they deal with some of the incredible changes in the workplace and in the economy. It also provides a basis for new relationships between the federal government and individual Canadians, between different levels of government, between governments and local communities. As the Minister of Human Resources Development said when he moved second reading:

> This is not a defence of the status quo or what it used to be. It is an attempt to provide a new, innovative way of governing—.The old ways are simply not relevant to the kinds of conditions we now face. That is one reason the government has undertaken to provide a new set of instruments, brought together with a single focus on policy.

The minister went on to say that the single focus was there so we can tackle the real deficit problem, which is not just the fiscal deficit, but the human deficit, a deficit as corrosive and undermining to the well–being of individuals as anything we face on the fiscal side.

How can this new department help tackle the problems we have with the human deficit? I say it is by providing a single focal point in the communities across the country, drawing together all the resources of the federal government and the community to help people find and keep jobs. It is by providing the opportunity for working more closely with the provinces to draw all of this country's resources together to help people find jobs. This is the priority of this government. It is the number one priority for Canadians. We know that.

Throughout this debate we have heard many examples of how this approach is already working. We have heard how the department is building a new integrated, decentralized service network moving from 450 to 750 points of service reaching smaller communities 24 hours a day. It is providing four times as many offices where seniors can get service in person. It is using the best technology available to speed up service, cutting UI processing time by two days, cutting old age security processing claims from eight days to one–half day.

We have heard how major changes have made student loans more accessible, flexible and sustainable. This has helped more than 300,000 students this year alone and has provided special grants to more than 13,000 high need students. We have heard how our new youth internships are leading to real jobs for some 24,000 young Canadians and how 130 Youth Service Canada projects across the country are helping young people serve their communities while getting valuable work experience. We know this is essential.

We have heard how the department is building new stronger partnerships with the private sector. There is increased funding for sector councils, partnerships where every federal dollar generates an additional $1.50 from industry to help Canadians adjust to the new economy, and we all have to realize it is here.

We have heard how the federal government is developing new partnerships with the provinces through joint federal–provincial initiatives. This is helping some 60,000 single mothers, older workers, aboriginals and young people to get new skills and new jobs.

We have heard again how this department is reviewing and distilling its 39 programs into a streamlined decentralized set of re–employment tools, tools that respond directly to the needs of Canadians where they live. Decisions can be made in the local communities instead of many miles away in some centralized bureaucracy. The provinces, municipalities, local businesses and organizations can be part of those decisions. They can tailor how federal service will be used to help people in their communities get back to work.

This may sound abstract, but in London, Ontario there is a wonderful example of these policies in action. Last month the minister sat down with community groups and political leaders in London to discuss the creation of a new learning and life centre there.

The London Learning and Life Centre will provide a centralized location for employment preparation, skills training and adult education. It will house a job search centre, an interactive lab for computer training and office space for community service professionals. Even an on–site child care service is planned.

An estimated, and I think this is conservative, 8,000 to 10,000 persons will utilize its services annually in London. The centre began as a community initiative, bottom up, not top down and has enormous community support. Its partner organizations include groups representing women, youth, adult learners, aboriginal people, immigrants and educators. Recognizing the real concerns, the real common sense of enabling local communities to work together for social development, the federal government contributed $700,000 to the initial stages of the centre's creation.

We heard the minister make clear commitments to build on the success of this decentralized approach, inviting the provinces to sit down and devise new solutions, new ways of working together. This is what the Canadian public wants. We want governments to work together with communities and individuals, new ways to deliver the best possible services, the most effective services to Canadians where they live, not here in Ottawa. This is clearly the right direction. This is clearly the kind of change and the kind of department that we need as Canada prepares for a new century.

The basic philosophy behind the new department, the vision behind Bill C–96, represents something new and very exciting. It is already making a difference in my community and in the lives of hundreds of thousands of Canadians every day throughout this country.

It is up to the House now to ensure that the department can keep moving forward and that Canadians can count on this government's commitment to provide the best possible help in today's economy. Bill C–96 creates the department that can deliver what Canadians need. It creates the kind of department that can make a difference and the kind of department that makes sense.

We have every reason to move forward, not backward, and to put this legislation in place as quickly as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Madam Speaker, I stand today in this House to address Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts.

The bill gives a legal basis to the Department of Human Resources Development in order to extend the powers of the Minister of Human Resources Development.

• (1115)

Thus, this bill gives the minister the power to circumvent provincial powers in order to establish direct links with local organizations or such other persons he considers appropriate. With increased federal intrusion in social and employment programs, and most particularly, in manpower training, all social or employment related sectors are likely to be affected by federal action. Consequently, with new powers, the minister is interfering with provincial jurisdiction.

In the powers, duties and functions of the minister outlined in clause 6, it is specified that he exercises his power > —with the objective of enhancing employment, encouraging equality and promoting social security—in matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction.

Clause 20 provides that the minister, within his powers, duties and functions, > —may enter into agreements with a province or group of provinces, agencies of provinces, financial institutions and such other persons or bodies as the Minister considers appropriate.

In the old legislation, the minister only had the power to enter into agreements with a province or group of provinces.

In clause 31.3,

> The Commission may authorize any person or body—to exercise powers or perform duties and functions of or delegated to the Commission.

In sectopm 18.3 of the old legislation, the commission could delegate them only to "officers or employees or classes of officers or employees of the Commission or, where the Minister approves, of the Department". It thus has delegation power equal to the minister's.

Quebec partners in the labour market have long recognized the need to repatriate to Quebec federal responsibilities and budgets for manpower.

The 1989 employment forum was a major step in this process. In December 1990, the Quebec Liberal government officially demanded that all federal budgets, including UI funds, allocated to manpower programs be transferred to Quebec.

The Quebec government hastened to create the Quebec manpower development society or SQDM so that labour market partners could work together to manage all manpower development programs in Quebec.

Bill C–96 increases the federal presence and encroaches on provincial jurisdiction by allowing the federal government to approach organizations, municipalities and individuals directly, without going through an intermediary.

The bill gives the minister, among other things, greater powers to intervene in income security matters for children and seniors. This opens the door to the privatization and contracting–out of certain programs, including unemployment insurance and the Canada pension plan.

As spokesman on seniors' organizations for the official opposition in the House of Commons, I am outraged by the June 12 tabling of the document from the Department of Human Resources Development, which questions the universality of old age pensions.

On Thursday, October 26, my colleague, the hon. member for Mercier and official opposition critic on human resources development in the House of Commons, said this: "The old age pension plan, the guaranteed income supplement, the spouse's allowance, the pension income tax credit, and the age tax credit will be combined into a single assistance program. Seniors' eligibility for this program will be based on their income".

The hon. member for Mercier also had this to say about the reform: "It is not only the end of universality for the old age pension that is at stake. What this government wants is to base the amount of the pension cheque on family income. This will affect mostly women and threatens their financial independence. The planned reform would also affect those who already receive their pensions, despite what the Prime Minister of Canada had suggested".

It is obvious that the end of universality for old age pensions marks a significant setback for Canadian and Quebec society, for women, and for all those who have a right to expect a minimum of financial security in the future.

Quebec also has the dubious honour of having the highest rate of poverty among seniors over 65 years old in all of Canada. This analysis was made by the senior citizens council. The old age security pension remains the main source of income for seniors, and elderly women in particular. I have spoken many times in this House to denounce the federal government's planned cuts to old age pension, especially those announced after the October 30 referendum in Quebec.

When we put questions to the HRD minister in the House, he laughs them off and always seems to have all the answers. To listen to him, you would think that he is graced with papal infallibility. On September 26, as the official opposition's critic for seniors' organizations, I asked Prime Minister of Canada if he could confirm for Quebecers and Canadians in general that his government's old age pension reform was actually ready but being put off until after the referendum so seniors would not know how extensive the cuts awaiting them were.

At the same time, I pointed out to the Prime Minister that his Minister of Foreign Affairs had clearly stated that the federal government would definitely not touch old age pensions, which is in total contradiction with his finance colleague's announcement, in his February budget, of an old age pension reform.

Of course, as expected, the federal government did not announce any cuts before the Quebec referendum. I must point out that the federal labour minister and minister responsible for the government's no campaign in the referendum also departed from the traditional federal Liberal line in reassuring a concerned lady by saying that the pension system would also be maintained under the Quebec sovereignty bill.

On September 21, I questioned the Minister of Finance about the review of the Canada pension plan, pointing out to him that it was obvious he and the HRD minister were waiting until after the referendum to let the axe fall on the old age pension program.

The Parti Quebecois made a firm commitment to maintain the old age pension program in a sovereign Quebec. In fact, clause 11 of the draft bill on Quebec's sovereignty states that pensions and supplements payable to the elderly shall continue to be paid by the Government of Quebec according to the same terms and conditions.

Unlike the federal government, Quebec will be able to fund this program through tax moneys recovered from Ottawa. It should be pointed out however that the old age security program is funded through taxes levied by the federal government in Quebec and across Canada. On the other hand, the Quebec pension plan, QPP for short, is funded through premiums paid by Quebec employers and workers. With the QPP, Quebec already has all the administrative structures needed to keep providing the old age pensions currently paid by Ottawa out of Quebec taxpayers' taxes when Quebec becomes sovereign, which should not be long in coming.

Bill C–96 is the federal government's way of interfering in and creating more overlap with provincial jurisdictions. Areas coming under the responsibility of the minister would include old age security programs, and the Bloc Quebecois cannot support such a bill.

[English]

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, we have heard many fine words about Bill C–96 over the past two weeks. I will quote some words said on Monday because they sum up one of the main reasons we need to proceed with the bill.

One member said: "The key to the future is a good training program based on the manpower requirements of the region in which they live. It is certainly not here in Ottawa, far from my region and others, that public officials can determine the best training programs for my constituents. They are too far away and they do not know about our specific needs. Therefore the decision making process regarding manpower training must be closer to those concerned".

Bringing decision making closer to those concerned is perhaps the simplest way to describe the principle underlying Bill C–96. What is interesting is that the person who described it in this way was none other than the member for Chicoutimi.

I am very pleased to see that the Bloc Quebecois, despite all its rhetoric, agrees with the basic intention of the bill. The government is decentralizing labour market programs more than ever before so that individuals and communities are empowered to make real decisions that affect their lives.

If the member truly believes this is the right thing to do, and it is, he has every reason to endorse the bill. Of course the member goes on to describe the bill as unacceptable to Quebecers. His colleague, the member for Blainville—Deux–Montagnes, goes so far as to described Bill C–96 as a steamroller of centralizing and anti–social legislation. I can only assume this is merely a lapse into the Bloc's more picturesque rhetoric.

I urge the member for Chicoutimi to trust his first instincts and recognize the bill for the ground breaking decentralizing legislation it is.

Everyone in the House recognizes there is a need to forge better partnerships, better working relationships between the federal and provincial governments. This is precisely why the federal government has invited the provinces to talk about new arrangements for labour market programs. We have made it clear that we fully respect the integrity of provincial jurisdiction in the area of training. We want to find a better way to work together.

Bill C–96 is a concrete illustration of this desire. The Minister of Human Resources Development said on November 9: "One of the direct results of the department will be to give far more space for provincial governments to begin to make decisions at their level of responsibility and jurisdiction. The time has come for us to take a much closer look at the respective roles and to build bridges to bring us together".

Our actions as a government, the initiatives taken with this department over the past two years, also demonstrate this desire to work with the provinces and address their concerns. Surely the time has come for all levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal, to rise above the old–fashioned turf wars and start finding ways to work together, to bring our resources together and to help the people we serve.

The Bloc, on the other hand, seems intent on blocking the very progress it professes to believe in. Instead of urging us on, instead of supporting positive, constructive action, it throws up this wall of words. Under the banner of jurisdiction the Bloc says we should do nothing. In the name of progress and change I say let us find better ways to do our job.

We cannot do a better job by building walls that keep us apart. We need a better philosophy. We need the kind of philosophy the minister outlined when he spoke of the need to empower communities and individuals to make more choices. What does the Bloc Quebecois saying response? No. Individuals should not be empowered to make more choices. That is the philosophy of the Bloc Quebecois.

We need the kind of philosophy the minister outlined when he spoke of new partnerships: government with the private sector, government with the school boards, government with the provinces. What does the Bloc say in response? No. We do not want to work together for change.

Is it any wonder so many people in Quebec feel abandoned? The member for Chicoutimi speaks with concern for his riding, which has the highest unemployment rate in Canada. How can he expect to help Canadians in his riding with a do nothing philosophy?

How can we hope to help the people of Chicoutimi by saying: "You cannot have this awful federalist Bill C–96. You cannot have a system that gives you the power and resources you need to build better lives and get good jobs. It is not the Bloc Quebecois way.

This is plain nonsense. Quebecers and all Canadians deserve something better than that. The one million Quebecers who turn to HRDC for help each year deserve the best help they can get. The more than 164,000 Quebecers we helped find jobs last year deserve that help. The 44,789 students who found employment last summer deserve those jobs.

The 700,000 Quebecers who use provincial social assistance programs deserve to see the federal government's contribution, almost $3 billion each year, used in the most flexible and productive way possible.

The half million UI claimants in Quebec each month deserve the best possible service in their quest to get back into the workforce.

The 400,000 Quebecers who benefited from the department's employment programs and services deserve to see those programs become more effective, more flexible, more focused on their needs.

The 850,000 Quebec seniors deserve to benefit from improved access and service that will be available as the department builds its new service delivery system.

Every Quebecer deserves more than the status quo. Bill C–96 is about moving beyond the status quo to something better, to more responsive programs and services, better programs and services designed and delivered at the community level, where they can make a difference.

Bill C–96 will strengthen partnerships and decentralize power even further and let Quebecers make the decisions about what kinds of programs and services make sense in their communities.

We have made enormous progress over the last year in the pioneering of this approach, fundamentally rethinking and redoing the way HRDC works in communities in Quebec and across Canada. We are making enormous progress in working with the provinces to provide the most flexible services possible to all Canadians. Consider, for example, the Canada health and social transfer, which will replace the old Canada assistance plan. The whole point of this CHST is to help the provinces deliver the kinds of social benefits and services they want to deliver but cannot because of the inflexibility of existing arrangements.

We are making real progress, showing that we can work together in putting solid progressive social programs in the hands of Quebecers. Bill C–96 is about continuing this momentum. It is about continuing to work together to clarify the roles of different levels of government and it is about building bridges. Surely this is a better way than talking about imaginary power grabs. Building bridges together is the philosophy. This vision underlies the new Department of Human Resources Development.

Bill C–96 provides the basis for the new department. With the accord and support of the House we can put this legislation in place and move forward.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to address once again Bill C–96, this time at second reading. This act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development has an extremely negative impact in my riding, since it involves, among other things, a restructuring of the employment centre network across Canada, including in Quebec.

Following that restructuring, there will be 28 regional management centres in Quebec, as well as 78 local centres or sub–offices. What is disturbing for Trois–Rivières and its surrounding region is that the government, in its wisdom, has decided to establish the regional operation centre in Shawinigan, instead of Trois–Rivières.

From now on, Trois–Rivières will be served by a suboffice of the regional centre in Shawinigan. You can understand that this decision is unpopular and also illogical. We strongly hope this is just an idea, but there is every indication that a final decision has been made at the departmental level. That decision is unpopular. Indeed, already, more than 25,000 residents from the Trois–Rivières region have signed a petition in which they express their disagreement and their discontent. Moreover, all the major stakeholders, including MPs and MPPs, the mayor of Trois–Rivières, various community groups, as well as 70 organizations, including some 40 municipalities, have also expressed, in writing or through resolutions, their opposition to the government's intention.

In addition to the employees' union, which is being disregarded in this process, two other organizations, the Fédération de l'âge d'or and the Fédération des caisses populaires of the Mauricie region, co–operated to ensure the success of that petition.

Not only is this decision unpopular, it is also illogical. It is so illogical and it makes so little sense that it even contradicts the criteria defined by the department regarding the selection and the location of these regional management centres. The main criteria, which were based on plain common sense, took into account the number of people concerned, including UI beneficiaries, income security recipients and seniors, because they are greatly affected by this project. These criteria also took into consideration the number of companies and employers hiring people who are UI beneficiaries, at least we hope this is the case, and which are concerned by such a decision and by the current role of the employment centres.

Given the numbers for these groups in the Shawinigan and Trois–Rivières regions, the decision does not make sense and goes against established criteria. Indeed, in terms of numbers, the ratio is two to one in favour of Trois–Rivières for just about every group, whether it be the overall population, the number of companies, the number of UI beneficiaries, etc.

This shows just how illogical the decision is. It is a decision which goes against the department's own criteria.

The change is upsetting for Trois–Rivières residents, because it has to do with the establishment of regional centres. Yet, the government wants to go to Shawinigan and just keep a local centre in Trois–Rivières, in spite of the fact that the latter is recognized as the main centre in the region. This is totally unacceptable, and we will continue, along with the other stakeholders, to denounce the situation.

We have to know what it will mean in day–to–day terms. People will come to apply in Trois–Rivières, since the role of sub–offices, like the one intended for Trois–Rivières, is to receive applications for benefits, and take information only without making any analysis or any ruling, and then pass on the information to the regional management centre, which will from then on keep the actual file of the claimant's application. When an application will need, as three out of four applications do, further attention or special analysis, the whole operation, any action, will be directed from Shawinigan twice as often to Trois–Rivière because of the population pool.

At present, for unemployment insurance, the department's investigations, which are routine in some cases, are made in Trois–Rivières, as are complaints made to the board of referees, since the actual file is in Trois–Rivières. In answer to the letter we wrote to make the appropriate representations about the intended move, the minister indicated that services will not be altered in any way for the people of Trois–Rivières. However, from now on, contrary to what the minister said in his letter, the department's investigations and the appeals to the board of referees will be made in Shawinigan and from Shawinigan, which altering, to use the minister's word, operations as they now stand.

We therefore question the good faith of the minister who, in our opinion, is trying to fool the population when he says such things.

You have to be aware that the project was developed, or the decision made, without any consultation. It was announced just before the House recessed, or just before the change of rhythm that occurs in our society at the beginning of the summer holidays, since the announcement was made on June 22 and later confirmed in late July or early August, at a time when it is practically impossible to mobilize the population. What a nice approach, somewhat in keeping with the minister's image.

I remind you that this was done without any consultation, both locally and regionally, and regardless of the regional dialogue that goes on in our area, the Mauricie.

I remind you also, as was confirmed to me yesterday by reliable sources, that there has been no comparative analysis of the impact of keeping the centre in Trois–Rivières, which used to be the focal point, instead of moving it to Shawinigan. They did not study the impact on the population, users or costs. I will deal with that later on.

One of the effects is that Bécancour, a community traditionally and naturally linked with Trois–Rivières, particularly as regards the manpower operations at the regional office in Trois–Rivières, will now have to deal with Drummondville, a choice that is arbitrary and inconsistent with the practices in our region, and makes no sense.

Anyone with the slightest acquaintance with this area would know things do not work that way. That is one of the reasons why my colleagues for Richelieu and Champlain and I agreed to a joint position and condemned the move, because our ridings are affected in various ways. This is a good example of the kind of co–operation that can come about when people want to co–operate.

Another aspect, which is just as revolting, is that this move will be detrimental to those most in need, people who have just lost their job and find themselves in a state of vulnerability they had not experienced before.

These people will feel increasingly uncomfortable in dealing with a system decreasingly at their service. Besides, what we have here is technological change of a type that will dehumanize relations between the department and people in need like the unemployed, seniors—who will feel the impact of that move—, people on welfare and community organizations which, as we know, rely heavily on volunteers and government assistance. Things have been made more difficult for them, and that is why this move should be condemned.

The government can choose one of three solutions if it wants to mend its ways. First, it could maintain the status quo, deal with existing circumstances, respect the wishes of the local population and users, and keep the centre in Trois–Rivières. Everybody would be happy.

A second alternative would be to have a regional office in Trois–Rivières for the whole area, including Bécancour, and give Shawinigan the status of a regional centre for the north shore, including Saint–Tite. The situation would be similar to that of Gaspé or Sept–Îles, something that could make sense. It would be up to the hon. member for Saint–Maurice to demonstrate that such an alternative makes sense.

Third, the most absurd alternative would be to set up a regional management centre in Shawinigan to serve the whole region, a decision we will always condemn.

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Madam Speaker, let me first start by saying that our worst nightmare has come true. What we feared when we embarked upon the last referendum campaign was that the central government would disregard one of the most solid consensus we have ever seen in the province of Quebec.

This most solid and deep–rooted consensus is that we will never be able to do anything about the employment situation if we do not give the levers required to deal with labour market–related problems to the level of government most capable of doing so.

Right now, the best government to give Quebec a labour market policy to efficiently fight unemployment is not the central government, but rather the National Assembly of Quebec.

Why are we saying that it is not the central government? Because the central government has to make decisions about a labour market that covers five regions, and we know that the labour market situation in New Brunswick is nothing like the situation in Quebec.

This is why several, if not all, of the major stakeholders on the Quebec labour market are opposed to Bill C–96.

• (1145)

Let me remind the House of some of the organizations that are against Bill C–96. There is the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre, the Institut canadien de l'éducation des adultes, the FTQ, the CLC, and despite this coalition of organizations representing tens of thousands of citizens, the central government has the nerve, the gall to introduce in this House a bill that would allow the federal to interfere in an area without any mandate to do so.

I hope that the government whip and his team will finally come to their senses and realize that they are doing something irreparable by submitting Bill C–96.

Yet, when you think about it it is obvious that everything which concerns the labour market comes under provincial jurisdiction. Surely, no member of this House is unaware that the labour code, the CSST, orders respecting collective agreements and mass layoffs are areas of provincial jurisdiction and that it is perfectly natural that labour market–related policies are the specific and exclusive business of the provinces.

Let me remind the House of a fact: unemployment is not innate. One is not born unemployed. Unemployment has nothing to do with genetics. Nor has it anything to do with the language one speaks. A person's language does not bear on his or her working skills. How is it, then, that within the federation the unemployment rate has always been higher in Quebec than in Ontario? Workers in both provinces have about the same qualifications and live in about the same social and economic environment. How is it that for the last 20 or 25 years Quebec has had a higher rate of unemployment than Ontario? And I am sure we could give very concrete examples of countries where unemployment was successfully eliminated. They have what is called a frictional unemployment rate of about 3 or 4 per cent, reflecting the number of people who quit their job for a very particular reason and are looking for another one.

How is it that we are unable in our system to create conditions allowing all those who want to work to find a job? Naturally, there are those who cannot work because they are handicapped and those who are momentarily out of work and those who do not want to work. But how is it that, in 1995, qualified and competent people who truly want to work find themselves in a system where the government is unable to create conditions leading to their employment? You do not have to be a rocket scientist or have three doctorates to understand that, if unemployment is not a matter of heredity or of language, there must be political reasons to explain why the unemployment rate is at 11, 12 or 13 per cent.

These political reasons are very clear: we have two governments which impede each other's labour market initiatives. The best example of this inefficiency, my colleague the member for Trois–Rivières referred to it, is of course the existence of two manpower centre networks, which cancel each other's initiatives.

Let me just remind you that Ottawa administers just as many programs as Quebec does. Quebec has approximately 25 programs to put people back to work and so does Ottawa. What this means is that if the people that we, as members, meet in our constituency office, and I am sure that this happens to you too, are UI recipients, they are eligible for some programs, but if they receive income security benefits, they are eligible for some programs but not for others.

I believe we are mature and lucid enough as parlementarians to say that we must aim at having only one government that will control all powers and levers in order to help put people back to work, and take them out of that unacceptable situation called unemployment.

This decision, this wish, is incompatible with the existence of two governments and it is certainly incompatible with the fact that two governments can each have 25 programs without any coordination between them. Instead of proposing what all important stakeholders in Quebec are asking, that is that the federal government pull out of the labour sector, this government has the nerve, the irresponsibility and the irreverence to give us a bill, Bill C–96, which increases the powers of the minister in labour matters.

Can you imagine such a situation where all Quebec stakeholders are asking for one thing, and the Government of Quebec is incoherently saying the exact opposite? We must not forget that the social cost of unemployment has been evaluated and I am convinced that all parliamentarians are concerned about this situation.

I would like to remind you that we have, in Quebec, a very respectable and respected organization called the Forum pour l'emploi. Of course, this employment forum expressed the wish to see all manpower policies transferred to Quebec, but it also analyzed the social cost of unemployment. It estimated that—I know this will give you quite a shock, so I will say it slowly—the economic cost of unemployment for 1993, that is 1993 A.D., not 200 years ago, was about $30 billion.

This means that, because the government is perhaps considering maintaining a duplication of structures, our society has to put up with a shortfall of $30 billion. That is the reality. That is what is unbearable with Bill C–96. Not only will the government not respect the consensus that exists in Quebec, it included in the bill provisions that will allow it to disregard the authority of the Quebec government and give direct funding to organizations like CDECs or direct it through other channels for the delivery of manpower related services, all this without going through the principal stakeholder, the Quebec government.

But this will not last long. Something will happen soon. There will be a grass–roots movement. People will take to the streets when they realize that we cannot support inefficiencies, that there is no reason to tolerate unemployment rates of 11, 12 or 13 per cent, when other western societies are able to give work to everybody.

Since you are telling me that my time is up, Madam Speaker, I will conclude by saying that this bill in unacceptable and that we hope that the government will see the light and respect Quebec's jurisdictions.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to make this speech immediately following the remarks of the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve. I listened very carefully to his remarks and now I would like to rectify a few things. I would like to show all our colleagues in this House, particularly members of the Bloc, that the adoption of Bill C–96 is part of a process that favours change and that supports the concept of partnerships with the provinces.

The leader of the Bloc said himself a while ago that he favoured change but wanted an agreement with the other provinces. I think this bill is very much in line with this idea. There is a partnership between the federal government and the provinces and, of course, there is change.

Any motion aimed at delaying the adoption of this bill seems negative to me and, unfortunately, opposition members sometimes take a negative and very partisan attitude. This is the opinion I have of the members opposite. They are not as objective as some of us are. The bill we are proposing is about greater openness towards the provinces and a better sharing of responsibilities.

As the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the member for Parkdale—High Park, said so eloquently in the House and I quote: "Bill C–96 is not changing any statutory powers". Listen to this, Mr. Speaker. It comes from an authority on the subject. "It is not taking any powers away from Quebec or from any other province. This bill seeks to enable us to work together in order to deliver programs and services more efficiently at less cost to the taxpayers".

And now the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve is saying that the bill is useless unless it gives new legislative powers to the federal government. How can a member of the Bloc who favours decentralization oppose a bill because it does not centralize enough? He just told us that the bill is useless unless it provides for more centralization. The member may be a centralizing separatist, but not me.

We, in the Liberal Party, are in favour of a flexible federalism and, in this bill, we simply want to confirm the fact that there is now a minister who is responsible for several federal departments. This does not take any powers away from the provinces. Quite the contrary, this bill gives no power to the federal government that it did not already have, except that from now on these powers are in the hands of one minister instead of several.

Our government is deeply committed to reducing spending, and this is why we wanted to reduce the number of ministers and consolidate some of the existing powers and federal departments. The powers transferred to the minister of Human Resources Development are not those of provincial ministers but they are part of powers that other federal departments already had and they are being consolidated.

I know that the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve wishes to hear what I have to say and that he will listen carefully to my speech, so that he can be well informed and can vote for Bill C–96. I know that after hearing what I have to say he will be able to change his mind. As I look at the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve at this very moment I have no doubt that he is in the process of changing his mind. He may even be off to reconsider his position on the bill.

So, to put the excellent words of the parliamentary secretary I referred to earlier in a perspective even closer to reality, he declared that the Bloc members began by saying that the referendum had sent a clear message to the federal government. A very clear message indeed. It showed that a majority of Quebecers do not want separation. The parliamentary secretary went on to say that this was the clear message we received and that we had to work with that in mind.

This is what we intend to do and therefore we will respect, as we always have, the will of the people of Canada and, in particular, of Quebec. This is why we continue to offer good government to Canadians—those who live in Quebec and those who live elsewhere, of course.

A few days ago, on November 20, 1995, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, said: "I draw the attention of the official opposition to recent post referendum polls, which state that 61 per cent of Quebecers want to remain in Canada and 78 per cent of Quebecers want to see major changes to the way the Canadian federation works". People want functional changes while remaining in Canada. That is what Quebecers want and we, of course, intend to respect that.

Today, we have before us a bill whose purpose is not to centralize but to consolidate into one department the work being done by different federal departments in order to improve government operations and to cut costs. "It is through bills such as this that hopefully through provincial federal co–operation we can get more people to work", said the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

On November 9, the Minister of Human Resources Development clearly addressed one of the essential impacts of this bill. He said and I quote: "— one of the direct results of the department will be to give far more space for provincial governments to begin to make decisions at their level of responsibility and jurisdiction. The time has come for us to take a much closer look at the respective roles and to build bridges to bring us together". That is what the minister said.

The opposition saw or pretended to see in Bill C–96 a move by the federal government to take over new powers. According to them, it is an intrusion in a provincial jurisdiction. In fact, the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve spoke to it earlier, and I know he is listening carefully.

The reality is quite different. For instance, one must examine the exact wording of clause 6 of the bill, which is in fact a restrictive clause. It sets limits to the powers vested in the minister by the bill. It clearly says that the only issues concerned are those under the jurisdiction of Parliament. Again, the only issues concerned are those under the jurisdiction of this Parliament, period.

This clause applies to everything under the authority of the Department of Human Resources Development. Any existing statutory power will remain exactly the same after this bill is passed. I repeat for the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, the same.

There is definitely no intrusion on areas of provincial jurisdiction: the bill forbids that. It is crystal clear. That being said, I am sure—maybe not sure, but I hope—that the Bloc members will change their mind and vote for the bill. I already see in the eyes of some of them that they are tempted to change their mind and suddenly vote for such a good bill.

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, when I hear the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell telling us that it is crystal clear and explaining things at great length, with a certain sense of humour, I feel that, after all, the problem might lie in the very objective way he is looking at the situation, a liberal and objective way, I might add.

I will use the next few minutes to explain to my "objective" colleague a number of facts which might help him understand our huge reservations—I am quite sure that he is listening very carefully to my remarks and that he will take them into serious consideration.

Instead of being part of the solution, Bill C–96 makes the problem worse.

Indeed, far from heralding the withdrawal of the federal government from manpower training, Bill C–96 reinforces the federal presence in this area. Duplications and inefficiencies resulting from this bill will grant the minister new powers, whether the objective member opposite likes it or not, new powers to negotiate directly with local governments or agencies, bypassing the provinces, which will enable him to set directions, standards and outcomes unilaterally.

The honourable government whip told us that clause 6 did not provide for new powers and that it defined and restricted them. Well then, let us have a look at clause 6. It reads:

> The powers, duties and functions of the minister extend to and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction—

Tell me, Mr. Speaker, is there any matter over which Parliament does not have jurisdiction, and which would not come under the laws of the land? Whatever goes on from sea to sea is regulated by this country's legislation and, consequently, is a matter over which Parliament has jurisdiction one way or another.

Not only are they not restricted, but they are incredibly increased. In fact, the powers, duties and functions of the minister are quite broad. Moreover, contrary to the present legislation, they are not specified, and we know that the federal government has a habit of intruding on matters of provincial jurisdiction. Therefore, there is cause for concern when you see the numerous jurisdictions of Parliament.

Let me quote the description of Human Resources Development Canada which is found in the Budget Plan tabled on February 27, 1995. It says: "Human Resources Development Canada administers unemployment insurance, income security programs for children and the elderly, the current federal programs of support to provinces for post–secondary education and welfare, labour market adjustment and social development programs, and student loans."

What we see today, with Bill C–96, is a strengthening of the federal government's hold on each of these areas and on all of them collectively. I was listening earlier to the member who expressed some deep feelings about this. I remember that the Minister of Human Resources Development has told us repeatedly that we simply did not understand that things would be better. It seems the only ones who are optimistic about Bill C–96 are the government party and the minister.

I would like to refer to a press release issued by the Institut canadien d'éducation des adultes on October 5, 1995. It says that the Board of directors of the ICEA, formed of academic, labour and community representatives, is unanimously opposed to Bill C–96. The organization invites all its partners to mobilize and denounce this bill which undermines the equity principle governing our social security system in Canada and denies the exclusive jurisdiction of provinces over manpower training and development.

It is not a sovereignist institute from Quebec which says that, it is the Institut canadien d'éducation des adultes. It seems that only the minister and the cabinet believe that Bill C–96 is a good thing. No, it is not a good thing. The same press release says: "Bill C–96 is, for the most part, one of the worst scenarios, something that our Institute denounced last fall, during the hearings of the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development." This indicates not only that the minister consulted, but that he was told that this was the worst thing to do. And yet, he went ahead and did it.

I would also like to mention the position of the Quebec government, because I believe that our viewers should know what Quebec thinks of this intrusion.

Mrs. Harel, the Quebec Minister, said: "When you read Bill C–96, you understand why the federal Minister of Human Resources Development did not respond, last spring, to my pressing demand for a federal–provincial conference on this reform. The bill is the opposite of the Quebec consensus on manpower. The opposite of the single window principle. This is proof that the federal government is committed to continuing and even increasing the costly duplication and overlap in the area of manpower in Quebec".

So, when the minister tells us, as he did during Question Period, "I consulted, I went to see my counterparts in the other provinces", we can only say that as far as the Quebec minister is concerned this was not the case. Once again, we have a minister who is intruding on provincial areas of jurisdiction and in particular Quebec jurisdiction, in a dangerous manner.

I would also like to mention the SQDM. Yesterday during Question Period, the Minister of Human Resources Development said that during the summer he met, through officials, with representatives from the SQDM and that agreements had been signed. He implied that everything was fine. Yet, nothing could be further from the truth. On October 4, 1995, the SQDM stated its position on Bill C–96 in a press release and I quote: "The board members of the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre ask the federal government not to set up a parallel structure of partnership and not to take initiatives overlapping Quebec jurisdiction in the area of manpower development".

Bill C–96 has catastrophic consequences. Starting with Mr. Valcourt, a former minister in the previous federal government, and now with the present minister, we are headed toward disaster in the area of manpower management.

In fact, in his recent report, the auditor general mentioned that job creation through the manpower development programs of our Canada Employment Centres was more costly in Quebec than elsewhere. Why? Why is it that the federal government is less efficient in Quebec than elsewhere? Simply because it stubbornly refuses to give Quebec all of the powers in this area.

To conclude, I would like to give specific examples affecting ordinary people. We are not talking about a piece of paper called a bill, but about real people suffering through real unemployment.

A few weeks ago, a woman who wanted to start her own business dropped by my office. There is a program called Self–Employment Assistance which would have allowed her, because she was receiving unemployment benefits, to start a business, to create jobs. Believe it or not, there is just enough money in this program to satisfy a handful of individuals in my own riding, and she was told to look for a job rather than to create one since, if she created one, she would no longer be eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. That is the great way unemployment is being perpetuated in Quebec. We prefer to give money to people to do nothing rather than help them create jobs for themselves and for others.

I will conclude on this note: I look forward to the day where a minister will have the courage to tell his or her civil servants that the federal government will no longer interfere in the manpower area in Quebec and that it is going to give the province all of the powers in this field, which will result in huge savings. We will, at last, be able to create the jobs that everybody needs.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as the saying goes, the proof is in the pudding. Let me tell you that I believe this holds true for what the Chrétien government intends to do with regard to social program reform, especially unemployment insurance.

Contrary to the fine promises which were uttered hand on heart, contrary to the statements of love and respect made in a none too subtle way in Montreal, the federal government is preparing to circumvent the will of Quebecers in a vital sector, that is to say training and labour programs.

Once again this government, which claims to be in favour of a decentralization of powers, is preparing to grab greater powers by means of the administrative restructuring of the Department of Human Resources Development Canada, which is the purpose of Bill–96.

Unfortunately this is not a coincidence, since the same thing happened with other departments. This is the case for example of the Department of Health and the Department of Canadian Heritage. I have already condemned the same underhanded tactics used by the government in those cases.

In the bill before us, that deals with the Department of Human Resources Development, the minister gives himself an enormous power that will extend to all areas relating to manpower.

As we are now able to really identify the government's huge appetite, members of the Bloc Quebecois want to alert public opinion in both Canada and Quebec. Bill C–96 contains a key section, that is, clause 6, which reads as follows:

> The powers, duties and functions of the Minister extend to and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction relating to the development of the human resources of Canada not by law assigned to any other Minister, department, board or agency of the Government of Canada, and are to be exercised with the objective of enhancing employment, encouraging equality and promoting social security.

This clause contains all the potential sources of major conflict between the provinces and especially between Quebec and the federal government. Indeed, it is important at this moment to go back in time and to point out clearly that the federal government, after some unfortunate procedures before the Privy Council and to the great displeasure of the provinces, obtained constitutional jurisdiction over unemployment insurance only. It is because of its strange and omnipotent spending power that it has invaded manpower training and that it now wants to get into the field of equality and social security.

I am not making this up; it is clearly set out in clause 6 of the bill. This further intrusion is very badly orchestrated and has been denounced by many stakeholders, both sovereignist and federalist, such as the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Institute of Adult Education and the Quebec Minister of Employment.

I would also remind the House that, historically and constantly, all Quebec spokepersons on this issue have denounced federal interference in manpower training. What will provincial organizations and governments think of this new federal intrusion on an exclusively provincial jurisdiction? I am sure that reactions are currently negative, will be negative and will soon be made known. They will follow Quebec's claims. Will they have the good fortune of influencing the direction that the current government has set for itself? I have my doubts about that. This is a very unfortunate situation because this new constitutional snag goes against the interests of the population.

In a document called "Un Québec pour l'emploi", which he published this year, Pierre Paquette analyzes the requirements for a full employment policy in modern Quebec. Mr. Paquette, who has been secretary general of the CNTU for five years, has also sat on the board of directors of the Economic Council of Canada and on committees to kick–start the economy and stimulate employment in the southwest and east ends of Montreal. He identifies three major elements of a comprehensive employment strategy.

The first element is all the actions that have a bearing on economic growth factors, including both individual corporate policies and social economic policies affecting all of society as well as the international community. The second element is the link between sectoral and regional development policies as part of an industrial policy. The third and last element stresses the importance of implementing a whole series of active manpower initiatives including professional training, placement, specific measures for disadvantaged groups and regions, and reducing the number of hours of work in all its forms.

You may have noted that all these areas come under exclusive provincial jurisdiction. Mr. Paquette goes on to say, "Effective implementation of a comprehensive full employment strategy requires a strong social consensus. In this regard, it is hard to imagine how the various social stakeholders across Canada could agree on the implementation of a full employment policy".

This conclusion is clear and explicit. As we have said a thousand times in this House, there is a consensus in Quebec that this government persists in ignoring with impunity.

The people of Quebec reject Bill C–96. They reject this counterproductive approach, which, far from giving them concerted access to the work place, keeps them a little further away.

In closing, I would like to make a suggestion to the government, which, until the next referendum on Quebec's future, will at least allow the people to benefit from their contributions to both levels of government.

I would suggest that the federal government should withdraw completely from all employment, manpower, social assistance and training matters. At the same time, I would suggest that the federal government should transfer to the government closest to the people, the provincial government, the money needed to put in place a real full employment policy, as the Quebec government wishes. This will demonstrate concretely the government's commitment to the equality and social security it refers to in clause 6 of its bill. I thank you and I hope that this government has heard my message.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the federal government promised Quebecers that many things would change if they voted no in the October 30, 1995, referendum.

A mere three weeks after the referendum, Quebecers are already getting a taste of changes to come as the Minister of Human Resources Development presents Bill C–96 to merge four departments into a single one. But at the same time, as could be expected, he gives himself broader powers, continues to invade provincial jurisdictions and goes against the quasi unanimous consensus in Quebec on this issue.

Back in 1991, the Bourassa government wanted Quebec to be responsible for all expenditures relating to manpower development, including training. At the time, Mr. Bourbeau, the minister responsible, had written his federal counterpart a very clear letter on this subject.

Time and time again, the Quebec national assembly requested almost unanimously that Ottawa withdraw from this provincial area of jurisdiction. After this bill was introduced, several major stakeholders in Quebec made representations against the HRD minister's centralizing designs. For example, the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre takes issue with the government repeatedly trying to interfere in provincial areas of jurisdiction.

According to the SQDM, clauses 6 and 20 of Bill C–96 would empower the Minister of Human Resources Development to enter into agreements with a province, a group of provinces, agencies of provinces, financial institutions and such other persons or bodies as the minister considers appropriate, to improve the labour market and promote equality and social security.

In so doing, the minister blatantly violates provincial jurisdiction and goes directly against Prime Minister Chrétien's promises of decentralization during the referendum campaign. These promises were short lived. When questioned on this by the Bloc Quebecois, the minister said, with rare degree of arrogance, that the opposition had obviously not even bothered to read the bill.

Not only must this bill be read line by line, it must also be read between the lines. One must do more than read the bill, and when that happens, one realizes that it is totally different from what it appears to be, because it allows the federal government to interfere in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

In response to another question from the Leader of the Opposition, the minister answered that he felt that the hon. member had strayed substantially from the line of logic and reason. That attitude shows clearly that the minister does not understand the issue and that he insults every Quebec stakeholder opposed to the new bill.

Even the Conseil du patronat, and this is quite something because this staunch supporter of federalism rarely agrees with the Bloc's philosophy, is asking the minister to amend, if not withdraw, Bill C–96.

With the rapid development of new technologies and the globalization of markets, Quebec industry must quickly adapt to meet the new challenges of the world economy. Manpower training plays a vital role in ensuring that our workers are familiar with state–of–the–art technology and can meet the needs of the Quebec labour market.

Currently, there are close to 70,000 jobs which are available in Quebec but remain unfilled because adequate occupational training has not been provided. The Quebec government recently introduced legislation to encourage companies to offer more in–house training.

However, a lot remains to be done and, without total control in the sector, the provincial government cannot properly meet the expectations of the Quebec labour market. The federal and provincial governments are always competing to show workers which of the two levels of government can best meet their expectations and aspirations.

When this happens, it costs millions of dollars in unnecessary duplication. Such duplication costs several hundreds of millions in the manpower training sector, and that is a real shame. For example, in the Eastern Townships, for every dollar spent on manpower training, 42 cents go to administrative costs. Over 40 per cent, more specifically 42 per cent, of the amount which should be used for manpower development is used instead to pay for course organization, promotional efforts and course delivery. Forty per cent of every dollar spent. This is an incredible waste of energy and money.

Unfortunately, Quebec workers are the ones affected by the stubbornness of the federal government and of its Minister of Human Resources Development. Moreover, since the 1990 UI reform, the federal government has been making extensive use of the UI fund for training purposes.

In 1994–95, $531 million was spent for this purpose. The federal department now offers 27 initiatives or programs, most of which create duplication with the 22 programs offered by the SQDM and others offered by various departments.

In 1994, the federal government announced the creation of Youth Service, at a cost of $175 million. This program is entirely comparable to the Volunteer Youth Action Program, which is efficiently run by the SQDM. In spite of repeated demands by the Quebec government, the federal government keeps refusing to transfer funds into the provincial program, thus wasting money because of duplication.

Another equally pathetic example is the federal program that matches another similar Quebec program called Jeunes stagiaires. The 50 Canadian sectorial skills council, set up in 1992, are another case of duplication, considering the 15 Quebec manpower sector committees which have been in place for more that five years. The federal government will spend more that $250 million to set up its own councils. Finally, because of the rigid standards for POWA, the federal government has failed to compensate many garment sector workers.

In view of the difficulties some workers were experiencing, the Quebec government, through the SQDM, had to step in to make up for the federal government's shortcomings. Here again, we have duplication. What a waste of money and time. The cost of all this duplication is estimated at $250 million a year. That is poor management and poor efficiency.

In conclusion, I would say that federal intrusion in the area of human resources development since 1942 is one more example of the government's abuse of the spending power and of its disregard for the exclusive jurisdictions of the Quebec government. Constitutionally, the provinces have exclusive jurisdiction over manpower training, but, to this day, the stubbornness of the federal government still undermines the development of the Quebec economy.

Vocational training is the cornerstone of competitiveness and availability of highly skilled workers, two assets that are essential if we are to develop a high technology economy, attract many investors and produce value added goods.

The minister and his government should stop all this nonsense and give back to Quebecers all the tools they need to develop manpower training. Bill C–96 should therefore be withdrawn, and the Prime Minister should start to deliver on his decentralization promises in areas where a strong consensus exists in Quebec.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, not long ago, I read the speech the Minister of Human Resources Development made during second reading of Bill C–96. This bill, entitled an Act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related Acts, certainly stems from a noble intent.

In reading this speech, I felt a significant change had been made to the usually model and edifying Liberal speech dished out to us to get us to swallow the pill. The minister said, and I quote: "a new, innovative way of doing government, to get people to begin to think differently about how government can relate to individuals, to provide a much more effective way of enabling people to respond and make choices themselves and not have choices made for them, to share, to create partnerships, to get away from the top down command system and to turn that into a Canadian Tire philosophy based in the local communities with tools and instruments customized and tailored to the needs of those communities".

One could think that the minister is talking about real decentralization and is about to comply once and for all with the repeated and urgent requests of the province of Quebec for control over the policies and programs concerning manpower and training.

However, the minister warned us right from the start. "It is, he said, decentralization of a very different kind".

The minister then said: "There has been a lot of talk about decentralization. So far it has been a somewhat restricted debate as it talks only about decentralization in terms of transferring from the federal government to provincial governments." And this is very significant. The message here is clear. The kind of decentralization the minister is bragging about has nothing to do with Quebec's expectations and ignores the consensus that was reached in Quebec over manpower training.

Let us look at this a little bit closer. Even though the prime minister told us, in answer to our questions, that the official opposition had obviously not bothered to read Bill C–96, we have to conclude that several individuals, institutions and organizations in Quebec are really ignorant, according to the prime minister. Unfortunately for him, the people of Quebec also know how to read between the lines.

It is appalling but not really surprising to see that Bill C–96 goes totally against the large consensus reached in Quebec over manpower issues. For several years now, all those involved in Quebec's labour force have agreed to demand the repatriation to Quebec of all manpower training programs and of the related budgets.

Far from abiding by this unanimous consent, the federal government has announced its intent to continue with and even increase all of the costly duplication and overlap. Once again, the Liberal government ignores its own basic rule. Yet, the Canadian Constitution of 1867 recognizes clearly and explicitly the areas of provincial jurisdiction. But for years now the federal government has been using its spending power and its authority to impose national standards and to infringe upon the jurisdictions of the provinces. All that Bill C–96 does is legalize a de facto situation.

Whatever the Prime Minister says, we did read this bill, and it was easy for us to grasp its real intent. For example, clauses 6, 20 and 21 are unequivocal.

Clause 6 aims at extending federal jurisdiction by expanding the powers, duties and functions of the Minister. Clause 20 provides that the Minister may negotiate and enter into agreements with, and I quote: "such other persons or bodies as the Minister considers appropriate".

In the same vein, clause 21 reiterates that the minister may authorize any other person or body to exercise any power or perform any duty or function of the minister.

All that to make sure we understand that the minister has no obligation to consult or agree with the provinces in precise areas of provincial jurisdiction.

Indeed, from now on, according to Bill C–96, the department of Human Resources Development will be authorized to by–pass the provinces and impose manpower standards and policies. It will be able to develop a parallel federal structure to intervene on the Quebec labour market.

The federal government is empowering itself to by–pass the provinces and to intervene directly with bodies, municipal governments and individuals. While the Constitution gives provinces power over manpower development and vocational training, the federal gouvernment has chosen to ignore it.

So history repeats itself. It will be remembered that, in 1991, the previous Conservative government tried to encroach upon provincial jurisdiction and directly interfere in matters regarding vocational training and manpower. Once again, Quebec unanimously denounced these centralizing and unconstitutional moves by the federal government.

The Quebec Liberal Party and the Conseil du patronat du Québec added their voices to this denunciation. The same centralizing designs, which are spelled out in Bill C–96, are now giving rise to the same denunciations everywhere in Quebec. The initiative is, however, more subtle this time, because it comes a few days after the referendum.

While the Liberals spoke of nothing but change during the referendum campaign, they are now, with Bill C–96, attempting further intrusion in the area of training.

Canadian provinces have different labour markets. A centralized and uniform approach would hardly help anyone. The result would be more red tape, as my colleague for Joliette clearly demonstrated earlier.

Let us not forget that Quebec already has established manpower networks. The Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre is a special form of partnership involving all Quebec stakeholders in manpower matters, whether they are employers, unions, co–operatives, educators or community groups. Quebecers know better than anyone else what is good for them. Quebecers must decide what their manpower policies should be and set their own priorities.

This is not a symbolic demand or the confirmation of a historic right. It is only a matter of good old common sense for those who take to heart the promotion and the support of manpower development. If there really is a will to change and to decentralize in Canada, as we were told during the referendum campaign, this is the time for the winds to blow.

If Bill C–96 is a proof of the flexibility the Liberal government boasts about, if it is indicative of the rejection of, and I quote the minister of Human Resources Development, "the old top down centralized hierarchies of governmental organization, which have been really a product of the old industrial age", then, it is a total failure.

Bill C–96 sends a clear message to the Quebec Liberal Party, to the Conseil du patronat and to all other partners in the field of employment in Quebec, and it is that the federal government will never accept that Quebec assume sole responsibility for manpower training within its territory. Ottawa will never accept either that Quebec repatriate the funds that the federal government allocates to manpower training programs. Quebecers will clearly see that it is impossible to develop a Quebec manpower policy suited to its realities and administered by Quebec if they stay in Canada. That will only be possible in a sovereign Quebec.

Therefore, I urge all members of Parliament who really care for the improvement of relations between the two founding peoples of this country to support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Mercier and to vote against Bill C–96.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in fact, the bill has nothing to do with jurisdictions. It has everything to do with people. It is aimed at helping Canadians and, of course, Quebecers in remote areas to find jobs.

The bill is designed to allow young people, older workers, single mothers and low income individuals to acquire the skills they need in our ever–changing economy. It is also aimed at bringing communities, businesses and all levels of government together to look at the human aspect of regional economic development.

This means that other forms of agreements and partnerships between the federal government and the provinces are possible. Quebec talked a lot about partnership during the referendum campaign and we are willing to go in this direction. As a matter of fact, partnerships with local and regional economic development authorities in the area of social and labour programs are highly desirable. That is certainly the way to go.

If we really want to pursue this discussion in a positive manner, it is important that we adopt this bill now and start working towards establishing new and improved partnerships with one another.

While some members are worrying about the federal government taking powers away from the provinces, the Department of Human Resources Development is doing its job with Quebecers and, of course, with the Quebec government. Using jurisdictional considerations as an excuse, members of the Bloc want us to do nothing. Let us say this: in the name of the progress and of the changes that are obviously wanted in Quebec, let us find better ways of doing our job.

Canadians, as well as Quebecers, are well aware that the federal government has a legitimate role to play in development and manpower. So let us get things straight.

We had a case, the other day, that showed the urgent need for federal involvement, through its agencies, its community development organizations, which play an active role in every regional county municipality and through the Federal Office of Regional Development, which is always there to give a welcome and desirable helping hand to stimulate small businesses in Quebec. There are other examples, such as the Federal Business Development Bank. When there is a need for a partner to set up a small business in Quebec, especially in remote areas, this additional financial help from the federal government is always welcome.

I would like to talk about a particular case that occurred in my riding a few weeks ago. Throughout the referendum campaign in the riding of Bonaventure, the minister of agriculture, who happens to be my provincial MNA in Quebec City, asked for the participation of the federal government in order to stimulate, or create, if you will, a dairy industry in the Gaspé Peninsula. Following pressure from this minister, it was agreed that the federal government would invest in the establishment of a cheese–making operation in the region. Now, the day after the referendum, that very same minister who had challenged us to invest reneged. He decided, on the basis of provincial programs and on the advice of his provincial bureaucrats, that the agreement was no longer valid. I find this most unfortunate, but fortunately the federal government remains present even if the Government of Quebec went back on its commitment to develop an important industry in Quebec, and especially in my region, which is said to be a depressed area.

The federal government is also committed to helping people who are victims of particular circumstances that do not apply only to one province. This is the case of senior workers whose jobs are being jeopardized by the restructuring of the economy. It is also the case of some workers in fisheries. We have all heard about TAGS. In Quebec $100 million was spent to support those who were hard hit by the moratorium. There are still considerable investments being made to find new markets for underdeveloped species. As we know, however, fortunately it is the federal government that manages fisheries in the Gulf and elsewhere, but once the catch gets to the docks it is the responsibility of the province from then on. It is then up to Quebec to issue fish processing plant operating permits. Unfortunately Quebec is still refusing to invest the amounts necessary to give our local entrepreneurs a chance to diversify production, particularly of underdeveloped species such as mackerel and herring.

There are lots of similar examples in Quebec, unfortunately demonstrating Quebec's intransigence and the fact that it is not necessarily attuned to the true needs of the population. When I heard the opposition saying "All we want is decentralization, all we want is for Quebec to make a final decision", were they referring only to the SQDM? Mention has never been made of the fact that there are people who are what the Bloc would probably call "Quebecers of the majority", old–stock Quebecers, working for the federal public service, who come from the Magdalen Islands, Bonaventure of course, or elsewhere in Quebec, and that these people are seeking, not only as federal employees, but as concerned individuals, to provide the public with proper services.

And in all the speeches I have heard this morning, not a single member of the Bloc, not a single member of the opposition, came forward with a good idea. The only thing that was said is that everything happening in Quebec at this time is the federal government's fault. What I find regrettable, however, is that no one is listening to the voice of the people. There is already talk of a third referendum in Quebec. Mr. Speaker, let me state here to you, here before my constituents, before eastern Quebec, before all Quebecers, that the winning side this past October 30 was the no side.

I believe that what will be expected of the outgoing Leader of the Opposition, when he is premier of Quebec as he surely will be—and let me, in passing, wish him luck—is a commitment. He must make a commitment. In fact, he did, and people in the PQ government have announced they are prepared to work together with the Canadian government. I think Quebecers are fed up with constitutional discussions that fail to provide any answers. We want to put Quebecers back to work, and this will happen within the Canadian federation.

Throughout the referendum campaign, we made it clear that if Quebec left Canada it would lose several billion dollars worth of federal investment. Losses would be considerable and would be felt by everyone, but especially by the most vulnerable people in the province of Quebec. I think we have reached a point in our history where we should look at what we have in common, instead of being divided and dwelling on the past like the Leader of the Opposition did throughout the last referendum campaign.

I challenge the future Premier of Quebec and members of the opposition to lay down their arms and say: "We are willing to work with everyone. We are willing to work with the federal government, the municipalities and, of course, the other provinces". I think it is really too bad that the Quebec government, which claims to be anxious to promote regional economic development, tends to boycott agreements and federal–provincial meetings and conferences.

I think that is too bad, and it is unfortunate that in several sectors, including fisheries and agri–food and agriculture, we see this refusal to meet Minister Tobin and officials and ministers from the other Canadian provinces. I think the Quebec government and especially members opposite will have to consider that people want development, but not if it means Quebec has to separate, not if it means breaking up and destroying the country.

I think that people, especially in Quebec, want to build a fair and credible society, and this will happen within the Canadian federation. In concluding, I would urge opposition members to suggest alternatives, to work with us, but even more important, to work with and for their constituents. I am convinced and confident that their constituents feel it is up to them to work with us to strengthen the economy of Quebec and Canada.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, before he leaves, I would like to congratulate the member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine for having successfully enlivened the debate this morning to some extent on that side of the House, because, up to now, things were pretty quiet.

Mr. Gagnon: True. True.

Mr. Dubé: He encouraged us to pay attention to and analyze the outcome of the referendum. I would like to return to his recommendation, and look at the outcome of the referendum in his riding. In his own riding—Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine—as he knows, it was not the no vote that won, but the yes. So, if he truly spoke for the people of his riding, he would be saying something different. It appears he did not listen carefully. Too bad for him.

I, however, remember. I have listened carefully to most of the speeches by the member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine. I remember him from when I was a brand new member. There was a debate on the famous ferry that would run between the Magdalen Islands and Prince Edward Island. The solutions proposed by the Government of Quebec were not particularly to his liking. He said: "I will listen to what my people have to say, and, you watch, we will come up with a solution".

The solution the federal government came up with was to buy a secondhand boat from somewhere else, rather than have a new boat built. Since then, the president of the Société de transport des Îles–de–la–Madeleine has been running around after secondhand boats, with $30 million of federal money. Recently, someone said on his behalf, a representative of the Société said: "Unfortunately, the federal government took so long in the matter, I missed an opportunity. The boat was sold elsewhere. There are no more secondhand boats for sale".

Meanwhile, I know, because we are talking about real problems, we are not talking Constitution, we are talking jobs, I am the member for Lévis, where the Chantier maritime de Lévis is located, and where workers at MIL Davie remember what the member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine said: "A second hand boat rather than a new one". Hundreds of unemployed workers remember that.

I listen to them and I say to the member, because sometimes we have to raise our voices so the member opposite understands: Not only did you not listen to the people of Lévis, you did not even listen to the people of the Magdalen Islands.

Before you warn me about the relevance of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I will return to Bill C–96.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I simply want to put you at ease. It has nothing to do with relevance. You should, however, always address your comments to the chair, and not directly to each other.

Mr. Dubé: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. You understand that we cannot always resist temptation. I have every intention of following your rules, which I graciously accept because of my great respect for your position.

The hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, for example, wonders what the official opposition is worried about, arguing that this bill will not broaden the human resources development minister's jurisdiction.

Not only is the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine not listening, but he has apparently not read the bill. What does the bill do? It expands the Department of Human Resources Development. It must be realized that, if we take away the money allocated to debt servicing, it almost exceeds 50 per cent of the federal budget. That is quite something.

It includes the old employment department, the labour department. It is responsible for old age pensions. On this subject, I simply wish to remind the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine about the debate surrounding the replacement of many employment centres with computer terminals.

As one who listens to citizens and to seniors in particular—and I know that all members on this side of the House have heard them—, I can tell you that they are concerned. They are not used to typing on computer terminals to get information. They are very concerned about this. The government is saying that they are moving their services closer to the people, but installing a computer terminal in a municipal location is not the way to go.

My main concern—and that is clear from the debate today—is that Bill C–96 will enable the federal government to deal directly with agencies and individuals in matters coming under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces like postsecondary education, security and manpower training. It is certainly not a case of jurisdictions being unclear.

The hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine suggested that we look ahead not back. I would actually encourage him to go back to the Canadian Constitution and read it over. The Constitution states that these areas are indeed areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

The hon. member closed by saying: "Let the members of the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois, the people of Quebec and the Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre come and help us, the federal government, to do what we have set out to do, so that it can be better done, in partnership".

He got it all wrong. It should be just the opposite. The federal government should be the one trying to help provincial governments in exercising their exclusive jurisdictions. That is what decentralization should be about. It should not be about the federal government decentralizing its action by going over the heads of the provinces to deal with agencies, businesses and individuals. This is not decentralizing. It is by–passing, going over the heads of the provinces. That is not the same thing, and it certainly does not qualify as decentralization.

On the contrary, that is centralizing. You keep the money, spend it according to certain rules or national standards and go over the heads of the provinces to deal directly with businesses and individuals in areas of provincial jurisdiction.

The past often gives us an indication of what the future holds. I will not go very far back in time. I will focus on the past couple of years. As the opposition's critic for training and youth, I would like to remind the House of a bill I mentioned a number of times already to give you an idea of what the minister has in mind when he talks about decentralizing. I am referring to the infamous Bill C–28 that the House passed on June 23, 1994. What is so special about this bill that the Minister of Human Resources Development is responsible for? Subclause 3(1) states that, from now on, the HRD minister will designate himself appropriate educational authorities for the provinces, which flies in the face of the Constitution. I say it again because people have to understand. Over time, people may forget the connection between certain legislative measures passed by the government. Bill C–28 is an example of a case where the federal government ignored the provinces.

Subclause 14(7) states that Quebec can opt out, with financial compensation, like before, provided that its program meets every requirement and that each of its components is similar to that of the federal program.

The Quebec government is free to do what it wants and, yes, will even get money. However, that money, which, incidentally, comes from Quebecers who pay 24 per cent of their taxes to Ottawa, will be paid only if certain conditions are met. In other words, Quebec is free to do what it wants, but if it does not do this or that, the federal government will cut funding. What a nice way to view decentralization, in a field of provincial jurisdiction. Such is the spirit that guides this government.

I followed every initiative of the minister regarding his employment development strategy for young people. One must admit that, in two years, it has not met with much success. The figures for the last two months show that the unemployment rate for the under–25 group is exactly the same as it was two years ago, when the minister took office. This is quite the strategy.

My limited studies in political science taught me that a political or administrative strategy was good to the extent that it produced results. Otherwise, the strategy was not good and had to be changed. I invite the Minister of Human Resources Development to change his strategy for helping young people find jobs. At the moment, he is in the process of trying to duplicate Quebec provincial programs at the federal level. For example his Youth Service Canada is identical in every respect to the Quebec program Jeunes Volontaires. He has tried something involving work placements as well, but these are things that have already been done by the Government of Quebec and the Société québécoise de la main–d'oeuvre.

During the referendum campaign, Quebecers heard and saw all this, with training and employability enhancement programs that change daily, but the last time I looked there were 102 federal and provincial programs. The total has even gone as high as 108, but a few were combined after that. It is still a huge number, and people cannot find their way around all these programs.

A number of stakeholders in the Société québécoise de la main–d'oeuvre, including Mr. Béland, the president of the Confédération des caisses populaires et d'économie Desjardins du Québec, the FTQ, labour federations, and the Conseil du Patronat as well, have been unanimous in demanding that the federal government pull out of this area. Despite their repeated demands, however—and this is where there is a danger when it comes to public opinion—there is a certain fatigue setting in and the strategy of the government across the way, apart from answering questions asked during question period, is to pretend that everything is rosy. No reaction. Total silence. No problem. With time, people are saying, "Maybe the Bloc MPs will get fed up. Anyway, it is a temporary party only". They are aware that we are in existence for a limited time, but the time is a bit longer than planned, and we continue to keep our shoulders to the wheel, to be vigilant, tenacious, persevering, keeping on our toes, and it is our intention to remain that way. We will continue until the Quebec consensus concerning manpower is satisfied with the federal government's actions.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to join my fellow Bloc members in speaking to Bill C–96, an act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development and to amend and repeal certain related acts.

As my colleagues explained earlier, this is an important bill. Last week when we were debating the amendment of the hon. member for Mercier, government members said that the bill simply grouped certain components without introducing any new elements. They told us not to worry. They said that the federal government would keep up the good work in the provinces and municipalities for the benefit of Canadians, and that basically, there was very little to get upset about. They assumed that the referendum was partly to blame that it was nothing very serious.

I would like to point out that the opposition of the Bloc Quebecois to this bill is fundamental. This bill goes to the very heart of a certain definition, a particular vision of Canadian federalism. First of all, the Department of Human Resources Development. As the hon. member for Lévis said earlier, this is a very important department. It is responsible for unemployment insurance, old age security, education and transfers to the provinces for social assistance, and it has a budget that is probably second only to the budget for servicing Canada's debt.

This department is a giant that is able to intervene in areas which it assumes are under its jurisdiction. It can intervene effectively because it has the resources. Over the years, the department has developed a mandate for intervention. Consider unemployment insurance, which required an amendment to the Canadian Constitution. Consider old age security, family allowances and federal assistance to the provinces for post–secondary education. Gradually, over the past 15, 20, 30 or 50 years, this department, or should I say its predecessor departments which it has now absorbed, have spearheaded a Canadian vision of social policy.

If we recall what happened when Canada was founded in 1867, simply put, there was a division of powers, as is normal under a federal system. The federal government had its powers and the provinces had theirs, and anyone who bothers to read the Constitution will see that areas with a more immediate impact on people, such as health, education, and social assistance, were a provincial responsibility, while foreign affairs, the economy, the armed forces and other areas of a more financial or economic nature were the responsibility of the federal government.

As I just said, over the years we have seen the federal government increasingly invade the jurisdictions of the provinces. So much so that today, we are considering a bill that will provide a rationale for the federal government's presence in provincial jurisdictions. I realize some people will say this may be normal, that federalism has evolved and change is necessary, that certain problems must be dealt with and that this should be done by the level of government best equipped to do so.

This is a bit what the bill says. The Minister of Human Resources Development may, at his pleasure, intervene, according to clause 6, in: "—all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction relating to the development of the human resources of Canada". Admittedly, this is very broad. The department may enter into agreements involving employment, encourage equality and promote social security. In the present context, members will agree that this is very broad indeed.

We in the Bloc feel that the department is using this bill to acquire legislative jurisdiction to define policy in areas of provincial jurisdiction. What is the effect of the federal government's approach? It could be dramatic, given that Quebec, Ontario and the other provinces also operate in these areas.

The Government of Quebec is involved in health, education, social and employment matters in these jurisdictions. It has defined its programs. It has set up departments. It has activities planned in these areas. We note, in the bill before us, that the federal government is giving itself the right to intervene in these areas.

Perhaps it wants to intervene with the best of intentions, but, in practical terms, two levels of government are operating in the same areas with programs that often compete with or overlap each other. My colleague mentioned there are currently more than 100 programs, either federal or provincial, aimed at meeting objectives in the social, educational or employment fields.

So we end up with two levels of government that, in a way, knock each other out of commission, not out of ill will, but because of the very nature of the political structure defining the programs and objectives. What we see in Quebec, what I have noticed in my riding, is that there were provincial policies, co–ordinated primarily by the SQDM, the Société québécoise de dévéloppement de la main–d'oeuvre, and there were federal policies from the employment centres and the Department of Human Resources Development.

When we think about the section 25 program from unemployment insurance, the job readiness programs and the special programs of certain agencies to help specific clientele, we realize that everyone's intentions are good. However, we also realize there is often inefficiency, which the Minister of Human Resources Development himself admits. Yesterday, during question period, he in fact said that he wanted to make changes in Canada and in his policies, because he could see over the past two years that the policies were ineffective.

So we end up with two levels of government that, in a way, pursue ineffective policies, precisely because these policies overlap and cancel each other out. The Bloc Quebecois's argument against this bill is that there should be a single level of government dealing with these issues.

If we look at the Canadian Constitution, we see that these programs should come under provincial jurisdiction. So we in Quebec asked the federal government to withdraw from these programs and transfer responsibility to the Quebec government. The other provinces do not, of course, want these powers, but we in Quebec want to be in charge of these programs because of our history, because the Quebec government is the government of a people, a nation distinct from Canadian society.

This has been a Quebec demand for 30 years, going back to Mr. Lesage, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Bourassa, Mr. Lévesque. This is a constant demand. We have always come up against a brick wall. If the federal government had acted in good faith, Canada might have achieved some form of asymmetrical federalism allowing Quebec to put forward its policies and to feel respected, while the other provinces could have enjoyed greater centralization and carried out programs benefiting their labour force, something that we do not have in Canada at the present time.

This is the brick wall we have come up against in recent years, whether at the Quebec government or the federal government level. This situation has come about because the federal government has refused for 30 years to accommodate the specific demands made by all Quebec governments for 50 years, going back to Maurice Duplessis.

I call on all members to reject this bill at second reading so that the jurisdiction of each level of government in the Canadian federation can be respected.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Milliken: What a pleasure.

Mr. Nunez: If the hon. member opposite will give me a chance, I would like to take part in this debate today on Bill C–96 to legally establish the Department of Human Resources Development.

As I said in my remarks on November 20, this bill accentuates the federal presence by giving the minister new powers, including the power to bypass provincial authorities and negotiate directly with local authorities and agencies. I denounce, once again, the federal government's centralizing designs. As you know, there is a strong consensus in Quebec on the need to have control over manpower training programs. This is an area where there is a great deal of duplication and overlap, which is proving to be extremely costly and inefficient.

Just to show how inefficient the federal government is, and this department in particular, the report tabled by the Auditor General of Canada two days ago, on November 21, is very critical of the manpower training programs, describing these programs as ill–suited to industry's needs. An estimated 300,000 positions remained vacant every year between 1988 and 1990 because suitable incumbents could not be found, but the training programs offered by the department related to only 5 per cent of these vacant positions. To be facing that kind of a problem when unemployment is on the rise is incredible. The federal government's inefficiency and squandering in this regard has to be denounced. The Department of Human Resources Development spends $2 billion a year on manpower training.

The auditor finds that there is no systematic or global measure to deal with the situation.

I also want to point out that clause 6 of Bill C–96 authorizes the minister to bypass provinces and establish direct links with financial institutions, local organizations and such other persons or bodies as he considers appropriate, "with the objective of enhancing employment, encouraging equality and promoting social security". Moreover, the minister may authorize "any other person or body" to exercise his powers. That provision opens the door to the contracting–out and privatization of employment services, something which is already illustrated by the streamlining of the federal network of employment centres.

The bill also provides that the Canada Employment and Insurance Commission may "authorize any person or body—to exercise powers or perform duties and functions of the Commission". Under subsection 31(3) of the former act, the commission could delegate its powers only to members of its staff or, subject to the minister's approval, to members of the department. Thus, the commission will enjoy a power to delegate similar to that of the minister. This is the same minister who is about to announce additional cuts of $1.25 billion in the UI program. That is a lot of money.

In spite of the fact that the public service, the crown corporations and the private sector are all experiencing cuts, closures and massive layoffs, Bill C–96 is silent on job creation.

Let me give a few examples of such cuts. First, by 1997, Bell Canada will have closed nine regional offices in Quebec alone. It also intends to close three auditing offices.

This company, which employs 46,000 people, hopes to lay off 10,000 of them over the next three years. A large number of these people are members of the Communications, Energy and Paperworkers Union of Canada. This is a 22 per cent reduction of the company's staff. Bell has 28,606 employees in Ontario and 17,300 in Quebec. It intends to reduce its staff through voluntary termination of employment, early retirement and outright layoffs. It should be noted that Bell cannot justify such major cuts, given the huge profits generated last year. Moreover, during the first six months of 1995, the company paid $35 million in dividends, which is as much as it did for the same period last year.

Recently, a group of Bloc Quebecois members, including myself, met with officials from the company and the union, here in Ottawa. We heard both sides. Following these meetings, I personally feel that these massive layoffs are totally unjustified, particularly since Bell is among the telephone companies employing the smallest number of people per line in North America. Bell has always made substantial profits. I salute the courage and the determination of the employees of the company and also of their union, which seeks to protect the rights and benefits of its members against a management strategy designed to produce massive layoffs.

I would also like to salute the 2,000 delegates who are attending the Ontario Federation of Labour convention, which has been going on in Toronto since Monday night. Yesterday, they marched down Bay Street, where Canadian banks and large corporations have their headquarters, to protest against Mike Harris' right wing policies, especially against the first piece of legislation his government enacted, which repealed the anti–scab act and makes the creation and certification of trade unions more difficult.

I would like to quote a statement made by an American, the Reverend Jesse Jackson, who told the convention delegates: "Do not allow the right to destroy all the accomplishments of many past generations". I could not agree more.

The Harris government has decided to dismantle the Ontario Labour Code. Moreover, it wants to reduce the size of the labour ministry by 46 per cent, which will mean fewer occupational health and safety inspectors, fewer air quality technicians, fewer officials to enforce minimum work standards, etc.

I an concerned about all these cuts and these attacks against workers in Ontario, the richest province in Canada.

The federal government, and the provincial governments of Ontario and Alberta, which are going after the poorest members of society in an attempt to put their financial house in order, are on the wrong track. They will only increase poverty. I believe that the way to go, instead, is job creation initiatives, tax fairness, a better redistribution of wealth, and increased social security.

Both at the provincial and federal levels, anti–scab legislation is not only essential, but urgently needed. I was very disappointed by the vote taken the day before yesterday by the members of this House who rejected by 144 against and 104 for the bill presented by my Bloc colleague, the member for Manicouagan. However, I salute the courage of a great number of Liberal members who supported the bill and who were in agreement with it, under the previous Conservative government. On the other hand, I denounce all the ministers, especially the labour minister, who voted against it.

Following the example of Quebec and British Columbia, such an act at the federal level would avoid the worsening of labour conflicts, as was the case at the Ogilvie flour mill, in Montreal, where the strike lasted for 15 months.

Finally, I will say that I support the FTQ's request for the strengthening of the present succession rights of workers, should a Crown corporation be privatized or a private company under federal jurisdiction be disposed of. This problem has arisen mostly with the sale of Canadian airports.

To conclude, I stress that I will vote against Bill C–96.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues, I welcome the opportunity to speak about the Act to establish the Department of Human Resources Development.

Bill C–96 establishing the Department of Human Resources Development flows from the June 1993 reform and is another demonstration of this government's desire to centralize. The Liberal Party of Canada, faithful to the objectives established by its guru of the last decades, Pierre–Elliott Trudeau, took office at the House of Commons in October 1993 with the clear intention of giving government in Canada a more centralized structure. Right from the beginning, there was a major offensive action against the autonomy Quebec was aiming at. During the two years of the present administration, we have seen countless examples of this thrust towards centralization.

Bill C–96 is but another step in the invasion, by the central government, of Quebec's jurisdictions in the area of social and economic development. Clauses 6 and 20 of that bill reveal the federal government will to limit the freedom of action of the Quebec National Assembly.

Clause 6 defines the powers, duties and functions of the minister, which now extend, and I quote: "to include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction relating to the development of human resources of Canada—with the objective of enhancing employment." The clause is unequivocal; it allows for the creation of a vast federal Human Resources Development department where the minister will have considerable powers and will be free to act without the approval of the provinces. In fact, this bill contains no provision on provincial jurisdiction, let alone on honouring this jurisdiction; on the contrary, it denies Quebec's exclusive jurisdiction over manpower training and development.

Clause 20 lists the organizations with which the minister may enter into agreements. It reads as follows: "For the purpose of facilitating the formulation, co–ordination and implementation of any program or policy [—]the minister may enter into agreements with a province or group of provinces, agencies of provinces, financial institutions and such other persons or bodies as the minister considers appropriate". So the minister may put anyone he wants in charge of managing his department's policies and programs without having to justify himself in the House or worrying about the Quebec government's directives.

In other words, he would have full discretion to contract out. The minister would have the power to enter into agreements with regional and local organizations, including municipalities, thus bypassing the provinces. This bill will allow the federal government to disregard Quebec's exclusive jurisdiction over the design of manpower training and development programs.

Quebec has always denounced the federal government's intention to put in place its own parallel manpower programs in Quebec. Quebec's Minister of Employment, Mrs. Harel, says that this bill is the antithesis of the Quebec consensus on the manpower policy, the antithesis of the single window.

Bill C–76, an act to implement certain provisions of the budget tabled in Parliament on February 27, 1995, is another example of the Liberal federal government's relentless denial of Quebec. Under this bill, the Minister of Human Resources Development can use the money saved through UI reform to set up a human resources investment fund.

This fund will be spent on manpower training programs, among other things, thus allowing for massive federal intervention—on a discretionary basis and with a centralizing effect—in education, an area over which Quebec has exclusive jurisdiction, with total disregard for Quebec's policies in this sector.

Interprovincial trade is another area in which the federal government likes to impose its centralizing vision.

In Bill C–88 regulating interprovincial activities, the federal government assumes powers that were never discussed when this agreement was negotiated and signed in June 1994. Clause 9 of the bill stipulates that if a party is found to be in violation of Article 1710 of the agreement, the federal government, whether or not it is a party to the dispute, takes it upon itself to impose retaliatory measures against any province without distinction.

This bill shows, once more, the federal government's determination to act as judge and jury in interprovincial trade and to give itself, through this bill, a power of enforcement under orders issued by itself to extend the application of any federal law to the provinces, as stated in clause 9(1)(c).

This unitary state attitude of a centralizing federal system is in contradiction with provincial identities and, as such, impedes the development of the people of Quebec. This attitude is also reflected in Bill C–46 establishing the Department of Industry, whose clause 8 states specifically that the Minister of Industry is responsible for "economic development in areas of Ontario and Quebec".

This legislation only goes to show that there is overlap with respect to regional economic development by confirming the federal industry minister's right to interfere in an area of jurisdiction over which Quebec has been demanding control for a long time.

Bill C–91 to continue the Federal Business Development Bank under the name Business Development Bank of Canada is the last example of the centralizing federal legislation that I will give you here.

Clauses 20 and 21 of this act are totally unacceptable to Quebec. Clause 20 suggests that the Business Development Bank of Canada may enter into agreements with, and I quote: "and act as agent for, any department or agency of the government of Canada or a province, or any other body or person, for the provision of services or programs to" them or on their behalf.

This act also flies in the face of the economic development policies being implemented within Quebec. Under this clause, the Liberal federal government pursues its strategy of centralization, a political strategy to substantially restrict the Quebec government's ability to act in the area of economic development, ultimately preventing it from achieving political autonomy.

By usurping the power to act as an agent for any department or agency of Quebec, through the bank, the federal government completely ignores the authority of the Quebec National Assembly and its legislation on the executive council, which states that no department or agency of the Government of Quebec may deal with the federal government without prior consent. The new Federal Business Development Bank, the Business Development Bank of Canada, has become the instrument of federal interference in regional economic development in Quebec.

The totally demagogic approach developed by Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who claimed that Canada was the most decentralized country in the world, is an insult to intelligence and reflects the bad faith now being displayed by the current Prime Minister. Such an attitude is a major impediment to finding a solution regarding Quebec's place in North America. In spite of the incessant pleas of the Quebec government to develop its own economic and social policies, the Liberal Party of Canada always said no and used every available legislative means to restrict the decision making power of Quebec's national assembly.

In the late sixties, Trudeau became Prime Minister and imposed a national vision which resulted in a series of federal interventions in fields of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. Since then, the primary objective of the federal government has been to streamline government activity and strengthen federal authority over the political economy. For example, in the area of manpower development and training, the federal government has over the last fifty years assumed increasing responsibility regarding the definition of the framework and conditions relating to government intervention in that area of Quebec economic activity. As a "policy definer", the federal government has given itself the role of direction setter and harmonizer, as opposed to that of a service provider for the provinces.

The patriation and review of the Constitution were opportunities for the federation to affirm the authority of the central government over the economic and social management of all the provinces. Regardless of what Pierre Elliot Trudeau and the current Prime Minister may say, the 1982 Constitution Act confirms Ottawa's dominating role as the place where power is exercised. This is why 2,308,266 Quebecers voted for sovereignty on October 30.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until Monday, November 27 at the ordinary hour of daily adjournment, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to seek the unanimous consent of the House to further defer the vote until Tuesday at the ordinary hour of adjournment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

Hon. Diane Marleau (for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Environment) moved that Bill C–83, an act to amend the Auditor General Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to take part in the debate on Bill C–83 at third reading and to support this legislation which will establish for the first time within the federal government the position of Commissioner of the Environment and Sustainable Development.

Not so long ago, maybe 20 to 25 years ago, the environment was not among the major concerns of the government. In fact, most of the environment departments, at the federal and the provincial levels, were only set up during the 1970s. At that time, the environment was considered a self–contained issue. It was dealt with within one department, as were all the other areas, such as health, education, finance or revenue. Each department saw to its own business, without thinking about integrating elements from other departments.

Little by little, we realized over the last 25 years that everything that relates to one area, such as environment, taxation, transportation, health, is also interrelated with other areas.

Nowadays, we cannot talk about the environment without addressing the issues of health, economy, energy, taxation, public transportation. Everything is linked together.

In fact, all things are interdependent. The whole environmental issue hinges on ecosystems and biodiversity. We need something to support all forms of life, our natural resources and everything that is essential to the wealth of any country, of any community.

We realize today that the only way for us to protect the environment and to ensure that sustainable development is a constant concern in our lives is to integrate the environment with all other aspects of government. That is why it is becoming increasingly important to talk not only about the environment but also about sustainable development, biodiversity and interdependence.

That is why, in an ideal world, we would not even need an environment department. In an ideal world, such a department would not be needed because each department, whether it be the Department of Health, Finance, Transport or Fisheries, would in itself be a sustainable development department, an environment department.

But we are far from this ideal world. We still need a Department of the Environment to act as a watchdog and to ensure that environmental protection becomes an integral part of the agenda of all other departments.

[English]

This is the central objective of Bill C–83. The central objective is to ensure that each ministry of the government, whether it be finance, transportation, health, or any other ministry, will be convinced that the way to promote the environmental cause is to make each ministry's activities and actions sustainable in the long term.

• (1345)

The reason for the bill is to ensure sustainable development strategies within the aegis of each ministry of the federal government. We have now constituted Bill C–83 to install a commissioner of environment and sustainable development within the office of the auditor general to monitor and inspire sustainable development strategies to be installed in each ministry of government, subject to public scrutiny through the office of the commissioner; the commissioner being installed within the office of the auditor general with all the autonomy and independence the office implies and sanctions.

The idea will be for these sustainable development strategies to be public in scope and accountable to the people of Canada through Parliament. They will have to be filed in Parliament and will be monitored by the commissioner who will have to report on them.

Bill C–83 will require the sustainable development strategies to be upgraded on a systematic basis so that the commissioner will have a benchmark starting in two years on the progress of these sustainable development strategies, considering the evolution of society in all its forms.

The office of the commissioner for environment and sustainable development is a key development in the governance of federal institutions. Besides the very important task of monitoring the sustainable development strategies of the ministries, another extremely important element of the commissioner's duties will be to be accountable to the public at large so that the public will have access to the commissioner's office to inquire, to complain if necessary, about the activities of the various ministries with regard to their sustainable development strategies and their environmental consciences.

The second element of public participation, that of accountability to the public, is a feature of the act which is almost if not as important as the first because the two are intertwined. This will provoke a transparent act, a bill that opens the scope of government to the public to ensure the government not only preach the preservation and enhancement of natural resources and the ecosystems that sustain all activities, but put the theory, the concept and the principles into practice in the every day governing of the various ministries of government.

Bill C–83 in that sense is a great step forward for the government, a clear achievement for the Minister of the Environment, in having recognized the necessity for the office in the red book which was the flag ship of the Liberal Party of Canada during the last election and, more important, to have carried out this key commitment at an early stage in its evolution as a government.

I am very pleased to have been part of the standing committee that examined and reported on the concept and office of a commissioner of environment and sustainable development. We are the first industrialized country of our size to have implemented such an office. We followed the lead of a very small country, a leading country of the world in this sense, New Zealand, which seven years ago installed an office of commissioner of sustainable development.

During the course of our hearings we were fortunate to have had the benefit of the experience and the advice of the commissioner for New Zealand, whose trail blazing work today has been the source of inspiration for ourselves. It is our hope that now that Canada has gone forward with the red book commitment and installed a commissioner for environment and sustainable development, this will become a practice that hopefully will be followed by the other nations of the world.

All of us are in this together. The environment is the most global issue of them all. Today we are committed as a nation to many international treaties such as the conventions on climate change and on biodiversity.

We are committed to the commission on sustainable development. We are committed to so many international instruments concerning environment and sustainable development that as we act, as we move forward, we set a tone, a benchmark which I firmly hope in this case will be followed by others in Canada and beyond.

I hope that all of the political parties represented in the House of Commons will consider this bill a positive, constructive and trail–blazing piece of legislation.

We may not have gone as far as the committee wanted to go at first, but I do think that our final resolution, the conclusion we have come to, is realistic and constructive, and is a huge step forward, not only for the federal government, but for all of Canada. This bill will show that the government is now firmly committed to sustainable development, not only through its environment department, but through all of its departments, all of the machinery of government. It will be up to us, as members of Parliament, and up to the people to ensure that the Commissioner of the Environment and Sustainable Development not only follows up on the sustainable development strategies, but also voices our concerns and puts pressure on all the governments, the current one, the next one and all the others after that. All this will mean that, for the government and the population, sustainable development will become one of our concerns and part of our daily lives.

I think Bill C–83 is a big step in the right direction for all of us. I am pleased to see today that it has come so far and that it will become a reality very soon, and I hope it will be passed by the Senate very fast so that it can come into effect as soon as possible.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I will take a moment to clarify a matter we dealt with earlier with reference to Bill C–96, following an intervention of the chief government whip on vote deferrals.

It is my understanding the recorded division on second reading of Bill C–96 is deferred not to the ordinary hour of daily adjournment but to the end of government business on Tuesday, November 28.

The Speaker: It being 2 p.m. we will now proceed to Statements by Members.

SENIORS SAFETY WEEK

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this week is Seniors' Safety Week. While growing old is as inevitable as taxes we know that seniors should remain active and stay in their own homes for as long as possible. It is integral to their good health.

Ironically the home is one of the least safe places for seniors. In Canada accidental death or injury leading to hospitalization that is often permanent is three times higher for seniors than for any other age group. These injuries exact high psychological and social costs on seniors. They lead to loss of independence and mobility, and fear and anxiety lead to isolation.

Therefore making home and consumer products safe is the best health promotion for seniors. Health Canada promotes increased safety awareness among seniors and their care givers. Access to devices and home improvements that ensure safe living environments for seniors are a priority for the government, which is why we support the Canada Safety Council national safety week campaign.

I urge all members of the House to work toward safer communities for seniors. We will all be living in them eventually.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Senate has now passed the infamous firearms legislation. For some it may be considered a victory but it is a very hollow victory at best.

The government has made some vague promises of safer streets and safer homes by introducing mandatory registration of rifles and shotguns. The Minister of Justice has never explained how cracking down on law–abiding citizens is going to prevent the criminal misuse of firearms. Obviously, criminals are not going to register anything they own.

I believe the legislation is nothing more than a very thin smoke screen to offer a false sense of safety to Canadians who are concerned about the growing crime problem in this country and to take pressure off a government that seems unwilling to do anything meaningful about it.

There is a tremendous cost involved in the legislation. The set–up cost is $118.9 million by the minister's own figures, and registration itself will cost hundreds of millions more.

At a time when we are seeing federal cutbacks in transfer payments for health care, post–secondary education and various social programs, should the government not be reconsidering its priorities and refocusing the spending of what money it has in areas more meaningful than the registration of firearms belonging to law–abiding taxpayers in this country?

TOBACCO

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, studies in the U.S. show that smoking causes 415,000 deaths in a year and $50 billion in medical care costs.

Smoking is the most important preventable cause of premature death. The immediate causes of death are a wide variety of cancers and cardiovascular and respiratory diseases. Yet 48 million young Americans still smoke. Twenty–four billion packs of cigarettes are purchased each year. Every pack sold causes $4 of expenditures on smoking related health care.

As 70 per cent of smokers begin before the age of 18 years, discouraging smoking among the young is essential if we are to cope with this problem. It has been shown that the young prefer the most heavily advertised brands. Here in Canada we must discourage our children from smoking.

These facts are from the 1994 issues of the morbidity and mortality weekly report of the Massachusetts Medical Society, 1440 Main Street, Waltham, Massachusetts, 02154. I would be glad to provide extracts to anyone interested.

MOTHERS AGAINST DRINKING AND DRIVING

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, November 16, I attended the local kick–off for the Mothers Against Drinking and Driving red ribbon campaign in the town of Kentville in my riding of Annapolis Valley—Hants. The red ribbon project is this organization's most visible grassroots campaign. Each red ribbon serves as a reminder for motorists to be safe and sober drivers during the holiday season and throughout the year.

In 1994 over 1,700 people were killed in alcohol related accidents. That works out to 4.6 people per day. By working to raise awareness on this issue, we can all help to prevent the senseless deaths and injuries that result from drinking and driving.

I have a red ribbon tied to the antenna of my car. I would ask that all members of the House support this very worthwhile campaign by doing the same.

CANADA OCEANS ACT

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on June 14 the government tabled Bill C–98, the Canada Oceans Act. This legislation is structured to provide a legal framework for the implementation of a new ocean management strategy. The Canada Oceans Act is needed to enable nation–wide management of our oceans on an ecosystem basis while ensuring that economic opportunities are achieved.

The province of Newfoundland is unique in its location and its dependency on intelligent oceans resource management. For this reason, the Canada Oceans Act is a landmark piece of legislation and is directed at the promotion of sustainable development and the protection of ocean resources.

With the Canada Oceans Act came the merger of the Canadian Coast Guard and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. One key role for this integrated fleet will be fisheries conservation inside the 200–mile limit. Groundfish and other species will be protected while nature rebuilds these resources and shellfish will be protected from over–exploitation.

The Canada Oceans Act signals a renewal of Canada's—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Macleod.

MEDICARE

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, medicare is important to all Canadians.

Medicare deserves a federal health minister who can adapt to major inevitable changes, like new technology, which will be expensive; like a population that is aging, which will also be expensive; and like government debt, with a federal Department of Health spending $1,200 per person per year on debt service and just $268 per person per year on health.

• (1405)

We need a keen, adaptable minister with fresh ideas. What do we have? We have a minister out of her depth, who is fining the provinces for the delivery of health care that does not match her interpretation of the Canada Health Act.

Medicare deserves better. Canadians deserve better. Federal fines for medicare mean failure.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, last month the Liberal government reduced federal transfer payments to Saskatchewan by a further $244 million. With a stroke of a pen, Saskatchewan's budget surplus has been wiped out.

Saskatchewan was the first province in Canada to produce a balanced budget without hurting those in need. This latest Liberal action will hurt those in need most.

Provinces have been under constant attack from the Liberal government's cutting of transfer payments. The Liberals' slashing of post–secondary education funding means higher education will only be available to wealthy families.

The reduction in transfer payments to the provinces is damaging to Canada's inter–generational and inter–regional sharing. Forcing young Canadians to pay more for their post–secondary education could cause them to lose sympathy for their elders. We ought not be surprised if soon these young people in turn demand that other generations, such as seniors, finance their own social and economic needs on a pay as you go basis as well.

Is this the Liberal vision for Canada, pitting one generation against the other?

WINTER CITIES CONFERENCE

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in recognition of the hosting in Winnipeg next February of the Seventh International Winter Cities Conference and Showcase.

[Translation]

This conference will bring together mayors and business leaders from more than sixty different cities and twenty–six countries to share their knowledge and ideas about what it is to live in a winter city.

By hosting Winter Cities '96, those of us who live and work in Winnipeg will be able to demonstrate to the rest of Canada and indeed to the rest of the world that we are immensely proud of our city and delighted to share it.

Winter Cities '96 is also a tremendous chance for Canadian businesses to showcase and promote their talents. At the moment, over 200 volunteers are hard at work preparing to welcome visitors from over 60 cities and 26 different countries.

I would like to thank them for their hard work.

I am sure that Winnipeg will make this Winter Cities Conference the most successful yet.

CP RAIL

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister made a shameful remark, taking dangerous liberties with reality.

By linking the departure of CP Rail from Montreal with the sovereignist movement, and even having the colossal nerve to state that the sovereignists are intolerant of cultural minorities in Quebec, the Prime Minister sidestepped the question and added fuel to the fire.

If the Prime Minister listened to CBC a little more often, he would know that Mr. Ritchie, the President of CP Rail, has denied any connection between moving the headquarters and Quebec's move toward sovereignty. Mr. Ritchie simply pointed out that 80 per cent of CP activities were in the west. And this is the result of federal policies.

Rather than seeking to exacerbate the differences between the various groups making up Quebec society, the Prime Minister ought to be working to bring them closer together. This is another of the real problems the Prime Minister ought to be addressing.

HEMOPHILIA

Ms. Jean Augustine (Etobicoke—Lakeshore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, November has been declared hemophilia month. Approximately 2,400 Canadians are affected by hemophilia, an inherited condition characterized by a failure in blood–clotting mechanisms in the body.

The Canadian Hemophilia Society is dedicated to providing information and support services to persons with hemophilia and other related blood conditions.

The Canadian Hemophilia Society has recently received a grant for $125,000 from Health Canada to assist in the development of a stronger volunteer base. This is in addition to the over $450,000 that has been contributed through the national AIDS strategy for AIDS information and prevention activities.

Today let us join together to salute the outstanding work of the Canadian Hemophilia Society. We wish them a successful campaign during hemophilia month.

CANADIAN POLISH CONGRESS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Polish Congress is an umbrella organization that unites over 240 organizations representing Canadians of Polish origin.

The congress is active in many areas, from helping to successfully resettle newcomers to the promotion of excellent relations with ethnocultural groups across Canada.

Throughout its history, the congress has participated in the development of a strong and united Canada, often providing input and advice to federal and provincial governments through briefs and through personal input.

I am therefore pleased to announce that the Canadian Polish Congress Council has chosen Ottawa as the site of the 1995 annual meeting this week. I welcome the delegates from all provinces and regions, who are beginning the council meeting with a visit to the House of Commons.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, according to the Globe and Mail, the government is preparing to reduce maximum insurable earnings for unemployment insurance.

This decrease will constitute the most substantial tax cut by this government, but essentially the ones to benefit will be high income earners who will therefore be paying less into the unemployment insurance fund, while people with unstable and seasonal work will get less money in benefits.

The minister himself has stated in the past that raising the ceiling would improve income distribution. He knows what he is doing.

We are anxious to see this long awaited unemployment insurance reform. This government, which claims it is addressing people's real problems, did not dare to table it before the referendum. Now we are really going to get clobbered.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, methinks the Liberals doth protest too much.

To the members of the traditional good old boys club in Atlantic Canada, let us talk oppression. It is the Liberal fisheries minister who would charge an ice–free port for icebreaking. It is the Liberal human resources minister who airlifted Atlantic Canadians to Ontario. It is Liberal provincial politicians who have monitored attendance at public meetings. These are the politicians who perpetuate the oppressive political system of handouts and rampant patronage. The truth hurts.

Reformers openly challenge the political system in Atlantic Canada. We offer hope and self–reliance to Atlantic Canadians through proposals such as Atlantica, which builds trade alliances with the eastern United States. This will create jobs.

LEADER OF THE BLOC QUEBECOIS

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois surprised few people on Tuesday with his announcement of his candidacy for the position vacated by Jacques Parizeau.

He surprised no one either with his announcement that his first priority would be Quebec's public finances. Truth be known, the disastrous state of Quebec's public finances is forcing all pretenders to the throne to promise to make them their first priority.

He did, however, surprise and disappoint people with his announcement that he would never sign a new constitutional agreement. The potential successor to Jacques Parizeau must respect the people's decision of October 30 and work, as the people of Quebec have requested, to renew Canadian federalism. If his separatist obsession precludes his doing so, let him give up the throne to someone who give more heed to the will of the people.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last evening, the other House finally voted in favour of gun control.

The work we started six years ago has finally come to a conclusion. We now have a tool to help improve public safety. The struggle mobilized many people who, like me, firmly believed that tighter control was necessary. I would like to thank them for their dedication and their tenacity.

On the eve of the grievous anniversary of the massacre at the École polytechnique, Parliament has heard the concerns of the victims' families. Responsible gun owners like us know that privileges imply obligations, and so the law will be observed. We must, however, remain vigilant and continue to keep close watch on the law and its regulations.

CANADIAN SUGAR INDUSTRY

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian sugar industry is very happy with the recent trade ruling by the Canadian International Trade Tribunal, which confirmed that dumped sugar from the U.S. and subsidized sugar from the European Union is threatening material injury to the industry.

● (1415)

The industry is also pleased that the United States has decided to exempt sugar from the Helms bill, which would have placed serious implications on Canada's ability to export sugar.

All this being said, the Canadian sugar industry still has one very key irritant that needs to be resolved. Canadian sugar exports to the U.S. were drastically reduced last year when the Americans implemented new trade restrictions which lowered our export quota. As a result, the Lantic Sugar refinery in Saint John, New Brunswick, had to lay off many employees. These tariffs are estimated to cost many hundreds of Canadian jobs in the sugar industry.

As an Atlantic Canadian, I call on the minister of trade to finish the job and continue to enter into formal negotiations with the U.S.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when the Prime Minister backed out of the promises he made to Quebecers six days before the referendum and said that reopening the Constitution was out of the question, Quebecers all remembered the promises made by Pierre Elliott Trudeau on May 14, 1980, promises on which the government at the time immediately proceeded to renege.

Since six days before the referendum the Prime Minister clearly referred to the Constitution as a way to bring about change, does yesterday's retreat signify that Quebecers have been tricked once again as they were in 1980, when they were promised so-called satisfactory constitutional changes and the government did not deliver?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): On the contrary, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister's statement in Verdun on October 24 was as follows, and I quote; "We will keep open all the other roads to change, including administrative and constitutional means. Any changes in constitutional jurisdiction will only be made with the consent of Quebecers", while the Leader of the Opposition said, and I quote: "While he talks about the Constitution, we will look after jobs".

[English]

When asked whether he would sign any deal he said: "No, it is not possible. I am a sovereignist". The person who is off the wall on this is not the Prime Minister; it is the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this is a fine way of passing the buck. This government blames unemployment on the previous government, and when there are problems with the Constitution, it blames them on the opposition.

When the Prime Minister made these promises to Quebec a few days before the referendum, he knew there was a sovereignist government in Quebec City. He knew that perfectly well. He made certain promises. So how can he use the sovereignist government in Quebec City as an excuse to back out of the promises he made so he will not have to deliver the goods?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat the promises made by the Prime Minister, which will be kept, and I quote: "We will keep open all the other roads to change, including administrative and constitutional means. Any changes in constitutional jurisdiction will only be made with the consent of Quebecers".

If anyone is saying no, it is not the Prime Minister but the Leader of the Opposition, who the day after the referendum dismissed the option of constitutional change.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): How delightful, Mr. Speaker. What is the world coming to? Now for my question, and I hope we manage to understand each other.

The Prime Minister of Canada—not Joe Blow but the Prime Minister—comes to Quebec six days before a referendum. Without anyone asking, he promises the changes the Deputy Prime Minister just mentioned.

And then we have the same Prime Minister, and since I am going to quote him, I will quote exactly what he said two days after the referendum in this House: "This I have promised and this I will do". And yesterday, he told us: "I will not do it". What is going on?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary. The Prime Minister promised, and I quote: "Any changes in constitutional jurisdiction will only be made with the consent of Quebecers".

Meanwhile, the Leader of the Opposition and future leader of the Parti Quebecois said in English, referring to the Constitution, that he did not believe it would be possible to formulate any offers, that they were not interested. That is what the Leader of the Opposition said, and we do not want to impose constitutional changes if he says Quebec does not want them.

[English]

The Speaker: I remind all members not to use props of any kind.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, two days ago, the Prime Minister made a suggestion to extend the deadline of the phoney committee chaired by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, whose mandate, according to its chairman, is to save Canada by reviewing all the options to renew federalism.

Can the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs tell us if he still intends to table the report of the phoney committee before Christmas or if he will grab the line thrown by the Prime Minister to gain a little more time?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I should first set the record straight. As I said before, the perfect example of a phoney committee is the Parti Quebecois's regional commissions, in which the Bloc Quebecois took part.

I would like to remind them that there are five million voters in Quebec, not 50,000, and that their commissions were not representative and did not try to find conclusions that would help Quebec and Canada, while our committee is looking at all the options and seeking solutions to our problems.

Once again, we are holding out our hand in good faith to the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois and urging them to soften their stance and negotiate a renewed federalism, as 80 per cent of Quebecers are asking them to do.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that the minister has a vivid imagination. He said that his committee's mandate was to review all the options in order to honour the Prime Minister's referendum promises, because the Prime Minister did make promises. But the Prime Minister is now turning his back on constitutional change. This is a remake of 1980, an old movie that we have seen before, but we have since gained 10 per cent. Soon we will gain even more in less time.

In this context, can the minister tell us what the phoney committee still has as a mandate? Should he not dismantle it instead, since the Prime Minister has decided as usual not to offer Quebec anything?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again, the hon. member's statements are wrong. As the Deputy Prime Minister said, the Prime Minister clearly stated in Verdun that we would keep open all other avenues of change, including administrative and constitutional changes.

Yesterday in the House, the Prime Minister said this:

> I never said we were going to change the Constitution—I said we were going to make changes to the federation, constitutional changes, if necessary—

There is no contradiction between the two sentences. It is the official opposition that will not abide by the results of the referendum, which showed very clearly that Quebecers want change, but within Canada.

[English]

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we are being reminded again today by the Bloc Quebecois that in the referendum campaign the federal Liberals made a couple of constitutional offers to Quebec. Despite the referendum loss the Government of Quebec and its future premier have already made it clear that they reject these offers and further that they would reject any offers of renewed federalism.

• (1425)

Will the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs make it clear today for all Canadians that the Government of Canada will not make further constitutional offers to a PQ government that has no intention of accepting them and that Canadians are sick and tired of playing this game with the separatists?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately it is true that the Leader of the Opposition, thinking about his future role as premier of Quebec, indicated that he would not consider any offers to renew federalism.

However, in saying that the leader was refusing to recognize the result of the referendum where the majority of Quebecers told him that they wanted changes to be made within Canada. He was also refusing to respect the majority of Quebecers who have expressed their views.

We will not do the same thing to Quebecers. We will be in a position to offer ways in which the present problems can be solved.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister avoided answering my question on constitutional offers, but in any case I will proceed with my supplementary question for the same minister.

As he pointed out, the Government of Quebec has made it clear that it will seek another referendum on sovereignty in spite of the fact that in the last referendum it never did make a detailed proposal on sovereignty and the proposed economic partnership.

Before the next referendum will the federal government formally request that the Government of Quebec table its detailed proposals for sovereignty and future economic relations with the rest of Canada so that Quebecers and other Canadians can evaluate the credibility of the ideas?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we will respect the current referendum which indicated that Quebecers want changes to be made and that they want the changes to be made within Canada.

I will repeat what the Prime Minister said yesterday in the House.

"I never said we were going to change the Constitution. I said we were going to make changes to the federation, constitutional changes, if necessary".

That is what we are working on. We will make recommendations to the Prime Minister, and we hope to be able to find solutions that will ensure, once again, that Canada remains as we know it, a united country, a country where we can all make our dreams and aspirations come true, whether we live in Quebec or in another province.

[English]

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, these are good words but they continue to miss the point, which is that the Government of Quebec is not interested in such plans and will proceed with another referendum at some point.

Let me go back to the Government of Canada's own commitments. On October 25, 1995 in a speech to the entire nation the Prime Minister said:

> All governments, federal and provincial, must respond to the desire of Canadians everywhere for greater decentralization.

This was a commitment to all Canadians that the Government of Quebec simply could not reject on behalf of everybody.

As the government has done nothing but bash decentralization since the referendum, what specifically do the Prime Minister and the government have in mind in making this kind of a commitment?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on this very important question I can only repeat what our line has been. It has been that decentralization would happen only when it is shown very clearly that it is more efficient to transfer responsibilities from one level of government to another.

It will be decentralization if it well serves Canadian citizens who pay taxes, but there is no doubt that decentralization for its own sake is not a remedy to any of the problems we now have.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

In his budget speech, the Minister of Finance announced that compensation packages for laid–off public servants would cost approximately $1.3 billion. But the annual financial statement tabled by the government shows a huge cost overrun, with costs up to $2.3 billion.

How can the government explain the fact that its public service downsizing programs have cost $1 billion more than anticipated?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the President of the Treasury Board were here, I am sure that, in response to the member's question, he would say that this increase can be attributed, first, to the pension funds that were not factored in when preparing the budget since they were not included in budget projections and, second, to the fact that more employees have accepted the offer earlier than expected. These costs will be recovered in time.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is surprising to say the least that the President of the Treasury Board never mentioned anything about this to the Minister of Finance. In view of the finance minister's answer, I might add that one of these public service downsizing programs, the early retirement program, which was supposed to affect 4,000 employees and cost $300 million, attracted 1,500 more people than expected and ended up costing $800 million instead of the original $300 million, or almost three times more than expected.

How can the government explain that its early retirement program will end up costing almost three times more than expected?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): First of all, Mr. Speaker, as I just said, this is explained, in the one hand, by the fact that some employees have agreed to retire sooner than anticipated and, on the other hand, by the fact that there are more people in certain areas than in others, but that is not a problem for the government because this will save us money down the road.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the governments of the provinces, particularly Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Ontario, as well as the two territories all registered opposition to the registration component of Bill C–68.

How does the government plan to gain the co–operation of these governments after having forced the bill on them against their will?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has noted that Parliament has now adopted a bill designed to ensure that we have peaceful communities and designed to ensure we have increasingly safe homes and safe streets.

I am sure the provincial governments will take note of the strong support for this measure across the country which will inspire their co–operation.

In any event, the Minister of Justice has announced today the appointment of a user group on firearms, composed of people from across the country who are responsible firearms users. This will be a very important way to make sure we have a cost effective, user friendly system of firearms registration which takes into account the concerns of responsible firearms users.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would have us believe that the provincial governments do not have any consideration for the safety of their communities and their streets and that only the federal government can see that kind of safety within the bill.

The federal–provincial financial agreements for the administration of gun control programs expired on March 31, 1993. I ask the government, what is the status of these financial negotiations with the provinces? Have these agreements been renewed and if not, why not?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will have to get further information on this for my hon. friend. It is the desire of the government to have agreements with the provinces which respect their concerns and at the same time ensure the safety of Canadians.

I hope my hon. friend will finally realize the support of Canadians for this bill and cease his opposition, which is certainly not well founded in light of the facts and in light of the support of Canadians who want safe homes and safe streets. They do not want an American style gun culture anywhere in Canada.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage. Mr. Manera, the former CBC President, and Mr. Beatty, the current one, both said that, should the CBC undergo additional cuts, it would be necessary to review the mandate of the corporation.

• (1435)

Does the minister intend to order new cuts to the CBC and, if so, will he review its mandate, as is deemed necessary by Mr. Manera and Mr. Beatty?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has got it all wrong. You do not deal first with the budget and then with the mandate. You start with the mandate and then look at the budget. This is exactly what we are doing.

A committee will make recommendations to us regarding CBC's mandate. We will look at these recommendations, make decisions and then decide on a long term financial plan.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given that the French network is already performing a lot better than the English one, does the minister realize that any additional cut would have a greater impact on the French network and could jeopardize its mandate?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is one aspect regarding CBC's mandate which, I think, will not change. It is the fact that the CBC must respect the linguistic duality of our country. This is a public institution. It is an institution which will continue to reflect that basic reality of our country.

If the hon. member has opinions on the budget cuts made by CBC's president and board of directors and looks to me, it may be that she wants me to manage the corporation. This will not happen. I will merely be the one who decides on CBC's mandate and budget.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food.

Last March the minister announced that he had instructed the Farm Credit Corporation to turn over the Crow payout to producers who lease land from the FCC. Last month the FCC stated that the minister's benevolent government corporation would increase the producer's share from a very generous 10 per cent up to a whopping 25 per cent.

Why did the FCC defy the minister's instructions? Farmers want to know who is in charge: the minister or his good Liberal friend and party contributor, Mr. Don Jackson?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what party affiliation Mr. Jackson has. I have never discussed it with him and I do not intend to.

On the substance of the issue, it is obviously not up to me to offer instructions to the FCC in terms of how it manages its business affairs. When the announcement was made in the budget with respect to the $1.6 billion capital payment in the wake of the cancellation of the WGTA, the FCC itself took the initiative to announce that it would find a way to equitably share that benefit with its leasing clients. It offered one particular formula. A number of the clients indicated to the FCC that in the opinion of the clients, they did not think that formula was sufficiently generous. As a consequence, the FCC more than doubled the formula.

Mr. Allan Kerpan (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister and the general manager for the FCC are saying one thing and doing another. The minister has stated that the balance of the payment would be reflected in lower lease and sale agreements, yet documented cases in Saskatchewan show that FCC leases and asking prices have risen by as much as 20 per cent.

Will the minister finally take a stand on something and address this paradox before it is too late?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is obviously being a bit inconsistent. He invites me to take a stand and every time I do that he criticizes it because it is not the Reform Party position. I would remind him that I was elected as a Liberal, not as a Reformer, and I do not intend to adopt his party's position.

With respect to the arrangements made by the FCC, it anticipates that in the first year of the adjustment to the loss of the Crow rate it will pass through to its tenant clients 12.5 per cent of the value of the Crow payment that it will receive. In the second year it will pass through another 12.5 per cent. It is fully expected by the third year that the impact of the freight rate adjustment will have worked its way through the land pricing system in western Canada and the benefit of reduced land costs will then be adjusted into the capital base.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the heritage minister.

The heritage minister is attempting to justify the way its government is apportioning the cuts at the CBC by pretending that both the French and the English networks will have to make the same effort.

Can the minister explain why, in 1992–93, according to the most recent numbers available, the production costs for a one hour program were $18,000 on the French network and $37,000 on the English one?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our colleague does not seem to take into account the fact that the CBC is an independent corporation. I have the responsibility to look after its mandate and its overall financing; the board of directors and the president run the show.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): But then, Mr. Speaker, why has the minister attempted to justify the way the cuts are being apportioned at the CBC? Can the minister explain why a one hour sport program, for instance, costs, for the same time slot, $28,000 on the French network and $70,000 on the English network?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my colleague would like me to be the accountant and the auditor for the CBC, which I am not and will not be.

CONFEDERATION LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for Financial Institutions.

The pensions and other savings of many present and former Bell Canada employees and many other Canadians have been jeopardized by the collapse of Confederation Life. Could the minister tell us what can be done to help speed up the liquidation process so that these Canadians receive their moneys as quickly as possible?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of interested constituents, and I would suggest to Reform Party members that some of their constituents might be interested as well in this matter.

The liquidation of Confederation Life is a court supervised process, in case some members did not know that. Responsibility for realizing the value of Confederation Life assets has been passed to a liquidator, Peat Marwick Thorne, under the supervision of the court.

Accordingly, people affected by the failure of Confederation Life should be in contact with the liquidator. The liquidator is responsible for obtaining maximum value for Confederation Life's assets. Again the liquidator does not wish to proceed with fire sale prices which would affect this.

There have been many positive developments since the liquidation began. Many lines of business have been sold and efforts are being made to sell the others.

CN RAIL

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government has indicated some concern in the past about the marketability of the CN shares. It even went so far as to suggest it may sell part now and then the rest of them later on when things improve.

Can the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport please tell the House if he anticipates a total sale of the government's shares in CN Rail?

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his great interest in this matter and the question.

As the member will know, this has been the most successful government issue in terms of privatization in our history. In fact the stock issue has gone better than expected.

• (1445)

The member will know that as anticipated it has gone so well that it looks like government may not have to keep any position in CN whatsoever. It will divest itself 100 per cent.

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, indeed there does seem to be great interest in the stock offering. Many potential Canadian purchasers have been unable to buy shares because of the large percentage offered outside of Canada.

Will the parliamentary secretary please explain to the House and to Canadians why the government rejected the Reform amendment to Bill C–89 which would have seen the share offering to Canadians and Canadian companies only for the first 60 days and would result in Canadian National Railway's remaining in Canadian hands, instead of intentionally selling 40 per cent to 50 per cent to foreign investors.

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the fact that the government wanted to maximize the price for CN was the reason it wanted maximum exposure not only in Canada but in the United States and elsewhere.

We were able to achieve such a good price because of that very reason. Foreign holdings or foreign shares were capped at 40 per cent. That Canadians were able to purchase over 60 per cent of Canadian National bodes very well for the issue.

HIV

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Health.

In 1989, a Quebec company, BioChem, developed a very important drug for the treatment of HIV infection, called 3TC. The American Food and Drug Administration has approved 3TC for sale in the United States. Because of the administrative slowness of Health Canada, the Americans are able to profit from this discovery before we do.

How can the minister explain that 3TC, a drug developed here, is already approved for use in the United States, while Health Canada is dragging its feet?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, scientists at Health Canada are continuing their work as fast as they can. We expect that they will give their approval very shortly.

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that the minister will make this year's "Bye! Bye!". I will ask her a supplementary question.

The minister has nice sounding words, but does she realize what the inefficiency of Health Canada means for the persons infected, especially when they know that their American counterparts are able to make good use of that drug, a drug developed here?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must also be aware that while drug approval is under way, there are ways for people in need of these medications to have access to them.

We have a number of programs, including emergency drug release programs. We are doing absolutely everything we can to fast track approval of some of these drugs. In the meantime we are also facilitating their access for people who truly need them.

INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board told the government operations committee that the government's much heralded infrastructure program cost Canadian taxpayers $750,000 for every job created.

Last year the auditor general said the $4.5 billion spent on job creation by regional development agencies has failed. The number of jobs created has been fudged, inflated and politically massaged.

Will the Minister of Finance acknowledge the taxpayers had a bum rap, that the unemployed have been led down the garden path, and that his own deficit reductions could have been much larger if he would only acknowledge that this process of job creation does not work?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one can speak to virtually every mayor of every municipality. One can speak to the executives of the mayors in municipalities. One can speak to the provinces. They will say the infrastructure program has been a tremendous success all across the country.

If one reads the auditor general's report, what he does is level a series of statements as to defects in evaluation, the vast majority of which occurred under the previous government and have been cleaned up by this government, which is why the auditor general congratulated the regional agencies under the Liberal government, and we are very proud of it.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I could not find the congratulations. First we had the national unity cabinet committee and now we have the job creation cabinet committee being struck. This is talk, talk, talk and more money flushed down the drain for a top down, borrowed money, government directed job creation program that we know will fail.

Will the Minister of Finance recognize and acknowledge that if he wants a serious job creation program he has to get the government off the backs of the private sector, reduce the deficit faster than he has been doing and reduce taxes? Each of these things is opposite to what the government has been doing so far.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if one looks at the trend of interest rates since the last budget, one would see those interest rates have come down and will understand the very clear linkage between deficit reduction, lowering interest rates and job creation. That is more than likely one reason that over the course of the last year and half there have been over 500,000 new jobs created in Canada.

The President of the Treasury Board told me that the proof the infrastucture program has been such a great success is that the member for Simcoe Centre keeps writing to him for more money.

BOSNIA

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

On November 21, with the historic signing of the peace accord in Dayton, Ohio between the warring parties in the Bosnian conflict, would the Minister of Foreign Affairs comment on any new role the Canadian government may play in support of the peace process in war torn Bosnia?

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are all pleased to welcome the Dayton peace agreement, bringing an end to the conflict in the former Yugoslavia.

I think I speak on behalf of everyone in the House when I say we congratulate all of the participants who had anything to with helping bring about this peace accord.

The peace accord is one thing but a lasting peace, the post–peace accord period, is sometimes as important or more important than the peace settlement itself. There will now be a period of reconstruction, rehabilitation and reconciliation. We will be monitoring this post–accord period very closely to see what part Canada can play together with its allies.

EMPLOYMENT CENTRES

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last July, the Minister of Human Resources Development announced a major restructuring of his employment centre network and decided that the regional management centre for the Mauricie would be located in Shawinigan, in the riding of Saint–Maurice, instead of Trois–Rivières, the regional capital.

Since then, 25,000 people have signed a petition condemning the government's decision and 40 municipal councils in that region have adopted resolutions to that effect.

In this context, what is the rationale for establishing this regional centre in Shawinigan instead of Trois–Rivières when the public wants exactly the opposite?

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in answering the hon. member's question.

What the government of Canada did in that instance was make a very important and valuable response to the issue of service delivery. We have basically amalgamated Revenue Canada and HRD services to provide one stop shopping for Quebecers.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Mr. Speaker, you will understand that I would have liked to get an answer from someone who is familiar with this matter.

Will the Prime Minister dare deny the fact that it is a highly partisan, arbitrary and illogical decision that the office of the Minister for Human Resources Development got directly from the Prime Minister's office?

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his questions. Anytime he would like to compare notes on this file, I will be willing to sit down with him.

The Government of Canada has increased points of service for Canadians from 450 to 750. Through the use of technology we have reduced the number of days required to file unemployment insurance claims from eight to two. Similarly, we have increased points of service for seniors by 400 per cent.

If the hon. member would like a further briefing, I will be available in my office.

IRVING WHALE

Mr. Paul Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

The Irving Whale salvage feasibility study submitted to the coast guard in 1992 noted the presence of a heating fluid called Mansanto MGS 295S. Had someone read the report carefully they would have discovered that the fluid was Monsanto MCS 295S, a substance comprised of 80 per cent PCBs.

When the minister asked the RCMP to investigate a possible cover–up of the knowledge of PCBs, did she ask it also to investigate her own department to find out who made the mistake? It was obvious that cover–up was on her mind.

The Speaker: In the formulation of a question we always give the widest latitude, but we should be very careful not to impute motive in any way, especially in this particular context. I ask the hon. member to withdraw the last words.

Mr. Forseth: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the words. I was not imputing motive.

The Speaker: Thank you. The hon. Minister of the Environment.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on July 6 of this year I ordered an investigation into the circumstances as to whether and why the Canadian Environmental Protection Act was violated in that information regarding PCBs had not been forwarded to my department.

That preliminary investigation was concluded last week and the results were serious enough that I have turned the matter over to the Attorney General of Canada and to the RCMP for further investigation.

With the investigation in the hands of the RCMP it has the full latitude to investigate everybody, including me.

Mr. Paul Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister needs to accept ministerial responsibility for the actions of her own department.

On March 18, 1994 the minister tabled the 1992 report to which I referred. I would think if the minister tabled the material she is responsible for its contents. She has known since the tabling that PCBs were on board the Irving Whale barge.

It is amazing that the environment minister calls for a police investigation when the fault lies with her. Will the minister accept the responsibility for the report which she tabled and take the blame for the mishaps of her department, an open ended cost so far of $12 million with still no results?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will accept my full responsibilities. Under the law of the people of Canada I was required in July to turn this matter over to an investigation because there was a possibility that evidence on the presence of PCBs had been withheld from the department specifically.

If the hon. member is suggesting I should break the law and ignore the requirement under CEPA to inform of the presence of PCBs by law, I will not. If he is suggesting I am attempting to deflect responsibility or am participating in a cover–up I will categorically deny that.

When I asked for the further investigation of the preliminary results by the attorney general and the RCMP, I made no bones about the openness of the RCMP to investigate everybody, including the actions of all departments of government.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

The CBC, one of the few remaining ties helping to keep our country together, is about to snap. The president of the CBC has warned that any further cuts would so drastically reduce the CBC that a change to its legislated mandate would be necessary. The minister, however, earlier today in the House guaranteed that the budget will fit the mandate, not the mandate the budget.

Does the government really want the CBC to continue to exist? If it does, will the government rescind the further $123 million in cuts it has ordered and provide the CBC with multi–year funding as promised in the red book?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are on record as supporting a strong public broadcaster and supporting the CBC.

• (1500)

We will indeed be looking at the future financing requirements of the CBC once we have decided on the mandate.

HEALTH OF WOMEN

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in my riding of Brant we are very concerned about the high incidence of low birth weight babies, about the increasing impact of heart disease on women, about osteoporosis, about breast and uterine cancer.

What is the minister doing to resolve these concerns and make good our promises in the red book to attend to the health issues of women?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the health of women continues to be a priority for this government.

In recent times, especially in the month of November, we have made a couple of very big announcements. One is the call for letters of intent for the centres of excellence on women's health. Another is the announcement that my American counterpart, Donna Shelala, the U.S. Secretary of Health and Human Services, and I will be co–hosting a forum on women's health in March 1995 here in Ottawa.

As well, we have a number of initiatives, including the prenatal nutrition program and programs addressing women and tobacco use. We have also been doing a lot of work on ensuring that women are a part of clinical trials.

In everything we do, we continue to check on the effects on women and their health.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

The Speaker: My colleagues, I wish to draw your attention to the presence in the gallery of the Hon. Dr. Martin Bartenstein, federal Minister of the Environment of the Republic of Austria.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POINTS OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during question period, in an answer to a question from the member for St. Albert, in a very feeble attempt to justify the infrastructure program the finance minister said that it was justified on the basis that the member for Simcoe Centre kept writing letters requesting money.

While we cannot call a minister a fibber, I think we have to make sure that the truth comes out. The truth is that there was one letter written and it involved the private sector. That is the only letter that was written.

The Speaker: I think the point has been made.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): With a very short preamble, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know from the government House leader what our legislative menu will be.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear that I am only going to make one statement right now.

The weekly business statement is as follows. We will continue today and tomorrow with Bill C–83, respecting the environmental auditor general; followed by Bill C–100, the financial institutions legislation; followed by Bill C–52, the public works and government services departmental reorganization.

On Monday we will begin with Bill C–108, the housing bill, and then return to the point on the list where we left off on Friday.

I would add to the list of bills for next week Bill C–99, the Small Business Loans Act amendments; Bill C–94, the fuel additives bill; Bill C–101, the transportation legislation; and Bill C–107, the British Columbia treaties bill.

Finally, Tuesday, November 28, and Thursday, November 30, shall be opposition days.

QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in an earlier statement in the House an answer that I gave was qualified as feeble. My point of order is that it was in fact incredibly decisive and strong. In any event, I withdraw the s.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): On a point of order, I have a question for the House leader of the government with regard to potential legislation coming before the House.

The Speaker: My colleague, you will recall that last Thursday we had a very brief exchange on this. Of course I will permit clarification of whatever is coming up. We do not usually do any dealing here on the floor, so I know that the question will be quite to the point.

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge): Could the hon. House leader of the government indicate whether there is going to be any consideration with regard to legislation on unemployment insurance on the list he gave today?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, legislation on that topic was not on the list I read out today.

All I can suggest to my hon. friend is that he keep an eye on the Order Paper.

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I was looking forward to speaking on third reading of Bill C–83 because of the debate we had last Monday on an amendment we tabled that would have deleted paragraphs (a) to (h) in clause 21(1) of the bill. I very much wanted to clarify a fundamental difference between members of the Bloc Quebecois and other members in this House.

We in the Bloc Quebecois are sovereignists and we come from Quebec. In other words, we support Quebec's sovereignty and are opposed to any form of intrusion in its jurisdictions, while seeking to expand those jurisdictions until Quebecers decide to have their own country.

Obviously we do not have the same outlook as the other members of this House, who are federalists. When a bill is tabled, we do not consider or analyze the bill in the same way the Liberals, Reform members and the remaining Conservatives do, who are federalists. They still believe in federalism but we do not. They believe in intrusion and imposition but we do not.

It is only normal that we should see bills like the one we are discussing today as potential for encroachment on Quebec's jurisdictions, while the other parties do not see it that way.

The deep–seated convictions of each and everyone of us mean that our points of view are different. We always try to assess the short and longer term impact of legislation on the prerogatives of the provinces. And when we consider the longer term effects, we feel that Bill C–83 will have a negative impact on the prerogatives of Quebec and thus on the environment.

From our point of view, the environment must be a provincial responsibility if we are to protect it, preserve it and, in many cases, restore it. We think it is clear the provinces have come a long way and today have most of the responsibilities in this area.

It is up to them to respond to their people and to pass effective legislation and set up programs and projects to preserve the environment. Many are already doing so, with good results. Quebec has assumed its responsibilities and done its homework. Furthermore, Quebec has led the way in a number of areas, including environmental assessment.

Looking at the federal side, there is not much to get excited about. The environmental effects are very watered down, and interest in the environment is not all that high and is a relatively recent thing. On the other hand, what is most remarkable about the federal government, the Liberal government in particular, is its great desire to become the saviour of the environment and to push aside the provinces more and more. It does this by riding over them roughshod, duplicating legislation, regulations, programs. The effects of this desire to interfere and to take over the helm at any price are very harmful to both the environment and the economy.

Bill C–83 has not escaped this constantly increasing desire by the feds to throw their weight around in the environmental area, as in a number of others. I wanted to explain this fundamental difference between us and the other members of this House because of what the hon. member for Davenport said about me last Monday. He wondered, and I quote: "—is it perhaps that the member for Laurentides badly needs a psychiatrist to remove her obsession with federal–provincial relations, her obsession with seeing under every chair a federal monster, a federal presence which may disrupt the quiet life of the people in her riding?"

I personally feel that the member for Davenport has defined our fears very well. I could not have depicted the federal government as well myself. And if he defines himself in that way, then surely the definition must be an apt one. Thank you, dear colleague, for that revealing definition.

You will understand that following such a definition, we will see the federal monster not under the chair, as you said, but on the chairs in front of us.

I am rather in a jocular mood today. I have to be, otherwise I would probably have to see a psychiatrist as the hon. member for Davenport suggested. As for me, I would never dare to suggest that my colleague from Davenport consult his geriatrician because of his retarded and old–fashioned ideas. I respect him too much to make such a suggestion. Yet, it is obvious that he looks at Bill C–83 with the eye of a federalist while I see it as a sovereignist.

However, the hon. member goes a bit too far when he accuses us of being against the health of Canadians, against the integration of environment and economy, against the protection of ecosystems and against the prevention of pollution. This is getting close to demagoguery and intellectual dishonesty.

The Speaker: Dear colleague, you used the expression "intellectual dishonesty". Perhaps you could consider using words that are more appropriate. I wish you would. I am not asking you to withdraw but simply to reconsider.

Mrs. Guay: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Do you wish me to withdraw that part?

The Speaker: No.

Mrs. Guay: Very well. Thank you.

We, sovereignists are as much if not more interested in ecology than most Liberal, Reform and Conservative members, the federalists in this House. To say that we are against the environment, in particular against sustainable development, because we do not support bill C–83 is going a bit far.

We are the ones who initially proposed the creation of a position of environment auditor within the auditor general's office. The minister took up the Bloc's idea and introduced the bill.

Besides, the auditor general, Denis Desautels, said in committee that he was already performing this role and could continue do to so if given more resources.

This seemed to us the best solution, the most efficient, the least expensive and the most logical. But the Liberals went overboard on this. They stuck doggedly to the promise they had made in the red book and suggested the creation of an independent office of the Commissioner of the Environment.

They suggested furthermore renewing the mandate of the auditor general in this area, even giving him additional resources. In other words, the Liberals wanted two independent offices, two auditors to perform the same task. What a fine way to manage. The Liberals wanted to create expensive and inefficient overlaps within the federal machinery itself.

So, if they are advocating creating duplication in their own house, one can certainly understand our reluctance and concern as to the commitment of these same people not to interfere in provincial jurisdiction. One can imagine the chaos and the administrative mess created by two environmental auditors. Such a situation would have been intolerable, and detrimental to the environment itself.

The Minister of the Environment—the best we ever had according to the member for Davenport, who is very humble since he himself has been a Minister of the Environment—was clever enough to follow through. She introduced Bill C–83 at first reading stage on April 25. At that time, we were in favour of the bill.

Later on, in committee, everything changed completely. Eager to lay it on, the Liberals suggested amendments that clearly demonstrated their annoying tendency to think that environmental protection is an exclusive federal role. When these amendments were tabled, for that matter, they were in for a bumpy ride, in fact it almost degenerated into a farce. At first, the Liberals moved amendments and voted on them. Next, relying on a rule rarely invoked, they cancelled these same amendments only to move new ones and take another vote. I want to point out that no amendment moved by the Bloc Quebecois carried.

So, the whole amendment stage was marked by confusion and turmoil. It seemed that the Liberals themselves could not understand each other; they appeared to be torn between public servants and politicians. This resulted in the Liberal amendment that modifies the bill by adding section 21.1, from (a) to (h). This added clause is what had led us to fear increased federal interference in provincial jurisdiction, and this is why we reject this bill. Liberals and Reformers are doing their best to convince us that this is not the case, but we see things differently.

We have been called obsessed, paranoid, we have been told we have a phobia against federalism. Fine. We have every right to feel this way, considering the environmental record of the federal government. We would not want the government to do more when it cannot even reach its own objectives in its own jurisdiction.

There are examples. The issues dealt with by the Liberals in the last two years and more clearly demonstrate that they are far from keeping their red book promises and that the minister, whom the member for Davenport has been praising for the last few days, has failed on all counts. Indeed, criticism levelled by environmentalists at the Minister of the Environment, who is so very comptent according to the member for Davenport, has been getting harsher and harsher, lately.

Environmentalists, the provinces, experts and reporters are forthright in their assessment of the minister's work and action. Disappointment is felt everywhere. The minister's abilities are regularly called into question. Bill C–83 is itself a telling example of the government's weakness. The red book proposed an independent auditor. Liberals in the standing committee proposed the same. The result is that the minister is meeting them halfway: half result, half failure. And now the Liberals are bragging about their minister's accomplishments.

One would have to be really blind or totally soft in the head to congratulate the minister on this issue. The least we can say is that the Liberals are a spineless lot.

Another issue is endangered and threatened species. If I were a Liberal, a federalist, I would find that the minister's position on this is very poor, and that her plan of action leaves much to be desired. In fact, the member for Davenport himself has tabled a private member's bill, Bill C–275, which is aimed at protecting species. Is the very competent minister supporting this bill? Why is that legislation not part of the government agenda?

We, Quebec sovereignists, are very happy with the minister's half measures in this area. In Quebec, we are quite capable of taking care of our species. But if I were a Liberal, a federalist, I would not find the minister's performance in this area very good. The greenhouse gas issue? Another issue where the minister is incapable of reaching her objectives. The provinces seem increasingly to want to distance themselves from the minister on this issue. The same holds true for the whole issue of harmonization with the provinces.

The provinces do not seem to like the minister's heavy-handedness, as she is more intent on imposing the federal will than harmonizing. That is another failure of the Liberals and their very competent minister.

As for the CEPA, the Canadian Environment Protection Act, we are still waiting for an answer from the minister. She is late, and despite the fact the committee clearly asked that she meet the deadline. Is the minister really looking after her responsibilities? I will let you answer that question. However, to ask the question is to answer it.

The Irving Whale, MMT, federal BCPs, etc., all these issues have something in common. Of course, they fall under the responsibility of the environment minister, but mainly they stand out as failures or as very sensitive issues whose management can only be described as incompetent and dominated by petty politics. Are the members opposite asleep? Are they not aware of all the mistakes their minister is making and of her inability to run her department? How distinguished Liberal members, true environmentalists albeit federalists, unfortunately, can lavish such praise on the minister is beyond me.

From a sovereignist perspective, Bill C–83, as explained earlier, poses a very real threat of federal intrusion into a provincial area of jurisdiction. Looking very closely at clause 21.1, one can see this clearly.

Dealing at first with sustainable development, this clause refers further on, through subclauses a to h, to several items that are under provincial jurisdiction. True, the Liberals claim that these are merely general goals related to sustainable development. We think there is more to it than that if you look beyond the words and this list of goals. Over the long term, these goals will encourage federal departments to intrude upon the jurisdictions of other government levels. The fact that a commissioner will measure the performance of departments against these goals in their programs or projects will be an incentive for them to do more and to get better results, even if they overstep their own area of jurisdiction.

Thus, under clause 21.1, a department encroaching on an area of provincial jurisdiction will get a positive appraisal from the federal commissioner. There was certainly nothing else to be expected from the Liberal committee members. True to themselves, they repeated the same arguments they had put forward when we were studying the CEPA, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

Sustainable development, a concept which the Liberals use a great deal to crowd out the provinces, is an ideal all societies should strive for.

Let us be clear. What is at stake here is not the validity of this principle, but the way it is implemented.

The Bloc Quebecois not only recognizes the validity of the principle, but also the need, not to say the urgent need, to translate it into concrete measures.

We believe this principle should be implemented by the provinces because they have the overriding jurisdiction over the environment. It is up to the provinces to promote the conditions needed for sustainable development.

In a federal system, the principle of sustainable development takes on a new dimension, that is respect for jurisdictions and areas of authority. Obviously, the squandering of both financial and human resources in order to maintain a dual structure, is in no way sustainable.

However, clause 21.1 provides for the commissioner to monitor the progress of the various departments, by taking into consideration criteria which clearly come under areas of provincial jurisdiction.

Clause 21.1*(a)* deals with the integration of the environment and the economy. In fact, this part of the commissioner's mandate can turn into subsidy programs for suppliers or targeted purchase programs. For example, the Department of Public Works and Government Services can set so–called "environmental" standards for some very specific purchase programs.

Let us say that the department wants to buy 10,000 sheets of plywood, but that the award of this contract is subject to some sustainable development standards stipulated in the purchase program. The commissioner comes in, does his job, examines the purchase program and realizes that the program does not meet some objectives, such as maintenance of the resource, the wood fibre used, or that the process used causes too much pollution.

In other words, the environment commissioner assesses the purchase program and concludes that the standards do not promote sustainable development. In his report, he then urges the department to upgrade its criteria.

But, in this case involving the purchase of sheets of plywood, the whole industry comes under provincial jurisdiction, thus under provincial criteria. What will happen if the federal criteria are not compatible with Quebec's criteria? What will industries do in such a mess? Who is better able to impose criteria and standards? The federal minister, under the guidance of the commissioner, or the Quebec minister?

There is no doubt in my mind that the provinces, which already have jurisdiction in this matter, are in a better position to manage their own affairs, that is, in this case, the forest industry and its pollutants.

This situation could occur in each and every department. One can easily imagine the jurisdictional problems that such situations could cause. This kind of back–door underhanded interference is unacceptable. I would like to hope that federalists will be bright enough to understand this situation and recognize that it is quite probable.

Other examples show that the federal government has used its spending power several times to launch programs or projects in areas of provincial jurisdiction. In many cases, after a few months, the federal government withdrew and let the provinces, especially the province of Quebec, foot the bill or assume responsibility for cancellation.

Item (b) is about protecting the health of Canadians. That makes the people on the other side jump and rant on about us, saying that the Bloc is against protecting the health of Canadians and Canadians being in good shape.

What we want is for Quebecers, Ontarians and Albertans to be in good health. Health is a matter of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. It is incumbent upon the provinces to prevent environmental degradation from threatening public health.

How far could the federal government go with this clause? It is a question the Liberals should answer.

Once again, duplication of standards and competition with provincial standards are inefficient and costly, for governments as well as for businesses and individuals. Again, the federal government opens the door to further jurisdictional quarrels.

Considering the crystal clear position of provinces on this issue, it is difficult to understand the attitude of the federal government. This is further proof that the Liberals have completely failed to grasp the repeated requests for change made by Canadians and Quebecers.

Clause 21.1(c) deals with the protection of ecosystems. As owners and managers of the land, the provinces have jurisdiction over the management of ecosystems. For example, to support this role, Quebec has created 17 national parks. It also adopted legislative tools to ensure the protection of biodiversity.

Provinces that have not done this must take action and meet the demands of the international community, which, for example, has criticized, in the OECD report, the environmental performance of Canada in the protection of ecosystems.

Bill C–98, an act respecting the oceans of Canada, is an object of concern for the protection of ecosystems. With this bill, the minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the saviour of our nation and of our turbot, strips the Minister of the Environment of her jurisdiction over this area.

He says that he wants to take full responsibility for the protection of ecosystems. We can well imagine the commissioner asking the minister of Fisheries to impose standards on a municipal waste water treatment plant because it pollutes an ecosystem where specific species of fish live. But municipal waste waters fall under the exclusive jurisdiction of provinces. Is it not a direct interference with provincial jurisdiction?

Paragraph (d) is about meeting Canada's international obligations. The majority of these international commitments were made on behalf of the provinces, which are sometimes the last to be informed of Canadian positions. That goes to show the contempt in which the provinces are held by the federal government.

For example, Canada made serious mistakes by committing to reduce greenhouse gases to an extent far greater than what some of the most directly concerned provinces would have accepted. These are a few things that make us doubt the will of the federal government to respect the provinces. Clause 21.1 of Bill C–83 is evidence of the contrary.

Under the guise of environmental protection objectives, the federal government is encroaching further on provinces' jurisdictions. I would also like to say a few words about the opportunity this bill gives individuals and groups to put pressure through petitions. Allow me to be sceptical about the effectiveness of these petitions, which will be treated the same way they are treated now by the government: they will simply be tabled in the House. Obviously petitions do not change anything and do not influence anybody, including ministers.

As I have said before, lobbyists and ministers go hand in hand and petitions are an exercise in futility. It is ridiculous to claim that the petition tabling process provided for in Bill C–93 will be a formidable weapon for the protection of the environment. The minister has not reinvented the wheel with this idea.

To conclude my remarks, I will say this: the commissioner of the environment must not encourage or even support this offhand attitude that characterizes federal interventions as a whole. I would like to read to you an excerpt from a document on the impact of federalism, published by the Quebec government in August 1995, and I quote: "Quebec's effectiveness and its ability to meet its objectives are increasingly hindered by the intransigence shown by the federal government in areas such as environmental assessment, the inconsistency of its interventions in relation to those of Quebec, including the sudden elimination of grant program funding and regulatory duplication in the pulp and paper and mining industries, the derogatory remarks contained in the report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development, and the fact that the federal government is forcing the adoption of its strategies in areas that should largely be under provincial jurisdiction, such as toxic substances, pollution prevention and sustainable development".

The role of the commissioner of the environment is not to promote duplication. On the contrary, he should encourage the various levels of government to respect each other's areas of jurisdiction. By giving so explicitly to the commissioner of the environment the mandate to monitor the extent to which sustainable development objectives are met, members of the committee have unduly politicized the role of the commissioner. We hope that, in the medium term, the use he will make of this mandate will have no impact on his credibility and his impartiality.

[English]

Mr. Paul Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak today on Bill C–83, which will amend the Auditor General Act.

• (1535)

Should the bill go on from the House to the other place and be given royal assent, Canada will be the proud owner of a brand new environmental commissioner, so it is said. The commissioner will have all the bells and whistles of a limousine, yet little gas to drive the wheels. The hands of the commissioner will be tied to the auditor general, who will ultimately have the final say on everything the commissioner does.

I want to read a promise from the Liberals' red book on page 64:

> Our second task will be to appoint an Environmental Auditor General, reporting directly to Parliament, with powers of investigation similar to the powers of the Auditor General.

I will briefly compare this promise to what is proposed in Bill C–83. The red book promises that the environmental auditor general would report directly to Parliament. Bill C–83 has the commissioner reporting to Parliament through the auditor general under his office, which is hardly what one would call direct.

Reformers believe the environment should be protected. We believe there is a place for critical review of what the government is doing with respect to the protection of the environment. It is our wish that this person be objective and independent as well as critical. It is also our wish that this person fit within fiscal reality.

Some Liberal members may think I am referring to exactly what is in Bill C–83, but I suggest they read the bill more closely.

The commissioner cannot be an independent figure. The commissioner might as well be a clerk of the auditor general. In other words, the commissioner is simply a staff member of the auditor general's office and subject to the larger pressures and priorities of that office.

I reassure members of the House that Reform is not opposed to the internal structure of the bill. We are simply opposed to the fact that money is being spent on a lot of status building trappings for a person whose job is already performed by the auditor general.

During the environment committee's clause by clause consideration of the bill the Reform Party proposed that any reference to the word commissioner be dropped and replaced by the term auditor general. I was not surprised to see that our amendment was voted down. It would be a cardinal sin, would it not, for any government member to vote in favour of an opposition amendment. We know how the petulant Prime Minister likes to punish his members.

Our amendment would have strengthened the bill in efficiency as well as cost effectiveness. We all know that the auditor general makes reports on how the government is undertaking certain environmental initiatives. Most recently in his 1994 report the auditor general reported on the environmental partners fund and the ice services branch of the Atmospheric Environmental Service. In the 1995 report Mr. Desautels reported on environmental management systems and environmental hazardous wastes. Allow me to briefly go through the report on hazardous wastes from the May 1995 report. The auditor general cites background information, audit objectives, observations and recommendations on the storage and destruction of PCBs.

It is no secret to Canadians that as a country we have a tremendous problem with PCB waste. We have been stockpiling the contaminated wastes for years. Now we are trying to get rid of it at the lowest possible cost. I read recently that Canadian companies hold a total of 127,025 tonnes of PCBs at 3,216 storage sites across the country. This number includes 495 federal sites containing 5,206 tonnes.

This is outrageous. What is even more scandalous is the fact that the government continues to do little about it. The minister may talk of studies, but studies will not help the people of Sydney, Nova Scotia, home of one of Canada's most polluted industrial wastelands. The Sydney tar ponds are presently contaminated by over 700,000 tonnes of toxic chemicals, including PCBs, coal tar, volatile aromatics, acid drainage and raw sewage. The minister says progress is being made, yet to date less than 90 tonnes of waste have been incinerated, not even 1 per cent.

We are not talking about storage sites holding newspapers or pop cans waiting to be recycled. These are sites holding a substance banned in Canada in the late 1970s; dangerous toxic sites, harmful to health.

In many communities laden with a PCB problem, a steady rise in the cancer rate is not uncommon. Sydney is now known as Canada's cancer capital, with a rate almost three times the national average.

• (1540)

The auditor general's report on managing hazardous waste outlines the role Environment Canada should play in the management of PCBs. It states the following:

> The Department provides the federal voice at CCME and federal leadership in the development and implementation of federal–provincial initiatives to regulate the use of PCBs and the storage and destruction of PCB wastes. The Department also spearheads the federal part of the national initiative by co–ordinating the activities of federal owners of PCBs and providing advice to both headquarters and regional levels on the storage, transportation and treatment of PCB waste.

In May 1994 the auditor general put forward his report on the management of hazardous waste. Now, one year and six months later, what has the federal government done to improve the PCB problem? Nothing. What will the government do? I am open to hear all the answers; however, I believe it will perhaps maintain the status quo. Again, the status quo really is nothing. I doubt that a commissioner will make much difference.

The auditor general clearly spelled out for the government that PCB sites need to be cleaned up. How much more can I stress the point the auditor general made? He did not say it would be simply a good idea to clean up the sites. Rather, he stated it was essential in order that the health of Canadians would not be put in jeopardy.

The government did not respond to the report. Therefore, if the government is clearly not acting on the auditor general's reports, I want to know what will be so special about the reports that will be written by the commissioner that will make the government act. Perhaps when we have time for questions and comments some hon. members from the government benches will be able to enlighten me on how they would be more apt to follow the warnings of the commissioner when they do not now follow those of the auditor general.

Bill C–83 will give us an environmental commissioner, whom we are told will whip the government into shape with respect to environmental issues. That is something the auditor general has apparently been trying to do.

The bill outlines that the commissioner will have several tasks to undertake. One of those tasks is the handling of petitions. A resident of Canada will now be able to file a petition concerning an environmental matter in the context of sustainable development. The commissioner would then forward it to the appropriate minister for whom the petition was intended. The recipient minister would then be required to acknowledge receipt of the petition within 15 days. In addition, that same minister would be required to respond to the petition within four months. In the bill it notes that the four–month period might be extended by the minister if the petitioner and the auditor general were both notified that it would not be possible to respond within the allotted four months.

The bill is really saying we need legislated permission for someone to write a complaint letter. Maybe with this new wrinkle the minister might even answer the mail.

Another duty of the new commissioner will be to monitor whether federal departments have met the objectives set out in their sustainable development strategies. The bill's amendment to section 24 would require that each federal department prepare a sustainable development strategy and table it in the House of Commons. Departments will have to table their strategies within two years of the bill coming into force. After that, strategies would have to be updated every three years.

In a nutshell, this will be the job description of the new environmental commissioner within the auditor general's office. In my opinion the tasks themselves are reasonable. The monitoring of departments in terms of sustainable development makes sense, especially when the Ministry of the Environment has failed to do its job on this score. The accepting and passing on of petitions is good as well. It is essential that constituents know that the petitions they file are being reviewed and acted on. However, there is a fundamental flaw in the bill. While the bill creates this high profile commissioner, it gives the person no independent power. That option was rejected by the government.

I mentioned that the job description in the bill was reasonable, and I believe monitoring may make a difference. However, there is no need to create a commissioner to follow through on these objects when the auditor general still has the final say, and his officials have been doing the job for some time.

All of the above mentioned responsibilities could be taken on by the auditor general and be performed effectively and efficiently on a regular basis if he were given the resources. However, I can clearly see why the Minister of the Environment chose to go the route she did. It makes it look as if the government is moving ahead with its environmental responsibilities and fulfilling this longstanding promise. I believe we call this window dressing.

We are in a time of fiscal crisis. The deficit is out of control and things appear to be getting worse instead of better. We need to be tightening our belts instead of loosening them. Government departments need to be amalgamated and consolidated to streamline services. We need to save money at every turn.

The same applies to the issue we are discussing today in the bill. While the ideas are reasonable, the process is not. The duties of the environmental commissioner should be part of the auditor general's regular duties. The auditor general could easily expand and juggle his staff to help in the monitoring of government departments and the transferring of petitions from constituent to minister.

Such a small ordinary solution would not make the minister look environmentally green among her international cohorts. The Liberals overreaching undeliverable promises are now revealed. This is exactly the fundamental problem with the thinking of the government. Image seems to be everything.

Let me inform the Minister of the Environment of what I am hearing from my constituents about how governments should run. They want government to function without the flare and the Cadillac style. They want a government that is fiscally responsible and accountable. They also want an environment minister who puts environmental results at the top of the agenda within a fiscally responsible framework.

The bill creates redundancy. I have never heard where redundancy was a synonym for responsibility.

In May 1994 the Standing Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development tabled a report entitled "The Commissioner of the Environment and Sustainable Development". This was the result of many long hours of hearing witnesses and reviewing documentation. I have highlighted some very interesting observations, primarily some from the comments made by the auditor general, Mr. Desautels. He told the committee that his office has for many years "been carrying out much of what would be the main audit responsibilities of an environmental auditor general".

The auditor general also stated that the office, referring to the current auditor general's office, will ensure that in carrying out its responsibilities it makes a positive contribution through audit to the protection and improvement of the national and global environment.

In my reading of the standing committee's report my conclusion was that the auditor general also thinks that his office could handle the increased responsibility and assume the role of monitoring the sustainable development strategies of federal departments.

I want the House to hear the six points the auditor general made when he appeared before the committee on why his office could continue to audit environmental sustainable development issues without any commissioner.

First, there would be no need for a new bureaucracy as an audit infrastructure already exists in the office of the auditor general. It would be less costly to the taxpayer as the office already has the structure in place to provide appropriate training, carry out research, develop methodology and carry out audit work.

Second, the independence, objectivity and credibility of the office of the auditor general are already established.

Third, there would be no confusion or duplication of roles as there might be with a new office of the environmental auditor general.

Fourth, the principles of sustainable development would be reinforced in that the environmental issues are audited together with economic and social ones.

Fifth, one auditor would create less disruption in the organization being audited if an additional external audit were also at work.

Sixth, the auditor general's office through its existing relationships with provincial legislative auditors can promote concurrent and/or joint federal–provincial audits of multi–jurisdictional environmental issues. This could help to overcome some of the problems related to the division of federal and provincial powers concerning environmental matters.

There is no question that the auditor general could undertake a more expansive role. He has said it to members of the standing committee. More important, if we were to ask the average person on the street we would discover that the vast majority is totally opposed to new levels of bureaucracy.

My constituents in New Westminster—Burnaby feel there is already far too much bureaucracy in government. When they find out that the government is passing legislation to add another level, my office phone might ring off the hook.

I refer to another important statement in the committee's report which reflects exactly what the Reform proposed in clause by clause consideration in committee:

> —it would appear that the Auditor General Act does not need to be amended in order for the auditor general, on his own volition, to expand his audit activities in the areas of environmental and sustainable development auditing.
> On the other hand, the act will have to be amended if the government wishes to make environmental and sustainability auditing a mandatory activity. The committee members were of the opinion that the Auditor General Act should be amended to this effect.

• (1550)

The Reform Party believes in sustainable development. We believe that through responsible economic development and the economic capacity that results, the environment will be sustained for all Canadians to enjoy.

The Reform Party supports the federal government taking leadership in developing a new discipline of integrating economics and the environment. However, while we support the truest definition of sustainable development we also support going about change in the most economical and pragmatic way possible.

Bill C–83 is definitely not cost effective. The installation of the environmental commissioner could cost upwards of $5 million in the next few years. We should consider the amount that was spent by the auditor general's office in 1993. In this year $4.5 million or 7.5 per cent of the entire auditor general's budget was spent on audits of programs and activities of the federal government.

I do not believe that the activities of the commissioner will need $5 million to operate. If the auditor general's office were to get just a portion of that amount, I am sure it would be able to hire the appropriate staff and perform the functions of the commissioner very admirably. However, we know it is about prestige and status. Prestige will be bought with a huge no cut contract for some so–called superstar and his or her appropriate entourage.

I cannot support a bill that does not take economic matters into consideration. If the government were serious about doing the right thing, it would have accepted Reform's proposal to get rid of the aspect of commissioner and hand over the responsibilities to the auditor general. Unfortunately such was not the case.

The environmental community and the Liberals when in opposition wanted a completely independent watchdog of the government concerning environmental matters. They saw the policy need and the need related to control, lines of accountability and the reporting structure. The independent commissioner was to have meaningful investigative powers and was intended to embarrass and expose laxity, rule breaking and poor administration on environmental matters. Now that the Liberals are in government the red book's high sounding phrases are only phrases. The bill it has now brought forward as a government is much less than what it promised.

The decision has been made: no independent commissioner or environmental auditor general. If we are not to have one, why not facilitate the auditor general's office with a little more resources and some enhanced legislative mandate and encourage him to get on with it? Not the Liberals; they want it both ways.

There will be business as usual but the bill also creates a new title under auditor general who has a position identified and set out with legislative status. With a magic wand we have an environmental commissioner. There are great press release opportunities, a high profile appointment and international advertising for the position. I wonder if the superstar contract will be larger than the boss to whom he reports, the auditor general.

If we have to spend more on environmental auditing, it should give the auditor general some resources and an enhanced mandate. It should not try to fool the public into thinking that it has something that was promised. The government should do one or the other. I can imagine the morale problems these new favoured environmental kids will cause in the regular office of the auditor general.

The bill does not make sense from a public administration point of view. The whole exercise as constituted is not likely to be good dollar value. The bill tries to take things both ways, but no one is fooled. Either we have a real auditor general for the environment or we do not.

If it is to be a subset and a listed function of the current auditor general, let us be forthright about it. The expensive optics game of the bill is out of sync with what the country wants and needs. Whom are we trying to impress? Is it the public or maybe the senior deputy ministers of various ministries of the crown who have failed so far to fulfil their environmental duty under the law?

I am not buying it and I do not think the public will either. When Reformers are the ministers, the auditor general report will be regarded and acted on quickly and there will not be any overpaid superstar commissioner.

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today in support of Bill C–83. The Liberal Party red book stated that the government would provide national environment and economic agendas. We also said that one of our priorities would be to appoint an environmental auditor general who would report to Parliament directly and would have powers of investigation similar to those of the auditor general. Bill C–83 fulfils this commitment and does even more.

Bill C–83 demonstrates that the government is serious about environmental and sustainable development, that we are willing to change the way government does business, and that government is not afraid to be held publicly accountable for what it does or does not do.

Federal government policies and operations have an impact on the decisions of Canadians, on the economy and on the environment. It is critical therefore that environmental and sustainable development considerations are integrated in government decision making. By getting its house in order the federal government can actively promote the shift to sustainable development throughout Canadian society. This is what Bill C–83 is all about.

The Standing Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development deserves a large share of the credit for the bill. The committee examined the government's red book commitment to establish an environmental equivalent to the auditor general. It recommended the establishment of a commissioner of environment and sustainable development. It provided valuable input at report stage when it made several recommendations to improve the bill.

Bill C–83 explicitly incorporates environmental and sustainable development in the Auditor General Act. It would also give the auditor general the explicit legal mandate to include environmental effects alongside the traditional considerations of economy, effectiveness and efficiency among the considerations he uses to determine the observations he will bring to the attention of the House of Commons.

Bill C–83 will also provide the federal government with leadership in making the shift to sustainable development. The amendments will proactively promote sustainable development across all federal departments.

Under the act ministers will be required to table in the House sustainable development strategies that include their departments' activities and plans of action to further sustainable development. Departments will also be required to update their strategies every three years and ministers to table updates in the House.

Bill C–83 will authorize the auditor general to forward petitions on environmental matters from the public to the responsible ministers. These ministers must respond within a specified timeframe.

The amendments I have just mentioned are significant in and of themselves but the bill goes much further. It creates a truly independent commissioner of environment and sustainable development. The commissioner will be established within the office of the auditor general. This will strengthen the role of the commissioner, ensuring independence and greatly enhancing the auditing of the government's environmental performance. The office of the auditor general has clout. It is independent from government. It is well respected and has solid expertise that can be put to use at once.

There is another advantage to the innovation. Within the work of the auditor general issues of environment and sustainable development will be integrated directly with economic considerations. This kind of integration is what sustainable development is all about.

To ensure his independence as an effective critic of government the commissioner will be appointed by the auditor general. The commissioner will be the auditor general's right hand person, helping him perform all his duties in so far as they relate to environmental and sustainable development.

The commissioner will monitor and report annually to the House on any aspects of sustainable development, environmental, economic or social, where they merit attention. These issues would include the extent to which departments are implementing their sustainable development action plans as set out in their strategies; the extent to which these action plans are effective and departments are achieving their sustainable development objectives; and the number, subject matter and status of petitions received by ministers.

The annual green report of the commissioner will not be the only report to the House on the government's sustainable development and environmental performance. The auditor general, assisted by the commissioner, may also report on environmental matters in his traditional reports to the House.

These amendments are historic and unprecedented. They will have far reaching implications for the way the federal government does business. They ensure that no matter who the auditor general happens to be, environment and sustainable development will have a high profile in the work of the office. They will provide leadership on sustainable development by proactively promoting and operationalizing sustainable development across federal departments and across economic sectors of the country. They will hold the government fully accountable to the public for its leadership and progress in making the shift to sustainable development.

The government has taken a red book commitment and engaged Parliament and Canadians in fulfilling it. Contrary to what the Bloc member who spoke said, it was a commitment in our red book and not one of their ideas.

I look forward to Bill C–83 becoming law and to the appointment of a strong and independent commissioner.

[Translation]

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, It is with great pleasure that I rise to address Bill C–83, an Act to amend the Auditor General Act.

This bill seeks to achieve five specific objectives:

First, to ensure that environmental considerations in the context of sustainable development are taken into account in the auditor general's reports to the House of Commons.

Second, to provide for the appointment—as suggested by the Bloc Quebecois—of a Commissioner of the environment and sustainable development.

Third, to impose requirements for responding to petitions received by the auditor general about federal environmental matters in the context of sustainable development.

Fourth, to provide for monitoring and reporting to the House of Commons on the activities of departments and the extent to which they have met the objectives and implemented the plans set out in their sustainable development strategies, and for reporting to the House of Commons on petitions.

Fifth, to require that each department's sustainable development strategies be prepared and tabled in the House of Commons.

From a technical point of view, if this bill is passed, a number of measures will have to be taken.

First, an adequate definition of what is meant by "sustainable development" will be necessary.

Second, the mandate of the Commissioner of the environment and sustainable development will have to be properly defined.

Third, we will have to ensure that the process for responding to petitions will adequately meet the requirements of the citizens who submit these petitions.

Finally, we will have to ensure that all departments have sustainable development strategies and that they meet the objectives set therein. This means that a major structure to monitor the activities of all departments will have to be put into place.

I said earlier that the first objective of Bill C–83 was to ensure that environmental considerations in the context of sustainable development are taken into account in the auditor general's reports to the House of Commons. In order to achieve this goal, all stakeholders must agree on a single definition of what sustainable development really means.

Bill C–83 includes such a definition; it says that sustainable development means "development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs".

It is surprising, to say the least, that the Minister of the Environment decided to include this definition in the bill to amend the Auditor General Act, but that she has not yet included it in the Canadian Environmental Protection Act itself.

In her speech to introduce this bill in the House of Commons on September 18, the Minister of the Environment said this: "[—] one of the first departments the office of the commissioner will be looking at is my department, the Department of the Environment. We welcome the opportunity of independent public review because we believe it will accelerate the integration of the two key objectives of sustainable development into the economy".

I hope that, during this review of the department's operations, the commissioner will have the opportunity to set the Minister of the Environment straight about this, because it would indeed not make much sense if the basic legislation respecting the environment in Canada was not the first to include a definition of sustainable development.

The only possible explanation for this is the minister's inability to carry out her responsibilities properly. Several examples come to mind. The Irving Whale case is a well–known example, where the minister proved to be unable to deal properly with such a major issue and such a dramatic one, under the circumstances.

In this case, the office of the auditor general would obviously have much to do to meet the first objective of this bill.

The second thing that Bill C–83 does is provide for the appointment of a commissioner of the environment and sustainable development. To this effect, the duties that the future commissioner to the environment and sustainable development is expected to perform are described in clauses 22 and 23.

The following information may be drawn from reading these sections. First, the commissioner in question will report directly to the auditor general, assist the auditor general in the performance of his duties with respect to the environment and sustainable development. For instance, the commissioner will assess the effectiveness of action plans in meeting the objectives set out in departmental sustainable development strategies.

Second, the commissioner will follow up in the prescribed manner any petition received from a resident of Canada about an environmental matter in the context of this so–called sustainable development.

Third, the commissioner will make any examinations and inquiries that he deems necessary to monitor the extent to which each department has met the objectives set out in its own sustainable development strategy.

Finally, he will, on behalf of the auditor general, report annually to the House of Commons on the extent to which each department implemented its sustainable development plan and on anything in relation to the environment that he considers should be brought to the attention of the House.

I think it is important at this juncture to repeat to this House the comments made by Auditor General Denis Desautels when he appeared before the Environment and Sustainable Development Committee on October 3.

At that time he said the following—and I shall quote him extensively because I think that the Auditor General has put his finger right on the fundamental problem in this matter.

I shall be quoting from several pages of Mr. Desautels' testimony. He said: "When I last appeared before this Committee, I also touched on the expectations of stakeholders regarding what was then termed an "Environmental Auditor General". I remain concerned about the extent of these expectations". He continued. "I sense there could be a gap between what stakeholders, such as environmental groups, would like or hope the Commissioner can do and what is reality, both in terms of mandate and available resources. It will be important in the months ahead to ensure that this expectation gap is minimized. For my part, I will try to do this by clearly describing this new role and the impact of these proposed changes on my Office at the first appropriate opportunity, in one of our reports to Parliament. I would, however, like to briefly discuss three of the areas where this expectation gap might exist".

"When I spoke to this Committee in March 1994, I discussed the importance of the independence and objectivity of this Office as underpinnings to the credibility it has established since its creation in 1878".

"I noted that responsibility for such matters as policy review and arbitrating environmental disputes should not be given to my Office, as this could quickly and seriously jeopardize the AG's traditional independence, objectivity and credibility".—I think that we can agree with Mr. Desautels on that.

"In Canada, it is generally accepted that legislative auditors do not observe on the merits of policy. They concentrate their comments on the implementation of policy".—policy defined by others, including this House.

"I might also mention that our work with other Auditors General worldwide, indicates that the majority of my colleagues outside Canada interpret their mandate in this manner. The proposed amendments to the AG Act make no provision for the Office to comment on the merits of policy and we will not do so".

I would like to intervene at this point. We see that the auditor general made it clear that he will not be involved in formulating policies but in enforcing policies formulated by others.

Mr. Desautels continued to discuss his role as ombudsman or what that role would be expected to be: Similarly, there is also no basis in the proposed amendments, nor in the Office's current mandate, for the Office to take on the role of Ombudsperson. Such a role would be costly and could likely have a negative impact on the credibility of the Office of the Auditor General and the Commissioner of the Environment and Sustainable Development".

He also talked about jurisdictions, saying: "Finally, the mandate of the Office of the Auditor General, including that of the proposed Commissioner of the Environment and Sustainable Development, is restricted to the responsibilities of the federal government. Neither myself nor the Commissioner have or will have any authority to address matters that fall outside federal jurisdiction. I think it is important to mention here that the mandate and functions of this Office, including those of the Commissioner—and I underlined what Mr. Desautels said in my text, —cannot be a substitute for strong government leadership and departmental management action and accountability. This of course applies equally to both environmental and non–environmental programs and activities".

"It remains the responsibility of departmental management to review their programs, to assess their success and continuing relevance and to determine whether there are cost effective alternatives. The results of these revisions are essential ingredients to managing programs wisely and providing information for accountability reporting".

"The government's Guide to Green Government, issued in June of this year, states that departments are required to report annually on progress towards sustainable development in Part III of their Man Estimates. The document also notes that this regular reporting of activities and performance in the Main Estimates will make on going monitoring and self–assessment a necessity. The management of individual departments, as part of their responsibilities, will therefore have to monitor and evaluate their own progress. This is a fundamental responsibility of management, whether in the private or public sectors".

"We have seen as a result of our work on program evaluation, how difficult it is for government to implement good effectiveness measurement and reporting".

I think Mr. Desautels explains himself here and will indicate the thrust of his interpretation of this bill: "In this time of downsizing and restructuring, I am concerned that the challenge presented will not be picked up". "From our experience we know that leadership, support and guidance need to be provided to departments so they can respond in a positive manner. I believe there may be expectations held by some that we alone will take on the responsibility of setting the benchmarks or criteria against which the government's overall progress can be measured. If the Office were to carry out this task without the government taking an active role, it would interject the Office into the day to day operations of the government, thus removing the traditional arms length relationship of a legislative auditor from these operations. It could also be perceived as a potential conflict of interest, since we would be put in a position of auditing something we ourselves had developed".

This is the end of the auditor general's text. I have taken the liberty of reading much of it, because it is in fact the response of the auditor general to this bill, which establishes his guidelines and determines his responsibility. In his opinion, they do not seem to correspond to people's expectations, and the auditor general himself says in fact: "I fear the challenge presented will not be picked up".

In short, the auditor general is telling us he cannot meet Parliament's expectations on the monitoring of activities of the departments covered by this bill.

What in fact are these expectations the auditor general refers to? During debate at second reading, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of the Environment said the following, and I quote: "Beyond the significant powers of the office, the very existence of the office of a commissioner of environment and sustainable development sends a powerful signal not only within the government itself but beyond the government into the reaches of Canadian society. They now know there will be somebody there, a monitor, an ombudsman, who will devote his or her duties to the environment and sustainable development in making sure the government itself practices what it preaches".

The remarks by the parliamentary secretary are somewhat at odds with those of the auditor general. This is made even more worrisome by the fact that, in the same speech, the hon. member for Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis goes on to say, "The key issue here is if this commissioner of environment and sustainable development will be truly independent and have the necessary powers, autonomy, independence to ensure that he or she is listened to and that the public feels that through this office it has a voice and a say".

The auditor general's own description clearly shows that his role depends essentially on the government's real leadership and not on his own qualifications.

But, as we heard, the auditor general did say that playing the role of ombudsman could have a negative impact on the credibility of the auditor general's office and of the sustainable environment commissioner. During the same debate, the hon. member for Davenport had this to say about Bill C–83: "This is not a minor step. It is a remarkable one. It inserts in the mandate of the auditor general the importance of monitoring sustainable development strategy and implementing the meaning, significance and the interpretation of sustainable development. That is no minor feat".

Yet, the auditor general himself went to the trouble of toning down this interpretation of the role that will be played by the commissioner of the environment and sustainable development. The auditor general himself said that the proposed amendments to the Auditor General Act contained no provisions allowing the auditor general's office to comment on the validity of policies, and that they would not do so. That is what Mr. Desautels said.

I also want to point out that, in his September 18 speech, the member for Davenport said: "The role and the funding of the commissioner must be ensured so that they do not suffer in times of budget cuts. I am certain that this matter will be taken into account fully".

Let us hope that the reassuring words of the member for Davenport, who is surely full of good intentions, will be heard by the Treasury Board Secretariat, because the auditor general expressed concern in that regard, following his discussions with TBS. Mr. Desautels said: "I want to point out that, in spite of the additional resources made necessary by the amendments to the Auditor General Act, in 1997–98, the office will have reduced its budget by some $7 million per year". Again, there is a contradiction.

There is another provision in the bill which should be looked at, namely the requirements of responding to petitions received by the auditor general about federal environmental matters in the context of sustainable development. Clause 22 of the bill states how these petitions will be dealt with. This clause reads as follows:

(1) Where the Auditor General receives a petition in writing from a resident of Canada about an environmental matter in the context of sustainable development that is the responsibility of a category I department, the Auditor General shall make a record of the petition and forward the petition within fifteen days after the day on which it is received to the appropriate Minister for the department.

(2) Within fifteen days after the day on which the Minister receives the petition from the Auditor General, the Minister shall send to the person who made the petition an acknowledgment of receipt of the petition and shall send a copy of the acknowledgment to the Auditor General.

(3) The Minister shall consider the petition and send to the person who made it a reply that responds to it, and shall send a copy of the reply to the Auditor General, within

(a) one hundred and twenty days after the day on which the Minister receives the petition from the Auditor General; or

(b) any longer time, when the Minister personally, within those one hundred and twenty days, notifies the person who made the petition that it is not possible to reply within those one hundred and twenty days and sends a copy of that notification to the Auditor General.

(4) Where the petition is from more than one person, it is sufficient for the Minister to send the acknowledgment and reply, and the notification, if any, to one or more of the petitioners rather than to all of them.

I would have much more to say on petitions, Madam Speaker, but you are signalling that my time is up.

To sum up, I would like to say this. We will be voting against this bill for very specific reasons, in spite of the fact that we had originally requested a position of commissioner to the environment be established.

The auditor general tells us his basic problem is that he does not believe that he will be able to fulfil this mandate adequately. He also tells us that the government's leadership in this matter is more important that his. And so far, on every issue—whether it is the Irving Whale or the Berlin agreements on greenhouse effect—the Minister of the Environment has failed to show the leadership required to allow us to believe with any degree of certainly that the commissioner of the environment would have any real power.

Third and last, I note also the very clear picture that my colleague the hon. member for Laurentides has painted for us in her quite accurate analysis of clause 21.1, which does invade areas of provincial jurisdiction.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: the hon. member for Brampton—unemployment.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, the speakers on this bill from here on in will speak pursuant to Standing Order 43(2). In other words, they will be sharing their time.

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am truly delighted to rise to speak in support of Bill C–83, an act to amend the Auditor General Act. This act will create for Canada a commissioner for the environment and sustainable development.

I am particularly delighted in this case because this is a clear example of us fulfilling a commitment we made to Canadians in the red book, which was the basis of our election campaign. We said then that we would move Canada toward sustainable development. This bill is a very concrete step in that direction.

In the red book we recognized that there is no separation between a national environmental agenda and a national economic agenda. Since assuming office we have tried to implement that belief wherever possible. We have implemented it in our approach to planning and decision making within government. We have tried to integrate economic matters, social matters and environmental considerations. We understand that all these aspects of sustainable development can and must be co–ordinated to give Canadians what they want: a prosperous and healthy country in which we, our children, and our children's children can work to achieve our aspirations.

Environmental sustainable development must be an integral part of decision making in all federal departments. That means that decisions on new policies, programs, regulations, and laws as well as decisions on existing ones, must take that into account. It also includes decisions on how departments manage their buildings, facilities, and operations.

Strategies of sustainable development are a key part of Bill C–83. These strategies will take sustainable development from a concept to a real practice across all federal departments. Each minister will be required to table a sustainable development strategy for his or her department in the House within two years of the coming into force of this legislation.

By legal definition, sustainable development strategies must be results oriented. Each strategy will include the department's objectives and plans of action to obtain those objectives. Every minister will in fact become a sustainable development minister.

We all now realize that sustainable development is not the sole responsibility of the environment minister. It is the responsibility of all ministers and indeed of us all as Canadians. As the parliamentary secretary said earlier, in an ideal world we would not need a Ministry of the Environment to monitor sustainable development in Canada because it should be the concern of all of us and of all ministries.

These departmental strategies will also assist the new environmental and sustainable development commissioner in monitoring and reporting on the government's performance. The stated objectives and action plans will serve as meaningful and measurable benchmarks against which to assess each department's performance in making the shift to sustainable development.

Departments are committed to developing their sustainable development strategies and establishing their goals and action plans in an open manner, working with all interested parties.

This will help to ensure that the departments establish meaningful and challenging targets.

In June the government released a guide to green government, which was endorsed by the Prime Minister and all ministers. The guide will assist federal departments and their stakeholders in the preparation of their sustainable development strategies.

Federal government departments differ in their mandates and in their abilities to influence Canada's sustainable development prospects. As a result, their strategies will differ, but clearly together they must present a coherent and consistent government approach to sustainable development.

Sustainable development is an evolving concept. Indeed, our understanding of sustainable development has evolved considerably in the past few years and it will continue to evolve as we grasp a further understanding of what it means as we move to operationalize it.

The guide I mentioned provides core concepts and principles underlying sustainable development as a starting point. The concepts and principles will likely continue to evolve over time and perhaps new concepts and principles will emerge.

Bill C–83 requires departments to update their sustainable development strategies and requires responsible ministers to table the updates in the House every three years. This allows the evolving nature of sustainable development and the lessons learned from operationalizing it to continually be incorporated into the strategies.

Another key aspect of Bill C–83 is the appointment of a commissioner of the environment and sustainable development within the office of the auditor general. The commissioner will assist the auditor general in performing general auditing duties. He or she will also report annually to the House on any matter concerning sustainable development that he or she considers merits the attention of the House. The commissioner will not only strengthen the work of the office of the auditor general on the environment and sustainable development, he or she will also enhance the federal government's accountability for its actions or its inaction on the environment and sustainable development.

We are the first major country to build sustainable development into our economy in this way. It is becoming increasingly clear that those economies that take environmental costs into account are in fact the most efficient of modern economies.

Bill C–83 establishes a framework for sustainability across all federal departments and enhances the government's accountability to the House for its progress on sustainable development. We are not afraid of being held accountable in this way because we are building a record of accomplishments, a record of which we are proud.

Bill C–83 will have far reaching implications within the government and within our society as a whole. It will move Canada forward along the path from talking about sustainability to acting sustainably. I look forward to the speedy passage of this important legislation.

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–83.

The Standing Committee on Environment and Sustainable Development took on the task of examining the government's commitment to establish an environmental equivalent of the auditor general. This was in fact a key red book commitment. It is an idea that has been discussed and debated for many years. It is also an idea the government is making a reality in short order.

The committee heard from many stakeholders representing a wide range of interests and opinions. Their testimony provided important insights into what must be done for Canada to achieve sustainable development.

The committee in preparing its report and the government in proposing Bill C–83 have paid careful attention to the message of stakeholders. The committee submitted its report in May of last year and the government responded just over a year ago. Its response was aimed at integrating economic, environmental and social factors in federal planning and decision making across all departments, just what the stakeholders had asked for.

Key aspects of that response include the amendments to the Auditor General Act with which we are involved today. The amendments would provide openness, transparency and leadership by government on sustainable development and continued action to make sustainable development a real practice throughout the federal government. Bill C–83 is central to integrating the environmental and sustainable development in government planning decisions across all federal government departments.

Last year I had the pleasure of being part of the Special Joint Committee for the Review of Canada's Foreign Policy. For the first time as part of a review of foreign policy one of the areas we looked at was sustainable development and the environment. We can see more and more these days how much environmental issues are international matters.

The hon. member for Peace River is here today. He was also a part of that review. It was a very interesting process. I was pleased that for the first time as a committee we recognized in our report that the federal government should include as a major plank of its foreign policy the promotion of sustainable development around the world.

Why is it important for us to make environmental matters and sustainable development more of a priority in government? One reason is that we live in a world of limited measurable natural resources.

I asked a friend of mine, a professor of geography in Halifax, if we could measure the atmosphere, the amount of air around the world. He checked with a friend in a specialized area who was more knowledgeable on the particular topic and told me there were approximately five quadrillion tonnes of atmosphere around the world. That is about one one–millionth of the total mass of the earth. Twenty–one per cent of the atmosphere is oxygen.

It is measurable and finite which means that it is limited. There is not always lots more where that came from. We have to recognize therefore that if we can measure it and if we can limit it, we can also destroy it. We can damage it. That is a very important point to realize in thinking about the environment and the world we live in.

This is the only planet we know of that will sustain and support life. That is an important point too. If we damage this one we do not have another one to go to. It is unrealistic to think we can choose some other world or that we will have some way to transport billions of people to some other planet where we can survive if we damage this one.

There is a very narrow range of conditions in which life can exist, particularly human life. Is it possible for us as human beings to actually alter or change the conditions which sustain human life? It seems to me the answer to that question is yes. We now have solid evidence that we actually have changed the conditions. We are having an impact on the conditions.

This year 2,000 leading world experts on climate change came to the conclusion and agreed, after years of debating it and not being ready to agree, that human activity contributes to global warming. We are affecting climate change. We are moving in the narrow range within which we can actually sustain human life. We should be aware of that very important point.

The planet has a limited ability to support human life. Researchers at Cornell University in the U.S. determined in a study that the earth's biosphere could only produce enough renewable resources, food, fresh water and fish, to sustain about two billion people at European standards. That is not North American standards and we should know the difference. If members know much about how Europeans live, they will know they are less wasteful of resources. They tend to follow the three *r*s of reducing, reusing and recycling a little more than we do. They have done it for quite a while. They have a head start on the three *r*s that are so important for the environment. I hope we can follow their example and catch up quickly.

Not only in Europe but in North America we have to change our practices to try to follow the three *r*s of reducing our consumption; reusing our receptacles for pop, bottles of various kinds and other containers; and reducing the amount of packaging of products. Often we buy products with a lot more packaging than is required. I understand marketing problems but somehow marketers have to take into account environmental issues and find ways to market with less packaging.

The whole issue of sustainable development is a new issue in foreign policy and newer one in domestic policy. Today it must be a core issue in our domestic as well as foreign policy. Sustainable development is about integrating environmental, economic and social values into decision making. That is very important for our future. If we do not include all three in deciding what will be sustainable for us in the future, how we will live in a sustainable manner and how we will support social and other programs in a sustainable manner, we have big problems. We need to think about how much we value the environment, society and the people in it and the economy. We must consider all these points and not one at the exclusion of others.

When thinking of the environment we must think about how much are interests are endangered. If we realize that we live in a very narrow range of conditions that can support human life and that we can actually affect those conditions, change them and move them outside that range, we realize our interests are in danger.

One great problem for us is to determine how to move toward goals of greater employment that are so important and at the same time deal with tremendous challenges in the environment. That is a major challenge of the next 50 years but I hope we manage to deal with it sooner than that.

Should we increase our emphasis on sustainable development? Clearly the answer is yes. We have done it in foreign policy. We are now doing it by creating a role within the auditor general's office for a commissioner who will report directly to the auditor general and will file a report annually on how the government and all departments are doing in environmental matters. It is very important to keep the government's feet to the fire on environmental matters to make sure it lives up to its responsibilities to promote sustainable development in every aspect of its activities.

I was very pleased to speak on the bill and I urge all members to give it speedy passage.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

A while ago I invoked Standing Order 43(2). It is my understanding that the member for Davenport would perhaps like to speak slightly more than 10 minutes, if the House has no objection, with the understanding that it would conclude the speakers on the government side.

Perhaps he will speak more than 10 minutes. On the other hand there will be no other speakers so the effect will be the same, if the House agrees.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is that agreed?

• (1640)

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the debate this afternoon has developed along five major areas of discussion as raised by opposition members.

The first area is whether the independence of the auditor general is in question as a result of the bill. The answer to that question is that it is not. The independence of the auditor general is maintained, is reinforced and is in full tradition developed by the House over the decades.

The second area concerns whether the bill adds an additional layer of bureaucracy and a cost that is unwarranted. Again the answer is no. It is actually a recommendation. As some members of the opposition have indicated, the bill reflects the recommendations made in committee by several members of the opposition to the effect that the measures should be as tight and as task oriented as possible with no unnecessary bureaucracy added to the existing one.

The third area is whether there is intrusion into provincial jurisdiction. This concern has been raised by different speakers this afternoon. The answer is simply no, there is no intrusion envisioned. No passage of the bill can be interpreted as an intrusion into provincial jurisdiction. I will elaborate on that later.

The fourth area raised deals with whether there is an ombudsman role for the proposed commissioner of sustainable development. The answer is probably yes for reasons I will elaborate in a moment.

The final area is whether the bill is in harmony with federal–provincial relations. The answer is also a very positive yes.

The member for Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies referred to the appearance of the auditor general before the committee. He did us a good service because he reminded us of the important and delicate role the auditor general has to perform. He has to examine the way in which policies are implemented but he does not comment on the policy. We fully agree with that interpretation of the role of the auditor general, as the hon. member for Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies has stressed. The bill correctly provides for the power to check on the manner in which policies are carried out but not on the content of the policies. The distinction is extremely important and we all agree on it.

What will this commissioner do? The commissioner will measure the performance of each federal department's plan. The commissioner will seek and request that the plan be updated every three years.

Who will prepare the plans? It will be the departments themselves. Some will prepare advanced plans. Presumably the Department of the Environment will want to prove that it is the best. Others will produce less ambitious plans. However the role of the commissioner will be to measure performance against the plan prepared by each federal department.

The word federal cannot be underlined a sufficient number of times. We are talking here about federal jurisdiction and no other jurisdiction. As I said, the plans will be updated every three years to improve their quality. We will learn to walk before we are able to run.

The parliamentary secretary was quoted by the member for Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies as having said in the earlier debate that the commissioner would act as an ombudsman. The answer is yes. The commissioner will monitor the minister's replies to petitions. In that sense the commissioner will perform the role of ombudsman. The commissioner will also monitor the extent to which departments implement the action plans and departmental strategies, as I mentioned before, and report annually to the Chamber.

• (1645)

In that sense alone the commissioner on behalf of the public will report to the public through the Chamber; a beautiful role and the quintessence of democratic accountability.

The member for New Westminster—Burnaby started his intervention by saying his party supports the general concept but criticizes it because "this will be money spent on status building trappings".

The reality of Bill C–83 is that it is exactly the opposite. This commissioner will not be a status building bureaucrat. This individual will be the right hand of the auditor general and will report to the auditor general. The commissioner will be functioning on all matters related to sustainable development within the office of the auditor general. Therefore the commissioner will be performing in the best sense of the word by doing the most with the least possible budgetary requirements. Instead of creating a separate office the commissioner will be performing and expanding a role which the auditor general has initiated in recent times.

When he appeared before our committee the auditor general did say that some 7 or 8 per cent of his activities and budgetary resources are already devoted to environment and sustainable development matters.

The commissioner will somehow strengthen, widen and build on this role that evidently needs to be given statutory recognition and some resources in order to perform a job which the auditor general cannot perform with the resources available at the present time.

We have somehow come up with a very clever solution that does accommodate the desire to keep budgetary expenses to a minimum and at the same time permits us to assume an additional role, ensuring the federal jurisdiction does implement its commitment to the sustainable development goal we all have heard about.

Does Bill C–83 add new levels of bureaucracy? The answer is no. Is Bill C–83 a cost effective piece of legislation? Most definitely yes. Will the commissioner be as independent as he or she should be? The answer is yes because the commissioner operates within the independent office of the auditor general. Therefore political pressures are out of the question.

The criticism, which we always take seriously, saying Bill C–83 tries to add bureaucracy and is costly and politically oriented is not founded. Therefore it is important we set the record straight.

Then we come to the member for Laurentides, evidently preoccupied with federal–provincial relations. I do not know whether I could convince her, even if I were to repeat until midnight that there is no provincial interference in this bill. Evidently we have reached the point at which this argument can no longer follow a logical path.

I assure the hon. member for Laurentides there is no danger of interference. There will be neither short term nor long term negative effects on Quebec. There is no danger to the environment of Quebec.

The government does not want to impose itself on provincial jurisdiction. The province of Ontario, which has already an equivalent commissioner for sustainable development, not only did not object to this initiative, it sent its commissioner to appear before the committee. She gave the committee good advice.

If Ontario does not object, why should Quebec? No other province has objected. No other jurisdiction has said anything. I do not recall receiving a letter from the Government of Quebec objecting to Bill C–83 not only during the debate but since the bill was introduced in the House.

The hon. member for Laurentides said her party was far more concerned with the environment than the Liberal Party. I am glad to hear that. If that is the case, I invite the Bloc Quebecois to support the bill, a bill to protect the environment. A good member of Parliament from the province of Quebec should be glad to see any measures which improve the overall quality of the environment because, as we know, environmental issues know no boundaries. The better the entire North American continent performs in economic and environmental matters and in their integration, the better will be the health of the entire population. There is everything to be gained.

With respect to duplications, to my knowledge there is no duplication to be afraid of. On the contrary, there can be a very substantial and significant integration between the role of a provincial commissioner for sustainable development who operates within provincial jurisdiction and the federal commissioner.

Evidently the hon. member for Laurentides is blind to the fact that there is a federal territory. There is the north. Therefore the commissioner will be responsible for what happens on federal lands. Federal lands are quite extensive north of 60.

It is unfortunate both members of the Bloc Quebecois could not resist the temptation to launch personal accusations against the Minister of the Environment. It has now become a permanent habit. I do not want to comment further on the matter except to say what I said on Monday, that we have the best environment minister we have ever had. She has taken very courageous stands. She is the first environment minister who has taken the matter of the Irving Whale to heart and begun to do something about it. I do not recall an initiative by the leader of the Bloc Quebecois when he was Minister of the Environment with the previous Conservative government.

I found it amusing when the hon. member for Laurentides objected to section 21(1). She went over each of the points which outlined the purpose of the commissioner. When she reached point (d), meeting international obligations, she said the provinces are never consulted or told about Canada's commitments. That is not true. The provinces are always consulted before the government makes an international commitment. Not only that, in almost every Canadian delegation travelling to an international gathering there is a representative of Quebec or representatives of more than one province. In almost every international delegation the member for Laurentides will not be able to prove that Quebec is not represented.

The amusing part on the point she objected to so much about international obligations, which has to do with the question of the commitment taken by Canada on carbon dioxide, is that it was her leader, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois in 1991 in Bergen, who committed Canada to the question of reducing carbon dioxide emissions. It was he who did it on behalf of Canada.

Today we have this absurdity of the hon. member for Laurentides objecting to an initiative taken by her own leader in 1991. What a sham.

Let us move to point (a) of 21(1). The member for Laurentides says the integration of the environment and the economy will work against the provincial jurisdiction because of procurement policies. This is quite an acrobatic leap of logic, if it can be described that way. The integration of the environment and the economy will be measured within the performance of that particular department.

The member for Laurentides was not a member of the committee when we wrote that report, that is true, so one cannot expect her to know the report well. At least she should know how the bill applies in practice. It will be applied within the performance of a plan prepared by the department. That plan will be submitted to the House of Commons every year for comments. To bring in this red herring of procurement policies is an unusual feat of imagination.

The member for Laurentides also objects to the second principle, the one of protecting the health of Canadians. The health of Canadians is not just a provincial responsibility. We protect the health of Canadians at the border. We protect the health of Canadians in interprovincial matters. No one has the monopoly, and the role of the provinces is extremely important and complements the federal jurisdiction.

It is quite interesting that three weeks ago in Jakarta, Canada managed to obtain the acceptance of Montreal as the winning city in a competition for the biodiversity commission, a remarkable breakthrough in relation to the acceptance and the reputation of Canada abroad in matters related to the environment.

Time is running out and therefore I am not able to deal with the other items that have been objected to by the member for Laurentides in sustainable development. I can only confirm that from preventing pollution to promoting equity, these are not the monopoly of the provinces. These are not the monopoly of the federal government. These are broad concepts that can be adopted by any level of government for the benefit of the public and for the long term benefit of the population, no matter where people live.

Let me put on record, since our international reputation was criticized earlier, what the OECD said in its report a couple of weeks ago. It praised the environmental assessment process. It praised the environmental analysis of legislation we carry out from time to time. It praised the round tables on the economy and environment. Last but not least, it praised the proposed commissioner of environment and sustainable development.

This bill has made it as far as Paris and it has received the support of the international community. It cannot be that bad.

• (1700)

If the Bloc Quebecois members want to live with their heads in the sand and ignore the reality of life in the larger world, that is their choice, but it certainly does not project a proactive, open and intelligent aura.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until Monday, November 27 at the ordinary hour of daily adjournment, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe you would find unanimous consent to further defer the said vote until Tuesday, November 28 at the conclusion of Government Orders.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, if you were to seek it I believe you would find unanimous consent to call it 6.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Madam Speaker, this government's foreign policy includes the commitment to create jobs for Canadians through international trade.

From time to time the government grants export credits to other countries in order to promote investment in Canada. This is a very aggressive means of creating Canadian jobs through international trade. Such a bold policy must be carefully monitored.

Edmund Burke once wrote it is the nature of all greatness not to be exact, and great trade will always be attended with considerable abuses. It is the role of government to identify and minimize these abuses. My purpose today is to identify one aspect in the administration of Canada's trade policy that has led to the loss of many valuable Canadian jobs.

Through the Government of Canada Canadian taxpayers gave an export credit in the order of $200 million to Guangdong province during a visit by a delegation to Ottawa in April 1993. In November of 1994 Nortel announced that it had finalized an agreement with Guangdong province to manufacture and install switching equipment in China. The value of the contract was $200 million. The impact of this agreement was swift and devastating. In March of this year Nortel announced that it was laying off 580 Canadians at its Brampton plant, which brings the total number of jobs lost since 1994 at that plant alone to 1,300. At the same time, Nortel announced it would add 3,000 manufacturing jobs to its plant in Guangdong province over the next three years.

I want to be clear that my quarrel is not with Nortel. Although I am not at all happy that 1,300 jobs have been lost in my riding, I recognize that Nortel's concern is ultimately the bottom line. Its present circumstance confirms it is reacting to market conditions, as Canadian sales have declined while export sales have increased dramatically.

A recent issue of "Report on Business" described the countless hours Nortel invested in winning this contract. Even the first challenge faced by Nortel was a difficult one.

After signing a memorandum of understanding in December 1992, Chinese officials became upset that Canadian parliamentarians were expressing their concerns about human rights violations by the Chinese government. Chinese officials threatened to walk away from further negotiations. Nortel responded by telling Chinese officials that they were with Nortel U.S., not Nortel Canada. Having distanced themselves from Canadian parliamentarians, Nortel finalized this deal a little less than two years later.

This is a valuable case study for parliamentarians. It clearly demonstrates that export credits must be accompanied by assurances that jobs are created in Canada rather than in low wage economies. The focus of job creation through international trade must remain fixed on Canada. The government must move swiftly to ensure strong Canadian labour content in export assistance programs. A strong first step would be to reverse the recent reduction in the Export Development Corporation's Canadian labour content requirements.

We made a commitment to Canadians that we will promote job creation through international trade. This is a commitment we must keep.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): The Canadian telecommunication equipment industry is one of the shining stars in Canada's high technology galaxy. It accounts for 21 per cent of business enterprise research and development undertaken in Canada and is a major employer of university scientific technology graduates. It is a major earner of export revenues. Typically, the small to medium sized enterprises in this business export 90 per cent of their products.

Worldwide, the industry is dominated by a small number of very large corporations that were established on the basis of serving national or regional markets. With the fundamental changes that are taking place in the provision of communications services world wide, the equipment industry is undergoing massive changes of globalization and restructuring. Canada is fortunate that one of these developing global players is based in Canada and maintains its headquarters and large portions of its research and development and manufacturing here. A consequence of these benefits is constant restructuring.

I am certainly sympathetic with the plight of the workers being displaced by Northern Telecom's decision to transfer manufacturing out of its Bramalea facility and convert it into the corporate world headquarters. I know the important role these workers played in building the product that was responsible in large part for the modernization of the Canadian telecom infrastructure and for taking Canada's reputation as a source of quality advanced telecom equipment around the world. I wish them the best as they adjust to their new circumstances. I am pleased that much of the work done in Bramalea is staying in Canada and that job growth is continuing in other areas of the industry.

Sustained success in this business for Northern Telecom and for other firms that comprise the Canadian telecom equipment industry is through access to foreign markets. It is important that we in Canada provide a competitive environment from which to supply the world market.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), a motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

BANK ACT

Hon. Douglas Peters (for the Minister of Finance, Lib.) moved that Bill C–100, an act to amend, enact and repeal certain laws relating to financial institutions, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to launch second reading debate on Bill C–100. The legislation offers concrete, well considered measures to further enhance the safety and soundness of Canada's financial system.

These measures are the culmination of an extensive consultation process. I take this opportunity to extend the government's thanks to the many industry participants and other stakeholders who provided constructive insightful advice and to the Senate committee for its extensive hearings and report. As well I express appreciation to the Standing Committee on Finance for its decision to hold advance hearings on Bill C–100 during the summer parliamentary recess.

The presentations received by the committee were invaluable groundwork for effective clause by clause review of this wide ranging package. It will ensure that the legislation we approve will fulfil the best interests of consumers, financial institutions and their stakeholders, as well as the Canadian economy.

There is no question that sound, secure financial institutions are a fundamental requirement for national economic well–being.

Canada is blessed with a world class system. The financial sector is very much a part of a world of dramatic, accelerating change driven by new technology, by surging globalization, by new consumer demands and by heightened competition. That is why we are introducing the legislation now rather than waiting for the mandate in the 1997 review of financial regulations.

As I said in many forums, we are acting now not because the system is broken, and it surely is not, but to maintain a dynamic, competitive system. We must do our part to help it evolve with market trends and respond to recent experiences. That is why Bill C–100, dedicated to safety and soundness, responds to our experiences with financial institutions that have recently failed.

The changes in Bill C–100 are not patchwork nor band–aid measures. They flow from a series of basic principles outlined in the white paper we issued last February. They include that the ownership of a financial institution is a privilege and not a right, that it is preferable to have early intervention and resolution of institutions experiencing difficulty, that financial institutions must operate with sufficient incentives to solve their problems in a timely manner, and that there must be appropriate accountability and transparency in the system.

The first principle, that ownership of a financial institution is a privilege and not a right, is virtually a given, but good principles are worth reiterating from time to time. More important, we believe the principle leads to an important corollary. In certain circumstances it may mean that the interests of depositors, policyholders and creditors will take priority over the interest of shareholders.

This is why we believe it is necessary to provide the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, OSFI, with the new powers needed to resolve a troubled firm's problems early on. Financial institutions need incentives to manage their risks adequately. When an institution fails to manage its risks and experiences financial difficulty, it is then to the advantage of depositors, policyholders and creditors of the company to have the situation resolved promptly.

This would not necessarily mean that the institution would be closed. For example, the institution could develop a plan to implement changes that would solve its problems. The simple fact is that early resolution is likely the best way to prevent substantial losses to depositors, policyholders, creditors and potentially shareholders.

The legislation stakes out the clear position that if an institution is facing difficulty owners do not have the right to continue in business until they hit the brick wall and cannot pay liabilities as they come due. This leads to another closely related point. Our regulatory approach must recognize that the failure of a financial institution does not in and of itself represent a failure of the supervisory system.

In a vibrant, competitive marketplace firms can and do fail. No system can forestall every institutional failure unless it is given the authority and the resources to oversee all management decisions and unless institutions are severely restricted in the loans and investments they can make. Canada could not afford the price of such a failure safe system, even if it did work. My experience of almost 40 years in financial institutions clearly indicates to me that it would not. However, even if it did work, the result would be to strip the industry from contributing to the dynamism, growth and evolution of the economy.

One final principle is the need for transparency of the supervisory system. It is important that financial institutions understand the steps authorities could be expected to take if the financial condition of an institution deteriorates. Furthermore the supervisor must have a clearly defined role.

A new legislative mandate for OSFI notes the importance of OSFI taking prompt action to deal with institutions in trouble. The guide to intervention we have also set out clarifies the actions that could be expected and the role of OSFI and CDIC.

I have highlighted the key principles underlying our proposed legislation. Let me now turn to some of the specifics of Bill C–100. The legislation includes amendments to what are collectively referred to as the financial institution statutes including the Bank Act, the Trust and Loan Companies Act, the Insurance Companies Act and the Co–Operative Credit Associations Act.

A key thrust of the new regime as highlighted is to allow the superintendent, where circumstances warrant, to take control of a troubled institution earlier than at present including the authority to close an institution before its capital is depleted.

The function of the Minister of Finance will also be affected. He or she will no longer have to come to an independent view of the solvency of an institution. The legislation places this responsibility more appropriately in the hands of the regulator involved with the day to day activities of the instutition.

Other changes are being made to move responsibility for approving matters of a more technical, supervisory nature from the minister to the superintendent. The minister, however, will continue to play a key controlling part in the process with final responsibility to determine whether or not it is in the public interest to close an institution.

Increasing OSFI's scope for early intervention provides an incentive for problem prevention, not just a means of resolution. Under the proposed legislation troubled financial institutions will understand that OSFI will take action if its concerns are not dealt with promptly.

Another important element of Bill C–100 deals with information, which is a critical commodity for effective public and regulatory decision making. That is why we are amending the statutes to facilitate the release by federal financial institutions and by OSFI of more information on the financial condition of institutions. I do not, however, believe that financial institutions or OSFI should disclose information regarding regulatory actions. Doing so could create self–fulfilling prophecies with detrimental consequences for the institutions.

I emphasize that OSFI's role is not and cannot be to micro manage financial institutions. Nor do we deploy an army of examiners to scrutinize federal financial institutions. That is why we must place constant emphasis on corporate governance. The boards of directors are on the frontlines ensuring problem prevention and good management. Bill C–100 takes important steps to strengthen the effective, independent corporate governance that is a vital part of strong, prudential framework.

First, the legislation proposes that the superintendent will have the power to designate certain directors as affiliated for purposes of the requirement that one–third of directors of an institution be unaffiliated.

Second, the legislation proposes changes that will prevent the board of a financial institution from being identical to an unregulated parent firm. This will help ensure there are directors of a regulated institution who will focus primarily on the institution's interests.

Third, the legislation will empower the superintendent to veto the appointment of directors and senior officers of troubled institutions.

Legislative amendments are being made for insurance companies so that the superintendent can employ the services of an external actuary at the company's expense in certain circumstances. There will also be a separation of the function of corporate chief actuary from certain other executive positions to avoid potential conflicts. OSFI will have the explicit authority to develop standards of sound business and financial practices for insurance companies.

Now let me turn to the amendments that Bill C–100 makes to the Winding–up Act. As part of the early intervention policy these amendments will provide additional grounds for obtaining a winding–up order for a financial institution.

The act is also being amended to provide more flexibility to restructure, under court supervision, the affairs of insurance companies in liquidation. As a result of these provisions a liquidator will have greater scope to enhance the value within the estate and improve recovery of assets disposed of by the liquidator, all of which will go to the benefit of policy holders.

The principal changes are designed to provide for earlier closure of problem federal financial institutions in cases where this would reduce the loss to consumer stakeholders.

I will touch on a third area of action under Bill C–100, the amendments to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act, or the CDIC act. This is another aspect of our emphasis on the principle of incentives for timely problem solving. The act is being amended to allow the CDIC to develop a system of varying premiums on member institutions based on the risk rating of specific firms, reflecting the risk they could bring to the deposit insurance fund.

The risk rating would provide a clear signal from the CDIC to the company's board of directors and management concerning the level of risk. More important, such an approach will recognize firms for good management.

As well, the government is making changes that will allow the CDIC to act as receiver of an unhealthy member institution's assets and to sell those assets along with a package of liabilities to a healthy institution. This should permit CDIC to obtain more value than it would if the institution was liquidated and its assets sold.

I want to turn to a final important area of change proposed by Bill C–100, which is one dealing with transactions between financial institutions here in Canada and with the rest of the world.

Through this legislation we are proposing a new act, the payment clearings and settlement act. It is designed to ensure that major clearing and settlement systems for financial transactions are designed and operated properly.

By the term "properly" we are addressing two clear concrete objectives. The first objective is to reduce or eliminate systemic risk to the Canadian financial system by ensuring that the failure of one participant in a clearing system will not lead to a domino effect by bringing down other members of a group. Second, it will enhance the international competitiveness of Canada's clearing and settlement systems.

The key components of the legislation are as follows. They will give the Bank of Canada explicit powers in the oversight of clearing and settlement systems that are potential sources of systemic risk. Again I emphasize systemic risk. Systems designated by the bank would be subject to bank oversight.

Second, they will provide the Bank of Canada with the capacity to participate in aspects of these clearing and settlements, such as the large value transfer system, or LVTS, as well as to serve special functions, such as guaranteeing settlement.

Third, they will give statutory recognition to netting arrangements in payments and other clearing and settlement systems in order to ensure that Canadian participants in derivative markets have greater certainty that their transactions will close. This will ultimately mitigate systemic risk.

I want to dispel concerns raised by the Quebec government last August. Systemic risk is an issue internationally and it is the central banks that have led in the development of measures to deal with systemic risk concerns in various fora, such as the Bank for International Settlements, the BIS.

Let me be very clear. The proposed federal legislation is not aimed at, nor will it result in, the regulation of securities markets. The focus of the Bank of Canada's oversight role is very different from that of the provinces. It does not in any way infringe on any province's jurisdiction.

I have talked at some length because this legislation covers much ground and deals with important issues. I believe Bill C–100 will help Canada's financial sector preserve and improve its world class stature to the benefit of all stakeholders and all Canadian citizens.

The measures we have proposed strike a critical balance between on the one hand, protecting the rights of depositors, policyholders and creditors and, on the other hand, facilitating innovation and growth in economic activity.

Canadians expect the government to ensure that their hard earned savings and investments will be well protected. The legislation will ensure we have the best and most efficient regulatory system, one that recognizes the interests of policyholders, depositors and creditors as well as one that promotes dynamic economic growth.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on the subject of Bill C–100, an act to amend, enact and repeal certain laws relating to financial institutions. Permit me first to say that the Bloc Quebecois disagrees with three aspects of Bill C–100.

The objectives of the bill are highly laudable, particularly the one aimed at reducing the potential for systemic risk—the creation of the domino effect—within financial circles. For those who are not familiar with these financial terms, there is potential for systemic risk when one financial institution is unable to meet its obligations and drags the entire financial sector along with it. It is a sort of domino effect where one institution is unable to pay another, the other cannot pay the next, and so on. In short, we end up with a financial catastrophe such as we saw recently in western Canada.

Reducing the potential for systemic risk is highly laudable. However, when it serves as a pretext to slip through the back door into exclusive provincial jurisdiction, and specifically that of Quebec, it is no longer acceptable. I refer here to the securities sector. Securities do not escape from the application of the new provisions on financial institutions. Under subsection 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1982, jurisdiction over the securities sector is a matter for the provinces, for the Government of Quebec.

This jurisdiction, based on the Government of Quebec's exclusive powers over property and civil rights, was confirmed by the case law of the Supreme Court of Canada, which added provincial regulation of the securities market to property and civil rights. It has been clear since 1982. Now the bill is directly targeting the field of securities.

This is strange. We are barely over a constitutional debate, a referendum campaign, in which our colleagues opposite argued: "Yes, we will make certain changes to the system. Yes, we will respect Quebec's jurisdiction. Yes, we will have a good understanding in the future". This is what they told Quebecers, they said: "If you vote no to Quebec sovereignty, things will go well, you will see". A few weeks after the result, Quebec is being treated with arrogance and cynicism with the tabling of a bill such as Bill C–100.

What is more, this bill, in addition to invading Quebec's exclusive jurisdiction, accords unheard of powers to the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance.

I am referring to the provisions on pages 117 and 118 of the bill, which stipulate that the Bank of Canada may enter into an agreement with a clearing house or a participant, or both, in respect of: netting arrangements; risk sharing and risk control mechanisms; certainty of settlement and finality of payment; the nature of financial arrangements among participants; the operational systems and financial soundness of the clearing house.

In addition, the Directives section of the bill provides that, and I quote: "Where the Governor of the Bank is of the opinion that a clearing house or participant is engaging in or is about to engage in any act, omission or course of conduct that results or is likely to result in systemic risk being inadequately controlled—the excuse of systemic risk, or—that the designated clearing and settlement system in respect of the clearing house or participant is operating or is about to operate in a way that results or is likely to result in systemic risk being inadequately controlled, the Governor may issue a directive in writing—not a proposal or suggestion but a written directive—to the clearing house or participant requiring it to cease or refrain from engaging in the act, omission or course of conduct, and perform such acts as in the opinion of the Governor are necessary to remedy the situation".

Do you know what this means? It means that the Governor of the Bank of Canada could issue directives not only to clearing houses but also to participating institutions telling them how to conduct their business. It means that, if the institution is a participant, as specified in this provision, the Governor of the Bank of Canada could tell this institution what to do; it makes no difference whether this institution is a provincially chartered bank or a player in the securities industry.

Under this bill, the Governor of the Bank of Canada may issue directives to a clearing house or a participant. This means that he could—he has the authority to do so—issue directives to an institution like Fiducie Desjardins, Lévesque Beaubien Geoffrion and Leclerc, and Desjardins' central branches for example. These are all provincially chartered institutions in the securities industry. Such an invasion is unacceptable.

I would say that this invasion is even worse than the recent federal invasion in the area of manpower training for example. It is worse in the sense that it touches one of Quebec's sacred cows. It touches an area under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Government of Quebec, as recognized in the Constitution imposed on us by the current Prime Minister in 1982.

It takes a great deal of self–righteousness and cynicism to do something like that.

Mr. Boudria: Thank you for your generosity.

Mr. Loubier: I can hear my Liberal colleagues, and the Liberal whip in particular, scoff at the arguments we are putting forward.

Mr. Boudria: Not at the document, at you.

Mr. Loubier: I would tell the hon. member that his friend Daniel Johnson, in Quebec, Daniel Johnson himself took offence at this federal invasion. Daniel Johnson himself wrote to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, because he found appalling that a bill has been on the table since last year to invade one of Quebec's areas of jurisdiction.

So, Mr. Speaker, when even strong federalists like Daniel Johnson, like the government whip who scoffs at the arguments we put forward, take a stand similar to ours, this goes to show that there is major consensus on this issue in Quebec.

It is a unfortunate that the people across the way show this kind of an attitude. Instead of listening to our arguments and amendment proposals concerning the bill, they poke fun at us. Such an attitude is unacceptable in this House, and it has been going on for about a month, since the end of the referendum campaign.

I do not know if you can do something about it, Mr. Speaker, but I would really like our friends opposite to listen to what we are suggesting instead of acting like they are this morning, throwing arguments without substance at us and mocking us.

Can you call for order, please, Mr. Speaker? He is making me lose my concentration.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Sometimes the House gets somewhat animated and that is understandable. However, following the request made by the hon. member for Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, I am asking for the co–operation of the House, so that members who have the floor can speak in an atmosphere of mutual respect.

Mr. Loubier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is rather unusual to see a whip get involved at this stage.

I was mentioning the powers given to the Bank of Canada regarding clearing and settlement houses. Let me quote the brief recently submitted by the Quebec securities commission: "The powers given to the Bank of Canada regarding the clearing and settlement system would constitute an infringement on the authority given by the Quebec legislator to the securities commission. Most of the powers given to the Bank of Canada are a replica of those delegated to the Quebec securities commission more than 10 years ago. The only difference is that the Bank of Canada's authority, as provided in the schedule to Bill C–100, is based on a desire to control the systemic risk by invoking the national interest, while the authority of the commission relates to the overall market regulations".

If we look at the bill, we see, given the schedule and the new powers delegated to the Bank of Canada, that the bank, through its authority to give directives to a clearing house and a participant, does exactly the same as the securities commission. For example, under Bill C–100, the Bank of Canada would exercise powers which are an integral part of the authority given to the securities commission, such as giving clearing houses and their participants directives akin to an order to do or not do something. Such power is given to the Quebec securities commission through its incorporating act.

"Since the Bank of Canada should be informed of any change in the internal regulations and rules of operation of the clearing houses, this means that it exerts a supervisory power over these changes. The Commission des valeurs mobilières also has the power to approve these modifications. Finally, the Bank of Canada is empowered to inspect clearing houses, which duplicates the power assigned to the Commission". This is a quote from the Commission des valeurs mobilières.

Not only, then, is there encroachment on an area of jurisdiction that belongs exclusively to Quebec, but they have also taken the luxury of creating duplication and overlap in times of austerity budgets, after all we have heard from across the way in that connection. After hearing the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, the Prime Minister himself even, saying that action will be taken to reduce duplication and overlap, now we are presented with a bill that does exactly that, creates a double structure, a double role, that encroaches on an area of Quebec jurisdiction, that makes institutions such as the Bank of Canada duplicate the work of others. It is inadmissible and nearly unbelievable on the one hand, and on the other it creates flagrant inefficiency through overlapping of resources in the area of financial institutions.

As for systemic risk, as I have said, we agree with the objective of reducing it. It is a most praiseworthy objective and one shared by all nations throughout the world. It is, however, a false pretext for giving such a broad and powerful mandate to the Bank of Canada, particularly in an area of jurisdiction that belongs exclusively to Quebec, securities.

All that the government could do to reduce systemic risks would be to improve what is called the large value transfer system, by putting into place an electronic clearing system which will ensure the final character of the clearing transaction, and will make it possible to pay out, perhaps not immediately, but within the day. If the Secretary of State is familiar with such a system—and I am not convinced that he is all that familiar with it, judging by the responses he gave to the finance committee, but let us assume his familiarity—this was specifically one of the recommendations by the internationally renowned group of 30. This was precisely what they said in 1989, that it was necessary to implement and perfect a large value transfer system, so as to reduce the systemic risks on the financial market.

This recommendation by the Group of Thirty was so good that the Governor of the Bank of Canada, speaking to members of the financial community this summer before he appeared before the finance committee on August 15, acknowledged that it was enough to improve the large value transfer system in order to reduce, and in fact, if I remember correctly, he did not say reduce, he said eliminate, in referring to the most ambitious risk taking that went on, more ambitious than most people are prepared to undertake. In other words, to eliminate systemic risks, all we had to do was improve the large value transfer system.

There is no need to intrude on the jurisdictions of the Government of Quebec. There is no need to give the Governor of the Bank of Canada extraordinary powers to issue directives to provincial chartered institutions involved in the securities sector. There is no need to create unnecessary friction between the federal government and the Quebec government. All we have to do is improve the large value transfer system. That is all.

So why does it again boil down to encroaching on one of Quebec's jurisdictions? Why give the Governor of the Bank of Canada considerable powers and take away from the Government of Quebec its power to control the development of the securities sector? Why?

Again, I put this question to the Governor of the Bank of Canada on August 15, but I did not get an answer. I asked him about the difference between the speech he made before the finance committee and the one he made this summer, when he said: "I do not need additional powers; all I need is a better large value transfer system". The debate became very political, and I agreed with the Governor of the Bank of Canada that his role was not that of a politician. However, I think everyone realized that the federal government was again trying to centralize all powers, including prerogatives explicitely recognized under the Constitution Act, 1982.

In fact, as I pointed out earlier, this is not sovereignists against federalists, it is simply a matter of common sense and of respecting the prerogatives of Quebec as conferred on the province by the Constitution. So much so that on February 16, 1994, when the federal government's intentions with respect to financial institutions were already known, and the bill was already on the table, not the bill as such but the proposals to invade the securities sector, Daniel Johnson, the Premier at the time who was to be Premier for a short while yet, wrote to the President of the Privy Council and the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer, to tell them that he disagreed with the bill.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will quote what he said: "Perhaps I may remind you, first of all that the Government of Quebec has never supported an expanded federal role in the securities sector, which is the exclusive responsibility of the provinces". This is not Mr. Campeau or Mrs. Marois but Daniel Johnson when he was Premier of Quebec. I will continue: "In fact, it has regularly indicated it was opposed"—strong language for Mr. Johnson—"to federal initiatives in this respect, as were several other provinces regarding the recent reform of federal legislation on financial institutions, which came into force in June 1992".

I will continue this quote from Mr. Johnson's letter: "In the quinquennial report she tabled in the National Assembly last December, the minister responsible for finance reiterated Quebec's concerns about the federal bill to regulate the securities sector which would be part of this legislation. She stressed that federal regulations would be inappropriate, both constitutionally and from the point of view of efficiency". This still according to Mr. Johnson, a staunch federalist, who in this letter warned the federal government against meddling with the securities sector, which is Quebec's exclusive responsibility.

To continue with the letter from Mr. Johnson, who is still a federalist today: "Such regulations would mean duplicating both existing regulations and the supervision involved and would inevitably add to the administrative and financial burden on issuers, investors and intermediaries". Mr. Johnson goes on to say the following: "If the purpose is to reduce duplication and improve efficiency, it seems to me it hardly makes sense to create a new structure and additional regulations".

As I said before, if the Bloc Quebecois and Daniel Johnson agree, it is because a broad consensus exists in Quebec.

• (1040)

The federal government must amend its bill in order to withdraw from the area of securities, which is a field of exclusive jurisdiction for the Quebec government. This is the unanimous feeling in Quebec. It must not invade this area. It must not give the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance new powers to issue directives not only to clearing houses, but also to participating institutions or establishments.

It must not give the Governor of the Bank of Canada powers to issue directives to the Fiducie Desjardins, for instance, or Lévesque Beaubien Geoffrion and Leclerc, or the Caisses centrales Desjardins. This is none of its business. This is the Bloc's position in this matter.

The Quebec finance minister is still waiting for an answer to a letter he sent the Minister of Finance on August 15. No abuse. The Quebec government does not need the kind of abuse it got from the Minister of Finance the day after he received the letter. All the Quebec government wants is explanations, assurances and changes to Bill C–100.

To this day, these basic requests have remained unanswered by the federal government. This is not normal, especially since federalists claim to be open to reforms and willing to foster greater harmony between Quebec and the federal government, and eliminate inefficiencies and duplications. Between words and actions, there is a big gap, not to say a huge discrepancy.

There are two other aspects of the bill which annoy the official opposition. The second aspect of Bill C–100 with which Quebec has a serious problem is clause 133, the clause dealing with the Winding–up Act. The notion of insolvency is broadened—we acknowledge that it is an area of exclusive federal jurisdiction—but by broadening it once again the federal does not take into account the role of a major player in Quebec, namely the inspector general of Quebec financial institutions.

I can hear them laughing and mocking on the other side. This is the kind of reaction we have been getting for the last month whenever we tell the truth. the pretence of wanting to increase stability and reduce uncertainty in the financial sector, they added a player and thereby added the possibility for dispute by institutions which could be found wanting by Quebec's Inspecteur général des institutions financières.

That opens the door to disputes which could go all the way to the Supreme Court. Let me give you an example. If the inspector general sees that an institution is not fulfilling its obligations and issues directives that it must follow, and then the institution, with the new bill, the new provisions respecting the Winding–up Act, decides to ignore these directives, it may do so because the bill adds some ambiguity, it adds another player whose objectives and powers are exactly the same as those of the Inspecteur général des institutions financières.

Therefore, they say they want to increase the predictability of the financial market, they want to eliminate uncertainty and reduce systemic risk, but they are adding another element, which could interfere with the decisions and the orientations of Quebec's Inspecteur général des institutions financières.

If this is what they mean by reducing uncertainties, increasing stability, we are no longer on Earth. We are on another planet. With this bill, the federal government is stretching the notion of insolvency, it is creating uncertainty on the financial market and ambiguity in the evolution of institutions in the financial sector, which could adversely affect the proper operations of these institutions.

This will not improve anything, this bill does not propose improvements. What the bill proposes, I tell you, is quite harmful. At a time when financial institutions, as everybody knows, need stability and certainty, a federal bill is adding uncertainty to the market. It is adding a nebulous provision, which will deny the Quebec Inspecteur général des institutions financières his exclusive role; his directives will no longer be exclusive. Which directives will financial institutions abide by? Those of the Quebec inspector general or those issued by the federal government under Bill C–100?

The financial sector can do without such ambiguous situations. It is hard enough to manage in this sector without possible challenges over the role of the Quebec Inspecteur général des institutions financières and without added uncertainty.

There is also a third aspect of the bill which raises questions, and this will be my last point. It is on page 11 of the bill where it says: "from now on, premiums payable to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation will be based on a risk factor assessed by the institutions". The principle may be excellent, but once again, they are disregarding a Quebec institution in the area of securities called the Régie de l'assurance–dépôt du Québec, which did not consider necessary to implement this kind of system and was never consulted on the rating system that the federal government is trying to implement through the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

We have mixed feelings about this new rating system, which will set the rate which will apply to a given institution following a risk analysis. Let us take for example Fiducie Desjardins; it is just an example, but let us take this one. About 95 per cent of its deposits are from Quebec and only 5 per cent from the rest of Canada. With this bill, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation would be empowered to give Fiducie Desjardins a bond rating on 5 per cent of its deposits on a Canadian basis. It would issue a rating on only 5 per cent of its deposits.

By issuing a rating on 5 per cent of deposits, this rating becomes a signal for all financial markets, including in Quebec. This signal can be as private as the one given by ratings from agencies such as Moody's, Standard & Poor, Dominion Bond Rating and Canadian Bond Rating. If this rating becomes public—and there is a risk that it will—, that would mean that Fiducie Desjardins, which would have been rated according to the risk associated with 5 per cent of its deposits, would be given this rating for all its deposits. In other words, that would become a risk signal for 100 per cent of Desjardins' deposits. And this risk is very real.

These are the three aspects I wanted to underline and for which we did not get a satisfactory answer from the government when Bill C–100 was tabled this summer. We hope that the analysis that the official opposition has just made will result in valuable answers from the government and that, when Bill C–100 is examined clause by clause, the government will propose amendments to assure us that, first of all, Quebec's exclusive jurisdiction, that is its securities sector, will be respected.

Second, no extraordinary powers must be granted to the Governor of the Bank of Canada just to reduce the systemic risks of issuing guidelines to the clearing houses and the participating institutions. So, no new powers must be granted that would directly infringe upon the powers of the Quebec Securities Commission.

We must also eliminate the new role given to the Deposit Insurance Corporation, which could lead to an increase in financial market concentration and also to a rating that would apply to all deposits made in Quebec institutions, but not just to the deposits made elsewhere in Canada.

Third, the broadening of the concept of insolvency must not be used to circumvent the role of the superintendent of financial institutions in Quebec.

So, these are the three provisions that bother us, and we will try hard to urge the government to amend them. We hope that the government will respond to these three objections made not only by the official opposition, but also by the Government of Quebec and even the leader of the opposition at the National Assembly, Daniel Johnson.

• (1050)

If the government does not apply these amendments, we shall propose, during clause by clause consideration of the bill, amendments to Bill C–100 that will meet respond to these objections.

[English]

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the expressions of the Bloc member are an absolute classic example to the House and to all Canadians that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition fundamentally represents or thinks that it represents 25 per cent of the people resident in Canada.

I took particular note of the fact that the prairie provinces, British Columbia, Ontario and the Atlantic provinces somehow were completely apart from any concern of the so–called official opposition. I find that exceptionally unfortunate.

For the duration of this Parliament the Reform Party has been the national opposition. I will be responding to the bill in light of our concern on behalf of all Canadians no matter where they live, including in the province of Quebec.

I should like to put on the record the Reform Party understanding of the bill. It brings amendments to the Bank Act, Co–Operative Credit Associations Act, Insurance Act and Trust and Loan Companies Act dealing with first, the disclosure of information; second, the elimination of appeals in relation to certain matters; third, the disqualification of persons from becoming officeholders in an institution; fourth, the taking of control of an institution by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions; and, fifth, changes to the duties of the superintendent.

There are also amendments to the Winding–up Act respecting, first, the circumstances and procedures for winding up an institution and, second, a revised part III dealing with the restructuring of insurance companies. There are also amendments to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act. It is this area that I will be addressing in the balance of my speech.

Continuing with our observations, the amendments to CDIC concern, first, the business affairs of the corporation; second, the restructuring of institutions by means of vesting of shares and the corporation becoming a receiver; third, the assessment and collection of deposit insurance premiums; and, fourth, the enforcement of the act.

As I mentioned, the amendments to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act is the primary concern of the Reform Party. The bill is as a result of the government's review of the safety of financial institutions. It follows upon failures of a number of financial institutions and is the government's response to concerns regarding financial institutions. We also note that the bill is a prelude to the Bank Act review scheduled for 1997 that promises to be much wider in scope.

I have been approached in my office by a number of people with respect to the Bank Act review. There is much concern on the part of businesses with respect to the encroachment or the potential further encroachment of the chartered banks into the insurance business. I look forward to the review in 1997.

As I noted at the start of my speech, the Bloc Quebecois is being irresponsible in its position as official opposition in that it is very myopic in taking a look at the concerns of only 25 per cent of Canada's citizens, but I would be remiss if I did not make some comments about the government.

The bill we are speaking to today is important. It concerns the fundamentals of controlling money or at least the affairs surrounding money. Money as the medium of exchange whether it be in Canada or around the world must have government control. We respect that the act is of some value. However, in the context of all other legislation or non–legislation the government has been bringing forward and the way it keeps taking us as parliamentarians through a void of any meaningful legislation, the act although important to Canadians is yet another way of getting around the fact that we should be getting on with other affairs that are important to Canadians rather than simply wasting time on housekeeping issues.

I do not suggest that the act is a waste of time. I am just saying that it falls into the context of avoiding any review of UI, for example. There are all sorts of leaks to the press about what will be happening with UI and about items promised by the government over the last two years about which nothing has happened.

Speaking specifically to the bill, there is a very little difference between the thought processes of the Liberals and the Conservatives. Liberal, Tory, same old story. The same kind of thought processes would come from either of the old line parties. The Liberals are trying to engineer results of the gain. With the act, particularly as it relates to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, they are continuing to attempt to interfere in the natural process in the marketplace. Liberals, as was the case with the Conservatives, want to engineer the results of the gain. They want to make the rules of the game such that they can ensure what the results will be.

Basically this imposes external and extraneous pressure on an international commodity such as the trading medium of money. It brings values into the marketplace that would not be there if it were not for blatant government interference, as is shown in its proposals relative to the CDIC.

It makes me think a lot of the way that the Liberals and their predecessors, the Tories, have gone about interfering in the marketplace in the area of regional development and regional development grants. There is an absolute parallel between regional development and the way they are looking at the CDIC amendments.

In regional development we see countless Canadian dollars going into marketplaces under western economic diversification, FORD–Q, ACOA or any other program. The Canadian taxpayers' money squandered through these programs basically ends up distorting the marketplace. Why? It is because most frequently they end up supporting non–competitive companies that cannot make it on their own. There is no natural cleansing process to the marketplace. The biggest problem that creates is distortion or disadvantage for the firms that are competitive.

It is tremendously ironic that the competitive, healthy firms are paying the taxes. Their taxes are being taken in by big government, by the Liberals, and in turn are being put into firms that are less competitive, thereby creating competition for the firms that are competitive. The bottom line is that it costs taxpayers lots and lots of money.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but it being 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30 the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

The hon. member for Kootenay East will have his remaining time after question period and daily routine of business.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

[English]

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq, Lib.):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

This week the newly elected members of the Northwest Territories Legislative Assembly selected their government leader and cabinet. Of the eight–member cabinet, four are from the Eastern Arctic and four are from the west. There is one female, and there is Inuit, Dene, and Métis representation in the cabinet.

Congratulations to veteran MLA and former cabinet minister Don Morin as the new premier of the Northwest Territories. I congratulate as well John Todd, Kelvin Ng, Manitok Thompson, Goo Arlooktoo, Jim Antoine, Charles Dent, and Stephen Kakfwi as new cabinet ministers.

On behalf of the Government of Canada, I wish the new territorial government well. There are many challenges ahead of us leading up to the division of the territories in 1999. We look forward to working closely and co–operatively with the new government.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we learned this week that the leader of the separatists will soon be leaving the House to become the anointed premier of Quebec. Constituents in my riding will be happy to see his anti–Canada rhetoric exiting the House.

Meanwhile, the other 52 Bloc members appear to be in for the long haul. After all, they did vote in favour of the MPs pension plan and they are very comfortable sitting here receiving their federal salaries and their federal perks at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers.

Most Canadians are sickened at seeing the separatists continue to sit in the House. They have every right to feel that way, because the Bloc is committed to the destruction of Canada.

If constituents in my riding had their way, Bloc members would be dragged kicking and screaming from the House and charged with treason.

The Speaker: Colleagues, we cannot use words taken from another source and repeat them in the House. We have to claim them for our own.

I would like the hon. member to please withdraw the last line of his statement and I would ask him to do so right now.

Mr. Harris: Mr. Speaker, I apologize. I was reflecting the thousands of comments I have heard. If I was out of order in the House, I do withdraw that.

The Speaker: I thank the hon. member, and I would encourage all members of the House to stay away from this type of language, either in statements or in questions. I appreciate very much the hon. member's withdrawing. I do not think it does us any good in the House to use these types of terms.

The hon. member for Victoria—Haliburton.

PAGE PROGRAM

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in each session of Parliament I offer a challenge to the pages who serve us in the House of Commons. The current group was given the challenge of producing a picture of their home area. The contest included a box of Crayola crayons, which are produced in my riding of Victoria—Haliburton in the town of Lindsay, and a single piece of white paper. The contest was judged by Hélène Monette, a security guard in the lobby.

This session's winner is Katheryn Lyons of the Montreal–Kirkland area. Congratulations to all the pages who took part in the contest with such enthusiasm.

If members wish to view the art work, it is on display in the government lobby. The prize is an assortment of Crayola products and a certificate to prove the bragging rights that go with winning any contest.

LINCOLN AND WELLAND REGIMENT

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will be pleased that a clerical oversight that deprived the Lincoln and Welland Regiment of two World War II battle honours has finally been corrected.

• (1105)

Regrettably, the regiment failed to receive honours for the unit's final two battles when scrolls were presented to Canadian military units in 1951. The oversight was recently detected, and scrolls citing exceptional conduct and courage at the Battle of Kusten Canal in April 1945 and the Battle of Bad Zwisehenahn in May 1945 were presented at a reunion for veterans.

Seventy–two men of the regiment died and approximately a hundred more were wounded in these two campaigns. These two scrolls recognizing the regiment's efforts in these two very intense battles during the closing days of the war are proudly placed on the armoury wall beside sixteen others.

Peace and freedom were purchased for us with the sweat, toil, tears and blood of those like the Lincoln and Welland Regiment who walked the road before us. My congratulations go out to the Lincoln and Welland Regiment for this well deserved honour. My sincere appreciation goes out to veterans everywhere.

HANS DAIGELER

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to pay tribute to Mr. Hans Daigeler, who tragically died on November 9, 1995, at the young age of 50 years.

Hans represented the provincial riding of Nepean from 1987 to 1995. He was a very special man, whose basic goodness impacted on all of us who knew him. His loyalty to the riding of Nepean and its people was legion. This commitment permeated his community, his province, and his country through all his interventions in the Ontario provincial legislature.

I knew Hans well. He was both my friend and my provincial Liberal colleague. His memory will live on through the dignity, compassion and justice that he so personified. To his wife Beverly, his son Christopher, and daughters Elyssa and Amanda, I offer my heartfelt sympathy.

We will miss you, my friend.

CP RAIL

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, CP Rail's move enlightens us on the lack of ethics shown by the no side during the referendum campaign. They told Quebecers that a yes vote could lead to a move by CP Rail when the decision had already been made for business purposes only. And two days ago, the Prime Minister added insult to injury when he blamed sovereignists for the move of CP Rail's head office.

To have the Prime Minister tell us that Quebec's economic problems are caused by the sovereignist movement is an insult to all Quebecers who work hard to build a strong Quebec.

The Prime Minister should stop playing politics on the back of Quebecers and support them by addressing the real problems. After all, he is the Prime Minister of all Canadians, including the 49.4 per cent of Quebecers who voted yes in the referendum.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the government spoke with pride about what a great price it is getting for CN Rail shares and how selling them in foreign countries helped to increase that price. What really helped to increase the share price was the amount by which the government reduced CN's debt.

In committee the government talked about reducing CN's debt by approximately $1 billion and that very little if any would actually come from the Canadian taxpayer. In reality, the government reduced CN's debt by $1.4 billion, and all of it came from the taxpayer except for what can be realized from the sale of non–rail real estate assets with a book value of $235 million and no appraisal to the contrary.

This pay–down may well have contributed to the enhanced share price. However, if the government is going to use Canadians' tax dollars to enhance the value of shares, should it not have offered the first chance of those shares to Canadians? As it now stands, 40 per cent of those shares are being sold outside of Canada, despite the fact there appears to be sufficient interest inside Canada. If this government is going to continue to run huge deficits, at least let Canadians be the beneficiary of that debt.

FORESTRY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the management of forest resources in Yukon has been one of the most mismanaged federal issues I have ever seen in my years in Yukon. The lack of a comprehensive forestry policy has resulted in sit-ins, week long demonstrations, and lawsuits. Surely this has to be a wake-up call that all is not well.

The only positive thing that can be said about the federal government's handling of this issue is that its ineptness has managed to unite the politicians of all parties, First Nations, loggers, and a very large percentage of the population. It should do so well on national unity.

Northern affairs has managed to introduce casino logging by calling three lotteries for timber permits and then cancelling them. It has not instituted the promised forestry advisory committee on reforestation and has caused unnecessary expenditures by both First Nations and taxpayers for failing to foresee the possibility of legal action.

The minister of Indian and northern affairs must take charge, do a full review of the management of northern affairs in Yukon, and institute immediately a full and public review of forest policy.

CANADIAN SPORTS HALL OF FAME

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last November 9, six Canadians were inducted into Canada's Sports Hall of Fame: Bob Gainey, who played with the Montreal Canadiens for 16 years and was a key part of five Stanley Cup winning teams; Paul Henderson, who scored the winning goal for the Canadian hockey team in the series of the century against the Soviet Union in 1972; Kerrin-Lee Gartner, who won a gold medal at the 1992 Albertville Olympics in downhill skiing; Mark Tewksbury, who won a gold medal in the 100 metre backstroke event at the Barcelona Olympics in 1992; Paul Dojack, a Canadian Football League official for 24 years, involved in 550 games, including 14 Grey Cups; and Debbie Muir, head coach for our national synchronized swimming team from 1981 to 1991, who shared in the success of Carolyn Waldo, Sylvie Frechette and many others.

Congratulations to the six new members of the Sports Hall of Fame and best of luck to all up and coming athletes, coaches and officials.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, recently the industry committee and Canada's major banks agreed to a set of small business lending standards that will benefit all Canadians. This represents progress for the small business men and women in this country. It is an example of what can be accomplished when industry officials and federal politicians work together to achieve change.

Small business constituents can now insist their lenders adhere to a code of conduct. They can take advantage of an alternative dispute resolution system. They can take complaints to an internal ombudsman, and if they are still not satisfied they will now have access to an independent industry-wide ombudsman as well. Finally, every three months parliamentarians will see the banks' small business borrowing statistics. These standardized statistics will be our tool to monitor progress.

To paraphrase a famous quote, this is not the end of ensuring that the banks will live up to their responsibilities. It is not even the beginning of the end. But it is perhaps the end of the beginning. There is much to be accomplished.

ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Maria Minna (Beaches—Woodbine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the residents of Beaches—Woodbine, in particular Mr. Michael Liebson, for their perseverance in helping to prevent offshore dredging in Lake Ontario. The residents of the Toronto Beaches area are pleased that the Ontario Ministry of Natural Resources has turned down an application to dredge in Lake Ontario.

Bedrock Resources Inc. put in a proposal to the Ontario Ministry of Natural Resources to dredge sand in Lake Ontario off the shores of my riding. The health and environmental issues raised by this proposal were critical. In its correspondence, Environment Canada stated that the quality of the material makes it acceptable for on-land use as aggregate, but it is not acceptable for open water disposal. The proponent will be separating and saving the larger grain size material, while discharging the fine silts and clays back into Lake Ontario. In our view, this is open water disposal. Environment Canada also found that the sediment plume modelling, as conducted by the proponent's consultants, was inadequate.

In addition, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans stated in its correspondence that dredging will result in the harmful alteration, disruption and destruction of fish habitat. As well, in the opinion of the—

PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, during the referendum campaign, the Prime Minister of Canada promised Quebecers that his government would recognize Quebec as a distinct society and give the province the right to veto any constitutional change. He even repeated this promise a few days after the referendum.

But, once again, it was just an empty promise. The Prime Minister, trying to buy time or to make us waste ours, decided two weeks ago to create a phoney committee that has absolutely no substance to it.

The Prime Minister is so troubled by the criticism expressed with regard to this puppet committee that he is now claiming that he never promised anything and that Bloc members are liars. Take some rest, Mr. Prime Minister, and try to regain your memory because you can be sure that Quebecers have not forgotten and will never forget.

The Speaker: My dear colleague, maybe it would be preferable not to use the word "liar" even though it is applied to oneself. I would ask you not to use this word in the House.

FISHERIES

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the fisheries minister said that he consulted the industry when he dreamt up his new tax, but he sure did not listen. Here are just a few of those who wrote in protest to the minister: the Eastern Fishermen's Federation, Southwest Nova Fixed Gear Association, the Fisheries Association of Newfoundland and Labrador, the South West Nova Tuna Association, the New Brunswick Fish Packers' Association, the Fundy Weir Fishermen's Association Inc., the Ontario Fish Producers' Association. The list goes on: the Atlantic Herring Co–op, the Fisheries Council of British Columbia, the Canadian Council of Professional Fish Harvesters, the Alliance des pêcheurs professionnels du Québec, Fishermen Food and Allied Workers, the Prince Edward Island Fishermen's Association, and many more.

MONTREAL ECONOMY

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada is rejoicing at the bad news affecting Montreal. Just this week, he applauded the move of CP Rail's head office. Ottawa is making no real effort to ensure sustainable economic recovery in Montreal. What is the minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec doing?

It is no wonder that FORD–Q is reported, in the document tabled this week by the auditor general, as not seeing itself as a strategic organization in terms of development policies. If the minister responsible for regional economic development in Quebec cannot even ensure that federal policies reflect Quebec's interests, what good is he? This is another example of how sharing responsibilities with Ottawa can only lead to a weakening of the economy in Montreal and in Quebec as a whole.

PUBLIC FINANCES

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the federal government and the hon. Paul Martin have taken upon themselves to put their fiscal house in order.

[English]

The Speaker: I would ask the hon. member not to use a person's name, just a title.

Mr. DeVillers: I stand corrected, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance. Since federal transfers to the provinces account for nearly 20 per cent of federal expenditures, they cannot be ignored. On the other hand, these transfers account for only three per cent of the provinces' revenues.

We made deeper cuts to our own expenditures on goods and services than to transfers to the provinces. Saskatchewan and New Brunswick have been able to balance their budgets while taking into account the new federal transfer payments. The Quebec government is lagging behind, because of all the energy it is putting into separation plans and referenda. In view of the fact that the transfer cuts contemplated amount to only a few percentage points of provincial revenues, is it fair to say that actions taken by the federal government are solely responsible for provincial cuts to come?

[English]

The Speaker: Colleagues, we are going into question period immediately. Over the last little while I have found that the preambles to questions are getting a little longer and the answers are sometimes getting a little longer.

May I ask today before we begin that hon. members cut back a little on the preambles to questions in the hope that more hon. members can ask questions during the question period.

Of course I will help in this respect if it is needed.

COMMITTEE CHAIRED BY MINISTER OF INTERGOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the phoney committee that was set up in a mad rush to save the face of a government that is incapable of keeping the Prime Minister's promises, this phoney committee headed by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs has now started its work and apparently has sent a progress report to the Prime Minister's office.

Since this report is supposedly essential to the survival of Canada, does the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs who chairs the phoney committee intend to release this report, so that Canadians can look at the recommendations?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted with the interest the hon. member for Roberval has shown in this committee, which is of course a contradiction of his preliminary remarks since, as I said before, the ultimate phoney committee is the regional commissions that were set up in Quebec for the benefit of partisan members only.

In this case, we have set up a committee of ministers who report to the Prime Minister and whose statements are confidential. If the Prime Minister feels it is appropriate to publish the recommendations, he will do so.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, here is my supplementary.

Are we to understand that the minister refuses to release any recommendations or clarifications of any kind with respect to the proceedings of this committee? Perhaps he prefers not to embarrass his friends on the No committee, the provincial Liberals who are meeting in Quebec City on the weekend and who would otherwise realize that the minister and the government have strictly nothing to offer Quebecers.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last Tuesday, the Leader of the Official Opposition was asked this question:

[English]

"Is it even theoretically possible that premier Bouchard could sign any deal which would see Quebec remain in Confederation?"

Mr. Bouchard replied: "No, that is impossible, I am a sovereignist".

In that case, I fail to see why the official opposition or the hon. member for Roberval would ask about the ways in which we are trying to deal with the current problem, since they have already said that, in the circumstances, they are not interested and that their only objective is to destroy the federation.

The Speaker: Again, my dear colleagues, I would ask you to use the title of the member to whom you refer during question period.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is so obvious. A cabinet minister tries to explain why they should not keep the promises made by the Prime Minister, and it is not their fault. I have never seen anything like it.

Is it not true that the purpose of the phoney committee headed by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs is merely to play for time so that the government can slowly but surely downgrade its commitments to Quebec and ultimately make them compatible with the interests of its Canadian friends?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we must recognize the facts. The Prime Minister repeated in the House what he said in Verdun, and I mentioned both statements yesterday to show they were consistent. However, it is also time to realize that the Leader of the Official Opposition and the members of the official opposition are neglecting the duty they have, as the official opposition, to defend the interests of their constituents. They have now stated they do not intend to co–operate with the federal government at all, and consequently, their only goal, as their leader has said, is to achieve sovereignty. Their only goal is to destroy Canada and consequently, their questions no longer have any credibility because they are not trying to improve the way the government operates but are only trying to achieve their goal, which is to destroy Canada.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): So, Mr. Speaker, we can say we are protecting the interests of our constituents when we ask questions of the government in order to discover its intentions toward Quebec.

What they want to know, precisely, is the federal government's intentions with respect to commitments it made less than a month ago, in the last days of the referendum campaign. It is obvious that the deliberations and recommendations of the phoney committee are a well kept secret.

Can the minister at least tell us whether, in the interim report he sent to the Prime Minister, the option of a simple House of Commons resolution on the distinct society is the one favoured by that phoney committee?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I feel obliged to repeat once again what the Prime Minister said, which is that to ensure the change and modernization of Canada, no change is excluded. And what he said in the House on Wednesday, which is:

> I said we were going to make changes to the federation, constitutional changes, if necessary.

Thus there is no contradiction between the two statements. What we are doing in the unity committee is preparing a series of recommendations for the Prime Minister. The recommendations the group of ministers make to the Prime Minister are confidential, as they must be, because the person who makes decisions on behalf of the government is the Prime Minister. Once those decisions have been made, he will make the announcement.

• (1125)

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, can the minister at least confirm to us that one of the hypotheses selected by the phoney committee regarding administrative decentralization is based on the principle set out by Pierre Elliott Trudeau two weeks ago, namely that no decentralization toward the provinces is possible without an equivalent transfer to the federal level, which would mean increased centralization of economic powers at Ottawa?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to use the same vocabulary, this is a phoney question, clearly void of content.

We repeat what we have said: the Prime Minister's promises are correct. And as long as the opposition continues to ask phoney questions like this one, when its goal is the destruction of Canada, it does not deserve an answer.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased with the recent peace agreement signed between the governments of Bosnia, Croatia and Serbia. This is a welcome step toward peace in that troubled region.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Frazer: Yesterday the Prime Minister stated that Canada would commit troops and also promised a debate in the House to acquire Parliament's approval.

To date however the government has paid only lip service to the principle of consultation. On September 21 last year the debate was only nine days before the renewal. This year on March 29 the debate was only two days before renewal and then the commitment was extended by two months without any reference to Parliament.

Will the government commit this time to having the debate on Canadian forces deployment to the former Yugoslavia after the details are known and before any cabinet decision is taken?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister signified yesterday that it would be his intention for Parliament to debate the potential deployment for the NATO force. That debate will be scheduled in the next week or so after consultation between House leaders.

This is a further example of how the government has restored Parliament's role in the debate of major foreign engagements.

The hon. member has criticized only the matter of timing of these debates. The fact is that members of Parliament have been able to express their views before commitments have been made and that is the course that will be followed.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that is all very interesting but in my previous question I asked if we would debate after the details are known. I suspect they will not be known next week and we will not know what we are debating.

The Minister of National Defence yesterday stated that because the successful formation of the NATO force will depend on American troops being committed, we will have to await the decision of congress. It is reported that the Americans are talking of a commitment of one year.

Does the minister think the mission will be accomplished in one year and will he consider proposing a specified period for any Canadian commitment with a declared intention to withdraw Canadian forces at the end of that period?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with great respect, these are all questions and ideas that should be raised in a parliamentary debate.

The government would be quite interested to know from the Reform Party and other members the degree of commitment we should make, the numbers that we should be sending and in what proportion. All of those questions really are matters the government will be interested in before the government makes its final commitment to NATO.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the government will not commit to having a realistic debate on the commitment of Canadian forces.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Frazer: I am concerned that Canadian troops have already been stretched past the limit by their commitments in the former Yugoslavia. Some soldiers are in their fourth and even fifth tours of duty and this is cause for great concern.

I recently read a report from a chaplain who wrote: "We do not know the emotional ramifications of psychological layers being built up by these repeatedly rapid deployments".

Will the Prime Minister consider other options, such as offering NATO an air squadron rather than a land unit, in order to lessen the burden on our under equipped and over taxed land forces?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have been discussing with our NATO allies the requirements for this kind of a force. Next week at the Defence Planning Board meetings in Brussels these commitments will be examined in greater detail.

I will take the hon. member's comment as a representation that Canada should offer air support. That will be very interesting. Other members may have a different view but we want to hear the views of all members before we decide.

The hon. member also talked about the overstretching of Canadian forces. He knows that was a legitimate argument to make 18 months ago. As a result of the deliberations of the committee of which he was a member, the white paper signalled an intent to put more people into the sharp end of the army. We are now recruiting so that we have more people available for such duty.

I also underscore the fact that with the pullback from Croatia, Canada now has significantly fewer people in the field than we had six months ago. The criticisms the hon. member has been making this morning are not fully justified by the operational facts today.

BRONFMAN FOUNDATION

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

The recently published public accounts reveal that the Minister of Canadian Heritage awarded a grant of $5 million to the Bronfman Foundation to fund "Heritage Minutes" on Canada's heritage for television broadcast. His own officials recommended a grant of only $1 million.

How does the minister explain his decision to give the Bronfman Foundation five times the amount his officials recommended, when he is cutting subsidies to francophone associations outside Quebec and everywhere in the area of cultural development?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not clear in my colleague's question whether he feels these heritage minutes were badly done and did not warrant funding. In my opinion, they provide an excellent look into Canadian history, which may be of no interest to him, but which interests me.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not answering my question. We are not talking about product quality, but, rather, the fact that it cost $5 million when it was supposed to cost $1 million.

As my supplemental, I would like to know whether the minister's sudden generosity was intended as an unobtrusive injection of several million dollars worth of propaganda on the eve of the recent referendum campaign?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if our colleague believes Canada's history is propaganda, he should not be sitting in this House. Our history is our history, our roots are our roots, and we may be justifiably proud of them.

COMMUNICATIONS SECURITY ESTABLISHMENT

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians were justifiably shocked to learn that the Communications Security Establishment is eavesdropping on Canadian citizens.

In response, the defence minister said that he would not comment on issues of national security. The Deputy Prime Minister clearly stated that CSE did not have a mandate to spy on Canadians. Not surprisingly, the Prime Minister said that he did not know what CSE was doing.

Does the Minister of National Defence know what CSE is doing and who gave CSE authority to invade and violate the privacy of Canadians by intercepting private communications?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the member knows from my previous answers in this place, I certainly know what is going on in the department and especially at CSE.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, two former employees of the spy agency have publicly stated that CSE has spied on Canadians.

The law is clear. Any interception of communication of Canadian citizens is an offence under part VI of the Criminal Code. How dare the government spy on its own citizens?

Has the minister's department reviewed the allegations of former CSE employees Frost and Shorten? Is he prepared to have charges laid against those CSE agents who have broken the law?

Hon. David M. Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I fully reject the premise of the hon. member's question, but with respect to recent comments that have been made by a third party, the government is certainly looking into them.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

In announcing budget cuts, the President of the CBC explained that between 600 and 1,000 positions would be eliminated before March 1996. According to him, the exact number of jobs to be cut will depend on whether or not the federal government decides to contribute to the funding of Radio Canada International.

• (1135)

Can the Minister of Canadian Heritage confirm that his government has decided to stop funding Radio Canada International?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as our colleague must know, the international component of the CBC's mission is outlined in its current mandate.

We will review the CBC's entire mandate, including this component, in light of the mandate committee's recommendations. The whole mandate will be reviewed, and the status of Radio Canada International will be determined at that time.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since Radio Canada International is Canada's international showcase—

Ms. Copps: Are you interested?

Mrs. Debien: Since Radio Canada International is Canada's international showcase and helps promote Canadian culture abroad, does the minister not feel that it would be irresponsible to stop funding this service, and can he give us advance notice of his intentions in this regard?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, allow me to correct the preamble to our colleague's question. Radio Canada International is a vehicle that promotes Canada around the world. I just got back from TV5, through which francophone Canada has gained international renown. Radio Canada International is not the only broadcaster to further our country's interests.

In response to her question, I would add that we should not put the cart before the horse. We have to make a decision on the CBC's mandate and its international component will be part of this decision.

CHILD CARE

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Thousands of people are demonstrating today across Ontario because of the intention of the provincial government to cut child care services and subsidies.

In our red book there is a promise calling for the creation of 50,000 new child care spaces each year following a year of 3 per cent economic growth.

Does the government intend to address this acute social need and alleviate a crucial problem faced by so many Canadians?

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for raising a very important question on an issue that is very close to the Liberal government.

We are strongly committed to child care. We have already made progress in a number of areas such as the $72 million program to establish or improve a total number of 6,000 spaces within First Nations and Inuit communities over the next three years. We have also invested $6 million annually for a child care vision.

The Minister of Human Resources Development last week met with his provincial counterparts to discuss ways of finding new financing arrangements so that the red book commitment could be honoured.

There is no question the focus would be on enhancing and expanding child care services. Our position is crystal clear.

JUSTICE

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, blatant Liberal pork barrel patronage by the revenue minister rewarding Liberal law firms on Vancouver Island is going on and on and on, in spite of six months of feeble assurances to the House by the justice minister. Yet again on Wednesday of this week, when a drug trafficking case was called in Victoria no federal crown prosecuting lawyer even turned up for the case.

How many more drug cases will be fumbled, lost or dropped before the justice minister exhibits some competence in getting the revenue minister's cronies in line?

• (1140)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows perfectly well that the Minister of Justice has made outstanding appointments in every appointment he has made.

If the hon. member would simply praise the minister occasionally instead of constantly harping and carping, he might find that he gets better service in his constituency.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, what a joke. Speak of praising, I have had personal conversations with the justice minister about this issue over a six–month period. I have a fat file on it. One patronage appointed lawyer is unprepared and the charges are dropped. Another patronage appointed lawyer does not show and the charges are dropped. Another patronage appointed lawyer mishandles the charges and the charges are dropped.

How far does this have to go? The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice last time said—

The Speaker: I ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Abbott: If the firms are not incompetent, if the justice department is not incompetent, if the justice minister is not incompetent, why do we end up with all these cases screwed up on Vancouver Island?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice has had all his appointments screened by officials before they were made and he is confident that these are very competent lawyers. The confidence is reflected in the fact that 22 of the 42 firms appointed in B.C. are reappointments. Half the agents were appointed by the previous government.

There have been isolated difficulties on Vancouver Island. The minister admits that fact. Preliminary reports suggest that the failure of certain former agents to co–operate with the new appointments may have contributed to the problem. The hon. member should be encouraging the former agents to co–operate with the new ones instead of carping and yelling in the House every day about the odd failure that occurs. These people are competent and they will do their jobs.

IRVING WHALE

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Last summer, the federal government wasted several million dollars in a failed attempt to refloat the Irving Whale. We are currently unable to get from the environment department the exact amount spent on that botched operation.

How can the minister justify her department's refusal to reveal the terms of the contracts and the amount spent on the failed attempt to refloat the Irving Whale?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the operation did not fail. It is underway and will be completed next year, following the recommendations made by the former Bloc Quebecois critic for the environment, who said that the Irving Whale was like a time bomb for the environment and had to be refloated.

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister not realize the public is concerned that, in opting for the cheapest solution under the circumstances, without any regard for the safety of the operation, she started a process which could end up costing taxpayers a lot more than expected because of the bad decisions she made?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the total costs of the operation will be borne by the private sector. Moreover, the hon. member and his colleagues should have heeded the advice of the Magdalen Islands RCM board, which is asking the federal government to assume its responsibilities and not fail like the former environment minister, the member for Lac–Saint–Jean, who received letters from Magdalen Islands fishermen but never bothered to answer them.

We, at least, have taken our responsibilities and are following the unanimous recommendation of the Magdalen Islands RCM to proceed with the operation, so as to get rid of this time bomb for the environment, as the former Bloc member called it.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a few bad apples on the Stony reserve west of Calgary have resumed illegal tree cutting. Grassroots natives have shut down the logging trucks the minister of Indian affairs said he would shut down.

Who will stand on the government side today and justify this environmental mess?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the minister of Indian and northern affairs indicated in response to an earlier question by the member that the government expects the law to be respected both on and off the reserve, and it will be respected.

• (1145)

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister made a promise in the House, a promise he has failed to keep. Rank and file natives have kept that promise for him while the minister, his officials and band and council on the reserve sit in their ivory towers. Once again, who in this weak-kneed government is going to stand up and stop this environmental pillage?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it hard to believe that the member accuses the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development of not being close to the grassroots. In fact, over the last two years he has met with more band members, more chiefs and more aboriginal people than certainly has the entire caucus of the Reform Party.

I would underscore that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has the full confidence of the aboriginal peoples unlike their view of the Reform Party which is certainly not their greatest ally.

IRVING WHALE

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it would appear that the Minister of Environment has finally seen the light on the Irving Whale issue.

Last week, she showed some common sense when she announced an investigation by the RCMP into possible criminal activities, as well as a new environmental impact review.

Can the minister assure us that the public servants and other individuals who are being investigated by the RCMP will not take part, either as witnesses or as commissioners, in the new environmental assessment she has ordered?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, obviously, the government rreferred this issue to the RCMP so that it can investigate at every level.

This being said, the PCB assessment will take into account everybody's public testimony and, obviously, those who are being investigated will be excluded from the process.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, would the minister not agree that, now that she has recognized the existence of criminal activities surrounding the refloating operation of the Irving Whale, the only way to give credibility to the process would be to strike a totally independent expert panel, one that has no connection with her department?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member's allegations are false. Moreover, if he wants the investigation to be conducted properly, it must not be interfered with.

But if he means that an investigation should be conducted independently from the Canadian government, Environment Canada has the responsibility to carry on environmental impact assessments, and we do not want to avoid our responsibilities, we want to take them the same way we did when we became the first government to tackle this ecological time bomb.

I would like to point out that the RCM of Îles-de-la-Madeleine, the fishermen of the Magdalen Islands—

[English]

The fishermen of Prince Edward Island, of Atlantic Canada, support the position of the government. I only wish the Bloc would help us to rid ourselves of this ecological time bomb.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board and is about the public service.

[English]

Reports indicate that the early retirement and early departure incentive programs have been so favourably received by public servants as to cause a larger expenditure than expected.

Will the President of the Treasury Board assure the public servants and the Canadian public that the government does not intend to lay off employees or cut services to compensate for the overspending under these programs?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, we will be true to our fiscal commitments and operate within the established targets.

True, more people than expected indicated that they wanted to take advantage of the government offers. This simply shows that there will be more spending in the beginning, but we will be able to make up for all that. True, this could amount to almost

$2.3 billion, but at the same time, this will be offset by savings of $4.2 billion. Thereafter, $2.2 billion will be saved each year.

• (1150)

[English]

Concerning the public service, I am convinced we shall continue to have a service that reflects the needs of Canadians. Members well know that as a result of the program review we have had to reduce it, but we will continue to have a competent and committed civil service that will respond to the needs of Canadians.

NATIONAL REVENUE

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of National Revenue amalgamated Canada customs and taxation he claimed the department would become more efficient and more effective. The auditor general disagrees. In his report last week the auditor general points out that taxpayers are now waiting 26 days longer for disputes to be resolved and that Revenue Canada missed collecting $17 million in interest charges on overdue accounts.

How can the minister claim this reorganization in his department has been anything but a failure?

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue answered that question when the auditor general's report came out.

If the member looks closely at the report, he will see the auditor general acknowledged the changes the Minister of National Revenue introduced and the savings that have been realized. Naturally, the time period is not of sufficient length for the auditor general to draw any conclusions. If the member reads the report very carefully he will see that at the moment the auditor general is being complimentary. He encourages the department to continue and it will continue in this manner.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, I believe the parliamentary secretary is out of touch with this department.

Over the last couple of months I have received evidence that there are questionable management practices. There is evidence of racism. The morale is low and there is a lack of fulfilment in the department.

The minister of revenue and taxation has to do a better job of controlling the department. Tax time is coming up. Budget time is coming up. We know the friction between taxpayers and Revenue Canada collectors.

When will the people responsible for the department improve the image of national revenue and taxation?

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe the member did not have a supplementary prepared and just went on a rampage of making allegations. If the member has evidence of specific cases of wrongdoing by people working in the department, he should come forward and give them to the minister and make them public. Then the minister will definitely look into the matter.

Since 1993 when this government took office we have made the necessary changes in the department. Canadians are receiving their tax refunds faster than before. The amalgamation of the two departments has created savings in the millions of dollars and this will continue.

BOOKSELLERS

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the heritage minister.

Yesterday, David Peterson, a former premier of Ontario, submitted a brief to the heritage committee, on behalf of the Canadian Booksellers' Association. Mr. Peterson predicted that the impending arrival of two mega–booksellers from the United States, Borders, and Barnes and Noble, would have disastrous consequences on the book market in Quebec and Canada.

Before the Minister of Industry allows American booksellers to invade the Canadian market, will the Minister of Canadian Heritage undertake to set up a committee of experts to assess the economic and cultural impact of the arrival of these two booksellers on the Canadian market, like it did for Sports Illustrated?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me advise the member clearly of what the existing book policy is of the government.

The policy prohibits the establishment of a new retail book selling business by non–Canadians. Non–Canadians may only engage in book retailing as minority investors in Canadian controlled joint ventures. Any proposed joint venture that may be brought forward will be carefully examined under the existing powers under the Investment Canada Act to ensure that control in fact is exercised by the Canadian investors.

• (1155)

We do not contemplate in any way softening or weakening that policy in favour of any proposed investment. I believe the interests of the Canadian booksellers will thereby be truly protected.

[Translation]

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it does not seem as though Mr. Peterson feels all that reassured. Would the government's eagerness to close that deal have anything to do with the fact that the Canadian partner of the giant American Borders corporation is Heather Reisman, a member of a well–known Liberal family, as reported by the Globe and Mail?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to thank the Bloc member for her interest in Canadian heritage.

[English]

As for the rest of her question, I will not dignify it with a reply.

FUR INDUSTRY

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, about 72,000 Canadians are registered fur trappers, about half of them being native or Metis. Another 30,000 work on trimming, storing and creating garments with fur and selling them.

As a former trapper myself, I would like the Minister of International Trade to explain now that native trappers have convinced the European Union to postpone for one year its ban on furs caught with leghold traps, how will the government use that one year reprieve to ensure that an EU ban on Canadian wild furs never takes place?

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are aware that we have one year within which to work out the proposition. We are quite encouraged by the European Union decision to grant us the extra year. We are going to work with the industry, the provinces and all of the interested parties. We hope to be able to come up with what is believed to be a proposition which is in the best interests of everybody, including the people who are benefiting from trapping in Canada.

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is not as if this is a new problem. The European Union now buys about 75 per cent of Canadian fur.

Will the Minister of International Trade explain what action he is taking to broaden the market for Canadian wild fur and reduce our dependence on the European buyers?

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are quite concerned about this issue. Thousands and thousands of people depend on trapping for their survival.

I take this opportunity to congratulate Canada's aboriginal community which worked extremely hard with our government, as well as with governments in Europe, to ensure that our position is well known to Europeans and others abroad.

I assure the member that whatever we do on this issue is going to be in the best interests of the aboriginal people and the best interests of the Canadian industry.

CHILD CARE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, in 1993 the Liberal Party promised to expand child care in Canada by 50,000 spaces each year that follows a growth of 3 per cent. Last year real growth was just over 4 per cent and still the government has not lived up to its commitment. It has broken its promise to Canadian families.

The parliamentary secretary responded to an earlier question that the government is working on this matter. I therefore ask the Deputy Prime Minister, exactly how many child care spaces—and I presume it will be at least 50,000—will the government create this year to maintain its promise?

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thought I answered that question earlier on. I will take the opportunity to outline other measures the federal government has taken to not only address child care, but to also address the issue of child poverty.

Campaign 2000 recently released a report card which did not take into account some very positive news which occurred last year. Last year for the very first time in a long time, the average family income increased by almost 2 per cent. This speaks to the fact that the jobs and economic growth agenda the Liberal government has introduced over the past year is not only creating jobs, but is helping the issue of child care and child poverty.

• (1200)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister will be very brief.

Exactly how many child care spaces will be created by the federal government this year in keeping with its promise?

Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the same way that we have honoured our job creation program, that we have lowered unemployment, that we have increased exports, that we have increased the gross domestic product, we will continue to honour all the commitments made in the red book.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a two–part question for the Minister of Finance.

[English]

We have heard more and more concerns about the Canada pension plan. Last week a leading actuary maintained that we are unable to pay even the pensions of those already retired.

Can the minister tell the House if the Canada pension plan is in danger and what he intends to do about it? The second part of my question is what does he think of the Reform plan?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the chief actuary did indeed raise a number of very important concerns relative to the Canada pension plan. The departmental officials from the federal government and from all the provincial governments, because this is a joint responsibility, are indeed meeting to address those plans.

The Canada pension plan is not in danger, but it does require modification, it does require change. We will bring those changes in to ensure that the Canada pension plan is there for young Canadians when their time comes to retire.

The fundamental flaw in the Reform plan is that while there are interesting things in the margin, it makes sure that the rich are richer in retirement and the poor are poorer in retirement. This government will never accept that.

BANK ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–100, an act to amend, enact and repeal certain laws relating to financial institutions, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I know that with the wonderful words of wisdom I was expressing to the House prior to question period, the Speaker will recall that I was speaking about the fact that the Liberals and Tories all seem to enjoy the process of interfering in normal natural processes within a marketplace. The proposed bill is a classic example of exactly that.

The Liberals have an opportunity under the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act to make some substantive changes that would continue to protect Canadians while giving Canadians a responsibility for their own lives, their own affairs.

It makes me think a lot of an occasion when I was in my constituency in the town of Invermere a few weeks ago. There was a gentleman who was the park warden from Glacier National Park in the United States, which I am sure members will recall is considered to be part of the Peace Park. It is right across the border from Waterton Lakes National Park. They have a wide swath cut from mountaintop down through the valley up to the other side of the mountain approximately 60 feet wide to designate the border.

The superintendent was saying it does not really make any sense for us to have this wide swath out in the middle of the wilderness. Here we are talking about this being a peace park, about how there is this desire on the part of Canadians and Americans to come together in the Peace Park, so why do we have this 60–foot wide swath? He was going to be proposing to the powers that be that this wide swath be permitted to simply regrow. What it would mean is that no longer would there be vegetation–destroying chemicals put into the area. It would save money. Above all, it would make sense.

At that point I put up my hand at the back of the room and he acknowledged me. I told him he had a serious problem: you are proposing to the governments of the United States and Canada something that makes sense and saves money; you do not have a chance of this passing. Unfortunately, in spite of the fact that I said that with tongue in cheek, it is exactly this kind of problem we have with the old line parties, with this government. If it saves money and makes sense we can count on the fact that the Liberals are going to reject it.

What am I referring to specifically? We propose a different way of handling the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. We call it, as it is called in the industry, co–insurance. This bill rejects deposit co–insurance.

Since the introduction in 1967 of 100 per cent deposit insurance, that is up to the maximum value, 30 financial institutions have failed, with 20 failures in the last 10 years. This has cost the CDIC about $5 billion as of March 1994.

Before 1967 there were no bank failures. Governments over the years have exhibited a reluctance to institute market based measures of reform such as co–insurance instead of opting for more regulation and oversight.

The use of the market through the implementation of co–insurance and market based criteria as early warning signals would alleviate the problem in the financial system in a less costly yet more effective manner than proposing further regulatory change. Regulatory attempts to mimic the efficient results only achievable by the free market will always be more costly for all parties involved and will rarely, if ever, achieve the same quality of results.

Under the proposed system, depositors are only encouraged to seek out the best rate, regardless of the risk profile of the institution in question, since they know that they will be fully compensated by the CDIC in the event of a failure. This facilitates the entrance, growth and eventual failure of risky and recklessly managed institutions. It also discriminates against healthy, strong, financial sector players who minimize risk by conservative lending and borrowing policies. The act does set the stage for risk based CDIC premiums.

It makes me think a lot, in terms of the government interference the Liberals and Conservatives have always practised, of a Canada Cup hockey game between Team Canada complete with Wayne Gretzky and all the rest of the superstars against Team Jamaica. The government would not set the rules for the game. It would set the rules for the result. It would probably make the Canadian goal the goal line, that is from side to side on the ice, and make the Jamaican goal the size of a shoebox. That way we could know what the results of the game were going to be. That is the attitude that has consistently, without fail, been the approach of both the Liberals and the Conservatives in the way they have governed Canada.

We have to realize that money is a medium of exchange. Money has no morality nor does it have nationality. We must restore balance in the marketplace, which is what this bill is about.

I am referring to making the depositor take some responsibility because what is going on right now is that the solid financial institutions are being basically penalized. The people investing in those solid financial institutions are being penalized by people who know they can invest up to the limit covered by CDIC and bear no risk as long as those deposits are guaranteed by CDIC.

The 100 per cent coverage creates a situation parallel to the situation I described with regard to regional development grants, in that it shifts the responsibility away from the depositor and on to the backs of (a) the larger, more responsible financial institutions that have a long track record and (b) ultimately the taxpayer.

Let us get government interference in the marketplace under control. Maybe that is too much to expect from the Liberals. We can only hope. But above all, I ask the members of the government side to consider this. Canada has to be prepared to compete in the real world. This issue of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation is just one small indicator of the kind of government interference that is distorting an orderly marketplace. It is reflective of the real world and of that marketplace. As long as we continue to shift responsibility ultimately from the people in that marketplace, we are not doing anything to create any health, vibrancy or cleansing within the marketplace.

It is for that reason, the fact that the government refuses to consider the prospect of co–insurance, that we will be voting against this bill.

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to participate in the debate today on Bill C–100. I am pleased to have the opportunity to express my support for this legislation which will enhance the safety and soundness of the Canadian financial system.

I would like to focus on the issue of early intervention when an institution is experiencing financial difficulties. It is an area where Bill C–100 establishes a dramatic shift or enhancement in the philosophy of financial institution regulation. It is a reform that I believe all consumers should applaud.

As the hon. secretary of state pointed out earlier, the logical underpinning for early intervention in problem situations begins with the principle that ownership of a financial institution is a privilege, not a right. This reflects the absolute vital role in terms of economics and public confidence that such institutions play in an open market economy.

The legislation before us takes this principle to a natural and essential conclusion. It recognizes that when a financial institution is experiencing difficulty, the owners do not have the right to continue business until the bitter end. In other words, the obligations of management include a duty to depositors, policyholders, creditors, as well as shareholders. This means that an institution's owners do not have a natural authority to carry on in the hope of some miraculous turnaround, until capital is depleted or they cannot pay liabilities as they come due.

Bill C–100 translates this view into concrete measures. It makes clear that if early intervention in and resolution of institutions experiencing difficulty need to occur it can occur. This is specifically recognized in a new mandate for the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. This mandate is given bottom line reality to changes in the statutes to permit this institution to obtain a winding–up order for problem firms earlier than this is warranted.

I should point out that this new mandate represents an important clarification of the mission statement of OSFI. Prior to Bill C–100, this institution was guided very informally by the objectives to maintain public confidence in the Canadian financial system.

However the bill provides the regulator with a detailed, legislative mandate which recognizes OSFI should contribute to public confidence. It will do so by recognizing the interests of depositors, policyholders and creditors of Canadian financial institutions.

Prescribing such a mandate more formally in legislation is an important step. This will give the regulator greater accountability for its actions. It also lets institutions and other stakeholders know that the regulator will deal with them in an expeditious manner should problems arise.

Greater transparency with respect to the role of the regulator provides all financial institutions, healthy or troubled, with a greater incentive to monitor their affairs more prudently.

I firmly believe the very fact that the early intervention is a clear and concrete part of the OSFI mandate is in itself an incentive for better management.

Bill C–100's mandate for this institution extends beyond simply requiring the regulator to take immediate action with institutions experiencing financial difficulty. OSFI has a broader responsibility to promote the adoption by senior management of financial institutions of sound policies and procedures to control their risks. After all, financial institutions must bear a greater responsibility to their stakeholders for managing their exposure to risk adequately. This is consistent with the principle that ownership of financial institutions is a privilege and not a right.

Supervisory systems must be designed in such a way to create an incentive for corrective action by financial institutions themselves to set right and salvage firms where possible.

However, earlier resolution alone cannot ensure that a troubled financial institution will not fail. In an open market environment, especially in today's increasingly competitive global arena, firms may fail. Therefore it is extremely important, when closure of a financial institution is imminent, the supervisory system be prepared to shut down an institution in a manner that protects the interests of all stakeholders.

In this regard, Bill C–100 provides the regulator with sufficient scope to close down a troubled institution before the value of the firm has been fully depleted.

The legislation includes amendments to the winding–up and restructuring act which provides OSFI with additional grounds for obtaining a wind–up order for a financial institution. The act is also being amended to provide more flexibility to restructure, under court supervision, the affairs of insurance companies in liquidation. This should provide protection for stakeholders if closing down is required. The liquidator will have greater scope to enhance value within the estate and improve recovery on assets disposed of by the liquidator to the benefit of all policyholders.

Again, the interests of financial consumers stand to be recognized under Bill C–100 revised closure policy. I believe this legislation acts on the aspects of good regulation and good management, fairness and openness.

In other words, there is a fundamental need for transparency of the supervisory system. If we are to encourage the most positive attitudes and behaviour within institutions, it is essential that they understand the steps that the authorities can take if the financial situation deteriorates. We must be prepared to deal with situations where firms make mistakes and face difficulty.

We must have a more transparent system in place so that messages to the company management are clear. That is why the secretary of state is proposing a guide to intervention that clarifies the actions that can be expected, a guide that clarifies the role of OSFI and the CDIC, the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation.

This guide sets out four stages of intervention. Each stage makes clear to institutions what type of regulatory action will be taken. It includes a number of fairly technical supervisory measures that may be measured and used by OSFI in recognizing the interests of stakeholders.

It also spells out actions by CDIC in fulfilling its legislated objectives to control risk to the deposit insurance fund and minimize its exposure to loss.

These regulatory actions range from the initial stage–one situation, where the regulator takes a number of small steps when the institution is experiencing difficulty. At this stage, OSFI could require the external auditor to expand its work. If the company continues to decline, there are two other stages of more direct action that can be taken by the regulator, where a more hands–on approach is taken. By stage four, firm action is required because insolvency is imminent.

The institution approaching this stage will have warning that unless it improves its situation it will be shut down. Bill C–100 provides that in such a scenario, OSFI could seek a winding–up order while the institution still has positive capital.

This is clearly to the benefit of the depositors, the policyholders, the creditors and other stakeholders. It is consistent with the institution's mandate.

The legislation before us is largely technical in content. It does not have the drama of some other high profile issues, but this should not obscure its vital importance, nor its real benefits to our economy and to the security of millions of Canadians.

Consumers have come to expect that regulatory authorities take prompt action to deal with the problem of financial institutions. A sound, dynamic financial system is important to all Canadian consumers and an essential component to economic strength, the strength that ultimately, as we know, produces jobs.

The legislation enhances the soundness that Canadians expect from their financial system. A sound, dynamic financial system is a fundamental foundation for personal financial security and public confidence. The legislation before us will ensure that such confidence is fully justified.

I urge all hon. members to approve this legislation. It is in the interest of all our constituents and our nation as a whole.

• (1230)

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in this House as a member of the Bloc Quebecois to address Bill C–100, an act to amend, enact and repeal certain laws relating to financial institutions.

I listened closely to the previous speakers' speeches, especially that of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, who explained a number of guidelines followed by the government in the drafting of this bill.

First of all, he told us that the purpose of the government was to regulate in the best possible way certain aspects of the financial system in Canada, certain financial institutions, so that Canadians who put their trust in these financial institutions and deposit money in them will not have their trust betrayed because of a shortcoming in the regulations or abuses by the financial institutions themselves.

Following this line of reasoning, any Canadian or Quebecer would think that the federal government is fully justified in introducing the bill now before us.

The parliamentary secretary also mentioned global issues, changes in the overall financial system, new technologies, the diversification of financial needs, competitiveness, everything that makes up globalization. He told us Canada must act to make sure that our financial system will react appropriately, should financial institutions have problems that could put money deposited by Canadians and Quebecers at risk.

If we accept this argument, we would think that all is well, that the government must indeed take action. Later on, I listened to the official opposition financial critic, my colleague from Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, who stressed other aspects of the issue. He said that, yes, the government was justified in taking some measures but that, while doing so, it must respect the provinces' jurisdictions. I would say that the hon. member clearly underlined different aspects of the bill which infringe upon the jurisdiction of provinces such as Quebec.

During his speech, I was looking at government members and thinking that they were elected to the House of Commons to represent their constituents. In a sense, they are forced to listen to arguments which tend to become repetitive, because, no matter what bill is being debated in the House, the official opposition will criticize it in terms of federal and provincial jurisdictions. Of course, it can be tiring for hon. members, who are elected to represent their constituents honestly, to see all their bills attacked from a particular angle by Bloc members.

I understand that, but they must also recognize the position of members from Quebec, and here I am speaking of members from Quebec generally. I was reading a letter sent by Mr. Johnson, the former Quebec premier to a federal minister concerning the bill, in which he was using essentially the same arguments presented by the hon. member for Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot. In other words, he was arguing that Quebec's jurisdiction should be respected. So it is not just a sovereignist member's point of view that has been put forward, but the point of view of a member from Quebec who wants to represent his constituents well, as is proper under the constitutional traditions of Quebec.

Once again, at the risk of displeasing some colleagues, I will tell you why a piece of legislation like this one, which at first glance appears perfectly appropriate and normal under the circumstances, is questionable.

It is questionable, first of all, from the standpoint of the Constitution. It is all very clear in the Canadian Constitution that private property and the Civil Code are under the Quebec government's jurisdiction. It is clear and it is there for all to read. This means that any laws or moves the federal government makes to regulate to some extent private property or items covered by the Civil Code are, in and of themselves, unconstitutional. It is with some hesitation that I use the word "unconstitutional" because it is a fairly strong word, but the fact remains that those laws or moves are intrusions by the federal government into another level of government's jurisdiction.

The Quebec government is not alone in saying this, as we saw last summer, when the chairman of the Ontario Securities Commission made the same argument, saying that the draft legislation put forward at the time—it was being considered by the committee—flew in the face of provincial jurisdiction over securities regulation.

Of course, when the representative of the Ontario Securities Commission showed up before the committee which was examining this bill last summer, he had changed his mind and said: "Look, maybe it is important that the federal government legislates in this area". At that time, we were about to embark upon a referendum campaign, and the people of Canada who sincerely believed that Canada should not be divided and should remain united after a referendum were sticking together. That is why he changed his tune a little bit.

But you have to understand that, at the outset, he had examined his powers and provincial jurisdiction and had noticed that this bill would infringe upon this area of provincial jurisdiction.

This all goes to explain why this is the first concern of hon. members from Quebec—and I am not only talking about sovereignist members of Parliament—when they examine a bill. Of course it may not cross the mind of the members from the Yukon, from British–Columbia or from Ontario when they examine a federal bill. But it is a reflex that we, the politicians of Quebec, have developed over many decades. We have done so since Confederation, under the governments of Duplessis, Lesage, Lévesque, and the Johnsons, both father and sons. The elected representatives of the people of Quebec have always been especially careful to remind the federal government that it must respect the various areas of jurisdiction.

Again today, the elected representatives of the people of Quebec, as the official opposition, want to remind everyone of this basic rule of the Canadian federal system, which is the existence of various levels of government, with different areas of jurisdiction under the Constitution that ought to be respected.

On the very face of it, this bill does not respect the Quebec government's power to exercize jurisdiction over securities, because securities are private property. If private property and the Civil Code come under provincial jurisdiction, then securities also fall under provincial jurisdiction.

What is the purpose of Bill C–100? It grants the Bank of Canada jurisdiction over securities clearing houses, which, as I amply demonstrated—I believe—at the beginning of my speech, are already regulated by the provinces. The bill gives the federal government powers which go beyond its jurisdiction under the Canadian Constitution.

It even goes as far as giving a power to issue directives to clearing houses and their participants. Therefore, for a Quebec representative, this is not right, this is unacceptable. That is why we are condemning it.

The second aspect mentioned by my colleague had to do with the whole issue of so–called systemic effects. This referes to a situation where a financial institution that is in difficulty because it is unable to meet certain obligations would endanger another institution, creating a kind of domino effect where a weaker financial institution can doom other financial institutions perhaps better administered or more prosperous. A schedule was added to this bill for the purpose of controlling this phenomenon.

It is clear that, in the context of globalization, governments must closely monitor such phenomena. We read from time to time in the newspapers that the problems of a bank in Hong Kong can affect another bank in England, which happens to have interests in Canada. This situation can in turn create problems for that bank's branches and institutions in Canada and in Quebec. I understand that those things have to be regulated.

But under the pretext of having to regulate such situations, Bill C–100 encroaches once more on provincial jurisdictions, in areas which are presently regulated by the Commission des valeurs mobilières du Québec. This agency has opposed passing of the bill in its present form precisely because it saw that the federal government, mainly through the Bank of Canada, was encroaching upon the mandate it received from the Government of Quebec.

Indeed, the schedule of the bill dealing with clearing and winding up empowers the Bank of Canada to issue directives to clearing houses and participant institutions, without regard for the charter of the institution. As we know, some institutions have federal charters. We can understand that the federal government must regulate such institutions, but there are also institutions with provincial charters. Quebec has many. There are ten trust companies, 25 personal insurance companies, 60 damage insurance companies and 1,300 credit unions with a provincial charter in Quebec. That is a lot.

It is a lot and credit unions are a special concern to Quebecers. You are all familiar with the success of the caisses populaires Desjardins in Quebec. They gave Quebecers from humble backgrounds the opportunity to found institutions based on co–op principles, so that there are now 1,300 caisses populaires throughout Quebec. These institutions were built in parishes and villages and really represent a major achievement for Quebecers.

We can see that, through this bill, the federal government is giving itself some powers over these provincially chartered institutions. We are against this.

• (1245)

We are not opposed to the fact that we must protect ourselves against systemic risk that an institution could endanger another at some point. We disagree, however, with the federal government's approach. Instead, the government should have fine–tuned the large value transfer system, as a group of international experts, the Group of Thirty, proposed in 1989. The Governor of the Bank of Canada admitted as much last summer when questioned on the issue of systemic risk in the financial sector.

Of course, by the time he appeared before the finance committee last summer, the Governor of the Bank of Canada had changed his tune, as did the Chairman of the Ontario Securities Commission.

We think that he changed his tune for political reasons. That is not surprising. I can appreciate that, given the situation last summer before the Quebec referendum, those who believe in federalism and want to maintain this system in Canada may have agreed to certain things and qualified their previous proposals or statements so as to avoid embarrassing the federal government.

But the fact remains that, had the proposal to improve the large value transfer system by streamlining it been approved by the federal government, the government would not have felt compelled to give itself powers I would describe as outrageous over Quebec financial institutions which are well managed.

Not one single financial institution in Quebec has declared bankruptcy in the last ten years. Some insurance companies have merged in the interest of their shareholders and policyholders, but there has not been any bank failure among Quebec credit unions, trust companies or major insurance companies in over ten years.

Of course, there have been problems in Canada. There have been problems in Western Canada and the government had to intervene. It thinks it probably did what was best for the people of Canada and Quebec at the time, but, just the same, the federal government cannot justify invading one of Quebec's areas of jurisdiction by saying that, over the past ten or twenty years, Quebec has not been assuming its responsibilities with respect to regulating the securities industry or financial institutions.

Again, this is seen by members from Quebec as typical of the kind of insensitivity Canada has displayed toward what could be called Quebec's unique view of federalism.

When I spoke in this House yesterday on Bill C–96, establishing the Department of Human Resources Development, I put forward the same arguments. It is all fine and well for the Minister of Human Resources Development to ensure that the moneys spent for communities and individuals in Canada are spent as efficiently as possible. But this is one more intrusion—let us say it as it is, a federal intrusion—in areas of provincial jurisdiction: occupational training, manpower, and so on.

Today, the Bloc Quebecois would like to once more condemn the federal government's approach in regulating financial institutions. Rest assured that, in committee, our members will do their utmost to ensure that these clauses, which obviously are not in keeping with a harmonious federal system, are deleted from the bill.

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank the hon. member for Jonquière, who in my estimation made a good analysis which, along with the one made this morning by another Bloc member, clearly illustrates the problems with Bill C–100. There are several problems which affect Quebec but, more importantly, this bill is yet another example of federal interference in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

The hon. member pointed out that, almost every time a bill is introduced in the House, Bloc Quebecois members rise to condemn the fact that it infringes on an area of provincial jurisdiction. This is a rather recent phenomenon here. Indeed, in the last 15 or 20 years, there have been Quebec MPs in this House who were not Bloc members but who rarely got up to condemn federal interference in areas which come under Quebec's jurisdiction.

This is explained by the fact that, whenever Quebecers were represented here, it was by Conservative or Liberal members who were in a minority position and who had to toe the party line within their caucus. Since their caucus was formed by a majority representing the rest of Canada, they had to defend the interests of Canada before those of Quebec. This applied even when there was an obvious consensus in Quebec, that is when federalists and sovereignists of all political colours were of the same opinion.

The hon. member just mentioned the fact that Daniel Johnson sent a letter to the minister, in which he described our position precisely. Therefore, there is obvious consensus on Bill C–100, among federalists and sovereignists alike in Quebec, with respect to this intentional intrusion on matters of provincial jurisdiction, and I hope that the government will take this into account.

Another obvious example of consensus in Quebec being ignored by the government is the fact that manpower training and everything connected with manpower training should be handed over to Quebec. Every political party and all of the stakeholders in Quebec, be it management or labour, obviously agree on this, yet the federal government is not responding. We in the Bloc Quebecois have every right to defend these positions.

It is a well known fact that movements such as the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois were born as a result of the realization that we were a political minority. And when we played the power game, whether within the Conservative Party or the Liberal Party, we remained a minority and, as such, had to defend Canada's interests. This the origin of the emergence of the sovereignist movement in Quebec; we realized that we were caught in an ongoing process of being reduced to a political minority.

My question to my colleague, who has studied several pieces of legislation similar to Bill C–100, is: does he not realize that, for several years now, we have tried to explain to our fellow citizens what being a political minority means, and that, to a certain extent, being a political minority leads to becoming an economic minority, and that, when we deal with Quebecers, we should add this dimension to our debate?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies for his question.

It is obvious that politics has an impact on the economy. Indeed, I mentioned at the beginning of my speech that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance had partly justified the introduction of this bill by the government by putting it in the context of some sort of globalization.

He spoke of global issues to justify that the bill is written in such a way as to regulate or influence securities throughout Canada and to insure that Canada has a single voice among other nations with regard to securities regulation, in order to avoid negative impacts from outside the country.

If we, in Quebec, are not careful, the arguments of globalization, of competitiveness, of the need for the economy to adapt to the global context will be presented every time that the government wants to make Canada stronger, more visible, more efficient and more aggressive at the international level, bacause to be strong, efficient and aggressive, we must speak with one voice.

Faced with this reality, Canada wants to speak with one single voice. However, Canada forgets that there is a major voice in Canada, albeit a minority voice, as my colleague has remarked; there is Quebec's voice, which has represented a nation, a people, since the beginning of the Canadian Confederation. This voice has always made itself heard. Today, considering the globalization of economies and the fact that Quebec feels somewhat threatened by this globalization from the economic viewpoint, and not only from the viewpoint of its culture and its language, the economic argument becomes an important one for nationalists in Quebec.

In the past, we wanted to achieve sovereignty in order to maintain our language and our culture. That is fine, and that is still the most important reason, at least as far as I am concerned. However, in the last ten years or so, we have come to realize that the economic argument is gaining increasing importance. Quebecers realize that they too must speak with one single voice if they want their people, their nation, to continue developing in a global context.

I agree with the representatives of Canadian federalism that, in the global context, we must speak out loud and clear, with a single voice, and that timing is a major consideration. It is also one of the reasons why sovereignists in Quebec have been saying for many years that sovereignty should not be achieved only to preserve our language and our culture, but also to give Quebec the economic health and vitality it needs to maintain its place in the international community.

I thank my colleague for his question. It allows me to demonstrate, although I recognize the merit of our federalist colleagues' arguments from a Canadian viewpoint, that the sovereignists' arguments are also of an economic nature. I hope that some day, in a newly defined partnership with Canada, we will be able to accommodate both sides so that both Canada and Quebec can get what they want economically as well as play a leading role in the world economy.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in this debate concerning Bill C–100, once again we see the separatists grabbing at an opportunity to attack a Canadian bill, not because it is a poor one, but simply because it is one that would be good for Canada. In other words, if a bill is good for Canada, they are going to attack it.

What they have told us today is that Bill C–100 is an encroachment on provincial jurisdiction, in other words one more intrusion by the federal government. But that is not true in the least. What is it? This is not a bill aimed at regulating co–operatives in Quebec or elsewhere in Canada. It is a bill that will reaffirm the vital role played by the Bank of Canada in protecting all Canadians and all Canadian institutions against systemic risks that may originate anywhere in the world.

We have witnessed the collapse of Barings Bank, which could have caused many problems in our country. What we are proposing in this bill is to give the Bank of Canada the power to guarantee transactions between financial institutions, either in Canada or elsewhere.

This means that if a Canadian banking institution or even a credit union had received a cheque, say for $100 million drawn on Barings Bank and had deposited that cheque, but Barings Bank had gone bankrupt before the cheque cleared, while in the meantime, counting on the $100 million, the institution had paid some of its debts, that institution would have sustained a heavy loss.

What we need to do from the time a cheque is received by a Canadian institution, is to be sure that it can be counted on. But they do not want this. Why do they not want a system which would entitle all Canadian institutions to certainty when financial transactions are concerned?

[English]

The fact that the Bloc members are complaining about an intrusion in their constitutional domain is typical of what they will do with every bill we see in this House that is for the good of all Canadians, including Quebecers. They are going to try to find some way to knock it down so that they can say that Canada does not work. Their agenda is not the better working of Canada, it is the destruction of this very country. Canadians are not going to be fooled; Quebecers are not going to be fooled.

Let us get down to some of the essences of Bill C–100. Part of the genesis of it was the failure of Confederation Life which shook all Canadians. We had not expected it; a great financial institution went down.

The insurance industry put in place an institution called CompCorp where it contributes funds to protect the policyholders when there is a failure of an insurance institution. The government was concerned that perhaps there was not enough federal regulation in terms of CompCorp, that maybe some of the interests which we needed to have on the table, acting for all Canadians, were not going to be there.

The minister proposed a new type of institution using the insurance companies but also having a greater federal presence. The insurance industry came back to us and said it did not like our federal proposal, but it recognized that there were some improvements it had to make in the way CompCorp was run. The industry said it would make the changes in order to respect the needs of all Canadians.

This was a remarkable process. The minister put out a challenge and the industry responded on its own. The government is not involved in yet another program that could cost it funds, but the industry has assumed this responsibility in a way that will even strengthen the protection available to policyholders.

I commend the industry for coming up with this solution. It is the way we have to work. It was the spirit in which all of the measures in Bill C–100 were addressed.

One of the other issues which came before the committee was addressed by my colleague from the Reform Party. His party will not be supporting the bill because it believes we should not have Canadian deposit insurance which covers every last cent owed to a depositor up to $60,000. Reformers want a system of co–insurance so that if someone deposits funds in a financial institution which is regulated by the federal government, the depositor cannot be guaranteed 100 cents on the dollar to the first $60,000 he or she deposited.

There is a rationale for what the Reform members say and it does have some merit. The merit is that if I as an individual am responsible for part of the risk on that $60,000, I will be more prudent in selecting the institution in which I deposit my funds. I will investigate whether it is credit worthy. I will look around with due diligence before I make that deposit.

In theory that makes a lot of sense but in practice I wonder whether it would really work for the vast majority of Canadians. How many of them have the opportunity to investigate on their own whether a financial institution is really solvent, whether it is really solid, whether it is going to pay back their deposit within five years if it is a term deposit for that amount of time?

Can we really look five years down the road if we are making a term deposit, even if we have access to all of those financial documents? I am not really sure it is reasonable to expect everyone who deposits in a bank or a financial institution to do that, and most people do have deposits. Is it reasonable to expect all Canadians to undertake this with due diligence? Even if they do undertake it, is it reasonable to expect that they can look five years down the road when their deposit is to mature?

I like the idea of Canadians taking a greater role in looking at their returns and not just going for the highest return. If somebody is paying more than the going rate, perhaps there is a reason for it. Perhaps they are desperate for the funds and they will take them at any price. I suspect that what we have to do as a federal government is make sure through our federal institutions that the deposit taking institutions are solvent. Through the Superintendent of Insurance and other federal agencies we have undertaken that greater role of making sure those institutions to which we have given the privilege of taking deposits will hopefully be safe in the future.

This is why I believe it is important in order to protect the vast majority of individual Canadians that we continue to maintain the full level of deposit insurance. This does not mean we cannot look at this issue in the future and perhaps look at other ways in which we can achieve the same results.

I want to go back to the process by which we looked at Bill C–100 and how it evolved. It can serve as an example for other federal legislation.

The Secretary of State for Financial Institutions put out a white paper last spring. He gave the industry about three months to respond to it. The industry studied it and came back with its considerations. The minister took those considerations into mind when he introduced the bill which came down last spring.

The finance committee sat in the month of August and heard testimony on the bill. The committee did not wait for the House to give it this reference. The bill has not even achieved second reading yet. It had just been tabled in June but we thought it important to get feedback from the industry again.

The finance committee held two very intensive days of hearings here in August. About 15 recommendations for modifications to the bill were made. The industry was very enthusiastic that we had accepted what it had proposed for CompCorp which was the major issue, to try to protect policyholders of our insurance companies in the future.

The industry came back with some concrete and constructive suggestions as to how Bill C–100 could be improved. We have noted those suggestions. The vast majority of the recommendations made at the hearings were very constructive.

We are now at the stage that even before the bill has been officially given to the committee by the House, we are looking at the recommendations made by industry. We are having discussions with officials, and we are continuing discussions with members of the industry. I am sure by the time the bill sees the light of day again it will have a number of constructive amendments attached to it. The amendments will not be arrived at through confrontation nor by saying: "Here it is; take it or leave it". It will be through the constructive, co–operative efforts of those of us here in Ottawa, of the officials who are knowledgeable and of those from the industry who are concerned with achieving a proper legislative result.

I commend the minister for this approach. I commend the industry for the very constructive role it has taken. There is only one sour note we have seen in this whole bill.

It was when the committee sat during the month of August. The separatists tried to attack the bill on the grounds that it was a federal intrusion in a provincial jurisdiction. That was not the case at all. It would have been ultra vires for the federal government to do so.

What we did was give the Bank of Canada the power to provide better protection for all Canadian institutions, including the caisses in Quebec and all the co–ops and banks, against major risks, the systemic risks in the financial system as a whole.

The separatists themselves asked to keep the Canadian dollar. So would they prefer to ignore a better way to protect financial institutions and the dollar? Even if Quebec were an independent country, it would be necessary to protect the large value transfer system and prevent systemic risks.

However, they do not want it now and never will. We all know that the Bloc strategy, the separatist strategy is to attack us every time we do something good for all Canadians.

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I note our hon. colleague has just said, and, very much to the point, I think, that the aim of the bill was never to invade Quebec's jurisdiction, and I believe him. I do not think the ministers opposite and our Liberal colleagues spend their time trying to think of ways to create bills to invade Quebec's jurisdictions.

That is absolutely true. I think their aim is probably to come up with good bills that will apply to all Canadians, in Canada's best interest. I am not questioning this, but the effect of the bill is to invade Quebec's jurisdictions—there is no way round it. Even Daniel Johnson, a Quebec federalist, agrees.

All this, because, on the whole, Canada is pursuing an orderly and intelligent course of development, which obliges it to centralize its powers. Mr. Trudeau recently stated that Canada cannot be decentralized any more than it is, because it is the most decentralized confederation.

Clearly, in order to become a strong country, Canada must centralize its powers in Ottawa, and this is in fact what the government is doing.

The effect of this centralization of powers in Ottawa is to rob Quebec of its powers. This is Canada's big problem. We have two sets of jurisdiction pursuing different interests for the most part. This has not been so obvious until now, because the Quebecers we sent to the House were lost in parties like the Conservative or the Liberal Party, where they were in the minority and where they were entitled to speak in the House only to toe the party line.

Now there is the Bloc Quebecois, which truly represents the interests of Quebecers and is truly in keeping with Quebec's history. This position is being defended not only by the sovereignists, but has been defended by events in Quebec since 1950 and earlier. The position has been defended by Quebec's premiers, whatever their political stripe—federalist or sovereignist.

There was Maurice Duplessis, who said, on Quebecers' behalf, "Rendez–moi mon butin à Ottawa", calling for the return of the province's powers, and he got them too. There was Jean Lesage, who started the Quiet Revolution, and talked of "Maîtres chez nous". What did he mean? He realized we lacked some of the tools we needed for our development. Then there was Daniel Johnson, Sr., who said "Égalité ou indépendance", and yet he was not a sovereignist. Toward the end of his term of office, he realized that it was absolutely necessary for Quebec to retain its powers and—if possible—obtain new ones for its economic and political survival. In this ever–changing political environment, René Lévesque managed to launch the sovereignist movement. This movement is still influential; it has led to the presence in this House members of the Bloc Quebecois, which is representative of Quebec.

Of course, there are representatives of Quebec within the Liberal Party. But these are isolated cases. Quebec is represented by the Bloc quebecois. I know that Canada needs to centralize its powers. I would like to ask my colleague a simple question. Does not he think that it is time—I know that the Prime Minister has said or at least implied, maybe not to us, but to Quebecers, that he might decentralize Canada or some minor services, when we know perfectly well—

Mr. Bryden: No, no.

Mr. Pomerleau: Yes, as a matter of fact. Well, there will be no decentralization, but the fact remains that the Prime Minister indicated to Quebecers there would be some decentralization.

Does my colleague not agree basically, if we consider the situation in a simple and rational manner instead of an emotional manner, that Canada needs to have all his powers in Ottawa, that Quebec feels that its powers should be centralized in Quebec City, and that any attempt to transfer powers from Ottawa to Quebec is bound to fail?

Mr. Peterson: Never, Mr. Speaker, will we give the provinces power over our monetary system.

The Bank of Canada's powers are based on its responsibilities for guaranteeing large value transfers, to create a safer, more responsible system for all Canadians, including Quebecers.

Why decentralize? Destroy what? Our monetary system, the Bank of Canada system? That would be stupid, and the hon. member knows it.

Why, during the referendum campaign, did they ask for the right to use the Canadian dollar? Were they afraid of using another monetary system? Of course they were. Why did they spend so much money to support the Canadian dollar when the markets were almost predicting Quebec's separation? They were afraid. That is why the Bank of Canada must be able to control and guarantee transfers as provided for in Bill C–100.

I will not get into a debate on the other powers that could be devolved to the provinces. There is certainly a great deal of overlap and duplication in powers. Our Prime Minister said that it would be better to work together with all the provinces to better serve Canadians in reducing spending, red tape and duplication.

As far as manpower is concerned, almost a year ago, the minister wrote the Quebec government in an attempt to negotiate something in the sector mentioned by the hon. member. He never received an answer. This shows the hypocrisy of the Bloc in this House. They want to get powers, money and independence without contributing to the debate affecting all Canadians. They will continue to do so, but we will not be fooled. Even without the Bloc's co–operation, we will continue to build with all the other members of this House a more effective, more profitable, more generous, more prosperous country. And we will do so in spite of the separatists.

[English]

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I applaud the comments of the member for Willowdale. I agree completely with everything that he said. The opening comments of my speech on this issue were reflective of that.

Getting to the issue at hand, co–insurance is very important. It is important because there has to be accountability in the marketplace and a responsibility if we are going to have monetary controls, if we are going to be able to give people any sense of comfort.

We must end in a way with the small depositor in particular, having some form of protection. As I pointed out in my speech, the difficulty of having 100 per cent protection and not having co–insurance is that the government then has to step into the monetary market to an extent that the small investor is absolved of responsibility for his or her investment decisions.

That is bad because money is not moral, money is not national. Money is neither of those things. Money is a way of exchanging value within the entire world community. To isolate depositors to federally controlled institutions from the reality of that is to introduce into Canada a system of insulating us from the reality of trading money.

I point out that there is an almost universal consensus for co–insurance. In spite of diverse interests, the banks, the insurance industry, both the present and the past superintendents, the chairman of the CDIC, the Canadian Institute of Actuaries, academics, including most recently the Public Interest Advocacy Centre which studied the issue from the consumer's point of view and the Senate banking committee, have supported co–insurance.

In light of this virtual universal acceptance of the idea of co–insurance, would the member who is the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance support an amendment put forward at report stage by the Reform Party to seek co–insurance, instead of what is currently proposed in this bill?

• (1325)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Much to the regret of the House, the hon. member will not be able to respond because the time for questions and comments has lapsed. As much as the member for Willowdale might like to reply, time has run out.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to add my voice to those of my hon. colleagues in the government in support of Bill C–100.

The government has taken the position that the state and its officials should not try to do what others can do better. This is particularly true when it comes to the world of business and when it comes to making sure that we do not stand in the way of private sector dynamism. Furthermore, never in Canada's history has it been so important to control the cost of government. Our fiscal situation demands it and so do Canadians, who are suffering from tax fatigue.

I raise these points because they represent important underpinnings for some of the measures before us: specifically, the actions that Bill C–100 will implement regarding corporate governance.

Underlying the changes to the governance framework is a very basic assumption. The simple fact is, no system can forestall any financial institution failure unless it is given the authority and resources to oversee all management decisions and unless institutions are severely restricted in the loans and investments they can make. However the price of such a failure safe system, even if it did work which I doubt, would be to strip that industry from contributing to the dynamism, growth and evolution of our economy.

This is where the issue of cost also raises its head. To try and implement greater micro–management of the financial sector will require a veritable army of additional auditors and regulators. This is the approach used in the United States. However, at a time when governments must downsize, I do not see this as an option anyone here wishes to embrace.

The alternative is to take a governance oriented regulatory approach by putting greater onus for the well–being of financial institutions on the management and the board of directors of financial institutions. This is an approach employed by the United Kingdom regulators.

Whether either approach could be characterized as a more efficient system of governance is difficult. Each system functions at opposite ends of the spectrum and it would be difficult to advocate that one approach was somehow foolproof in preventing failure, or better than the other, given the global environment in which institutions must operate.

As the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions has argued so well, and I concur, our supervisory and regulatory systems cannot be positioned as a mechanism or regime dedicated to preventing an institutional failure. If we tried to do that, we would limit the potential well–being of the financial sector and its ability to serve the economy and Canadians. Rather, any specific supervisory approach should be built around the fiscal, business and economic environments. It is important that the regulatory tools be responsive to changes in these environments.

The changes in Bill C–100 to the governance for financial institutions strike a balance. They are not intrusive. Rather they clearly recognize that the role of the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions is not, and cannot be, to micro–manage financial institutions. They give OSFI due authority but not excessive authority to intervene in the governance of financial institutions but only when circumstances warrant.

I should also highlight that the changes in Bill C–100 build on and enhance changes introduced in the wide ranging reform of financial statutes of 1992. It was during the 1992 reforms when the statutes were revised to require that no more than two–thirds of the directors could be affiliated with a financial institution. In other words, at least one–third of the directors would have no relationship with the company and as a result, would not in any way be beholden to management.

The 1992 reforms also implemented the requirement that important board committees, such as the audit committee, be comprised of a majority of unaffiliated directors. These were valid and valuable changes, but they left some unfinished business that Bill C–100 will complete. They enhance the balance which would place onus on management and directors for their own governance and yet allow the regulator to intervene where circumstances warrant.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it being 1.30 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Parliament should adopt specific measures to enable and ensure access by members of Parliament to all judicial, quasi–judicial and administrative hearings held under the provisions of the Immigration Act, the Young Offenders Act and the Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion exhorts the government to put in place measures that would allow members of Parliament access to what are now closed door procedures under three separate federal statutes. The exhortation is for access, not a procedure for making submissions or representations. It is merely for access, presence or entry into procedures which deal with the rights and liberties of Canadians behind closed doors.

I have three short anecdotes gained from my several years of experience as a member of Parliament where, as have all of us in the House, I confronted barriers to access for members of Parliament when fulfilling our duties.

The first anecdote has to do with an Immigration Act refugee hearing about five years ago. Someone came to me to ask for my assistance in gaining a visitor visa for a brother. I did what I could. In the end after two or three interventions and a lot of work a visa was issued. The brother came and in complete disregard of all that had happened and the good faith of the family, he made an application for refugee status. I knew the man was a liar. I also knew he had put forth false information. I knew that the applicant would be presenting that false information at a refugee hearing.

Therefore I followed it very closely, particularly because what had happened was an abuse of my office and collectively involved the offices of all members of Parliament. I owed a duty to my constituents and to Canadians to make sure that my MPs office was not abused.

I went to the hearing where to my surprise I found that it was a closed door hearing and I could not be admitted. As things turned out, the hearing was adjourned. I made an application for access and it was granted. I was allowed to be present at the hearing but in the end I did not have to present evidence. The application was denied and the man was deported. Under a federal statute a hearing can take place and under a law enacted by the House MPs do not have access. That case worked out reasonably well but it caused me concern.

There were two subsequent cases, one involving the prosecution of a young offender charged with murder under the Criminal Code. In that case I did not need to have access at the time, but I did take note of the provisions of the Young Offenders Act that can exclude individuals or groups from young offender hearings. A little light went on and I thought it was not healthy to have a statute enacted by the House excluding members of Parliament not specifically but generically. That was another case.

A third case involved parole hearings. Under current legislation there is no provision for access by any of the public to those hearings. In one particular Parole Act statute, and I do not know when it was repealed, MPs and senators were given access to parole hearings. Under the current Corrections and Conditional Release Act there is the absence of any provision to provide access to MPs or to allow the public access to those hearings.

I was at the Warkworth Institution about four years ago and had the benefit of attending a hearing, thanks to the decision of an inmate and his solicitor. It was useful to walk through the process at the time. There is hardly a member of Parliament in this place who will not be called upon at some point in his or her career to address issues involving hearings under the three statutes. My motion raises the issue for consideration by the House.

We are accountable to our constituents for the effectiveness and fairness of every procedure under all federal statutes. We are responsible to ensure the collective rights and liberties of our constituents are protected and are not abused by the procedures. We enact the laws and we are accountable to our constituents for them.

We are legislators but as history has evolved members of Parliament are also ombudsmen. That second role means that we must have as much access and freedom as an ombudsman in any provincial government, in any municipal government or at the federal government level. At the moment in the three federal statutes there are barriers to that access.

To the extent that MPs are unable to access the procedures, we run the risk of impairing our role as ombudsmen. The purpose of the motion is to get us all thinking a bit about our roles in particular under the three statutes. We must consider what we do when we enact statutes in the House and roll back to some degree the present barriers.

For the sake of the record I will cite the sections of the three statutes. In the Young Offenders Act it is subsection 39(1) and subsection 39(3). In the Corrections and Conditional Release Act it is subsection 140(5). In the Immigration Act it is subsection 69(2).

I wish to make a few comments about how the role of members of Parliament has evolved over the years. I have mentioned the legislator role and the ombudsman role. Parliament has evolved over the years, but in terms of the newer role of ombudsman it has not evolved sufficiently. Our ombudsman role is carried out in part based on the privileges of members of Parliament which are fairly well articulated, constrained and referred to directly and indirectly in the Constitution, in the Parliament of Canada Act and in the common law handed down to us when Parliament was created 128 years ago.

I do not have to go over them but I will point out that in every session of Parliament it is important for MPs to resubmit our request to the Sovereign for confirmation of our privileges in the House of Commons. The words read somewhat archaically but in a real way:

> We humbly claim all of our undoubted rights and privileges especially that they may have the freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable construction.

As obscure as some of those words are, they are the request for the body of privileges and rights we collectively have in the House of Commons. We need them for the most important modern roles we have as members of Parliament, legislators and ombudsmen.

I was somewhat shocked about two months ago to read a legal opinion submitted to a committee by a body created by the House for the purpose of assuring Parliament and Canadians of the rights and liberties of Canadians in a particular field. The opinion was essentially that the body appointed by a statute enacted in Parliament did not have the obligation to answer questions put to it by members of Parliament at committee. It is a very serious issue for members of Parliament and has been for hundreds of years.

The legal opinion appeared to me to be completely ignorant of parliamentary law, which as I stated earlier is part of the Constitution. It verged on being contemptuous of parliamentary law. I simply put that on the shelf and say that hopefully there will be more on the issues of privilege and disclosure to parliamentarians in the new year.

There are two ways to address our role as ombudsmen. First, we could expand our privileges. Some of us believe that is not a great way to go, that there are more effective ways of addressing the problems. However we need to ensure our rights and privileges are vital, responsive and evergreen in what we need to do in our job as members of Parliament. Second, we can be vigilant when enacting legislation to ensure that our role as MPs is not impaired in connection with procedures under the statutes. The motion before us today is attempting to roll back barriers that we have placed in the statutes.

Canadians want to know that their MPs are equipped, fully aware and conversant to deal with all of the procedures under federal statutes. We enacted them, so we had better know what is going on under those procedures. In order to know fully what is going on on behalf of our constituents, I say that access is fundamental.

When I say access I am not saying that we have to change the procedures to allow MPs to make representations, submissions, arguments and get involved in the process; I am simply saying access. We should not close the door to ourselves in fulfilling our work as MPs.

I ask my colleagues, the officials of government and the ministers to take note of this important issue.

I will not close without putting on the record what should be to all of us in this place self–evident. In our system of government the ministers sit in the House. They have burdensome responsibilities. I am sure they live 26–hour days. However, in doing their work they would be more likely to be ministers of government and less likely to be parliamentarians working for Parliament. Their job as ministers is to work for the government. They sit in Parliament. I suppose that most of them are good parliamentarians, but in terms of addressing the parliamentary agenda, very few of them would take the initiative to address matters directly on behalf of Parliament. That is somebody else's job. Whose job is it? It is not the ministers', it is the parliamentarians' job. It is the job of every member of Parliament and every senator who sits in Parliament.

In dealing with this issue we must not look to government. We must not look to ministers. We must look to ourselves. Hopefully the ministers will acquiesce in the constructive, positive things we do for Parliament.

Everything we do for Parliament will be handed down to our children and their children. We must not let this place atrophy. We must ensure that Parliament and its procedures are responsive to and vital for Canadians. It is our job to do that.

I leave this motion with the exhortation that it is our job to do this. Hopefully there will be support for this type of initiative, not just in this motion but as we pass legislation in the future.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak today to Motion No. 39, moved on January 18, 1994, by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, which reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Parliament should adopt specific measures to enable and ensure access by Members of Parliament to all judicial, quasi–judicial and administrative hearings held under the provisions of the Immigration Act, the Young Offenders Act, and the Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

This motion refers to three acts. As a general rule, court hearings are public. In camera hearings are the exception. It is not very hard to understand that confidentiality may be required when the life, freedom or security of a person could be put at risk by public hearings.

In immigration matters, the court that rules on refugee status claims is the Immigration and Refugee Board, the IRB.

• (1350)

The IRB is made up of three divisions: the Refugee Division, where proceedings are normally held in camera; the Appeal Division, where normally proceedings are public; the Adjudication Division, where normally proceedings are public also.

Section 69(2) of the Immigration Act provides that: "Subject to subsections (3) and (3.1), proceedings before the Refugee Division shall be held in the presence of the person who is the subject of the proceedings, wherever practicable, and be conducted in camera or, if an application therefor is made, in public". This is the provision the member's motion deals with.

Subsection (3.1) adds that: "Where the Refugee Division considers it appropriate to do so, it may take such measures and make such order as it considers necessary to ensure the confidentiality of any hearing held in respect of any application referred to in subsection (3)". The legislator has therefore established the confidential nature of hearings before IRB commissioners, since refugee claimants may have to give details about their life and the dangers they had to face. Sometimes, as is the case with rape victims, they have to describe intimate situations and circumstances that the public does not have the right to know.

On the other hand, confidentiality is not needed in appeal cases dealing mostly not with facts but points of law. Thus, sections 80(1) provides that "Subject to subsections (2) and (3), an appeal to the Appeal Division shall be conducted in public". This is the general principle.

The exception is covered by subsection 80(2). It reads: "Where the Appeal division is satisfied that there is a serious possibility that the life, liberty or security of any person would be endangered by reason of the appeal being conducted in public, the Appeal Division may, on application therefor, take such measures and make such order as it considers necessary to ensure the confidentiality of the appeal".

As for the Young Offenders Act, it states, under subsection 39(1) that: "Subject to subsection (2), where a court of justice before whom proceedings are carried out under this Act is of the opinion (a) that any evidence or information presented to the court or justice would be seriously injurious or seriously prejudicial to

(i) the young person who is being dealt with in the proceedings,

(ii) a child or young person who is witness in the proceedings, or

(iii) a child or young person who is aggrieved by or the victim of the offence charged in the proceedings, or (b) that it would be in the interest of the public morals, the maintenance of order or the proper administration of justice to exclude any or all members of the public from the courtroom, the court or justice may exclude any person from all part of the proceedings if the court or justice deems that person's presence to be unnecessary to the conduct of the proceedings".

This provision is very clear as it relates to young offenders. This piece of legislation is based on the principle of rehabilitating young offenders. While the need for punishment is recognized, the focus is on rehabilitation into the community to preserve the public peace. That is why it strongly protects the young offenders' identity, disclosure of which to the media, as well as the disclosure of any fact that could give away their identity, being forbidden.

Also, the presence of observers is controlled to ensure fair treatment to all. There is a strict procedure governing admission to hearings, and it is difficult to see why these measures ought to be changed. Once can easily imagine what impact the presence of a member of Parliament in the courtroom would have on a young offender. And what use would this information be to the member, since none of it can be disclosed in any case?

The third statute referred to in the motion is the Corrections and Conditional Release Act. Subsection 141(4) of that act provides that: "The commission may, to the extent deemed absolutely necessary, prevent the communication of information to an offender, if it has reasonable grounds to believe that such communication would be against the public interest, would jeopardize the safety of a person or of the penitentiary, or would jeopardize the holding of a legal inquiry".

Looking at the three above-mentioned statutes, I think that Parliament was right, in the specific cases that were mentioned, to allow in-camera proceedings and to protect confidentiality of files, as well as the right to privacy of individuals.

I realize that the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River seeks to facilitate the job of parliamentarians by, among other things, ensuring that they can attend any judicial, quasi-judicial or administrative hearing, if only to verify the administration of federal statutes.

However, there are other ways of assessing the effectiveness of a piece of legislation. Let us not forget that separating the legislative and judicial powers is a basic principle to ensure a sound democracy. In that sense, the presence of a member of Parliament, who is a symbol of political power, would not always be a good thing in the situations targeted by the hon. member's motion.

The Immigration Act best exemplifies the negative impact that the presence of an MP could have on a refugee claimant, who may never have appeared before a court in his country of origin, and who does not really know Canada's rules and policies in that regard. Such a presence could often be intimidating for the claimant. This is especially true if the claimant knows that the MP is not particularly receptive to his claim. This is sometimes the case, as in the Malik affair, which took place in Toronto, in 1991, and to which the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River just referred.

These three statutes all authorize in-camera proceedings or public hearings. At certain stages of the process, they require that some restrictions be applied, so as to ensure protection of, among other things, the right to privacy. Why should members of Parliament be allowed to violate these rights, and what use would they make of the information obtained?

This is the real issue. For all these reasons, I oppose Motion No. 39.

[English]

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in my short period as a member of Parliament this will be the third private member's bill I have had the pleasure to speak to and in favour of. The first two were from the member for York South—Weston and the member for Hamilton—Wentworth.

I am happy to see a motion such as this with the common sense attached to it the Canadian people have been talking about for many years, with government not listening. I am dismayed that common sense motions that reflect the mood of the Canadian people have not been forthcoming from the government and the ministers themselves. They primarily come through private members' motions.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to Motion No. 39 today put forward by the member for Scarborough—Rouge River. I understand the intent of the motion. It is a terrific motion. It is long overdue.

The motion seeks to open up judicial and quasi-judicial hearings to members of Parliament. The member is quite right when he talks about how an MP's daily role now takes on the form in many cases of an ombudsman. We are elected to represent our constituents. The people come to us with many concerns they want us to help them with.

• (1400)

A number of constituents have asked me what is wrong with the system. Why is this person in the country when he has such a terrible criminal record in the country he came from? Does no one know about these things? What goes on in those hearings?

The case the hon. member was involved with, the Malik case, was an example. It was not, as I understand it, criminal activity, but the individual had entered Canada under pretences. I understand he applied for a visitor's visa and the member went to bat for him on it, and then when the person arrived as a visitor he promptly claimed to be a refugee. Without the knowledge of this the refugee board would have no idea about the deceptive method by which the person came to Canada.

I disagree with the member for Bourassa when he said that this person's position could have been prejudiced. Truth never prejudices anything. Truth is always what we as MPs should be looking to see prevails in every case.

In his motion the member refers specifically to such hearings held under the Immigration Act, the Young Offenders Act and the Corrections and Conditional Release Act. As members know, in our lifetimes we have been absolutely frustrated and bewildered at times by some of the decisions that have come out of these three institutions.

We ask how the parole hearings can possibly release this person into society. We may never know why some of these things happen. We would never know unless somehow we as MPs, as the ombudsmen for our constituents, had some form of access. I am sure the member is not talking about intervener status or advocacy status. I believe that in the bill he is simply talking about automatic observer access to hearings, so that when he as a member of Parliament, a representative of the Canadian people, sees that something is going on that is simply not right, he will be better able to speak about it in the House of Commons and maybe in some legislation to try to correct the wrong that is being done or the interpretation of the rules that is not conducive to what the Canadian people feel.

Certainly the three institutions the member lists are the very three I have had the most trouble with in my lifetime with regard to their decisions. I support the member's bill with regard to these three institutions.

I am aware that particular members of my own party, the Reform Party, have been involved in the process and have experienced first hand some of the barriers that face MPs when they attempt to attend some of these quasi–judicial hearings. I am referring to the members for Fraser Valley West and Calgary Northeast.

The member opposite thinks this is a joking matter. The fact is in these two instances a refugee had committed some serious crimes in Canada and the immigration people were trying to get this person out of the country. The person went before a hearing and the member for Fraser Valley West was in fact prevented from attending it. The member had personal firsthand knowledge of some of the things that may not have been brought out there. He was not allowed to present them. I understand that; that is proper. However the members of this quasi–judicial committee were not regarding this case in the fullest sense of the circumstances.

This was of great concern to the member for Fraser Valley West, because he had the protection of society as his first thought in mind. There was the very real possibility that if this individual had been granted refugee status he would have been a threat to the public safety of the citizens of British Columbia. He had a lengthy criminal record, including a charge of rape. However, as these MPs found out, the safety and the rights of victims are secondary to the rights of a criminal before a quasi–judicial body.

I know that the member for Scarborough—Rouge River has had personal incidents where he has run up against the same type of situation, where he was barred from attending a hearing. Motion M–39 would seek to change this situation by permitting automatic observer access to these hearings. Based on the member's own experience, I can fully understand the intent of the motion.

There are a couple of things we have to be very clear and very careful about. I am sure the member in his motion does not imply this in any way. We have to be careful that MPs are not permitted to interfere in any way with the operations and decisions of these hearings as a participant. Nor should an MP be permitted to put pressure on the people who are conducting the hearings.

I suppose the motion—and perhaps the member for Bourassa has taken this opinion—could be interpreted in such a way that an MP would have some sort of official status or presence in the hearing. I do not think that is the intent of the motion. The wording should be examined very carefully: specific measures should be adopted to enable and ensure access for MPs. The word that needs to be clarified is "access". This could be taken to mean a whole range of things. I agree with the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River that his meaning of this is very specific and narrow. However, it could be interpreted, as it was by the member for Bourassa, as being perhaps prejudicial to any of these hearings.

Time goes quickly when speaking on a bill of such importance, and so I will close. Although this bill will certainly enable the MPs to do their job as ombudspersons for the people they represent and it will go a long way to helping us, I really believe that ultimately this government will have to take a look at the legislation which covers these institutions and make major reforms to them so that the Canadian people once again can have some confidence in these quasi–judicial bodies which are supposed to protect our society.

My party and I will support the member's motion. We wish him success in this motion, wherever it may travel from here.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very proud to live in a country that is seen around the world as being kind, compassionate and welcoming as a nation. Over the past few decades we have opened our hearts to tens of thousands of refugees. We have been a safe haven in a world of hunger, death and tribulation.

• (1410)

A key element of our refugee determination system is the Immigration and Refugee Board. The board was established in 1989 to allow refugee claimants the right to an oral hearing. These hearings are usually not open to the public. There are a number of very good reasons for this.

A number of applicants are worried that what they say during their hearing with a view to obtaining refugee status might reach the ears of groups involved in persecution in their country of origin. Even though they are safe here in Canada, they fear that relatives and friends may be exposed to reprisals for their statements.

[English]

We may have difficulty imagining that possibility from here in Canada. It is sometimes hard to imagine that there are regimes where you could be arrested, tortured, or killed for your beliefs or for the beliefs of your friends and associates. We must remember this. If we want the truth, and that is what the refugee hearings are all about, we need to make sure the claimant feels that he or she has the full opportunity to be heard.

We are also concerned with having a system that is open to the public. Accountability is a vital and cherished cornerstone of our governing system. That is why we have struck a balance between the right of the public to know and the right of the claimant to protection and security.

It is a principle of Canadian law that judicial and quasi–judicial decision making take place in an open and transparent environment. The hearings held by the immigration appeals division, for example, are held in public. As I have said, sometimes there must be limits on that openness and transparency. That kind of limit is indeed even enshrined in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in section 1, which talks about reasonable limits prescribed by law that can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. The balance provided in the Immigration Act between the rights of the claimant and the rights of the Canadian public was intended to respect the competing charter concerns.

There are two ways in which an individual or the news media can gain access to the hearing: either the claimant can consent to the presence of the individual, or the hearing panel can, in response to an application, declare the hearing open to the public. In the latter case, the burden is on the claimant to establish that the life, liberty or security of any person would be endangered by a public hearing.

It would be very worthwhile for members to let their constituents know what really goes on in these hearings. It would be very difficult to understand an applicant's objecting to the presence of a representative of the Canadian Parliament, except in very unusual circumstances.

[English]

Is an amendment needed to achieve this level of access to the hearing process? Are lawyers and other counsel advising their clients to resist access by parliamentarians to the hearings? Are members of Parliament being left only with the recourse of litigating the issue of access before the refugee division and the courts? No, they are not.

Accountability is a hallmark of good government. The Canadian government has always held the public's right to know to be sacrosanct. It is a principle we will never abandon. Liberty, justice and freedom demand this. Sometimes the need for individual security demands privacy. An individual's right to safety and protection is another cornerstone of our society. It means we often have to strike a delicate balance. I believe our system does this.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of Motion No. 39. I congratulate the member for Scarborough—Rouge River for having introduced the motion.

He touches on something even deeper than what he remarked on in his own speech. That is, while we all agree that judicial processes should be as transparent as possible, this is particularly important when it comes to order in council appointments.

One of the things he failed to touch on in his speech is what we are dealing with here are boards and tribunals of a quasi–judicial nature, which may have officers of the judicial body who are appointed by government. The motion is very important in this regard, for if we have a quasi–judicial body that consists of government appointees and we do not have a mechanism whereby the deliberations of that body can always be monitored by a representative of the elected people or by the public in some way or another, then we have a very dangerous problem.

I looked at the Immigration Act where it describes the conditions for in camera proceedings. I also noted the remark by the member for Bourassa who said that only the refugee status hearings were the ones held in camera. I submit that the refugee status hearings are precisely those hearings where all the action takes place. This is where we measure whether or not the quasi-judicial body is doing its job. This is where we measure whether or not the people appearing before it should be granted refugee status.

When it comes to the role of the opposition and the role of all members of Parliament in all this, I would expect that opposition members and government members would be extremely interested in how a refugee board or a parole board was performing. This is exactly what we should be doing. The member for Scarborough—Rouge River has a very good point that at the very least if we cannot open these hearings to journalists and the public at large, a member of Parliament should be able to attend them freely.

This is no worse a level of entrusting confidentiality than we would to a minister, a priest or any other person who has a particular position of confidence and importance in the public eye. Who could be more important, if I may say, in the public's eye than someone elected to represent the people?

The question that follows is whether the elected member will hear something he or she should not hear. The member for Bourassa was citing examples where there might be descriptions of personal abuse. I expect members on all sides of the House would respect the reasonable confidences of the innocent people whose testimony they may hear.

On the other hand, members hear independently the performance of the judicial board. For example, it is very important in the interests of democracy to make sure that order in council appointments are not gross patronage. We want to know that the people appointed by the government are people of quality who can do the job. How can we do that unless a member of Parliament from either side sits in on the proceedings?

In the final analysis, the MP has an important role in all of this quite apart from checking the quality of the job done by the members of the tribunal or that justice has served the person appearing before the tribunal. The member of Parliament has the ultimate responsibility because he or she is the law maker. We are the law makers. We cannot make laws unless we can see clearly for ourselves in person that the laws are working. If there is any area of government whatsoever where the law maker, the member of Parliament, cannot go in and see whether the laws are working, then we have a very serious problem.

I congratulate the member for Scarborough—Rouge River for raising this matter because it is a very large and important issue. I would suggest to the members of the Bloc that they should consider this very carefully. They are always saying they believe in the parliamentary system, parliamentary democracy and the need for transparency, and I believe them. I would suggest they reconsider this motion and give it their full support.

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand and support Motion No. 39 on behalf of the member for Scarborough—Rouge River. This is the second private member's motion brought forward by the member to which I have had the pleasure and privilege of speaking.

The member for Scarborough—Rouge River is once again bringing to all members of the House a problem that requires very little effort to rectify. However it may cause members of Parliament to be left in a difficult position when it comes to giving proper representation to cases involving the Immigration Act, the Young Offenders Act and the Corrections and Conditional Release Act. Members of Parliament must be allowed to represent the people who elected them to the full ability they are given under the law and to ensure that they have access to all information concerning the aforementioned acts.

At the present time an immigration hearing is off limits to individual members of Parliament. This is a problem particularly if the member is privy to information which may better represent the truth than the story being presented.

If a family promotes a visitor to Canada through the assistance and help of a member of Parliament and assures the member of Parliament that the person will return to their native land on a specific date, and if the visitor then applies for refugee status upon arrival and asks for welfare in the interim, that is a direct abuse of the system. It may well be that the member of Parliament is the only person aware of the original application and the promises which were made at that time. Therefore, why is the act very specific in section 69(2), which reads that the proceedings before the refugee division, et cetera are to be conducted in camera?

Members of Parliament are elected both to serve as legislators and to act as de facto ombudsmen. In cases where the member of Parliament has an interest and where he or she feels there may be an injustice, they should be allowed observer status automatically. That is not to say that any member of Parliament can attend any closed door meeting going on at any time. The member must be allowed to attend the meeting in which he or she has an interest and may be in a position to dispel some of the myths which are present at a number of these closed door meetings.

In the case of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act of which I am well aware from my experience on the parole board, the parole board may decide at its option to exclude anyone it wishes from the hearing. In other words, it may decide that no witnesses are allowed: no family, no friends or character witnesses who may help the person to gain parole or in fact lose parole. That is allowed under section 140(5) of the act.

Once again a member of Parliament is removed from the role even as observer status in a hearing which may affect the community into which the person could be released on a parole pass, even though the member of Parliament may have important knowledge of the circumstances surrounding the release of the offender.

The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River is not asking for a huge change in these acts. It is a change which can be accomplished with the stroke of a pen if the motion is passed. It is a necessary item of business which requires very few administrative dollars. It opens up the system and makes it transparent. It will help all members of Parliament to function in a more complete manner for the people who have elected them.

I urge the support of all members for Motion No. 39 sponsored by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River. Let us open up the closed door meetings of these agencies and allow members of Parliament to further serve their electors in an effort of fairness for all.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, under whose name Motion No. M–39 stands, has asked the Chair if there would be unanimous consent to grant him under right of reply one minute to close the debate. It must be clearly understood that no one can speak after his intervention.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we wrap up debate on this motion I would like to thank all members for their interventions.

I confirm that the intent of the motion is not to open up closed door hearings completely and not to disclose confidences of witnesses and parties to hearings. It is not to embarrass anyone. It is to facilitate the work which we all do as MPs from time to time. It is to ensure that in the future our legislation is sensitive to and cognizant of the need of members of Parliament to have access to these tribunals, to view them in operation, to see the appointees do their work and to ensure that there is fairness and efficacy in our federal system of government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank the hon. member for his co–operation.

The time provided for consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96, the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should immediately take the required measures to privatize all operations and services of the Canada Post Corporation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for seconding the motion.

My speech will be about 10 minutes long to allow my colleagues to also speak to private members' motion 312. I preface my remarks by stating that Canadians need and deserve an efficient postal service.

The Reform Party supports placing the ownership and control of corporations in the sector that can perform their function most cost effectively, with greatest accountability to owners and the least likelihood of incurring public debt. We believe there is overwhelming evidence that this would be the private sector in the vast majority of cases.

As far as Canada Post Corporation is concerned, the Reform Party supports free competition for the post office. There should be no restrictions on private competition in the delivery of mail, which brings me to my private members' motion. It calls for the government to take measures to privatize the operations and services of the Canada Post Corporation.

There are at least two essential considerations. First, is there any reason at all to involve government in mail delivery? Should it be completely privatized or totally deregulated? Second, if there is reason for government involvement in mail services, is the current system the best and the right way to do it?

As far as the first consideration is concerned, if our goal is simply to maximize efficiency, there is no role for government operations or subsidies here or anywhere else. If people who live in remote places find that mail is hard to send or hard to get, that is a consequence of their home being somewhere remote. If they do not like it, they should move closer to a city or area where mail service is better. Of course, I am not advocating that option.

It is normally argued that the purpose of a national mail service is to contribute to national unity by allowing everyone from sea to sea to sea to send and receive letters at a reasonable price. If this is true, there has to be some sort of government role.

The bulk of the mail is between businesses and their customers, in and around large towns and cities where deliveries can be made cheaply because the volume is so high. In a truly private world, the more remote you are the more your mail will cost. It is true that people in remote places generally are among the less wealthy and less able to afford high postal rates.

Most people, except possibly a few federal cabinet ministers, understand that free citizens do things better, cheaper and more nicely than government. Therefore we should assume that government should not become involved in any particular area and put the burden of proof on those who say it should stay involved and to explain why.

In the case of mail delivery the reason for involving government is to make sure that all Canadians from coast to coast to coast have access to mail in the interests of the national community and national unity. It is not because people think the government would do a good job of delivering the mail, even by the normal standards of bureaucracy.

However, people who think the government should ensure that everyone can get and send mail cheaply should still not want a postal monopoly. The right way to manage the mail would be to promise that anyone, anywhere can mail a letter for a certain rate, say 45 cents. The entire field of delivery would then be thrown wide open and deregulated totally, except that the government would pay for but contract out the job of making mail deliveries at 45 cents per letter to places like Inuvik, that private carriers just could not and would not service cheaply.

This would be paid for out of general revenues. Since the goal of promoting national unity is one that benefits all Canadians equally, it makes sense to ask them all to pay for it. The argument will be made that the government would lose money on this even if it is compared with the present system. What the present system does is penalize all users of mail and all potential mail delivery servers quite heavily. It allows every Canadian to get mail, but imposes the cost disproportionately on one group and in the process damages the Canadian economy. I suggest the damage to the Canadian economy at the hands of Canada Post is not small.

CPC is a perennial money loser, having lost money in three of the last five years, ending its most recent fiscal year with a $68.8 million loss. That amount is only a fraction of the cost to the Canadian economy by the mail monopoly. Slow delivery, private opportunities denied and lost, excessive charges for mail in big towns and cities that could be delivered for less than 45 cents and burdensome bureaucracies are some of the inefficiencies.

The real cost of Canada Post is higher than its on–book losses. Here are a few losses to consider. There is the $68.8 million loss which I just mentioned for 1993–94. It was $22 million higher than the company executives predicted just a year before. Some prediction and, I suppose, some executives. The books also showed a $270 million deficit even though last year CPC showed a profit in its first class mail delivery; a $282 million entry attributed to internal restructuring of some kind. That is more than five times higher than the previous year's entry. No explanation was given for what type of restructuring.

Here is another interesting phenomenon: 41.7 per cent of CPC'S volume of delivered mail is in the form of unaddressed advertising, or as Canadians so affectionately refer to it, junk mail. Here is the kicker. Junk mail generates only 5.2 per cent of CPC's total revenues, which means that nearly half of CPC's volume produces a paltry 5.2 per cent of its revenues.

To the viewers watching, I hope they are sitting down for this. It is illegal for private mail carriers to charge less than $1.29 a piece for the delivery of first class mail, which is nearly three times as high as the already exorbitant price of 45 cents a stamp charged by CPC. It is a monopoly and it is still losing money.

The government is planning to review the operations of CPC. That is really what our country needs, and the people are just dying for it, another study by this do nothing government. CPC should be privatized using the contracting out model of reform on the least subsidy basis; that is, ask for bids to deliver the mail, charge customers 45 cents and take the bid from the company that delivers to remote places as efficiently as possible. The extra cost would be taken out of general revenues as I stated earlier.

One thing is certain. CPC is pricing itself out of the business of delivering mail, especially with more and more businesses turning to faxes and E–mail. CPC is a top down, inefficient monopoly that has no place in the emerging global economy. I urge the government to take action to allow private carriers the opportunity to be involved in mail delivery. Not only would it help to fix our ailing economy, but the Canadian people would be much better served.

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House states:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should immediately take the required measures to privatize all operations and services of the Canada Post Corporation.

I cannot support this motion. To support it is to support an end to universal access. My riding of Annapolis Valley—Hants is primarily a rural riding, a riding where people recognize the important role of the post office in strengthening the economic and social infrastructure of our communities.

Much like myself, the hon. member for Yellowhead lives in and represents a predominantly rural riding, an area where a private corporation might not choose to provide a service. Does the hon. member realize that if this motion were adopted, the postal services in his riding and in rural ridings across Canada could be seriously affected or become non–existent?

As government we believe in the importance of providing easy access for all Canadians regardless of where they live. I cannot understand why the member for Yellowhead would introduce a motion that could deny postal services to his own constituents.

Canada Post is improving services to Canadians. In the past five years Canada Post Corporation has increased by nearly 30 per cent the number of locations where stamps, postal products and postal services can be purchased. The crown corporation has a network of over 2,500 franchise outlets across the country. When we walk into our local drug store or convenience store, chances are we can purchase postal products at one of these outlets. These outlets attract customers to these locations which means increased commerce. It is good for business and good business helps our economy.

By building on these partnerships with local businesses, Canada Post is expanding the accessibility of postal services without incurring large expenditures. This is part of Canada Post's drive to ensure convenient access to postal services for Canadians.

I also point out to the hon. member that independent surveys done by Decima and Anderson Strategic Research show that customer satisfaction with these outlets is well over 90 per cent.

Canada Post's diversity is evident and it is demonstrated in how it operates throughout the country. Take for example Atlantic Canada. In Atlantic Canada, Canada Post is a 200–year old federal institution which has helped to build and maintain the region. Atlantic Canada is predominantly rural and has the largest number of small post offices in the country. Among them is Canada Post's first post office which is located in Halifax.

Throughout the region there are approximately 2,300 locations to buy postal products.

The post office is not just a place to buy stamps. It is a place to interact with other people, to establish the links which make a community and build a country. I live across the street from the post office in Canning, Nova Scotia and I see the traffic. I hear the conversations. I see the relationships which are made. I see the transactions people make. I talk to those people. It is the hub of our community.

For millions of Canadians the post office has been a connection point and an important part of our culture. Hon. members will remember that in February 1994 there was talk of further closures of rural and small town post offices. During that debate I talked and met with postal officials and many concerned citizens in my riding of Annapolis Valley—Hants and the message was clear: Do not close down the post offices. I brought that message back to Ottawa.

On February 17, 1994 in the House I urged the government to demonstrate its commitment to rural Canadians to ensure that these post offices remained open. The minister listened to these concerns and to the concerns expressed by Canadians from coast to coast to coast. As we know, he placed a moratorium on closures and conversions of rural and small town post offices. In announcing the moratorium the minister said: "As long as this government is in power, no rural or small town post office will be closed".

I remind the hon. member that in his riding the towns of Whitecourt, Grande Cache, Hinton, Edson and Jasper are all covered by the Liberal moratorium on post office closures.

If Canada Post were to be privatized, would the private company keep all of these small post offices open? Even courier companies are closing down shop in small towns. If these companies close down, who is left? Who will deliver the parcels to rural areas once the hon. member has privatized Canada Post? That is why Canada Post is a necessary national institution.

The hon. member must take into account that 20 per cent of Alberta and 23 per cent of Canada is rural. With privatization there is a real danger that rural Canadians will be forgotten.

People in the town of Evansburg in the hon. member's riding held a meeting and asked the government not to close down their postal outlet. The government is listening. Canada Post under this government will not abandon rural Canadians.

While the motion talks of privatization, I wonder what kind of service Canadians living in the northern regions would receive under this scenario. In all likelihood the answer is nil.

Canada Post has had a profound impact on the north. Since its formation in 1989 the northern services division has been responsible for maintenance and improvements to postal operations in northern Canada.

Ongoing training programs have allowed northern services to work toward the gradual turnover of operations and management to indigenous residents of the area. The area administered includes Yukon, Northwest Territories, communities in northern Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, and all of Labrador. This division represents 72 per cent of Canada's land mass and a diverse population of 221,000 people.

The geographic location, the climate conditions, the low population density and the remoteness of population centres create operational challenges and some difficulties in mail delivery and communication with residents. To overcome these difficulties, the corporation has adopted its network policies and procedures to meet the specific needs of the north.

It is clearly evident that Canada Post helps to promote and maintain this region of our vast country. Canada Post must remain a crown corporation because there is a need to provide consistent services to Canadians while being fiscally responsible. This means servicing all areas of the country, even those which are less profitable, and serving them well.

That is why the Canada Post Corporation was established as a crown corporation on October 16, 1981 out of what was then a government department. I remind all members of the House that the Canada Post Corporation Act was supported by all three parties in the House of Commons. It was welcomed by organized labour, business and consumer groups.

The Canada Post Corporation was established as a crown corporation to provide purpose and direction and to bring business values to the operation of postal services in Canada. Why should this government now take a successful corporation and privatize it? I believe that over the years Canada Post has made progress. However, I also believe we still have a lot of work to do.

I am pleased to see that our government is conducting a mandate review of Canada Post. It has been 15 years since the corporation was established and 10 years since the Marchment report, the last major review of Canada Post's mandate. It is therefore necessary to examine the current situation against the original intent. It provides a valuable opportunity to revisit corporate direction.

Canada Post is a national institution and we are proud of it. Canada Post has achieved many accomplishments. Canada Post is a viable crown corporation and it provides an essential public service.

I cannot support the motion before the House because I believe it would bring an end to universal access to postal services. This in turn would negatively affect the very communities I have been elected to serve.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak to this private member's motion this morning.

As we know, the role of Canada Post will be reviewed by a committee recently set up by the minister; my remarks are therefore subject to this committee's proceedings and subsequent report.

If I understand correctly, today's motion calls for privatizing Canada Post. In principle, since this is a private member's motion, I will speak first on my own behalf and not on behalf of the Bloc. Of course, I myself am not opposed in principle to privatizing government controlled businesses. In principle, one should not be against this. Even the present federal government cannot come out against any kind of privatization, since it has just privatized CN. It is easy to see that this privatization may eliminate some rural services and that this is not necessarily a good thing for people across Canada.

But they may have done the right thing by privatizing CN, especially because of the competition with CP. As for Canada Post, it is indeed a monopoly, which raises questions on the risks of privatizing such a large monopoly.

We already know about the numerous problems with Canada Post. The Canadian Union of Postal Workers has exposed many cases of waste and inefficiency, accusing Canada Post of misusing its money and running considerable deficits from one year to the next because of this. There have also been complaints from private firms, including courier service and mail advertising companies, which deliver information packages from door to door.

I have reviewed this matter quite thoroughly, since industry representatives have complained to me personally that Canada Post unfairly competes with private sector companies. This is something of an outrage because, if I understand correctly, Canada Post can make a profit from its monopoly in first class mail delivery by charging 48 cents for every stamp. If we look only at the revenue from stamp sales and first class mail delivery, Canada Post makes a profit, but uses it to compete with businesses such as home delivery, courier service and mail advertising firms.

This is unfair and I am totally opposed to this kind of competition from the government, whether we are dealing with the postal service or the engineering sector. Canada Post comes under the responsibility of the public works minister, and we will soon have an opportunity, perhaps even this afternoon, to debate Bill C–52, which testifies once again to the government's tendency to compete unfairly with the private sector.

For a government that wants to encourage private enterprise and put in place legislation to promote job creation, this is totally unacceptable. In the case of Canada Post, this is blatant. It is inevitable. Last year, Canada Post's deficit was approximately $70 million, if I am not mistaken, and, before that, I think it was $280 million. But these deficits can be attributed, to some extent, to the fact that Canada Post is spending money it makes as a monopoly to compete with the private sector for courier services and direct mail advertising.

Canada Post's services are not competitive. It is in fact digging in the public purse, because, as a crown corporation, Canada Post belongs to all of us. It belongs to all Canadians and uses its revenues from mail delivery to compete with the private sector. It is obviously unacceptable and, at the very least, Canada Post's mandate should be reviewed to ensure that, if Canada Post maintains its monopoly on first class mail delivery, it should not compete with the private sector, at least not any more.

That is for sure.

But I am not sure how effective it would be to privatize Canada Post and limit, say, its role to first class mail delivery. I wonder because, as I said earlier, Canada Post turns a profit only on first class mail delivery. So, why do that if the service is there and is adequate, or at least cost effective, although there may still be room for improvement within the organization. As I said earlier, according to labour, postal workers, inside staff and others, service delivery could be improved, but there does not seem to be any net benefit in privatizing Canada Post.

But again, it all depends on how Canada Post's mandate review will be conducted. Perhaps, over the next few months, moving away from a monopoly, service delivery could be broadened, in the sense that several private companies could provide the service.

However, there are many instances where, when we try too hard to liberalize certain sectors, ordinary people end up footing the bill. For example, the government's decision to end Bell Canada's monopoly resulted in a significant increase in the costs of telephone services. The same thing also happened in the transport sector and in several other sectors.

Sometimes, the liberalization process is taken too far and is detrimental to public interest. Since consumers have to pay more, we must ask ourselves this question: If we privatize Canada Post so that a number of companies can offer services currently provided exclusively by the corporation, does it mean that, instead of paying 48 cents for the delivery of a first class letter, consumers will have to shell out 75 cents? If this is the case, I do not see how such a change would be beneficial. It would create an excess in the other way.

So far, the government has not used adequate judgment to restrict the mandate of Canada Post and ensure that the corporation does not compete unfairly with private businesses in the delivery of mailings, or even as regards courier services. This an abuse of power and an aberration. It is unacceptable. It may even be immoral. However, it would be just as bad to go to the other extreme, liberalize all the services provided by Canada Post, and trigger a substantial cost increase in the delivery of a first class letter for ordinary Canadians. That could be an excess of another kind.

As a matter of principle, we cannot oppose the privatization of crown corporations. The government has already shown that it was open to privatization. However, a balance must be sought regarding the mandate of Canada Post. Hopefully, once that mandate is reviewed by the minister's committee, balanced recommendations can be made taking into account the interests of all Canadians.

• (1135)

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the motion now before the House proposing the privatization of the post office can be based on myth only, and we on this side of the House prefer to deal with the facts.

The mover of the motion presumes that Canada Post is an inefficient, money losing organization and a drain on the Canadian taxpayer. In fact, Canada Post has achieved a considerable turnaround in its operations and finances. It is self–sufficient and since 1988 no longer receives appropriations from government.

The mover of the motion presumes that Canada Post is an inefficient organization that did not adapt to the realities of the marketplace. Wrong again. In fact, Canada Post has been improving continuously since becoming a crown corporation, with efficiency gains in all aspects of its operations.

It is most important to note the current mandate review, which the minister responsible for Canada Post announced on November 6 of this year. It has been 10 years since the last major review of Canada Post. This review will give Canadians a chance to express their concerns about the corporation.

The review committee will also be analysing the current competitive environment of the corporation. The communications market has changed dramatically since the Marchment report, and it is time to review the effects on the corporation.

The mandate review will also review the functions that Canada Post currently carries out and those that should be provided in the future. In this regard, I want to deal with the allegations of cross–subsidization, which we have heard from couriers and others and most recently from the hon. member for Québec–Est.

Let me emphasize that Canada Post Corporation competes fairly. It does not subsidize its services. These allegations have been reviewed by both the Bureau of Competition Policy and the National Transportation Agency. The Bureau of Competition Policy examined concerns with regard to cross–subsidization of Canada Post ad mail services with profits from letter mail and alleged predatory pricing. The bureau cleared Canada Post of the allegations in 1994.

The year before that, in 1993, along with the National Transportation Agency the bureau also reviewed the corporation's acquisition of 75 per cent of Purolator courier and the issues of unfair competition and cross–subsidization as they would relate to that purchase. The bureau found "no grounds to believe that cross–subsidization would occur post–merger".

The hon. member putting forward the motion is not aware of the many other changes taking place at Canada Post. Canada Post knows technological innovation. In a world economy driven by ever changing business partnerships and alliances, technological innovation and convergence, there remains the crucial need for a reliable, efficient, dedicated postal administration.

Canadians want a faster, more reliable, and lower cost postal administration. Throughout its history Canada has always been quick to embrace these demands. Canada Post has worked hard to meet its mandate to provide service to every Canadian.

Between 1992 and 1994, pieces of mail processed per hour increased by 64 per cent. Delivery points per hour increased by 30 per cent. All this was accomplished with a workforce that was reduced by 24 per cent. These are the facts, something the Reform Party does not seem to be acquainted with.

Since incorporation there have been many innovations Canada Post can be very proud of, such as the national control centre, which allows end to end monitoring of performance. The first system for tracking and tracing also has been developed. This system accurately pinpoints the progress of your mail. The corporation has also developed a new technology for hybrid services, which can electronically send your document, print it, and have it mailed. This is available to all Canadians.

Would a private corporation offer this accessible service to all—I underline all—Canadians? This is something the opposition has not considered.

Good service means accessibility to retail services. In the mid–1980s Canada Post decided to experiment with franchising of postal outlets. This partnership with the private sector has resulted in an increased network of outlets where Canada Post products and services are available.

The Canada Post retail network currently consists of nearly 8,000 full service outlets, 4,150 corporate outlets, and more than 3,400 private sector outlets, supplemented by 11,000 stamp shops and agencies. Hours of access to postal products has increased substantially, while the cost of operations has been reduced. These outlets had a combined earned retail revenue in 1994–95 of $1.8 billion.

The franchising of retail postal services provides key solutions to four critical problems that were faced by Canada Post: how to obtain necessary capital; how to restructure and expand the retail customer service network; how to move quickly to a customer focused workforce; and how to reduce the high cost of a corporate retail network.

The franchising of postal services brought benefits to not only Canada Post but, more important, to Canadians, rural and urban. Franchising has nearly doubled the size of the postal network, offering consumers over 3,000 additional service centres across Canada. Canada Post's franchising and retail postal service has been a success. It is evident that Canada Post is constantly improving and adapting. Why should that be changed?

Canada has entered a new electronic era. Should Canada Post be involved in this electronic era? In the government's upcoming mandate review one of the terms of reference is whether CPC should be free to react to advances in technological alternatives to mail. If so, what would be the implications for the users, namely the government, the public and CPC competitors? This should make the opposition happy. We look forward to hearing the results.

The future contribution of postal administration in the new electronic environment will be contingent on the answers to some very basic questions. What is and will be the role for a postal administration as a public service? Is there a role for a postal administration as an electronics intermediary and as a provider of security services in electronic messaging? Can letter mail be delivered still faster and more cheaply? How much commercial freedom should a postal administration have?

The volume of physical mail in Canada is still marginally increasing from year to year. However, it will significantly decrease as electronic messaging takes hold. Over time, the labour intensive infrastructure required to process physical mail will be transformed to handle more electronic messaging. The transformation from hard copy to electronic will take time, however, more than most people predict, and for good reason. There is a multimillion dollar investment in the interlink physical mail infrastructures of Canada Post and its customers, and it will take an enormous investment to go completely electronic.

The immediate future is a bridge the corporation calls hybrid, which allows messages to be submitted to CPC electronically, travel electronically to the closest point of delivery, then be printed and delivered in hard copy. It is in this area that CPC's new electronic services are concentrated. It is the belief of many that a hybrid environment will be with us for a very long time.

Canada Post's concentration on hybrid services is allowing it to greatly increase its efficiency. Expansion of these services is vital to its customers, not only to contain or reduce costs but to allow the transaction of business effectively in a global marketplace using electronic data interchange, EDI, and hybrid data interchange, HDI. This obvious change in the face of technology has allowed Canada Post to remain competitive. Canada Post is doing much more than perhaps the hon. member is aware.

Business and governments need to share information with their clients in the form of documents or reports. Maintaining physical copies of documents and distributing them is costly, environmentally damaging and does not add value to the economy. Working further to reduce costs and speed up delivery, CPC has developed a service that stores documents and delivers them through a 1–800 telephone line. The documents can be delivered by fax, E–mail or regular mail. This service reduces business costs, speeds delivery of information and avoids environmental impacts of printing and storing an abundance of physical documents.

Canada Post presently has a physical directory of all addresses in Canada which it must maintain to deliver mail, including postal codes for efficient mail sorting. It is extending this directory to include electronic addresses and other information which Canadian businesses and governments can access for effective communication in the medium of the receiver's choice.

This will take the form of hard copy, telephone, fax, computer, E–mail, telex and even interactive television in the future. The directory will reduce the cost of doing business, improve the speed of messaging and enable a sender to reach the receiver regardless of technological—

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt but the member's time has expired.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to speak today on Motion No. 312 tabled by the member for Yellowhead which states:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should immediately take the required measures to privatize all operations and services of the Canada Post Corporation.

The finance minister stated in the last budget speech: "Our view is straightforward. If the government doesn't need to run something it shouldn't and in the future it won't".

Motion No. 312 allows the government the opportunity to make good on this straightforward point of view. When it comes right down to analysing where the government should be involved, Canada Post does not rank as a priority.

This is an organization that in the view of Professor Robert Campbell of Trent University has been "given a considerable amount of space in which to function like a private commercial operation and has acted very much like a private sector corporation". Canada Post has therefore illustrated that it is capable of providing its existing services as a private sector corporation.

Traditionally the main argument against the privatization of Canada Post is that people see it as the communications link for rural areas. This claim is now false. If Canada Post is so committed to rural service, why has it either closed or amalgamated 1,700 of its rural post offices? The simple answer to the question is that Canada Post is behaving like a private corporation. If it were privatized and industry as a whole were permitted more market freedom, people in rural areas would have greater access to more and more delivery companies. Many companies would jump at the opportunity to provide full postal services in rural areas.

Another weak argument offered against privatization is that Canada Post does not receive any federal money for its operations. This claim has an element of truth in it. Every year Canada Post aims to balance its books and it has been successful in three of the last five years in doing so. However the two years that losses were recorded added up to just under $400 million in losses and these losses were absorbed by the taxpayers.

I find the idea of privatizing Canada Post a compelling one. Canadians should no longer be asked to bear the burden of subsidizing an organization that could operate just as effectively or more efficiently if it were in the private sector. Best of all, if this were the case, taxpayers would not be shouldering the costs when Canada Post records financial losses. These financial losses continue despite the fact that Canada Post has invested enormously in becoming more efficient and more diverse.

I was surprised when I learned that Canada Post owns 75 per cent of the courier company Purolator. I was even more surprised when I read repeated claims by competitors in the courier industry about Canada Post. The competitors claim that Canada Post is using revenue generated from ordinary mail to subsidize its courier company. It is claimed that this allows Purolator courier to offer rates that are lower than private sector rates and gives the Canada Post–Purolator team an unfair advantage.

The president of the Canadian Courier Association recently claimed: "There is not a courier in the world who would offer that kind of service at that price. Who is paying for that cost? You are if you bought a stamp".

Canada Post's competitors claim that if Canada Post is to have an unfair advantage then its entire financial record should be made public. This would mean that Canada Post should present not only its budgetary figures but also how much money is being transferred to Purolator. I find the request to be entirely reasonable. If taxpayers are subsidizing Purolator they have a right to know the exact nature of the financial arrangement these two companies share.

Canada Post is an enigma, especially to the corporate world. On one hand it operates as a crown corporation with a mandate to provide universal postal service to all Canadians. On the other hand it operates as a ruthless competitor expanding into the courier industry while possessing a legislative monopoly on first class mail. In other words Canada Post enjoys all the benefits and security of a crown corporation with government protection and government backing while it conducts itself as though it were a private sector organization.

Canada Post should no longer enjoy this advantage. It should have it one way or the other. A spokesman for the United Parcel Service, UPS, recently said: "We are not seeking the abolishment of the post office. Our goal is that the playing field should be levelled".

Another area that competitors claim is not on a level playing field is the business of delivering unaddressed mail, advertising flyers or junk mail. When Canada Post created its so–called ad mail program to distribute third class mail, it knocked many small distributors right out of the industry. The ones that are left face an unfair advantage.

By Canada Post's own estimates, the number of delivered flyers jumped from 1.8 billion pieces in 1987 to 4.4 billion in 1994. This represents an increase of 144 per cent. This would not be all bad except Canada Post only reported a 63 per cent increase in revenue from this service.

Ottawa Citizen columnist Peter Hadekel recently commented: "Canada Post's own numbers show that its cost per thousand flyers delivered fell 33 per cent, a clear indication it has been cutting prices to build volume". Once again Canada Post is using this diversity within the protection of a crown corporation to create a monopoly in another area. Taxpayers have the right to know how the financial structure of Canada Post works and how it is using this advantage unfairly.

Despite the closure of over 1,000 rural area post offices Canada Post is the largest franchise chain in Canada. It is the 28th largest corporation in the nation. It has the potential to grow even stronger. Canada Post would have no problem finding investors and would, if privatized, be able to provide the same service it does now, and perhaps more efficiently in the competition of the open market.

In many ways Canada Post already operates as a private organization. It rented a $200,000 private sky box in Toronto's SkyDome. It may be an acceptable practice in the corporate world, but during a time when the government is trying to reduce expenditures and debt it is absolutely unreasonable for a crown corporation. I do not feel comfortable telling the people of my riding of Cariboo—Chilcotin that we must make sacrifices to reduce the debt while Canada Post executives have this kind of government guaranteed luxury at all Blue Jay games.

If privatized Canada Post would do fine on its own and Canadians would still enjoy good postal service by whoever provides it.

• (1155)

Next August Parliament will see the results of a major review that has recently been ordered. It is my hope that it will not be just a cosmetic review to appease the concerns of Canada Post competitors. The editor of the St. Albert Gazette near Edmonton recently stated: "Are they going to be able to dig into Canada Post's affairs or will they be stonewalled like everyone else before them? Canada Post likes to keep business to itself".

The time has come for Parliament to recognize that Canada Post can do well as a private corporation and that it needs a more level playing field in the postal industry for the benefit of all Canadians. As I have said, Canada Post likes to keep business to itself. As a private corporation Canada Post can still freely keep to itself but only if it can beat the competition.

I ask members to support the motion and to realize this is a start in the most logical direction.

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we know we are in trouble when we see Liberals defending Canada Post. In the few minutes remaining I should like to deal with the mandate of Canada Post. Its mandate should be to deliver letters efficiently and cost effectively. That is the bottom line. Why it is in the courier business is a bit of a conundrum because it is using the postal rates to justify and undercut private courier businesses.

I must commend the government for its timely and upcoming review of Canada Post. However once we have the review I would then hold the government accountable to looking into the review and making some major changes such as changes in access to information.

Crown corporations are presently exempt from access to information requests. As such Canada Post is exempt. We cannot get an access to information request from Canada Post because it is exempt, as are other crown corporations. This is basically wrong. How are Canadians supposed to find out and figure out what is wrong with their crown corporations including Canada Post when they cannot get the basic information?

An hon. member: It is taxpayers' money.

Mr. Gilmour: It is taxpayers' money, as my colleague says. Why can we not see the records?

I support my colleague's move to privatize Canada Post. I look forward to the review to see which direction the country will go with its postal system and hold the government accountable for listening to what Canadians say.

The Deputy Speaker: There are a few minutes remaining in the debate. If the proposer of the motion, the hon member for Yellowhead, wishes to summarize he is allowed to do so under our standing orders.

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues for supporting the motion. I urge the government to look carefully at it and in its review come forward with some of its suggestions and recommendations.

The Deputy Speaker: Shall we call it 12 o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: The time provided for consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–108, an act to amend the National Housing Act, as reported (without amendment) from the committee.

Hon. Fernand Robichaud (for the Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.) moved that the bill be concurred in at the report stage.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the chief government whip and the chief opposition whip to defer the division until a later time.

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until tomorrow after government orders, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

BANK ACT

The House resumed from November 24, 1995 consideration of the motion that Bill C–100, an act to amend, enact and repeal certain laws relating to financial institutions, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Jordan: Mr. Speaker, I move that we suspend the House for 10 minutes.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member for Erie has the floor from the last time. He has 15 minutes remaining for debate, if he wishes to take advantage of having the floor.

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks to wind up my address to the House.

Bill C–100 takes important steps to ensure that Canada's financial institutions enjoy effective, independent corporate government yet allows OSFI to intervene in the composition of senior management and boards when the institution is experiencing financial difficulty. Clearly it is often when institutions encounter financial trouble that management and boards need to be carefully scrutinized.

The current minimum one–third of unaffiliated or independent directors sitting on the board of a financial institution will no longer be permitted to hold a seat on the board of their unregulated parent. This will help ensure that there are directors of institutions who will focus on the institutions' interests alone. This measure will be particularly important for ensuring independence and objectivity in the management of institutions in trouble.

For institutions that are in trouble, the legislation will empower the superintendent to veto the appointment of directors and senior officers of that institution. This is a very limited provision as it applies only at the appointment stage and only when the institution is in financial trouble.

Incidentally, a similar authority exists in the United States. It is an important power since the institution in trouble needs to rely on its board to make important decisions about the future of the company.

My remarks so far have focused on the measures to give OSFI further power to enhance the quality of corporate governance. It is also important to note that this legislation recognizes that effective corporate governance is not just one–sided.

We should appreciate that Bill C–100 includes measures that will help boards perform the all important function of overseeing management. An example is the guidelines for supervisory interventions that are being set out. These guidelines identify four stages of increasing intervention available to the superintendent, culminating in the power to close an institution.

By knowing what stage their company is in and the penalties involved, directors will have both a tracking measure and a set–up to guide their dealings with management.

As well, the legislation includes providing the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation, CDIC, with the authority to apply varying deposit insurance premiums based on risk factors. This too will act as a source of information for directors who will be free to inquire why their institution may be paying more than the base rate.

I have covered a fair amount of ground. I will close by putting the legislation into context as I see it.

Bill C–100 is being put forward for the continuing success of a supervisory and regulatory system which must evolve with market trends and respond to current experience both here and in the rest of the world. The thrust of the legislation clearly is safety and soundness. These improvements in safety and soundness build on the recent Canadian experience with financial institutions that have failed.

By giving our approval to Bill C–100, we will be honouring a responsibility to help maintain what is truly a world class financial system. This is a goal we can all support irrespective of partisan politics. I urge all members of the House of Commons to support Bill C–100.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to enter the debate on Bill C–100. This bill is designed to bring about certain changes and make some amendments to the Trust Companies Act, the Interest Act and so on. I want to address this in the context of what is happening in the financial world in Canada today.

About 10 years ago legislation was passed in the House which actually eliminated the four pillars of Canada's financial institutions. I will review briefly what that was all about. We know that the four pillars which existed were the banks, the trust companies, the insurance companies and the investment companies, or investment dealers as they are more commonly known today.

The provisions in the past were that the banks took deposits, made loans and had financial interaction with their customers. The ownership of the banks was restricted to 10 per cent. No one person or group could own more than 10 per cent of a bank.

The trust companies were another pillar. They were allowed to hold property in trust for others. They could hold shares, bonds and real estate. Often they exercised the prerogative and in fact did take the fiduciary responsibility to manage the portfolios of individuals, particularly widows, children, orphans, and other people who did not want to look after their own portfolios. It restricted very much the kinds of things the trust companies could do. For example, the trust companies could not lend out more money than they actually had on deposit. They also were limited in the kinds of loans they could give. For instance, they were excluded for many years from lending out under the Small Business Loans Act.

The insurance companies, the third pillar, were divided into two sections: the life insurance section, and the property and casualty section. The life insurance companies were there to provide life insurance policies and annuities for people who wanted payment in perpetuity. The property and casualty insurance companies dealt with the liabilities that might be incurred toward individuals. They also insured the physical properties, buildings in most cases and vehicles and other equipment.

The fourth pillar was the investment companies. The investment companies were the underwriters of equity shares. They also helped to distribute those particular shares once they were issued. They also underwrote debentures and limited partnerships and made a market for these particular securities. They acted nationally and internationally so that individuals who wanted to sell shares internationally could do that.

In 1987 these pillars came apart. They were changed. The legislation allowed the banks to own trust companies, the banks to own insurance companies and the banks to own investment dealers. The independence which was guaranteed before was now amalgamated under one piece of legislation. The insurance companies also took advantage of those changes. They bought trust companies and in some cases the established banks. They also got into the mutual fund distribution business.

Why did it happen? It happened because the insurance companies and banks are the two big giants in the financial institutions. They command the largest proportion of the money that is managed in our financial world. The banks wanted access to the huge funds of money the insurance companies had and of course the insurance companies wanted to keep them out.

There was a real conflict going on at that time. The insurance companies finally agreed to let the banks buy insurance companies. That made it possible for the banks to actually own an insurance company, but they could not distribute the insurance through their branches.

Actually, the very thing the insurance companies wanted to prevent they ended up not preventing. Now the only difference is the bank cannot really distribute it through their branch network. I will talk about that in more detail later.

I will briefly focus on the concentration of the financial interests that has come into an increasingly small group. Fewer and fewer companies actually manage more and more of the financial assets in Canada. That is really what has happened here. I want to bring this into a more detailed focus as I get toward the end of my speech.

The policy paper was presented by the Secretary of State for Financial Institutions when he appeared before the Senate committee in August. He said he intended to release a policy paper sometime early in 1996 which would deal with these four financial institutions under the Trust Companies Act, the Loans Act, the Investment Companies Act and the Bank Act.

The secretary of state wants to release that in the early part of 1996. That policy paper would then be followed by further consultation before we table legislation for passage early in 1997 which has to do with a total review of the Financial Institutions Act. He said: "I want to act now on the issues included in Bill C–100 because the legislation enhances the safety and soundness of the system. When steps can be taken to improve on it to diminish risk, I believe it is important to get on with those changes right away".

It is pretty hard to argue against that, except that we are now at the end of November. This statement was made in August. The bill is before the House. In the early part of 1996 there is to be this policy paper, yet we have something that is supposed to be acted on right now.

I warn the secretary of state and the government that to make the kinds of changes that are being proposed in this legislation will affect other legislation. I am convinced it will affect the overall review that will take place in 1997.

What is the big hurry now? We are not even seven weeks away from 1996 and we are faced with supposedly some kind of an emergency. I submit there is no emergency. There is no urgency to get this done right now.

Some people will say that this is actually to come to grips with a big problem we had last year when Confederation Life went down. What is really involved here is that this is a very subtle way to get us ready for that continued erosion of the distinction between the financial pillars. It will have the effect of drawing more and more power into the hands of fewer and fewer financial institutions, namely the banks.

I will get into the Confederation Life matter in greater detail because it is this concentration of power that creates some difficulties. For example, the Confederation Life people bought trust companies and through that trust company they developed what would easily be characterized as an imprudent portfolio. It was imprudent from the point of view that it was overextended in a particular sector.

My understanding is that the former Superintendent of Financial Institutions did tell the Standing Committee on Industry that he had warned that particular institution that it was over extended in the real estate market. But what did he do? Nothing. What did the company do? Nothing.

Some people would argue it is more poor management than an imprudent portfolio. Imprudent portfolio, poor management, whatever the case, the issue is there was legislative provision that allowed a concentration and overextension that was never the intention of the original legislation but nevertheless was the effect of it. That is precisely the danger we are running into here.

Suppose one of our chartered banks today were to go down. Imagine the implications that would have across the country. Within that context let us now look at the provisions in Bill C–100. In particular, I want to look at the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

In this context I would refer to exactly what the purpose of the bill is. It is to amend the Bank Act, the Co–operative Credit Associations Act, the Insurance Act, and the Trust and Loan Companies Act, dealing with the disclosure of information, the elimination of appeals in relation to certain matters, the disqualification of persons from becoming office holders of an institution, the taking of control of an institution by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, and changes to the duties of the superintendent.

Then there are amendments to the winding–up act respecting the circumstances and procedures for winding up an institution and the revised part III dealing with the restructuring of insurance companies and amendments to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act concerning the business affairs of the corporation, the restructuring of the institutions by means of divesting of shares and the corporation becoming a receiver, the assessment and collection of deposit insurance premiums, and the enforcement of the act.

What are some of these details? I refer to clause 81:

(2) The Governor in Council may make regulations and the Superintendent may make guidelines respecting the maintenance by life companies and societies of adequate capital—

Okay, let us keep that in mind.

(3) Notwithstanding that a life company or society is complying with regulations or guidelines made under subsection (2), the Superintendent may, by order, direct the company or society

(a) to increase its capital; or

(b) to provide additional liquidity in such forms and amounts as the Superintendent may require.

Does anybody need any more authority than that to run a company? The whole company could be run with those two phrases.

Then the bill goes on to state:

The Governor in Council may make regulations and the Superintendent may make guidelines respecting the maintenance by property and casualty companies of assets of a particular value.

This is again a direct imposition. In fact the Superintendent of Financial Institutions can get into the exact management now of the company itself:

Notwithstanding that a property and casualty company is complying with regulations or guidelines made under subsection (2), the Superintendent may, by order, direct the company to increase its assets.

Furthermore:

A company may then enter into a transaction with a related party of a company if the Superintendent, by order, has exempted the transaction from the provisions of section 521.

We want to put this into the context of clause 93, because we recognize how significant the powers of the superintendent are in determining the assets of a company, to increase its financial situation, to look at the ownership of property of the company. Now let us get a good view of what else happens here:

The Superintendent shall disclose, at such times and in such manner as the Minister may determine, such information obtained by the Superintendent under this Act as the Minister considers ought to be disclosed for the purposes of the analysis of the financial condition of a company, society, foreign company or provincial company—

Good, we will say, that is fine; there is nothing wrong with that. I agree. It goes on:

> —and that
> (a) is contained in returns filed pursuant to the Superintendent's financial regulatory reporting requirements in respect of companies, societies, foreign companies or provincial companies; or
> (b) has been obtained as a result of an industry–wide or sectoral survey conducted by the Superintendent in relation to an issue or circumstances that could have an impact on the financial condition of companies, societies, foreign companies or provincial companies.

• (1220)

Now comes the key part. We notice that the superintendent can do these things but subject to the minister's approval. The second clause states:

> The Minister shall consult with the Superintendent before making any determination under subsection (1).

What has happened here? We have the minister deciding in the first instance what the superintendent should do and what kinds of information can be collected, and then before he can have any discussions or make any public pronouncements he has to go back and consult with the superintendent before he can do that. Who is in charge here?

The person in charge here is the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. The Minister of Finance, who is to be looking after the financial affairs of this country on behalf of the people and who the Prime Minister has entrusted with this particular portfolio, is now having his hands virtually tied by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, a bureaucrat who has been appointed by the minister.

These kinds of provisions are not for the health of this country.

I draw the attention of the House to the exact powers and objectives of the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. The objectives are to supervise financial institutions in order to determine whether they are in a sound financial condition and are complying with their governing statute law and supervisory requirements under that law; to promptly advise the management and board of directors of a financial institution in the event that the institution is not in sound financial condition or is not complying with its governing statute law or supervisory requirements under that law and in such a case to take or require the management or board to take the necessary corrective measures or series of measures to deal with the situation in an expeditious manner; and to promote the adoption of management and boards of directors of financial institutions of policies and procedures designed to control and manage risk.

That is good. A further objective is to monitor and evaluate system–wide or electoral events and issues that may have a negative impact on the financial condition of financial institutions. That is good. Further, in pursuing its objectives the office shall strive to protect the rights and interests of depositors, policy holders, and creditors of financial institutions, having due regard to the need to allow financial institutions to compete effectively and take reasonable risks. We would say that is just great, and I agree.

Notwithstanding that the regulations and supervision of financial institutions by the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions can reduce the risk that financial institutions will fail, regulation and supervision must be carried out having regard for the fact that boards of directors are responsible for the management of financial institutions. Financial institutions carry on business in a competitive environment that necessitates the management of risk, and financial institutions can experience financial difficulties that can lead to their failure.

He is supposed to do all these wonderful things and then in the final analysis he is given the power to intervene, to get involved in the actual management of a company. Then in the final section it says that if things go wrong it is not his fault. I think the bureaucrat wrote this, because he is totally absolved on these things.

We are dealing with the trust and the faith that individuals have in financial institutions. I have no difficulty in recognizing that the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions is a very important office. It has been given extensive powers. But in the final analysis, who is accountable?

• (1225)

We have to come to grips with this. We need to know all the secrets. In all the texts I read there is no obligation to make those kinds of things public. I want to get into the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, because it is here that it becomes even more significant.

The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation guarantees the first $60,000 deposited in a financial institution that is covered under that particular act. This is a great provision, but I want to take a look at some of the experiences.

This particular corporation was set up in 1967. There were no bank failures prior to 1967. Since 1967 there have been 30 failures of financial institutions, 20 of them in the last 10 years. The CDIC has now paid out a total of about $5 billion and owes the federal treasury $1.7 billion as of March 1994. It may be a little more than that, about $1.745 billion if my memory serves me correctly.

The provisions of this act are very noble. People want to know that their deposits are insured. However, it has had some very interesting effects. Financial institutions did not fail before but have failed since. Why? There are pretty obvious things, but nobody can prove them. It reduces the incentive of a financial institution to look after the deposits up to $60,000. They can be reckless or risky because that money is not going to come out of their pockets. The first $60,000 will be paid by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

There is also no incentive on the part of the depositor to look around to find which of the financial institutions is the soundest. They look to see which institution is to pay the best return on their money after it is deposited. That becomes the issue, and not the soundness of the financial institution.

There are some interesting things that can be looked at here. The insurance premium the institution pays to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation should be commensurate with the risk incurred by placing these deposits in certain kinds of ways. The act does go that way up to a point. It states, for instance, that financial institutions will pay $5,000 as a base and after that I believe it is a fraction of a percentage, based on the total of the money that is on deposit. That is great, except that the minister, without telling anyone, has the right to reduce that rate.

The other part of this is that the rate the institution has to pay for its premium to be insured by this company is secret. This means that on the one hand we have the financial institution paying a premium that is somewhat commensurate with the risk involved, but the person who deposits does not know what it is. So he has no way of telling whether this financial institution is a sounder one than the other one.

I believe there are some very serious shortcomings in this act. If we really wanted to get serious about this act we should think about such a thing as a co–insurance plan of some kind. An individual who is depositing his money into a particular institution knows it is insured up to $60,000 but with a deductible. The individual will have the responsibility to put it with an institution that will insure his or her deposit for the full $60,000. If the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation insures it for up to $58,000, the financial institution will give the other $2,000 with no penalty.

An institution could also state it is going to be paying 12 per cent on your deposit, CDIC covers a major part of it and it will cover part of it, but because this is going to be a high return you are eligible for a $1,000 or $2,000 deduction. So there is a co–insurance plan here, which will provide the incentive to the financial institution to manage the money well or to at least let the individual know where the risk is in that particular deposit.

Second, that individual will say: "If I am to get a higher rate of return from this institution, I also need to carry some of the risk". There has to be responsibility in those particular areas. There are major concerns about the proposed amendments to this legislation.

I want to move now to another part of the review of financial institutions which has to do with the concentration of power to which I alluded before. The four pillars have, to a large degree, been eroded. It is my suspicion that the review in 1997 will erode them even more.

I draw attention in particular to the big fight now being displayed in the newspapers, financial papers and other media between the insurance companies and the banks. The insurance companies are saying: "You are not going to sell our product through your network". The banks are saying: "If we can own the insurance company, we want the authority and the power to do that". The fight is on.

A lot of problems are associated with the concentration of power, one of which I want to detail. That has to do with conflict of interest. I am going to take my example not from the insurance area but from the investment business. The investment companies have the opportunity to underwrite shares for an issue. I will use as an example the privatization of CN Rail. This share issue is underwritten by a number of investment dealers. Who owns the investment dealers? The banks, with a few exceptions. They underwrite the issue. However, some people are going to borrow money to buy those shares. Who will lend them the money to buy those shares? The banks.

There is a projection that the investment dealers of Canada are going to have an extraordinary year. They will have great profits this year. Guess what the main contributing report was on "Canada AM" this morning. The privatization of CN Rail.

This is very interesting. It is a very cosy arrangement. A crown corporation is in the process of privatizing. The underwriters are investment dealers who are, to a large degree, owned by the banking community. The banking community will, through its subsidiaries, show a tremendous profit. The banks will earn approximately $5 billion this year and, as well, the investment dealers will realize a terrific return.

The banks are also saying they want to sell the insurance product because it will give them more money. Associated with that money comes a far more significant issue, of which I am most fearful, which is the concentration of power. When a few people can decide where the money is going to be applied and how it is going to be invested, that is too much power in the hands of too few people. That is my big concern.

Every effort should be made to balance this situation very carefully. We must not run into this situation without being very clear about the implications.

Comparisons will inevitably be made by the banking community. The banks will argue that they should have the service because to be competitive globally they have to be able to sell insurance. Let us look at this situation.

Approximately 2,000 banks operate in France, while in Germany there are 4,600 licensed banks. With such intense competition it is difficult for a European bank to cross–subsidize its entry into the insurance business. That situation cannot be compared to the one that exists in Canada. To use that argument is not only specious but misleading. We have to be very very careful not to get sucked into that kind of situation.

To suggest the banks are going to take control is rather easy to understand. In 1992 reforms gave the chartered banks unrestricted powers to own trust companies. A few years later, what portion of the trust business is now in the banks? Almost all of it. Less than three years after the 1992 financial institution reforms came into effect only two independent trust companies of any size remained in the business. The danger of banks cross–subsidizing their entry into other financial services is that it is provoking a reduction in competition for consumers.

Probably the most vicious argument is that all this entry into the marketing of insurance through the branch network is in the consumers' interests because they will have one stop shopping. That may be convenient, but will the consumer get the best advice? Will the consumer get the best price? Will the best interests of the consumer be served? That ought to be the consideration, not whether the consumer can do it all in one place. If the customer gets a bum deal in one place, it is a bum deal regardless of the fact that it was very convenient to do it in that place. That becomes our concern.

We need to make sure the power is balanced, that we have a separation so the people's best interests not only now, but in the long term, are looked after as well.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his contribution on a very important issue.

It is important for members of the House and the public to know that the critic for industry from the Reform Party has been working very hard in committee over the last two years on the whole issue of access to capital for small business men and women. The issue we are debating today is very important for that whole small business market.

We have been trying to the best of our ability in a non–partisan way to try to change the thought processes of the banks in their attitudes toward small business. Frankly, after two years despite a bunch of PR from the banks we have not accomplished a lot.

Does the member not fear or have concern that those million small business men and women out there who depend by and large on that relationship with their branch managers will once again lose leverage with their financial institution because once they take on the insurance component of a business relationship, that small business will have no other place to deal than with the bank? If that relationship is not solid then that small business man's or business woman's whole equation is in jeopardy.

Mr. Schmidt: Mr. Speaker, that is an excellent question. I would like to divide my answer into three parts.

The first part has to do with whether the businessman is going to feel coerced into buying the product the banker is shoving down his throat. The question then becomes is the bank in this instance acting as a broker for a variety of insurance companies or is it going to be presenting its own insurance company which it owns? Talk about a conflict of interest; there it is.

The second part concerns whether the individual gets the best possible premium rate. The individual, in order to get the loan through, will buy the insurance as well at the same time.

The third point is that recently the banking community had a study done on its branch network. It seems to me that both in the United States and here in Canada the conclusion was and the recommendation was to reduce the number of branches. That network, which is supposed to be this great fanning out, is actually going to go the other way.

I do not think that businessmen or individuals are going to be served as well as they are today.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in debate on Bill C–100. I am going to bring something a little different to this debate. I take my hon. colleague's comments very much to heart. This debate has been well motivated by the very best spirit of Parliament to try to bring all kinds of light to a very important piece of legislation before the House.

I have listened very carefully to the debate. We are dealing with the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. I will confine my remarks primarily to the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions because this legislation is designed to enhance the protection of the assets of ordinary people. This is the kind of legislation that Parliament and the government should be all about. I believe it is exactly that.

People put their life savings into financial institutions which are regulated by the Government of Canada. We must at all costs ensure that their deposits are safe. This legislation builds on earlier legislation, primarily because we have seen some unfortunate incidents in the financial marketplace of late. I am thinking of the collapse of Confederation Life and the earlier difficulties with other institutions. Certainly the depositors and the investors in these organizations were paid back. Nevertheless, a question of confidence arose from these eventualities.

Bill C–100 is an effort to address this problem of confidence. In a nutshell the legislation gives a mandate to the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions to investigate, along with various other things.

I am very interested in this legislation because it is a model for what can be done in other sectors. It is a model for what can be done in the not for profit sector.

It is well known that I am an MP who has shown a great deal of interest in the regulation of charities and non–profit organizations, which currently are very poorly regulated. They are controlled by a hodge–podge of legislation here and there, court precedents and that kind of thing. Yet the not for profit sector represents about $120 billion of revenue a year going in and out of these organizations.

On the other hand, deposits of around $600 million are covered by Bill C–100. We have comparable huge industries, one that is subject to very fine regulation now, one that does not have very much regulation.

I would like to go through Bill C–100 and put it up against what I would like to see happen with the not for profit sector.

First, Bill C–100 gives a mandate to the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. In effect, it lays out the rules. It says this organization can investigate and monitor all institutions that are in the business of taking deposits from ordinary citizens. We would like to see with the not for profit sector a charity commissioner with a similar mandate, which incidentally does not exist at this time.

Bill C–100 also adds something that is vitally important and very near and dear to my heart. It enhances disclosure. The public throughout Canada is demanding that institutions be more transparent than they have been hitherto. To give the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions the ability to track what is happening in deposit organizations Bill C–100 requires a higher level of disclosure.

For example, it requires all deposit institutions to disclose their balance sheets in much more enhanced detail than is defined by regulation. It requires the disclosure of executive salaries. That is a favourite issue with me because executive compensation is not a matter of privacy when dealing with the public trust. It is a way of determining whether the executives of an organization who have the public trust are acting in the public's best interest. In other words one of the most instant signals of trouble with an institution is a very high executive salary and very low results on the balance sheets.

Bill C–100 requires an enhanced level of disclosure of the assets and liabilities of deposit taking institutions. Some of my colleagues feel that is an invasion of the central government into the affairs of an organization. Indeed it may be a provincial organization such as the caisses populaires in Quebec.

Nevertheless if we are to know what is happening we need the details. It requires an enhanced monitoring of assets and liabilities. I can compare that with non–profit organizations and say that it would be an enormous step forward if the public had access to the details of how non–profit organizations are spending their money and what are their assets. Presently no such regime exists for non–profit organizations. As such, for charities it is very restrictive in its level of public disclosure.

Bill C–100, however, would give all this to the public so that everyone could see what is happening, including the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. This is the most important.

Bill C–100 defines the role of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions as his office monitors deposit taking organizations. There is a whole schedule of warning bells. Certain things happen. Certain things appear on the books. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions will ask questions. If further problems occur the questions will be more probing. They will go deeper and deeper. There is a whole schedule of early warning levels for the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

The organization knows the benchmarks at each level, the benchmarks going down as it gets into trouble. It knows what to expect, what it has to give, and what is expected of it by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. Bill C–100 lays out very clearly what will happen when there is a crisis and what are the steps if an organization is deemed to be in significant trouble, for example if its liabilities exceed its assets or that kind of thing.

I can compare with charities and non–profit organizations and say that is precisely what we want with charities and non–profit organizations that also have the public trust and are in effect chartered by the government. They ought to be able to convince the public that they are using the money wisely and well.

When it is determined that a deposit taking organization is in a sorry state financially, the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions can move in to take over. Basically it will dismember the organization or sell it.

We need the same for the not for profit sector. Right now if a charity is deemed to be in trouble it is a painful and difficult process to take it out of action no matter how extraordinary its failure is. In the case of not for profit organizations there is no real legislation to take them out of the picture at all if they have problems. We only find out about the problems when they get into such difficulty that it hits the news or if there is a criminal or extraordinary charge. Otherwise secrecy is the order of the day with respect to charities and non–profit organizations.

Bill C–100 applies transparency and a whole regime of what to do when organizations that have the public trust get into trouble. There is a series of regulations to look after the problem. I wish the revenue minister and the finance minister would take note of the structure and effectiveness of Bill C–100.

One problem of the not for profit sector is that it has been unregulated for many years. The problem of bringing in legislation to control it seems insuperable. However Bill C–100 is the model that could be used to set up a charity commissioner or a not for profit commissioner who would bring the entire $120 billion sector under regulation and into transparency so that public confidence in charities and not for profit organizations could be restored.

My comments will be in another direction temporarily. I listened with great attention to the debate on the bill in the House last Friday. I was struck by the comments of Bloc Quebecois and Reform Party members who tend to be opposed to the bill. At one point the Liberal member for Willowdale stood and with great passion complained that the opposition to the bill of the Bloc Quebecois, and to some degree the Reform Party, was as a result of their separatist leanings.

I listened with great attention to what I heard from the Bloc and the Reform Party and I did not hear separatism so much as I heard provincialism. I heard from the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party about the fundamental problem with Confederation. There is always a tension between the federal government in the central power and the provincial powers. The provinces are always looking for more power and saying: "You are intruding into our affairs". This is a natural and normal aspect of Canada as we know it today. It is a pity that the Bloc Quebecois translates provincialism into separatism. Bill C–100 clearly illustrates why federalism works and why provincialism in this case should not be the order of the day.

I will explain myself. Certain aspects of our political life occur at a provincial or municipal level. At that level politicians are normally taken up by local needs, almost selfish needs. It is very difficult sometimes for local politicians to look at the grand scheme of things when they have local community and provincial concerns to look at. This was illustrated last week by a Reform Party motion dealing with the suggestion that the federal government should force municipalities to provide better sewage treatment rather than dumping effluent into the seas. It was a classic case of where it was easier for the municipality to use its taxes on things that matter to its people locally rather than to worry about the environmental aspects of a problem being caused to the country at large or the world at large.

So it is with financial institutions, with charities and non–profit organizations. The need for central regulation of charities and non–profit organizations is amply illustrated by the example of the Nanaimo Holding Society in British Columbia that is under investigation for suspicion of having diverted charity funds to the provincial NDP of British Columbia. Without commenting on where that investigation will go, it is the kind of reason we need arm's length regulation of public institutions with the public trust.

At the provincial level or the municipal level these organizations may be subject to undue political influence. If there is something like the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions that can look from afar at an organization and be out of reach of local politicians we are better guaranteed that the public trust is being served by the organization. The warning will be sounded by an organization that has no axe to grind or has no involvement in the institution.

The classic example was during the recent referendum when it was claimed that the caisse populaire was supporting the Canadian dollar. We learned from the caisse subsequently that it was not doing any such thing. Nor should it. It is a classic reason for needing an organization like the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. If undue influence were exerted by the local political power, be it the province or the municipality, control would be in an arm's length organization that exists outside the zone of political interference.

Quebec and the caisse benefit from federalism because of an organization like the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. The benefit is even greater because all deposit taking organizations are dependent on the rest of the country for the confidence the public has in them.

Let us just suppose that every banking institution, every deposit taking institution were separately administered in each province, as I suspect has been suggested by the Reform Party. We would not have the level of confidence in the institutions that we have when people in Quebec or British Columbia, for example, know that the institution is subject to the same rules of transparency, openness and honesty across the country from sea to sea. It does not matter whether the organization is in Quebec or in Nova Scotia. Because we have organizations like the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, Canadians from sea to sea can have confidence in their institutions.

Bill C–100 deserves the support of the entire House regardless of our individual viewpoints on centralized government or decentralized government. This legislation serves us all regardless of our political viewpoints. It serves the ordinary person.

I should like to discuss the bill at great length but I know my time is up. It is the kind of legislation which makes federalism work and of which I am proud as a member of the government.

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I will take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the debate on Bill C–100 to draw the attention of this House to the inconsistencies and poor decision–making that undermine the very foundation of the federation.

I have had an opportunity during the past thirty years to observe, as many of us have, the evolution of Canadian federalism. A system based on certain relations between the federal government and the provinces, federalism has never been able to settle the issue of Quebec, Quebec which has the largest national minority in Canada. The Fathers of Confederation designed a system of government in which the provinces maintained a large measure of autonomy. In the twentieth century, two world wars, the emergence of the welfare state and the modernization of institutions as part of today's worldwide trend towards globalization gave the central government a chance to intervene increasingly in the administration of the provinces.

This normal development in a country whose geography was continental in size was never well received by the Quebec government which, for most French Canadians and later Quebecers, had always come first. Any attempt or decision made by the government in Ottawa to improve the way this country was governed has always been perceived by successive governments in Quebec as an encroachment on the prerogatives of the Quebec National Assembly.

The sovereignty–partnership proposal of Quebec sovereignists constitutes the only concrete and realistic initiative to get out of the vicious circle that has poisoned the existence of this beautiful and great country that is Canada. Yes, Canada is an exceptional country. Although the current state of its public finances has prevented it from developing its full potential, this is due to the legacy left by former Prime Minister Trudeau and to the inept financial management of the present Prime Minister, who was then Minister of Finance.

Under his stewardship, the deficit rose to $10.4 billion in 1977–78 and to $12.6 billion in 1978–79. For the first time, the annual deficit exceeded the 10 billion dollar mark, before spiralling completely out of control during the years that followed. In power, for far too long and instructed by English Canada to deal with the Quebec problem, Pierre Trudeau believed he could unite the country by wooing voters with wall to wall social programs. He temporarily reduced certain disparities which today reappear with a vengeance as a result of the debt left us by the former Prime Minister.

Yes, Canada is an exceptional country, and the only way to deal with the crisis in our public finances, with useless administrative overlap and internal constitutional bickering, is to create a new economic and political partnership between Quebec and Canada, with a sovereign Quebec engaging in continuing negotiations between two sovereign and equal states. Yes, Canada is an exceptional country, but as Quebecers, we want our own country.

We know Quebec will also be an exceptional country and will be Canada's premier global partner. Canada will be an even better country, once it has stopped the bickering and useless power struggles with a sovereign Quebec that will maintain special ties with Canada, based on equality and friendship.

Instead of supporting this view of relations between modern states, instead of supporting the proposals for renewal and change, which the Prime Minister promised us during the last days of the referendum campaign in Quebec, the government proposes Bill C–100 on financial institutions, after tabling C–76 in which Ottawa assumes the power to impose national standards on social programs. Ottawa made another attempt at centralization with Bill C–88, to implement the agreement on internal trade, an agreement that would allow the government to act as the ultimate arbiter in interprovincial disputes.

The federal government and Quebec are going to be at each other's throat over regional development. Under Bill C–91, Ottawa will also be able to sign agreements with local authorities directly, without regard for provincial governments or existing regional structures.

All these legislative efforts aimed at centralization and at building a modern country could be meaningful and have some implication, if Quebec's situation were settled once and for all. Canada could blithely carry on with its efforts at economic modernization and streamlining the administration of its structures, if Quebec's situation were settled through the sovereignty–partnership arrangement we sovereignists are proposing to Quebecers. Ottawa will always be too centralizing for most Quebecers, whereas the majority of Canadians believe, quite legitimately, honestly and proudly in a strong central government.

In the meantime, no attempt can really reform Canadian federalism without the resolution of the Quebec–Canada issue, through the emergence of a sovereign Quebec that would keep close ties with its Canadian partner.

Instead, the Liberal government is proposing Bill C–100, which simply fuels the flames of federal–provincial relations. Let us have a closer look at the implications of this bill for Quebec's financial institutions.

Bill C–100 is very clear. It enables the federal government to take action faster when a financial institution is in difficulty. It also aims to reduce the risks inherent in Canada's financial system.

Under clause 6 of Schedule I, which establishes a Canadian clearing system, the Governor of the Bank of Canada reserves the right to issue directives, not only to clearing houses but to financial institutions as well, regardless of their charter. So, for example, Bill C–100 would allow the Governor of the Bank of Canada to issue directives and orders to institutions that are institutions of Quebec essentially, such as: Fiducie Desjardins, the Fonds de solidarité des travailleurs du Québec or the Lévesque Beaubien Geoffrion brokerage firm, to name but a few.

The Superintendent of Financial Institutions and of the Winding–up Act will be given more powers and will be able to intervene directly with provincial charter institutions.

The increased options available to the federal Superintendent of Financial Institutions will mean costly duplication and inefficient management of savings. The Inspecteur général des institutions financières du Québec already monitors the situation in this regard so that the federal superintendent's new powers will simply duplicate those that already exist.

The federal superintendent's broader powers may prompt Ottawa and Quebec City to issue court challenges that will leave struggling financial institutions and their depositors in the lurch.

Bill C–100 shows that the federal government is more concerned about assuming new powers than about ensuring the viability of financial institutions and protecting savings.

Bill C–100 will make major changes to the deposit insurance system in Canada. To participate in the system, financial institutions now pay premiums based on the amount of deposits with them. The bill provides that the premiums will no longer be based on a financial institution's deposits, but on its level or degree of risk. This raises many questions. For example, what criteria will be used to determine a financial institution's risk rating? The federal government now refuses to make public the regulations that will set risk ratings.

What will be the impact of federal risk ratings on financial institutions? No one knows.

Basing premium amounts on risk levels may penalize Quebec financial institutions particularly because they are relatively small. Since large corporations are generally seen as less risky and since Quebec has its own deposit insurance scheme, in which premiums are not based on risk levels as such, we will end up with two systems: one based on risk and the other on deposit liabilities, with all the inconsistencies and contradictions that this entails.

• (1310)

Bill C–100 shows once again Ottawa's determination to centralize activities. By establishing Canada–wide clearing and settlement systems, this bill encroaches on powers exercised by the Quebec securities commission and the Quebec inspector general of financial institutions.

All this results in costly overlap. Financial institutions will be subject to two levels of control, a situation which will result in unnecessary administrative duplication.

As I already mentioned, in addition to Bill C–100, the government has tabled three other centralizing pieces of legislation since the last federal budget, namely Bill C–76, Bill C–88 and Bill C–91. The centralization exercise is continuing as strongly as ever.

A 1991 Treasury Board study showed that 67 per cent of federal programs overlap provincial ones. With Bill C–100, Ottawa keeps heading in the same direction, towards a dead end. According to Julien and Proulx, from the University of Montreal, close to 1,000 meetings take place every year between Ottawa and Quebec public servants, simply to harmonize program objectives, or to ensure that provincial and federal programs are not incompatible with one another. Bill C–100 will give all these public servants another opportunity to meet, simply to try to harmonize the criteria used to determine premiums paid by financial institutions.

Pierre Fortin, who is an economist, estimates that three billion dollars is wasted annually because of overlapping Quebec and federal programs. Such overlap results in unnecessary costs for taxpayers, businesses and citizens. These costs have an impact on the debt and, in the end, jeopardize institutions which were set up to support our country's blueprint for society. From that perspective, Bill C–100 is nothing but an ill–considered attempt by this government to centralize, under the pretence of protecting investors, when the system in Quebec works very well.

This bill is also an unacceptable intrusion into the securities industry, when the private sector and major business associations already complain about excessive government involvement. Such abusive interference always results in lower productivity and in a shortfall, this at a time when there is an urgent need to improve the sad state of public finances. Instead of withdrawing and concentrating on the essential, as it should, given its chronic state of indebtedness, the federal government is increasingly interfering in fields of provincial jurisdiction, as well as in the activities of our businesses.

In Quebec, the various governments which have been in office over the last 30 years have all strongly defended Quebec's jurisdiction over the securities industry. Even Daniel Johnson reaffirmed that position in February 1994, when he was Quebec's premier. The authority given to the Governor of the Bank of Canada to issue directives or orders to participants goes squarely against their traditional Quebec position, upheld even by provincial Liberals, which is quite something. As in the case of manpower training, there is a strong consensus in Quebec regarding this issue.

Consequently, the official opposition cannot support Bill C–100 on financial institutions, because it maintains a situation which, for more than 25 years now, has led to disputes which have drained the country and put it into debt. In order to end the current financial crisis, the federal government must stop getting involved in the activities of businesses. Similarly, in order to end the current constitutional crisis, Ottawa must stop getting involved in fields of provincial jurisdiction and let Quebec take charge of its own destiny. Unfortunately, this is just the opposite of what is proposed in Bill C–100, which is yet another stage in the exercise conducted by a centralizing government, which is out of step with current events.

[English]

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, how would the hon. member explain the increased riskiness that apparently is to be expected by the financial institutions in Quebec relative to the financial institutions in other parts of Canada? In particular, I would like him to address the failure of Confederation Life, which was not exactly a small financial institution. I would like him to compare the risks Confederation Life had vis–à–vis some of the institutions which exist in Quebec.

• (1315)

I would like the hon. member to relate the small institutions that operate in Quebec vis–à–vis those that operate in other provinces, for example the Atlantic provinces, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan and some very small institutions that are covered by the CDIC. Is it the same kind of problem he is alluding to in Quebec, that in fact there are riskier situations? Exactly what point is the hon. member trying to make?

Mr. Bélisle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that we already have a deposit insurance corporation in Quebec. Depositors' and investors' savings are already protected under the law, and I agree with him. A government majority member who spoke previously mentioned that the attitude displayed by both Bloc and Reform members could be described as provincial or, in the case of the Bloc Quebecois, separatist.

I would like to tell these hon. members that all we Quebecers want is to be able to manage our own affairs. We certainly have nothing against any streamlining effort, legislation or any measure that Canada may want to make, pass or take to better protect people's savings. But as Quebecers and members representing the single largest minority in Canada, we must point out that we have a unique culture, a unique language, and have always defined ourselves as a distinct nation. All we want is to manage our own affairs. Whether in finance or in any other area, we want to be regulated and protected by our own laws.

We have absolutely nothing against any legislation being introduced before this Parliament to improve the way financial markets operate, or the way Canada operates. As I said earlier in my remarks, Canada is indeed an exceptional country. And I think it is destined for further growth in the future. But as Quebecers, that is not our goal as a society. It is not our goal as a country. All we want is just to manage our own affairs. And in a future referendum, in two, three or four years from now, I think that the majority of Quebecers will vote yes, and then, as I indicated earlier, we will have the opportunity to keep working together, hand in hand, not as one of nine or one of ten, but with all nine English provinces and the federal government. We will have the opportunity to keep working together on an equal footing, one on one, with Quebec on one side of the table and Ottawa on the other side.

That is all I wanted to say on this subject today. That is the context in which we want to continue to co–operate with you: as two peoples on equal footing.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity to stand and support Bill C–100, an act to amend, enact and repeal certain laws relating to financial institutions.

This bill, which is essentially a housekeeping bill, has many good features in it. We are giving the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, an organization within the Government of Canada, the power and the capacity to have a much more specific accountability. This is not just in terms of protecting depositors' funds, but also in terms of making sure that the financial institutions are following all of those rules and regulations they are responsible for following which is the reason they got their franchise.

A bank is really not any different from a McDonald's franchise. The person who applies for a McDonald's franchise has to live by the rules and regulations of the administration granting the franchise. If that McDonald's franchiser is not following the rules, then as I am sure members have heard from people who have owned a franchise other than McDonald's such as Budget or Swiss Chalet, the management will say: "There are rules and regulations attached to the franchise that you have been allowed to operate. You are not following them and if you do not clean up your act, we are going to pull the franchise. We will pull our agreement. We will take the franchise away from you".

Very few Canadians realize that the people of Canada through their trustees and agents in this House of Commons are the ones that grant the banking franchises which exist in Canada. The men and women in this room are the ones who design the rules and regulations that allow the banks to operate. The basic thrust behind that banking franchise is to protect depositors' funds but they are also to be in the business of lending money.

The banks, the franchisees, have done a pretty good job of those 7,000 little franchise operations across Canada, whether they be the Royal Bank or the Bank of Nova Scotia. They have done a pretty good job of protecting depositors' funds.

Where I have a problem is the way they have been handling their relationship with small business men and women. If I had my druthers and if I had had an opportunity, I would have added a couple of amendments to the bill. I would have liked a very specific responsibility given to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions on behalf of small business.

As the Superintendent of Financial Institutions goes through all the lists of responsibilities he has to maintain in his relationship with banks there is no special mention for small business. I do not see it in here anywhere. On that score, I am disappointed. It does not take away of course from supporting the bill because there are a lot of good things in this bill.

Today I have the opportunity to stand on my feet in the House two years into our mandate. I have to say that our effort to sensitize this country's banks to become much more supportive of small business has not grown. That attitude change has not grown the way it should have grown.

I see my colleague, the industry critic from the Reform Party, who sits on the committee with me. He is nodding his head in approval that we really have not done as much as we should have done in committee.

I do not want to say that our efforts and the efforts of the banks have been a total failure. Two weeks ago there was a meeting of the industry committee. It was reported in a document that at the end of the second year there was an increase in the small business loan float. We were all very excited about getting that document. We saw that the loan float for all small business men and women in Canada was approximately $28 billion. That is the total of outstanding loans being utilized by small business men and women. That is a 1 per cent increase in the small business loan float over the last year.

Granted, some people would argue that we are lucky it was not a decrease. However, when we consider the government's Small Business Loan Act guarantee, which is also included in that and the fact that the float increased, the real risk the banks have taken on behalf of small business men and women has not increased that much in the last two years. We are going to have to continue to press forward.

We hope eventually the banking culture, the men and women who operate the 7,000 bank franchises across Canada, in the not too distant future will be fully converted. We hope they will realize that the only way the economy is going to get back on the right track and men and women will get back to work is by making sure the small business community is given the maximum opportunity and the best environment in which to grow.

The Superintendent of Financial Institutions can play a major role in helping members of Parliament accomplish that policy directive. I am not talking about my policy directive here today; it is a policy directive of the Prime Minister of Canada. Make no mistake about it. Two months before the last national election campaign began the Prime Minister of Canada sat in the press gallery across the street from Parliament and said on coast to coast television that we were going to be the government that would really work to change the attitude of financial institutions toward small business men and women.

When I stand in the House today and support this bill and talk about access to capital for small business men and women, I am speaking on behalf of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Industry. In the last budget even the Minister of Finance said that we have to create new benchmarks for the banks in relation to the small business sector.

Those in the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions who will take this bill after it has passed here today and later through the Senate are responsible for monitoring, reviewing and auditing small business activities. I plead with them to assist us in sensitizing those 7,000 branch managers, those franchise holders that small business must be very much a part of the language of the review, et cetera.

I want to move on to another aspect of the bill which I am pleased to see is addressed. It is on page 29 and deals with the whole business of derivatives.

It is no secret to anyone in the House that I have always been concerned about the private casinos the financial institutions in this country operate, the derivatives sections in the banks. I see that this bill gives the Superintendent of Financial Institutions enhanced authority to go into those derivatives sections within the financial institutions and do thorough and complete audits.

I will be honest. I do not understand the complexity of the derivatives game the banks are playing. I notice other members are nodding likewise. However, I trust that the expertise exists within the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. Some members are noting they are not convinced of that. I hope they are wrong. I will tell them why I hope they are wrong. I know of one financial institution in this country that in its derivatives section, which I call the private casino, trades close to $30 billion a day. In one 24–hour period it trades $30 billion. This is an amazing amount of paper pushing, going back and forth. There are very small margins but with very big exposure.

If the essence of this bill, as my colleague from Dundas said earlier, is to make sure those depositors' funds are protected, then the Superintendent of Financial Institutions should start by making sure there is a good solid handle on all those private casinos, all those derivatives sections in all the financial institutions.

Do members not wonder sometime how one bank can find $30 billion to play the derivatives game in one day yet cannot seem to find the resources for the small business men and women who really require a small loan of $10,000 or $15,000 or $50,000? Am I losing it? Does anyone wonder about that sometimes? It is a totally different issue, but it has to do with will and attitude, which is the point I am trying to make.

If the board of directors or the senior management of a bank decides it is going to be in the derivatives business and play with $30 billion a day, it happens. These guys work 24 hours a day, seven days a week in these derivatives sections of the bank. So if the management of a bank puts forward a policy that allows $30 billion a day to be pushed around the world by these unelected, unaccountable people who can affect the way our dollar goes and affect our interest rates, then why can we not get the same kind of will from the management of the banks to increase the float to small business by a little better than one per cent a year?

I noticed my colleague from the Reform Party, the industry critic, is saying that we can do it. We on this side of the House appreciate his consistent support as we deal with this issue.

This is a good bill because it gives the authority to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions to make sure that not only are depositors' funds protected in a more thorough way, but the whole administration of the bank franchises is followed according to the basic framework of the Bank Act. Alongside that responsibility, I would also ask them, as they go through their check list of responsibilities, to add another one: Check and make sure that those 7,000 franchise holders of bank licences or bank charters across Canada are doing what they should be doing for small business.

• (1335)

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I commend the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Industry for raising the issue of what is happening to small business. I do not believe he is taking enough credit for some of the things that have happened and have changed the attitude of the banks.

On the one hand, it seems to me that the committee succeeded in saying we have to get more numbers together to ensure that we know for a fact they are not giving money to small business. That is important. The committee was sensitive not only to small business, but to the banks and to the House.

The banks will never be able to escape from the investigation that took place. Each of the chartered banks has appointed an ombudsman and they are now looking for a national ombudsman.

I know that the parliamentary secretary feels the national ombudsman will probably not be very effective because he will be appointed by a board of directors that is made up of representatives from the banks. We will see whether that is the case.

With all of this, the parliamentary secretary has demonstrated one word, although he has never said it: transparency. It is about transparency, being open, telling the story the way it is and making sure the banks come up with their numbers.

I ask the parliamentary secretary whether he agrees with the provision that the premiums paid by the financial institutions to the CDIC should be left secret. Should that not become transparent?

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, before I deal with the specific answer to the question I will deal with the first part of my colleague's remarks.

I do not believe it is appropriate for us to stand in the House and defend the chartered banks of Canada until they have really delivered on the objectives the hon. member helped to form in our "Taking Care of Small Business" document.

Yes, the banks have agreed to create an ombudsman, which they essentially appoint, because they control the board of directors. However, I am nervous about our effectiveness as a committee. Yes, they will report more numbers, but let us face it, the banks will not give us what we wanted in recommendation number two, where we wanted a much greater regional breakdown. When I only see a one per cent increase, which is what I call real action, not words—they are fantastic. Remember that campaign of the Bank of Montreal: "We want to share your pain". When I see only a one per cent increase in the small business float, are they getting to us? Are they pushing us off the mark? Are they pushing us off our focus? Are they distracting us?

This is not bank bashing. There are a million small business men and women out there, and there are as many in the hon. member's riding as there are in mine. If his small business men and women are saying to him that the banks are doing a great job, then his small business men and women are different from mine. They are saying we have not made much of a difference yet.

I plead with all members, if we get one thing done in this session for small business, let us make sure that we get the banks into the business of lending to small business in a serious way.

In answer to the member's specific question about CDIC fees being disclosed, for me it is a slam dunk: I think they should be.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I share the zeal with which the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood campaigns on behalf of small businesses. I know exactly what he is talking about. I have spent my entire life in small business and I know the problems small businesses have had with banks. Quite often the small business people I talk to feel like third class citizens when they go to these big banks to try to get some financial help.

I agree that it must be demanded of the banks that they get serious about dealing with small business in a substantial manner. As far as I am concerned, one per cent is a bit low. I would like to see it higher.

I believe there is an inherent and traditional conflict of interest when it comes to the relationships that governments, whether they be Tories, Liberals, or whatever, have had with the banks over the last several years. The major contributors to the federal parties, both the Tories and the Liberals, have been these very powerful banking institutions themselves. The banks are the most powerful financial institutions, but they are also probably the most influential institutions as far as political direction.

I hope this government has the guts to stand up to the banks and hold a hammer to their heads and say the way they have done things in the past with the Liberal Party and with the Tory Party does not go any more and that the government wants to see them make a profound effort toward helping small business to thrive and prosper in this country. Until a government is prepared to do that, mean it and stick to it, nothing is going to change in the attitude of banks toward small business. That is the key to all this.

We can talk all day long about legislation, and we are going to put this in and we are going to make this amendment, but the government has to be prepared to back it up. I hope this is the government that does it.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I presume the hon. member was talking about the campaign donations made to the parties. I do not think political donations made by the banks really have any effect on whether a government would deal with an issue such as this. I do not see it. I could be wrong.

Where we have a problem as a government, and this is all governments, has to do with the bonds, the government coupons that are being clipped by banks; in other words, buying our debt. That is where bank decision makers can have a tremendous influence on the executive of a government. We are so dependent on the marketing and the purchasing of those bonds.

That goes back to what the member from Okanagan said earlier in his remarks, which has to do with transparency. When we have a bill like this today, Bill C–100, where we are dealing with the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and all the major financial institutions in Canada, I find it absolutely stunning that there is not a list of speakers the length of this room who want to speak on this bill. It gives us an opportunity not only to exchange with each other but also to send a message to the implementers of this bill where we, as a collective group, are coming from.

In my judgment, as MPs, we are blowing a gift to debate one of the most fundamental issues facing Canadians today, which is the ability of small business to gain access to capital. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions is one of the key players in making sure that happens and happens properly.

What are we doing? We have just half a dozen speakers, then the bill will go through the House. It is not that the bill would not go through the House, but this is a good reason to have a good, exciting debate to provide some hope for the only sector in the economy that is creating jobs.

Where are we today on this issue? I am not being critical of the House. I am just saying that every now and then we get a gift handed to us. This is one of the bills that affects the lives of most of our constituents. I wish we could create a little more excitement around it so the superintendent would understand where all of us are coming from on this issue.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak on Bill C–100.

I feel obliged to say that this is yet another unfortunate federal initiative, which gives some impression of being an attempt to help small business and create employment, is intended, when it comes right down to it—at least in the eyes of a member from Quebec—only to increase the powers of control and centralization over some of the country's financial institutions.

The truth at the heart of the matter is that Bill C–100 gives more powers to the superintendent of financial institutions. It also allows Ottawa to take action more promptly when financial institutions are in difficulty, and here again, in the eyes of a member from Quebec, this is merely a move to increase the power in the hands of the federal government, since we in Quebec already have institutions in place which do the job and, what is more, do it very efficiently.

The Commission québécoise des valeurs mobilières is already in place and working very well. We have an inspector general of financial institutions who carries out the same duties Bill C–100 now wants to give to a superintendent at the federal level.

The game is therefore, of course, once again to beef up the federal government's power, the power of centralization, unfortunately at great cost, since once again there is overlap and duplication. Duplication is part and parcel of the history of Canada, the waste of having a federal department doing something, and a provincial department doing the same thing. There is a virtually endless list of examples of this fundamental problem of Canadian federalism, which seems to me to want essentially to monopolize powers in Ottawa, although there are already competent institutions on the provincial level.

This bill is, I repeat, not the sole example of this logic, or political attitude, within the federal government.

I could easily recall from memory some six or seven other bills brought before this House recently, since the election of the Liberal government. Without going into them in great detail, I could mention Bill C–52, which once again attempts to add to federal power in areas that are not only under provincial jurisdiction but are in the private sector. Then there is Bill C–95, which attempts to establish national health standards, often contrary to the interests and powers of the provincial governments.

We have C–96, which addresses human resources and also gives increased powers to the minister in applying the department's legislation. We have Bill C–91, which grants broader powers to the Federal Business Development Bank. We have Bill C–88 on interprovincial trade, which quite openly gives the federal government residual powers, including the power to intervene in agreements between the provinces. And there are many more examples. I could go on almost all day about this.

This government is quite simply intent on increasing its powers to guarantee a certain level of centralization and to keep the provinces well under control. We have this enormous deficit in Canada because the federal government in Ottawa has far too much power and, as a result, is wasting money left and right. It is the same old sad story of this country. As a system, Canadian, federalism has been wasteful, and the federal government has failed to learn from its past mistakes. Even today, government members tell us, in speeches that are hypocritical and make no sense at all, that they are helping small business and will find ways to give them more money.

We are already doing the job in Quebec. We have agencies that are perfectly capable of meeting the requirements of small businesses. In Quebec, we have set up a number of creative initiatives to meet these requirements, in large municipalities and also in the regions. Our financial institutions work very well. We have all the resources and agencies we need to supervise these institutions. And it works.

So why bother today with Bill C–100, which would establish at the federal level a series of activities and institutions that already exist at the provincial level? Again, and we keep repeating this all the time, this is what is fundamentally wrong with the federal system. I could go on and on about the disease, as it were, that exists here in Ottawa, which is—perhaps unfortunately—not only due to a lack of political will on the part of the government but is reflected in the very survival of the whole bureaucracy established in Ottawa for so many years, which is very invasive and whose resistance to devolving powers to the provinces is ingrained, although across the country, people keep asking for decentralization.

The federal government has now tabled a bill that is a complete contradiction of these repeated requests for decentralization. The government cannot or will not listen. This is irresponsible, especially considering the deficit, which is cause for serious concern. It is extremely disturbing when a government tables bills like the one before the House today.

Bill C–100 is purely and simply another tiresome and costly duplication gimmick. In Quebec, we know what this means. We have problems with this, and perhaps this is one major reason for Quebec's wanting to leave and its wanting to change the way negotiations are conducted with the federal government. We want to negotiate as equals, because, it would seem that English Canada is unable to give the federal government a wake up call.

It will take Quebec's sovereignty to wake up the other provinces, and it will be in their best interests, because they will be able to reorganize themselves in more effective terms. When I talk of duplication and the costs of the waste it entails, we know what that means in Quebec. We have done a lot of studies on this. There have been commissions and studies, including the Bélanger–Campeau study in 1990, which gathered a lot of information. There was also the study by Mr. Fortin, a Quebec economist, who said that, in all, some $3 billion had been wasted due to federal and provincial duplication—and this was only as far as Quebec was concerned.

In other words, Quebec as a province could save some $3 billion if there were not this duplication. Three billion dollars; that is a lot of money. You will agree that $3 billion a year is a substantial amount. If the Government of Quebec had this money to create jobs, to lend it to small and medium businesses, jobs would be created.

It is time the government stopped kidding us about wanting to be more efficient and to create jobs, when, in fact, the only thing it wants to do is increase its power. There are examples of duplication. I tell you: all the latest studies show that Quebec alone is losing $3 billion. If we were to look only at the matters essential to Quebec's development, we could point, in the case of manpower training for example, to another study showing that, because of duplication between the federal and the provincial governments, Quebec loses $250 million a year. There is no training and the reason is that the federal government is trying to do the same job as the province. Often the federal government implements initiatives that run contrary to Quebec's interests.

The Speaker: My dear colleague, you will be able to continue the debate after question period. It being two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 31, we will now proceed to statements by members.

LAKEFIELD, ONT.

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last summer I attended Civic Pride Day in the village of Lakefield, Ontario. This was the home of Margaret Laurence and before her of two other famous authors, Catherine Parr Trail and Susanna Moodie.

On this day, the village was celebrating no less than four anniversaries. It was the 75th anniversary of the Lakefield Hydroelectric Commission and Memorial Hall. It was the 100th anniversary of the library and it was the 120th anniversary of the first village council meeting.

The celebrations were organized by the LACAC, Lakefield Architectural Conservation Advisory Committee, with the support of council and many volunteers and sponsors. Past and present reeves and councillors were present. A historical booklet was produced.

We do not take enough time to celebrate our rich and diverse heritage. We need to think more about Canada as it really is today. My thanks to the village of Lakefield for setting such a fine example.

THE BARRHEAD TWO–BUCK

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the town of Barrhead started off with an idea and watched it produce fame and fortune. The idea, producing its own version of the $2 coin. The fortune, raising enough money to beautify the downtown core.

How does it work? The Pride in Barrhead Association representing over 100 local businesses minted the Barrhead two–buck. The coin features two deer on one side and on the other side the town's mascot, the blue heron. The two–buck is local tender in Barrhead until the end of 1996.

Collectors from all parts of Canada are clamouring to get their hands on this gold coin. The demand is so high that thousands more had to be minted.

If members want more information on this unique fundraising idea they could call my office. Better yet, they could purchase the two–buck. They had better hurry; they are going like hotcakes.

FORESTRY

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, this morning I had the pleasure of participating in a presentation to the Governor General at Rideau Hall.

Our small group presented the Governor General with a Christmas tree, a white spruce, the provincial tree of Saskatchewan, on behalf of the town of Meadow Lake which was Canada's forestry capital in 1995 and on behalf of the Canadian Forestry Association of which the Governor General is the honorary patron.

I take the opportunity to thank the people of Meadow Lake and the Meadow Lake Forestry Capital Society represented today by Donna and Barry Aldous for the fine job that they have done on behalf of forestry communities throughout Canada in 1995. Meadow Lake's efforts during the past year will be fondly remembered for many years to come.

I congratulate the people of Meadow Lake, their representatives and the members of the Canadian Forestry Association for making the forestry capital program such a success.

I wish the Governor General, his wife and staff an enjoyable Christmas season with that fine white spruce in their lobby.

KATIMIVIK

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend in my riding of Annapolis Valley—Hants I met with a group of young people involved with Katimivik.

Katimivik is an Inuit word meaning meeting place. The project being funded under Youth Services Canada brings youth between the ages of 17 and 21 together to acquire work experience, become involved in their communities and discover Canada.

Through exchange programs such as Katimivik, Canada's young people have an excellent opportunity to travel and learn about all regions of our great country. By promoting this wonderful program the government is helping to bring young people together to achieve common goals, build lifelong friendships and to help break down regional barriers that often divide us.

I urge the government to continue to promote Katimivik and other similar exchange programs as a valuable means of building stronger ties among all parts of Canada.

PANACOM

Mr. Andrew Telegdi (Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last Monday, Hewlett–Packard (Canada) Ltd. announced that it had purchased a 12–acre site in Waterloo. Construction will begin immediately on the new plant that will be occupied by the Panacom automation division. The 75,000 square foot facility will be ready by September 1996. Panacom designs, develops, markets and manufactures network terminal devices for the worldwide market.

Since Panacom began in 1984 it has been a leader in its field. Panacom is the number one supplier worldwide of X–stations, which are network display devices that allow users to access simultaneously multiple applications running on work stations. Panacom is a genuine Canadian success story.

The people of my riding are delighted that Hewlett–Packard has decided to invest in Waterloo. The new plant adds to the growing, vibrant information technology sector in Waterloo riding. The new plant will mean more research and development in my riding and more jobs for the people of Waterloo.

To Hewlett–Packard and to the Panacom automation division we send our congratulations and best wishes for continued success.

GALA DES MASQUES

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Gala des Masques, a moving event underlining the richness of Quebec theatre was held last night. Today, we in the Bloc Quebecois wish to pay tribute to the Quebec theatre actors, producers, directors and technicians, whose art lights up the stages of Quebec, Canada and the world.

As Jean–Louis Millette, one of the most talented theatre actors in Quebec, pointed out, we can be very proud of Quebec theatre. We have no cause to be jealous of any other country in the world.

We are all honoured by the creativity, talent, artistic research, and mastery of both classical and modern plays shown by these artists from every region of Quebec.

• (1405)

All Quebec plays performed around the world are a source of pride in and recognition of our cultural strength and vitality. Congratulations to all our artists and creators.

CRIME PREVENTION

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the holiday season is a busy time for shoppers and criminals alike.

The Peel regional police and police all across Canada have compiled lists of suggestions to help people reduce the risk of becoming a victim of crime. Among other things they suggest that shoppers avoid carrying large amounts of cash and lock their purchases in the trunks of their cars.

They remind people that empty cartons from high value products such as televisions, computers and stereo equipment may cause a thief to add their home to his post–Christmas shopping list. They suggest that gifts and valuables be kept away from windows to keep criminals from window shopping.

These crime prevention tips may keep thieves from stealing the joy from our holidays. I am sure all members will join me in commending the police on their fine work.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Liberal and Tory senators put a lump of coal in the Christmas stockings of legitimate gun owners when they passed a flawed gun bill last week.

Again it is obvious that the concerns of law–abiding gun owners do not count in the House or in the Senate. The Liberal government ignored these concerns and rammed through legislation which will do nothing to reduce crime but will establish an extensive bureaucracy and give the justice minister unprecedented powers.

When Liberal backbenchers voted with the wishes of their constituents, the government gave them a swift kick to keep them in line. It is the front benches that need a swift kick in their egos, one that will propel them to the back and out the door.

Liberal, Tory, same old story. Tories out in 93. Liberals next, just wait and see.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, A. K. Wigg Elementary School of Fonthill in my riding of Erie took the first place award out of approximately 80 entrants in the Niagara Environmental Technology Exposition.

The parents, students, staff and members of the community have embarked on a unique environmental project to transform the school property of six acres into an environmentally friendly green space.

The environmental nature area will include trails, wildlife, habitat facilities including a butterfly garden, plantings of Carolinian forest trees and shrubs, as well as woodland wildflowers and ground cover, thereby returning the area to its natural habitat.

The outdoor educational classroom and amphitheatre will have weather station features, compass, sundial, sculptures of cloud formations and windmills. Environmental education will be taught from the natural habitat right outside the classroom window.

I know, Mr. Speaker, you will appreciate A. K. Wigg's plan for enhancing the environment, increasing environmental stewardship, augmenting environmental education and positively involving the community in an excellent project. It is innovative and demonstrates the proactive approach that all Canadians should take to the environment.

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the constitutional changes contemplated by the Prime Minister during the referendum campaign are stirring up feelings of déjà vu.

We are still waiting for government proposals, and what is emerging is not very encouraging: a recognition of distinct society through a meaningless resolution of the Canadian Parliament that falls far short of the Meech Lake agreement, and a right of veto over any constitutional change that will be contingent on the federal government's goodwill.

The Prime Minister has clearly taken the path recommended by the Globe and Mail by giving Quebecers the impression that changes will be made when, in fact, there will be nothing meaningful for Quebec. The Prime Minister's proposal is meaningless, period.

VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during this period leading up to December 6 when Canadians are focusing on the issues of violence in our communities it would serve all of us well to review last June's Josephson report on "Television Violence: A Review of the Effects on Children of Different Ages".

Dr. Wendy Josephson's research produced a useful reference guide for broadcasters, producers and parents to help determine age appropriate programming for Canada's children.

All the research from Canada, Japan, Europe and the United States clearly demonstrates a correlation between television violence and aggression at very young ages. Our children are subject to positive and negative role models in the media.

• (1410)

We must ensure that television companies serve all Canadians well, particularly our youngest Canadians. For safe communities, safe streets and safe homes this is a critical issue.

CASINO WINDSOR

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, December 12 is the grand opening of Windsor's second casino location, the Northern Belle Riverboat. With this event the total number of casino jobs created in Windsor will rise by 950 to a total of 3,000. Ninety per cent of these jobs are from the Windsor–Essex county area.

The Northern Belle will entertain two million patrons on top of the 5.5 million that already visit the existing site. Eighty per cent of those visitors are U.S. residents. That means 80 per cent of the dollars spent are foreign dollars.

One of the major competitive advantages to Casino Windsor over its American counterparts has been the safety factor which will be further strengthened by the recent successful passage of the government's gun control legislation. The legislation will not only increase the safety of Canadians in Windsor, it also means good economic sense in Windsor because it leads to an environment in which job creation thrives.

HER MAJESTY'S LOYAL OPPOSITION

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I address some comments to Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, currently the Bloc Quebecois supported by the Liberals, with specific reference to the words loyal and opposition.

According to the Oxford dictionary loyal means faithful, trustworthy, true, steadfast in allegiance and devoted to the sovereign or government of one's country. In the House the Bloc is certainly not loyal to Her Majesty or to Canada and is openly plotting against the government to set up a separate Quebec.

Turning to the word opposition, according to Beauchesne's the official opposition is the largest minority group which is prepared in the event of the resignation of government to assume office. How can we have an opposition party that has no intention of becoming government, at least not in Canada, and is attempting to set up a separate independent state?

Clearly Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this 35th Parliament is neither loyal to Canada nor is prepared to fulfil the role of official opposition. It is time for the Bloc to step aside to make room for the real opposition to the Liberals, the Reform Party of Canada.

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, at the time of the referendum, the Prime Minister of Canada promised Quebecers change. All solutions had to be considered, including, and I quote: "administrative and constitutional". As of October 31, the Prime Minister's reassuring words gave way to chaotic ones.

Today, the Prime Minister says the Constitution must not be changed: "I said we were going to make changes to the federation, constitutional changes, if necessary, but I never said they were going to be constitutional". The Prime Minister who said he wanted to act quickly has nothing more to offer and is now saying that he will act in due course—heaven knows when.

As Alain Dubuc put it so well in his commentary on Saturday, the moral of the story is: "Please, Mr. Prime Minister, say no more".

[English]

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party has been calling for a much weaker federal government. Once again Reformers are listening only to the small percentage of Canadians who are their supporters. They are not listening to Atlantic Canadians.

They want decentralization in the most decentralized federation in the western world. When Reformers want federal government to withdraw from health care they are not listening. When they talk about privatizing UI they are not listening. When they want a looser federation they are not listening to Atlantic Canadians.

Atlantic Canadians believe in a strong federal government. Atlantic Canadians believe in Canada.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, 25 years ago when the Royal Commission on the Status of Women tabled its report in the House women formed roughly one–third of the labour force and on average earned 64 cents on every dollar that a man earned.

In the last 25 years we have eliminated the most blatant forms of discrimination against women through labour and employment equity initiatives. Women now represent 45 per cent of all workers. Nonetheless challenges do remain. Today, on average, women earn 72 cents for every dollar a man earns. Most women continue to work in traditionally female dominated fields.

We need to support job creation and training programs that will prepare women and girls for the jobs of today and tomorrow. We must help Canadian women prepare so they too can have good jobs and earn good incomes.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the special general council of the Quebec Liberal Party revealed last week in Montreal that Daniel Johnson, the president of the No committee, not only heard the Prime Minister's promises of change, he believed them. As Ottawa has been reluctant to deliver the goods, the Quebec Liberal Party went so far as to adopt four resolutions on the promised constitutional changes.

My question is directed to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs or to the Deputy Prime Minister. Will they acknowledge that the Prime Minister has no intention at all of acting on the recommendations of the Quebec Liberal Party and reopening the Canadian Constitution, as requested, to insert a provision recognizing Quebec as a distinct society?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my first answer is that the Prime Minister is a man who keeps his promises. He promised he would act on the issue of distinct society and the veto. I remain convinced, absolutely convinced, that he will act on those two promises very quickly and that Quebecers will see the Prime Minister is a man of integrity, a man of his word and a man who keeps his promises.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs acknowledge that what the government plans to do about recognizing Quebec as a distinct society and about the veto has no connection at all with the request made by Quebec Liberals on the weekend to include these two concepts in the Canadian Constitution, and that the government certainly has no intention of reopening the Constitution to do so?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we should rephrase the question as follows: What is the position of the Bloc Quebecois and of the Leader of the Official Opposition? Because if I remember correctly, last week the Leader of the Official Opposition, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois and aspirant leader of the Parti Quebecois, said in no uncertain terms that he would not consider any constitutional offers before sovereignty.

Clearly, the Leader of the Official Opposition is the one who is obstructing any translation into constitutional terms of the Prime Minister's promises.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister's inept excuses are not backed up by Daniel Johnson, president of the No committee in Quebec City. I have the following question for the minister. Now that even his federalist allies in Quebec are asking the Prime Minister to deliver the goods, will the government remember his pre-referendum commitments to Quebecers or will it do what the minister just did and hide behind the fact that there is a sovereignist government in Quebec City?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, the Prime Minister made promises he intends to keep and he will keep them. The only obstacle to our proceeding immediately is the members of the official opposition, because their leader made it very clear he is not prepared to proceed on any constitutional offers.

It is time the official opposition stopped trying to evade the issue and admitted that with the Parti Quebecois, it is preventing Quebecers from having the full benefit of the Prime Minister's promises.

After all, 73 per cent of Quebecers said they wanted the Quebec government to negotiate offers with the federal government, and we have the Leader of the Official Opposition who objects, who said no and who prevents us from taking a constitutional approach.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, according to a Gallup poll released today, fewer than 40 per cent of people living in English Canada are in favour of recognizing Quebec as a distinct society, and barely 10 per cent are in favour of reopening the Constitution to add the right of veto.

In light of these results, will the Deputy Prime Minister admit that, when the Prime Minister promised changes to Quebecers on October 24, it was only to sweeten the pot during the referendum campaign and he was well aware that these changes would be unacceptable to English Canada?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all there is not one English Canada, as the future leader of the Bloc Quebecois claims. Second, if he wants to look at surveys, I would recommend the one that shows 73 per cent of Quebecers want the government of Quebec to assume its responsibilities and negotiate in good faith with the federal government, which it refuses to do, despite the support of the majority of people in Quebec.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): There is no English Canada, Mr. Speaker; everybody knows that. That is why all the newspapers are in English.

At the special general assembly of the Quebec Liberal Party, the leader of the No committee and of the Liberal Party stated as follows, with reference to the resolutions on constitutional changes adopted yesterday: "These demands represent a starting point only, and are most definitely not the last word".

Is the Deputy Prime Minister aware that the major problem of the Canadian federation is that what constitutes a starting point for the federalists of Quebec represents something unacceptable for the federalists of English Canada, even with the majority they have here in this House?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what bothers the member is to see that there are sixteen francophone members representing ridings across this country which are not in Quebec but are francophone.

It bothers the member to hear that a poll by L'Actualité shows that 86 per cent of Quebecers state that they belong to Canada. If the hon. member wants to carry out an analysis of Quebecers' sense of belonging to Canada, I am sure that the Quebecers, along with other Canadians, are aware that Canada has need of improvement, that Canada has need of change, that Canada has need of open minds, yet Canada is still the best place in the world to live.

[English]

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Quebec's premier in waiting has said that he will not hold another referendum until 1997. That seems to be good news for this do nothing government.

A recent poll found that if a Quebec referendum were held today the yes side would win with almost 55 per cent. This is an outright condemnation of the Liberals' post–referendum strategy. What is more, 55 per cent of Quebecers reject the symbolic changes which the Prime Minister is offering, while a strong majority, as high as 85 per cent, want to see a transfer of powers to the provinces.

Since constitutional change is not an option and since Quebecers will reject the symbolic changes, when will the Prime Minister introduce concrete measures to transfer real power to the provinces?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians are probably as disturbed as we are to hear the underlying tone of glee in the member's voice when she talks about the possibility of a future referendum.

I point out to her that just as Quebecers do not want a referendum, Canadians do not want a referendum. They want the Canadian government to work together in a constructive way with the provinces, municipalities and Canadians to make a better Canada.

• (1425)

Canadians want better health care. They want a national health care plan that is respected by the province of Alberta. We will continue to fight for a better Canada for every Canadian.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we wanted the referendum to be over and done with through a strong no vote. It did not happen because of who was in charge over there.

Let me remind the Prime Minister that on October 25, in a speech broadcast to the entire nation, he said:

> All governments, federal and provincial, must respond to the desire of Canadians everywhere for greater decentralization.

That was a promise, not just to Quebecers, but to all Canadians. Since the referendum, however, the government has done nothing but backpedal on its promises.

When will the Prime Minister keep his promise to introduce concrete measures to transfer many powers to the provinces, which is their normal jurisdiction anyway?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to underscore how sad we are that the Reform Party missed a real opportunity to work for Canada during the referendum.

I also remind the hon. member that despite the backroom manipulations of her party, we actually won the referendum. As a government we intend to govern for the betterment of all Canadians.

The Prime Minister made promises in Verdun. He has every intention of keeping those promises. He will not be able to count on the support of the leader of the third party because when the time came, in a private meeting when the Prime Minister asked the leader of the third party to fight for Canada in the way that the leader of the Conservative Party did, the leader of the third party was not there to fight for Canada.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have been and will continue to fight for a new Canada, not this old rehash, out of date Canada that they keeping talking about.

I seem to hear from the other side decentralization, if necessary, but not necessarily decentralization. Mackenzie King's dog would have been proud of that line. He could not have said it any better.

Canadians inside and outside of Quebec want real change. They do not want just cosmetic changes and the ivory tower thinking that we are going to hear on Wednesday from the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Is that it? Is that all this bankrupt Liberal government has to offer, recycled centralist policies again and again and botched unity strategies? Does the government have any clue whatsoever, or is the Prime Minister just making it up as he goes along?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the saddest thing about the configuration of the current Parliament is the fact that in the opposition every day basically we see two sides of the same coin. We see a Bloc Quebecois that is fighting to separate Quebec from Canada and a Reform Party that is fighting to separate Canada from Quebec.

The member talks about the rehash of Canada. I remind her that despite our differences and despite our flaws, we have been chosen for several years in a row as the best country in the world in which to live. Yes, there is room for improvement, but if the Reform Party suggests that Canada is a rehash, it should call itself the regress party.

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to either the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs or the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday, Daniel Johnson repeated what he, his party and all other Quebecers had heard and understood, namely that the Prime Minister had undertaken to make constitutional changes in line with Quebec's aspirations. That is why Mr. Johnson urged Ottawa to act quickly on its referendum promises.

Will the Prime Minister, his deputy or the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs admit that setting up a phoney committee to save Canada is only a tactic to water down the Prime Minister's commitments, but a tactic that fools no one, not even former allies of the no side like Daniel Johnson and Liza Frulla, who are now asking him to deliver the goods quickly?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again, I think that the official opposition is hard of hearing. The Prime Minister made promises and he will honour them.

This past week–end, the special convention of the Liberal Party passed a number of resolutions, which we will do our best to help implement. The unity committee that was struck and that I chair is to look not only at how the Prime Minister's promises can be fulfilled, but also at possible corrective measures to make Canada an even better place.

I wish that the official opposition would do its job, which is to help make Canada a better place, instead of systematically attempting to destroy the country.

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): In this regard, Mr. Speaker, are we to understand that the Prime Minister intends to take the advice of the Globe and Mail, which was suggesting that, to save face, all he would have to do is to offer Quebecers a symbolic recognition of the distinct society and a so–called right of veto?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again, we must bear in mind that the Prime Minister made promises concerning the distinct society and the right of veto and that he will keep his promises.

But at the same time we must not forget that the Leader of the Official Opposition very clearly stated that he would reject any constitutional proposal and refuse to consider any offer made by the federal government. So, in this instance, the Prime Minister is the one who is trying to go ahead and give something to Quebecers, but his efforts are being thwarted by the inflexible and hard line approach taken by the official opposition and its leader.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, every time this government holds a debate on peacekeeping it is a total sham. The decisions are already made and there is no free vote.

Last week I sent a letter to the Prime Minister requesting that he respect the will of Parliament and allow a free vote on a clear peacekeeping proposal. Now that the government has had time to think about it, I would like an answer. Does Parliament get a free vote, yes or no?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

As he knows, while the peace accord was signed, from the Dayton, Ohio discussions it appears it will be some time before the accord is actually ratified. He would be aware that there are a lot of perturbations going on in Bosnia with respect to the details of the accord itself, such things as the width of the corridor in northeastern Bosnia, the disposition of war criminals potential and also the difficulty with the management of the Sarajevo situation.

On behalf of the Prime Minister and the ministers of defence and foreign affairs, I can guarantee the hon. member that there will be a debate. The opposition parties will have their input. But I cannot say when this debate will take place. I hope it will be soon, but it cannot take place until the accord is actually agreed to.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I guess I missed the yes or no in that answer. I am sure it was there somewhere.

In my letter to the Prime Minister I asked him for a genuine debate on peacekeeping. In order to have that debate, we require details. We need to know the budget, the maximum duration, the mandate. The government has not even told us the size or the role of the Canadian contingent.

When is the government going to provide these details? Is it just planning to keep Parliament in the dark as usual?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's questions, they are very valid.

The standing committee on defence, with the input of the third party, has agreed to a set of criteria in the white paper. I can assure him that these criteria will be looked at. They were developed basically by all parties in the House. We will try to provide reasonable and responsible answers to these questions when the debate takes place.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the president of the no committee, Daniel Johnson, asked this government to decentralize federal powers, starting with those in the manpower training sector.

• (1435)

Can the Deputy Prime Minister pledge that the social security reform, which her party intends to table in the House this week, will be an example of decentralization and that, consequently, Quebec will have sole authority over manpower training?

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we will shortly be tabling a new Unemployment Insurance Act here in Canada in response to what we heard from hundreds of thousands of Canadians who want basically a modern system, a system that is sustainable, and a system that will provide Canadians with a set of tools to get back to work quickly.

Part and parcel of what Canadians are calling for is greater decentralization and empowerment of local communities to make the decisions that best suit their local realities. The objectives that Canadians have set will be of course honoured in the new employment bill.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Deputy Prime Minister. This week, we will discuss a concrete issue, namely vocational training, and we are anxious to see how the government will decentralize powers.

Are we to understand that, by refusing to make the social security reform an example of decentralization, the government is clearly showing that the commitments made by the Prime Minister in Verdun were just a smoke screen?

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member gets the impression that we are not willing to reform Canada's social security system. Just as a reminder, it was the federal government that embarked on this very important legislative process to modernize Canada's social security system.

I want to tell the hon. member, who is extremely concerned about the role of the provinces in this particular case, that the provinces will be brought in as very effective partners, along with local stakeholders, to make sure that the type of training Canadians need is in tune with the times and will get Canadians back to work very quickly.

PRISONS

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it was recently reported that the 1994–95 cable TV bill for providing cable services to prisoners at the Mountain and Kent institutions totalled nearly $60,000. That is for one year.

Criminals should be punished for their crimes. Yet we have murderers, thieves, rapists, and drug dealers being treated to such luxury as cable TV, compliments of the taxpayer.

My question is for the solicitor general. Why is he wasting taxpayers' money to provide prisoners with cable TV when many of our law–abiding citizens and seniors cannot even afford to keep it?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is mistaken in his allegations. If my recollection is correct, the system is being switched so that the cost of cable TV is being paid for by the prisoners themselves. I think that is something he should be happy to support.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the solicitor general should get his facts straight. The salaries the prisoners make in prison are paid for by the taxpayers. It is still taxpayers' money.

Federal prisoners in federal institutions are sitting on their duffs watching cable TV to the tune of $1 million a year. Whatever happened to hard time?

Will the minister show some strength of character and announce immediately that all TVs will be removed from federal prisons, yes or no?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and solicitor general of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when prisoners get paid it is basically for work they do or programming they are involved with in prisons. It is part of the process so that when they get out they do not offend again, which I hope is something the hon. member will support.

I repeat, the cost of TV in prisons is being borne by prisoners themselves. I do not understand why the hon. member is more concerned about this than matters of jobs or Canadian unity, but if he wants to be, I am happy to answer his questions.

ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment surely knows that her colleague, the Minister of Natural Resources will, as early as mid–December, fob off on the private sector a site located in Quebec which could be contaminated by nuclear waste. Indeed, a public servant involved in the sale wrote that: "If the site is contaminated, we may be forced to decontaminate it, even after the sale".

• (1440)

Is that the kind of practice to which the minister was alluding when she recently said, with great pomp: "We do our best to turn environmental challenges into economic opportunities"?

[English]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I must confess that I am not sure I understand the hon. member's question. If she is referring to the sale of part of some 2,500 acres owned by AECL in the province of Quebec, AECL will be selling 250 acres of that site. The contractual negotiations are ongoing at this time.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the minister, who prides herself on implementing the principle whereby the polluter must pay, give the example by pledging to decontaminate that potentially contaminated site before its final sale? I think my question is clear, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, environmental assessment of the land is a matter for discussion and negotiation between the seller and the prospective buyer. Those discussions are going on now as part of the negotiations for the sale. I do not understand what the hon. member's concern is.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Now that the report of the special commission on restructuring of the reserves has been tabled, can the minister advise the House and my Carleton—Charlotte constituents the timeframe that can be expected for the new review and possible implementation of the commission's recommendations and the result of same?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question, which I believe is of importance to all members of the House.

I have to tell the hon. member, and I believe the House is aware, that this spring a special commission was struck on the restructuring of Canada's reserves. The commission was chaired by a retired chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. Two acknowledged experts in the field were his compatriots on the study. The study was completed at the end of last month and was reported to the minister and indeed to the parliamentary committee.

The Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs is now in its third week of hearing witnesses with respect to the recommendations that were made on the report, which was tabled in the House about three weeks ago. The hon. member should also be aware that the other place has recently struck a committee and it too will be studying the contents of this very important report.

Regarding the time frame, both committees are to make a report to the minister by mid–January.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, victims groups, the police, the Reform Party and a majority of the Liberal caucus want the elimination of section 745 of the Criminal Code, which allows first degree murderers to appeal their sentence after serving only 15 years of a life term.

I ask the Minister of Justice, will he support the removal of this unacceptable provision by ensuring that Bill C–226 is brought before the standing committee before this session of Parliament ends?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, may I first observe how welcome it is to hear the hon. member asking about a new and important subject.

Last spring, when the private member's bill was before the House, there was in effect a free vote on the question of whether it should go to committee. It went to committee. Shortly afterward I wrote to the chair of the committee and asked that the committee arrange to have hearings on the bill early on. Those hearings were started just after the House resumed in September.

I have urged the committee to look at the question of section 745 in the broader context of penalties for murder. I hope it does that. I also hope to have something to say to the committee before it completes that deliberation on the whole subject so that we can see the issue in context.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, what motivates, at least in part, my question to the justice minister is my knowledge of his stand on Bill C–226 when it came before the House.

I say to the justice minister that Darrel Crook, the convicted murderer of RCMP Constable Brian King, is appealing his parole ineligibility for first degree murder this February.

• (1445)

Will the minister put a stop to the further torment of Brian King's widow or will he subject her to reliving the brutal death of her husband one more time? Will he support the elimination of section 745 from the Criminal Code? Will he tell us of his intention today?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I met last June in my office with Marie King Forest, the widow of Constable King. I had an opportunity to discuss with her firsthand the effect that the application has had on her and her family.

More than anything else, it was my perception that her exclusion from the process was enormously hurtful. That in large part motivated the change in section 745 which I brought before the House in Bill C–41, which guarantees the role for the victim in the section 745 hearing. This change was brought about largely due to my meeting with Marie King Forest.

I do not believe the issue is so simple that it can be dealt with solely by the repeal of section 745. I have made every effort to encourage the hon. member, the House and the committee to see that question in the broader context of penalties for the crime of murder.

As the committee examines that broader question, I shall have something to say by way of what I hope are constructive suggestions as to how it might improve the regime for murder penalties in Canada. This will include the question of the application provided for in section 745.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the heritage minister.

In response to a question put to him last June about the fact that the Canadian sports guide was published in English only, the heritage minister promised to have the Official Languages Act enforced in organizations that his department awards funding to. I wanted to remind him of that promise.

How can the minister explain that several sports associations that his department is responsible for, such as Badminton Canada, Water Ski Canada and a dozen other associations, are still publishing their annual reports in English only?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, since that time, we have taken steps to negotiate an accountability framework for the various federations receiving financial assistance from the federal government.

If our hon. colleague has additional information, I will be pleased to look at it, but the policy I outlined has not changed: we expect these documents to be published in both official languages.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of legislation being open to negotiation in this House before.

Here is my supplementary question: How can the minister explain that, this year, for the first time, Football Canada's report was published in English only, if not by the fact that francophones are the first ones to bear the brunt of budget cuts?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will remind our hon. colleague that the funding of sports governing bodies does not come under any statute of the Parliament of Canada nor directly under the Official Languages Act. Arrangements are made by my department to make sure that French is used as it should be in Canada. But the law was not broken in this case.

TRADE

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the United States has initiated a trade action against Canada's tariffs on supply managed farm products.

Will the Minister of International Trade use this dispute as an opportunity to negotiate a reduction in American subsidies, subsidies which restrict Canada's ability to export dairy and poultry products south of the border?

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, working groups are now considering this issue. Discussions are taking place. We believe that a proper approach to trade and trade remedies will deal with the issue.

• (1450)

I will take the issue under advisement and bring it to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food who is in the best position to answer the question.

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary should realize that this is a winner take all dispute. It is a very important question for Canada's supply managed farmers.

Why is the government playing Russian roulette with our farmers? If Canada loses the dispute, our supply managed sector will see open borders almost overnight. Thousands of farmers will go broke. Why is the minister not offering partial tariff reduction in exchange for fair access to the U.S. market?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows very well that a number of trade discussions are going on with the United States on a number of fronts. The challenge through the NAFTA panel process on supply management is only one of them.

We have said very clearly that we will continue to handle each concern which the United States has with us and which we have with it one at a time. We have also said very clearly that we will defend Canada's supply management system very fervently. We are confident the process will work in our favour.

PUBLIC SERVICE OF CANADA

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, many of our fellow citizens in the Outaouais are very concerned about the public service cuts. The government has expressed its desire to provide quality services.

Can the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board tell the House what measures have been taken to boost morale in the public service?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board has taken a special interest in the public service. He has outlined, both here in the House of Commons and in public, his vision of the public service and has been involved in a number of initiatives to raise morale, to try to work with these people. The President of the Treasury Board has also attended special events of all kinds.

[English]

The President of the Treasury Board has set up a secretariat to look at renewal in a profound way. He has set up an advisory council for change in order to do just that. He has hosted a series of meetings and has been involved in them in a hands on way. He has opened dialogue with everybody in the public service, including the frontline workers. He has sent a letter to his colleagues encouraging them to do the same.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint-Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the solicitor general. Some time ago, the RCMP suspended Sergeant Gaétan Délisle for running in a municipal election and being elected Mayor of Saint-Blaise-sur-Richelieu. This individual has been campaigning for years to defend the right of RCMP officers to form a professional association.

How can the solicitor general justify Sergeant Délisle's suspension, when other RCMP officers elected to public office in their communities have never been suspended from their jobs?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, according to the information I have, the other officers the hon. member is referring to were elected as school board trustees and not as mayors. The regulations prohibit any officer from running for mayor, for member of a provincial legislature, or for member of Parliament. It is also a matter of internal discipline. This whole matter will be reviewed thoroughly.

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint-Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the solicitor general that the rules that now apply to the RCMP used to also apply to the Public Service Act, and that this act was ruled unconstitutional and obsolete. I therefore ask the solicitor general if he intends to intercede with the Commissioner of the RCMP to defend Sergeant Délisle's democratic rights and stop the RCMP management's harassment campaign against him?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again, according to my information, the Supreme Court ruling has no direct bearing on Staff Sergeant Délisle's case. In any event, the matter is under review as part of the RCMP's internal discipline process, and I will gladly take steps so that this process will in time provide a response to this very important matter for Staff Sergeant Délisle.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, due to popular demand the federal government's cash buyout program aimed at reducing the public service is expected to cost an extra $500 million in addition to the original cost of $1 billion. These expensive buyout programs are costing the taxpayers millions of dollars and are giving some lucky public servants a golden handshake similar to winning the lottery.

Will the President of the Treasury Board confirm that the government's buyout plans are far too generous and that it has been a long time since so much has been given by so many to so few?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when the government initiated these programs it obviously went to the private sector to see what was being done there. Certainly what we are doing is very comparable to the private sector.

My colleague fails to understand there has been an initial rush on that program. There have been more people than expected. Yes, it may reach $2.3 billion, but during that same period of time $4.2 billion will be saved and $2.2 billion per year thereafter. That is a clear saving.

I am really quite surprised that my colleague would make such a charge. It is unfounded and completely incorrect.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, talking about the private sector, the National Capital Commission is cutting 400 jobs by contracting work out to employee takeover companies. Spokesperson Diane Dupuis said that the project works because employees will receive less pay and benefits in the private sector than they would as public servants.

Would the parliamentary secretary please tell us why civil servants are paid more than private sector employees, have better job security than private sector employees and have far more generous buyout packages than what one could have in the private sector?

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that the first question was totally erroneous, that there is going to be savings over time.

With respect to the second question that if one privatizes or commercializes there would be a particular savings because people would earn less, we all know that sometimes it works that way but other times it is completely the opposite. In this case we are keeping those programs we need to keep. We are keeping those civil servants we need in order to give the best service to Canadians. In certain cases we are looking at alternatives which is a wise, sensible and sensitive way to proceed.

I am surprised that my colleague is not jumping up and down applauding the government for this wisdom.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

Louisiana–Pacific's OSB plant and harvest plan in Manitoba is under review by the province. There have been claims of errors and omissions in the entire existing process. There have been calls for an environmental impact for the entire escarpment area. There appear to be federal triggers in place including aboriginal land interests and fish habitat.

Does the Minister of the Environment have the opinion that the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act is applicable in this case? Is she prepared to take the steps necessary to see that a joint federal–provincial assessment is done?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government recently released figures about Canada's international trade.

Could the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister for International Trade tell the House what these figures show about Canada's export performance and how it contributes to our economic growth and jobs for Canadians?

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues I would like to pay tribute to the finest ever minister of trade and his staff on a job very well done.

Here are the facts. In 1995 to date Canadian exports were 20 per cent higher than for the same period in 1994. Our trade merchandise surplus for September alone was $2.9 billion. By September, Canada's year to date trade surplus with the United States was $5.7 billion, higher than for the same period in 1994. For every $1 billion, 10,000 jobs are being created in our economy.

AIR TRANSPORT

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

On November 3, American Airlines and Canadian International filed an application for antitrust immunity with the U.S. department of transport. Such immunity would allow the two companies to merge their operations and act as a single carrier for transborder flights.

• (1500)

Will the minister clearly tell the two carriers that merging their transborder operations is not acceptable to the Canadian government, because it violates the Open Skies Agreement by giving American Airlines privileged access to the three largest Canadian airports, thus jeopardizing the activities of Canadian carriers?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the application that the hon. member refers to is one that is being considered by the appropriate authorities in the United States.

The National Transportation Agency has the responsibility as it relates to any activities by the two airlines in Canada. It would be our intention that whichever direction those two airlines desire to take in terms of merging their operations, they will have to respect both the letter and the spirit of the law in Canada.

FISHERIES

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Nisga'a land claims negotiations in northwest British Columbia apparently include a Nass River aboriginal commercial fishery allocation.

This flies in the face of the five aboriginal fisheries cases currently being argued before the Supreme Court. The provincial aboriginal affairs minister in B.C. has stated that whatever the results of these cases, commercial fishing must not be entrenched in B.C. treaties.

What continues to motivate the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to promote inclusion of a racially based commercial fishery in B.C. treaties?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that the only thing that is racially based is the nature of the questions being asked in the House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Both in the questions and in the answers sometimes we abut on what is parliamentarily acceptable. I would encourage all hon. members when asking questions and responding to be quite judicious in their questions and in their answers.

This concludes question period.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Transport on Bill C–101, the Canada Transportation Act.

The primary aim of the bill is to encourage the revitalization of the rail industry by reducing the regulatory burden facing that sector.

The bill was referred to the committee after first reading, pursuant to Standing Order 73(1). This new procedure allowed members to participate more fully in the legislative process and make important and constructive amendments to the bill.

The committee acknowledges with gratitude the co–operation and support of all those who contributed to our study of Bill C–101. We extend our thanks to all the witnesses who appeared, as well as those who made written submissions and shared their knowledge and insight with us.

In the process of reviewing this bill, the committee heard 55 hours of testimony from 154 witnesses, representing 85 stakeholder groups and organizations.

I would like to give special thanks to the clerk of the committee, the researchers, interpreters and the support staff of the committees and parliamentary associations directorate. I would also like to thank my fellow committee members for patiently proceeding through hours of testimony in order to ensure the effective evaluation of Bill C–101.

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 103rd report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding the membership and associate membership of standing committees.

If the House gives its consent, I intend to move concurrence in the 103rd report later this day.

CANADIAN WITHDRAWAL FROM NAFTA ACT

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–359, an act to require the withdrawal of Canada from the North American Free Trade Agreement.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is a mirror bill to legislation introduced in the United States Congress by Peter De Fazio, a Democrat from Oregon and Senator Byron Dorgan from North Dakota.

It has support in the United States of 23 members of the House of Representatives and a number of senators representing both political parties. Basically, it says that not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this act, the Government of Canada shall, pursuant to article 2205 of the agreement, notify the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the United Mexican States of the withdrawal of Canada from the North American Free Trade Agreement.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. This petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Etobicoke, Ontario.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society.

They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill and the aged.

ABORTION

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to deposit a petition signed by some of my constituents, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have several petitions to present today. One is asking that the current prohibitions against euthanasia or assisted suicide of any kind be upheld.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, another petition requests that Parliament enact provisions to protect human life before birth.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a third petition asks that recognition by the crown of same sex relationships be withheld.

WITNESS PROTECTION PROGRAM

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, another petition prays for better recognition for witnesses in any witness protection program.

Question No. 244—Mr. Caccia:

Since its inception 19 years ago, what has been the total cost of constructing, maintaining and repairing the Bruce II reactor at the Bruce nuclear generating station?

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Natural Resources Canada and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited have not provided funding for the construction, maintenance and repair of the Bruce II reactor at the Bruce nuclear station. Ontario Hydro is responsible for the Bruce II reactor.

BANK ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–100, an act to amend, enact and repeat certain laws relating to financial institutions, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Québec–Est has the floor. He has another six minutes approximately.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before question period in connection with Bill C–100, I find this bill unfortunate for Quebec, because it is an attempt to set up institutions that already exist in Quebec and work very well there.

I said that the great misfortune of the Canadian federal system is this business of duplication and that a policy of decentralization had to be implemented as quickly as possible. The people of Quebec, like elsewhere across the country, have spoken in favour of more decentralization.

Here is the government introducing Bill C–100, which goes against the trend and the wish expressed by so many people. Common sense itself dictates the need for more decentralization in Canada. Quebec has already suffered considerably from the wastage caused by departmental duplication. I was saying that, according to certain studies submitted to the Bélanger–Campeau commission, including the one done by Pierre Fortin, duplication cost Quebec alone some $3 billion a year. This money is wasted. This is pure and simple loss. Not only is it money lost, but it means departments and governments are unable to function and to provide people with quality services.

It seems to me that, if I were in government, and I wanted to save this great and fine country of Canada, I would undertake to decentralize. It seems that it is just good common sense for the government to decentralize; it is obvious. If only the people in government would listen, it could be done. They would understand that, in fact, decentralization is the only way to save the country. I repeat: centralization, the federal government's tendency to take over powers and to duplicate services already available provincially, is costing the Government of Quebec $3 billion. Studies have proven this; these are not groundless allegations.

Just in the area of transport and communications, there has been much talk—call it dispute if you want—much debate about the distribution of powers between the federal and provincial governments. It is estimated that, in the area of transport and communications alone, the shortfall is about $233 million. If the responsibility for transport and communications came under only one level of government instead of being shared by two governments, hence duplication, the Government of Quebec would end up with $233 million more in its pocket. So, there is a shortfall in that regard.

It is the same thing with taxes. If there were only one government collecting taxes in Quebec, this would generate $299 million in savings. In other words, this much, $299 million, is lost, squandered, because of duplication and overlap between our respective departments.

I could give you more examples, with respect to regional development and business assistance for instance. In fact, Bill C–100 is brought forward under the pretext of providing assistance to businesses, when there are well established new business start–up services in Quebec to assist small business. Why more duplication? Why establish more agencies and institutions that we already have at the provincial level?

Same thing with health and culture. The worst of all, of course, is manpower training, an area where the federal government is essentially copying the services provided by the province, duplicating programs. This duplication is apparently responsible for a $250 million shortfall in Quebec and, again, not only is money being lost, squandered, but manpower training is not being conducted.

We are told that, in Quebec, thousands of jobs may have remained vacant because this training was not provided. In many cases, these jobs require special technological training. Since this training was not provided because of intergovernmental duplication, the people who should be holding these jobs end up either on unemployment or on welfare because of the government, again, because of this duplication.

This creates not only deplorable waste but also a great deal of poverty. In fact, this keeps a number of people unemployed and on social assistance. Of course, the federal government does not have a good reputation in this area so far. You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that since the last budget the federal government has introduced a whole series of measures to make cuts in unemployment insurance, in the health sector, in education, and even in old age pensions, which all amount to rather virulent attacks against the most vulnerable in our society.

Allow me to quote from an article by Jean–Robert Sansfaçon that appeared in the May 2 edition of Le Devoir: "To this day, the only result of the federal government's social reforms has been to move people from unemployment to welfare rolls. Yet, one does not have to be a separatist to know that the provinces are in a better position than the central government to find the solutions that can best meet the needs of their people".

In fact, we should all learn this lesson, which is constantly repeated in this House. The lesson is that the provincial government is often in a better position to fulfil certain functions, as in the case of financial institutions. Unfortunately, Bill C–100 would put in place institutions that already exist at the provincial level. What a waste.

[English]

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to Bill C–100, an act to amend OSFI and CDIC and related acts.

• (1520)

Looking back in history, some years ago we had what were then known as the four pillars of our financial industry, which were the banks, the trust companies, the insurance companies, and the brokers. At that time, the government of the day saw fit to allow the banks to break down these barriers among the four pillars of the financial industry. So the banks started to take over the trust companies and the brokerage houses. Today, as we know, the banks virtually control the other two pillars of the industry, which only leaves the insurance companies, which by and large are removed from the banks. At this point we still have a clear separation of what banks can do in the insurance industry, and insurance companies are kept out of the banking industry.

We know there is serious lobbying and serious pressure by the banking industry to get into the insurance business. This is going to take away the pillars of our financial industry which kept us four square on the ground and will leave us standing on one leg. I am not exactly sure that we are going to find that standing on one leg interminably is actually going to be good for our health. It might get a little cramped and painful after a while.

I have some serious concerns about the wisdom in the long term about decisions such as allowing the conglomeration of all the financial services in this country to come into the realm of the banks. Without being derogatory to the banks, there are not that many of them left. We have a very serious concentration of power in the hands of a very small number of elite people in this country, all of whom are unknown, unelected, and responsible to no one, hardly even to their shareholders.

The banks are such a complex business that those people involved in the senior management of the banks would have great problems, I am sure, trying to explain the intricacies of their jobs to the shareholders who own their business and to the depositors who participate or create the business to the benefit of the country and to the government at large.

As I have said, I have serious concerns about the wisdom of taking the four pillars of the financial institutions and making them into one.

I know the banks have always put forth the argument that competition requires that they get bigger. When we look around the world we see some behemoths as far as the financial world is concerned. I understand the merger of the Chase Manhattan Bank and the Chemical Bank in the United States will create an organization of $300 billion in size. That is truly a behemoth under any rule we wish to use.

However, here in Canada we are a small country. If we are to agree that big is beautiful in the world of international finance, we cannot have it both ways. We can either have competition with a large number of competing companies or we can meet the desire to be large and compete on an international scale by using the same measures as the huge banks around the world. Therefore we may end up having a choice between big banks and no competition or small banks and much competition, or we may have to have an arrangement or a compromise in between.

I say that competition surely is the way to go. When we look around the world we always find that competition brings out the best in business. It brings out the best service, the best products, and the best prices. I am sure that rule applies to the financial industry every bit as much as it applies to every other industry that serves our Canadian public.

The other argument for competition is these huge banks that are being created around the world. It was earlier this year when the first surprise was sprung upon the world with the Barings Bank disappearing overnight with a $1 billion loss, all because of one rogue trader in one office who was on the opposite side of the world from the head office. The entire organization was destroyed overnight.

A couple of months ago one of the Japanese banks in New York admitted to losing $1 billion. Again it was the fault of one rogue trader, who perhaps was in collusion with others within the organization. That overnight loss was revealed to the general public.

In the last decade there was a $500 billion loss in the savings and trust loans fiasco in the United States. Now we are facing a situation in Japan, where the largest of the world banks have been based for some time, in which losses may be as high as $1 trillion. That is a tremendous vote of non–confidence in people's ability to manage institutions that big.

That is why competition is vitally important. Bigger is not necessarily better.

Bill C–101 deals primarily with two things: the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. I would like to talk about the CDIC.

The CDIC is sponsored by government to insure deposits within the federally regulated banking system up to $60,000. We thought it was working well for many years because there was never a claim. However, in the last few years we have seen quite a number of institutions that have been claiming on a regular basis, from the vast sums of money claimed by Confederation Life to other trust companies that have failed over the years. They have cost the Canadian taxpayer large sums of money.

It is time for us to take a new look at the situation. This bill unfortunately goes a short way by proposing rated premiums for the CDIC, which will be based on its assessment of the risk. It will vary the premiums according to the risk. The bad thing is that the CDIC intends to do this behind closed doors. That I cannot accept. If they think they are going to tell a financial institution that the risk is high and therefore the premium on the deposits is high, the Canadian public must be made aware that there is a potential risk involved in the financial institution and be governed accordingly.

About a decade ago in my home province of Alberta we had a fiasco called Principal Trust. I know that was a provincially regulated institution, but the principle is still the same. If an institution that is being fraudulently managed wants to work behind the veil of secrecy, it can do so, making the Canadian public vulnerable to loss.

It is absolutely vital that the information be provided up front. I cannot see any harm in that. I do not see how an institution can prevent it from becoming public knowledge.

We all know that once the bill is adopted the premium ratings will be applied. All it requires is someone at the annual meeting of the financial institution to ask what is the rating of the premium paid to the CDIC. They will either find out or management will lie to the shareholders. I hope they will not lie to the shareholders. The information should become public very quickly. I see no real reason for the information to be kept private.

Another thing regarding the CDIC, which perhaps has more of a bearing on the government than the CDIC, is the fact that if it needs money it will be given the opportunity to borrow the money on the open market rather than dipping into the consolidated revenue fund. While it may seem a fairly innocuous change, if we look more closely we see it is another way to slide borrowings off the balance sheet of the Government of Canada and on to the private sector so that they will not show up in the public accounts of Canada.

It is shameful and disgraceful the government would even propose such a move. If the government is to stand behind the deposits of investors, let it show in its records what it is costing taxpayers. It is shameful the government would even propose the amendment to which I am totally and absolutely opposed.

The money markets of the country are not the place in which to subsidize the losses of financial institutions that create the money markets in the first place. We could go around and around in ever increasing circles and accomplish absolutely nothing.

The government should be prepared to stand up to its obligations, have the information in front of the public, tell people what is happening and let the people decide while the government still enjoys their confidence. If they do not we know the consequences. To hide behind the barriers and the veils of secrecy cannot be tolerated in this day and age. On OSFI the veil is being drawn even more tightly than on CDIC, perhaps with even more disastrous results.

We can look at some of the items in the white paper released by the government back in February 1995 prior to the tabling of the legislation. OSFI's role is to monitor and supervise financial institutions to ensure that they are safe for the general public to invest in. The government has come up with the phrase that it is a privilege rather than a right to own a financial institution. I tend to agree with the statement that no one has the right to own a financial institution if it allows them to rip off the public and hence the Canadian taxpayer.

There are four steps that OSFI envisages if an institution were to decline financial help. In stage one, the early warning stage, the management and the board of directors of financial institutions are formally notified by OSFI of concerns and requested to take measures to rectify the situation. Perhaps it is not as strong as we would like it to be. Therefore some directives are being issued.

In stage two the financial health of the institution has continued to deteriorate in the opinion of OSFI. At that point senior OSFI officers meet with the management and board of directors of the financial institution and with the external auditor of the institution to outline concerns and discuss remedial actions. The management and board of directors are formally notified that the institution is being placed on the regulatory watch list. That is more involvement by OSFI which perhaps at that stage is not bad. OSFI is getting more and more involved in the daily administration of the institution.

If it continues to slide it gets into stage three where the management and the board of directors and external auditor of the institution are informed of the problems. Depending on circumstances, pressures may be exerted on the management and the board of directors to restructure the institution or to seek an appropriate prospective purchaser.

That brings us to stage four. The organization is continuing to deteriorate. The government says that pressure to rectify the situation is exerted on the management and the board of directors of the financial institution with frequent meetings with senior officers. If statutory conditions for taking control of the assets exist and if circumstances are such that there is an immediate threat to the safety of depositors and other creditors, OSFI may take control of the assets of the institution for a short period.

While the financial institution is still solvent everything in steps one, two, three and four have taken place behind closed doors, in secrecy. They have watched the institution deteriorate. They have become more and more closely involved with the management of the institution on a daily basis. It may be that their management has caused the institution to deteriorate.

While the institution is still solvent they have taken upon themselves the authority to seize it and manage it.

I hope this is a democratic country. If it is, that cannot be tolerated. We cannot have an agency of government getting intimately involved in the daily management of the affairs of a financial institution, participating in the decline of the financial health of the institution and seizing control of the institution prior to its becoming insolvent. That is not democratic and that has to be opposed.

I stand fully behind the idea that we have solid, sound financial institutions, but I do not stand behind the idea that the government shall get into bed behind closed doors, dictate to the management of a financial institution and seize it if it does not like the proposals coming from management. Also I do not like the idea that we have rated premiums which are supposed to be kept secret from CDIC.

It is time to rethink the entire bill and talk about such things as co–insurance. The government could perhaps ensure 90 or 95 per cent of deposits up to a certain limit. At that time investors would know they have a potential exposure. Perhaps it is small but nonetheless it is exposure. In that way they would take more of an interest in their money and more of an interest in financial institutions. It is the same as the bond rating system in place for governments, for institutions and for money markets. They are rated according to financial strength, soundness, liquidity and so on. They have a rating which people know when they put up their money. The same could quite easily apply up front, above board, in the open so Canadian depositors know how well financial institutions are being run.

As far as the supervision of institutions that are falling short is concerned, Canadians need to be assured that the government is looking over their shoulders. We saw in the Financial Post over the weekend that the managers of a brokerage house a number of years ago are off to prison because they helped themselves to several million dollars of the company's money and mismanaged the company to the point of losing quite a number of millions of dollars.

I hope that is not the type of supervision we are looking at. I hope we will be able to monitor rather than get into daily management of the organization. We will be asking them to ensure they meet the margins they require and that the risks are not being totally ignored.

As I said earlier, Japan is now looking at $1 trillion in bad debts because they all jumped on the same bandwagon and inflated real estate to such an astronomical or exorbitant price that people were getting 100–year mortgages to try to pay for the property they were buying. The banks caused the problem. They are the ones that now have to suffer the problem. The taxpayers in Japan will be left holding the bag as they did in the United States under the Resolution Trust situation.

Let us get the situation out in the open now while it is sound and while we can see it. If warts are to grow on our financial institutions, let us watch them grow rather than wait until the cancerous growth will kill us.

• (1540)

The government could have done much more in conjunction with financial institutions to make it an open system, an accountable system, a system that would work. Then Canadians would know what is going on and would have some faith in it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, a division on the question now before the House stands deferred until Tuesday, November 28, at the end of government business, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS AND GOVERNMENT SERVICES ACT

The House resumed from December 13, 1994, consideration of Bill C–52, an act to establish the Department of Public Works and Government Services and to amend and repeal certain acts, as reported (with amendments) from the committee; and of Motions Nos. 2 and 3.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): When Bill C–52 was last before the House the hon. member for Elk Island had approximately two minutes remaining on debate.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I realized there were some hazards when I got into the political business, but I did not realize I would be interrupted for 349 days, almost a year, on an important statement that I was making. Because I have so little time left I want to get right to the statement.

Bill C–52 would put into action a decision made by the previous government to establish the department and we are dealing with some amendments to the bill. I go on record as reviewing what I said almost a year ago and emphasizing as strongly as I can that I think we would make a gross error in approving some of the items in the bill unless we accept the amendment proposed by the Bloc to delete clause 16.

We run the risk of actually losing the very foundation of the economic system of the country, namely free enterprise or the private initiative to go out and get it. The government has taken it upon itself to tax everyone to death and use that money to subsidize activities that should properly take place in the private sector and, most important, to compete unfairly with it.

It is unjustifiable to force businesses to pay taxes and then use that money to provide the services the companies are in the business of providing. It is a contradiction that will destroy the economic basis of the country if we proceed. I emphasize as strongly as possible that we should not do what the bill proposes, which is to give the Minister of Public Works and Government Services carte blanche to do anything for anyone as the bill proposes, just anything that he decides, using government departments to provide engineering services, printing services, advertising services, all the services which many businesses depend on in order to provide for their employees for their very survival.

Instead, we have this move by the government to give the minister unbridled ability to do whatever he or she wants in terms of competing with private enterprise. That is a wrong principle.

Let us ask for some careful thought on the part of the government. Let us not wait until the other place has to be the chamber of sober second thought. Let us do some sober thinking in this Chamber and defeat this bill unless we can get the amendments for which we asked.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Let me commend the hon. member for Elk Island for being so patient and waiting all those number of days to close his intervention. It seems just like yesterday that he spoke on this very important matter.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to resume the debate.

When I heard my hon. colleague say this bill will somehow shake up or destroy the economic system of the nation, I think there is some exaggeration.

I heard my colleague say we are forcing businesses to pay taxes. My goodness, I think most businesses pay taxes rather willingly. Some have questioned some sections of the bill, but they have also acknowledged some of the meaningful changes that have been made.

When he suggests there ought to be sober thinking here, I hope there is thinking and that the people who are doing the thinking are sober. If that is so, it would be sober thinking.

It has been almost a year since we debated this bill, as my colleague has pointed out. With Bill C–52, an act to establish the Department of Public Works and Government Services, four common service agencies are being integrated into one: Supply and Services Canada; Public Works Canada; the Translation Bureau and the Government Telecommunications Agency. The bill has a single and simple purpose, integration. The government is setting out a solid legislative process for integrating virtually all common service agencies within one organization. The result will be increased savings, efficiency and improvement in services for government, business and, most important, the Canadian taxpayer.

Through overlap and duplication reduction, system streamlining and expertise pooling, the cumulative savings for the Canadian taxpayer will be approximately $180 million by 1997–98.

We are talking here about integrating four former departments. We are talking about efficiency and about improving services to all Canadians. We are also talking about saving taxpayers' money.

[English]

Under this bill, the Minister of Public Works and Government Services will have the authority to provide services in several areas, including acquisition of material and services for other departments, printing and publishing, communications and translation, real property services, including the administering of federal real estate, realty services and architectural and engineering services, acting as a receiver general, providing administrative services such as management consulting, information services audit, accounting and financial management.

The authorities contained in Bill C–52 essentially reflect those contained in the legislation of the four components of government that are being amalgamated. However, changes were made to modernize the legislative responsibilities of the department and to ensure consistency across the newly amalgamated organizations.

The Public Works Act dates back to 1867 and the Supply and Services Act back to 1969.

We are merging four former departments. We are taking into account the legislation of these departments, of course, but we are also modernizing.

• (1550)

Bill C–52 is about savings, efficiency, improved services. The integration of virtually all common service agencies into one department is achieving savings, increasing efficiency and improving services by reducing overlap and duplication, streamlining systems and pooling expertise. This will ensure the most efficient and cost effective delivery of our services and generate significant savings for Canadians, savings I have indicated previously in the magnitude of $180 million annually.

As a result of budget and program review decisions, the department will reduce the workforce in five years by 5,263 full time equivalent positions, or by about 30 per cent of its current population. About 85 per cent of these reductions will occur by the end of 1997–98 fiscal year.

This is about competition. The minister recognizes that more than ever the government has to be sensitive to the needs of the private sector and the real and legitimate concerns about unfair competition from the public sector. That is why the minister has moved swiftly to rectify the situation when specific examples of unfair competition have been brought to his attention.

In the case of architectural and engineering services, the minister has directed a review take place to determine the most cost effective means to deliver these types of services for the government as a whole.

A consultative committee has been established to guide this review, with representatives from industry associations and firms as well as union and government officials participating, including members of the Association of Consulting Engineers of Canada.

The minister has stated on several occasions that the department will not be allowed to compete against the private sector. This legislation will only be used by the department to support Canadian businesses to expand successfully, I might add, and to obtain a greater share of global markets, as well as to reduce overlapping duplication in all levels of government.

This bill has now the inclusion of a requirement for an order in council. The inclusion of a requirement for an order in council in section 16, proposed by the member for Guelph—Wellington, will ensure that the government obtain full direction from cabinet before the authority contained in this section is exercised and, therefore, ensuring accountability.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that Tuesday, November 28 and Thursday, November 30 are hereby not allotted and shall not be opposition days.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS AND GOVERNMENT SERVICES

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–52, an act to establish the Department of Public Works and Government Services and to amend and repeal certain acts, as reported (with amendments) from the committee; and of Motions Nos. 2 and 3.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, this bill is a further safeguard to ensure that the government is committed to govern with integrity and will take every measure necessary to restore confidence in the institutions of government.

This bill is about public–private partnering. The Minister of Public Works and Government Services is committed to further investigation and development of a potential for partnering. He is working at building the kinds of partnerships and working arrangements which will be beneficial to the government, the business community and the people of Canada. This commitment is shared by the Prime Minister.

Bill C–52 is needed to allow the minister to fulfil his commitment to further investigate and develop the potential for beneficial public–private partnering and working arrangements as well. This bill is about the efficiency of the federation.

PWGSC is contributing to the efficiency of the federation initiatives in the area of shared government support services. Priority areas identified include infomatics, procurement and realty services. PWGSC is in the process of negotiating with the provinces and territories on shared government support services.

Bill C–52 will enhance efficiency of the federation initiatives in that it will simplify administrative processes, leading to sharing arrangements with other levels of government.

Bill C–52 is about good government and improving services. It is essential that we get on with this bill. I look forward to the support of my colleagues.

This bill is about responsible and responsive government. We have consulted extensively with the Association of Consulting Engineers of Canada, the ACEC, and have made every effort to accommodate the concerns of this special interest group.

• (1555)

We recognize that the issue raised is a very important one.

[English]

First, we have put forward two separate amendments to clause 16 of the bill, one at committee stage clarifying that the department would only provide services outside the federal government at the request of another level of government or private sector firm.

The member for Guelph—Wellington has now also introduced an amendment stating that this will be done only after receiving governor in council approval.

Second, the minister has directed his department to undertake a comprehensive review of the levels of out–sourcing of the government's architectural and engineering requirements. For this review, a consultative committee comprised of industry, union and government representatives has been established to provide advice throughout all phases. This study is now under way with a report expected in the spring.

As I just pointed out, we are merging departments. We are integrating, if you will, four former departments, and we are modernizing. We are responsive to the issues raised by a number of people and we are trying to be sensitive to their concerns. I believe this bill does just that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before I recognize the hon. member, I must inform the House that the hon. member, who wishes to take the floor, has already spoken on the same group of Motions, that is group No. 2, which we are debating. So, do we continue the debate?

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 76, the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We will now proceed with consideration of group of motions No. 3.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill c–52, in Clause 17, be amended:

(a) by replacing line 5, on page 6, with the following:

"17.(1) The Minister may, subject to any regu–"; and

"(2) Before any fees or charges are fixed under subsection (1) or increased, the Minister shall cause to be published in the Canada Gazette and in no fewer than two leading newspapers in each province a notice clearly indicating

(a) the products, services, rights, privileges, regulatory processes, approvals or use of facilities provided under subsection (1); and

• (1600)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): With respect to Motion No. 5, the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River has indicated he will not be present and will not be moving the motion. I might add while I am on that subject that Motion No. 7 by the same member also will be struck.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.) moved:

That Bill C–52, in Clause 17, be amended by replacing lines 5 to 16, on page 6, with the following:

"17. The Minister may, subject to any regulations that the Treasury Board may make for the purposes of this section, charge for services provided by the Department pursuant to this Act or any other Act in force at the time this section comes into force."

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this motion is proposed essentially to allow the government to be more open in its method of setting the price of goods and services. Our suggestion, basically, is that all changes involving the price of supplies, the awarding of contracts or almost anything else be published in the Gazette and even in daily newspapers.

Clause 17 in fact gives the government or the minister the right to change the charges for passports, for example, or for any other service the government supplies at the present time. The minister would be entitled under this section to change the set charges without notifying the House or the public in advance. All we want is for all changes to be published in the Canada

Gazette and in newspapers, so that people are informed and the government is transparent.

The non-transparency of government can be seen in a number of areas. Moreover, the government does not even listen to the suggestions made by the general public. For example, the preceeding clause, 16, contains the same problem as 17: lack of transparency or not being attuned to the concerns of the general public.

Where clause 16 is concerned, it is even more flagrant. It is not solely a question of publication, but is really a question of respecting private enterprise. The committee even heard representations from the Canadian Association of Professional Engineers. Engineering representatives joined with more than 12 other Canadian organizations to oppose clause 16. In fact, that group of associations was a coalition of 12 of the most important organizations in Canada, including the Canadian Association of Professional Engineers, the architects' association, boards of trade, the federation of independent business, the Conseil du patronat du Québec, and so forth. These 12 associations represent 280,000 Canadian companies opposed to clause 16. They were violently opposed to clause 16 because, with it, the minister assigns himself the power to compete with the private business sector, particularly in the areas of engineering and architecture.

In my opinion, this is an abuse of power. The hon. member for St. Boniface said that the minister had no intention of competing with the private sector.

However, in a letter sent to committee members, the minister himself stressed they did not intend to bid the private sector out of the market, but he did say they intended to compete. This is in fact abuse of power, because not only does the government not respect the opinion of those concerned, as in the case of clause 17, but it acts as though nothing was wrong.

After all the representations made in committee, the government fails to act on this request by the coalition of Canadian associations. The hon. member for St. Boniface said that they set up a committee to review this sector, at least as far as competition between the government and the private sector on engineering and architecture projects was concerned, but this is just another phoney committee. The federal government is very good at setting up committees that do nothing, know nothing, hear nothing and see nothing.

The committee was set up nearly a year ago. Can you believe it? In fact, the president of the coalition, Pierre Franche, told me they had yet to meet. Imagine, they have not discussed the problem. In fact, he said there was absolutely no hope for any changes, especially in clause 16. That is pretty obvious, because today in the House, the government wants to adopt the same clause tabled a year ago, without any changes.

This is not openness, and this is not necessarily listening to the general public. We can hardly say this is a government that is working very hard to meet the needs and deal with the concerns of Canadian citizens or associations. They are doing nothing. Zilch. Not one word changed.

In fact, the government's proposal concerning clause 16 is to maintain all the elements that have raised the concern of these 12 Canadian associations which represent 280,000 companies in Canada. That is a lot of people. The government did not budge and insists on maintaining this clause, while saying, of course, that no, this will not necessarily increase the minister's powers: no, the minister will not act in such a way as to establish competition with private businesses; and no, we will be on our best behaviour. This power, accorded the minister under this clause in the bill would not be abused.

Well, if government members are honest, candid, and really up front, as we hope they are, if indeed the minister would not abuse this increased power, if indeed he would not use it and if 200,000 companies in Canada oppose this clause, let the government abolish it. It should abolish it. Why are they keeping it saying they will not use it, despite the opposition to it? If they keep it, it is because, hypocritically, they want to use it.

Obviously, the government would not hang onto increased power knowing that it would not use it, despite the opposition expressed by so many responsible companies and organizations across Canada. It wants this power. And this, basically, is why the government is keeping the clause intact. What also concerns me is that any engineering industry and architectural expertise we may have in Canada is mostly concentrated in Quebec.

Engineering firms have developed admirably in Quebec. The industry is very important to Quebec. It is one of the most important ones given all the hydroelectric projects and the consultation development done.

Is the federal government positioning itself to set up coalitions with certain private corporations in these sectors? Does it want to set up coalitions that may compete with and even destroy other engineering firms? Could this lead to patronage? Is there a possibility of collusion to support certain policies rather than others?

This provision opens the door to abuse, to competition between the government and the private sector. I find this extremely dangerous. We have seen, across Canada and around the world, several cases in which competition between government and private enterprise is never good. This morning, we talked about Canada Post, a crown corporation that competes with the private sector in the area of courier services and mail advertising delivery, for example. This is costing Canadian taxpayers a lot of money. Do you know why the federal government is running such a huge debt and deficit? It is because it is not really dealing with this.

I basically think that clauses 16 and 17 are unfortunate. Again, the main purpose of our motion is to ensure maximum openness, so that the general public will know exactly what the government is doing, because between you and me, Mr. Speaker, this government does not always act honestly and in a straightforward manner.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just spoken really was discussing clause 16 of the bill rather than the amendment he has put before the House regarding advertising in newspapers.

While there may be some relevance and I am not arguing that, I think he has misunderstood the thrust of the amendment that has already been proposed and which is subject to a vote. Also, I think he will be well satisfied with this bill and the Canadian public will be well satisfied when we have completed the amendments that have been proposed in the House today. I think the hon. member for Québec–Est knows that perfectly well.

I would like to speak in support of the amendment I proposed to clause 17 of this bill. Clause 17 deals with the powers of the minister to fix certain charges that may apply to the various services provided by the minister's department.

The government's original intent was that the legislation dealing with the departments of public works and government services, industry, and heritage would all include an identical clause dealing with fees for the sake of consistency and uniformity. However it is recognized that public works and government services differs from the other two departments in that the focus of its mandate is internal to government as opposed to delivering government programs to the Canadian public which is the case in the other departments I listed.

The vast majority of contractual arrangements that the minister signs and that involve charging for goods or services are made with other federal agencies. Generally speaking, the department delivers common services to some 150 federal departments and agencies. These services cover a wide range of activities.

[English]

They include: providing office furnishings and supplies; consulting services; real property and realty services; architectural and engineering services; communications and telecommunications services; and many more. The important point is that these are essentially intergovernmental arrangements that do not impinge directly on the department's relations with outside interests.

As a result and subsequent to debate on this clause, I put forward an amendment to its wording. Under the proposed amendment, the full wording of the clause would be as follows:

> 17. The minister may, subject to any regulations that the Treasury Board may make for the purposes of this section, charge for services provided by the department pursuant to this act or any other act in force at the time this section comes into force.

• (1615)

Not only does this revised wording simplify the description of the minister's power in this area, it also more accurately describes the nature of the department and its functions. The use of the words "charging for services" rather than the original wording "fixing fees and charges" reflects the reality of the service nature of the department. It is in line with the wording found in the existing Supply and Services Act. For this reason I ask hon. members to support this amendment.

Clause 17 of this bill as amended establishes a clear, relatively simple and unbureaucratic regime for establishing charges for services made by the department. It is in line with the general thrust of the bill, which is to streamline government operations, reduce red tape and make the delivery of common services more cost effective.

However, the minister's powers in this area are by no means unlimited. One of the major constraints is that many of the services his department provides to the government are optional; that is, the client may accept them or look elsewhere for better value. This in itself is a powerful incentive to make sure the department's schedule of charges is well thought out and competitive with outside sources. Of course in establishing charges the minister must take into account the rules and guidelines of his own department, the Treasury Board, and other government bodies.

By giving the power to set charges to the minister rather than the department, clause 17 ensures the minister will be ultimately responsible to Parliament to answer any questions that may arise with regard to charges.

Mr. Keyes: As it should be.

Mr. Milliken: As my hon. friend from Hamilton West says, that is as it should be. I agree.

This being the case, members can rest assured that these powers vested in the minister under clause 17 with the amendment I have proposed will not be abused. Passage of Bill C–52 with this amendment will give the minister the legislative authority he needs to continue working for more efficiency and cost effectiveness in government operations.

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on the proposed amendments to Bill C–52, an act to establish the Department of Public Works and Government Services and to amend and repeal certain acts.

The four proposed amendments—now two, as two have been dropped—have been grouped together for debate. All address clause 17 of the bill. Clause 17 proposes to allow the minister of public works, subject to any regulations the Treasury Board may make for the purposes of this clause, the authority to "fix fees and charges that the minister considers appropriate to be applied to products, services, rights, privileges, regulatory processes or approvals and the use of facilities provided by the minister, the department or any other board or agencies of the Government of Canada for which the minister has responsibility, including public works and federal real property under the administration of the minister".

That is a very longwinded way of saying that the minister would be free to set fees and charges for any department services under his portfolio completely at his discretion. This amount of ministerial discretion and power goes too far and is clearly unnecessary.

This clause moves in exactly the opposite direction to where we feel we should be heading. Canadians want a bottom up system of decision making. However, proposals such as clause 17, with decisions concentrated in the hands of the minister, support a top down system of policy and decision making. Somehow the Liberals must have their signals crossed, because this is definitely a move in the wrong direction. Either they are not listening, which happens quite often, or they are hoping to slip one by the public when it is not looking. This may explain why the government has sat on this bill for so long, nearly a year, because such controversial proposals simply will not be accepted by the Canadian public.

It is not surprising that a number of amendments have been proposed to address this clause. What is surprising is that these changes are being proposed in the first place.

The first proposed amendment by the member for Québec–Est is to change clause 17 so the minister would have to publish any fee or charge increases in the Canada Gazette and in no fewer than two leading newspapers in each province. This notice must clearly indicate the product, services, rights, privileges, regulatory processes, approvals or use of facilities provided under subsection (1), and the fees or charges that have been fixed or increased.

However, this proposal would do nothing to change the intent of the clause as it stands. The only benefit, and it is a benefit, is that the public will be made aware of the changes. But the minister still retains complete discretion in the setting of fees. For this reason, this amendment is redundant and I see little cause to support it.

The member for Scarborough—Rouge River proposed an amendment and then withdrew it. The amendment had the effect that the fees and charges for government services did not exceed the cost of providing the service. The motion would have restricted the minister in how much he or she could raise fees for services. I could not have supported that in the long run, so I am pleased to see the amendment withdrawn.

The parliamentary secretary to the leader of the government also proposes an amendment to clause 17. However, I fail to see why this amendment was proposed in the first place, because it changes nothing, except perhaps the wording of a particular clause. The intent of clause 17 is the same. Fees would be set by the Minister of Public Works and Government Services at his discretion or whim, giving the minister far too much discretion, which I am not confident he can handle. I cannot in good judgment support this amendment either.

Motion No. 7 was proposed by the member for Scarborough—Rouge River and is the only amendment to clause 17 that makes any sense. Perhaps that was why he withdrew it today. Motion No. 7 would have proposed to delete clause 17 altogether. That made good sense. This amendment clearly would have had our support, because Canadians are demanding a more open and transparent system of government. They want honesty and integrity restored to our government.

Canadians are simply tired of governments that do not consult them, disregard their views, and especially governments that conduct key parts of public business behind closed doors. Yet closed door politics that allow government ministers to make random changes to fees and service charges, with no system to scrutinize and oversee changes, can hardly be considered a step in the right direction.

The Liberal government has made a lot of promises regarding open government. We often hear the term open government, but we see little action. On the contrary, we have seen quite the reverse. This is just one example of the government grasping at more power and control. When this government proposes decision making to be concentrated in one person, the minister, and conducted behind closed doors with no accountability, this is not open government. This is a step toward a more autocratic, not democratic, system of government.

The Liberals promised in the red book that "open government will be the watchword of the Liberal government". Right. It is obvious that the Liberals need to reread their book of promises. When put to the test on this government's commitment to open government, it has failed miserably again and again.

It is unfortunate to note that with the problems the government has had regarding patronage and abuses of privilege, clause 17 is certainly not appropriate. Clause 17 has no criteria in place to guide decisions to raise or lower fees. It is completely lacking in any system of checks or procedure for making fee changes known to the public.

In addition, who will scrutinize the minister's decision when fees and charges are raised or lowered at his whim? Will it be the ethics commissioner, who has been notably absent in a number of allegations of impropriety? I rather doubt it.

The government is proposing a system that will be left wide open to the possibility of abuse. That is what concerns me most with this portion of the bill. Unless the government will impose a system of checks and balances to ensure accountability, it is best not to leave the entire Department of Public Works and Government Services and all its operations open to the possibility of abuse.

Let me remind the House and Canadians who are watching that this is the same government that allowed one of its backbenchers to take money from two different government departments for one piece of equipment. In this case there was no system of checks and balances to ensure that the money was used appropriately. This is just one example of the government's irresponsibility in the managing of taxpayers' money. And now we are looking at a proposal to give the Minister of Public Works and Government Services complete discretion over rates for his department. Give us a break.

This is the same government that promised to scrap the GST. Where is it now? Right back where it was.

There is a definite lack of accountability. This makes it very difficult to consider giving unlimited ministerial discretion. Time and again this government has made a mockery of open government. Last session closure was invoked on several bills in an effort to hide the bills from public scrutiny.

In conclusion, Canadians will not tolerate this abuse of privilege again and again. Canadians must be allowed to participate in debate and decisions. It is time for this government to take a step in the right direction, and that is to strike clause 17 from this bill altogether.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the general thrust of Bill C–52 is to allow the Minister of Public Works and Government Services the opportunity within existing laws and regulations to develop the most efficient system possible for delivering common services to the government.

An amendment has been put forward by the member for Kingston and the Islands to clause 17 of the bill, which will allow the minister, subject to Treasury Board regulations, to charge for services provided by his department.

This is a simple and direct approach to price and fee setting and determination.

[English]

This approach reduces to a minimum the administrative time and costs involved, both to the department and to its client departments.

Another amendment to clause 17 proposed by the hon. member for Québec–Est would have exactly the opposite effect. Adopting this motion would result in substantial additional costs, a heavier bureaucratic structure and considerable delay in the price setting process for the department's services.

[English]

This goes directly against the grain of what the government and most members want to see; namely, more efficiency and economy in government operations and less red tape.

There is already a framework within government that ensures that any authorities granted are being executed to safeguard the interests of Canadian taxpayers. It should also be noted that the services provided by the Department of Public Works and Government Services are offered to other departments on an optional basis and not to the general public.

[Translation]

This means that client departments and interested agencies may either accept the department's rates or look for other ways of satisfying their requirements.

[English]

This in itself is a very strong incentive to the minister and the department to ensure that the rates they charge are fair and competitive with others in the marketplace.

The wording proposed by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is better suited to the realities of Public Works and Government Services Canada. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Québec–Est would just create a heavier bureaucratic structure, result in higher costs and not protect the public interest any better.

[English]

The motion being put forward by the member for Kingston and the Islands more appropriately reflects the approach to be taken in this instance. I ask all members of the House to support it.

We must show the taxpayers that we can operate more effectively and serve them better with fewer people and less money.

[English]

This is essentially what Bill C–52 is all about. The new department has already demonstrated its value in cutting costs and eliminating duplication.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The question is on Motion No. 4. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

• (1630)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 76, the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Chicoutimi—the Constitution.

We now move on to consideration of group 4.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 8

That Bill C–52, in Clause 20, be amended:

(a) by replacing line 38, on page 6, with the following:

"20. (1) Subject to any regulations that; and"; and

"(2) Within the first five days of every month or, if the House of Commons is not then sitting, within the first three days next thereafter that the House is sitting, the Minister shall cause to be laid before the House copies of all contracts entered into under subsection (1) since copies of contracts entered into under subsection (1) were last laid before the House.

(3) The copies of contracts laid before the House of Commons pursuant to subsection (2) shall stand permanently referred to the committee established to consider matters relating to government operations."

That Bill C–52, in Clause 20, be amended:

(a) by replacing line 38, on page 6, with the following:

"20. (1) Subject to any regulations that; and"; and

"(2) Within the first five days of every month, the Minister shall cause to be sent to every member of the House of Commons a list of the contracts entered into under subsection (1) in the preceding month that relate to a corporation or a firm

(a) having a place of business in the member's constitutency; or

(b) providing products or services pursuant to the contract in the member's constituency."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment to clause 20 is once again an attempt by the official opposition to provide greater transparency in the activities of the Department of Public Works and Government Services.

We certainly understand that the Department of Public Works and Government Services has an important mandate, which is to award contracts. However, we also know that there is a lot of patronage related to that process, something that can be very costly. As you know, the federal government contracts out almost $10 billion worth of services every year. The committee which reviewed this bill was told at one point by Treasury Board that these contracts amounted to only $5 billion. Then we learned that it might closer to $7 billion. Now we know that, for all intents and purposes, these contracts amount to some $10 billion, and not all of them are necessarily justified.

Again, we were told by Treasury Board officials that, while the government is in favour of relying more on the contracting out process, as confirmed from year to year, particularly since the Liberals took office, and while that practice has indeed increased, Treasury Board has not set up any written assessment system to show effectively that this process was good for the government, in terms of money saved and increased efficiency.

Just recently, the committee heard some Treasury Board officials who showed us, through their studies, that the total value of non–competitive contracts was greater than that of competitive contracts. Just think. Contracts under $30,000 awarded by the government are not subject to a bidding process, nor is any assessment done by any independent agency or department.

In other words, all contracts worth less than $30,000 can be awarded to anyone, without any bidding. These are non–competitive contracts and, as I said, their total value is greater than that of all the contracts which are subject to the competitive bidding process.

I think this is outrageous, because we know perfectly well that the present government has monstrous debts. It seems to me that a responsible government would want to use every means at its disposal to ensure that these contracts with agencies that do business with the government are honest and efficient.

However, there seems to be no desire to take any initiative in this respect. The motion on clause 20 is quite straightforward. Its purpose is to ensure that all contracts entered into by the government with outside firms are published. It is certainly not too much to ask the government to publish contracts, if only to inform members of contracts entered into in their ridings. This is elementary.

It is not a matter of cost either, although the government keeps saying it would be extremely costly for the Department of Public Works and Government Services to table in the House copies of contracts entered into with outside firms. It is certainly not too costly, since the Quebec government already does this.

This mechanism already exists. Clearly, if contracts awarded by the government were published, this would be one more way to monitor the system, so there would be less patronage involved in awarding these contracts. Members of Parliament and others with access to this information would be able to draw attention to the many cases of abuse that would be easy to detect.

However, the government will not budge, it continues its policy of concealment and shows no desire to be transparent. As far as we are concerned, the kind of information we want is elementary. We want to know. This is nothing out of the ordinary. We would have this information if the government had the political will to inform the general public, but we are not even asking that. We just want members of Parliament to be informed, as is the case in Quebec. The government has rejected our request. In fact, in the past two years we have filed several requests with the Minister of Public Works and Government Services for access to this information, and we have been turned down many times.

In my opinion, this refusal on the part of government to make contracts entered into with outside firms public seems to be a desire to conceal information. It seems to me that it is not a desire for transparency, and the fact that waste and patronage may be at a very high level in this government perhaps explains why access to this information is being refused. Not only does this denote a denial of transparency and information, but it is also an obvious reflection of the desire, or lack of concern, on the part of the Government to try to really reduce waste and misspending when it comes to contracts with companies outside the government.

Where subcontracting is concerned, in connection with contracts of under $30,000 with no tendering process, I can personally tell you that I have met a number of people who are familiar with all the tricks used within the public service, all those readily implemented tricks that can be used to get impressive amounts out of the government, under the pretext that the contracts are non–tendered, non–competitive contracts. Shockingly high amounts have been wasted once again by these departments.

All that we in the official opposition want is to be responsible, to set up an initiative which will ensure greater transparency by enabling us to obtain the necessary information to denounce abuses and waste. This, I feel, is elementary. These are things to which one ought to be entitled.

It seems to me that the government itself, if it were really concerned about transparency and reducing waste, would have brought in modifications to ensure that those involved were better informed. It seems to me that the government is refusing things which are self–evident.

To my eyes, this is an extremely worrisome action. We can understand why the government is not reducing its deficit. We can understand that the debt is going to continue to increase. The economists are even predicting that the debt will exceed $800 billion by the year 2000. This situation is cause for alarm.

With this, the government would have the opportunity to implement measures to limit these abuses. It could even go so far as to pass an act, as my colleague from Portneuf has said, to protect public servants reporting waste within government, or to propose bills to protect private businesses which have dealings with the government, so that they too may report wastage, rigged contracts, abuses and so on. But the government does not do so.

In closing, I would like to express my wish that the government adopt this motion so as to guarantee greater transparency in contracts outside government, thus reducing waste in Department of Public Works and Government Services contracts.

[English]

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the Group No. 4 amendments to Bill C–52, particularly the motions put forward by the hon. member for Québec–Est.

I know what the hon. member is thinking in proposing these amendments. They would allow government contracts to be placed before committees and before members of Parliament. The committees would look at them and either approve or disapprove of them. Quite naturally, this is an unworkable and unrealistic concept. It simply does not work.

We must take into consideration when considering Motion No. 8 the fact that the government enters into literally thousands of contracts over the course of a year with thousands of individuals and hundreds and hundreds of companies. To suggest that these contracts could be effectively analyzed by the government operations committee is unrealistic. Considering the sheer number of contracts in no time the committee would be simply choked with paperwork. Ultimately this would achieve nothing.

While I do not support the amendment I share the opinions of the member for Québec–Est, particularly those on non–competitive contracts. I share his concern in all contracts laid out by the government. It is a well known fact that Liberal governments past and present and Tory governments past and hopefully not in the future have built their party fortunes on the practice of patronage.

We can look at the who's who of business in the country and find Liberal and Tory friends, big time. We have seen time after time where Canadian companies that are well known supporters of the Liberals or the Tories end up with a multitude of contracts.

One that comes to mind since I spoke about it a couple of weeks ago is in the area of Canada Post, a crown corporation, and SNC–Lavalin. I know it is a little removed from what we are talking about. However SNC–Lavalin is a huge consortium, a huge company, a well known friend of the Liberal Party. In the last three years hundreds of millions of dollars in contracts have been let out by Canada Post. They have been uncompetitive and given with no public tender to SNC–Lavalin.

It does not take a rocket scientist to go through the political contributions over the last 10 or 15 years. Almost on an annual basis SNC–Lavalin and friend companies come up right at the top of the list as contributors to the Liberal Party. We wonder why.

I share the concerns, but to put thousands of contracts before the government operations committee, before members of Parliament, is simply unworkable and unreasonable. Let us talk about whether, if they did go before committee, the matter of committee examination raises larger issues with respect to how committees operate anyway.

The Liberals promised that committees would play a greater role in Parliament and that members would have input into the legislative process by way of their roles on the committees. What a joke.

Let us start with some of the more notable initiatives of the government when it comes to committees. One of the vice–chairs of committees is automatically given by tradition to a member of an opposition party in the House. There are two recognized opposition parties in the House. One is a federalist party that believes in Canada, that loves the country. Its power base in the last election just happened to have been in the western provinces, from Manitoba west. It was a good result for our first time out. We will wait until the next election. We will let the people of Ontario, Quebec, the maritimes and the rest of Canada determine our future.

We are a federalist party. We put forward a member's name from our party to sit as a vice–chair. The separatist party, the Bloc Quebecois, put forward a member. It is a party determined to break up the country. The Liberals had two options. One was a separatist who wants to destroy Canada and the other was a federalist who wants to keep Canada together and make some changes so that it will stay together. Who did the Liberals vote for en masse? They voted for the separatist member. In every vice–chair position the separatist member was supported by the Liberal Party.

• (1650)

The chairman of the public accounts committee is always an opposition member. The Reform Party, a federalist party, put forward the name of the member for St. Albert and the Bloc Quebecois put forward the name of a member of its party for the chairmanship of the committee. One would think the government would want someone in that position who has the interests of the future of Canada at heart. I would think that. Most Canadians would think that, but not the Liberals.

The Liberal whips were there to make sure all their committee members did exactly what they were told. They promptly voted in a member of the Bloc Quebecois, a separatist party whose goal is to break up the country, to be chairman of the public accounts committee. What a joke.

We can talk about the effectiveness of committees. Given the fact that government members dominate the committees in number, and they are the government so let us give them that credit, the effectiveness of the committee is nullified. If there was patronage going on, and I am sure there is, it would quite likely continue because the committee members would simply rubber stamp everything their party whips and powers that be told them.

We should look at how effective opposition members have been in committees and the way Liberals have bulldozed bills through committees. We need only look to Bill C–45, Bill C–64, Bill C–89 and Bill C–91 to find that the Liberals had no intention of listening to what the Reform Party or the Bloc party had to say.

When Bill C–64, the employment equity bill, was before the committee the Liberals allowed four witnesses from the Reform list to appear before the committee and debate on each clause was limited to five minutes. We are talking about a major piece of legislation the Liberals wanted to push through the House. What did they do? They sent the whip down to the committee examining the bill to give Liberal members their instructions and the bill was rammed through.

Motion No. 8 has some merit in so far as the intent of the hon. member for Québec–Est. I agree with his intent but unfortunately it is simply not workable.

Motion No. 9 would cause a list of all government contracts in each constituency to be distributed to the appropriate MP every month. This would incur a tremendous amount of cost. The Reform Party is a fiscally conscious party. It wants to see government operations decreased rather than increased. Although we agree with the intent of the motions we have to oppose them and that we will.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House today to address Bill C–52, more particularly the proposed amendments to clause 20 put forward by the Bloc Quebecois member.

Before doing so, I would like to make a few comments. When my colleague from the Bloc referred to contracts, he forgot to mention that the number of contracts awarded in the past few years has remained essentially unchanged. True, their value has increased, but he is well aware that this is because of a number of major contracts that skewed the information. He knew this, but he did not say it.

What is interesting, is that one of the government committees, the Standing Committee on Government Operations, decided to take a look at the matter. When it called witnesses, do you know what was interesting? It was that people in the public service were already looking at this question. They were studying it because they were concerned as well. There you have it. It is quite interesting, but he neglected to mention it.

I also find it interesting that my colleague has made all sorts of unfounded accusations. He claims it is rotten, claims there is patronage everywhere and claims that we are handing out money here and there as if it grew on trees. Frankly, I find this exaggerated and unfortunate. And what about my colleague from the Reform Party?

• (1655)

[English]

He makes accusations too. He can make any kind of accusation. He does not have any proof. It does not really matter. The Reform Party has a lusting for power. It is lusting so terribly that it is saying some terribly silly things. It is so silly that Reformers are trailing the Tories in the polls. That is how silly it is and Canadians know it is silly. I invite them to continue to make comments. Every time they do it helps the Liberal Party. Would you stand and continue? You are doing a fine job to help us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order, please. It is not for me to slow anyone down, but I remind the member to make his intervention through the Chair.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. I was trying to speak through you to them. I shall make sure that I do so from here on in.

I will make a couple of comments as well with respect to contracts and sole sourcing. The preferred approach of the Department of Public Works and Government Services is always the competitive one. My colleagues know that. Why would they not have mentioned that?

They also know that there are good occasions and good reasons when we need to sole source. They know that. They also know that if we sole source, any supplier who feels qualified to meet the requirement can challenge the sole source award. They forgot to mention that. That is openness. That is transparency. Is it that they do not know or are they being mischievous?

It is interesting to note as well that advance contract award notices can be challenged. They are rarely challenged. What does that mean? That means that it is being done transparently. It is being done above board. I am really surprised that it would not have been mentioned.

I add as well that the House should also be reminded of other measures the Minister of Public Works and Government Services has taken to ensure integrity in the process. For example, all members of the House have been invited to subscribe to the open bidding system. I wonder if those who have been rather loquacious, vociferous and noisy today have done that.

The minister introduced the lobbyist certification clause. Do they know that? Do they know what it does? Probably not. An effective bid challenge process has been implemented in the department. Do they understand that? No, probably not. Contracting operations are subject to regular internal audits. That is another precaution. I cannot believe they would not share the positive as well as the questions they feel need to be addressed.

The Department of Public Works and Government Services holds supplier seminars across the country almost every day to make sure people are aware of what is happening. In this department small contracts are competed, contrary to the impression that was given, even contracts below the dollar threshold required by Treasury Board for competition. That was not said.

They did not talk about the transparency of the open bidding system. They have not said that for low dollar value procurements not advertised on the OBS the department uses an automated vendor rotation system which ensures equitable access to all suppliers of local commodity specific source lists of qualified suppliers, another precaution. They did not mention that 75 per cent of suppliers subscribing to the OBS have 50 or fewer employees, which points out that small businesses take advantage of it.

We have no evidence of a trend for contract splitting in the department. The department statistics indicate a reduction in both the number of contracts under $30,000 and the number of contract amendments.

I thought we needed to set the record straight because either my colleagues have not done their work or they have done their work and choose to ignore the facts. Either one is unacceptable.

I get back to the specifics. It is my view that the amendment aims to address two issues related to the department's procurement activities: access to information on contracts and ensuring integrity in the procurement process. No one would argue that these are not worthy goals. Right now the department has mechanisms in place which address the same issues.

I am sure the members in opposition are familiar with Public Works and Government Services' efficient and rapid contract opportunity information dissemination system.

• (1700)

I am talking, obviously, about the Open Bidding System, the OBS. It is an electronic display panel providing information not only on opportunities for contracts over $25,000 for goods and over $60,000 for services, but on contracts already awarded. It provides details on the bid selected along with the name of the contractor and the amount of the contract.

The OBS gives its users, be they small or medium size businesses or members of Parliament, instant access to valuable information on procurement opportunities past and present.

If the goal of the member is to ensure that the system is fair, let me assure the House that many steps have already been taken by the minister and the department toward that goal. For instance, the Minister of Public Works and Government Services has taken positive steps to tighten up the manner in which the government awards contracts for advertising and public opinion research. This is a sensitive area, one in which the actions of the previous government have come under serious criticism. The minister has also moved to curb the potential influence that lobbyists could bring to bear on the contracting process.

All contracts awarded by Public Works and Government Services now include a clause requiring all firms to state that payment, in full or in part, of services rendered by all lobbyists hired to obtain the contract depends neither directly nor indirectly on the client's being awarded the contract.

In other words, conditional payment of honoraria to lobbyists is prohibited. As the result of these amendments, Treasury Board now requires all departments to prohibit contractors from paying their lobbyists conditionally.

[English]

If it is accountability that the member is concerned about, the function of procurement or contracting out is almost certainly the most closely scrutinized responsibility of the minister and Department of Public Works and Government Services. The contracting process is subject to the department's own rules and procedures; to Treasury Board regulations and guidelines; to scrutiny by cabinet and the auditor general; and of course, by the media and the Canadian public.

An emphasis on fair and open competition goes to the very heart of the drive for economic growth and renewal in this country. Fair competition encourages firms to strive for greater efficiency and to look for innovative ways of producing and delivering their goods and services.

These qualities are vital to the development of a strong and creative economy for Canada. It is therefore particularly important for the federal government to practice what it preaches in its own business operations.

By stressing competition, fairness, and openness in contracting, the government can help build a culture of excellence in this country and ensure the Canadian taxpayers get full value for their money. Passage of Bill C–52 and the creation of the Department of Public Works and Government Services will be a positive step in meeting this goal.

I will close by saying that I deplore this tendency we have of making unfounded accusations. I also deplore the tendency of exaggerating problems we have in government and I deplore the tendency of members not doing their homework before rising in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The question is on Motion No. 8. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

• (1705)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 76, the recorded division on the motion is deferred.

[English]

The next question is on Motion No. 9. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 76, the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Motions Nos. 10 and 11 in Group No. 5 will not be moved by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River and are therefore withdrawn.

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the chief government whip, with the agreement of the whips of all the recognized parties, has asked that the recorded division on the question now before the House be deferred until Tuesday, November 28, after government orders, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, from indications given by my colleague, the House leader and his staff earlier, the House would normally proceed to the debate on Bill C–93. However, since report stage motions were filed on Friday, the 48–hour notice rule is not satisfied. We will then have to proceed with the next bill on the Order Paper which is Bill C–94.

MANGANESE BASED FUEL ADDITIVES ACT

The House resumed from November 21 consideration of the motion that Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): On this bill we are now at the five hour stage of debate which has entitlements for members to speak for 20 minutes subject to 10 minutes of questions or comments. Slightly over two hours are left at this stage of the debate.

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the issue in Bill C–94 concerning the removal of MMT from gasoline in Canada.

We have been told that this was a debate between, on the one hand, the automobile industry and, on the other hand, the industry that is making MMT, that is, the Esso company.

For us, on this side of the House, it is not in any way one or the other; it is purely a debate on an environmental issue, on a sustainable development issue resulting from automobile emissions that are the greatest sources of noxious gases that change the climate and against which we are fighting vigorously under the convention on climate change.

For us, the intent and the objective are to reduce as much as possible noxious automobile emissions so that we can reduce greenhouse gases.

[English]

The whole debate revolves around what are known as catalytic converters in automobiles. Twenty–five years ago, before catalysts were installed in automobiles, automobile emissions were far more severe than they are today. With the advent of very adverse conditions especially in the heavy automobile states such as California, New York and Pennsylvania, catalytic converters were born. To appreciate the essence of the debate on MMT, we have to appreciate what is the true function of a catalyst in an automobile.

A catalyst in an automobile has two main functions. One is to filter and to deter the emissions of hydrocarbons and deleterious gases. The other is to store oxygen within the converter. In modern automobiles we are now installing onboard detection systems with very sensitive equipment such as computerized sensors which permit the catalytic converters to function at their maximum efficiency.

What happens with the use of the heavy metal MMT in gasoline? It compounds the problems of catalysts in that it produces manganese oxide deposits inside the various elements of the converters. The effect of MMT over time on a catalyst today is to impair its function of providing the maximum input in reducing hydrocarbon emissions and other noxious gases. This happens gradually and increasingly as the catalyst ages.

More oxygen is accumulated inside the converter with the effect that the sensor is completely fooled by MMT in its application. Today's sensors in the onboard detection systems are prevented from working properly. The automobile manufacturers have rightly said that where there is MMT it is impossible for the new type of onboard detection systems to function properly.

Further, a big cold battle has been raging in the United States as to whether MMT should or should not be included. It will follow that even if MMT is permitted in the United States, in several states representing at least one–third of the gasoline purchases in the United States, all the heavy automobile states such as California, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, New York and so forth, it will still be impossible to use MMT because the clean air act provides that these states must use reformulated gasoline.

This means MMT or additives containing heavy metals will not be able to be used, except under very special circumstances. It means that even if MMT were allowed in the United States tomorrow, in the several states which provide for the use of reformulated gasoline, for example, California, Connecticut, Illinois, Maryland, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Texas and Wisconsin, it will be impossible to use MMT because heavy metals cannot be used in reformulated gasoline.

The reason is very simple. When heavy metals are introduced into gasoline it is impossible to gradually change to other formulas which enable other octanes such as ethanol to be used. The quicker we ban MMT in Canada, the faster we can move into the use of alternative fuels such as ethanol and others as additives to produce a more environmentally friendly gasoline. It has been said that this debate is the auto industry against MMT, that this side has relied on the automobile industry for its input. I have gone to the trouble of speaking to scientists very far removed from the automobile industry, who have told me that unless we remove MMT from our gasoline it will not be possible for us to move toward reformulated gasoline using additives, such as environmentally friendly ethanol produced from wood and other substances; ethanol which will produce far fewer emissions, which go toward the warming of our climate.

For me this whole question is an environmental issue. It is very much an environmental issue. If tomorrow I have a choice to use a heavy metal, such as manganese as an additive in gasoline, and on the other side to gradually move toward environmentally friendly additives, such as ethanol and others, then for me there is no choice. Unless we take the first step, the second will never happen.

I know it has been said that the Ministry of Health has not banned MMT, has not found it noxious to health. Yet there are very severe warnings. In the last debate in this House at second reading, I quoted some very severe warnings by leading health specialists and scientists. I will not return to all the quotes I have already read, except to put the accent on one of them.

During the hearings before the United States House of Representatives committee on health and environment regarding the EPA, there was one quote that "like lead, manganese is not new or toxic. It is an element and thus does not degrade or lose its potency with the passage of time. As a result, the manganese released into the environment through the use of MMT in a given year accumulates over time with all the MMT released in the next year and all the subsequent years".

I have recently received a health report written by three scientists. It is a report headed "Developmental Toxicity of Mangafodipir Trisodium and Manganese Chloride in Sprague–Dawley Rats". It is by three scientists, Kimberley Treinen of the Sanofi Research Division of Collegeville, Pennsylvania; Mr. Tim Gray of the Alnwick Research Centre in Alnwick, Northumberland in England and William Blazak of Nycomed, Collegeville, Pennsylvania.

They studied MnDPDP, which is a manganese chelate being developed as a contrast agent for magnet resonance. They say:

> A third study, in which 15 rats/group were dosed intravenously with 0, 5, 20 or 40 XXX mol/kg MnCl2XXX on days 6–17 of gestation, produced identical skeletal malformations to those seen with MnDPDP, indicating that manganese is the active moiety responsible for these specific malformations.

Their summary says:

> In summary, the data presented here indicate that a specific syndrome of skeletal malformations in rats was induced by MnDPDP, which occurred in the absence of maternal toxicity at four times the intended clinical dose. The same specific malformations were also seen with intravenous administration of equivalent or lower doses of manganese. Since manganese has been shown to cross the placenta (Jarvinen and Ahlstrom, '75; Koshida et al, '63; Rojas et al., '67), it appears that manganese is the active tertogenic moiety in MnDPDP.

• (1720)

It appears that manganese is the active teratogenic moiety in MnDPDP.

Our health ministry has not accepted and proven conclusively that manganese is a toxic agent that should be banned. At the same time, the whole question is, if we have two alternatives, it is always a question of choice. We have two alternatives, MMT on one side, a heavy metal that is known to affect, to gum up catalytic converters. It is not used in California, which is trying to clean up its air. It is not used in New York state. It is not used in Pennsylvania or Wisconsin.

If by any chance we move to cleaner additives, to ethanol and others, then the choice is very simple for us. Let us ban MMT so that eventually we are going to produce and use much cleaner fuels.

The world is moving very fast. I am told by various scientists from the automobile side and others that the day is coming very fast when automobile catalysts will be so precise that they will be able to monitor any noxious fumes. There will be far more effective filtering agents that will be used much more effectively with reformulated gasoline, such as is the case in the states that have led the fight on this, California and others.

If MMT continues to be used, then the potential for an improved catalytic converter will not happen. The choice for us is to say let us move on, let us go along, pass Bill C–94 very fast so that Canada joins not only the United States, not only California, not only Pennsylvania but Sweden, Norway, the Netherlands, France, England and all the states of the world that do not use MMT. Why should we be the exception?

For me, this is the vote for the environment. We will vote with much conviction for Bill C–94.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member present his case. I want to make a point and ask a question.

The member speaks as if there is absolute, conclusive opinion regarding the detrimental effects of MMT. I listened to the member speak. I believe that he believes that.

The fact is that there are conflicting reports on the effects of MMT. I would like to ask the member if he has read the reports that say that MMT is not the bad additive that the report says. Has the member read both reports? Could he comment on what is his opinion of the report that supports the continued use of MMT and the effectiveness of it as a product that helps the gasoline to burn more clean and effectively? Has he read both reports?

Mr. Lincoln: Mr. Speaker, yes, I have read on both sides of the question. Yes, I know it is not a question that is totally black and white. Yes, I know that the makers of MMT can genuinely say that in some sectors it has advantages.

However, in all the decisions we make here nothing is exactly black or white. We have a choice. Of the two choices, one is the choice of a heavy metal with very serious potential health questions attached to it which many scientists have been flagging, as they did about lead. The same debate took place on lead. Should it be taken out of gasoline? Should it be left in because it is a very good octane enhancer? Today we would never go back. If we looked at the debates which took place I am sure there were two sides to the issue.

Eventually a choice has to be made. With me the choice is clear. On one side is a heavy metal which has potential health problems. It has been clearly demonstrated to gum up catalytic converters, which are the salvation of tomorrow with respect to the car of the future. I would like to find a way to move much faster in Canada toward other additives. It may be a bit more expensive in the beginning, but eventually we should look to other additives, just as the rest of the world is doing.

If MMT is so beneficial, why do not Scandinavia, a leader in the environmental field, the Netherlands, Germany or Japan use it?

For me the choice is very clear. In the balance of choices I have chosen to go with Bill C–94. It is the fastest way for us to use environmentally friendly fuels in Canada.

Mr. Harris: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the answer of the hon. member.

I want to key in on a phrase which he used and that was the phrase "potential health hazards". Either we have a health hazard with the use of MMT or we do not. Surely, with the science which is available to us to study the effects of a fuel product using MMT, we can determine beyond a shadow of a doubt whether there is or is not a health hazard.

The hon. member said that he has read studies which indicate that MMT is fine and that no conclusion has ever been reached that there are health risks involved with it. On the other hand, the reports and studies which came from the auto industry said that there is a health hazard with MMT and that we must stop this devastating product immediately.

I am surprised that the government is ready to jump to a decision to ban MMT without having a conclusive scientific finding. When there are two reports on the product which are at absolute opposites, I wonder what is behind the government's enthusiasm to jump in and ban MMT. It is all right to say that the sky is going to fall, but that might only be opinion. The sky may never fall.

I believe that the Liberals are playing Chicken Little with this bill. The sky is falling and MMT is going to pollute the earth. In fact, the sky has never fallen and there is no scientific evidence that MMT is a health hazard.

Mr. Lincoln: Madam Speaker, first of all, the auto industry has never made its case on the health issues. The automobile industry made its case on catalysts and sensors and the onboard detection systems in vehicles. That was its case.

With respect to the case on health, I produced several quotations during second reading and I have them here. I did not obtain them from the automobile industry.

• (1730)

The fact is that several very learned and respected scientists have said beware, there is a potential problem with manganese. To say that it does not exist is to negate some very important opinions that have been expressed.

Following the earth summit in Rio, which my friends on the environment committee will know, sanction is now one of the basic principles of any environmental law as a precautionary principle. Do not wait until everything has been proven conclusively before we act.

When Rachel Carson wrote a book about DDT she was thought to be crazy. And look at what DDT has done while we waited for conclusive proof.

At one time we were using PCBs and we thought they were good for the environment and for equipment in transformers. We found out too late how deleterious it is to the environment. We used lead as well, and thought it was great until too late we found out what happened.

As I said to the member, if there is a choice to be made, do we choose a heavy metal that can produce problems or do we use a clean additive? The choice is very clear to me. On the basis of the precautionary principle and on the basis of all I have read, I am voting very convincingly for Bill C–94.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Madam Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois has decided to propose an amendment to Bill C–94 at third reading, because we know that the American agency EPA will table a report on the issue shortly. As my colleague of the Reform Party said earlier, we believe that it is important for us to also look at studies that will be published at the international level, because our friends opposite enjoy saying in committee that the environment knows no boundaries. This is why I move the following amendment:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following:

"Bill C–94, An Act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese–based substances, be not now read a third time but that it be read a third time this day six months hence."

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): We are verifying the validity of the amendment.

The hon. member has taken debate time. We now have a 10–minute period of questions and comments.

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–94, which is now before the House.

In the bill the government is taking a decisive step toward protecting the environment, jobs, consumers, and keeping our country at the leading edge of automobile technology. All are very important goals.

Bill C–94 will prohibit the import and interprovincial trade of MMT, a manganese based fuel additive manufactured in the U.S. The proposed bill, to be known as the manganese based fuel additives act, will come into effect 60 days after it gains assent.

Canada is one of the few countries in the world that use MMT. It is very rare in the world these days. The U.S., for example, banned it from use in unleaded gasoline in 1978. It is remarkable that it did it so long ago and we still have it in Canada.

Some members opposite have cited a recent U.S. court decision in favour of MMT as a reason to stop this legislation. But MMT will still be banned in California and in those states that require federal reformulated gasoline to be used. What is more, we have yet to see whether the U.S. government will repeal this decision.

We are taking this action because we need to protect the latest onboard diagnostic systems that Canada's car makers are installing in their new vehicles. These systems are extremely important for the environment. They are responsible for monitoring the vehicle emission controls and for alerting the driver of malfunctions. Without that kind of technology one cannot be aware of how well the car is working or if it is not functioning at all in terms of its emission control processes. They ensure that the cleaner burning engines of today and tomorrow operate as designed. They ensure that automobiles are properly maintained, resulting in decreased tailpipe emissions and improved fuel economy. In other words, this is one more important tool to help us address air pollution, including smog and climate change.

This government will not allow MMT to get in the way of the automobile industry's effort to make cars cleaner and more efficient and less polluting. Canada's environment and Canadian consumers have the right to the best anti–pollution technology possible. Yet Ethyl Corporation, the manufacturer of MMT through its subsidiary Ethyl Canada, denies the vehicle industry allegation about the ill effects of MMT on the vehicle emissions control systems. In fact it makes a counter claim that MMT is environmentally beneficial.

All this is somewhat fuzzy. What is certain is that efforts to reduce motor vehicle pollution can no longer be addressed by just the petroleum industry, the auto industry, or the federal government. Progress at reducing vehicle pollution requires simultaneous action by all. The petroleum industry needs to keep making improvements in the composition and properties of the fuels engines burn. The auto industry needs to keep making improvements in the vehicle emissions control systems and technologies, such as those offered through onboard diagnostic systems. The government needs to take decisive action in Bill C–94, which removes a major obstacle to the introduction of these technologies. That obstacle is MMT.

Our strategy to reduce vehicle pollution goes beyond just taking action on MMT. The government is doing its part because we know that automobiles are a major contributor to climate change and urban smog as well as some toxic pollutants like benzene. In fact in a recently released task force report done by Canada's deputy ministers of environment it is noted that even with the improvements in emissions technology, vehicles are still the largest contributors to air pollution.

I must say that troubles me. I as a member of Parliament, and I am sure many of my colleagues, have to travel a great deal throughout my riding and often I am the only person in the vehicle. There are times when I feel uncomfortable about that. I know that it is important that I get around my riding, get around to different events, be seen and hear people's concerns. Yet I also know that I am driving a vehicle a lot more than I would like to be driving it. Unfortunately, my riding is too big to go by bicycle. It would take me forever, but it would certainly be great for my health. This issue does trouble me. We should be concerned about the impact of automobile emissions as they impact on the environment and air pollution.

On a national basis, gasoline and diesel powered vehicles still contribute some 60 per cent of carbon monoxide emissions, 35 per cent of nitrous oxide emissions or smog, 25 per cent of our hydrocarbon emissions, and 20 per cent of carbon dioxide emissions. These vehicles, gasoline and diesel powered, are very big contributors to our smog and pollution problems.

This report I just referred to stresses the need to proceed on all fronts at the same time in all of these areas. It states the following: "Vehicle technology and fuel composition, although two separate industry sectors, must be treated as an integrated system in the development of policies and programs in order to successfully reduce emissions from motor vehicles". This is good advice. It should complement our work in preparing our comprehensive motor vehicle exhaust emission standards.

To meet these standards, we are counting on integrating improvements achieved in emission control technologies and fuels. However, clearly we cannot hope to meet these standards without the kind of action we are taking against MMT in Bill C–94. And it is not simply an act of impatience. Since 1985 the federal government has waited for the automotive and petroleum industries to resolve this situation without legislation. It was not resolved. The time for waiting is over. It is now time for the government to act.

Last October the Minister of the Environment urged both the petroleum and automotive industries to voluntarily resolve the issue of MMT in Canada by the end of 1994; otherwise, the government would take action. This deadline was subsequently extended in February of this year to review automobile and petroleum industry proposals. The MMT issue is no longer an industry dispute. Its outcome can affect the vehicle emissions programs we are putting into place. In the long term it could also negatively impact on the automotive sector. Successful resolution of the MMT issue will ensure that environmental benefits are realized through the use of the most advanced emission control technologies. We have to move in this direction.

Members opposite have claimed that this legislation will have an enormous financial impact on the petroleum sector. However, let us be prudent and realistic. The economic impact of removing MMT will be small, not enormous. Estimates for the industry, an industry that involves many billions of dollars, range from $50 million to $83 million per year, which means an additional cost to consumers of 0.1 cents to 0.24 cents per litre at the pump. This is less than one–quarter of a cent per litre at the pump.

Some have said that taking MMT out of our fuel will increase benzene. That is not so. It is nonsense. Gasoline can be refined without MMT and without increasing levels of benzene. Any effort to increase benzene levels or benzene precursors will not be tolerated under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. In fact this past summer the Minister of the Environment announced that benzene levels would be regulated at a maximum of one per cent per volume. So there is nothing to fear. Let us move ahead. Let us do it, because we need new emission control technologies like the onboard diagnostic systems. We need them to help achieve reductions in smog, carbon monoxide, and hydrocarbons. We need to reduce these kinds of emissions because they have an influence on climate change and urban air quality.

This is good legislation. It is good for consumers and good for the environment. All 18 automobile companies in Canada agree, even if the Reform Party does not, that we are moving in the right direction.

I urge all members to give their support and swift passage to this bill.

• (1745)

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Madam Speaker, as we said in the motion, we are not asking for the bill to be withdrawn altogether but to be postponed for six months. The environment is of course a very important matter, and we support any measures that have a positive impact on the environment and that are environmentally viable.

However, as far as Bill C–94 on the abolition of MMT is concerned, we are not convinced it is a good bill. If we consider what has been done with respect to manganese, including tests by the automotive industry, the tests now being done by independent laboratories were ordered strictly by Ethyl Corporation which, on the basis of its tests, has demonstrated that MMT does not in any way affect the components of the antipollution system in automobiles.

I also wonder what the automotive industry is doing in this respect. If studies have already found that MMT causes pollution in the components of the antipollution system, why have these tests not been published? Did they actually do any tests? Do they intend to or did they never do any at all?

When I look at the government's position in this respect, is it possible that the government was pressured by the automotive industry lobby to the extent that it felt obliged to table this bill? It is quite possible. I do not want to accuse anybody, but we all know that there are two major lobbies here in Canada. The oil company lobby and the automotive lobby. As it happens, all the automotive industries are in Ontario, not far from the environment minister's riding. Maybe that should give rise to some questions.

However, the U.S. automotive industry is only beginning to test this product. The purpose of our amendment is for us to wait until they get the results of those tests before we make a final and definitive decision, because legislation is definitive. We must have some kind of proof and nobody has proven anything yet, not even Health Canada. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment said earlier—he read it, by the way, because it is in Hansard—that as far as health is concerned, tests have shown that there is no threat whatsoever to health.

I believe that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment made a mistake a while ago when he mentioned that manganese was a toxin. I am sorry, but if it were considered a toxic product, we would not be here considering a special piece of legislation such as Bill C–94 to ban it, because it would be covered under CEPA, the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. This means that any product considered toxic is automatically included under CEPA. This is not the case here. Manganese is not a toxic product since we have to enact a specific legislation to ban it. There has been a slight error which I wanted to point out and correct.

We have heard about a recent ruling in the United States, which I believe to be very important. The Ethyl corporation has been working for years to keep on manufacturing and marketing its product. Very recently, a few weeks ago, a ruling ordered the EPA, the Environmental Protection Agency, the American equivalent of our Department of the Environment, to lift the ban on MMT.

In the United States, even the Environmental Protection Agency tells us when we call that it does not know if it is going to appeal, that it does not think so. We are told that this product could be reintroduced in the United States as early as the beginning of December. So what is the rationale behind Bill C–94?

We are also told that 50 per cent of American refineries are ready to use this product and cannot wait to do so. So if 50 per cent of these industries are ready to use MMT, again what is the rationale behind Bill C–94?

In the environment committee, we are always talking about harmonization, about trying to make the environment an international concern. I totally agree with that. Yes, I have said many times that we have to avoid duplication and conflict and yet, with Bill C–94, we are creating a conflict with our neighbours, the Americans, who are a bit more powerful than we are.

So we are going to eliminate MMT from the market and ask all our refineries to transform their system, at a cost of several million dollars, because they will not be able to use MMT any more, and we may well have to reintroduce it in six months. It makes absolutely no sense at all.

What we are asking is not that the bill be withdrawn, but that we wait and see what happens in the United States. We are also asking to see the tests being done right now by the U.S. automotive industry, and I have the feeling that these tests will be performed a little bit faster than the ones scheduled to be done in Canada, because we will not be able to watch them. Once we have these results, we will have a complete, concrete and logical overview of the issue, and in six months' time, we can revisit the bill and make a decision based on logical arguments.

We are going through tough a period, in our economy, where we cannot afford to make mistakes. We are out of money. We are going through some hard times. Are we going to ask refineries to completely modify their process simply to achieve what we set to do as far as MMT is concerned? I know that MMT is an additive. But we are also talking about other additives now available on the market, such as ethanol. As you know, we have yet to see complete and concrete evidence that ethanol is neither toxic nor hazardous. We may realize one day that ethanol is not that good for the environment.

I am not against the introduction of products like ethanol, but why should we replace manganese, MMT, which has been thoroughly analyzed for 15 years and has not been proven to be dangerous? On the contrary, it even helps to reduce the greenhouse effect by 20 per cent.

I am not saying that we should keep this product forever or that the bill is not good. What I am saying is that the product is now being reintroduced on the American market and that we should wait six months to see what the EPA will do or what studies the U.S. automotive industry will produce on this product before we make a logical and reasonable decision on this issue.

[English]

Mr. Paul Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Madam Speaker, if the minister is lucky, her Bill C–94 banning gas additives will stall before it backfires.

An innocuous–sounding piece of federal legislation supposedly aimed at reducing auto emissions has left critics wondering whether the Liberal government hasn't inhaled one noxious substance too many.

The bill we are debating, the manganese based fuel additive bill, would ban a gasoline additive called MMT.

Environment Minister Sheila Copps has made the rather dramatic claims that the move will make auto emissions 600 percent cleaner, while saving car buyers an average of $3,000 on the next family clunker. Unfortunately for all, there is considerable evidence that the issue is made up of equal parts of clean air and the hot variety.

A growing number of critics of the legislation—including provincial environment ministers in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—fear a ban on MMT may actually cause a dramatic increase in choking tailpipe filth, while causing higher gas prices.

MMT has been added to Canadian gasoline since 1977, primarily to increase octane levels.

• (1755)

It was mentioned that it was banned in the United States. That is not particularly the case. It was never really approved because of some early concerns and then it got involved in extensive court battles. Specifically, it was never banned because it was seen as a dangerous substance; it just never received approval.

The alternative is enhanced oil–refining, at greater cost to the petroleum companies and, inevitably, consumers.

Of course that would involve other additives, which may also prove eventually much more harmful than MMT was ever contemplated to be. There is also evidence that MMT may significantly cut smog–producing nitrogen oxide emissions, or what we commonly call NOx.

But the automobile companies claim MMT gums up their emission–control warning systems, possibly causing the malfunction indicator lights on the dashboard to malfunction. If drivers don't know they have a problem with emission control, the industry argues, they will unwittingly be poisoning the air even more than usual.

The alternative of fixing the cars instead of the fuel, according to the federal environment minister, would increase the average car price by $3,000.

One official spokesman for the minister said that "On this particular issue, the evidence she has seen—has provided her with enough to get this bill through cabinet and the House". The cabinet dealt with this in a far too cursory manner.

That so–called "evidence" is contained in four separate reports—three written by various automobile lobby organizations, the fourth at the request of General Motors. No surprise; all concluded MMT was pretty terrible stuff.

As it happens, there are a few other studies floating around. Health Canada, for instance, concluded MMT poses no particular health risk.

I recall looking at my vitamin bottle, and manganese is on the vitamin pill list. It is a matter of trace amounts or whatever. The studies that were quoted by the parliamentary secretary talk about giving rats an unusual amount of the concentrated substance. I would think that any vitamin given in a disproportionate amount is going to cause some deleterious effects to a living organism.

Another mega–study was conducted over a five–year period for the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, which, until recently, had placed a total ban on MMT additives in gasoline. It was not permitted. The results of the study, in part, last month led the U.S. Court of Appeals to order the environmental agency to approve the use of MMT in unleaded gas.

We are waiting for December 5, which is the cut–off date for any filing of appeals. Certainly the motion before the House today would accommodate that wait and see approach to see how the world is generally going to move on this item.

The U.S. court ruling also blew the engine on the minister's argument that, as a trade issue, it was vital to harmonize Canadian and U.S. standards on MMT.

One effect of the U.S. court ruling is that it compelled the American automakers and petroleum industry to launch a new joint study into MMT and the whacky warning lights.

Given the amount of conflicting evidence presented by both sides, the five provincial environment ministers have suggested Copps put the brakes on her pet legislation, at least until the U.S. joint study has been completed.

Even within the Liberal cabinet, we are told, some ministers seem concerned that Copps' determination to ram the MMT legislation through has more to do with her personal political agenda (e.g., saving face) than practical environmental considerations.

Copps's rhetoric on this issue has been so forceful, retreating from the legislation now would produce more political egg than she has face to wear.

Fortunately for her, there is a graceful way out. The Commons is expected to prorogue some time next month, meaning this session of Parliament will be officially declared dead, along with all unpassed bills. In the meantime, the bill still has to go to the Senate, which, if Copps is really lucky, will tie up the bill till prorogation do it part.

• (1800)

This anti free trade bill should die. I think MMT is about to be used around the world. Many countries are not using it now because it is not being used in the United States. They are watching what will happen in the United States. If the American industry begins to use it, many countries are ready to follow suit.

The EPA will be completely out of the picture on December 5. The government should be embarrassed about this bill. It knows it and we know it. Let common sense prevail.

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I want to rectify a few things that have been said by previous speakers.

I think reading from a newspaper article to show that the minister is only pushing Bill C–94 forward as a project to save face is nonsense. The minister believes, as I and the Liberal government do, after much thinking and cogitation and the several weeks of discussion the bill has undergone, that for us it is the best choice.

There are two choices. MMT could be left in, riding on the back of the Ethyl Corporation which both the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party quote very extensively. The Ethyl Corporation has done a great lobbying job with the members. I am happy for the Ethyl Corporation that some members are convinced. At the same time, there is an issue of choice, an issue of whether we keep a heavy metal, which is what MMT is, in our future gasolines and cars, or whether we try to move toward more environmentally sound fuels.

I heard the Bloc Quebecois member question whether ethanol will one day be found to be just as bad for the environment as lead or something else is today. I would suggest that she read the testimony made before many committees of the House on ethanol and that she consult with people involved in the ethanol industry. Perhaps she should consult with those who crafted the clean air act in the United States. It was amended so that in the future more and more ethanol would be used because of its cleaner properties. The scientists are very clear that ethanol is a cleaner fuel because it is derived from natural, biological properties. Obviously, it is not a heavy metal.

When I referred to manganese as a toxin I was quoting from studies of scientists who referred to it. A statement was made by the United States House of Representatives Committee on Health and Environment at the EPA hearing on June 22, 1990. Reference was made that like lead, manganese is not only neurotoxic, it is an element, et cetera. We are talking about neurotoxic in the generic sense, not in the sense of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. We are talking in a generic sense.

I will quote other scientists from the University of Pittsburgh, Western Psychiatric Institute and Clinic at the same hearings: "The page 15 appendix to their waiver application"—talking about Ethyl Corporation—"that deals with health nowhere mentions the neurotoxic properties of manganese".

The Department of Health and Human Services in the United States stated: "MMT can be absorbed through the skin and probably readily by the nose and lungs". Obviously they are talking in a generic sense about a heavy metal.

Perhaps the Bloc Quebecois critic should check with the deputy minister of the Department of the Environment.

In a letter dated July 7, 1995, the minister said that they were thinking of supporting the Canadian position on MMT in order to maintain the uniformity of car fleets and to take advantage of the environmental gains that will be made possible by the new motor vehicle emission control technologies.

The Quebec Deputy Minister of the Environment wrote to his federal counterpart that they were thinking of supporting the Canadian position on MMT in order to maintain the uniformity of car fleets and to take advantage of the environmental gains that will be made possible by the new motor vehicle emission control technologies.

This, of course, was denied in a November 2, 1995 letter from the Quebec Minister of Natural Resources, who disagrees. In any case, it is interesting to note that they agreed from an environmental point of view. It is clear that this issue has two components. We could argue, like the Reform critic, that once MMT is accepted in the U.S., the rest of the world will follow.

[English]

There is no evidence of that. There is no evidence that the Netherlands, Germany, Sweden, Norway, Finland, Denmark or Japan, environmentally conscious countries, would join in because a court case was won by the Ethyl Corporation in the United States.

Certainly the EPA opposed the court case all the way along. The Environmental Protection Agency of the United States also pointed out that several states of the United States would not be able to use MMT because they were using reformulated gasoline so that they could clean up their own air emissions faster.

It is a stalling tactic to try to kill the bill, to produce another amendment that is exactly the same as the amendment we defeated very fairly the other day. There was a similar amendment on second reading to defer it for six months and we defeated it. That is the democratic process. I am sure the same result will greet this amendment.

Mr. Forseth: Madam Speaker, certainly stalling has been basically our position all along because of the appeal situation in the United States. Our position, which was purported to support the MMT bill, has been well pointed out in the House and at committee.

When I began to cross–examine some of the evidence at committee, for instance the sparkplug evidence, it turned out to be fake. I demolished the testimony of the person who had the nerve to come to the table and put forward evidence that turned out to be completely erroneous.

That is why the government has been very reluctant to agree to independent third party testing. It has rejected that down the line. However I understand some groups are getting together in the United States to have independent third party testing to be able to remove the pressure of lobby groups.

Certainly our party has not been siding with any particular lobby group. Right from the beginning we have been asking for independent third party tests. My colleague asks who stands up for science. We wonder about the government and what lobby groups it is supporting.

The delay is to see what will happen in the United States and certainly this is an ill advised bill that should die.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

• (1810)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, a division on the question now before the House stands deferred until November 28 at the end of government business, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, in view of the time of the day which leaves very little time to commence a new order I suggest that we call it 6.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Madam Speaker, on November 7, the Prime Minister announced that a ministerial committee had been set up to review the whole question of constitutional and administrative changes to the Canadian federation. It is strange though to set up such a committee, whose mandate and schedule remains unknown, even as we speak.

It is strange also that this committee is made up only of federal ministers, when everyone knows full well that the real decision makers in that regard are the provincial premiers. I for one believe that this committee was struck just for the Prime Minister's satisfaction, to give him something to say, or else to distract momentarily from the poor performance during the referendum.

How can this committee have any credibility when some of its members have gone out of their way to trample on Quebec. What can be said about the Minister of Justice, who was looking for legal means to prevent Quebecers from voting again on their future? And what about the fisheries minister who invited thousands of Canadians to act in violation of the Referendum Act? What about the Minister of Canadian Heritage who will not recognize that Quebecers are a nation? What about the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration who, when he was a member of the opposition in this House, voted against a government proposal which recognized, among other things, the distinct society in the Meech Lake Accord?

And what about the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs who, when answering the question I put to him on November 8 about the mandate of the committee, simply said, and I quote: "Our committee will also look at non constitutional measures, so as to not overlook any means to make our federation more effective"?

Yet, by giving such an answer, the minister admits his helplessness. The measures which will be considered are non constitutional measures. How can such measures come up to the expectations of the Quebecers? Again, it is a committee established to do away with the legitimate expectations of the Quebecers.

[English]

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Madam Speaker, on November 8 the member for Chicoutimi asked the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs about the mandate of the cabinet committee on unity.

The minister replied that the committee was going to look at all the possibilities for constitutional and administrative changes in the federation.

The member further asked if the minister could inform the House whether the committee would look at options, such as a resolution to recognize Quebec's distinct character, as well as a bill on regional referendums.

The minister responded that the commitments made by the Prime Minister during the campaign concerning a distinct society and constitutional veto for Quebec will be fulfilled.

[Translation]

The initiatives announced today by the Prime Minister represent a ground breaking and effective way of achieving a major constitutional objective without reopening the Constitution, since Lucien Bouchard and the PQ government have stated clearly and repeatedly that they were not interested in constitutional change.

Our legislation on the right of veto ensures that we will not make any constitutional change Quebec does not want. We must not let the intransigence of Lucien Bouchard and of the Quebec government impede the adoption of non–constitutional changes, changes the people of Quebec and of other Canadian regions are looking forward to.

[English]

The results of the October 30 referendum have shown the clear desire of Quebecers to remain within Canada, a country that they have helped to build into the tolerant, compassionate society we know today.

At the same time, the referendum has signalled that Quebecers and many other Canadians are looking for changes within the federation that will make the government more responsive to the needs of Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

CANADA REMEMBERS

Hon. Lawrence MacAulay (Secretary of State (Veterans), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on November 6, 1993 I had the privilege of announcing the Canada Remembers program. There have been literally hundreds of events commemorating events that led to the end of the second world war.

I had the privilege of leading a number of pilgrimages through Italy, France, Belgium and Holland. Indeed they were very touching events.

I remember standing outside Belgium with a number of Canadian veterans and marching into the city. In the city the people were singing "O Canada" and their greatest desire was to touch a Canadian veteran.

In Vlissingen, the Netherlands over 100,000 people came to say thank you to the allied veterans.

• (1005)

The most touching event for Canadian veterans was in Apledoorn where between 300,000 and 500,000 people came to say thank you to the Canadian veterans.

Now I have the privilege of leading a delegation to the far east, to Burma, Singapore, Hong Kong and Japan. In 1941 about 2,000 Canadians of the Winnipeg Grenadiers and the Royal Rifles left Vancouver for Hong Kong. More than one–quarter of these veterans died either on the battlefield or in prison camps.

About 10,000 Canadians served in the far east during the second world war, and over 1,000 paid the supreme sacrifice. We will be visiting a number of those graves in commemoration of these people. We will also be visiting memorials in Rangoon, Singapore and Yokohama. These memorials bear the name of the Canadian veteran who has no known grave.

In 1995 when we are looking ahead it is so important to look back to 1945 and really understand what price was paid for freedom and democracy. This pilgrimage is the last event for the Canada Remembers program. There have been so many events throughout this country from the largest provincial organization to the smallest community organization, all of which did nothing but add to the knowledge and the great respect we have for our Canadian veterans. These people can be justly proud and I thank them very much.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak this morning on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois concerning the pilgrimage to the far east, which will be undertaken later this week by the secretary of state, along with several parliamentarians and a group of veterans. The purpose of the trip will be to provide the veterans with the opportunity to honour the memory of their fallen comrades in Commonwealth cemeteries in Hong Kong, Burma, Singapore and Japan.

It is important for the vital role played by our veterans in the defence of freedom to be properly commemorated, particularly this year, which marks the fiftieth anniversary of V–E Day. We have already had a number of opportunities to recall to mind the selfless sacrifice of the men and women to whom we owe our heritage of freedom and democracy. This morning I would like to again express our gratitude to all of those who laid down their lives, and all those who were prepared to lay down their lives, in defence of that cause.

Such was the price of our allegiance to the values of democracy and peace and it is precisely because our young servicemen shared those values that they fought to uphold them throughout the world. More than 100,000 young Quebecers and Canadians lost their lives during the two world wars, and many hundreds more in Korea and various peacekeeping operations.

Today, we want to honour, more specifically, the war effort of our veterans in Hong Kong and other parts of the far east during the second world war. Ten thousand fighting men and women served there, and nearly a thousand did not return home. As the secretary of state rightly pointed out, the war effort in the far east was primarily an air war. The battles there were vital to the triumph of freedom and democracy.

Our soldiers were actively involved in reconnaissance, transportation, fighter and bomber squadrons. RCAF air crews and ground crews supported Commonwealth land forces in the war in the Pacific. We want to express our heartfelt gratitude to them.

This pilgrimage is one of a number that have been made to different parts of the world, particularly Europe, where Canadians and Quebecers helped liberate Belgium, France, Italy and the Netherlands. The celebrations for V–E Day were particularly emotional.

• (1010)

The significant loss of human life and the horror of the suffering of our veterans in the far east, including all the members of Canada's troops of Chinese or Japanese extraction, must not be left to fade with time.

This heritage must be passed on to the very young. We are therefore delighted to learn that four young people will take part in the pilgrimage. They are at the same age that the veterans were when they left to defend our freedom.

The Bloc Quebecois is pleased to support this initiative.

[English]

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I was 13 years old when the second world war ended; 9 when the Japanese bombed Pearl Harbour and the war in the Pacific commenced. Young as I was, with an aunt, an uncle and a cousin already in Canada's armed forces, Pearl Harbour impacted strongly on my family and on me.

For the men of the Winnipeg Grenadiers and the Royal Rifles the overwhelming numbers of Japanese attacking Hong Kong made the battle short but the ensuing years in prisoner of war camps long and arduous.

Overworked, underfed, exposed and vulnerable to tropical diseases and without adequate medical care, almost as many died in those camps as had been killed in the fight.

History tells us that the Japanese met their strongest resistance where men of the Royal Rifles and Winnipeg Grenadiers held the ground.

More than 500 of those who sailed for Hong Kong did not return. Those who did suffered abuse and deprivation which would affect them for the rest of their lives.

In the air, whether flying the hump in transport aircraft, in bombers carrying the fight to the enemy or in fighters defending our forces against enemy air attack, the Royal Canadian Air Force made a vital contribution to the successful resolution of that war.

I was delighted to see on the list of 40 veterans whom we will accompany on this pilgrimage the name of a pilot with whom I served during my career in the air force. Until I saw his name among the veterans I had no idea he had flown in that campaign. He is not one to trumpet his accomplishments. We have not seen each other for many years and I look forward with great anticipation to meeting him again. I look forward to meeting and coming to know all these veterans who gave so much for Canadians and the world during that difficult time.

The year 1994 marked the 75th anniversary of the end of the first world war and the 50th anniversary of events leading to the end of the second world war. The year 1995 has seen ceremonies commemorating events late in the war and finally victory in Europe.

This pilgrimage on which we embark tomorrow will visit cemeteries where Canadians lie in Burma, now Myanmar, Singapore, Hong Kong and Tokyo.

I will take great pride in joining our veterans of those campaigns as we pay tribute to their many comrades who made the ultimate sacrifice and did not return.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT RETIRING ALLOWANCES ACT

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–360, an act to amend the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act (deduction re other income).

He said: Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague, the hon. member for Prince George—Peace River, for seconding the bill.

It is a pleasure to introduce my private member's bill which calls for amending the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. Members opposite know how the Reform Party and indeed the overwhelming majority of Canadians feel about the rich MP gold plated pension scheme.

My private member's bill proposes to introduce an MP pension clawback which would apply to former parliamentarians. It would work on exactly the same principle as the old age security clawback applies to senior citizens. Former parliamentarians earning more than $53,215 in the private sector would have a portion of their MP pensions clawed back.

It is time for this kind of legislation. Canadians are calling for legislation which reflects fairness from their elected representatives.

• (1015)

I ask members from all parties to give serious consideration to this bill.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION ACT

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–361, an act to amend the Access to Information Act (crown corporations).

He said: Madam Speaker, my bill will make all crown corporations subject to the Access to Information Act. These would be corporations like the post office and CMHC. At present, these corporations are exempt from access to information even though they are subsidized with tax dollars. This bill will open corporations to the public and make them more accountable to Canadians.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–362, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act and the Canada Elections Act (confidence votes).

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill if enacted would amend the Parliament of Canada Act and the Canada Elections Act.

It would end the uncertainty over when our general elections would be called. Provisions in this bill would call for the general elections to be held every four years. This would in no way contravene our Constitution. No constitutional amendments are required because the Governor General still has the authority to determine whether or not that election shall be called.

There are also amendments to the Canada Elections Act that would clarify when a byelection would be called. It would ensure that in constituencies where members no longer represent their constituents because they have either been appointed to the Senate, as we have seen in the past, or they have passed away, timely byelections would be called on fixed dates.

Provisions in this bill would come into play if there was a crisis thus giving the bill the flexibility to be very usable.

I ask that all members of the House give serious consideration to this bill. If the bill passes, we would know that the next general election would be held on October 20, 1997.

PETITIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition which has been circulating all across Canada. This particular petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Waterloo, Ontario.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families who make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill, or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families who decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill, or the aged.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1020)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b), because of the ministerial statement, government orders will be extended by nine minutes.

SMALL BUSINESS LOANS ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, as reported (with amendments) from a committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I will now read the Speaker's ruling.

[English]

There are six motions in amendment standing on the Notice Paper for report stage of Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 will be grouped for the purposes of debate. The vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motion No. 5.

[English]

Motions Nos. 2, 4 and 6 will be grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 2 applies to Motions Nos. 4 and 6.

[Translation]

Motion No. 3 will be debated and voted on separately. I shall now put Motions Nos. 1 and 5 to the House.

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–99, in Clause 1, be amended:

(a) by replacing lines 24 and 25, on page 1, with the following:

"(d) ninety per cent, or such other percentage as is fixed by the committee of the House of Commons that normally considers matters relating to industry, of any loss sus–"; and

"(c) or, where a percentage is fixed by the committee described in this paragraph,".

That Bill C–99 be amended by adding after line 32, on page 4, the following new Clause:

"4.1 The Act is amended by adding the following after section 7:

7.1 The committee of the House of Commons that normally considers matters relating to industry may, for the purposes of paragraph 3(1)(d), fix the percentage of any loss that the Minister is liable to pay."

—He said: Madam Speaker, thank you for your co–operation. Our set of amendments consists of three groups. There are six amendments, and I will now speak to Group No. 1, as agreed.

In this first group, there are two elements that reflect the spirit of our amendments. One concerns the change in coverage now provided under the act. The government currently guarantees 90 per cent of loans made under the Small Business Loans Act, but that same government now wants to cap coverage at 85 per cent.

The other aspect concerns our role as legislators, in Parliament and in committee. In clause 1(1)(d), and we will get back to this later on, the government's share will be prescribed, and we feel that is wrong. To get back to the loan guarantees provided under the Small Business Loans Act, which will be reduced from 90 per cent to 85 per cent, a difference of 5 per cent, this means the government is in a way backing out, is reducing its contribution to this legislation, and this increases the lender's liability by 5 per cent.

The implications of this measure, although not dramatic, are nevertheless very serious, because there is a message here for small lending institutions, especially in Quebec, where there is a credit union in every town. Since the risk to the lender increases, small lending institutions that do not provide more than 10, 15 or 20 loans per year may think twice. We fear that this may cause bank managers to be more cautious, to be psychologically inclined to direct loans to less risky businesses, because the lender will, in theory, still run a greater risk.

This, in our opinion, will cause banks to favour less risky businesses. This runs somewhat counter to the economic development needs of our society, which is increasingly focused on high–tech companies in preparing for the future. These companies represent a risk in themselves because, as we know, contrary to traditional businesses, high–tech companies often have nothing to reassure lending institutions because their operating strength is based on their owner–managers' knowledge and expertise, on intangible values, and not on the usual buildings or facilities.

Reducing government coverage indirectly penalizes high–tech companies, which represent an extra risk for the banks. This has already been clearly identified as a problem during the industry committee's proceedings, because we know that the banks are generally reluctant, perhaps with good reason, to finance these high–tech companies.

This, we also fear, will penalize new businesses without any experience or history that have not yet proven themselves. These businesses represent an extra risk for lenders. Reduced coverage will make it harder for them and for the banks to accurately assess the situation, since any banker knows that lending to a new, unproven business without annual statements for the previous years will make the matter even more difficult.

Perhaps I should have pointed out earlier that we should keep in mind that what this bill implies comes from the last speech of the finance minister, in which he suggested rather strongly that the Small Business Loans Act program should be self–financing.

This is an expression of the current political will. We members of the Bloc Quebecois realize that this is a legislation, a small business assistance program with a price. In 1993, bad debts that had to be absorbed by the federal government totalled $32 million and, with the envelope growing from $4 billion to $12 billion, losses could rise to $100 million.

There may be food for thought here, serious thought. That is what the official opposition has in mind in suggesting that, before amending this act to limit its scope and introducing concepts such as self–financing, a cost–benefit analysis should be conducted to identify the benefits arising from this legislation. We need to know at least how many jobs are created, what the government's tax return on its investment is—since the loss incurred as a result of the implementation of this act could be likened to an investment—and what indirect taxes are created by the implementation of the act, taxes that otherwise would not have to be paid.

So, before the scope of this act is restricted, we in the committee would have liked, and that was part of our recommendations, to see a cost–benefit analysis. Unfortunately, the government did not follow our advice and is now going ahead by reducing, as we can see, coverage by five per cent.

• (1030)

The other aspect of Group No. 1, which is also found in Group No. 2, relates to clause 1(d), and reads:

> Subsection 3(1) of the Small Business Loans Act is amended by striking out the word "or" at the end of the paragraph (a) and by replacing paragraph (b) with the following:
> (d) eighty–five per cent, or such other percentage as is prescribed—

It is that "as is prescribed" provision that we object to and that we oppose. As you may have noticed, the official opposition—we all do—feels that the role of parliamentarians, including that of Parliament as legislator and that of the committees, is neglected and belittled. This bill should be a good opportunity to enhance the role of parliamentarians and committees, and this is why we condemn the fact that the government intends to resort to regulations.

All the polls show that we must enhance the role of elected representatives. We were elected through a democratic process, we have things to say, and we all represent our constituents. We are here to express their views. Yet, the system relies less and less on the expertise and sensitivity of parliamentarians. If we are not the ones who can influence decisions, then who can? It is the bureaucracy, the lobbies and those who have money, as the current Quebec premier so accurately pointed out in his review of the referendum results.

Given how much money circulates in our economic system, it is easy to see the power of money. That is confirmed once again. Indeed, if the government does not work openly with the institutions that we represent, than it works on the sly and resorts to its authority. With that provision, we will only find out after the fact that the government decided to change its coverage. By resorting to regulations, if the government wants to ensure self–financing and realizes that implementing the act is too costly, it can simply decide that its coverage will no longer be 85 per cent but, rather, 80, 75 or 70 per cent, without any discussion. All of us here will simply be put before a fait accompli, and that is not good for any self–respecting democracy.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened attentively to the member for Trois–Rivières. Quite frankly, there are some points the member makes that are quite valid. I would like to dwell on the first point for a couple of minutes, and that has to do with the reduction in the government's liability from 90 per cent on the small business loan guarantee to 85 per cent.

Last year the government liability for the Small Business Loans Act float was approximately $100 million. That is what it cost. Effectively, what we are doing with this amendment to the bill, which the Bloc does not support, is reducing the liability from $100 million to $95 million. In other words, by lowering the exposure of the government we are going to save $5 million.

The member for Trois–Rivières makes a very interesting point. Will that five per cent threshold cause banks to not look as hard or take as much of a chance with those smaller, more innovative, knowledge based firms? I am not sure that it will not.

Two weeks ago we heard in the industry committee that the small business float for all banks in Canada was $28 billion, a one per cent increase in the float over the year before. The banks of Canada that make loans under the Small Business Loans Act were guaranteed, prior to this legislation, 90 per cent of that loan by the crown. The float right now is around $4 billion to $5 billion. If we deduct that Government of Canada guarantee to the banks on those loans, then effectively we have not had a real increase in the small business loan activity in this country in the last two years.

We have to be very careful. I am not going to support the member's motion to reduce the crown's exposure. The member from Trois–Rivières wants the government to go on the hook for another $5 million. I am not going to support that. Because of the pressure from the Reform Party, our government is on a fiscal obsession with the deficit and the debt. I hope this path will head to a quicker economic recovery. I share the view of the Bloc member for Trois–Rivières that we are going to have to be vigilant, because if we lower the government guarantee to the banks we may see a lot of good opportunities go by the wayside. The banks might not come to the party. We need small business going full throttle in the country.

I think the member's motion gives us an interesting concern, which we register. However we must at the same time balance our responsibility with reducing the cost of managing the program to the taxpayer. We will try it, and if we see that the activity on the Small Business Loans Act does not continue at the same rate or if there is not the same action on the Small Business Loans Act, then as a committee and as a government we can ask the minister to reopen the file. However we must give it a chance in the interest of fiscal restraint and make sure the bill is focused on cost recovery.

I must say that the member for Trois–Rivières has done a fabulous job in the industry committee in the last two years. Instead of his party being called the Bloc Quebecois, I wish they were called the Bloc Canadien. If they were called the Bloc Canadien, then imagine the thrust we could get going in the House and the stimulation to the economy.

• (1040)

Who knows, once the current leader of the Bloc Quebecois moves to Quebec City perhaps we will get a conversion going and the Bloc can become the Bloc Canadien. I sense there are a lot of members in the Bloc who really do by and large share some of the values and some of the things we all aspire to in the House for all of Canada.

The second part of the member's point is about giving the industry committee the authority to amend this bill. That would be equivalent to changing the whole system of government. We all know our system of government gives the Prime Minister and his cabinet the executive responsibility to put legislation forward. We members of Parliament have the ability and the opportunity to provide input and to amend, as we are doing here today.

The reason we do not have any motions being put forward today by the Reform Party is because the motions and ideas of the Reform critic for industry were accepted in committee and have become part of the bill. It is not as if members of Parliament do not have the—

Mr. Penson: It was the first time.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): No, it was not the first time. We have accepted many of the good ideas of the member from Okanagan.

The point I am trying to make is the government would not abrogate to committees of the House its executive responsibility. The member for Trois–Rivières is asking the executive of the Government of Canada to just give its executive responsibility to the industry committee. We could not support such an idea, because ultimately the Prime Minister and the cabinet, the government, are responsible.

Mr. Hermanson: They call the shots.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): That is right. We can have input, but that is the way we are governed in this country and that is the way it will have to stay.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in the debate on this very interesting motion. In some ways it sounds very good in principle. In another sense, I have great difficulty with it.

I would like to review some of the provisions of the Small Business Loans Act itself and what it is doing. I noticed the hon. parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Industry alluded to the exposure of the government and the liability that is incurred on behalf of the government for the people of Canada under the Small Business Loans Act. It is rather substantial. Last spring the $4 billion ceiling was increased to $12 billion, which is a threefold increase. It is very interesting that at that time the government's liability was 90 per cent of that $4 billion, which works out to about $3.6 billion. That costs roughly $100 million a year in terms of the non–payment or the defaults on various loans.

The current amendment proposes to reduce the liability for the $12 billion ceiling to 85 per cent, which still means a liability for the government of approximately $11.2 billion or $11.3 billion. If that proportion of $100 million goes with a $4 billion ceiling, this could now go to $300 million with this new ceiling, which is pretty substantial. We have to be very careful about this.

We have to recognize that Professors Haines and Riding did a very interesting study about small business loans and what happens. The cap of the individual borrower under the Small Business Loans Act is now $250,000; it was $125,000. The ceiling or the size of the business has increased. It was limited to any business that had $2 million or less of sales on an annual basis. The new ceiling goes up to $5 million.

• (1045)

It is very interesting what this study of Haines–Riding showed. It showed that businesses below the $2 million ceiling had a default rate of somewhere between 7 per cent and 8 per cent. Those with sales between $2 million and $5 million had a default rate of 14.7 per cent, which is much greater.

We can see the exposure under the new provisions, under the new ceilings, are rather interesting because they increase the risk to which the government has exposed itself.

To combat that the bill comes forward and says that there will be an administration fee. As we all know there is a 2 per cent registration fee right off the top which is added to the principal. Then there is a 1.75 per cent fee in terms of cost to make the costs of defaults and various other administrative items recoverable. It was not good enough that it resulted in a $100 million loss. That has been increased by another 1.25 per cent which means a total of 3 per cent. The 1.25 per cent can be recovered in only one way and that is through interest rates.

The earlier situation was that the Small Business Loans Act used the prime rate that could be increased by 1.75 per cent. It went up to 6.75 per cent. Now it is 3 per cent above prime, which means that we will probably run the new small business loans under that provision.

To give us the context of what is happening, the liability of the government is increased under the Small Business Loans Act by about 300 per cent over what it was before. It is our responsibility as elected representatives of our constituents to protect their interests. If we are exposing their risk from $4 billion to $12 billion, it should not be delegated to the executive council of the government. It should be the responsibility of parliamentarians in the House of Commons.

The bill had the provision that it should be delegated to the executive council. We proposed an amendment. The hon. parliamentary secretary referred to the amendment in his presentation a few moments ago. It was accepted by the committee. It has now been taken out of the bill so that parliamentarians have control over fixing whether it will be 90 per cent or any other percentage. It is a real positive move for democracy.

When I look at the amendment before us I notice that it has been adulterated because it is neither fish nor fowl at this point. It is being proposed that parliamentarians in the House of Commons should not have control but the committee should have control. Admittedly the committee is made up of parliamentarians elected from all parties represented in the House. They are elected representatives of the constituents.

However when we are talking about $12 billion it is a lot of money. I do not think a committee should have the authority to make those kinds of decisions on behalf of Parliament. If we thought the executive council should not have that kind of power, it is much less that a committee of the House should have the authority.

While the direction of giving authority to the people is a good one and while the intent is noble, the way it is being proposed will not achieve what we really need. We need to recognize that as representatives who have been elected by the people we represent them in a threefold way. First, we represent them because of the party we are a member of that presented the candidates to the people. They knew we were to present certain things. I appreciate the parliamentary secretary's statement that gave us credit for the fact that the Reform Party is here to bring about an awareness of the fiscal responsibility and the need to get our house in order financially. That is absolutely superb. We need to do that.

The difference I have with the hon. member opposite is that it is not an obsession. That is a reality. That is something we have to come to grips with. It is high time that we do it just as soon as we can. If truth is an obsession it is time we were all obsessed because truth is what we need. That is the first point.

As we represent our people we have another responsibility to detect very clearly what they feel about certain kinds of issues. They want a voice and they have told us clearly that we have to get our financial house in order. That was not a mandate that we in the Reform Party said we would have, but the people told us quite independent of it being a Reform platform that it was what they wanted us to do.

Second, as representatives we actually go out and represent the people in what they think. Finally, we apply our best judgment to ordinary everyday housekeeping items where we do the things that have to be looked after.

This is a very critical and important issue. To put this into the context of only a one–industry committee is not enough. The whole House of Commons is involved in financial issues of major import affecting small business, the engine that generates about 85 per cent of new employment in Canada. It is the issue.

Also that group, especially the high tech group, is bringing about innovations to make our economy grow. There is no question that today we will move faster and faster not because we are so smart but because we bring about new innovations, new applications of new knowledge. That is what we need to do. The small business component is the absolute number one component in the economy that will help Canada grow to where it becomes a truly competitive industrial nation in the world. That is where we need to move.

I appreciate the opportunity the motion has given me to express some ideas although I oppose the motion not because we do not need to deal with small business and not because we do not need representatives of the people but because the method is wrong.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to enter the debate at report stage of Bill C–99, specifically Motions Nos. 1 and 5 brought forward by the member for Trois–Rivières.

I was interested in the member's speech. He discussed the need to defend lenders. It seems unusual to me. Sometimes when I look at the Small Business Loans Act the question that comes readily to mind is why the Government of Canada has to encourage and guarantee lending to small business, which is the obligation of our financial community.

I was very surprised to hear the member defending moving the guarantee from 90 per cent to 85 per cent. He defended the potential liability for another 5 per cent on these loans to lenders. The banks of the country have reported something in the neighbourhood of $1 billion worth of profits. It is apropos that as legislators and parliamentarians we are concerned about the small and medium size business communities and where they fit.

The question could well be why the guarantee is at 85 per cent. The intent of the legislation is to recognize a liability exists for the Government of Canada in terms of these loans. As far as I can understand, the guarantee has been amended to 85 per cent basically to allow more lending to occur. The growth in the SBLA program has been remarkable. In that sense it has been very successful in channelling investment loans to small and medium size businesses. By leaving the guarantee at the 90 per cent level, loan losses could well exceed $100 million a year.

As we have heard from the hon. member from Okanagan the government is committed to reducing our expenditures and our risk to loss. He spoke about a maximum liability of something in the neighbourhood of $12 billion. That is erroneous. That kind of risk would be like giving somebody an $85,000 mortgage on a $100,000 house and expecting to lose the entire $85,000. Most of the small business community could look at that situation and realize it is an unrealistic assumption.

Most of the loan loss provisions that have resulted in losses to the government are somewhere in the neighbourhood of 2.5 per cent. That is not unreasonable in the lending business, which gets me back to my original question of why we cannot encourage our financial institutions to be more aggressive in lending to small and medium size businesses rather than require the federal government to guarantee the loans.

The hon. member mentioned a number of other issues, not the least of which was investment in new and emerging technologies. Certainly that is a good point. The history of the loans has been that they are used for capital additions to small and medium size businesses, basically equipment, real estate and so on. The aspect of new technology still befuddles the investment community generally. We need to look for new and different types of sources of capital for small and medium size businesses. I suspect small and medium size businesses and the SBLA program do not look to this source of capital to finance emerging technologies.

About a year ago I had the opportunity to tour the Royal Bank. I talked to some of the portfolio managers and listened to their concerns about emerging technologies. I still believe that the financial community has not come to grips with how to deal with emerging technology. It is still very much focused on the concept of security, based on what it was doing 10 or 20 years ago, looking for hard assets as security for the loans.

The most prevalent asset was real estate. I do not have to tell my colleagues what has happened in the real estate industry in the last five years. The banks, in an effort not to be burned twice, are getting back to using real estate as a security item, which has compounded the problems of small and medium size businesses. The banks are refusing to enter even traditional markets because they do not know from where they will get security.

Through the Small Business Loans Act the government has attempted to inspire financial institutions to come forward and lend to small and medium size businesses. Most businesses will be smaller, based on some of the changes to the act. When we are talking about sales of $5 million and so forth a lot of people in the riding of Durham do not think that is small business; they think it is big business.

The changes to the SBLA will allow it to be more focused on genuine small businesses. The question is how big businesses occur. They occur from the emergence of small businesses that are allowed to grow within the system. The Small Business Loans Act has really been a hand up for some small businesses. As the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood suggested, it may well be the only hand up that exists between the financial sector and small and medium size businesses.

• (1100)

The second part of the motion deals with the possibility of having the industry committee approve changes in the guarantee aspect of these provisions. One thing that small business needs is flexibility and rapidity in decision making.

I question whether it is in the purview of the committee system to undertake this sort of review process knowing the heavy workload the committee constantly has in this place. I also question whether it is within the competence of the committee to make those kinds of decisions.

In order for the committee to change these kinds of guarantees it would need rapid and up to date information about the experience of loan losses. It would have to be able to understand emerging tendencies within the lending business.

I really question whether it would be a service to small and medium size businesses which would find a great lag in being able to have a flexible relationship with the government. I think the government is attempting to be very flexible in allowing this plan to emerge and foster support of small business.

In conclusion, I am opposed to both of these motions for the reasons I have mentioned.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The vote is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare Motion No. 1 lost. Therefore, Motion No. 5 is lost as well.

(Motion No. 1 negatived.)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): We will now proceed to Group No. 2.

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C–99, in Clause 1, be amended by replacing line 25, on page 2, with the following:

"Minister the annual administration fee fixed by the committee of the House of Commons that normally considers matters relating to industry,".

That Bill C–99, in Clause 4, be amended by replacing lines 25 and 28, on page 4, with the following:

"paragraphe 3(4)(c)(i), the time when the annual administration fee fixed by the committee referred to in section 7.1, is payable;".

That Bill C–99 be amended by adding after line 32, on page 4, the following new Clause:

"4.1 The Act is amended by adding the following after section 7:

7.1 The committee of the House of Commons that normally considers matters relating to industry may, for the purposes of sub–paragraph 3(4)(c)(i), fix the annual administration fee or the method of calculating the annual administration fee."

• (1105)

He said: Madam Speaker, I realize these amendments are rather technical and dry but they are nevertheless important, and they take the same approach as the amendment we introduced earlier when we condemned the use of the word prescribe and the whole regulatory process and mechanism it entails.

However, before I continue, I would like to thank the parliamentary secretary for his kind words, which I appreciated. I want to return the compliment, because I think we should realize the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Industry is not only a very good parliamentarian but also an outstanding asset to our work in committee.

I would also like to comment on what he said about establishing a bloc canadien. In fact, in the forties there was a "bloc populaire" to defend the interests of Quebecers. In the nineties, and English Canada is not about to forget it, we saw the birth of a bloc québécois. To continue the musings of the parliamentary secretary, we might see the birth of a bloc canadien very shortly in Canada, after Quebec becomes sovereign, a bloc that would be foster the best possible relations with a sovereign Quebec, including an economic and political partnership, which we support because it is sensible, it is the way to mutual respect between good neighbours and recognition of the equality of the two peoples here in America, different from the United States, different from Europe, who represent certain cultures, since Canada is also a distinct society on this planet. If there is enough good will on both sides in the months and years to come—and our contribution to the industry committee is a good example of that—we will be able to work together for the well–being and prosperity of our respective peoples.

I would like to comment on the remarks of my colleague opposite, who expresses surprise at the spirit of our amendment on the reduction of government coverage, in which we wanted to protect lenders rather than borrowers. I think we have to face the fact lenders are reluctant when it comes to small business. That is the reason for a small business loan act. We know there is a reluctance and that the government wants to keep the legislation but distance itself from it by reducing its coverage. I think this will be to the detriment of what is increasingly the motor of economic development: the small and medium business, the SMBs. This is why we are being very careful in this. We want to ensure the continuation of the coverage currently offered to the more vulnerable small borrowers, the ones threatening to lenders.

So, getting back to the spirit of this second bloc, it is to reinforce, as mentioned earlier, the roles of parliamentarians. In any civilized society, as ours claims to be, where there is representation by election, I believe there has long been a certain malaise over the role of those elected to Parliament. The role of parliamentarians is becoming more increasingly insignificant. And I think this is one of those times when we are reminded that things could be done differently. Over the course of several decades, the public service has progressively become heavy, especially at the top. As was mentioned earlier, the executive branch assumed a great deal of power, and while Parliament is certainly a place for debate, it has very little power, and that is what we are condemning and want to change. There is also continuity.

I think that anyone who has seen the Bloc Quebecois at work in the various committees can appreciate the logic underlying our remarks and contribution, in ensuring, rather like I am doing this morning, that parliamentarians have greater power to influence the decision making process so that the public interest remains first and foremost, at the expense, if need be, of other interests, which, as you know full well, have other ways of making themselves heard.

Earlier, I heard the parliamentary secretary criticize our amendment proposal, saying that, should coverage be reduced, as we in the official opposition are concerned it will, the industry committee will make appropriate representations to the Minister of Industry to have this issue reviewed. That is not much, in terms of power.

This means that, when a problem is reported, the industry committee will come to agreement and quietly make representations to the minister, asking him: "Would you please stop doing this, Sir; you are hurting our constituents". Parliamentarians certainly do not have much power, in such instances.

This is what we deplore and want to change by introducing an amendment which, as we can see, has unfortunately not garnered unanimous support in this House. Even the Reform Party is not very keen on our proposal. This is unfortunate because it discredits our role once again, given what that role should be. This is not only the case in the Parliament of Canada, but in all British legislatures where, over the decades, elected representatives were gradually stripped of certain powers because of the size of the bureaucracy, to the benefit of technocrats, who want to work behind closed doors. It goes without saying that it is easier to resort to regulations and orders in council.

I remember the debate on Bill C–88 dealing with internal trade. It provides that the federal government can, through orders in council, take action against the party deemed at fault. Using orders in council means that there is no public debate. It means that we cannot even discuss the issue on behalf of the province deemed to be unco–operative or at fault. The elected representatives of that province would not even be allowed to make public representations, because the issue would have been settled through an order in council. This, in my view, is rather ominous. This is why we moved these three amendments, which essentially seek to eliminate the use of regulations and replace it with a committee decision. More specifically, Motion No. 6 seeks to add a new clause 7.1, which reads:

> 7.1 The committee of the House of Commons that normally considers matters relating to industry may, for the purposes of sub–paragraph 3(4)(c)(i), fix the annual administration fee or the method of calculating the annual administration fee.

As things now stand, the minister is keeping this power for himself without too much consultation and is being very discreet about it. So much the better for those who will be aware of that, and too bad for the others.

Instead of that, it is possible to rely on the existing political structure, and to proceed in a manner which is more transparent and more public. This is what we hope to achieve with these amendments.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have always been an advocate that members of Parliament can play a meaningful role in amending or designing legislation in the House of Commons. Therefore, I do not share the view of the Bloc member for Trois–Rivières. It is important that we explain to Canadians how as individual MPs we can have an impact on the system.

If I have a particular view of how the Small Business Loans Act should be amended, then I should sit down with colleagues on both sides of the House and develop a consensus. Quite often when we can get a consensus it has always been my experience that unless it is something that really upsets the fiscal framework of the country most ministers accept good ideas from their parliamentary committees.

I have never experienced a situation in which a minister who had constantly ignored the advice of his political confreres on a constant basis whether in the House, in committee or in caucus still succeeded as a minister. I have never known ministers to succeed if genuine requests from MPs to their departments are ignored. If they are ignored it is the MPs' fault.

Mr. Strahl: Ask the Minister of Justice if he listens.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I presume the hon. member is talking about gun control. The Minister of Justice did listen. This was a balancing act he had to perform. He had to make a very tough decision. Do we think for a minute the Minister of Justice did not balance in his decision making process the difficulties rural members were having versus the concerns urban members had?

An hon. member: He ignored them completely.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): The judge is out on whether he ignored rural MPs or whether this situation will succeed in gun control. That is a fair example. It was a tough decision.

By and large on ideas not as controversial, when we get a consensus ministers tend to listen.

It is very important that we take notice of the Bloc's point on the control the bureaucracy has in this community. I have been working around this town since 1979. I came here as a young political assistant, not a bureaucrat. I was amazed at the way the bureaucrats, the public servants, operated and managed departments within government. We call it the machinery of government.

I had a terrific experience working in the Prime Minister's office for almost four years. I was amazed even in that office when we wanted things done the public service had this capacity to actually control the tempo of implementation. I coined an expression back in 1981 called the MAD treatment, maximum administrative delay. They were good public servants. It was just part of the culture. It was part of the thought process that even though the political will wants a particular policy implemented, before we actually put it into the factory and implement it we must do further analysis. We must check this and we must check that. The delay was enough to drive one nuts.

The member for Trois–Rivieres has given us a very important point on which we must be ever vigilant. Those of us who are elected and accountable have to make sure the things approved in the House are implemented and not steered off and done in a way the bureaucracy thinks should be done.

I do not share the member's view when he says we do not have an opportunity for input. I think we do. If we are passionate about our ideas and we get support from other colleagues usually they can be implemented.

It is not always easy. I could give a personal example and pass it on to the members opposite on the whole issue of tax reform. I have been working on the issue of tax reform for six years, the single tax system.

I was hoping that with 50–odd members from the Reform Party who apparently believed in tax reform we would have much more energy in support of the notion of comprehensive tax reform, but that has fizzled. Obviously I have not done a good enough job on that issue in convincing other colleagues we need comprehensive tax reform. We are not talking about it enough, debating it enough or selling it to the rest of the decision makers in the Chamber.

An hon. member: Convince the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): We cannot simply convince the Minister of Finance. This is where we go to the member for Trois–Rivières' point about the technocrats, the bureaucrats. What we really should be doing is lobbying as elected men and women. We should lobby the finance department.

How many members have taken the time to go to the finance department, sit down with a senior bureaucrat and talk to him or her about their ideas for tax reform? Those public servants cannot refuse to see elected members of Parliament.

Mr. Strahl: They do it to me all the time.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): If they are refusing to see the member, he should go to the minister. They do not refuse to see the lobbyists so I cannot imagine a public servant refusing to meet with a member of Parliament. I find that crazy.

If a member tells me of any public servant who refuses to meet with an elected person I will stand up in the House and we will talk about it. Even before I will, the Prime Minister will go berserk. As someone who has been in nine different government departments, the Prime Minister understands the public service is there to implement the political will of the approved legislation in the House. If there is resistance to it, it is our fault to allow the resistance.

I appreciate the comment from my colleague from Trois–Rivières that we should be ever vigilant as we deal with the public service in the way it manages some of these pieces of legislation we approve in the House. However, I do not share his view that members of Parliament cannot have a substantial role in amending and designing legislation. For that reason we will not be supporting this motion.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to debate the motions placed by the Bloc. I listened to the eloquent defence of Parliament by the previous speaker. I wondered why in his eloquent defence he would be opposed to the idea that Parliament make the decisions regarding the levels of the fees and so on charged within Bill C–99.

The member also told us about how difficult it is to get through the civil service, how difficult the bureaucracy is to move and the challenges we as members of Parliament face in achieving these things. Yet he gave no indication whatsoever that he was prepared to recognize these decisions should be made right here on the floor of the House rather than some back room by some unelected, unknown bureaucrat we cannot even find much less influence as far as making these decisions.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to humbly correct the member because I did not in any way, shape or form say the elected people in the House do not have an influence on the way bills are designed and approved.

• (1125)

Mr. Williams: Madam Speaker, I advise the member that decisions regarding the level of fees should be made right here on the floor of the House. We should not be delegating the authority to some bureaucrat who is nameless, unelected and unknown, who advises his minister that he thinks they should vary or increase the fee and the minister does it. This is how the bill reads.

The Bloc is trying to change the motion so that a committee of the House would make that decision in lieu of the minister by order in council.

Unfortunately we cannot support the motion by the Bloc even though we feel the decision should be made right here on the floor of the House because unfortunately the Bloc does not understand the rules of the House. Committees do not make decisions. All committees can do is report back to the House. Committees do not have the authority to make legislative decisions.

Any motion approved on the floor of the House is not legislation by itself. It is only an expression of the House. We only approve legislation. We cannot initiate legislation through a committee. That is where the Bloc is totally misinformed and cannot understand the rules of the House, which leads me to the question of separation. When Bloc members want to separate from the rest of the country they have no understanding of the process. The referendum they had in Quebec last month was ruled illegal by a court in their own province, and yet they proceeded with the referendum anyway.

We now find they do not understand the rules of the House, where they expect committees to make legislation. It is little wonder we have a party that cannot understand how to enjoy life within the confederation and would rather head off on its own. I am concerned for the people of Quebec if they are to be led by a group with no concept of how to live within a set of rules.

Getting back to the legislation and getting back to more relevance, we want to see decisions made by members of Parliament. We do not want to delegate the authority to the minister who acts on the advice of some bureaucrat. We want to see the minister make up his mind and bring a proposal to the House in the form of legislation. We look at it, debate it and vote on it. If it is approved that is fine, but we do not want to give him a carte blanche to vary the rules at his whim without debate, without the public at large realizing what is going on. That is why we have to oppose the motions proposed.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to once again enter the debate on Motion No. 6.

I listened to the hon. member for Trois–Rivières talking about how different Quebec and its people are from the rest of the country. The Small Business Loans Act shows us very realistically how we are all similar. The problems of small and medium size businesses whether in Montreal or Chicoutimi, Oshawa or Vancouver are very much the same. Small and medium size businesses have difficulty obtaining access to capital.

Clearly it is important for us as a country to look at as big a market, as big a capital access as we possibly can and to assist small and medium size businesses. What are we talking about here? Ultimately, we are talking about jobs and the ability to create jobs.

I was very interested recently to read a summary by the Quebec Manufacturers Association that stated that Quebec is the least attractive jurisdiction in Canada in which to do business. This is not something that has been created by the federal system; it is something that has been created within the province of Quebec. I addressed some manufacturers from Ontario this week and asked them how we could assist our fellow business people within that province to overcome some of the problems of high wage structures, high interest rates and so forth that the manufacturers of Quebec are having which means an inability to create jobs in that province.

This motion deals with the ability of making the administrative changes to acts within the purview of the committee system. What we have to do is ask ourselves what our role is as parliamentarians. Psychologically, it sounds very good to say that we should be involved with every decision of government, possibly every change in the Income Tax Act, possibly every idiosyncracy or change in the Environmental Protection Act, fee structures that are administered by Canada Post. There are all kinds of administrative actions that occur on a daily basis.

When I practised as a chartered accountant I had a list of complaints, and I agree that the system is too complex. I had a stack of information that came in every week of changes within the system, a stack of about four or five inches. If that is to be the purview of the committees, I do not think they will get much work done.

The other aspect of this is that we need to empower somebody with responsibility, somebody who is answerable, somebody who can appear before the committee and answer for decisions that are being made. I question whether on a daily basis we can have members of Parliament involved in all of these individual decisions. On paper it sounds very good but the reality will be that we are going to delay the decision making.

For instance, on administration fees the object of that exercise was to basically make the administration of those loans break even for the government, for the government to have no costs involved, covering our loan losses, et cetera. For the committee to make rational decisions on an ongoing basis it would have to know almost on a weekly basis the administration of those loans, the numbers that have gone into default, the industries that are being pressured and so forth to know whether to increase or decrease fees in certain areas.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that committees do not meet that often. The reality is that Parliament is only in session less than half of the year. How could it possibly react on a daily or weekly basis to these kinds of changes? That is not the purpose of Parliament or even the purpose of the committee system.

Once again, I am opposed to this group of motions. If we want to improve the committee system we should ask whether the reviews the committees enter into are efficient and adequate, whether the powers of investigation are adequate and whether they exercise them adequately. Those are really properly the issues that would face parliamentarians on how to make this place more efficient and more democratic.

There is room for possibly strengthening the committee system, and I thank the member for Trois–Rivières for making that point. A lot of people in this country would like to see the committee system strengthened to use the talents of members of Parliament to their optimum benefit. Quite frankly, approving administration fees I do not think is one of them.

There is another important aspect we overlook about the administration fee. It has been the complaint of the SBLA program that it was essentially the prime borrowers, well heeled companies, that were getting the loans. In other words, these people could possibly get loans on their own without that guarantee but chose to get the guarantee because it was a cheap source of capital for them with a government guarantee attached to it. By increasing this fee that will no longer be an advantage to them.

As a consequence, what we have done is opened up a significant amount of capital for small and medium size businesses. What this means is that those companies that can afford to pay regular rates of interest will be unattracted because of this fee structure and will go off and borrow through the normal financial channels without the SBLA guarantee. The companies that will be left will in fact be those emerging companies, the ones that find difficulty in getting access to loans.

Time and time again on the industry committee and through our report, Taking Care of Small Business, we have been told by small business that the most important thing is access to capital and not necessarily the cost. Of course there is a point at which the cost of capital becomes prohibitive but those small emerging companies, the ones we are looking toward as creating new jobs and new industries, are going to have better access to funds under this system. This sounds ironic because the fees are slightly higher but it will open up an area for small and medium size business that does not currently exist.

Getting back to the original motion, I think it will be a detriment to those industries if for some reason the administration fee is somehow logged into a committee that is cumbersome and takes a long time to react. It is wise that the government leave that decision making possibly with a bureaucrat. That bureaucrat from time to time and at the discretion of the committee can appear before the committee and explain his actions. If for whatever reasons we find him negligent, we can get rid of him and hire somebody who is better. I believe that is more appropriately the administration of the committee system.

In conclusion, very simply, I am opposed to Motion No. 6 because I do not believe it is in the best interests of small and medium size businesses.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure today to speak on Bill C–99 and related amendments 2, 4, and 6 put forth by our colleagues from the Bloc Quebecois.

The backbone of our economy is made up of the small and medium size businesses in this country. They are the ones who truly create longlasting jobs within Canada. They are the ones who create real employment in our country. They form an essential part of our tax base in areas of innovation, science, technology, finance and many other areas. They are something we Canadians should be proud of.

The small to medium size businesses are finding it increasingly difficult in Canada to function because of the high tax loads, the red tape they are forced to struggle under and the difficulty they have in securing loans. Lending institutions within Canada are historically very conservative. Therefore, individuals in this country who bring forth many good ideas find it difficult if not impossible to have their efforts actually go to fruition. This is an enormous loss for Canada.

One just needs to look in the areas of medicine, science, technology and the pharmaceutical industry to see good ideas going nowhere or in fact being sold to companies in other parts of the world. I recently read some very interesting information on this. I read about incredible ideas being born within our own country and being sent to other countries where they become productive, profitable and contribute to the society by providing long term, high tech, high paying jobs for people in other countries. This is indeed a sad thing.

Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, comprises efforts to put this program on the road to cost recovery. Everyone in this House approves of this. However, we are also addressing the amendments put forth by the Bloc Quebecois. We oppose these amendments because they bring the power of determining liability directly to the committee instead of bringing it down to the area in this government that is closest to the public, and that is the House of Commons.

I would like to congratulate my colleague from Okanagan Centre, who put forth amendments that were adopted by the committee that would bring the decision making process closer to the people, and that is the House of Commons.

I find it quite strange that members of the Bloc Quebecois are putting forth amendments but are not addressing some of the large issues that are affecting their province. Sadly, Quebec in recent times has seen economic destitution and social problems unrivalled in its history. It is easy for the Bloc Quebecois and other separatist forces to blame history and Ottawa for these problems. I ask my honourable friends in the Bloc Quebecois, does not responsibility for some of these problems rest on their own shoulders? Is it not the intent of the separatist forces to carve Quebec out of Canada? Are they not at least partly, if not largely, responsible for the terrible economic and social destitution we see in many areas of Quebec? One just has to visit the eastern part of Montreal to see this in real life.

I hope the hon. members of the Bloc Quebecois will look toward building a united Canada and addressing the economic and social problems that affect all of us within the context of this country. I find it extremely strange that they say that if they did not have to give their tax base to Ottawa they would be a lot better off. I ask them to wake up and look at the fact that net transfer payments go to Quebec and not to Ottawa. I ask them to remember that before they continue to pursue their course.

I would also like to address some of the problems that are affecting small and medium size businesses and put forth some constructive solutions. As I said before, small and medium size businesses are having increasingly difficult times because of the high tax loads they are forced to work under. This is indicative of the government's huge tax loads. With these huge tax loads, the high debt and deficit we have incurred, we are forced to pay off increasingly larger amounts of interest on these debts. As a result, interest rates in the country are higher than they ought to be and tax rates are also higher than they should be. It makes it very difficult for these companies to compete in other countries.

The industry committee supported the fact that federal, provincial and municipal governments should get their fiscal houses in order so that interest rates may be brought down and more money made available to companies, making a stronger, healthier dollar. It would provide an element of stability that is essential if small and medium size businesses are to be effective competitors in the future.

In talking to business we have found that one of the greatest obstacles they face is red tape. It is extraordinarily strange that the great ideas put forth in this country have to pass through so many loopholes to get to where they can be effective that many do not achieve their ultimate end. Red tape that is supposed to work for businesses is in effect choking them. We need to take a very close and hard look at this. We need to work with the finance and revenue departments to determine ways in which we can decrease the red tape and make businesses more effective and virile competitors in this country.

I would also like to raise the issue of using tax incentives to make more capital available to businesses. Indeed, the industry committee looked at this and suggested that decreasing capital gains tax rates for long term investment in Canadian small and medium size businesses would be an effective way to provide these companies with money to invest to build their businesses. Maintaining the $500,000 capital gains exemption is also a useful technique. If that were applied to small and medium size businesses it would provide more capital for them.

Relaxing the use of RRSPs in investing in one's own business is another measure which would put the responsibility back on those brave men and women who like to go it alone and try to make a private business work. They could use their own funds to invest in their business.

We also need to find ways in which the public can invest in Canadian companies. We need to define new financial relationships for the government, the banks and the private sector.

We can look at many examples. Germany and Japan are two giants which have managed to capture large segments of markets throughout the world. In part that is due to the unique relationship which the private sector has with the lending institutions in their respective countries. We do not have to reinvent the wheel. There are many examples in the world of these ideas being put into effect to support business.

In summary, small and medium size businesses are the backbone of the Canadian economy. They are an invaluable source of taxes for the federal and provincial governments. They are the primary employers. Without these institutions the employment rate would be much higher. They provide long term, long lasting, high paying jobs for Canadians. It is the responsibility of the government and opposition members to support measures which would maximize the effectiveness of small and medium size businesses. Let us look at other parts of the world and find ways in which we can support the backbone of Canada's economy.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Deputy Speaker: I declare Motion No. 2 lost on division. Therefore, Motions Nos. 4 and 6 are also lost.

(Motion No. 2 negatived.)

Mr. Yves Rocheleau (Trois–Rivières, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C–99, in Clause 4, be amended by replacing line 6, on page 4, with the following:

"ty taken".

He said: Mr. Speaker, we welcome this opportunity to discuss the third and last group, which deals with the above amendment and for which some background may be useful.

Clause 4(1) of the bill reads as follows:

4(1) Subsection 7(1) of the Act is amended by adding the following after paragraph (e):

(e.1) prescribing the terms and conditions on which a lender may release any security, including a personal guarantee, taken for the repayment of a business improvement loan;

• (1150)

That is a sore point with us, and that is what we want to change through this amendment. In fact, the proposed amendment is entirely in line with the message we got during the last federal election campaign, when the Liberal Party of Canada had already said in its famous red book that if it were elected, it would ensure that no personal guarantees were required for loans under the Small Business Loans Act.

However, whether it was divine or some other kind of intervention, whether it was a lack of political will or loss of memory—Alzheimer's not being restricted to humans, even institutions will forget, and I think this is very disturbing in the present case—I think the government forgot a promise that must have been welcomed by the business community, especially small business entrepreneurs who are directly affected by the Small Business Loans Act. The promise was that from now on, the Small Business Loans Act would no longer require personal guarantees.

The Liberals forgot, and it is our job to remind them of one of the few promises in the red book that made sense. Asking the borrower for a personal guarantee under the Small Business Loans Act is, like the hon. member for Champlain said earlier, like having a belt—the government guarantee—and asking for suspenders because you are afraid the belt will break and the loan will otherwise be a write–off.

With the 90 per cent guarantee the lender used to have and which will now be 85 per cent, the lender could still expect to avoid severe losses after agreeing to lend money to a small business. However, if the lender can also ask for a personal guarantee, in most cases a home, a bank account, a car or part of the assets of the entrepreur and business owner, we are seeing a kind of security that may be unnecessary and provides what may be excessive guarantees for the lender.

As the hon. member for Durham mentioned earlier, there is always an element of risk involved, and the lender should be prepared to share the risk. In this area, 15 per cent may be riskier than 10 per cent, especially in the case of new or high tech businesses, as we pointed out, but to ask for personal guarantees as well is something to which we object, and we hope the government considers and endorses this amendment.

Another direct advantage is that, if personal guarantees such as a house were not required as security under the Small Business Loans Act, because the government provides a guarantee to the bankers—these assets in the possession of the borrower, in the possession of the manager of the small business, particularly in the case of high tech or exporting companies, which make lenders feel insecure—if those assets were freed up and not used as security, they could be presented to lenders to facilitate obtaining a loan, as security in any negotiations or transactions other than those under the SBLA, the Small Business Loans Act.

The borrower could therefore use these personal assets not required as security to plan future business development, particularly in the case of small high tech or export businesses, where lenders might justifiably feel insecure about the operation or the very nature of the business' activities. Often lenders are not familiar with high tech and export businesses, whose accounts receivable are outside the country and not always easily checked.

The Export Development Corporation is involved as well, but here again with additional administrative costs and delays.

• (1155)

Thus, by eliminating the personal guarantees now required under the SBLA, they could be placed in another context for use by the borrower as security with a lender. This is what we hope the government will accept, and that is why we have presented this amendment.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is important for people to understand that to be eligible for a small business loan under the current system the loan has to be applied toward certain conditions. For example, it is not to be used for working capital; it is to be used for the purchase of equipment, leaseholds, things that have true and sustained value.

If a loan is in default under the Small Business Loans Act, that equipment has a value. It can be sold. When the value of that equipment or leaseholds that have been sold has been realized, the amount that is left over is subject to a 25 per cent personal guarantee.

For example, if one has a loan of $100,000 for equipment, under the Small Business Loans Act one has to have a minimum of approximately 15 per cent to 20 per cent. The amount of exposure right off the bat is $80,000. Of course, one is in the process of paying it down almost immediately because it is always part of a programmed return. If the business goes bad and it at least realizes half of the value of the equipment, then the owner's exposure on that $100,000 is approximately $30,000. Then, from a personal guarantee the owner is only exposed to 25 per cent of that.

Because of the way banks have been dealing in Canada traditionally, there is this mindset right now that when someone applies for a loan they want his or her home, RRSPs and life insurance as security. They want four and five times security for the loan. That is not what we are talking about here.

We are saying under the Small Business Loans Act the personal guarantee is limited to 25 per cent of the amount that is left over after everything has been liquidated. From a normal commercial business point of view I do not see that as a bad thing. It is a big improvement over the traditional type of security that banks would want on most other small business loans.

We are not going to support this motion. The bill is designed in a way that gives much greater flexibility. Once the loan repayment reaches a certain level, where there is security in the assets to cover the exposure, under the current act the personal guarantee, the 25 per cent, can be released. Once their exposure was reduced most banks would release the personal guarantee. I believe that is fair and that we should not change that aspect of the bill.

The member for Trois–Rivières has put forward good ideas and thought provoking points. However, on balance the design of the bill is quite solid and will probably do the job we intend it to do.

As this is the last motion, I should like to say that the industry committee is very good. It has had a very tight focus on the issue of access to capital by small business. This is the third time in less than three years the bill has been through the House of Commons. It was amended three years ago by the then Conservative government. By the way, it went through all three readings in the House in one day. We supported the Conservative government in amending the bill three years ago because we believed in the importance of the issue of access to capital and some kind of instrument that would act as a catalyst to sensitize the banks and to push the banks forward.

As much as I support the bill, I am becoming a little concerned that we are creating too much of a crutch for the banking institution. I listened to the critic from the Reform Party this morning. He mentioned that the float capacity in the last two years under the legislation had gone up from $3.5 billion to $12 billion. The total small business float last year for all financial institutions and small businesses in Canada was $28 billion. Now we are suddenly letting the small business float go up to $12 billion, and this is the one the crown guarantees.

In my judgment we are doing the work the banks should be doing. We are taking all the risks of decision making away from banks.

Mr. Hermanson: Why?

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): The member asks why we are doing it. It is because we realize that small business represents our greatest hope for taking people off unemployment insurance, taking them off welfare and getting them back into a productive state in life where they have dignity and are paying taxes. When we get this fiscal framework together small business represents our greatest hope. The greatest difficulty of small business is getting access to capital.

We are urging, hoping and coaxing banks to get into the small business game but it is not easy. We have to be a catalyst along the way. I am being very candid in my belief that we must have a heads up on the issue because we are essentially making the work of banks a lot easier by increasing the float to such a large amount and giving that guarantee. We had to do it to spark small business loans activity. It was not happening. What else are we to do? Are we to bring back the Bank Act and dictate to the banks to whom they should lend money? We cannot do that.

Mr. Strahl: We need more banks, more competition.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I hear from the Reform Party that we need more banks. I could not agree more. We need more competition in the banks. The problem is how we do that. If they know of a way or have a formula to create more competition for major financial institutions without putting the treasury of Canada at any greater risk we would be the first to listen. The minister responsible for financial institutions is in the House. He would love to hear how to create more competition for financial institutions within the framework of ensuring the financial exposure of the treasury is not put at greater risk.

• (1205)

The minister responsible for financial institutions is from the banking community but he is not from the establishment. He has always been a reformer—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): —and a challenger of the status quo of banks. He has always been there for small business. Speaking of the word reform, a number of us over here are quite proud to be called Liberal reformers.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we may have to stray again from the narrowness of the debate on the motion to amend the clause regarding security. Getting back to the motion before us, we must recognize that we need some rules or guidelines by which security may be varied as the loan is reduced. As the hon. member mentioned, it is only prudent after a loan has been reduced by a reasonable amount that we may want to release some of the security taken to grant the loan such as the person's house, car, equipment, office building and everything else.

These types of comments are appropriate to ensure that the financing of small businesses, if they want to raise additional capital at a later date, can be accommodated without being ground down by inappropriate rules and regulations when the loans have been reduced in an orderly fashion.

Speaking in a wider context on the bill, I mention again that I still do not think the point got across to hon. members opposite. They talk about the treasury's involvement as a catalyst for small business lending; about not wanting to put the treasury at too much risk but nonetheless having a role to play; and about the banks perhaps getting off too easy because of the Small Business Loans Act.

I reiterate that the bill will turn the Small Business Loans Act into a no cost service by the government. That strikes me as being strange. I cannot really understand the logic of it. The amendments to the act will require that borrowers carry the cost. Borrowers will have to pay a fee to the banks. The banks will take the fee and pass it on to the government. The government will take the money it has collected and reimburse the banks for what they have lost. That is the end of the line.

Who is left with the tab? The borrowers, the guys who are trying to create jobs, will be left holding the bill to subsidize those that tried but failed, to subsidize the banks that made a wrong decision and to let the government off the hook so that it can say what a wonderful service it is providing in that $12 billion of loans to small business have been guaranteed. Who is paying? It is not the government. It is a tax on successful small business borrowers who have had to pay an administrative fee in addition to interest to subsidize banks and let the government off the hook.

As I said before, and I will say it again, a dollar in the hands of an investor, a businessman or a consumer is far better spent than a dollar channelled through a bureaucrat. I cannot think of any greater illustration of the bill. It has been designed to fulfil the process we are absolutely opposed to. It will channel the money through a bureaucrat and back to the private sector at no cost to the government. Who ends up paying the bill? It is the private sector. The small businessman is being asked to carry an additional loan in the name of allowing the government to take credit for providing something it is not providing.

I am fully in favour of helping small business. I had an accounting business before I became a politician. I served small business people in my community. I was a fan and still am a fan of small businesses. They are the generators of employment. They are the innovators, the creators and the people who see a niche, develop it and make money. They are the ones who are the driving force of the economy, the ones we depend upon to employ people so that taxes can be paid. They are the people who have given us our standard of living and our prosperity.

Again they are being loaded down with another tax so the government can take credit for helping small business. Small businesses certainly need a hand. They need to be motivated as much as possible. We have to encourage lower taxation and encourage them to meet the new challenges because they are the ones who ultimately accept the risk. They are the ones who lose their life savings, their houses, their businesses and their investments; they lose everything. They are the ones who are prepared to put their financial lives on the line. Many do and unfortunately many fail.

As I have also said before and will say again, the cost of eliminating failure is equal to the price of success. We cannot have a success story without having some failures. Our challenge is to try to reduce the failures but we will never eliminate them.

If the government thinks by churning money through its books the system will be made better, I suggest we have a new method of rethinking how we are to motivate society, to live up to the challenges of the 21st century, to live up to the global economy, to market Canadian expertise and talent around the world and to generate an increased gross domestic product which will allow us to come to terms with our debt and our deficit.

These are the challenges we should be addressing, not the idea of smoke and mirrors through the SBLA.

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent among the parties to defer the vote just requested.

The Deputy Speaker: Under this section it is required that the whips of all parties agree. It is acceptable to all of the whips?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(7), the chief government whip with the agreement of the whips of all recognized parties has requested that the division on the question now before the House stand deferred until the end of Government Orders today, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TREATY COMMISSION ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission, as reported (without amendment) from the committee.

Hon. Jon Gerrard (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that the Bill C–107 be concurred in.

The Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Gerrard (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

• (1220)

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am proud today to initiate the final stage in the House of passing Bill C–107 into law. It is a day which I am pleased has come at last.

I am grateful for the non–partisan approach taken by parties opposite on this bill. The history of the British Columbia Treaty Commission has been one of partnership among people of diverse political stripes, and I am glad that spirit has continued in the House.

The tone set in this debate reflects and reinforces all of those who across the years and across party lines have joined hands in a common cause. That cause is simple: to bring justice to aboriginal peoples and certainty to British Columbia.

During the course of debate on the bill we have heard the historical incidents which have made the legislation necessary. We have seen that only a handful of First Nations in British Columbia ever signed treaties with the crown. As a result, 124 years after becoming a province, the key questions of aboriginal title over land and resources remain unresolved, and the majority of British Columbia remains subject to outstanding aboriginal land claims. With those claims come uncertainty and confusion.

We have also seen the historic step taken by the Government of British Columbia in 1990 to agree to the negotiation of treaties and the subsequent establishment of a task force to make recommendations on the process and mandate for treaty negotiations. We have heard of the key recommendation of that task force: the creation of an arm's length B.C. Treaty Commission.

Since its creation in 1992 the commission has received statements of intent to negotiate from 47 First Nations, representing over 70 per cent of First Nations in British Columbia. Clearly there was a need for this type of process, a need now being met.

Today we honour the commitment made by our predecessors to establish the commission in legislation. However, the bill is about more than just creating a certain status for the commission. It is about creating opportunity for all British Columbians.

Because the failure to deal with these issues has greatly limited opportunity in B.C., the uncertainty over ownership of land and resources has exacted a high cost. Uncertainty has meant lost investment.

The Price Waterhouse study, referenced in second reading debate, prepared in 1990 estimated that $1 billion in investment in the forestry and mining sectors had not occurred because of unresolved land claims. Three hundred jobs had not been created and $125 million in capital investments had not been made. Since the time of that study the price has continued to be paid year in and year out. It is a price we can no longer afford and it is a price we will no longer have to pay.

Settling land and resource issues will create an environment for investment and increased local economic activity. Therefore I commend members from all sides of the House for their support of the legislation. Certainty will be good news for the forest worker and the miner. Certainty will mean an expanded tax base, as the infusion of settlement funds stimulates economic activity and creates jobs. Certainty will mean lower social costs associated with poverty and unemployment in aboriginal communities. It will mean an end of conflict and litigation and the beginning of co–operation and negotiation.

• (1225)

The mandate of the B.C. Treaty Commission is straightforward. It is to facilitate, not negotiate, modern day treaties. Its main functions are to assess the readiness of parties to negotiate, allocate negotiation funding to aboriginal groups, assist parties to obtain dispute resolution services and monitor and report on the status of negotiations.

Because these negotiations will affect all British Columbians, we have established a province–wide consultation process so that all interests will still be heard.

This consultation process, as I indicated at an earlier stage of debate, operates at two levels. The first is a 31–member treaty negotiation advisory commission, which brings together the perspectives of municipalities, business, labour, fishing, wildlife, forestry and environmental groups to the treaty making process.

The second level brings the diverse interests of the various regions of B.C. to bear on the land claims process. Regional advisory committees are being struck in each treaty negotiation area so that local voices may be heard. These committees work directly with federal and provincial negotiating teams.

As land claims issues are resolved, the land base and access to resources they provide will establish a foundation on which aboriginal peoples can build self–sufficient communities. The growth of strong, self–reliant, economically vibrant aboriginal communities strengthens us all because it will bring positive economic spillover into non–aboriginal communities.

For too long the aboriginal peoples of British Columbia have been denied both their rights from the past and their hopes for the future. For too long we have denied ourselves the contributions they can make. With the rights and obligations clearly defined by treaties, all British Columbians, aboriginal and non–aboriginal, will be able to get on with realizing the potential of their province and expanding their opportunities for advancement.

On August 10 our government released its approach on the inherent right of aboriginal self–government and presented the principles which will guide the negotiations. In the case of British Columbia, the policy provides that negotiations on self–government will take place at the same table as discussions on land and resources. In other words, the process and structures already in place for treaty negotiations will also be used to negotiate self–government issues.

These two sets of discussions, self–government on one hand and land and resources use on the other, complement each other perfectly. Treaties will clarify and define the issues and self–government will establish the authority to manage them.

What this means is that for the first time the parties will be able to have all of their issues dealt with at one table, under one set of negotiations. This will be more cost effective, as it eliminates overlap and duplication and permits a much more comprehensive approach.

I spoke earlier of the high cost associated with leaving these issues in British Columbia unresolved. If the price is high for the general population, for aboriginal peoples it has been yet higher. For aboriginal peoples it has meant great hardship and grinding poverty. It has meant generations of frustration, of dreams deferred and promises unkept. It has meant a quality of life few of us can imagine and none of us should accept.

Some of those conditions are appalling. Diseases such as hepatitis and tuberculosis, virtually eradicated in the non–aboriginal population, persist in aboriginal communities. Death by fire is three and a half times the non–aboriginal level because of unsafe housing and the lack of proper sanitation. Aboriginal peoples are more than three times as likely to die a violent death and about twice as likely to die before the age of 65. The suicide rate among aboriginal peoples is 50 per cent higher than non–aboriginal peoples. That difference is even more pronounced in the 15 to 25 age group.

This country simply cannot afford to lose another generation of aboriginal peoples able and willing to make their contributions. We cannot afford to continue to condemn aboriginal peoples to lesser lives in a lesser land.

I do not mean to suggest that all of this will be magically solved with the passing of this legislation, but it will constitute a true beginning. It will take us off the rutted road of confrontation and litigation. It will send a signal to all parties that this is how we resolve problems in this country.

This legislation does several things. It ends uncertainty. It honours our obligations. It creates hope for tomorrow. It also does something else, something even more important. It confirms negotiation over confrontation, consultation over litigation. It stands as a vivid reminder of what can be achieved by men and women of understanding. It is an eloquent reminder that progress is possible, that persistence prevails. It is a testament to the simple fact that more can be achieved by joining hands than by shaking fists.

This must always be our approach but it is an approach which is by no means automatic. It is one we must work to adopt. That is why legislation such as this is so important. It creates a process and a forum for negotiation.

If we fail to demonstrate our resolve to negotiate, we leave the field and the resolution to those with little regard for the law to those who seek solutions through less democratic and less peaceful means.

We should not underestimate the historic qualities as well as the substantive importance of this bill. To all of those who have fought so hard for so long to see it through, I offer my admiration and appreciation. I again want to thank this House for its wisdom and its support.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to speak to Bill C–107 at third reading.

When this bill was at second reading, I talked about my very extraordinary trip to western Canada this year. I visited several First Nations in western Canada, including the Nisga'a, the Chilcotin and the Carrier–Sekani.

I will not go over this trip again, but I think it is important to address the situation of the Nisga'a because the current debate on the proposed legislation to recognize the British Columbia Treaty Commission has some precedents.

I think it is worth mentioning that the Nisga'a have succeeded in negotiating agreements, probably because of their perseverance and determination. They may be the precursors of what is before us today, which follows an act of the legislature of British Columbia and a resolution of a summit of official representatives of the First Nations.

All this was achieved, and we must, I think, recognize the Nisga'a's commitment to try to negotiate agreements.

• (1235)

When I visited the Nisga'a last summer, negotiations were unfortunately at a standstill and people were somewhat discouraged because these negotiations had been going on for 19 years; people were working very hard to get things moving again.

I am happy to see that things are starting to move again. Only 20 minutes ago, I talked with the chief negotiator, Nelson Leeson, who is chairman of the Nisga'a education committee and their negotiator in this matter. They have a negotiation meeting today and I will be happy to give the House a progress report on these talks.

But why spend so much time on the Nisga'a? Of course, they are precursors to the process we are reviewing today. But, moreover, the Nisga'a hold the key to negotiations in British Columbia. Most of the First Nations I met with last summer told me, "You know, Mr. Bachand, if the Nisga'a negotiations do not resume, the other nations will be wasting their time. It is useless; we will have no faith in the proposed process if we see that 19 years of negotiations have failed".

That is why it is important to always start our speeches on the British Columbia Treaty Commission by supporting the cause of the Nisga'a and what has been done so far.

Only 20 minutes ago, I was given a brief update on the negotiations. I can report that there does not seem to be a problem with self–government for instance. Ninety–eight per cent of the objectives relating to self–government were achieved.

A final agreement on self–government is imminent. One stumbling block seems to be fisheries, and commercial fisheries in particular, because of licensing requirements and, unfortunately, as we known, fish stocks are dwindling. Fishing licences have been issued and licensing authorities are looking into the possibility of transferring a number of them to first nations. As we speak, there is a bit of a problem there.

This matter has not yet been settled for good. Another major problem is the apparent lack of firm offers concerning land claims. Many difficulties emerged regarding land claims. I will explain in a moment. At times, B.C. columnists even suggested that it made no sense, as first nations ended up claiming 125 per cent of the territory because of overlap. So, there is a great deal of qualifying to do there.

I think that both provincial and federal authorities might be afraid of giving up too much land. All of this needs to be put in perspective. That is how negotiations go; it is better to start by asking for a little more rather than a little less.

The Nisga'a are one case where, as I will explain in a moment also, the Supreme Court of Canada recognized that they indeed had title to all the lands they claimed. As we will see in a moment, the Nisga'as are claiming self–government and title over only 8 per cent of their claim site and certain things already granted by the Supreme Court of Canada.

I felt it was important to open the debate on the Nisga'a case. In British Columbia, there are some 200 reserves. There is a very rich aboriginal culture in that province, with 200 native reserves or communities and eight language groups. In addition, aboriginal people who share common interests often get together in groups known as regional councils or band councils. There are nearly 30 such aboriginal councils.

This goes to show that aboriginal culture is pervasive and very strong in British Columbia. It came as a surprise to me. We are not used to seeing every second store on main street a native one, as is the case in Vancouver for instance.

• (1240)

This shows how predominant the aboriginal culture is in that part of the country. It is important to do a bit of history here. At one time, that region was one of the most populated on the American continent. Europeans settled there 140 years ago. Yet, and unlike in other parts of the country, only 15 agreements were signed during that period in western Canada.

Fourteen of these treaties relate to Vancouver Island. They were signed by the Hudson's Bay Company. These are pre–Confederation treaties, dating back to before 1867. The only post–Confederation treaty is Treaty No. 8, signed in 1899. In central Canada, treaties were numbered from one to ten. Only one of these treaties, namely Treaty No. 8, relates to British Columbia and part of Alberta.

Treaties were also signed elsewhere in Canada, including some in Quebec, such as the Murray treaty, as well as other important ones. However, it seems that, during those 140 years, people tried to avoid negotiating anything in western Canada. They did not wish to recognize the contribution of aboriginal peoples to the European culture. They did not want to negotiate,so they just ignored the issue. Ultimately, that approach brought about more serious problems. Indeed, problems do not go away if you bury your head in the sand or ignore them.

It is important to keep that historical context in mind. Over time, some changes were made.

As I said earlier, the Nisga'a helped clear the road to negotiation. The Calder case was probably instrumental in the negotiation of territorial claims. At the time, in 1973, the decision was hailed as a victory for aboriginals, since the Supreme Court confirmed their claim on aboriginal titles.

Following that decision, the federal government came to the conclusion that, since the Supreme Court had ruled that the claims on aboriginal titles were valid, it might as well start negotiating. Negotiations slowly got underway and the Nisga'a were the first ones to participate in the process.

There were other historic advances in terms of aboriginal values and culture and negotiations with aboriginal peoples, including the patriation of the Constitution in 1982, and I am referring to the often quoted section 35, which contains some recognition and affirmation of the existence of aboriginal, Inuit and Metis rights and treaties.

Of course there were other decisions that point out that a treaty is not necessarily a contract as we know it. It is not necessarily a document bearing the signatures of Europeans and aboriginal peoples. In many cases the oral aspect of treaties is recognized. This is not to say that aboriginal peoples were illiterate, because that is not the case. They had their own language, their own linguistic roots, but the language of the white man was not like theirs, and so when they had to sign a treaty, they would say: "We agree; let us have a verbal agreement, since we cannot sign in your language, the way you sign".

For me it would be like signing a contract with the Inuit. I do not know whether you ever saw Inuktitut, but I would not know what I was signing, and I think that is what happened at the time. The courts in their wisdom judged that treaties have a certain oral value; it is not only the signature that counts.

So in 1982 this was recognized by section 35 of the Constitution. In 1989, political action was stepped up, especially in British Columbia. It was decided to create a Department of Indian Affairs. This was quite a step. The government had no one who was responsible for conducting negotiations with the aboriginal people, although the problem had been around for 100 or 120 years.

In 1989, they really started to tackle the problem in British Columbia by establishing the Department of Indian Affairs.

• (1245)

Furthermore, the Premier of the province appointed a Premier's council for aboriginal affairs. So there was a new awareness following all the legal discussions and the problems generated by a failure to negotiate, problems that were becoming increasingly obvious. A decision was finally made to sit down and deal with the matter once and for all.

The cabinet urged the provincial government to change its past policies. In 1989, the Premier's council told the government: "Listen, we have to change our attitude and our perception of negotiating, which is 120 years old and which has meant we simply ignored the problems". So they sat down and started to settle land claims. At that point they set up a task force, which I see as the predecessor of the commission we are discussing today. They set up a task force whose members identified the need to conclude creative and far–sighted treaties with the First Nations, the provincial government and the federal government.

The treaties had to include three parties: the First Nations, the federal government with its fiduciary responsibility for the First Nations, and the provincial government, because it was often on provincial land that the federal government exercised powers in areas that were the responsibility of the province. The report called for a new partnership to recognize the importance of Canada's natives and First Nations, based on voluntary, properly conducted talks in which the natives, the province and the federal governments would negotiate as equals.

The agreement in principle between the three parties I referred to earlier—the federal government, the province and the First Nations—was signed in September 1992. The legal entity empowered to sign for the First Nations is called the summit. This agreement implements the 19 recommendations made by the task force, including Recommendation No. 3. That is why I referred to it as a precedent earlier.

Recommendation No. 3 of the task force was to form a British Columbia treaty commission, which was done. The agreement also outlined the commission's role, mandate and operation. The purpose of Bill C–107 is to establish this commission on a legal basis. On May 26, 1993, the province followed up by tabling a proposal to create the commission. It has already passed an act to that effect. As for the First Nations Summit, it has already ratified the proposal through a recommendation signed by summit participants.

The parties were willing to go ahead. The only thing missing was the federal legislation before us today, which, I hope, will be passed as soon as possible, although some of the work has already started. I think it is important for the House to adopt this legislation once and for all, to prove that the third signatory to these agreements, the federal government, is acting properly, and that is the purpose of the bill before us today.

So why should we negotiate treaties? I think that we should put things in their historical context. Commissioners have pointed out that, if the role of treaties and their historical context were explained clearly to B.C. residents, they would be much more open to the land claim settlement process. In my introduction, I talked about overlapping land claims covering 125 per cent of the territory.

Just the same, there are individuals who are, in my opinion, adding fuel to the fire in B.C. right now by saying: "Look, we cannot give the natives the whole thing". I must stress the fact that this is an initial bargaining position. I believe the provincial government promised to reply: "Look, we cannot give you more than 5 per cent of the land. We shall see".

In other words, the federal government's opening position is five per cent, as opposed to 125 per cent for the First Nations. As usual in any negotiation they will settle somewhere in the middle. For the time being, I think that what matters is that the government sit across the First Nations at the negotiation table, listen to what they are asking for and see what we can offer. That is when negotiations are most valuable.

It is also very important that treaties be negotiated to prevent challenge strategies. Events like those that took place at Gustafsen Lake or, in Quebec, at Oka and Kanesatake, must not be allowed to happen again if it can at all be helped.

It is therefore important that people see soon that the legal dispute and tangle can soon be resolved once and for all, not by force, endless legal controversy or roadblocks, but rather through negotiation.

At present, in B.C., there are even non–native groups that are quite familiar with the negotiation process and are siding with the natives to force the appropriate authorities to reach agreements once and for all, in the hope of avoiding unfortunate incidents such as roadblocks and illegal land occupation, which often lead to disaster and crystallization in relations between natives and non–natives.

Why negotiate treaties? To avoid confrontation and promote a peaceful settlement around negotiation tables.

In that context, the role of the commission is to facilitate the negotiation of treaties. It does not participate directly in negotiations, but, if they stall, it must step in, try to sort out the problem and basically serve as a mediator by bringing parties together.

The commission is made up of five commissioners. This is important. Two of these commissioners are appointed by the First Nations Summit. This is almost a majority, since one commissioner is appointed by the federal government and one by the provincial government, while the chief commissioner is selected by these four commissioners. The chief commissioner will be selected because of his expertise and may often be an aboriginal who has a great deal of knowledge regarding treaty negotiations. Consequently, aboriginals will have a strong representation.

The commission approves the participation of first nations and organizes an initial meeting between the parties. I will explain this six–stage process and discuss it at length later. It is interesting to note that, when the parties meet for the first time, traditional ceremonies often take place. This helps government officials become acquainted with aboriginal culture. It is also a way for aboriginals to show that there is no animosity. Their culture includes certain traditions, which are quite fascinating. Often, inviting someone to a traditional ceremony is a gift, as well as an indication of the open–mindedness of aboriginal people. Such ceremonies are common procedure during initial meetings.

The commission then puts in place the structures that will ensure smooth negotiations. Obviously, the commission has certain tools available to it. It can provide loans and contributions to first nations. The program is funded by both levels of government. The commission also provides expertise to solve disputes and ensure progress in the negotiations. This is more or less the role of mediator to which I alluded earlier. Finally, the commission acts as keeper of the process.

It goes without saying that it does not participate in treaty negotiations. None of the commissioners sits at the negotiating table with a nation which has opted to use the BC Treaty Commission process.

The Commission is also required to produce annual reports. According to the first report, apparently, 42 first nations, groups or tribal councils have indicated a desire to establish negotiations. It should be pointed out that the Nisga'a will not fall under the commission's jurisdiction, because both levels of government have agreed that the negotiations had been long underway. Because they were so far advanced, there was no question of their being started over again or integrated at the stage they had reached. The decision was made to move ahead.

I have already told you what stage the negotiations had reached. The aboriginal nations of British Columbia breathed a great sigh of relief to see that the negotiations with the Nisga'a are moving forward.

Before I begin to talk about the six distinct steps in the process, I must also point out the optional nature of the process. In other words, a BC nation can decide not to make use of this negotiating mechanism but to explore other paths. To date, however, it seems that the first nations are greeting the process with a great deal of approval and are readily integrating themselves into the process.

• (1255)

The first step of the process is to file a statement of intent to negotiate. The First Nation concerned identifies itself, the people it will represent, its geographic area, and the territory it claims as its ancestral land. It appoints a resource person with whom the two levels of government will get in touch. Often, the important thing in negotiations is to know who to contact in case there is a hitch or if further details are required. In the first step of the process, it is clearly specified that the First Nations must meet these conditions.

The second step consists in preparing for negotiations. A first meeting must be held within 45 days of the first contact. As I pointed out earlier, this first meeting is usually held on the ancestral land. It starts with a traditional ceremony to which the negotiators and the various observers involved are invited.

At this stage, the First Nation is asked to appoint a negotiator with a full and specific mandate. It must get resources from the commission, adopt a ratification process, and identify the substantive and procedural issues to be negotiated.

Another very important point is that it must identify and file its claims on its ancestral lands. Reference was made earlier to overlapping aboriginal land claims. Negotiating first nations are required to consult neighbouring nations to make sure that their land claim does not encroach on other nations' claims. It is important that this be done early on, and negotiations cannot resume as long as this requirement is not met.

Governments must also consult non–natives and ensure that appropriate information is gathered. This too is important in my view because all the people living on a first nation's ancestral lands are not necessarily native people. There may also be non–natives, European families who, in many cases, settled there many decades ago, perhaps 120 years ago, sometimes at the very beginning of the colony.

There people feel rather insecure. That is why this is so important. At this stage of the game, commissioners should be consulting non–natives and gathering information to be prepared to answer any question that may come their way.

Once the commission is satisfied that the three parties to the negotiations meet the requirements, negotiations on the master agreement begin. Stage 3 is the negotiation of a master agreement. At this stage negotiation goals and objectives are set and a time frame suggested, but of all the negotiations under way none have gone further than stage 3.

In fact, none of the 42 first nations I mentioned earlier, which are taking part in the process, have gone past stage 3. The closest one is the Nisga'a. Earlier today, I spoke to Chief Leeson, who told me that they hope to sign an agreement in principle before Christmas. Although such an agreement would not be binding, they hope to have it. Even though this is an unusual process, some form of negotiations existed before. The Nisga'a are now at the agreement in principle stage, and they hope to have such an agreement before Christmas. We all hope that they do.

Negotiating an agreement in principle means negotiating substantive issues. For example, it means finalizing the agreements on self–government and territorial claims, defining the real basis of the treaty that will follow, and discussing what is to be included in that treaty. This all takes place at stage 4.

Stage 5 involves the negotiations to finalize a treaty. This is the stage at which a treaty officializes the content of the agreement in principle. All that was agreed to is finally put together and confirmed in a treaty. Following that stage, the treaty is signed and officially ratified.

Stage 6 is, of course, the implementation of the final treaty.

I must mention here a criticism that was made. Some aboriginal nations told me that, indeed, negotiation, and not confrontation, was the way of the future. However, given this series of stages and the fact that it took 19 years for the Nisga'a to reach stage four, some think that setting up the British Columbia Treaty Commission is a delaying tactic.

That criticism must be pointed out. I share that concern, to some extent. However, it seems to me that the investment made in establishing the commission is worth it, in terms of both time and ideas put forward. I think this is better than letting each community in British Columbia, and there are 200, progress at its own pace, which would hardly be conducive to orderly negotiations. Some people might use this as an excuse to say: Listen, next door they are getting nowhere fast and the same here, so we do not want to negotiate any more.

In this way the process is more uniform. Perhaps it will take a little longer, but I think it is worth it, and time will tell us we were right. Treaties will be signed on a peaceful basis, and I think the confrontation that has existed in British Columbia for 120 years will finally disappear. Time will tell us we were right and that negotiating is more important than protests.

Of the 43 First Nations participating in the process today, 14 have finished stage one. Seven have finished stage two and are now negotiating a framework agreement, 11 have basically finished stage two; according to the commissioners, these 18 First Nations are expected to reach stage four by 1995–96.

The process is picking up speed, and it is a process that is supported by the First Nations and will become fully operational in the months to come.

No group has yet finished stage four. I also want to say that the First Nations have my full support. If they ever reach an impasse, in a democracy, in the House of Commons, there is an official opposition, and I want to take this opportunity to tell people, and I admit it has happened before, that when negotiations reach an impasse, the First Nations of British Columbia can count on my full support. I could intervene within the limits set in a democracy, by going to the minister or the provincial authorities to ensure negotiations are successful.

Incidentally, I also looked up some recommendations the commission made in its annual report, which I feel are important.

The first recommendation made by the commissioners is that federal legislation should be passed and federal and provincial laws ratified as soon as possible to give the British Columbia Treaty Commission the status of a corporate entity. That is what we are doing today. The commission will be recognized as a corporate entity once we have passed Bill C–107.

The second recommendation is also very important. The commissioners recommend that the parties to the agreement and the negotiating parties continue to make every effort to ensure that the public is better informed and that the parties to the agreement are more involved in educating the public. Any initiative in this respect is to take place at the provincial, regional and local levels.

This is one thing the Nisga'a pointed out to me the last time I was there. They told me it was important to get a lot more information out to the public, because there are people whose interests do not coincide with those of the First Nations and who, as I said earlier, were fanning the flames of controversy. They claim that land claims cover 125 per cent of the province, that aboriginal people want all the land, and so forth.

The Nisga'a saw to it that their part of the contract was fulfilled, that is to say they informed non aboriginals and the population in general of the appropriate nature of their claims, of the appropriateness of dealing with them on the same footing. I think they did just that. But from what I know about the process to date, the federal and provincial governments have not made much progress in raising public awareness of the relevancy of the process I explained just now.

• (1305)

If the process is properly explained and the people of British Columbia can be confident that the aboriginal people do not pose a threat, this should speed up the process, preparing the ground for negotiation.

It is important to acknowledge that, if the climate for negotiations is propitious, the process progresses a lot better than if it is tense and government officials are told, "Now listen, we cannot go too fast because our people are not all that much in favour".

It is very important for this public awareness to be, not just maintained, but stepped up, particularly by governments.

Another recommendation which struck me, and I feel I must raise it here, is that the Government of Canada and the Government of British Columbia use all methods of consultation available to them to let the community as a whole know that it has been understood and its concerns taken into account.

My colleague has just spoken of a degree of uncertainty. There are all kinds of companies out there, and what struck me on my last trip was the speed with which natural resources are being taken out of the area. It is as if the companies on these ancestral lands said: "We are in a race, because once these lands are transferred to the native people, we will not be able to continue our present operations".

I saw up to 500 logging trucks a day coming off Chilcotin, Nisga'a and Carrier–Sekani land. That really impressed me. It really disappointed me as well, and I even mentioned it to the Premier of British Columbia and to the Minister of Indian Affairs. To my mind, those forests were being clear cut and would have a hard time recovering. Moreover, for the trees coming out of B.C. of late, no money is going to the first nations.

It seems to me, that the whole question of natural resource use could be included in the upcoming treaty discussions. In fact, we are looking into the possibility of joint management in the House standing committee. We will therefore conclude our work, but, in the meantime, I think it important to point out to the principal groups using natural resources, particularly, that there is no danger, in our opinion.

The taxes they currently pay to use these resources could be paid to the native peoples rather than to the provincial or federal governments. This is the sort of discussion being held, and I think it important that these financial groups be part of the process and not consider negotiations on these ancestral lands as a threat to their business. The entire community must know this as must the special interest groups.

In conclusion—I see my time is just about up—our objective is to put an end to 140 years of injustice. We are very lucky that the first nations have this mentality of sharing. You know that, when the Europeans appeared, regardless of where in Canada they appeared, the native peoples always said: "Look, the land belongs to everyone, so let us share it together".

We have been lucky up to now to have the use of this land, but I think an injustice has been done to the native peoples in their being confined to small reserves with few natural resources and not enough of a land base to enable them to take control of their lives.

The extent of their dependency is rather outrageous, in my opinion, because they are always depending on government grants. This means they are unable to really fly on their own and to take control of their lives. I think the process before us today will enable them to take off. We are lucky, as I said earlier, that they have agreed to share this land with us without violent challenges. We have had some of late, but they have to stop. We cannot have them.

• (1310)

The most logical and sure way to avoid any reoccurrences of such unfortunate situations is the process of negotiation before us.

So let us avoid roadblocks and events such as at Gustafsen Lake and Oka. Let us exchange aggression and argument for discussion and negotiation.

I wish the first nations of British Columbia good luck. The Bloc Quebecois will support Bill C–107.

[English]

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the B.C. Treaty Commission.

I noticed at the beginning of the previous speaker's speech he talked quite a bit about the Nisga'a negotiations. I would like to point out that the Nisga'a negotiations are not part of the B.C. treaty process under the B.C. Treaty Commission as they predate it and are not subject to the same terms of reference.

There has been a high degree of increased public awareness of the ramifications of the B.C. treaty negotiations in the last two years in British Columbia. It has now risen to be the number one issue in the public mind in British Columbia.

The opposition political parties at the provincial level are adopting treaty policies very different from what has gone on up until now and very different from the federal government. There are concerns about the costs and the length of time the negotiations are going to be taking. There are concerns regarding the negotiating mandate of the two senior levels of government. There are also concerns regarding the consultation and ratification process for any negotiated treaties.

As we talked about the Nisga'a agreement earlier, this is a precedent setting agreement outside of the B.C. treaty process and at this point it will not necessarily be adopted by an incoming B.C. government. We are in the circumstance of having a government that is currently in the last year of its mandate and the other two major parties vying for government have made that statement.

Against this backdrop of a precedent setting negotiation which has largely been cloaked in secrecy and mystery, that is the Nisga'a negotiations, we do have this B.C. treaty process. The terms of reference for the Nisga'a negotiations certainly allow for a much greater degree of openness than has been demonstrated to date. In an overall context, this is not a good start.

Some of the history of the B.C. Treaty Commission is that in December 1991 British Columbia accepted all the recommendations of a task force. Those recommendations led to Canada and B.C. beginning formal negotiations on the roles and responsibilities of the two governments within treaty negotiations, including cost sharing. This was culminated in March 1992.

In September 1992, Canada, B.C. and the First Nations Summit leadership formally supported the establishment of a B.C. treaty commission and signed a B.C. treaty commission agreement. In April 1993 commissioners were appointed on an interim basis by provincial and federal orders in council and by First Nations Summit resolution.

In May 1993 the provincial legislation received royal assent which was pending federal legislation. The Governments of Canada and British Columbia then successfully concluded cost sharing negotiations in June 1993. This allowed for the treaty commission to open its doors in December 1993.

Virtually all of these actions, save the very last, occurred prior to the last federal election in October 1993.

Currently an estimated 77 per cent of the British Columbia bands are involved and signed up in this process. There are 196 bands in British Columbia. As I mentioned earlier, the Nishga negotiations are completely outside of the B.C. treaty process. All the remaining bands in British Columbia that are not a part of the B.C. treaty process have no option: they either go with the B.C. treaty process or there is no other negotiating option for them. Those are the terms of reference. This is problematic for those 23 per cent of B.C. bands that have concerns and do not want to enter into the process.

There is one major omission, which is not mandated by Bill C–107, which we are discussing today, and that is the consultation process. There has been a separate set of agreements. In July 1993 the federal and provincial governments announced the establishment of a 31–member treaty negotiation advisory committee to advise ministers in the treaty negotiations. That committee is not referred to in any way, shape, or form in Bill C–107. It has no recognition. In addition, regional advisory committees are being struck in each treaty negotiation area to represent local interests. There is much unhappiness about the consultation process and about the ratification process at this time.

I would like to point out that in the term of this 35th Parliament we have had previous legislation dealing with aboriginal issues. We have had the Yukon self–government and land claims agreements. We have had the Sahtu agreement in the western Arctic. We have had the Pictou Landing compensation agreement in Nova Scotia for environmental damage at the reserve level. We have had the Split Lake compensation agreement in Manitoba. Now we have this enabling legislation which has been very late in following the provincial legislation and the agreement.

The reason I mentioned all of that is because each of these bills, every piece of aboriginal legislation that has come before the House in this 35th Parliament, predates the last federal election in terms of when the agreements were reached. There has not been one piece of legislation from this department in this Parliament.

In preparing to look at Bill C–107, one of the necessary steps is to talk to legislative counsel. Legislative counsel advises that no legislative changes are possible to Bill C–107 because neither the federal nor provincial governments can make unilateral changes, and the B.C. Treaty Commission agreement, the tripartite agreement between the federal, provincial and First Nations Summit, which was signed in September 1992, and also the provincial enabling legislation override the ability to make changes. The only way a change could be made is if those agreements were also changed. This is really a reverse onus on this Parliament in many respects.

I have some concerns about this bill many of which are quite basic. Who would enter into an agreement in which there is no satisfactory amending clause? Who would enter into an agreement in which there is no satisfactory cancellation clause? In both cases this bill comes up lacking. The agreement leads one to assume a lot.

If a band enters into the process it receives funding that is 80 per cent repayable upon completion of negotiations. In effect they are being given a loan to set off against the eventual settlement package. The agreement is silent in terms of what happens to these moneys should the band or the tribal council not complete negotiations. The act is also silent about those bands that do not enter into the process and may not want to enter into the process. There is no alternative open to them.

The First Nations Summit organization and their appointment of representatives is open to any band whether they are participating or not. I find this a little strange. It is a very fluid thing. They are not elected. It is very difficult to pin down. The compensation packages for the summit commissioners have no transparency whatsoever in terms of the arrangements for these appointments or the compensation for these appointments.

Clause 22 of the proposed act states that nothing in the act prevents the three parties from amending the agreement of September 1992. I mentioned this earlier. This is very problematic because this very agreement has been shown to compromise Parliament's ability to amend the very act we are being asked to pass at third reading. Therefore this is an unacceptable reverse onus, in my view.

I have other concerns. The municipal level of government is not recognized in the act. They are simply a sidebar arrangement through the provincial negotiators. Also, funding of recognized interests beyond the bands is not addressed in the act. There is $15.3 million a year going into funding of the aboriginal negotiating parties. Right now, through the provincial government the municipalities are receiving $250,000 per year. They have many concerns about that.

From their meeting last month, the Union of B.C. Municipalities is certainly expressing great displeasure about what this process has done. They have a responsibility to take part to represent their interests. They have no choice but to get involved because they are very much impacted. The 10 regional groups that now represent municipal interests in the treaty talks are capped at a $250,000 funding level. According to the Union of B.C. Municipalities, the municipalities are having to fund this thing out of local taxpayer funds to make up the difference.

The federal and provincial governments have spent more than $30 million on the negotiations since they began in 1993. Some of the municipalities in the lower mainland have competing aboriginal claims. Rather than having to deal with one set of claims, they have to deal with multiple claims over the same piece of ground. This is becoming very expensive for the municipalities. It is an unfair burden and one that should be addressed in this bill. The bill is silent on the municipal role.

There is no reference in the bill to readiness guidelines for the regional advisory committees. They are not in the terms of reference of the B.C. Treaty Commission. This has proven to be very problematic as well.

• (1325)

We have readiness guidelines for the other parties but not for the advisory groups at the local level. Because the readiness guidelines are not there, there is a tendency for senior governments and the negotiating parties to set a few people in place at the local level and then carry on with negotiations. As the keeper of the process, the B.C. Treaty Commission should have terms of reference that also include readiness guidelines for the consultation groups. That is not addressed. It is not there. And because it is not there this is not happening.

It was identified in the 1993 and 1994 B.C. Treaty Commission annual reports that there was no federal enabling legislation for the B.C. Treaty Commission. As as result, the B.C. Treaty Commission had major concerns. I asked what the reason was for the lengthy delay in bringing forth the federal legislation. Apparently it is related to summit concerns over the wording of one clause in the bill. I have to ask: How can one party's concern over one clause hang up or protract this legislation for more than two years?

The province has negotiated interim agreements which have compromised the B.C. Treaty Commission process. The B.C. Treaty Commission made that statement in its 1993 annual report. The bill does not empower the B.C. Treaty Commission to deal with that kind of concern.

In summary, Canada and British Columbia have budgeted $77.6 million over the period from 1994–95 to 1997–98 to the process. Given the weaknesses inherent in the bill, I will not be able to support the legislation.

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to join in the third reading debate on Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the B.C. Treaty Commission. It is helpful to have the co–operation of the opposition members in support of the bill.

The events of the last few months, whether in B.C. or elsewhere, are convincing that issues of aboriginal rights and land claims can only be resolved through negotiation. It is very important to get on with the process. The sooner we can get the land claims settled the faster we can get on with economic development and other government issues.

I want to talk about the process upon which we have embarked in British Columbia and also about the importance of the economic development aspects, which need to coincide with this process, and the role in particular, in view of my position as Secretary of State for Science, Research and Development, of science and technology, in promoting economic development for First Nations people.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has recently visited British Columbia several times, the latest being November 24. During the summer he met with the First Nations Summit to report on the inherent right of self–government policy and he formally signed two of the four framework agreements. The signing of framework agreements with the Champagne and Aishihik, the Sechelt and the Gitksan–Wet'suwet'en First Nations are visible examples of the benefits and results of resolving these issues through negotiation.

Many other First Nations are working on framework agreement negotiations or completing the readiness stage. The government is committed to moving negotiations to conclusion rather than pursuing endless negotiations. That is evident from these recently signed agreements.

About 140 of the almost 200 B.C. First Nations want to sit at the table with federal and provincial governments to solve these issues. That represents over 70 per cent of the First Nations of British Columbia. Of the 47 nations in the process 25 have completed the readiness requirements. In 12 of those the 2 governments have also met our readiness requirements and 9 have completed or are working on framework agreements.

Clearly this process deserves the support of the House so that it can continue toward its goal of reaching acceptable, affordable and fair settlements.

It is important to note that we need fair settlements for all British Columbians and for all Canadians. That is the basis on which we must work.

It is important that third party interests be well taken care of in this process and indeed they are being taken care of. The British Columbia Treaty Commission process is the product of extensive consultations. In 1990 the federal and provincial governments established a task force to come up with a made in British Columbia approach to map out a negotiation process that could accommodate the many First Nations in British Columbia that wanted to negotiate settlements.

The recommendations of the task force were accepted by both governments and the representatives of the First Nations. One of the key recommendations was the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission as an independent keeper of the process.

The task force also made several recommendations on public information and education as well as on consultation. The members recognize that treaty negotiations will succeed if both aboriginal and non–aboriginal communities understand why we need treaties and what those treaties mean.

As the negotiations for framework agreements proceed, governments must obtain background information on the communities, people and interests likely to be affected by the negotiations and establish mechanisms for consultation with non–aboriginal interests. These are among the criteria the treaty commission considers when it assesses the readiness of the parties to begin working toward a framework agreement.

In other words the commission will not give the green light to negotiate unless proper consultation mechanisms are in place. There is already a province–wide treaty negotiation advisory committee which my colleague spoke of but for each claim regional and even local committees are established, and these committees are becoming more and more active as parties move into the framework negotiations.

To date there are advisory committees up and running in Bulkley–Skeena, in Lilloolet–Pemberton, Westbank–Kelowna, the Lower Mainland, on Southeast Vancouver island, the west coast of Vancouver Island and the Sunshine Coast.

Regional advisory committees are also being formed in Central Cariboo, Kitimat–Skeena, Central Coast, the Desolation Sound area and in the Prince George and Nechako Valley. Clearly third party interests are a central part of the treaty making process in British Columbia.

It seems the demands of some to halt the negotiation process seem aimed at avoiding the issue rather than finding workable and honourable agreements.

The government remains firmly committed to negotiating treaties with First Nations across Canada where needed. We will stay focused on that objective because it is the only way uncertainty can be ended and all British Columbians can benefit.

I will speak for a few minutes on the importance of this process in going forward in economic development and in particular in the potential in the area of science and technology and telecommunications for economic development for First Nations people in British Columbia and elsewhere.

It is important we get through this process, that we sort out the settlements and finalize the situation. It is also important that we start building the economic framework and in particular the telecommunications. The telecommunications, the information highway infrastructure which the government has promoted from the moment we were elected is vitally important for communities in rural and remote regions of Canada and particularly for First Nations communities.

• (1335)

As we outlined early on in our mandate, this information highway infrastructure is essential for jobs and learning in rural areas. It is essential we move quickly in areas of access and it is fundamentally important that we move quickly in developing Canadian content. We need aboriginal First Nation content so First Nations people are not only receivers but providers of content in an increasingly important way.

One major effort we have made is in the SchoolNet process. This process is one to which we are committed to ensure that schools in all First Nations communities are linked to SchoolNet and to the Internet and can join the information highway as one important step not only in learning but in community development as we have moved into the community access program.

In British Columbia there are some important advantages in technology becoming available with ATM networks giving broad band, multimedia access on the information highway.

As recently as last week I was in British Columbia to announce the establishment of the telelearning network centre of excellence, linking communities across Canada and centred at Simon Fraser University. The development of teaching materials on the information highway using the worldwide web and other multimedia tools will enable delivery of learning and jobs at a distance.

In this context it is important to realize a big change is occurring. Universities like Simon Fraser are already putting courses on to the worldwide web so they can be taken from anywhere around the world. In a few years a number of courses will be dramatically increased and therefore the possibility of taking courses and learning materials from anywhere in Canada, from any First Nations community in Canada, will be there and realized.

The people at Simon Fraser are already working on the possibility of having all courses on the worldwide web by the year 2000. If that happens, what a remarkable achievement and what important new access to learning and post–secondary education it would give to people across Canada.

There is another side to the question. Even as the learning material becomes more available it is now more possible and more important to develop learning materials based in and coming from the First Nations people of Canada. This is also an important objective of the SchoolNet program and an important objective of economic development, to enable teaching materials to be shared from one First Nations community to another to develop content and learning materials which can be very important as cultural expression for First Nations people into the next century.

As we proceed in settling land claims, providing the framework, it is also important we proceed with economic development, with the information highway so that it will allow people across the country and particularly First Nations people access to the information they need when they need it and where they need it.

This will allow better management of natural resources and a remarkable new array of economic development opportunities and jobs, particularly in remote locations, as is already starting to happen in small communities in northern British Columbia and remote communities in Newfoundland, setting up businesses on the information highway and worldwide web and to operate around the world.

It is a very different world from what we have lived in, one fundamental reason it is important to move quickly to settle land claims so we can move forward in development, learning and in new possibilities.

• (1340)

I urge my hon. colleagues to show support for this process, which will bring certainty to the province of British Columbia and renewed hope and prosperity to the people of British Columbia and particularly First Nations' people.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to my hon. colleague's comments. He said the whole business of the Indian question and what to do about land claims, self–government and these types of issues will be resolved only through negotiation.

That is true. That is something we can all agree on. However, if that is true, why have so many of the Indian bands in British Columbia either backed away from this process or not participated to begin with?

One of the reasons we are opposed to this treaty process is that the only examples we can see are the ones history has taught us. Treaties enshrine special rights. They enshrine racism because certain rights are attributed to one group of Canadians based solely on their race.

The Reform Party believes the ultimate goal of any negotiations, as the hon. member said and I agree, is we must get to the point at which we can negotiate an end to these issues and put them to rest. The end goal must be the equality of all Canadian citizens, not further inequality, not enshrining inequality in agreements.

Another point is the finality. We believe on this side of the House these must be final agreements. They must bring about extinguishment of special rights and they must be final.

Once again when we look at history and at what happened with the settlements in the northern territories, we do not see that finality. Rather there are clauses in those agreements whereby any future negotiations that bring about benefits south of 60 could also accrue to those bands that have already completed negotiations in the territories. We do not have finality. Canadians do not know what the final bill will be.

One of the reasons the Charlottetown accord was defeated was the ambiguity of the Indian questions. In other words, what did native self–government really mean? How would it come about?

I heard my hon. colleague putting forward the Reform perspective that what we need is a very clear definition of whether self–government will be based on a municipal model or some third level of government. These are the types of questions Canadians want answered.

Where is the involvement of the third party during these negotiations, private landowners? There are a whole bunch of questions not answered and not adequately addressed by this treaty negotiation process presently under way and which this bill would enshrine.

In a constituent survey in my spring householder I asked a number of questions on native land claims because I wanted feedback from the citizens of Prince George—Peace River. The first question was: Does government have an obligation to negotiate modern day treaties with natives?

This is exactly what we are talking about today with this bill. It is interesting that although the returns were low, the sample size was low, of the more than 500 people who returned the questionnaire two to one voted no. They said we are not obligated to negotiate treaties.

For that reason and the others I outlined I will be joining with my Reform colleagues in opposition to this bill.

• (1345)

Mr. Gerrard: Mr. Speaker, let me rise to reply to the questions raised by the hon. member.

It is fundamental that we have a process of negotiation. It is also important that we have a framework so that there are not 200 separate processes going on simultaneously in British Columbia. We need a framework in which we can negotiate with British Columbia First Nations in order to move this process forward as rapidly as possible.

More than 70 per cent of the First Nations in British Columbia are involved in the process. Therefore, the concern that huge numbers will be left out will likely be mitigated. We will see what happens as we proceed further.

On the question of finality, in the end the process on which we are embarked will have an outcome which gives much greater certainty than we have at the moment. As a result of this process, we will be able to give important consideration to the situation in British Columbia for a stable and good future for both First Nations people and non–First Nations people and that will be a building block on which all British Columbians will benefit in the long run.

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I seem to be the only one who would like to participate in this debate with the hon. member.

I take exception to the point the member made that he believes this process will bring greater stability and certainty for British Columbia. That is certainly not what I have seen. I am not opposed to negotiations if they lead to the type of agreements that all of us and the vast majority of Canadians can ultimately support. My great concern and the concerns expressed to me all of the time from my constituents is that these processes are not doing that. They are driving a further wedge between the Indian people and Canadians at large.

A great concern of mine is that we are not bringing about finality or extinguishment of special rights. We are just further enshrining them.

Sometimes I question and am questioned as to whether we are really addressing the concerns of the average Indian in this country who in many cases is living in poverty on reserves. Or, are we really addressing the concerns of the Indian leadership which in many cases is vastly different from the primary concerns of the individual Indian?

It is estimated that combined provincial and federal spending is between $7 billion and $9 billion a year on Indian programs. When I travel to the reserves in my constituency, which, I am assured by colleagues in the House, are not that much unlike other constituencies, I see very few examples of where that money is being spent on the reserves.

I really question whether this process is the best way to address the concerns of the average native in this country.

Mr. Gerrard: Mr. Speaker, I have two quick comments in reply.

First, if the member is trying to suggest that we should go back and start all over again, I think we have made a lot of progress. We have a process which has been agreed to by the federal government, the provincial government and more than 70 per cent of the First Nations in British Columbia. It is a reasonable basis for proceeding and I believe we should proceed.

Second, when I spoke I deliberately talked about economic development, the information highway and the changing things that are coming. These are also very important in making sure that individuals and communities have the benefit of the changing times in order to move forward and progress to a better 21st century.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure today to speak on Bill C–107, an act respecting the B.C. Treaty Commission.

The aboriginal people tragically form some of the lowest socioeconomic groups within Canada, a first world nation. Indeed the incidence of violence, sexual abuse, crime, infant mortality, suicide, substance abuse and unemployment are among the highest of any sector within our country. It is not something our country should be proud of, and indeed we are not. That is why we are here today, to try to develop some sensible solutions to address these tragic problems within our midst.

I have seen with tragic frequency these individuals shot, stabbed, dying and sometimes dead from other people's hands and tragically too often from their own. It is a situation that needs to be addressed. It needed to be addressed yesterday but now we have an opportunity to do something about it today.

The cultural and social genocide which is taking place among the aboriginal people has been taking place for decades and continues to this day. In part this is due to successive governments that have continued in a paternalistic fashion toward the aboriginal people. They have had unequal treatment for the aboriginal people. Because this treatment is unequal, it is by its very nature racist in that we are treating the aboriginal people in a different way. We do not treat any other segment of our society that way.

The mindset has been to pour successive amounts of money into the department of Indian affairs for the aboriginal people. We continue to pour money down a black hole. If we look at the results of where this money has gone and wonder whether it has really gone to help the aboriginal people, if we go to the aboriginal people on and off reserve we will see that sadly it has not.

By pouring money down this black sinkhole, successive governments have created an institutionalized welfare state. If we continue to give money to people without them working for it, we erode the very soul within the individual. This does not matter if the person is an aboriginal or a non–aboriginal. It is a basic human characteristic. We cannot keep giving money to people and expect them to have pride and self–respect. It is incredibly destructive to the soul of a human being. It would happen to anybody, aboriginal or non–aboriginal, who is subjected to this.

It is often said that the aboriginal communities have lost their pride and self–respect. Part of the responsibility lies in the fact that we have created this institutionalized welfare state, that we have continued to support people in this manner. It has done them a great disservice. Therefore we see the sad destruction of a beautiful culture and beautiful people. A person cannot get pride and self–respect by having someone give it to him. That person must earn it himself.

Essential to this is having the ability to earn the funds to support ourselves, our family and people. If we can do this, then from that we will develop the pride and self–respect in ourselves and therefore the community around us. That is absolutely fundamentally important in my opinion.

I spoke with an individual who is responsible for the B.C. treaty process in my area. This man was in charge of it. After listening to him for one hour on what they were going to do, I asked a very simple question: Will the negotiation of these treaties help the aboriginal on or off reserve who is part of that lowest socioeconomic group I spoke about earlier? He answered that he did not know.

It is not good enough to pursue a course of trying to help people who are suffering from those tragic things I mentioned earlier when it is not known that it is going to help anybody. Why are we pursuing this course?

• (1355)

Perhaps we are doing this to assuage a guilt complex we have from what has gone on historically. If that is the case, I think we should end it. It is not respectful to the aboriginal people and it is not respectful to us. We have to look forward to a new day, a new era, a new age when aboriginal and non–aboriginal people can have respect for themselves and each other, when we can all live under circumstances that we do not need to be embarrassed about.

I have many concerns about the B.C. treaty negotiation process. First is the cost. It is going to cost hundreds of millions of dollars to establish these treaties. Where is the money coming from? All levels of government do not have the funds to pay for this. It is a simple question for which I would like a simple answer. Where is the accountability coming from? These moneys are going to be given to groups of people with no accountability whatsoever. Accountability must be built into the system.

One of the complaints I have is not politically correct to speak of. I have spoken to a number of aboriginal people who have come to my office complaining that large sums of money given to bands by the federal government have disappeared. The money has disappeared into the hands of band elders and band leaders. Nobody speaks for those aboriginal people who are not in that leadership. They need that money and they need it to work for them effectively and positively for the future. In too many cases that is not occurring.

Second, there are a lot of questions surrounding the issue of giving the resource management to the aboriginal people. What happens to the rights of the non–aboriginal people who also have interests in these areas? They talk about crown lands and the fact that these areas are going to be given over to aboriginal people. The fact remains there are a lot of non–aboriginal people who lease these areas from the federal government. What is going to happen to them?

Also, look at the mismanagement which has taken place in some areas where aboriginal people have managed the resources. Look at the Stoney Creek reserve where large tracts of land were given out for timber rights and huge tracts of land were decimated.

Look at the aboriginal fishing strategy on the west coast. The AFS has proven to be an unmitigated disaster. An individual's racial grouping cannot be used as a licence to trash and destroy a resource. Unfortunately part of the responsibility of the decimation in the west coast fishery lies at the feet of the aboriginal people. There is no question that non–aboriginals have been poaching too. However, a significant number of people within the aboriginal community have been using the AFS to destroy a precious resource.

Who speaks for the aboriginal people who are law–abiding, who respect the resource and who are interested in preserving that resource for future generations? Absolutely nobody speaks about them. A number of aboriginal people have approached me and said: "These aboriginal people are using the AFS for their own gain at the expense of us who are trying to manage and use the resource in a sustainable fashion". This has to be said. Where are the environmental safeguards that are going to take place when whole resources are being taken over and given to a group of people?

Third, what are the rights of the non–aboriginal people who live near lands that are being given to the aboriginal people? I have significant concerns in my own area. Many municipalities have mentioned that they have their own municipal plans that deal with the future of their area. There are a number of areas that—

The Speaker: My dear colleague, you will have the floor right after question period when we resume debate. You still have plenty of time remaining.

It being 2 p.m. we will proceed to Statements by Members.

CARDIOPULMONARY RESUSCITATION

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, November has been proclaimed awareness month for cardiopulmonary resuscitation, better known as CPR.

Cardiovascular disease is the leading cause of death in Canada and the leading cause of death among older women. More than 60,000 Canadians die every year from heart attacks and strokes.

The basic skills of CPR can be learned in as little as four hours, yet fewer than 3 per cent of all Canadians can perform it. Therefore Health Canada and the Heart and Stroke Foundation, together with the Red Cross Society, St. John Ambulance, the Canadian Ski Patrol, the Royal Lifesaving Society of Canada and the Advanced Coronary Treatment Foundation encourage all Canadians to take the time to learn CPR.

On behalf of the members of the House, I would like to support the initiatives of CPR awareness month and urge all Canadians to familiarize themselves with CPR. We should all know that a few hours of training could save the life of someone we love.

COWBOYS

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the great riding of Yellowhead is home to Canada's royal family of rodeo, the Hay family from Mayerthorpe.

This family has a long and distinguished career in professional rodeo. Fred, the dad of the family, busted broncs until 1983, and his son Rod is a four–time Canadian finals rodeo champion. Now his brother Denny is continuing the Hay family winning tradition by capturing the first ever CFR saddle bronc title in Edmonton recently. It was a lifelong dream for Denny to win the national title. He began busting broncs when he was just eight years old. Now Denny and his brother Rod are off to compete in the national finals rodeo in Las Vegas, the only pair of brothers from Canada ever to compete in this world class event.

I am sure all members will join me in wishing Denny and Rod lots of luck when they take on the world's best. Good luck, Denny and Rod.

RENEWAL OF CANADIAN FEDERALISM

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in view of the proposals made yesterday by the Prime Minister, Quebecers can now see for themselves that the federal government has no intention of responding to the legitimate aspirations of the people of Quebec.

It has become obvious that Ottawa never intended to renew federalism, as the proposals which have been put on the table amply show. Quebecers will never accept to have the wool pulled over their eyes in such a manner, and they will reject these empty proposals outright.

Quebecers who voted no at the last referendum, but who wanted real changes, will be even more disappointed and will feel betrayed once again by a prime minister who could not care less about their aspirations. As for those who voted yes, these proposals only confirm what they already knew. Ottawa's proposals will never meet Quebec's expectations, Quebecers bar none know it full well.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the NDP federal caucus calls on the Liberal government to realize that it cannot save Canada if it is busy undermining its foundations at the same time.

Recognizing Quebec's distinct society when the socioeconomic and institutional realities that make Canada distinct from the U.S. are being harmonized or rationalized out of existence is a tragic irony. Talking about vetoes and sovereignty is a cruel joke when we have abandoned real control of our lives to the global marketplace and the money speculators, not to mention that the veto proposal completely misunderstands western Canada and should have recognized B.C. as a region. Finally devolution of training as a facade for federal offloading and the privatization of labour market strategies is further cause for cynicism.

The Prime Minister should give Canadians something to believe in other than the bottom line mentality and they will be in a better frame of mind to deal with what Quebec and the rest of Canada need to do to keep Canada united.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last week's Campaign 2000 report of a drop in the number of poor children in Canada is good news, but there remain nearly 1.4 million children who do not have the adequate food, shelter, clothing and social environment their peers enjoy.

Poverty is a serious threat to the growth development, and social well–being of children and therefore merits the continuing attention of all levels of government. Therefore I have introduced a private member's motion to encourage the government to create a special Canada children's future fund. This is to ensure that the elimination of child poverty remains at the forefront of our national agenda even during tough economic times.

I look forward to the full support of the House. All children deserve a secure and stable tomorrow, for they hold in their hands the future of our nation.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Tony Ianno (Trinity—Spadina, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at the recent Commonwealth conference the Prime Minister reacted to the execution of Ogoni playwright Ken Saro–Wiwa by calling on the assembled heads of government to speak out with one voice in the face of flagrant violations of democratic principles and basic tenets of justice.

• (1405)

Following up actions with words, the Prime Minister pushed for an unprecedented suspension of Nigeria from the Commonwealth in the face of its flagrant violation of human rights and yet another example of the utter contempt held by General Abacha's regime for world opinion.

In light of this, I urge my colleagues in the Government of Canada to take this condemnation one step further by sending a stern message to the Government of Nigeria by cancelling all of its oil imports and imposing economic sanctions.

In light of these events, the citizens of the world must also send a message to multinational companies such as Royal Dutch Shell that they are responsible for more than simply maintaining the bottom line of their balance sheets. These companies must adopt environmental standards for their operations, especially in societies where opposition to their operations is repressed.

ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on November 17 a group of maritimers met in Truro to discuss the concept of economic and political union of the maritime or Atlantic provinces.

Business people, academics, labour leaders and even a few politicians agreed that union is an old idea, going back to 1807, whose time has finally come. We must join together to eliminate wasteful duplication and provide lean government with cohesive policies for all Atlantic Canadians. We must join together to create new economic opportunities for our region and renew a sense of pride in our people. We must join together so that our voice is truly heard at the national level and our concerns are understood and respected.

The Truro meeting is only a beginning. An Atlantic union must be driven by the people of Atlantic Canada not the politicians. The Prime Minister has shown that Confederation is not static. Changes can and must be made to improve the operation of our institutions and the quality of life for our people.

Opinion polls over the last number of years show that the people of Atlantic Canada consistently support union. They are ahead of the politicians on this issue now, as they have been in the past. We would serve them poorly if we did not make every effort—

RENEWAL OF CANADIAN FEDERALISM

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in 1982, as a result of the unilateral patriation of the Constitution, Quebec lost its veto, a right it had as one of the founding nations of Canada. Since them, every Quebec government has demanded that the federal government rectify the situation.

What is the Prime Minister offering us today? Crumbs. A mere bill, which could be struck down by the next government, creating a regional veto, which completely dilutes Quebec's claims. And there is more. It will be possible to amend the Constitution through a national referendum and sidestep Quebec's National Assembly. This is a far cry from the pre–1982 situation when the National Assembly had a constitutional veto.

Come on now. Does the Prime Minister really believe that Quebecers will be satisfied with mere symbols which bring about no change whatsoever?

NAFTA

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Americans subsidize their dairy farmers to the tune of $3.6 billion, yet they are challenging our high tariffs on dairy and other supply managed products. They have asked for a NAFTA panel to rule in their favour.

If the Americans win, our supply managed farmers will face open competition overnight and Canadian dairy and poultry producers may be devastated. Two billion dollars' worth of dairy quotas will become worthless, thousands of farmers could be forced out of business and many rural communities would be severely affected.

I ask the Minister of International Trade to be proactive rather than reactive and initiate a negotiated settlement, point out the sky high American subsidies and offer to reduce some of our tariffs in return for subsidy reduction in the United States.

I ask the government to negotiate because too much is at stake to play at winner take all. It is entirely possible that the NAFTA panel may say "Canada, you lose".

PORNOGRAPHY

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to your attention the deep concerns of many of my constituents, especially in the districts of Cudworth, Wakaw and Humboldt, regarding pornography.

I have received many little white ribbons in recognition of WRAP week, "White Ribbons Against Pornography". The letter I received from Lana Reding explains it best. Lana wrote: "We feel that not enough is being done to protect families against abuse and pornography, especially our children, who are our future. In our church, St. Michael's Parish, we pinned white ribbons on our parishioners and they returned them the following week. Also our town of Cudworth declared that October 22 to 29 be recognized as WRAP week. There is far too much pornography on TV, in magazines and books exposing our children to sex, violence and crimes. They need to be protected from much of this. We hope you will pass these ribbons along to our Prime Minister and express our concern regarding WRAP week".

It is only when people like Lana Reding get involved in the process that meaningful change can occur. I commend my constituents for their efforts.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's announcement yesterday on change in the federal system honours the referendum commitments and also provides a lead up to the mandatory constitutional conference of 1997.

The initiative on distinct society reflects already existing law of the Constitution; that on regional veto commitments the federal government creates no additional constitutional barriers for provincial governments; that on manpower training signals the new co–operative federalism, with its emphasis on functional power sharing and flexible decision making on common social problems.

RENEWAL OF CANADIAN FEDERALISM

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, as he had promised during the recent referendum campaign in Quebec, the Prime Minister of Canada outlined the first elements of the strategy to renew Canadian federalism.

Through this proposal, we are tackling head on the notions of distinct society, regional veto and job training. It shows that this government responds to the legitimate demands expressed by all Canadians.

Yesterday, Quebecers found out that, more than ever before, they can count on the Prime Minister of Canada and his government to address the issues they care about.

Yesterday, all Canadians learned that, when their Prime Minister promises something, he delivers.

[English]

Yesterday Quebecers received yet another confirmation that the Prime Minister of Canada is listening to their concerns and that they can count on the government to address the issues that are important to Quebec.

Quebecers once again see proof that when their Prime Minister promises something, he delivers.

The Speaker: I remind colleagues to use the titles of members rather than their names.

THE LATE ODETTE PINARD

Mr. Michel Daviault (Ahuntsic, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today, we mourn the senseless death of Odette Pinard, an officer in the Montreal Urban Community police department.

A mother of three young children, Mrs. Pinard had worked as a police officer for nearly 10 years. She could have looked forward to a successful career in the Montreal Urban Community police department.

I would like to offer our sincere condolences to her family, her friends and all her colleagues in Montreal. Her death reminds us of both the fragility of life and the difficult work done every day by police officers, particularly those in our major centres.

When we ask the police to help us and protect our communities, our homes and our lives, we are in fact asking policemen and women to do a job, sometimes at the cost of their lives. Odette Pinard's death reminds us of their courage and dedication, for which we are all grateful.

FISHERIES

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is a simple message and even the fisheries minister's blowhard rhetoric and double talk cannot stifle it. Fishermen across Atlantic Canada are protesting the government's broken promise of "no tax increases".

From St. John's to Saint John, from Glace Bay to Yarmouth, the cry "Axe the fish tax" is being heard. Since that cry is falling on deaf ears, Reform, along with local citizens, have unveiled a billboard in Yarmouth protesting this unfair tax, one of many billboards in Atlantic Canada that will remind thousands and thousands of passers–by that the so–called fee is in fact a tax. This tax will rob Yarmouth of $3 million, southwest Nova Scotia of $18 million and rob Atlantic Canada of $50 million.

There is no excuse for broken promises. There is no excuse for a new tax. There is no excuse the government can offer fishermen whose pockets are being picked.

Leave the money at home. Mr. Minister, axe the Tobin tax.

RENEWAL OF CANADIAN FEDERALISM

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, by announcing the details of his three main initiatives for change yesterday, the Prime Minister of Canada kept his referendum promises.

Yesterday, the Government of Canada tabled a motion to ensure that the Quebec's distinct society be recognized in the Canadian federation. Legislation establishing a regional right of veto will be introduced to give Canadians from all four major regions of the country the assurance that no constitutional change will be made without their consent. The Government of Canada will withdraw from manpower training; the provinces will then be quite free to develop their own policies and programs in that area.

These first three initiatives clearly show that we are committed to helping build a Canada that better meets to the needs and aspirations of its people and is more sensitive to them.

RENEWAL OF CANADIAN FEDERALISM

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister of Canada's press conference was barely over when positive feedback started pouring from Quebec.

Reacting to our Prime Minister's proposals, the leader of the Quebec Liberal Party said: "First of all, we have to salute the Prime Minister of Canada's willingness to act. It is a first step in a process that should start now".

This initial reaction of the Leader of the Official Opposition in Quebec tends to prove that our government has correctly heard and understood the desire for change expressed by the people in the referendum.

Let us hope that, as the official opposition in the National Assembly, the Quebec Liberal Party will be able to convince the PQ government to set aside its separatist obsession and help renew the Canadian federation, as requested by the people of Quebec.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

RENEWAL OF CANADIAN FEDERALISM

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister hastily announced measures with which he intends to meet his referendum commitments. In fact, he is trying to fool the public, but Quebecers will not be fooled by these cunningly worded resolutions on the distinct identity of Quebec, any more than they will be by the sham veto he proposes.

My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Considering that the cabinet committee on constitutional change only recently started its work and that the timeframe for unemployment insurance reform has again been changed as a result of his statement yesterday, will he acknowledge that his improvised announcement is intended to counter increasingly overt criticism of his leadership and his failure to deliver the goods?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we acted quickly. I had a text when I spoke to Canadians on the Tuesday and Wednesday of the last week before the referendum. What I did today was keep the promises I made to the Canadian people and especially to the people of Quebec, that is take steps to recognize Quebec as a distinct society and ensure that, in future, there will be no changes in the Constitution without the consent of Quebecers.

During the past four weeks the committee has had time to review everything I mentioned at the time, and that is what I delivered.

As for unemployment insurance reform, it will come. The bill will be tabled Friday, and the Leader of the Opposition will have all the details. However, as we have said on many occasions in this House, we decided that we would respect jurisdictions and that there was no longer any need for the federal government to be directly involved in manpower training programs. We intend to make the money available to clients who are our responsibility so they can receive these services from their provincial government.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would be useful to recall that the man who just spoke is the main artisan of the forced patriation of the 1982 Constitution and of the demise of Meech Lake.

We know that nearly half of Quebecers supported sovereignty in the referendum and that many others voted for a thorough overhaul of the federal system. That being the case, what makes the Prime Minister think that Quebecers will be satisfied with a mere resolution that is meaningless as far as Quebec's distinct identity is concerned?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the Leader of the Opposition feels that a resolution of the House of Commons is not enough, he should tell the House that as soon as he is premier of Quebec, he will support a constitutional amendment recognizing Quebec as a distinct society. If he does, I will assume my responsibilities as Prime Minister and discuss it with the provincial governments.

I am sure that if the Leader of the Opposition wants to entrench the concept of distinct society in the Constitution, the provincial Premiers will recognize his request. I think we could have a constitutional amendment very quickly. It could be done in a matter of months.

• (1420)

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if I ever take on the duties referred to by the Prime Minister, I would consider it an insult to my position and to Quebecers to accept a solution that is unacceptable. Even his ally, Mr. Johnson, would refuse.

How can the Prime Minister expect Quebec to take seriously a resolution that falls far short of the proposal in the Charlottetown Accord which was rejected in no uncertain terms by Quebecers in the 1992 referendum?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I and my party are in favour of recognizing Quebec as a society that is distinct because of the French language, the culture that is specific to Quebec and the fact that in Quebec we have always had a civil code based on the Napoleonic Code. So everyone knows this is a fact that can be easily recognized in the Constitution.

However, today it seems quite clear that the Leader of the Opposition is not interested in having Canada recognize Quebec as a distinct society.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in his last minute improvised announcement, the Prime Minister remained true to himself in proposing to recognize Quebec as a distinct society, purely symbolically, through a simple parliamentary motion, which will give Quebec neither special status nor additional power.

How can the Prime Minister seriously think he is satisfying Quebecers, nearly 50 per cent of whom voted for sovereignty in the last referendum, with a simple resolution of the House of Commons symbolically recognizing the distinct nature of Quebec but without any additional power? Is this not an insult to their intelligence?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the insult will come when the Bloc Quebecois votes in this House, based on what we see today, against the notion of distinct society for Quebec. If the Bloc Quebecois really wants it to become a constitutional proposal, they should pressure the future head of the Government of Quebec to pass a resolution in the Parliament of Quebec, and then we will see it is passed, and convince the provinces to pass it.

However, if the current Government of Quebec—or the January government—does not want Quebec to be a distinct society under the Constitution, there is nothing I can do.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, with all due respect for the Prime Minister, I have strong doubts that the future Premier of Quebec will agree to something Mr. Bourassa turned down at the time.

After hastily tabling his proposal, without awaiting the report of the phoney committee headed by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and without consulting his partners in English Canada, how does the Prime Minister think he will convince Quebecers of the seriousness of his actions? Will he admit to badly playing his last card, which looks oddly like a two of spades?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can hardly wait for the member for Roberval to rise in this House and vote against the distinct society. For the first time we have an opportunity to speak clearly, not in the context of a thousand things, but on a very clear issue—

Mr. Bouchard: It is a sham.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): —a very clear issue: Is Quebec a distinct society because of its language, its culture and its Civil Code?

Mr. Bouchard: The Napoleonic Code.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): I am not ashamed to admit I know that Quebec's Civil Code dates back to the Napoleonic Code. If it offends the Leader of the Opposition, too bad for him. It is a fact of history. I can hardly wait to rise in this House and vote for Quebec's recognition as a distinct society, and I will watch the Leader of the Opposition vote against it, with a smile on my face.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I too have reviewed the Prime Minister's November 27 statement on unity measures and find the lack of content almost unbelievable.

• (1425)

Canadians inside and outside Quebec want fresh thinking. They want realism, not symbolism. They want a fundamental change in the way the federation operates. Instead the Prime Minister has offered them the tired old thinking and formulas for failure that doomed the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords and almost lost the referendum on October 30.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Is this all there is, recycled amending formulas, hollow symbolism from failed accords and lip service to decentralization? Is this really the best that the Prime Minister of Canada can offer on the subject of national unity?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I made a speech in Montreal that was very clear. It was in written form and I am pleased the leader of the third party read it. It is exactly what I promised.

I said that the Quebec people because of their language, culture and the civil code are different from the rest of Canada. I have no problem with that.

I am offering a possibility for the rest of Canada to have something to say in the evolution of Canada as proposed by the leader of the third party who talked about regions in his document called "New Confederation" and said that all regions were entitled to equal status in constitutional negotiations. That is exactly what we offered the four regions of Canada.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): We will have a lot more to say on that tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

The contents of the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords were flawed because the process for developing the contents were flawed. Meech Lake and Charlottetown were top down, closed door, politician driven approaches to change which failed to carry the judgment of Canadians because Canadians were not involved.

Yet in coming up with this package the Prime Minister has not only ignored the lessons of Meech Lake and Charlottetown. He has taken a huge step backward. He involved fewer Canadians in developing this Quebec package than the Meech Lake and Charlottetown gang did in theirs.

Is the Prime Minister following any recognized process at all, or is he just making this stuff up as he goes along? If there is a process, why is there no meaningful role in the process for the provinces or the people of Canada?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I made some commitments in Montreal on behalf of the people of Canada.

Perhaps the leader of the third party does not agree with what I said. Of course it was at a time when he was offering subsidies for Quebecers to move out of Quebec. That was his solution to national unity.

We want to fulfil our commitments and get back very quickly to dealing with the real problems of the country: jobs and growth. However, because the leader of the third party cannot attack the government on the substance of the operation of the nation, he would like to discuss the Constitution around the country. That is not our intention. It is to deal with the economy and job creation and dispose of these commitments within weeks.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister ignores questions about the lack of content in his package. He ignores questions about the flawed process. Maybe he will answer a question about the strategy behind the package, which is bizarre to say the least.

The Prime Minister has apparently decided to build a case for national unity on the concept of distinct society and a constitutional veto, two areas where there is little public or provincial support. He has chosen to ignore the one area where there is a real desire for change both inside and outside Quebec, namely the realignment of federal and provincial powers.

Is the symbolic tinkering with manpower training the government's only response to Canadians' demand for a major realignment of federal–provincial powers? Is that all there is?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the announcement I made on manpower training yesterday there was a very big move of clarification. It is a complaint that was mentioned by all the premiers over the last two years. However, we had to wait for the Minister of Human Resources Development, who will soon be tabling his bill on the reforms to the unemployment insurance program, before suggesting any reforms in that field.

• (1430)

I have discussed the strategy with the premiers and with this caucus. I know the Reform Party's position on this strategy is exactly the same as that of the Bloc Quebecois.

[Translation]

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in an attempt to enlist the support of the premiers in English Canada, the Prime Minister was forced to render Quebec's recognition as a distinct society meaningless, so as not to violate the principle of equality for the provinces.

This is so true that the so–called right of veto was offered to all regions of Canada, while responsibility over manpower training, which has yet to be defined, will be offered to every province.

Will the Prime Minister recognize that he was forced to render Quebec's recognition as a distinct society both meaningless and useless, so as to make it acceptable to the rest of Canada, which is so attached to the principle of equality for the provinces?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it clear to the hon. member that the Prime Minister represents all Canadians, not just English–speaking Canadians.

I also want to tell him that Quebecers rejected the very ambiguous separatist proposal. Now his party must comply with the will of the people, which means it must work within Canada.

As for the regional veto proposal, it was accepted by all Canadian premiers a long time ago. It makes perfect sense to me that Ontario, with 40 per cent of the country's population, should get such a veto, as well as two provinces representing a majority in western Canada, and likewise in eastern Canada. Such a proposal does not belittle anyone.

I think that, in Canada, we must all co–operate, and this is what we are proposing to do with this offer. I can see the despondency of Bloc Quebecois members who are about to vote against a distinct society status for the province of Quebec.

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the Prime Minister put the whole burden of the proof on the back of the Quebec government, considering that the premiers of British Columbia, Alberta and Manitoba have serious reservations about his proposal?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member just criticized me for trying to propose a regional veto, because some provinces would like a veto for each and every province.

What we have done is to impose on the federal government a technique to use its own veto right. If Quebec no longer has a veto right as it thought it had once, it is because the PQ government of the time opted for a formula different from the Victoria proposal and, in doing so, eliminated the veto right that Quebec was seeking.

I can understand the despair of Bloc Quebecois members, who can see that we are solving two problems at once, in that we are recognizing Quebec as a distinct society, while also taking action to prevent any constitutional change without Quebec's consent. This is a commitment that all members of this House will soon be making. It will quite something to see the Bloc member oppose a motion seeking to make it possible for Quebec to have a veto right.

[English]

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in 1992 both the Liberal Party and the Reform Party fought for national referendums on constitutional change. The current Prime Minister was successful in having the Liberal Party pass a resolution that stated: "The Liberal Party of Canada stands for the principle that the Constitution belongs first to the people and that the people must have a say in how the Constitution is changed".

Why then has the Prime Minister, instead of giving the people of Canada a say through a national referendum, decided the legislative assemblies, the direct notice of government and provincial governments can have a veto over federal constitutional change?

• (1435)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are not at the stage of changing the Constitution. We are saying we are changing the way we, the federal government, will use our veto powers.

The House of Commons has a veto power. We say which way we will use it. The Constitution remains the same. The amending formula is the same and there is no proposition at this time to change the Constitution.

If the Government of Quebec were to say it is willing to change the Constitution to have a distinct society, as it is written in the Constitution at this time, we must have the consent of seven provinces, representing 50 per cent of the population.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the question was not answered. Why has the federal government not given the people of Canada a say in these kinds of changes through a national referendum on its own ratification?

I point out to the Prime Minister that we asked him this question about his Verdun speech on November 1. The Prime Minister said to the leader of the Reform Party: "The hon. leader of the third party should take time to read my speech. I said it would be a veto for the people of Quebec".

Since the people of Quebec voted against separation, why has the Prime Minister turned around and instead of giving the people a veto, given a veto to the future premier of Quebec, the separatist Leader of the Opposition?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, for the Reform Party there is a reality. Is the Government of Quebec a legitimate government? Like the government of any other province it as been elected and I have to respect that reality.

I would rather have another government, which would be possible the day the Reform Party supports this party rather than supporting the Bloc Quebecois in the House all the time.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, immediately following the Prime Minister of Canada's announcement, the provinces of Canada voiced reservations on both the so–called right of veto and the scope of resolution on the distinct character of Quebec. It was obvious that the premiers of English Canada had not been forewarned of this initiative by the federal government.

How can the Prime Minister have the gall to present his initiatives of yesterday as the end result of his referendum promises when, immediately following his announcement, a number of provinces in English Canada, including British Columbia and Alberta, voiced serious reservations about the federal plan?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the fact that they have reservations does not mean I spoke to them. I am simply saying that I made commitments in my capacity as Prime Minister during the referendum campaign, saying that I would deliver the goods. I have said that, in the past, I and my party have recognized Quebec as a distinct society and that we would recognize it as such in the future. That is what we shall do in the very near future.

We are taking steps, and that is the commitment I have made, not to change the Canadian Constitution without the consent of Quebec. There will be legislation on this, in Parliament. I am most anxious to see how the critic will vote, whether she will vote against the decision of this Parliament not to change the Constitution without the consent of Quebec.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, are we to understand that the Prime Minister, as he did in 1980 following the referendum, is in the process of acting unilaterally, attempting to present not only Quebec but the other provinces as well with a done deal?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am working within the federal jurisdiction. I am the Prime Minister of Canada. I invite the members of this Parliament to make a decision on the distinct society and on the right of veto for the four regions of Canada, within the capacities of this Parliament. There is nothing mysterious in that.

We, the members, are the ones who will all have to make up our minds a few days from now. When everyone has voted, then it will be a done deal, yes. The members of this Parliament, the large majority, thanks to the Liberal Party of which I am the leader, will have voted in favour of a distinct society and to ensure that the veto will be shared with the four regions of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is creating a cloud of confusion on the issue of a constitutional veto. Could he clarify for the benefit of his own members, as well as ours, exactly what he means when he talks about giving a veto to Quebec? Is he talking about giving a veto to the Government of Quebec or is he talking about giving a veto to the people of Quebec through a constitutional referendum? Will he make it crystal clear what he means?

• (1440)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I mean that the people of Quebec have a parliament and an assembly where they have people elected. They will vote, just like the people of Alberta will vote, through the members of their legislature.

We say it is a desire of the House that we not proceed without the approval of the four regions of Canada, as the hon. member is asking in his program to recognize the four regions of Canada. Quebec will vote on that. There might be a referendum, there might not be a referendum, but under the Constitution when we amend the Constitution it is always by a resolution of a legislative assembly and the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, let us get this straight. When the Prime Minister talks about giving a veto to Quebec he has just said that what he means is giving a veto to the Government of Quebec. Will he confirm that in other words he is proposing to give the separatist government of Quebec a constitutional veto over the Constitution of Canada?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have never seen so little respect for democracy in my life.

We are giving a veto. The veto is ours. We say we will not impose on the people of Quebec or the people of Canada an amendment to the Constitution that does not have the consensus of Quebec, Ontario, the west and the east. This Parliament will decide and we will establish the conditions.

However, we have this notion that suddenly a great friend of the leader of the third party is the leader of the Bloc Quebecois. They used to have breakfast together; now we see them in the same bed. Now to see him disappear is a bit disappointing. The reality is there is a legitimate government in Quebec and it exists according to the Constitution of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, through his initiative announced yesterday, the Prime Minister is offering Quebec a mere resolution of this House, in which the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society is simply a symbolic recognition of an actual situation. They are telling Quebec that it is distinct but, in fact, this changes nothing in terms of power.

Will the Prime Minister admit that his proposed distinct society resolution will give Quebec no special status or additional powers?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society should eventually be enshrined in the Canadian Constitution, and the courts will interpret it as they see fit. We in the government cannot make decisions that are up to the courts. For the moment we have instructed the Canadian Parliament, the executive branch of Canada's government, to take this reality into account. This is indeed a reality that we hope this Parliament will recognize, and we will soon vote on it.

If the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois want this to be recognized in the Constitution, we will start talking. We have already spoken with the provinces and, as I said yesterday, I am sure that, if the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois want recognition as a distinct society to be enshrined in the Constitution, the provinces will be happy to oblige, because, like me, they want Quebec to remain a part of Canada.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this, however, is different from the Meech Lake accord, which required the courts to interpret the Constitution in light of Quebec's distinctiveness. We are nowhere near there. We are still dealing with the deflated Meech Lake balloon as seen by the Prime Minister in 1990, when he killed the proposed reform. And he knows it.

• (1445)

Does the Prime Minister share the opinion of his minister—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, could the Deputy Prime Minister stop shouting?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Duceppe: Again—

The Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Duceppe: I was getting to it, Mr. Speaker.

Does the Prime Minister share the opinion of his Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and chairman of his phoney committee to save Canada, to the effect that the proposed recognition as a distinct society does not in itself involve new powers for Quebec?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what has always surprised me is that all PQ members in the National Assembly voted against Meech. Every last one of them.

It happened when the Leader of the Opposition decided to turn his back on his friend, the then Prime Minister, to oppose the Meech Lake agreement. I myself was not even a member of this House at the time, so I do not know why I am being blamed for so many things. Of course, it is easy to make accusations. The hon. member should ask Mr. Parizeau and the other PQ members then sitting in the National Assembly why they voted against Meech.

Today, I want to correct this whole situation and give Bloc members an opportunity to vote for the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society. We will see in a few days what they will do.

TAXATION

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

Last weekend I met with constituents in my riding of Brant to begin our prebudget consultations. Among many topics of interest my electors registered their continuing concern about the underground economy and its impact on our ability to manage the deficit.

What has the minister done to date to control the leakage of millions of dollars in revenue into the underground economy?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question and also for the consistent support she has given to making the tax system more efficient and fair over the last two years.

In fact, it is two years ago this week that I announced a series of major initiatives to attack the underground economy. They are specifically: more co-operation with the provinces, including agreements on exchange of information; more co-operation with industry associations, again with respect to information and also assistance in our efforts; more service for ordinary Canadian taxpayers; more publicity for people who unfortunately break the law. I am happy to say these have resulted in substantial improvements on the revenue side. Over those two years these specific measures have totalled $1.1 billion of revenue that would otherwise not have been collected.

QUEBEC

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when Canadians buried the Charlottetown accord six feet under, I thought I had seen the last of the elitist backroom boys, but I was wrong. The Liberals have even one upped the Tories.

The sum total of this Prime Minister's consultation process was this: an interim report from the national unity dream team; a couple of heart to hearts with the dynamic duo of Pelletier and Goldenberg; a few quick phone calls to the premiers; and a last minute briefing of his very own caucus.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Why were the Canadian people, the people and not the governments, left out of the process again? Will the people have a direct say on his government's Quebec package?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada were very happy that we participated in the referendum and helped to win it. At that time we were being attacked daily by the Reform Party rather than receiving its help.

• (1450)

The people of Canada want us to get back to job creation and growth. The people of Canada want the Prime Minister of Canada who speaks for all Canadians to deliver on the goods he promised in Montreal the week before the referendum.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada will be begging the question, why in the world did he bring this up yesterday afternoon? Why do we not get on with job creation? Let us do it.

The Prime Minister's style is often likened to that of Louis St. Laurent but I think Louis XIV maybe is more like it. The Prime Minister did not consult with Canadians. He did not consult with the premiers. He did not even properly consult with his own caucus who are watching this show today before announcing the Quebec package. They know it and we know it. They have been talking to us. What is worse is that the government does not trust the Canadian people to give them the final word on these measures.

Will the government commit today to a free vote in the House of Commons on its proposals? Will it then give the Canadian people a direct and final say on the Quebec package?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we made this proposition because we made a commitment on behalf of all Canadians one week before the referendum to do something. This is extremely important after what the Canadian people said at that time. Thousands of Canadians came from across the land to say to the people of Quebec that they want Quebec to remain in Confederation. They want to keep this country together.

The people of Canada want the Prime Minister to deliver the goods. He will do that and quickly.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question also is for the Prime Minister. The very day that the Prime Minister claims to recognize Quebec's distinct society status, he refuses to follow up on the Quebec consensus to the effect that the federal government must transfer to the province the powers and resources related to manpower training. There is quite a contradiction between these meaningless statements and the facts.

Will the Prime Minister admit that his proposal to give the money allocated for training directly to the unemployed and bypass the Quebec government and its manpower development commission, which includes officials representing management, the unions, the government and various other institutions, prevents Quebec from implementing a true manpower and employment policy, as requested by everyone?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member could not have been listening very well to the words of the Prime Minister.

He said that we would be transferring responsibility of many of the training programs. They show the reflection of the very extensive discussions we have had across Canada which I wish the Reform Party would acknowledge and receive. At the same time, we would want to do that in full consenting agreement with the provinces. We want to work with the provinces because we share one fundamental objective which is to help people get back to work and be employed.

I hope that when the hon. member's leader becomes the next leader in the Government of Quebec he is prepared to live up to his commitment which is to get away from any of these other discussions and focus on the question of jobs. If he is prepared to focus on jobs so are we and we think we can work together.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, given that the government says it will keep the money, that it will, in fact, not transfer any responsibility, and that it will continue to control the content, standards and results, how can it call its initiative a decentralization? There is a contradiction here between the statements and the facts.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member is so full of misinformation and contradiction. It really is quite remarkable and amazing how one person can be so wrong so many times.

The reality is that we said we want to find additional resources to help people get back to work. The whole point of putting this in the context of a major fundamental restructuring of the entire employment insurance program is to find the resources to help people get to work and to work with the provinces, communities and businesses to make that happen.

• (1455)

The problem is that the hon. member is not interested in getting people back to work. She is simply interested in dealing with a bunch of abstract constitutional issues. More important, she simply wants separation. She does not want employment for people in Quebec.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I insist upon an answer to the questions I asked earlier in question period.

The Prime Minister knows that the provinces of Canada already have a say in constitutional change through the amending formula. The people of Canada do not have a say. The Prime Minister has promised repeatedly over the past three years to give the people a say through referenda on constitutional change. Why is he backing down on his promise to have national referenda on constitutional change?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not very complicated. A vote will be held in the House of Commons as quickly as possible. We will then return to our work on jobs and growth. It will be easy. We will vote and then we will return to the real problems of Canada.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister wanted to have a real agenda on jobs and growth he should have presented one instead of presenting the bill on constitutional change.

The people of Quebec voted against separation. The Government of Quebec is ignoring those results and continuing to pursue separation. Why is the Prime Minister in bed with the separatists promising them a veto on constitutional change instead of the people of Quebec?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not want Canadians to suffer further discussions, committee hearings, commissions and referenda on every little comma in the Constitution. They do not want to hear about it.

I understand that the Reform Party is confused. Reformers want to talk about it because their own agenda for the politics of Canada has gone down the tube. Let them boil in their own juices.

The vote on the Constitution will be held very soon. After that we will be addressing other very important problems. On Friday we will table a very important reform with respect to jobs and growth. I hope that the Reform Party, rather than asking questions, will vote for it so that Canadians can benefit from the program in the near future.

FISHERIES

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Today the hon. member for Skeena stars in an advertisement on the government's proposed fishing licence fees. How does the minister respond to allegations that licence fees are being applied in a racist manner and that the Canada Oceans Act proposes the use of politically appointed boards to manage the fishery?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is true. Half–page ads at $7,700 per ad have been taken out to support the Reform Party policy on the fishery, pondering up visions of the federal government being engaged in a "racist based fishery".

I have in my hand a copy of a letter written to the hon. member for Skeena and to the leader of the Reform Party by Michael Belliveau, the executive secretary of the Maritime Fishermen's Union. It states:

> Dear Sir,
>
> Who gave you the 'god–given right' to poison attitudes towards First Nations peoples? Your press release, 'Tobin tax blatantly racist', is a disgrace and Orwellian to boot—
> Do not send us any more such contorted garbage".

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister and everyone else will know that the western part of Canada is made up of two very distinct regions: the prairies of western Canada and the province of British Columbia, which is the third largest province in Canada. It is a province with a distinct history, a distinct geography and a distinct economy.

• (1500)

In determining the regional veto powers, why did the Prime Minister ignore the people of British Columbia?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are giving people of British Columbia more power than they have now. Because they represent 47 per cent of the population of the west, we are giving them a lot of power when we talk about the number of people.

If the NDP government of British Columbia were not blocking people coming into British Columbia who want to move there because some might be on welfare, which is against the law of mobility in Canada, very soon B.C. would have more than 50 per cent of the population in the west. Then it would have its own veto.

The Speaker: I draw the attention of members to the presence in the gallery of His Excellency Jacek Buchacz, Minister of Foreign Economic Relations of the Republic of Poland.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BRITISH COLUMBIA TREATY COMMISSION ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–107, an act respecting the establishment of the British Columbia Treaty Commission, as reported (without amendment) from the committee.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was speaking about the aspects of the rights of non–aboriginal peoples living in areas adjacent to areas where land claims are currently under negotiation.

• (1505)

There are some very grave concerns in my riding of Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca and other western communities about what happens when a municipality in the future puts forth a 10 or 15–year plan for the surrounding area and another group working independently within its midst is able to completely change the entire demographic of that area? This is but an example taking place all across the country. Nowhere among these treaty rights is it stated what the rights of non–aboriginal peoples are in areas adjacent to the treaty areas.

Furthermore, a lot of these negotiations are taking place behind closed doors and away from the eyes of the people who will be affected by the decisions made by both the provincial and federal levels of government.

It is grossly iniquitous that these decisions and negotiations take place behind closed doors, in private and in camera. They must be made full knowledge to the public. It is the aboriginals and non–aboriginals who will be affected by these treaty negotiations. Therefore that has to be built into these negotiations but it is not.

More than 50 per cent of aboriginal people live off reserve. How do these treaty negotiations affect those individuals living off reserve? Many aboriginal peoples living in urban areas suffer tragic levels of substance abuse, violence and sexual abuse. It is tragic to see the lives these individuals endure.

I ask those here in the House how these negotiations actually affect the lives of these people? How does it improve their lives to be able to dig themselves out of the sad situations they have found themselves in? How does this give them the ability to stand on their own two feet and take care of themselves? I have never heard an explanation to this question regardless of whom I asked who was involved in the treaty negotiations.

It is fundamental for any person, aboriginal or non–aboriginal, to take care of themselves that they have the skills to do this. One of the roles of government can be to provide these skills and opportunities to enable people to take care of themselves.

I wonder if these land claims will actually do that. I cannot see that happening. For many of the people the earning power they would require to earn money and fulfill the lifestyle they require simply cannot be done on many of the areas being claimed today.

We support good skills training for aboriginals and non–aboriginals alike. We support good social programs where accountability has been built into the system. We support social programs that address good counselling for the people who are suffering. We support the elimination of the Indian Act, a paternalistic and racist act.

Above all, if there is one principle that should override everything, it is equality for all people. If we do not have equality for all of us how can we have equality for any of us? It is fundamental that we approach these negotiations with that fundamental principle in mind. It is something that Canada and Canadians have stood for through their entire history and something that Canadians have died for to give us that right today. I hope we do not abrogate that responsibility to our past by engaging in activities that make sure some people are more equal than others.

We support the hereditary activity of aboriginal peoples: the hunting, fishing and trapping under the treaty negotiations taking place. It is a fundamental right of the aboriginal peoples. However, we do not support utilizing those hereditary rights to be manipulated in such a way that would enable resources to be destroyed.

We support self–government for aboriginal people but at a municipal level. At a municipal level it gives them, as it gives all of us, the ability and right to determine destinies as individuals and as groups.

• (1510)

We cannot have completely autonomous states. That would result in the balkanization of Canada. The worst case scenario is that we have hundreds of small, autonomous non–functional states. That is the ultimate possibility that exists in these treaty negotiations. It is important that we recognize this idea is fallacious and cannot occur.

Everyone in the House wants to ensure the tragic situation that many aboriginal people find themselves in is changed now. They cry for help. It is a cry of desperation that must be answered.

It does not work to treat individuals in a paternalistic fashion. They must be treated in the same fashion as we would treat anybody else, as equals. We must provide these people with the skills and ability to stand on their own two feet. By doing this they would develop pride within themselves, pride in their communities and pride between people.

If we can do this we would go a long way toward developing a more peaceful, tolerant society between aboriginals and non–aboriginals. Sadly the course that has been taken, rather than bringing people together is causing deep divisions and rifts between aboriginals and non–aboriginals. This is sad because there is much that can be learned from all of our cultures. The aboriginal culture is a beautiful culture and we need to learn much from it.

It is time we moved ahead toward a new era of respect for others, respect for ourselves and equal treatment for all.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to rise on behalf of the constituents of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt to oppose Bill C–107, an act to establish the British Columbia Treaty Commission.

Bill C–107 is a fine piece of legislative engineering in theory. The i's are dotted and the t's are crossed. It has been translated in both official languages. It has been printed and distributed in incomprehensible legalese. However there are three important issues that call this legislation into question. First, 23 per cent of the Indian nations are not involved which constitutes 31,682 individuals.

Second, the public at large, which constitutes the majority of British Columbians, 3 million people, is left out of the negotiations. There is no room for their input into the process nor are there provisions for a grassroots referendum of all British Columbians to ratify any negotiations. These two issues must be addressed. They are vital to the continued well–being of the people and the economy of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt.

Third, no substantive amendments can be made to help correct the above mentioned deficiencies in this legislation.

Let us look at each one of these points. Twenty–three per cent of the B.C. Indian nations are not in the B.C. Treaty Commission process. These include the Okanagan Tribal Council, consisting of Indian bands from Osoyoos, Penticton, Upper and Lower Similkameen and Okanagan, and the Upper and Lower Nicola Indian bands and the Nicola Valley Tribal Council.

In other words, the Indians in my riding do not recognize the B.C. Treaty Commission as facilitators of land claims. The Indians within the Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt riding have been actively stepping outside the law to attempt to claim jurisdiction over land.

Currently they are threatening violence over the Green Mountain Road. They have been digging trenches along the road and are wearing camouflage fatigues in true Oka and Gustafsen Lake style. This form of confrontation is not new to the Indians in my riding. Over the past couple of years numerous incidents such as the Apex ski resort blockade have shown that formal civil negotiations outlined as the duties of the B.C. Treaty Commission are redundant and irrelevant to the Indians in my riding.

Currently they are in court fighting the B.C. government over ownership of Green Mountain Road. They say they will enforce a blockade of the road, win or lose. They claim they are willing to fight and die for this road. The rest of my constituents feel the same way the Indians do. In a survey conducted over the summer, 72 per cent of those responding were opposed to the continuation of the B.C. treaty process.

This fall I approached the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development a number of times to encourage him to come to Penticton to help resolve this situation. On October 23 I wrote the minister on humanitarian grounds to tell him that a dispute between the B.C. government and the Penticton Indians was escalating. A roadblock was being threatened. In the letter I asked him to go to Penticton on October 28, not as a negotiator, not as a mediator, but as a sign of good faith to the people of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt to try to get these people back to the negotiating table.

I did not receive a letter or a response from the minister of Indian affairs until today, November 28. He said that it would be inappropriate for him to become involved, despite the effect this dispute is having on the communities in my riding. He said he will leave it to the province to negotiate with the Penticton Indian bands.

This is pure nonsense. This is pure balderdash. The abdication of the constitutional responsibility by this government, which is responsible for Indians and land reserved to Indians, is totally unacceptable.

To make matters worse, today I also find out that the minister of Indian affairs this past weekend was in Kamloops, a three–hour drive from Penticton. The minister did not even have the courtesy to talk to the mayor of Penticton, to the Penticton Indian band or to any of the provincial people in the area. This again is totally unacceptable.

I have a letter from the minister to the mayor of Penticton dated August 21, 1995. In the letter he makes it clear that this road is still federal property not the property of the province or the Indian band. So why will the minister not get involved? The minister of Indian affairs is running out of excuses and he always has them.

When there is a roadblock up, he says he will not come to Penticton when there is a roadblock up. When the roadblock is down, he says he will not come to Penticton when there is nothing to talk about because there are no roadblocks. When there is a court case going on, the minister of Indian affairs says he will not come to Penticton because there is a court case going on. However when there is no court case on the table, the minister still refuses to come to Penticton and talk to the people and get the negotiation back on the tracks.

The only thing I have not heard from this minister is that he cannot come to Penticton because he has to go to the parliamentary dining room for a sandwich. I do expect I will get that excuse as well.

The third problem with Bill C–107 is that the Reform Party would like to make a number of amendments on behalf of their constituents. I can bring to the table two deficiencies which I have previously spoken about. One example that comes to mind would be an amendment to make the Union of British Columbia Municipalities a fourth negotiating power alongside the federal government, the B.C. government and the B.C. summit. This would provide a forum for the interests and concerns of millions of British Columbians excluded from the current process.

With such a large proportion of B.C. territory up for grabs, the interests and concerns of the grassroots British Columbians must be heard and must be addressed.

Making an amendment of this nature is impossible. Bill C–107 is based on a 1992 agreement between the federal government, the B.C. government and the B.C. Indians. This agreement is absolutely cast in stone and it contains absolutely no amending formula. All legislation that enacts the provisions of the agreement is therefore closed to amendments as well. No amendments are possible to the bill.

What has happened to our parliamentary democracy? As member of Parliament for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, one of my primary responsibilities is to review, debate and if necessary amend legislation based on the wishes of my constituents. Our whole parliamentary process is set around these very important functions.

Bills go through three separate readings, a committee hearing and a final report stage in the House of Commons to ensure that all members of the House and members of the public have had time to analyse legislation for faults.

There are a number of opportunities for members of Parliament to bring forth amendments based on the concerns of constituents and the Canadian public. The process is then repeated in the Senate. This process is not perfect. Governments can refuse amendments. This Liberal government is particularly noteworthy in this regard. Governments can also rush legislation through the House without adequate debate. In this regard, the Liberal government's track record is appalling and a disgrace to the parliamentary legacy of our forefathers.

Despite the lack of respect the Liberals have for our parliamentary democracy, this system can be made to work. However, with Bill C–107 there is no opportunity for members of the House to offer amendments to this piece of legislation. I must ask why we are even bothering to debate this legislation. The concerns I have for this bill are falling on deaf ears. It is shocking that the Liberals have the gall to even present this bill in the House. It might as well have gone straight over to the governor general for his approval.

Bill C–107 usurps the power of Parliament in a most undemocratic manner. Parliament has become just a rubber stamp for the whims of this Liberal government. The elected members of the House are powerless to do their jobs. Every piece of legislation must be open to amendment by elected representatives. This is the very essence of our democracy. The alternative is a Liberal dictatorship.

It is time for this government to restore some honour to the House by removing this bill from the Order Paper. The three treaty signators must go back to the negotiating table to make a new agreement which will allow the interests of all British Columbians to be heard.

The people of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt have instructed me to oppose Bill C–107.

The Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Speaker: Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Speaker: The vote will be deferred until the end of Government Orders today.

WITNESS PROTECTION PROGRAM ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–78, an act to provide for the establishment and operation of a program to enable certain persons to receive protection in relation to certain inquiries, investigations or prosecutions, as reported (with amendments) from the committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Speaker: There are two motions in amendment standing on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C–78. Motion No. 1 will be debated and voted on. Motion No. 2 will be debated and voted on.

Government Orders

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–78, in Clause 5, be amended

(a) by replacing line 32, on page 2, with the following:

"5.(1) Subject to this Act, the Commissioner"; and

"(2) Any decision made by the Commissioner, or by a member of the Force on behalf of the Commissioner, under section 5, 9, 11 or 14 of this Act may be reviewed by the Minister on application by a law enforcement agency."

• (1525)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand before the House today to address pressing issues on criminal justice, specifically Bill C–78, the Witness Protection Program Act.

There is an urgent need for legislation of this nature. I can relate to that on a personal level. For the past 22 years I have been a police officer in the city of Calgary, serving my constituents as well as the city in general. A good portion of that time has been devoted to the investigation of major crime. I have gained practical insight about how valuable witnesses are in the conduct of an investigation.

There is no doubt in my mind that certain witnesses need to be protected from potential harm, particularly when their testimony relates to organized criminal activity such as drugs and alcohol, tobacco smuggling operations and trafficking or other conspiracies to commit violent capital crimes.

The decision for one criminal to turn in other criminals can be a difficult one, not only for police departments that have to handle this individual but also for the criminal himself. If justice is to be served we must take strong measures to protect from any potential harm those witnesses who step forward. They may come from one of two categories: they may be active criminals themselves or they may have inadvertently been caught in some criminal act in some fashion, unknowingly.

Simply put, without the testimony of those individuals who come forward to present their knowledge or experience of a criminal activity or conspiracy to a police officer and eventually to a court there would be no investigation, no charges and ultimately no convictions.

Violent and organized crime is on the rise in Canada. I do not think this government understands that. No longer can politicians live in denial of this reality. Wherever there is a dollar to be made illegally, the criminal element will organize to beat the law.

A prime example of this organized criminal activity is motorcycle gang violence and the resulting turf war spilling out into the streets. We see that in Toronto and in Montreal. There is little to do on the part of this government right now to change a lot of that.

It is no secret in law enforcement circles that the Hell's Angels are in an all out war with the Outlaws motorcycle gang over control of the lucrative drug trade, prostitution and a mass of contraband smuggling and distribution business. The recent spate of bombings and killings in Montreal and Toronto continues as kingpins make money and people die. The carnage must stop if law and order is to be restored on Canadian streets.

It is extremely unsettling that this government would not acknowledge the new reality of organized criminal activity in our country. Furthermore, this do–nothing government has jeopardized the security of law–abiding citizens by burying its head in the sand and hoping that crime will disappear.

Consider that the budget for this witness protection program in Canada will accommodate approximately 80 to 100 individuals in any given year. That is very small. The budget established by the Solicitor General of Canada, a mere $3.4 million, is fundamentally inadequate given the resources required to penetrate the culture of organized crime and to properly identify and recruit criminals willing to inform on their own kind.

• (1530)

The RCMP would intensify its efforts in this regard if more resources were available. My chief concern is not only the witness protection funding deficiencies but also the lack of vision on the part of the Solicitor General. Instead of funding special interest lobbies who advocate criminal rights, the solicitor general might instruct his fat cat colleagues to consider the safety of the public for a change.

Perhaps if the minister were to rescind his gold plated pension and convince others in the government to do the same, the government could then find the funds to give the RCMP the tools it needs to get the job done. However those pensions are near and dear to the hearts of the government side.

Bill C–78 certainly is a step toward strengthening the RCMP witness protection program as it exists presently. However, there were some problems with the legislation before this bill came into being which have given rise to the amendments we are proposing here today. The first is the absolute authority of the RCMP commissioner in the decision making process in the following areas: to determine whether a witness should be admitted into the program; to terminate the protection of the witness if in the opinion of the commissioner it is warranted; to disclose the identity and the location of the witness or the protectee; and to make arrangements with other law enforcement agencies, attorneys general of the provinces or other provincial agencies.

With respect to the agreements that are struck between the parties involved in the witness protection program, I wish to point out that as it stands with this bill there is no resolution mechanism or appeal procedure for agencies, agents and protectees to air their concerns beyond the commissioner. It is a crucial that a resolution mechanism become part of this bill. I know personally of disagreements arising between law enforcement agencies and the RCMP which ended abruptly upon the decision of the commissioner. Take for example the concerns expressed by two witnesses who came before the standing committee on justice, one of whom was a serving police officer representing dozens of police agencies and officers across the country.

As it stands, the individual witness under protection is restricted in taking up matters of concern regarding the conditions of protection to the public complaints commission but not to the solicitor general's office. I submit that this process is totally inadequate.

Most police departments have an informant control officer who regulates the handling of an informant for the appropriate department. This type of arrangement allows a process of appeal in the event of an unsatisfactory decision on the part of the commissioner and would be available to agreements between individual police agencies and the RCMP via the informant control officer. I submit that this provision would make the program much more effective thus enabling agencies greater flexibility in their investigation of organized crime.

I have had an opportunity to visit various parts of this country and specifically this province. Organized crime has a firm grip in certain areas and the police agencies can do little or nothing about it. One such area several Reform MPs visited was the area of Cornwall and the reserve of Akwesasne where there is organized smuggling and it is being distributed across this country.

A lot of people do not understand the effects of drug smuggling as it applies to their own lives and their own communities. Drugs that come through areas such as the Akwesasne reserve at Cornwall and are distributed across the country do make it onto the streets of our communities and into our schools.

I would strongly urge members to support this particular bill which brings forth more accountability to deal with crime of that nature.

That is not the only area in the country that is subject to the will of the organized criminal. Until we get some real firm legislation and a strong commitment on the part of the Solicitor General to increase the funding in this particular area to combat the organized syndicate, we will not gain any headway and the streets of our country will not be any safer.

• (1535)

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I heard my colleague talking about his motion and I cannot help comparing it to a remake of an old B movie.

What are we debating exactly? A bill and amendment motions which, after all, will not prevent anybody from sleeping soundly tonight. As a matter of fact, Bill C–78 is so boring that I find it surprising that there are still some hon. members around still awake.

The solicitor general has invented nothing. He simply follows the international trend. Other countries have protection programs for witnesses. Programs in place in the United States, in the United Kingdom and in Australia have inspired the solicitor general for his Bill C–78. As usual, Canada is trailing behind other countries. Yet again it has failed to show leadership or innovation.

What is the purpose of Bill C–78? It proposes the establishment of a program operated under the commissioner of the RCMP for the protection of witnesses and informants as well as related or associated persons who might be at risk. The protection may include relocating the person, providing him or her with some accommodation, a new identity, as well as counselling and the necessary financial support for that purpose.

Motion No. 1 moved by the member for Calgary Northeast is by far the best suggestion made by the Reform Party in a long time. Unfortunately it is not new, since it had already been moved by the Bloc Quebecois during clause by clause study of Bill C–78 by the justice committee. It is well disguised but the principle remains the same.

I had proposed to amend the Witness Protection Program Act so as to prevent the Commissioner of the RCMP from being the judge, jury and sole executioner of the program proposed by the solicitor general.

The idea behind our main and related motions was that the solicitor general was to be entirely responsible for the program. This is one of the numerous problems with Bill C–78. This legislation provides that the program will be managed by the Commissioner of the RCMP, the same commissioner who determines the beneficiaries and the amount of protection they will be given.

How are the authorities who operate the program accountable for their actions? The RCMP both manages the program and is responsible for it. The RCMP is accountable unto itself. It is the judge, the jury and the executioner at the same time.

Not only that, the government wanted to give the commissioner judicial privilege. Fortunately, because of our protests in committee, it did not.

I tried to understand, but to no avail; the explanations given by the Office of the Solicitor General were as nebulous as they were convoluted.

As an aside, I wish to point out the deplorable effort made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General of Canada to clarify the question for the justice committee. When he appeared before the committee, the parliamentary secretary did not know how to answer my questions, especially those concerning the problem of codefendents. Unable to answer my questions, the member mumbled a few words before letting his officials do the work for him. The member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine appeared to be out of his depth.

The problem with an indictment dealing with two or more defendents is that the Witness Protection Program can be used as a negotiation tool.

Let us take the case of two accomplices charged with the same murder. If we assume that proof beyond doubt is readily adduced, but lacks a key element to bring about a guilty verdict, the testimony of one of the accomplices could prove crucial to the proceedings. The crown cannot afford to weaken the credibility of the judicial system if neither of the defendents can be compelled to testify against the other one.

The crown's alternative is to offer one of the accomplices a reduced sentence or other benefits, in exchange for pleading guilty to a lesser charge.

The other benefits which can be offered, in addition to a reduced sentence, may vary from one judicial district to another.

• (1540)

They generally deal with the length of the sentence and the conditions of confinement. In return, the first accomplice will testify against the second one, and instead of two acquittals, the crown will gloat it got two guilty verdicts. But there is a catch. With Bill C–78, the crown will have another present to offer criminals in return for their co–operation.

Both individuals in my previous example are, I believe, equally morally reprehensible. By offering the protection program to one of them, but not to both, our judicial system will once again apply double standards. A murderer could be protected by the program while the accomplice he helped convict will languish in prison. The public will not soon forget the Karla Homolka case.

To get back to the motion of the member for Calgary Northeast, I remind the House that it is based, more or less, on principles presented in committee by the Bloc Quebecois. I submitted several amendments myself, several of them specifying that the solicitor himself should be responsible for the witness protection program and not the commissioner of the RCMP.

The Reform Party did not support any of these amendments and today, they have the gall to make believe it is their idea. Since imitation is a form of flattery, I thank my colleagues of the third party. In spite of the Reform Party's opportunism, especially that of the member for Calgary Northeast, I will vote for motion No. 1.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the member for Saint–Hubert that the bill as tabled by the solicitor general stresses the importance of guaranteeing sources and witnesses the best possible protection.

Among the changes that should strengthen the program, we find a clear definition of the eligibility criteria for witnesses and a more transparent program management structure that would require greater accountability from all those in charge. I want to repeat, to be sure the situation is quite clear, that we will not support the Reform Party motion.

[English]

I would like to add that pursuant to the RCMP Act, the solicitor general can provide advice to the commissioner of the RCMP concerning matters of policy. The commissioner or his delegate is in the best position to make these decisions concerning the day to day running of the witness protection program.

Since 1984 the RCMP have provided protection to witnesses to such a high professional level that there has never been an individual killed or seriously injured while under their protection.

As a result of the bill, this highly effective program will operate in a much more open and transparent manner, as I have just indicated to the hon. member for Saint–Hubert, thereby ensuring that all participants are aware of both their rights and their obligations under this program.

In conclusion, we will not be supporting this motion.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Fraser Valley East, or West. You look like the fellow from Fraser Valley East.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is only the beard. Regional disparities: I have no hair and he has some.

Speaking to Bill C–78, the witness protection program, I must say that I support this bill. It is nice to finally get the government to move in a direction where even the victims in this country are getting some support from the government. That is not much to be said for a lot of the other crime bills in this country.

By the way, this bill originally came up in a private member's bill from one of the Liberal backbenchers. I really think that because an individual in the House was pushing it the government decided to move ahead and try to take the glory. I want to give some appreciation to that Liberal member who initially brought up the private member's bill that was dropped.

• (1545)

Currently we are looking at several amendments, which I will get to in a moment. There is no national bill for witness protection. The RCMP and local forces may have their own, but very secretive, with limited access to information as far as what the contents are. Again, victims have little or no knowledge of what these bills are and what rights they have. It is high time they did.

We know little of the programs. In fact when we attempt to get information in this country about witness protection there is very little acknowledgement from the RCMP or any other policing agency of what is available.

One of the Liberal members who usually talks while I am speaking says there is a reason for that, but the fact is if this were clear legislation then victims would have a little more knowledge of what is due to them. It is high time this government got serious about letting victims know what is available to them without disregarding their interests.

In this country we have seen provincial courts criticize the RCMP for their witness protection. We have seen courts in this country order protection for individuals. There was one very large drug seizure case where the individuals had to go to court to get protection. That should not be necessary in this country. It should be made available to them, not through order and mandate in the courts.

In 1993–94 we see that we spent $3.5 million on witness protection. I think that is very light. If we are going to assist in trying to prevent crime, or at least trying to rectify criminal situations and incarcerate people for wrongdoing, we have to put more support on the end of witness protection. This bill does that.

If the government needs money, which it does, it can take some of it from the fines and the other revenues it gets from other policing activities, so it would be possible to finance some of this business. As I understand it, the RCMP welcomes this, which is good.

There are two amendments we are seeking in the bill. With the inclusion of the first amendment there would be one more level of appeal not only for the protectee, who can now appeal his case to the public complaints commissioner, but also for police agencies which for the first time are granted a level of appeal beyond the commissioner or the minister.

As members know, there is an absolute authority granted to the commissioner, as my colleague from Calgary has said, but it bears repeating. This is an important aspect of the bill. It has to be changed.

The commissioner has exclusive authority in the following four areas: to determine whether a witness should be admitted to the program; to terminate the protection of a witness if the commissioner believes it to be warranted; to disclose the identity and location of the witness or protected person; and to make agreements with other law enforcement agencies or attorneys general. With our amendment to clause 5, we allow some further avenues for the individuals in the program.

Certain witnesses need protection. Unfortunately some of the witnesses who need protection in this country are also criminals. However if we are going to get at the root of the problem in this country we have to afford even those individuals some protection if they come forward in particular cases such as cocaine smuggling and so on and so forth. While I dislike protecting criminals, in this particular case I believe it is necessary. I believe it should also apply to smugglers.

• (1550)

Witnesses receive the same protection as the criminal if they come forward. Unfortunately victims know very little of their rights. They know very little of what is afforded them in terms of a bill such as this or in terms of any other legislation under criminal law. Victims should be read their rights. Their rights should be publicized, including rights such as being informed of the details of the crown's intention to offer a plea bargain; being informed of their rights at every stage of a process, including those rights involving compensation from the offender; and being informed of the offender's status throughout the whole criminal justice process.

If we are going to move in the direction of affording victims their rights in these areas, then victims must be afforded the knowledge of what is in a witness protection act.

We know that other countries have witness protection acts, such as Australia and the United States. There are problems with the American act. The advocacy groups that are responsible for witness protection make it very difficult for the crown to have access to a witness. We must be careful when we are legislating laws for individuals who come forward to put their lives on the line. We must guard them but we cannot overprotect them and prevent justice from taking its proper course.

I will be voting for this bill and the two amendments. If the two amendments are not accepted I will still support the legislation. It is necessary to move the government in a direction on behalf of people who are trying to help curb crime in Canada.

WITNESS PROTECTION PROGRAM ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–78, an act to provide for the establishment and operation of a program to enable certain persons to receive protection in relation to certain inquiries, investigations or prosecutions, as reported (with amendment) from the committee.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to take part in the debate this afternoon. I would like to begin by doing something I rarely do, which is to compliment the members of the third party for their support of the legislation.

Mr. Thompson: Do not get carried away.

Mr. Hermanson: We are just being friendly.

Ms. Clancy: I want to particularly commend the hon. member for Fraser Valley East.

I am astounded that they even heckle me when I am saying nice things about them. It is probably because they are in shock.

This legislation has been a necessity for some time. The witness protection plan in the past has basically operated under principles and guidelines laid down in RCMP internal policies. There is no question that this kind of activity is much better and much more in the public interest when it is covered by legislation passed in the House.

• (1555)

It is tragic to think that we are debating this bill today in the aftermath of yet another tragic occurrence in our country. I am speaking of the shooting yesterday in Cartierville, Quebec of the young female police officer who was shot in a community police station. She was the mother of three children and had just returned from maternity leave. The youngest of her three children was only eight months old.

I do not know if there have been more developments today. Last night I watched the news along with our colleague, the member for Saint–Laurent—Cartierville, who is very concerned about this tragedy that has taken place in her riding. There are no known witnesses. This happened in a busy mall, but we all know that things can happen that people may not see or hear.

With a program like this and with the attendant publicity the passage of this bill will create, we can hope people will come forward even if they are frightened, as many people are, to get involved with the criminal justice system.

Our colleagues from the other party have raised some legitimate points which they need to have answered. Even with the legislation replacing a mere policy program, it is extremely important, if this program is to work, that access to the information must be very, very limited.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley West talked about victims and the need for victims to know certain things. I believe the victims can well know about the process, about what the policy is and about what the legislation is, but that could be part of a government information program or it could be part of public education that victims rights groups would get involved with. However, in the actual day to day administration of the program itself, common sense must rule. Only a very small number of people can or should be apprised of who exactly is in the program, where these people are located and all of the attendant facts necessary to make sure the program works.

I take this rare occasion of amity between the government and those on the other side to explain that it is not a question of wanting to deny victims their rights to know. It is much more a question, as is the whole basis of this legislation, that we want to ensure that witnesses come forward and give their testimony in a court of law which will lead to the conviction of those who have committed offences and will add to the deterrent factor. In other words, it is to ensure that this legislation takes its place as part of the underpinning of our system of justice. This is a very sensitive area. It may well be the most sensitive area in the entire federal realm of legislating vis–à–vis the justice system.

Part of the difficulty, as with many of our developments in the criminal law in this place, is that a lot of people in the public at large garner their information about programs such as this from popular television programs. What happens on popular television programs and what happens within our various police departments, including the RCMP, is not necessarily the same.

• (1600)

Consequently, as the hon. member for Fraser Valley brought up, there is a lot of misinformation out there. People want to know more. It is the duty of members of Parliament and of government without being patronizing and without attempting to block the public's right to know to get out the message that some things being publicized would be counterproductive to the system of justice and to the system of government.

There is no question that secrecy in many cases is the enemy of democracy, but there are exceptions to that rule. In something such as the witness protection program, we all have to agree that a level of confidentiality in the protection of those witnesses who are doing their very best to help in the protection of the public is absolutely essential.

I do not have a very long time to address this matter but I also wanted to speak briefly on the question of cost in this legislation. Again, what we have here is very much of a bargain, particularly within the normal costs of federal government programs. At the moment, the cost of the RCMP source witness protection program is $3.4 million. No additional costs are expected as a result of introducing this legislation. The average cost per case is $30,000 and in actuality 60 per cent of cases cost less than $20,000.

It is difficult to say how many persons may be in the program at any given time because the numbers do change daily. They change with the expiration of protection agreements and the elimination of threats to safety. At any given time there are 80 to 100 people, including family members, in the program.

We all realize how important a program such as this is to our justice system. I want to compliment our colleagues in the third party who are supporting this, or in the words of their whip, any of those who wish to support it. We appreciate that support.

This country's criminal justice system is one that works very well. It is the subject of a lot of brick bats, a lot of criticism from time to time but in general as a law professor of mine used to say, under the universal theory of rough justice, in 80 per cent of the cases things work out.

The witness protection program may give us a betterment of those odds. Certainly all of us on this side of the House, as I know all on the other side, are committed to a criminal justice system which is fair and which protects Canadian society at large. This legislation will be a great help in ensuring that end. I support it very strongly. I congratulate members of the third party for their support as well.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address the amendments to Bill C–78. This bill came before the justice committee. As a member of the justice committee I heard witnesses address their concerns about the bill.

One of the concerns I want to address and which this amendment focuses upon is the enormous degree of vulnerability of many of the witnesses who come under the 14 or 15 witness protection programs across Canada. We heard testimony indicating that these witnesses are very vulnerable. For some of them, their lives are in danger. They have received threats yet they want to do the right thing and provide the evidence to ensure that the justice system works and that those who are involved in organized crime and in criminal activities are brought to justice. Some of the testimony we heard from the witnesses raises serious concerns in this area.

I have the brief submitted by Mr. Barry Swadron, a lawyer who acts on behalf of witnesses who have challenged the program because of the violation of what they believe to be the agreement the police forces have made with them. He states: "By the time protected witnesses get to lawyers, it is often to undo harm that could have been avoided had they consulted lawyers earlier. Police officers often discourage about to be protected witnesses from retaining lawyers with respect to proposed arrangements. A number of protected witnesses have been advised by police authorities that a lawyer will not be able to help them. We have been told that police officers pressure witnesses not to consult a lawyer. Indeed the negative pressure has on occasion been prohibition". He concludes by stating that this is reprehensible.

The committee heard testimony on this bill indicating that the agreements witnesses enter into in many cases are not upheld. They are not provided with the protection. They are not provided with the benefits they need. This new bill was scrutinized by those witnesses to determine whether or not there were checks and balances to ensure that they had recourse should their handlers not fulfil their end of the agreement.

Mr. Swadron goes on to say in his brief: "Swadron Associates have received dozens of telephone calls from across Canada and beyond from the types of persons described above". He is talking about the protectees. "They are of both sexes, various ages and from many walks of life. A substantial number have become our clients. We advise some. We negotiate on behalf of others. Sometimes we must resort to litigation where police forces are sued in order to obtain the contractual benefits that these protectees have entered into".

He also states: "You would be amazed at the hardships faced by these individuals. They experience the worst type of cultural shock. Not only are they forced to forge new beginnings in strange surroundings, but also to erase their much more familiar past. The degree of assistance they receive from police authorities varies significantly. Every aspect of daily living that you and I take for granted has for them been inexorably altered. Even attending to basic needs such as arranging accommodation, obtaining health care, getting a driver's licence, opening a bank account, or placing children in schools becomes insurmountable".

When we examined this bill we examined it from many perspectives and points of view. I was most concerned about whether or not the bill provided adequate checks and balances for the very sensitive and vulnerable position many of these witnesses find themselves in.

As I said earlier, many have been threatened. They fear for their lives and those of their spouses and children. They are very susceptible to the manipulation of the handler. Unless the handler is very conscious about the duties and responsibilities that they must discharge to the protectee under the agreement, often the conditions of the agreement are violated. Then the protectee is left in an extremely vulnerable position where they either have to seek their own remedies or seek the support of legal counsel if they wish to pursue what they consider to be benefits that have been withheld from them. As Mr. Swadron says, it creates an enormous problem within the witness protection programs.

Mr. Swadron referred to Bill C–78 as a police protection program rather than a witness protection program. He centred on what was at that time clause 19 of the bill. Clause 19 has been withdrawn and was done so by the government. Of course, we on this side of the House support that withdrawal because what clause 19 provided for was the protection of the RCMP. If the RCMP could simply raise the defence of having acted in good faith, then no protectee could sue the government successfully. That was withdrawn because of some of the concerns raised by witnesses, some of the concerns I am raising today and the amendment to which we are speaking addresses to some extent.

Clause 19 was withdrawn so that if there are areas of culpability in terms of discharging the requirements of any agreement, there is no legal barrier that would interfere with the right of the protectee to seek litigation in order to establish what they consider to be benefits from the agreement.

I am very much in favour of the withdrawal of clause 19 which is no longer in the bill. However, I also have great concern about some of the testimony provided. The commissioner alone has absolute power and authority to determine not only what witnesses enter into the program but the conditions of the agreement as well as the right to rule on any concern a protectee might have.

I support this amendment. It would provide the means whereby individuals can address the minister who can then be held accountable by the elected representatives of the House as to how these contracts are administered. I support the amendment and I will be supporting the bill.

I hope all hon. members will consider the testimony we have heard before the committee and the concerns I have raised with regard to the extreme vulnerability of the witnesses. We must ensure there are reasonable checks and balances within the legislation to protect them from abuse.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

An hon. member: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The question is on Motion No. 1.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 76 a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.) moved:

Motion No. 2

That bill C–78, in Clause 16, be amended by adding after line 17, on page 8, the following:

"(3) Every report prepared under subsection (1) shall, after it is laid before each House of Parliament under subsection (2), be referred to the committee of Parliament that normally considers matters relating to justice and legal affairs.

(4) Every report prepared under subsection (1) shall include, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the following information:

(a) the number of agreements entered into and the law enforcement agencies involved;

(b) the number of applications made;

(c) the average amount spent on each agreement entered into;

(d) the number of agreements terminated and the reasons for their termination;

(e) the number and types of offences committed by protectees;

(f) the total amount of all money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund spent in relation to the operation of this Act;

(g) co-operative measures between the Force and other law enforcement agencies with respect to witness protection; and

(h) the number of foreign witnesses admitted to Canada and the number of Canadian witnesses relocated outside Canada."

He said: Mr. Speaker, it never ceases to amaze me how little the government side knows about what is happening in the world of crime. In spite of the fact that we see all these documents, newspaper clippings and initiatives which have been started by the government, it never seems to want to really address the problem.

One of the headings in a newspaper not too long ago was: "Guns replace cigarette smuggling". Who does the smuggling? Who smuggles guns, cigarettes, booze and the like? No one but an organized criminal group. They are in it to make money.

• (1615)

As I mentioned before, several Reform MPs, and I know Liberal members went to the same area, went to the Akwesasne reserve and the city of Cornwall. It is interesting to note that the police task force initiated to combat smuggling is afraid to patrol the river in the evening for fear of being shot at by organized criminals who have literally taken over control of the river to move their contraband. That takes place mostly during the evening and the night. They are organized criminals who need special treatment. When we talk about protecting witnesses, witnesses from this area are afraid to come forward for fear of reprisal. They know the police cannot protect them adequately.

This is happening right across the country. Ipperwash is another place. The police are reluctant to properly police the area of Bosanquet and Ipperwash because they may end up having a confrontation with an organized criminal group. We can have all the witness protection programs we want, but if there are not adequate funds to deal with it, it is another matter. We will not be protecting witnesses.

That is happening in the country, not just in Ipperwash and not just in Cornwall. We can look at other areas including metropolitan areas such as Toronto and Vancouver. Organized criminal groups have control in many areas, whether or not we want to admit it. It will take extraordinary means to combat it. Power is given to the police including under the witness protection act as mentioned here. Funds must be available to take care of it, if the government is serious about it. I do not believe the Liberal government is serious about fighting crime at all. It would do something more about it if that were the case.

People are living in fear in their own homes. This is what combating crime the Liberal way has done. They have to bar themselves in their own homes to protect themselves from criminals who have control of the streets. That is not the way to fight crime. When it is in an organized fashion even this legislation falls short because many police departments have their hands tied.

My second amendment deals with the submission of the annual report on the operation of the program as it applies to the preceding year. There are enabling sections in the legislation to have the report placed before Parliament. However we are without any provision for having the report sent before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to be reviewed. It does not mention the content of what the report should include. I believe the report is ridiculous. If there is a budget of $3.4 million as the government has so slated, there should be some content in the report and some subsection to specify precisely how the money is to be spent.

Many times members have stood on both sides of the House and talked about accountability. It is a nice word but it seems as though a regulation has to be in place before somebody actually becomes accountable. Members on that side who were in opposition years before railed time and time against the government of the day on accountability and responsibility. All this amendment is suggesting is that there be more accountability.

Mr. Thompson: There is the problem.

Mr. Hanger: That is right. It is a question of accountability. I agree with my colleague that they do not want to be accountable.

I present an opportunity to members of the House to learn from past mistakes to make sure the bill does not miss its mark. The following information should be included in the annual report.

First is the number of agreements entered into and the law enforcement agencies involved. This is important, given the fact that there have been disputes in the past between law enforcement agencies and the RCMP in this area before the legislation was thought of.

• (1620)

Second is the number of applications made. Is everyone who makes an application accepted or are some turned down? That information should be made available.

Third is the average amount spent on each arrangement. There is a budget of $3.4 million. Approximately 100 protectees were in the program in the past. Will that continue? Will the number rise? When we look at organized crime as it is manifesting itself in the country, it will undoubtedly rise. Where will the extra money come from to protect the individuals who apply?

Fourth is the number of agreements terminated and the reasons for termination. This has been a dispute in other agencies or other police departments. The commissioner has the final say on who comes into the program and who does not. That information should be made available to the committee.

Fifth is the number and types of offences committed.

Sixth is the total amount of money spent from the consolidated revenue fund.

Seventh is the co–operative measures taken between the RCMP and other law enforcement agencies with respect to witness protection. Many joint force operations are taking place in the country. There are so many joint forces that it is impossible for one agency to effectively combat organized criminal activity without joining forces with others. This information should be made available. It is the other law enforcement agencies that often have the objections if the RCMP commissioner is the only one who has the final say on the agreements.

The last point is the number of foreign witnesses admitted to Canada who have become part of the protection program and the number of Canadian witnesses relocated outside Canada.

None of these proposed amendments is unreasonable. Upon review by the hon. members of the House I am confident they will see that the amendments are designed to bring about more accountability in the bill and the decision making process of the commissioner.

Given the rise of organized and violent crime the government should be doing everything in its power to ensure that the citizens of Canada are protected to the fullest. I urge all members to vote not based upon partisan considerations but rather on the best interests of their constituents and in favour of the amendments presented.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the second motion of the Reform member stresses other shortcomings of Bill C–78.

First of all, I would like to say that Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Calgary Northeast, is redundant in the first subsection. I will explain. The hon. member would like the annual report required under clause 16 of the bill to be transmitted to the Solicitor General and either tabled in the House or referred to the justice committee. However, according to Standing Order 32(5):

> Reports, returns or other papers laid before the House in accordance with an Act of Parliament shall thereupon be deemed to have been permanently referred to the appropriate standing committee.

This means that once the report of the commissioner has been tabled in the House it is immediately referred to the Standing Committee on Justice. The member of the Reform Party does not have to worry. It is already in the Standing Orders and therefore subsection (3) is superfluous.

Subsection (4) tries to define much more precisely the work of the commissioner. He would have to give a lot of details in the report that he must submit to the Solicitor General every year.

Clause 16 of Bill C–78 requires that the commissioner submit a report on the operation of the program to the minister, who in this case is the Solicitor General. The clause is quite vague as to the content of this report.

• (1625)

All the bill says, and I quote, is: "a report on the operation of the Program during the preceding fiscal year".

Things cannot be put more succintly. The bill does not provide any satisfactory answer to many questions that I think are obvious.

What the government has given us is nothing more than Canada–wide legislation that will be administered by the RCMP and to which provincial and local police authorities will have to adapt.

Today, we still do not know how co–ordination between the different police groups will be ensured, because Bill C–78 is silent on this issue. In fact, the silence of this bill is most certainly its main characteristic. What concerns me is not what is in the bill, but what was omitted.

A series of questions remain unanswered. Once the bill has been passed by Parliament, how long will it take to put the program in place? What budget will be allocated to the program? How does this amount compare with the current budget? How many people are expected to benefit from the program each year?

It is all fine and well to want to protect informers, but we should know how much this is going to cost. Indeed, we do not even know which envelope the Solicitor General intends to take the money from.

As we know, the witness protection program will be a kind of contract between the RCMP and the protectee. Let us examine the respective rights and obligations of the parties to this agreement.

The commissioner's obligations come down to almost nothing. As indicated in clause 8 of the bill, he only has:

> —to take such reasonable steps as are necessary to provide the protection referred to in the agreement to the protectee;

That is all. So, I hope that he will take the necessary steps. But what kind of steps are they? Only the commissioner will know because, once again, the bill does not explain what these steps will be. Thus, these "reasonable" steps are the only obligations the commissioner will have to fulfill.

As for the protectee, he must first provide the information or evidence required by the inquiry or the prosecution that has made the protection necessary. Second, the protectee must keep his or her hands clean, that is refrain from activities that constitute an offence against an act of Parliament. Shoplifting could be in this category.

Last, he or she must accept and give effect to reasonable requests and directions made by the commissioner in relation to the protection provided to the protectee and the obligations of the protectee.

If the protectee deliberately contravenes his or her obligations under the protection agreement, the commissioner may terminate the protection, provided that the protectee can make representations concerning the matter.

This bill puts things very succintly. I suppose that to correct these flaws, some practices are going to evolve allowing the RCMP to completely evade the power of supervision of Parliament.

This is the danger with poor legislation. Police forces create their own rules without any respect for the law. In fact, they are the ones who actually write it as circumstances change. I ask you this: When are we going to see the federal government assume its responsibilities and legislate in a detailed and precise fashion so that those who must enforce these laws know how to proceed?

Since the motion of the member from Calgary Northeast tries to fill some gaps, we are going to support it.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, even if the hon. member opposite raised several issues, we will not support the motion as tabled by the third party.

But the hon. member still raised some points. We should remind Canadians, in particular the hon. members opposite, that the commissioner may terminate the protection provided if, in his opinion, the witness provided false information, omitted to provide important information, or deliberately failed to meet his obligations under the protection agreement.

• (1630)

I think that the hon. member did point out some issues, such as the cost of producing an annual report. Normally, information would be provided on costs and on the number of participants in the program. Of course, certain criteria will established.

[English]

In reference to the member of the third party, we on the government side will not be supporting this motion. However, it is not necessary to enact a provision requiring the annual report to be referred to the justice and legal affairs committee.

Reports which concern matters relating to justice and legal affairs are presently referred to the justice and legal affairs committee.

With respect to the motion which specifies the content of the annual report to be tabled by the solicitor general before Parliament, many pieces of legislation require the tabling of an annual report without listing the specific information the report should contain.

The list of items provided in this motion is extremely helpful and will be referred to the commission for its consideration. It is important that care be taken to ensure that the information included in the report does not inadvertently compromise any witnesses in the program or the program as a whole.

Members of the justice and legal affairs committee will have the opportunity to review and assess the first report to ensure that the appropriate balance has been achieved in terms of informing the public without compromising the integrity of the program.

Therefore we will not be supporting the opposition motion presented to us.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as a a new member of the House, having been here only two years, it is always discouraging and dismaying for me to see not only in the House but in committee when the minister, through his parliamentary secretary or through his own directive, indicates what he wants the committee or the House to do, and everyone else on the government side simply follows suit regardless of the impression the amendments make on their own common sense.

It is dismaying for me to hear that the government is not going to support this amendment regardless of the common sense that it makes, regardless of the protection that it might provide in terms of checks and balances for the witnesses who are dragged into this system because of circumstances, perhaps in many cases beyond their own control. The government side is not prepared to honour the checks and balances that would protect the vulnerability of the witness entering into this program.

Let me tell members how vulnerable those people are. They come into the program because their life or the lives of their children may be threatened. They know that unless they abide by the wishes of their handler he or she can have an enormous impact on pulling the protection program out from under them.

What we are asking for in this amendment is simply a degree of accountability on the part of the commissioner who will be administering the program. Having served 14 years with the Mounted Police I know the commissioner never knows anything about things that often happen at the grassroots level because the only channel of communication he has are the reports he reads from people who prepare the reports at the grassroots level.

Consequently there are many things that could happen and are happening to these witnesses according to the testimony we have heard which places them at enormous vulnerability, where their grievances are not met and where they have absolutely no recourse. They ought to have a reasonable degree of recourse through their elected representatives who would review the program on an annual basis with these requirements. What does the commissioner have to provide for in his report to the solicitor general? What is it? Practically anything he wants unless there are some type of guidelines, the type of guidelines provided for in this amendment.

We do not want to know the names or the places of residents or any other factor that would place the witnesses in a vulnerable situation. Absolutely not. That is not the purpose of this amendment. What we want to do is have a degree of accountability in greater depth than a casual report from the commissioner. We see these kinds of reports. They have been submitted to the minister, whether from SIRC or some other statutory requirement.

They simply say what they want to say and withhold whatever information they want simply because there is no statutory requirement to provide that information. This amendment would go a long way to establish a reasonable check and balance on a program that involves innocent people and places them in very vulnerable situations. I support this amendment and I will be supporting the bill.

When we create these sorts of bills we ought to ensure citizens are provided the greatest degree of protection possible and not those who administer the program.

I urge all members to seriously consider and support this bill. It provides the reasonable checks and balances this kind of program ought to have.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 76, a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Following an intervention of the chief government whip, the vote will be deferred to the end of Government Orders today.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY ACT

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): moved that Bill C–109, an act to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act and the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, before I talk specifically about the amendments to the Bankruptcy Act, Bill C–109, it is important to go back and have a little history on how the bill evolved.

I hope later today we will hear from our colleague, the member for Dartmouth, because in opposition he was our critic for consumer and corporate affairs and had a tremendous hand in crafting this bill on bankruptcy and insolvency. It is a complex bill because it includes a lot of provisions affecting the bankruptcy and insolvency area.

This bill contains almost 100 pages and has provisions affecting procedures in consumer bankruptcies and proposals, landlord compensation where leases are disclaimed in reorganizations, liability of directors and stays of action against directors during reorganizations. It includes the whole area of protection of trustees and receivers against personal liability for pre–appointment environmental damage and other claims, workmen's compensation board claims, the dischargeability of student loan debts.

Also included are the licensing and regulation of trustees and their liability in relation to other activities related to business, the requirement that bankrupts pay part of their income to the bankruptcy estate, securities, firm bankruptcies and international solvencies, and so on.

I have gone over those issues because it is important to understand this is a very complex area but vital in terms of making sure the environment is good for creating opportunities for business men and women to get involved in risk taking. It is also very important that we deal with the issue in terms of protecting the consumer.

The amendments we are putting forward today are a further striking of a balance between rehabilitation and obligation. In other words, the emphasis in the bill is to make sure we do everything we can to help preserve jobs and the businesses that create them. Rather than automatically having a situation in which people lose their businesses, we create an environment in which we can actually help them through and that before they become bankrupt we take every measure possible to help them through difficult circumstances.

The amendments to the bill we are dealing with today are further refinements of the bill from 1992. This was a commitment we made. When the last bill was approved in 1992 we said that three years later we would have a review. We have listened to people from across Canada, from business groups and consumer groups. These amendments reflect the recommendations the study group proposed.

I will deal specifically with the amendments: "The maintenance of income support benefits, such as GST tax refunds, that allow families and individuals to meet their essential needs". Under the proposed legislation these benefits are exempt from seizures unintended to reimburse creditors.

"The priority status for provable claims by divorced or separated spouses for spousal or child support payments". Previously spouses were not considered creditors.

"Debtors to meet their obligations where a sexual or physical assault charge resulted in penalties". The amendments make these judgements non–dischargeable and allow support for assault victims to discontinue.

• (1645)

The bill also has a further refinement in the area of student loans, tighter control of premature student bankruptcies intended to discharge responsibility from student loans. In recent years the federal government has lost over $60 million per year in loan defaults as a result of early student claims of bankruptcy. The proposed changes will make student loan debts non–dischargeable for 24 months following termination of studies, recognizing that some students experience real economic difficulties. The amendments complement a variety of repayment options during that 24–month period including no repayment in situations of hardship.

Also individuals can make recompense from a portion of surplus income deemed to exceed a minimum cost of living. This provision provides for a regularized repayment schedule and encourages bankrupt individuals to make their best effort to reimburse their creditors.

Under directives from the superintendent of bankruptcy, trustees will have powers to establish rates and terms of a conditional discharge. This will save court costs and will allow for a personalized arrangement between a bankrupt individual and his or her creditors. Also spouses can make a joint consumer proposal where their financial relationship requires a co–ordinated repayment effort. These new provisions streamline the proceedings and save costs.

There is more time for creditors to review debtor proposals and a quicker response from the courts to those proposals. The old waiting period for creditors would be extended from 30 days to 45 days. The courts would have 15 days to indicate whether the proposal had been accepted as opposed to the current response period of 30 days. Otherwise the proposal would be deemed to be accepted. There is also a provision for counselling for persons related to the debtor.

That essentially represents the essence of those amendments in terms of the individual. We also have further amendments relating to businesses, farmers and fishermen. We feel confident that the House will support all of these amendments, certainly because of the participation of the advisory group.

Over the next little while the House has to deal with the whole issue of creating confidence in the marketplace. I personally do not like dealing with the whole issue of bankruptcy and insolvency. Even though the bill is there to protect and to make sure that people are treated fairly, I believe there is a very high level of anxiety in the marketplace right now. One of the things we must do as members of Parliament is make sure that we somehow work at creating an environment where the confidence level in the business community is returned to what it used to be.

It is only when people have confidence in the marketplace and confidence in themselves that they take the risk that generates production and job opportunity which eventually creates a condition in the marketplace where bankruptcies are minimized. In the last couple of years, even though bankruptcies have really remained constant, the bottom line is that we still had too many. The quarterly releases on the number of bankruptcies tend to send a shiver right through the marketplace. It is a domino effect. It has an adverse impact on the confidence of the entire marketplace.

It is hoped this bill will assist in giving individuals and business men and women every opportunity to avoid or get around having to go through that dreaded experience of bankruptcy and insolvency.

• (1650)

I hope we can get the support of all members for the speedy passage of this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood about Bill C–109. This is a bill whose full–blown title is an act to amend the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act and the Income Tax Act.

It is quite bulky, as my hon. colleague pointed out, and it is difficult to read, which is understandable, since the 1992 reform had been 13 years in the making, that is to say from 1979 to 1992. The government finally tabled the famous bill that had taken all that time to prepare, the act of 1992 that Bill C–109 now seeks to make substantial changes to.

I agree with the hon. member opposite when he says that bankruptcy is a problem, a complex problem. A balance must be struck between the responsibility all of us have to pay what we owe and the hope to be able, even when deep in debt, to have a decent living and perhaps manage to pull through, whether we have put ourselves in this difficult financial situation or it is the result of a business venture we started that did not do too well.

According to the minister's release, this bill contains more than 70 amendments to the Bankruptcy Act. In the little time we have had to examine this legislation, I managed to review the principles. There are three, at the beginning of the bill, relating to consumer bankruptcies. For example, debts will now be repaid from excess income, that is to say income over and above the minimum cost of living.

But nowhere in the bill is this concept of minimum cost or standard of living defined. I guess that it will be up to the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, somewhere in Canada, to determine—arbitrarily at times, I am afraid—what this minimum will be. Take Quebec for example. I do not know if the same thing applies in other provinces, but surely it must. In Quebec, we have the Code of Civil Procedure, and section 553 et seq. provide that a portion of someone's salary cannot be garnished. Therefore, if the superintendent for Quebec decided to ignore what section 553 says about part of someone's salary being exempt from seizure in Quebec, I sincerely wonder—and I am not being facetious—who would be encroaching on whose jurisdiction then?

That has not been set out in the bill. I understand that is not its role, but that is an ambiguity that is likely to create uncertainty for some people and also—and I hope this will not be the rule—to open the door to abuse, to lead to abuse.

There is another principle here, the obligation for the debtor to discharge his or her financial responsibilities relating to alimony for his or her spouse and children or relating to damages awarded by the courts to compensate for physical or sexual assault. I cannot but commend that. Frankly, this is a provision that, in my opinion, is absolutely fundamental, and I commend the Minister of Industry for it. He is showing concern for his fellow citizens who might have been victims of some highly reprehensible acts. Otherwise, the offender could say: "It is very simple, I go bankrupt and we forget all about the harm I have done to you". I endorse without any reservation that provision in the bill.

A third point is that it will be impossible for students to retire their student loan debts within two years of completing their education. Need I say I do not agree?

Not too long ago, we had before us the budget implementation bill. If memory serves, it was Bill C–76. We talked about students. We raised the level of their financial contribution to their own education by providing additional loans. The issue gave rise to a rather heated debate in the House. Some said that students would end up with debts of $28,000 or $30,000 or more.

We thought the government was not being reasonable in that bill, because the students had their talents nipped in the bud in that they were being put in a state of virtual bankruptcy the moment they entered the labour market. Our remarks did not fall on deaf ears, as demonstrated by this bill in which the Minister of Industry tells us that students are actually overburdened, but they will not be allowed to file for bankruptcy, at least not within the first two years.

I cannot agree with this. True enough, we should always keep a proper balance between the obligation to pay one's debts and the right to lead a meaningful life. All Canadians have both this duty and this right. Fortunately, one provision in this bill makes it at least possible to have some cases examined on their merits. In some cases, students could avoid paying back their loan in full.

There are underlying social principles in this legislation. This bill also includes another provision that deals with the overall enforcement of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, and I am talking about the trustees.

Since the new legislation came into force in 1992, it has not been easy in the province of Quebec. We had some quasi–fraudulent bankruptcy cases that caused a lot of stir. For example, Zoom Informatique was dealt with very harshly by the courts because of the actions of the trustees involved in the case. We also heard of a lawyer named Sirois who went bankrupt, a bankruptcy involving $1.6 million which was highly contested. Mr. Sirois was the father of the Bankruptcy Act that we are about to modify today. He was also a bankruptcy expert in Quebec.

Not surprisingly, the bankruptcy authorities really got raked over the coals on television, during some very popular and highly rated CBC television programs such as Enjeux, which examined these fraudulent bankruptcy cases.

I think that the problem will remain, even though we try to licence and regulate the trustees in this bill, because in the mind of the people the problem lies with the fact that the profession of trustee is not legally recognized as a corporate body, as is the case with the Ordre des avocats du Québec, the Canadian Bar Association, the associations of architects and professional engineers, the College of Physicians and Surgeons, all professional associations that are legally recognized and can perform peer reviews at any time in order to preserve a degree of dignity for their profession.

Unfortunately, it seems that trustees in bankruptcy do not form a profession. Recently, I noticed that, pursuant to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, a code of ethics for trustees had been published in The Canada Gazette. It dealt with sections 54(30), (31), (32), (33), (34), etc.

• (1700)

Sure, these are great principles and I have nothing against them. Except that the enforcement of these sections of the code of ethics is never monitored unless a complaint is filed, because the Superintendent of Bankruptcy is overloaded. He cannot do it on his own, although this legislation is now giving him the authority to commission inquiries. If an association of trustees in bankruptcy were created, mandated primarily to protect the public interest and empowered like the other professional associations to issue licences, then we could have something valid.

This bill almost gives quasi–judicial powers to the trustee. The trustee almost becomes a public officer. According to the documents we were given, the bankrupt person must reimburse what he or she owes with his or her income considered to be in excess of the minimal cost of living. Whatever that is, as I said earlier.

This clause provides for a regular repayment schedule and encourages the bankrupt person to do everything possible to repay his or her creditors. Great! Under the supervision of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, who is already overloaded, we can immediately see from what is happening in the bankruptcy sector that the trustees will have the power to set the rates and the terms of a conditional discharge, the power to decree or decide, that is a quasi–judicial power.

According to the Bankruptcy Act that was replaced in 1992 and to the one that is now in force, the trustee acts in the interest of the creditors. The trustee does not have to be impartial in dealing with a bankruptcy. The trustee is primarily a representative of the creditors, not the person in bankruptcy.

Unfortunately, it is totally different in practice. Someone who is in dire financial straits decides, on the recommendation of a friend or a relative, to consult a trustee he knows well and tells him: "Look. I want to make an assignment, would you look after my case?" It is not in the interest of the trustee, who has a reputation for kindness, who is an expert in public relations, to ruin his own reputation. So, unless the creditors he is supposed to represent under the authority of his legal mandate are opposed to it, the trustee will continue to be rather lenient with the bankrupt individual, which is fine, but unfortunately, he will do it at the expense of the creditors who, more often than not, will end up licking their wounds.

The bill adds another dimension to the treatment of bankruptcy cases. For example, in the distribution or collocation order, greater importance is now given to the environmental aspect. We can imagine a situation where a contaminated building is in the possession of a trustee; the assets would first be used to decontaminate the ground.

I have some difficulty with this clause in combination with clause 18 modifying the existing act—so it is not something new—which provides: "The trustee may, with the permission of the inspectors, divest all or any part of the trustee's right, title or interest in any real property of the bankrupt". It could be that, if the trustee becomes aware that the land has no realizable value, he will get rid of it and pass on his responsibility to decontaminate the site to someone else. It is not clear in the bill. It was just to put a damper on my pleasure at finding this provision in the bill.

Unfortunately, the government could have taken the opportunity to include, in the distribution and collocation order, the salaries of employees present at the time of the shut–down of a corporation, for example.

• (1705)

That was the reason behind my colleague from Portneuf's tabling of a private member's bill. The bill was passed at second reading in the House before being sent to a committee. That was the last we heard of it. I saw the Minister of Industry of the time in a fit of ministerial pique when he realized that the bill had been passed. Maybe this is why the bill is being dragged out in committee. I do not know. Nevertheless, the bill has never come back here.

It went along the same lines and was in the same spirit as the decontamination clause, except that the last employees, thanks to whom the company had lasted so long and who had kept supporting it during a not necessarily easy winding up period, had priority over the decontamination of the site. And the moment a trustee in bankruptcy comes in and shuts the company down, he fires them all and does not owe them anything. In the priority of claims, they come far behind the banks; the seven big banks that made $4.3 billion in net profit last year.

I was listening to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, and we all know how attached the Liberals are to big banks. We could see it when Liberal Party's list of contributors was made public. This bank gave $250,000, that one $250,000 and so on, quarter million chunks. Those poor banks netted only $4.3 billion last year. Of course, it was impossible to table a bill on bankruptcy without protecting their interests first. This is what the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood wanted us to swallow, like a candy coated pill. But basically, when we read between the lines, the security involved is that of the poor big banks which showed a net profit of only $4.3 billion last year.

And yet banks never lose. This is not a bill for the banks. Good for them if they get something out of it like any citizen. But the bill should have been written first and foremost with the protection of the general public in mind. There are seven banks for 31 million Canadians. It seems to me that there is no comparison. Even if we take into account the hundred or so American and Canadian trust and leasing companies, there are still a lot more people than financial institutions in our society.

I have the strong impression that the bill's purpose is to protect investors, that is major banks, leasing companies, rather than to try to help ordinary Canadians who are often affected by a bankruptcy, those who end up losing a few weeks' or a few months' pay if not their shirt. The government did not display much concern for these people in this legislation, despite all the enthusiasm shown by the member for Broadview—Greenwood in praising this bill.

I am also delighted to see in the bill that small businesses will no longer be forced arbitrarily to declare bankruptcy, that factors such as the possibility of recovery, job losses, etc. will have to be considered. I think it is just great.

But if the Minister of Industry wanted to be realistic and if arbitrary business closures because of bankruptcy or insolvency were his main concern, and it shows in this bill, what is he waiting for to introduce meaningful legislation based on some of the principles in the Quebec legislation on agricultural zoning?

• (1710)

In Quebec, we had the political will to say: "Enough is enough. Farmland will not be parcelled out any more. If you decide to buy a large piece of land, you will have to live with it. You will not be able to sell it off in small parcels". Today, corporate raiders as they are called come along and buy businesses that often play a vital role in our economy.

Take the case of Canada Packers, which had been in Canada and in Quebec for at least 125 years, more precisely in Pointe–Saint–Charles. Then comes some professional auctioneer who buys everything for $500 million. He starts by selling separately the various components of economic activity of the company: beef production, $25 or $50 million, followed by egg, poultry, milk and oil production. He sells everything, often to competitors in that same sector.

Without any scruples, he puts 1,500, 2,000 or 3,000 heads of family out of work. His net profit is made up of the equipment, capital assets, land, buildings, etc. He heads back to England and kisses us goodbye. More often than not, he does not have to pay any tax, or if he does, the federal government usually finds out too late. He has already gone home and no longer has any assets in Canada, so the government can always try to collect.

You might say that this is not a case of insolvency when it actually happens. True, but it becomes one afterwards. So, the bill would deal appropriately with such situations. At least, this is the way I see it. If the minister is short of ideas, he should come to Quebec. When we had to deal with the parcelling out of businesses that were doing relatively well, we did some thinking and came up with the agricultural zoning act.

It is not easy to comment on a bill which has some 100 pages and is made up of bits and pieces, this in just three days. I could do a more thorough review if I had a week. I am convinced that this bill will not make it past the next stage, not necessarily because it is a bad bill, but because it goes too far in some cases and not far enough in others. What is being done to students here I have a hard time living with, but I agree with the provisions concerning damages to a person resulting from sexual assault or wilful negligence

There is one other clause in the bill which I shall address very quickly, the one which says more or less that the spouses must make a joint proposal if their financial relationship requires co–ordinated repayment on their part. These new provisions will make it possible to rationalize procedures and reduce costs. I am not sure I have properly understood all this. I will admit honestly to you that I could not find it in the bill, not because it is not there, but because the bill is too bulky to find it among all the cross–references and annotations that are very hard to follow.

But is it possible that a decision has been made to encroach on Quebec law? We know divorce is a federal matter, but marriage is a provincial one. Is the decision now being made to interfere in matrimonial regimes in Quebec or elsewhere, in other provinces, saying for example that if a husband is not solvent but his wife works, they will both be put in the same pot, both will go bankrupt, pay the trustee and make the major banks happy by paying off their creditors? Is that what the plan is?

If that is the intent, it is a disquieting one. This would put an end to matrimonial regimes, or at least meddle rather too seriously and perhaps somewhat too harmfully in the area of marriage in Quebec. Relationships within a marriage are sacred in our province, and we have—as the Prime Minister has been saying ad nauseam—been living with the tradition of a Napoleonic code since around 1806.

I therefore feel that the Bloc members will not be able to subscribe in any way, if such is the intent of the legislator in this case, to this encroachment I perceive on the provinces' constitutional jurisdiction over marriage.

• (1715)

You are signalling that my time is almost up, Mr. Speaker. I still have some time left. We go on and on, but you can see that we are well intentioned. Someone said: Hell is paved with the well–intentioned. I do not know where that comes from.

An hon. member: And it is red.

Mr. Lebel: True, Hell also happens to be red.

My point is, he ends on an upbeat note. He says: "There will be counselling for persons related to the debtor". I cannot wait. I cannot wait for someone to tell the manager of the credit union or the manager of the National Bank or the TD Bank or any other bank: "Look, we raised $20,000 by selling the assets of the bankrupt, but his wife and children are taking it very hard; the poor things cannot cope. So I am going to take $5,000 to pay for counselling".

They are going to cause a backlog in the courts with this clause. Does anyone seriously think that creditors will forego a chance to get their money back and instead pay for counselling for the relatives of a bankrupt debtor? I doubt it. This is wishful thinking. But it is an interesting point and I must say I did not expect to find this in a bill dealing with bankruptcy and insolvency.

They say that the proposed amendments harmonize Canadian practices regarding bankruptcy and insolvency with those of our international trading partners. This harmonization will simplify co–operation between countries in the case of the restructuring or insolvency of a multinational corporation and will help enforcement of Canadian regulations on the distribution of assets, creditor ranking and voidable transactions.

I do not want to get involved in private international law at this point, but it was said in your basic course in Canadian private international law, which is after all based on international agreements, that the disposition of immovable goods is determined by their lex situs, their location. While as far as individual rights are concerned, the law of the country of residence prevails. As far as movable goods are concerned, the law of the owner's country of residence prevails.

I cannot see how, unilaterally, through the Minister of Industry and this bill to amend the bankruptcy legislation, the federal government could come and change internationally recognized rules developed outside of Canada, under an agreement between several countries. Unless, of course—in which case, the wording of the bill is incorrect—it was intended to apply only the bankrupt's property found on Canadian soil. That would make more sense.

Another clause puzzled me, namely the one providing that farmers and fishermen, whose principal occupation is forming or fishing will not be subject to petitions in bankruptcy, even if their principal occupation is not their sole source of income. Farmers and fishermen used to be liable under the law to petitions in bankruptcy when they ventured outside their traditional line of work to supplement their income during the off season. This bill will ensure that they no longer face bankruptcy each time they become technically insolvent.

Unfortunately, the bill does not say much about the reasons why this kind of provision was included. I hope that government members who will be speaking on this bill, to explain it to us, will be able to elaborate on the motives that underlie the decision to include such provisions in the bill.

That is about all I had to say at this stage of consideration of the bill. I am not blaming anyone. As you can see, I am not criticizing too strongly the government's position. I just find it unfair as it relates to students. Also I think it is a mistake to fail, as it does, to address the situation of those workers who, often, supported the business till the very end, when it finally declared bankruptcy, when, more often than not, the president and directors of the company are long gone. They have run off to Switzerland, as is fashionable these days. Low income workers, those who have worked hard to earn a living, cannot run away. They are forgotten in all this.

• (1720)

I urge the government to show more willingness to co–operate with the opposition to achieve a position that will be effective in maintaining this balance between the duty to pay one's debts and the need to survive.

[English]

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to make comments about Bill C–109, a bill dealing with the bankruptcy and insolvency of certain businesses and individuals. One thing that appears in the bill is a demonstration of humanitarianism during bankruptcy.

This is a particularly meaningful amendment to the bankruptcy act. In 1992 there was an amendment to that act. That amendment took place 40 years after the initial bankruptcy act was enacted; 40 years of unamended legislation. In 1992 a three–year review clause was introduced which brings the act to our attention now, which is too short a period of time. Not enough experience was obtained as a result of the amendments made in 1992. Now the proposal is that the next amendment take place seven years hence. That makes really good sense.

What is the bankruptcy act all about? It is supposed to protect three categories. The first is consumers. We want to protect that group. We want also to protect the creditors who have loaned money to other people. We want to protect the economy. Bankruptcies are disruptive to individuals, to industry and to the economy in general.

We want to protect the consumer in the sense that he or she should not enter into debts which he or she cannot afford to repay or that somehow he or she has not planned to repay properly.

How big is this problem of bankruptcies in Canada? I have a statement of September 1995 which I will go through to give a perspective of how big this problem is. I start with Newfoundland. In September bankruptcies amounted to $32.1 million; in Nova Scotia, $59.7 million; in Prince Edward Island, $3.9 million; in New Brunswick, $35.2 million; in Quebec, $1.52 billion; in Ontario, $1.932 billion; in Manitoba, $32.3 million; in Saskatchewan, $49.475 million; in Alberta, $294 million; in British Columbia, $275.1 million; in the Northwest Territories, $1.97 million; in Yukon $29,267.

• (1725)

Let us put that all together. Bankruptcies in Canada in September represented liabilities of $4,268,000,000. That is a significant sum of money. That is what we are talking about when we deal with bankruptcies. That is one month. It is not a small issue we are dealing with here.

There seems to be a psychosis developing. We have a government that has incurred debt upon debt. It calls it deficits from year to year. As that deficit accumulates from one year to the next, it becomes a debt on the present year. The deferral of these payments keeps adding up, until now it is $567 billion. That is the debt the Canadian government has incurred on behalf of the people of Canada.

We look at the government and say if it is all right for the government to keep on borrowing money, maybe we can do the same and so we have credit cards. I do not know how many of us here in the House have more than one credit card, but I dare presume there are a number of people who do. My colleague says he does not. He has one. It is probably so big that he can buy a car on the basis of his credit card. He is probably not the only who can buy a car on his credit card.

People have added debt upon debt and they follow the example of government. The other day the Conference Board of Canada made an observation that the individual Canadian has a debt load probably larger than it should be.

We have at least a threefold issue being dealt with here in bankruptcy: the individual consumer, the creditor who has lent this money or provided service or material and the economy on a larger basis.

This bill is trying to reach an equilibrium that encourages rehabilitation so that individuals or a company or corporation that finds itself in a situation in which they cannot repay their debt will be able to reorganize, restructure in such a way that they can rehabilitate themselves and again become a contributing element in our economy. We have to compare that rehabilitation over and against the obligation they have to pay off the debt they have incurred on behalf of someone else, on behalf of themselves, or on the basis of a director of a particular company.

If a business goes bankrupt how does it affect the economy in which we live? The first thing that happens is taxes go down. We do not collect the amount of taxes we ought to.

My colleague from the Bloc indicated very clearly how disruptive it is to the employee of a company that goes bankrupt. The individual does not have a job any more. This has an effect on the family structure. It puts stress and strain on the relationship between husband and wife, between the parents and the children, between the children and their parents and it becomes increasingly complicated. It has an effect on the mortgage payments they have to make, the credit card bills they are responsible for and a chain reaction develops.

Therefore what seemed to be one case becomes a multiplication factor that finds its way in a variety of cases all the way through to the grocery store, the furniture store, the clothing store and so on down the line.

In Canada we need an economy that builds, that grows, that develops. This will not happen in a situation in which people are fearful that their business is going to go down. In one month we see liabilities of $4 billion being accumulated. That is very extensive. This is no small issue that has to be dealt with.

I will deal with some of the provisions of the bill. The bill deals in a variety of areas with very technical issues. Two–thirds of the bill, as I understand it, has to do with technical amendments that try to harmonize the provisions of this legislation with the legislation that exists with the provinces and in other areas. It comes to grips with issues such as international creditors and bankruptcies on an international basis, securities firms and how they operate, and it brings into focus more accurately the situation as it exists between those people who are earning their livelihood in part from farming and fishing and in other parts from other kinds of income they might have.

The old act stated that persons who declare bankruptcy, if their sole income is from farming and fishing, can declare bankruptcy in that particular area. In today's economy there are many people whose main income comes from fishing but it is not sufficient for them to earn a living and they have to supplement their income. In other cases people have a professional job and they have a hobby farm. Sometimes they will declare bankruptcy on the one side but not on the other. This bill brings those things into reality and harmonizes and balances them.

I would like to speak on the humanitarian aspect of the legislation. There is one aspect in particular about which I would like to speak, and that has to do with the situation where a divorce has taken place and an individual is obligated to make support payments to the spouse or children. Some of these individuals decide to declare bankruptcy rather than make the support payments. If they declare bankruptcy they will no longer be liable for the support payments. This bill deals with that issue. It states that the obligation for support payments of either a spouse or children are part of the liabilities, as is the case with a mortgage or a loan. In fact the bill goes so far as to say that support payments are a priority on the list of creditors to be paid. That is a very humanitarian approach, which is necessary.

The bill adds another clause, which is equally significant to the one I have just referred to, and that has to do with difficulties that arise because of an assault. On that basis, the person declaring bankruptcy is liable and a creditor can make a claim.

The third area has to do with student loans. At the present time there are a number of students who are experiencing great difficulty in making their student loan payments. They graduate from university or from some other post–secondary institution where they have incurred an extensive debt and they find they cannot make the payments. They have no prospects for a job, at least not immediately. They look at the situation and say: "There is an easy way out of this. I will declare personal bankruptcy and then I will no longer be liable for the debt. It will all be over. After having lived the good life and behaving myself, my credit rating will be built up again, this will not be held against me and my debt will be discharged".

That will no longer be possible under this bill. Students who incur a loan and who plan to escape from paying that loan by declaring bankruptcy will still be liable two years after the date on which their bankruptcy has been declared and accepted. Two years from that date they are still liable to make their student loan payment. At that point a new provision kicks in, which suggests that if the student is still having difficulty and cannot meet his or her financial obligations, other arrangements can be made. I believe that is a fair and equitable provision.

The other point I want to raise has to do with the situation where creditors and debtors cannot agree and they fight with one another as to what is a reasonable settlement in terms of the portion of the debt that can and should be paid by the person who has declared bankruptcy. The bill provides for a mediation process and mediators so that these people do not have to go to court and incur expensive legal costs. Rather, mediation can take place and the matter can be settled out of court as expeditiously as possible. I think that is an excellent provision in this particular piece of legislation.

The other elements in this legislation that we want to commend at this point have to do with the recognition that there are certain international insolvencies that take place. At the present time it is difficult to move across boundaries. Assets have to be moved, papers and things like this across borders and cases cannot be heard in another country. The legislation now provides for those hearings to take place within the country where the insolvency takes place or they can be heard where the individual resides.

Another area the bill deals with has to do with securities firms that go bankrupt. These are particularly difficult and highly complicated situations. These are securities firms ranging all the way from brokerage houses to houses that deal with only mutual funds and the complications that can arise in those situations. This is where I think the bill is somewhat deficient. There are clarifications that need to be made in this bill as to just exactly how those kinds of bankruptcies can be resolved and dealt with. The length of time it takes to deal with some of the details here is rather substantive. In the meantime, many things could have changed and probably have changed.

It becomes very necessary for us to recognize that while this bill has some very positive things in it, there are some deficiencies in it.

When we go into the technicalities of the bill, the bill has done some things I really found rather humorous when I looked at them. In the existing act it states that there is a two–day time frame in which to present a particular proposal. In the new act it states that it is going to change to three days. In another instance three days becomes five days. In another situation 14 days becomes 15 days. In another instance 15 days becomes 14 days. In another situation 90 days becomes three months. In other cases three months becomes 90 days.

When I asked the people who put the bill together why they did this, they said they wanted to be consistent so that it would be very specific. I asked a question about the old bill, which stated 90 days, and the new proposed bill before us states three months. Mr. Speaker, you and I both know that three months are not necessarily 90 days; it could be more or less than 90 days. In that instance, we need to recognize that the apparent consistency is lacking. Perhaps the people in the committee should look at this in some detail and say let us be consistent: if we are going to use days then let us use days and if we are going to use months then let us use months, but let us not confuse it by moving back and forth. It is not a reasonable thing to do. That is one area we need to look at.

The other thing the bill does, which I found very interesting, is there is no such thing as a man or a woman in this bill. There are only creditors and the people who are bankrupt. This is very interesting. I guess in order to be politically correct we no longer speak about men and women. We now speak about creditors and bankrupts. I do not know how significant this is but there it is. A whole bunch of money and a lot of time has to be spent to change the legislation so that it becomes politically correct by taking gender references out of the particular legislation.

I think I am getting very close to the end of my time for today. I would like to touch on the area of directors' liability, but rather than starting halfway through here I will stop my intervention at this point and defer the directors' liability portion to the next opportunity I have to rise in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.39 p.m., I must now proceed to some deferred votes. The member for Okanagan Centre will certainly have 20 minutes remaining in his time allocation if he chooses to continue to speak when the bill returns to the House.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS AND GOVERNMENT SERVICES ACT

The House resumed from November 27 consideration of Bill C–52, an act to establish the Department of Public Works and Government Services and to amend and repeal certain acts, as reported (with amendments) from the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at report stage of Bill C–52, an act to establish the Department of Public Works and Government Services and to amend and repeal certain acts.

The first question is on the amendment to Motion No. 1.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if you were to seek it, I believe you would find unanimous consent that those members who voted on the report stage Motion No. 1 of Bill C–52 a moment ago be recorded as having voted on the motion now before the House with Liberal members voting nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): May I seek a point of clarification from the hon. government whip. I want to be sure that we are all at the same page and that the question is on the amendment to Motion No. 1.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I understand we voted a moment ago on the amendment to report stage Motion No. 1.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): If I could help the House, the division is on the first question which is on the amendment to Motion No. 1.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I understand we voted on the amendment to report stage Motion No. 1 and now we are voting on the report stage Motion No. 1 itself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): We had completed voting on Bill C–100. If I follow the schedule given to me earlier, we are now at item E of Bill C–52 on the amendment to Motion No. 1.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, that is correct. Liberal members will be voting nay.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: We support this amendment, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Ringma: Reform Party members will vote no, except those who choose otherwise.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, New Democrats vote no on this motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare Motion No. 8 lost.

The next question is on Motion No. 9.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am seeking unanimous consent to apply the vote just taken to the motion now before the House in an identical manner.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is that agreed?

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Ringma: Agreed.

Mr. Solomon: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernier (Beauce): Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Bhaduria: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 383]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare Motion No. 9 lost.

(Motion No. 9 negatived.)

Hon. David Anderson (for Minister of Public Works and Government Services, Lib.) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask for unanimous consent that the vote taken on report stage Motion No. 6 be applied to the motion now before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 382]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare the motion carried.

(Motion agreed to.)

[Translation]

MANGANESE BASED FUEL ADDITIVES ACT

The House resumed from November 27 consideration of the motion that Bill C–94, an act to regulate interprovincial trade in and the importation for commercial purposes of certain manganese based substances, be read the third time and passed; and of the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the amendment of Mr. Sauvageau to Bill C–94.

• (1830)

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the Liberal MPs in the House will be voting nay on the amendment.

I wish to indicate to the House that one Liberal member had to absent himself momentarily, the hon. member for Sarnia. Therefore, the members who voted on the previous motion will be recorded as voting nay on this motion, with the exception of the hon. member for Sarnia, who will be recorded as now having left.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, Bloc Quebecois members support that motion.

[English]

Mr. Ringma: Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party will vote in favour of the motion.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, the New Democrats vote no on the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernier: I vote nay, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Bhaduria: Mr. Speaker, I will vote against the motion.

(The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:)

SMALL BUSINESS LOANS ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act, as reported (with amendments) from a committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division at report stage on Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act.

The first division will be on Motion No. 3.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, if you were to seek it, I think you would find that the House agrees to apply the vote taken on Motion No. 8 on Bill C–52 to the motion now before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Are the whips in agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 383]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare Motion No. 3 lost.

(Motion No. 3 negatived.)

[English]

Hon. Douglas Peters (for the Minister of Industry) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I believe you would find unanimous consent to apply the vote taken on the previous motion in reverse to the motion now before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is that agreed?

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Ringma: Agreed.

Mr. Solomon: Agreed.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, I wish to be recorded as being opposed to the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernier (Beauce): Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Bhaduria: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

• (1835)

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, I was saying that we agree with the chief government whip with respect to reversing the order. We were not supporting the motion. We were in fact opposing the motion.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

WITNESS PROTECTION PROGRAM ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–78, an act to provide for the establishment and operation of a program to enable certain persons to receive protection in relation to certain inquiries, investigations or prosecutions, as reported (with amendment) from the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division at the report stage of Bill C–78.

The first question is on Motion No. 1

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if you were to seek it, I believe you would find unanimous consent that the results of the vote on report stage Motion No. 6 of Bill C–52 be applied in reverse to the motion now before the House. The same would apply to report stage Motion No. 2.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Ringma: Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is in reverse.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, New Democrats agree except for one question that relates to the member for Sarnia. He had voted on that previous motion. Is he voting on this one or not?

[Translation]

Mr. Bernier (Beauce): Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Bhaduria: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 380]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Therefore I declare Motions Nos. 1 and 2 lost.

(Motion No. 1.)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

(Motion agreed to.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 6.43 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

ABORIGINAL LAND CLAIMS COMMISSION

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing a new independent aboriginal land claims commission, as recommended in the 1994–95 annual report of the Indian Claims Commission.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise today to present to the House this motion, which seeks to bring action on the recommendation of the Indian Claims Commission.

The motion seeks the approval of the House to begin the discussion that will eventually lead to the establishment of a new Indian Claims Commission and process. I am also pleased this motion has been made votable because this means the members of the House will now have the opportunity to formally respond to the incredible and excellent work the current Indian Claims Commission has been doing.

Before beginning my formal remarks today, I want to thank the Indian Claims Commission for all its efforts in meeting the challenges of its difficult mandate and for preparing the groundwork for the next step in this important and evolving process. I am particularly grateful to claims commission co–chair Mr. Dan Bellegarde and to Mary Ellen Turpel whose legal and research work I borrowed for some of my presentation today.

• (1845)

The idea of a new claims process and policy is not a new one. As I will demonstrate later in my remarks not only did former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker advocate for an independent land claims process, so too did the Liberals as recently as the 1993 election.

However, as is also obvious it appears the current Prime Minister and the Liberal cabinet have to be reminded of their famous red book commitments and be pushed into keeping them. Most of this became very clear to me this summer during the unrest throughout Canada and particularly because of the events which took place at Gustafsen Lake in British Columbia and at Ipperwash in Ontario.

As I listened to those news reports, watched the events unfold on my television screen, read the details in the newspapers and as I talked to concerned individuals across Canada it became clear to me these were not just isolated incidents. Each had a similar message and each was echoed by other events unfolding elsewhere in British Columbia, as well as in New Brunswick and other parts of Canada.

What I and other Canadians were seeing were the expressions of long withheld emotions centred around the meaning and importance of land and jurisdiction over land held by aboriginal people from coast to coast. These emotions fueled by frustration and anger led to occupations or roadblocks which led to the involvement of the police and the exclusion of the legitimate land claims process.

In late summer I called on the Minister of Indians Affairs and Northern Development to get involved not just in the specific disputes under the eye of the media but also in the general approach to land claims resolutions that will have the ability to resolve differences before tensions erupt.

I wrote to the minister and I even questioned him in the House about the possibility of beginning the process that would lead to the establishment of a new independent land claims policy and process.

I was disappointed when the minister responded by saying he had to wait because he needed more direction. The process to begin finding that direction can be begin today. It has been clearly outlined by the Indian claims commission in the 1994–95 report. With this motion I hope the House will tell the minister to get busy, to get at it.

The process, I remind the minister, cannot be dictated by the federal government. It must be worked out and jointly agreed on with the First Nations. Arthur Durocher, writing on land claims reform for the Indian claims commission, states:

> There are many problems associated with the present land claims policies and processes. Claims are backlogged and there is a general dissatisfaction on the part of the First Nations. Changes have to be implemented as soon as possible because the longer the impasse drags on, the more difficult it will become to break. It is important that any changes that are done be done in consultation and in partnership with the First Nations. There has to be sufficient political will by the federal government to make any process viable.

In concurring with that statement, the support of the House on this motion will be very useful in securing action on this political will at this important time.

The Indian claims commission in the 1994–95 report came out in July of this year just as some of the land disputes were at their peak. I was surprised therefore when I heard very little comment from the government or the media about the Indian claims commission report itself.

If nothing else, the message from the commissioners at the beginning of the report should have alerted all of us to the importance of the matter in front of us. I will quote from that message:

> The ICC is mandated to find better ways of handling land claims. To this end we have used our considerable experience to identify problem areas and recommend solutions that will assist in creating a more expedient, fair and equitable land claims policy and process.
> Everything that we have learned as a commission to date indicates that it is imperative to commence the process of reform immediately. The return of native land is central to any real progress on the wide range of problems that face First Nations today. Meaningful self–government and true economic self–sufficiency are dependent upon an adequate land base. It is time for a fair and equitable process.

● (1850)

The commissioners recognized the need for immediate reform of the process. Now it is time for Parliament to do the same.

The frustration felt by aboriginal people throughout Canada has existed for a long time. I am reminded of the comments of former Assembly of First Nations Grand Chief Georges Erasmus, who was quoted in the introduction to a book on the subject, Drum Beat, published in 1989. Erasmus notes that for generations in Canada governments have treated aboriginal people as a disappearing race and that they have administered aboriginal policy accordingly:

> Yet we have not disappeared; we have survived, as we have done since long before the appearance of the Europeans, against no matter what odds. Unfortunately, to the present day, governments have been unconscionably slow in coming to terms with the fact that we will always be here, and that our claims for justice, land, resources, and control over our own affairs will never go away, and they must be fairly and honourably dealt with.

There is now a widely accepted view that the current land claims process is not working well and that the pace and conditions for the resolution of land claims conflicts are inadequate.

As Mary Ellen Turpel tells us in her work for the claims commission, claims resolutions in the past 20 years have seen a massive increase in litigation over claims even though almost everyone involved in the claims recognizes litigation is not the best method for addressing land disputes.

The rise in court challenges is a byproduct of a failed dispute resolution process in the claims area and has served to reinforce an adversarial approach on the part of the crown and the First Nations in dealing with these disputes.

It appears, Turpel says, the First Nations and the federal government are headed toward further confrontation and hostility. The only remedy is a reworking of federal claims policies and the establishment of an appropriate and effective process for the resolution of disputes between First Nations and government over lands and resources.

Turpel is writing in the claims commission's proceedings report, special issue No. 2, dealing with land claims, issued in 1994.

In that same report, the commission co–chairs, Dan Bellegarde and James Prentice, say very clearly:

> Much discussion concerning the reform of the specific claims policy has taken place over recent years; little of fundamental importance has been accomplished. There is an urgent need for reform of the specific claims process to provide a fair and accountable land claims process for First Nations and indeed for all Canadians.
> If we are to avoid further violence and bloodshed over unsettled land claims in Canada we must act now before the next confrontation.

That was written in September 1994 before the loss of life occurred at Ipperwash. Obviously action toward a resolution must begin, as the commissioners and others have been arguing, immediately.

It should be noted that the Indian Claims Commission was created in 1991 partly in response to the need for a fair land claims process, but it was acknowledged by everyone that the creation of the commission was an interim step only. The time has come, as it acknowledges, to go beyond the interim measure.

The commission is what has been referred to as a soft adjudicative tribunal in that the recommendations of the commission are not binding on the parties but rather are only advisory in nature. This means that at the completion of an inquiry the parties are not bound by the recommendations of the commission. In the end the federal government still must respond to the findings of the inquiry and the recommendations of the commission, and has only recently begun to do so.

In the case of a band within my constituency boundaries, the Canoe Lake Band, the response to its inquiry took the government more than 18 months to produce. The motion in front of us today suggests the government should take action on the recommendation of the claims commission's most recent report.

Before we run out of time in the debate today I will outline these recommendations. Recommendation No. 1 is the important one. It says that Canada and the First Nations should develop and implement a new claims policy and process that does not involve the present circumstances wherein Canada judges claims against itself.

The commission states that the present system involves a fundamental flaw: Canada must judge claims against itself. This is a manifest conflict of interest especially when Canada stands in a fiduciary relationship toward the claimant First Nation.

It is imperative, the commission states, that an independent claims body be established to perform at least the initial assessment of the validity of First Nations land claims against Canada. Mary Ellen Turpel notes in her work: "A full appreciation of the federal government's fiduciary obligations, which represent a considerable and serious duty to act in the interests of the First Nations, has been the glaring omission in the claims process".

In the absence of a new policy, the claims commission brought forward five other recommendations which must be implemented in order to make the existing but temporary process more fair. The commission's second recommendation is to put fairness into the current policy.

The 1994–95 report says:

> When First Nations submit specific claims to Canada they are encouraged to include for consideration the legal opinion of their lawyer along with their historical research. However, when Canada communicates its decision to accept or reject the claim, it relies on solicitor–client privilege and refuses to disclose its legal opinion from the Department of Justice.

The claims commission states that Canada has an obligation to provide that legal opinion.

> To do less fails to meet the requirements of the fiduciary relationship, a relationship that has been found to exist by the Supreme Court of Canada in cases such as Sparrow. The substance of Canada's legal opinion must be exposed to full public scrutiny if justice is to be done and seen to be done.

The Canoe Lake report was not responded to until 18 months had passed. The commission notes in its third recommendation that situations like this are unacceptable. In calling for a response protocol, it says this type of response is fair to neither the claimant First Nation nor to the people of Canada.

Recommendation No. 4 deals with mediation and suggests that government council engaged on matters before the commission should be given the same broad mandate to consider, recommend and negotiate settlement it would have if acting for the government in litigation over the same claim.

The commission notes that from its inception the commission has vigorously sought to advance mediation as an alternative to the court and inquiries, both of which tend to be adversarial in nature.

Unfortunately, it states, one of the greatest obstacles in the settlement of specific claims is that the Department of Justice typically regards its own legal opinions as being determinant on the questions of whether an outstanding lawful obligation exists on the part of the government.

If the lawyer concludes that no such obligation exists, the government assumes there is no place for mediation. Since mediation is essentially consensual and both parties must request it, an opinion unfavourable to the claim ends the prospect for mediation before it can even begin.

The commission is aware that some claims might qualify for reconsideration based on factors outside the legal opinion, but there is no authority for counsel representing Indian affairs to do so without access to mediation measures as suggested by the commission.

The fifth recommendation deals with the need to identify and review all claims that were rejected based on the ban of pre–Confederation claims that was lifted in 1991. The commission wants the government to take the lead and begin the reviews and not leave the onus on the First Nations to ask for a review of the claims that were rejected prior to the alteration of the specific claims policy in 1991.

Most important, the sixth recommendation of the commission is that Canada stop insisting on the express extinguishment of aboriginal rights and title as part of the settlement of specific claims. The commission says this is grossly unfair since the claims policy is not meant to deal with aboriginal title and/or rights, and Canada ought not to insist on their extinguishment as part of the settlement of a specific claim.

• (1900)

This measure has been supported in the recent fact finding report written by Mr. Justice Hamilton, entitled "A New Partnership", in which he said:

> Aboriginal people seek the recognition, not the surrender of their aboriginal rights. They are prepared to have the extent of their future rights to land and resources spelled out in a treaty. They are prepared to recognize the rights of others.

The Liberals have also agreed with this, at least the Liberal Party, ahead of the government. The red book states that "in order to be consistent with the Canadian Constitution, which now recognizes and affirms aboriginal and treaty rights, a Liberal government will not require blanket extinguishment for claims based on aboriginal title".

Prior to the general election in 1993, the leader of the Liberal Party, now the Prime Minister of Canada, said in Saskatoon: "A Liberal government, in consultation with aboriginal peoples, would undertake a major overhaul of the federal claims policy on a national basis".

In the red book, that now famous catalogue of Liberal promises, the Liberals acknowledged that if aboriginal communities are to become self–sufficient they must have an adequate land and resource base upon which to grow. That is why a Liberal government is committed to overhauling the land claims policy in ways that will make the process "more fair, more efficient and less costly".

Two years after the election, it appears that we have to push the Liberals into meeting their own promises—not just the claims commission, not just aboriginal people from coast to coast, but the House of Commons as well. If the Liberals have failed to deliver on this promise and if we must push, then push we will, because this is one promise that is worth fulfilling.

I want the House to know that prior to putting this motion on the Order Paper and having it called for debate today I took the issue to my own party at its national convention in October of this year. I am pleased to say that support for a new claims commission had the unanimous support of delegates attending the national convention of New Democrats. They, like me, consider the issue to be of critical importance to our nation.

The Grand Chief of the Assembly of First Nations, Ovide Mercredi, played a crucial and important role during the land occupations this past summer. The grand chiefs and the chiefs of the AFN have been doing a fantastic job in preparing for a new land claims policy and process. I ask the minister of Indian affairs to ensure that the AFN is central to any decisions that are made in this regard.

I conclude my remarks today by again referring to the work of Mary Ellen Turpel, who says that consensus for an independent claims commission is evident but that concentrated effort and good will are needed to take the proposal for such a commission from the stage of political consensus to one of policy implementation in a legislative framework. It cannot be done unilaterally by government. Implementing these proposals will require a process whereby First Nations leaders and federal ministers come together over a short period of time to decide on an implementation strategy to draft the protocol and develop legislation and resolutions.

Because of lack of time I did not talk about the expiration of the mandate of the joint working group and the good work the joint working group completed. However, I must say that this is the type of process that needs to be reactivated with a broader mandate.

I will quote Mary Ellen Turpel one last time:

> The agenda for land claims reforms is stalled at present. This is a tragic situation, given that so many options are available for immediate progress and all parties in the political process have identified a common set of problems and made a commitment to reform. If we continue to delay the process of land claims reform, we face further hostility as the prospects for an enduring peaceful relationship between First Nations and the crown grow dimmer.

Today, at the beginning of the debate on this votable motion, I thanked the chiefs for their patience and their unending commitment to their people. I thank the Indian Claims Commission for its excellent work in moving this critical issue forward. I urge all members of the House to support the motion so that the minister of Indian affairs and the government know that it has the support for change, which must be made sooner rather than later. I ask that I be given the opportunity to close this debate when that time comes.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.):

[English]

Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to respond to the motion by the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake and to debate the claims policy and the establishment of a claims commission.

The government has been looking for ways to promote a commission that would be fair and would be seen to be fair to all aboriginal and non–aboriginal Canadians who are affected by the settlement of land claims.

The hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has been a strong advocate in the House of policies aimed at resolving the outstanding issues relating to the claims process. We have listened to his advice and are looking forward to hearing what the Reform Party has to add.

As for the Liberal government, our approach to the claims process was spelled out in our 1993 election platform. In the red book we placed aboriginal issues at the centre of the public policy agenda. We devoted one of the eight chapters in Creating Opportunity exclusively to aboriginal issues and raised the awareness of the impact of other policies on aboriginal Canadians throughout the document.

We promised the role of our government would be to provide aboriginal people with the necessary tools to become self–sufficient and self–governing. We also said that our priority would be to help aboriginal communities in their efforts to address the obstacles to their development and help them marshal the human and physical resources necessary to build and sustain vibrant communities.

We promised our government would build new partnerships with aboriginal peoples based on trust and mutual respect. A fair and effective land claims process is essential for those objectives. The resolution of the claims must be a priority for all Canadians.

Both aboriginal and non–aboriginal Canadians require certainty with respect to land rights so that we can get on with the building of the economy, creating jobs and growth, and making our communities better places for our children.

In the red book we acknowledged that the current process for resolving land claims could be improved. We said a Liberal government would implement major changes to the current approach, and we have been working toward that goal.

We have been working alongside the Assembly of First Nations to find a better way to proceed with the resolution of claims. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has received several suggestions. Among them is a proposal for an independent Indian land claims commission, as recommended in the annual report of the Indian Claims Commission and as advocated by the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

We on this side of the House have no objection to such an independent commission. In fact, in the red book we stated that "A Liberal government would be prepared to create, in co–operation with aboriginal peoples, an independent claims commission to speed up and facilitate the resolution of all claims". This shows that we do not oppose the principles outlined in the hon. member's motion.

However, I would like to point out to the House a key phrase of the commitment from the Liberal policy platform. It is that we would create the independent claims commission in co–operation with the aboriginal peoples. Building a consensus among the aboriginal peoples will require time and we cannot act unilaterally. We cannot impose a solution that will be supported by some but not by others.

One of the major issues at stake is whether a new independent claims commission will be a court–like system with binding judgments or a mediation system with functions similar to those the Indian Claims Commission now performs.

Another issue is whether we can find a better way to bring matters to the attention of the commission. As hon. members are aware, under the current system a claim must be rejected by the Indian affairs department before the matter is brought before the commission. The minister has invited the Assembly of First Nations to provide substantive comments on concrete proposals for change. In co–operation with the First Nations, we are examining how the claim policies can be overhauled within the climate of financial restraint that affects us all.

The Assembly of First Nations has embarked on a project that will involve developing terms of reference for a joint Canada and First Nations review of the Indian Claims Commission. We will have to reach a consensus on these and other issues before we can reform the current system. We need directions from the First Nations on what kind of system they want.

In the meantime, the government has taken the steps required to make sure the system now in place works as efficiently as possible. When we look at what has been accomplished in the past few years, it becomes quite clear that the current system can be used more effectively than it had been before the red book commitments regarding claims process reforms were made.

Consider these figures: After 1990–91 the total cumulative settlements for specific claims numbered only 43. By 1994–95 we have more than tripled that figure to 142. Since taking office this government has settled 45 specific claims. In 1994–95 we settled 18 different specific claims, for a total of nearly $79 million. That is money that will go into aboriginal communities. It will create jobs for aboriginal as well as non–aboriginal people. It will improve living conditions and it will make aboriginal people partners in the development of a strong and dynamic Canadian society.

Today we are involved in negotiations on another 90 specific claims or are in the process of reviewing another 240 claims submitted by the First Nations. We expect that by the end of the 1995–96 fiscal year we will have settled another 20 to 30 specific claims and we will also continue to receive further claims, which will have to work through the current system until a better system is devised in co–operation with First Nations.

I am certain the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake appreciates these points. He wants what is fair for aboriginal people in Canada, as does this government.

[Translation]

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in support of the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

The motion reads as follows: That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing a new, independent aboriginal land claims commission, as recommended in the 1994–95 annual report of the Indian Claims Commission.

Anyone who has followed the issue of aboriginal land claims in Canada for a number of years will realize it is a matter of astonishing complexity. The First Nations were here in Canada before European immigrants came to settle the land, as we used to say. The aboriginal peoples occupied certain lands. In the past 10, 15, 20 or 30 years they have started to realize certain rights to those lands still existed, and various First Nations have started filing land claims.

It stands to reason that people living in often difficult social and economic circumstances should want to establish a land base where they can develop their potential, improve their situation and maintain their identity as a nation, as a people.

It is therefore entirely normal that the various First Nations should file these claims. Now it so happens that certain things have been accomplished, and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs told us a few moments ago that certain claims had been settled with First Nations. Claims are now being negotiated, and it is expected that a number of claims will be settled within the next few years.

However, it is a fact that the existing mechanism is not perfect. The process is very slow. Some very relevant questions are being asked about the impartiality of the system, because under the present system, various aboriginal peoples and communities file a claim, which is then examined by the appropriate federal authorities.

• (1915)

The federal government is almost in the situation of being a judge while, at the same time, having fiduciary responsibilities toward various native peoples. I think the government is, in a way, in a conflict of interest situation, where often, because of political imperatives, it cannot easily ensure quick resolution of claims, in my opinion.

Clearly, at this point, the process becomes blocked, despite the best intentions of the government, and I do not doubt them. But I imagine that if, as proposed by the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, we could set up an independent native territorial claims commission, we could clarify the whole process. We could clarify it for all Canadians, and we could clarify it for the various first nations.

I think it is important to clarify the process not only for the native populations, but for the people of Canada. Since becoming more closely involved with native issues, because I sit on the House Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development, I have been talking with my constituents in my riding and in my region. I realize that most people are sympathetic to the claims of native peoples, but are often critical because they consider the claims at times exaggerated and not in keeping with what they consider reality.

We often see maps in the paper, of either Quebec or Canada, depicting native territorial claims. If we superimpose a map of the land claims made by the various First Nations in Quebec on a map of the province, we can see that their claims cover almost all of Quebec.

I think that this is likely to cause many people to fear and be concerned about legitimate native demands, and even to reject them. People feel that their claims are out of all proportion to the populations involved.

The various native communities in Quebec may number 50,000, 60,000 or 65,000 people, depending on how you count them. People are asking how 60,000, 65,000 or even 80,000 natives can claim the Quebec territory and, in a way, challenge the rights of six or seven million Quebecers now living on this territory.

This is the kind of situation that could easily lead to prejudice developing. Just look at what is reported in the press and listen to open line programs. Aboriginal land claims are often opposed on the grounds that they are viewed as undue and unfounded.

I think that this situation ought to be resolved as quickly as possible. At the rate settlements are reached these days, according to the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development himself, I think that this issue is not about to disappear; it will remain hot and red for quite some time. If we take too long to resolve the situation, there is risk of a rejection reaction on the part of non–natives in Canada. In addition, decisions might be made at the political level that do not fairly reflect the legitimate demands of aboriginal people.

It is important that the federal cabinet and the Liberal government fulfil the promises made in the red book in 1993, when they stated clearly that "the current process of resolving comprehensive and specific claims is simply not working. A Liberal government will implement major changes to the current approach. A Liberal government will be prepared to create, in co–operation with aboriginal peoples, an independent claims commission to speed up and facilitate the resolution of all claims". This is precisely what the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake and the Indians Claims Commission are asking for.

• (1920)

The federal government should act as quickly as possible for the good of all Canadians and for the good of the aboriginal nations that live on Canadian territory and have valid claims to parts of that territory.

Everyone agrees. Earlier, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development said: "We will probably do it in the future. We do not know yet what will be the nature of the commission. However, I think we have been talking for two years under the present government, and previous governments have also dealt with these questions.

Therefore, in the interest of Quebecers, Canadians and all the different aboriginal nations, I think it is important that the government examines as quickly as possible the possibility and the urgency of creating a commission like that one so that at long last Canada and Quebec can solve the problem of aboriginal claims because it is vital for the native people. It is vital for them to keep their identity, which is to important. It is crucial to preserve the identity of a people. To preserve that identity, the territorial claims must be settled to that these people can have the necessary basis for their economic, cultural and social development.

[English]

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake in my home province for bringing this motion forward.

It is always a pleasure to speak to issues involving Indian people. I spent two years on an Indian reserve at Wollaston Lake in northern Saskatchewan, so I have a pretty clear idea of what barriers exist for the aboriginal people living in and around these communities. My constituency of Yorkton—Melville has five Indian reserves which I represent in the House. Therefore I have more than just a passing interest in the subject of Indian land claims.

The motion we are debating asks the government to "consider the advisability of establishing a new, independent aboriginal land claims commission as recommended in the 1994–95 annual report of the Indian Claims Commission". I read the annual report referred to in the motion and the commission's recommendation No. 1 states: "Canada and the First Nations should develop and implement a new claims policy and process that does not involve the present circumstances wherein Canada judges claims against itself".

The last time I spoke in the House on Indian land claims was during the debate on Bill C–33 regarding the Yukon land claims in June 1994.

The Reform Party is way ahead of the government in the area of aboriginal affairs policy. I would like to bring everyone up to date on the progress we have made.

In June 1994 I was one of several Reform MPs who had the privilege of participating in the Reform Party's aboriginal affairs task force. We met with many native people and even made a trip to Norway House in northern Manitoba. Mainly the concerns were about self–government, mismanagement of band funds, patronage and nepotism, and land claims.

In October of this year the leader of the Reform Party and Reform's aboriginal affairs critics released the party's aboriginal affairs task force report. The report was prepared following many public meetings held all across the country, but mainly in western Canada. Our task force met with native and non–native people. We were disappointed that for the most part Indian leaders boycotted the Reform Party's meetings.

Now, after the release of our 14–point plan, the aboriginal leaders are complaining that we did not consult them. Every band in western Canada was invited to the meetings and the vast majority of Indian leaders refused our invitation.

I am sorry that I do not have time to outline the Reform Party's complete 14–point plan in the House today, but here is what our task force report said about land claims:

• (1925)

Point number one: Indian treaties will be fully honoured according to their original intent and in keeping with court interpretation.

Point number four: Land claim agreements and self–government agreements will be negotiated under the principle of equality for and among all persons. Settlement of land claims will be negotiated publicly. All settlements will outline specific terms, be final and conclude within a specific time frame. Final settlements will be affordable to Canada and the provinces.

Point number five: Individuals residing on settlement lands will have the freedom to opt for private ownership of their entitlements.

Point number six: Property owners forced to defend their property rights as a result of the aboriginal land claims will be compensated for the defence of the claim.

A few weeks ago I was on a CBC Saskatchewan radio phone–in show discussing and debating the merits of our proposed aboriginal affairs policy. After I got home, I got a call from a woman, a native elder from a nearby community. She was positively excited about our ideas. She said that she wanted to start getting a petition signed supporting our new approach.

Here is how her petition reads: "We, the undersigned citizens of Canada, who also happen to be of Indian ancestry, draw attention of the House to the following: That we oppose in principle the government's approach to self–government and land claim settlements which would entrench forever a top down, paternalistic, race based system of government for Indian people run by bureaucrats, band leaders and tribal council leaders for the primary benefit of the bureaucrats, band leaders and tribal council leaders, not necessarily the individual members of the band; furthermore that we support in principle the Reform approach for self–government and land claim settlements which would give each individual Indian person real choices about how we want our money to be paid to us, how we want our benefits, entitlements and services to be delivered to us and whether we want our land to be owned and managed by the band or owned and managed by ourselves privately. Therefore your Indian petitioners request that Parliament move and support legislation which will protect the treaty rights, equality rights, democratic rights and property rights of each individual Indian band member, thereby giving us the right to opt for private ownership of a share of any land entitlements and the right to opt to receive our money and benefits directly from the government or through the Indian self–government".

Is it not very interesting that this comes from the native people themselves? This petition is being circulated by an Indian elder among aboriginal people in my constituency. It is clear we cannot continue the way we have been.

It is clear from everything I have seen during the two years I lived and worked on an Indian reserve in northern Saskatchewan that more money is not the solution. In fact more handouts simply perpetuate the problem. Whenever handouts, compensation or any benefits are given to anyone in society without that person being held accountable and responsible, it will eventually harm the one receiving it. That harm will spread like a cancer to the rest of society.

It does not matter whether the person or group receiving the handout is native or non–native, welfare has failed wherever it has been tried. Now native communities and native people are feeling the full effects of receiving handouts with no accountability, handouts given with no clear stated objectives and handouts given with no means by which to measure progress. The Reform Party's recommendations are made with the sincere intent to correct the colossal mistakes of years past.

Now we come to the motion we are debating this evening. Our task force was silent on the process by which land claims would be settled. It follows that we need to establish some kind of an independent commission to accomplish this goal. After reading the annual report of the current Indian Claims Commission it is clear that the current system is not very effective. There seems to be a lot of overlap and duplication which creates much bureaucracy and a colossal waste of money with little being accomplished.

The other aspect we must consider is the overall direction the Liberal government is headed in using the current settlement process which ultimately confers special status, special entitlements and creates separate enclaves based solely on race. It is not a policy and process based on equality. This is a policy of apartheid.

Before an independent aboriginal land claims commission could be effective, the negotiating principles have to change. We would argue that the principles espoused by the Reform Party's aboriginal affairs task force are a good place to start. As long as the negotiating principles can be changed so our starting point is accepted by all Canadians, then I would have to agree with the Indian claims commission recommendation.

It does not make much sense for the department of Indian affairs to be negotiating agreements and then also to be the final arbiter for the Government of Canada. I have to agree there is an obvious conflict of interest. Therefore, it is obvious we need some kind of independent process.

What choices do we have for an independent land claims process? We have an independent aboriginal land claims commission which I suppose would replace the current Indian Claims Commission as proposed in the motion we are debating today. We have a treaty ombudsman as recommended by Mel Smith, Q.C., a constitutional expert, in his recent book, Our Home or Native Land?, or we have the court system.

Until we have reconstructed our fundamental negotiating principles for dealing with land claims and until these fundamental negotiating principles have the support of the majority of people in Canada, I do not think it is possible to say which option is the preferred one.

This having been said, I would like to give my qualified support to the motion put forward today by my hon. friend from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake. After all his motion just states that this House "consider the advisability of". If this House considers the advisability of replacing the current land claims commission with an independent body, just maybe we will be able to have a full public debate about the terms of reference of this new independent aboriginal land claims commission.

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the motion is:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of establishing a new, independent aboriginal land claims commission, as recommended in the 1994–95 annual report of the Indian Claims Commission.

I appreciate the way the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake has phrased this motion. We are considering the advisability.

The hon. member knows this is a complex issue. He knows we cannot act precipitously. He knows there are many different perspectives and that First Nations themselves have some reservations about how an independent claims commission would affect the claims process.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been discussing these issues with the First Nations. We hope a consensus will be reached but in the meantime the debate over the hon. member's motion will help this House focus on some of the issues involved.

I would like to remind the House of the process now in place. It is a process that has been used successfully in the past although there is certainly room for improvement. At present, there are six steps to processing a specific claim.

In the first step the First Nation submits a claim along with supporting documents to the specific claims branch of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The branch then determines whether the claim meets the submission criteria of the policy.

Second, the submitted research contained in the supporting documents is analyzed and verified for completeness. The department works with the First Nation to prepare a historical report and analysis. Both parties must agree on the report. This is what is known as the research step, and it can take a long time to complete.

• (1935)

The third step is acceptance or non–acceptance of the claim. The specific claims branch of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development obtains legal opinions on the claim and a decision is made to accept or not accept the claim for negotiation. If the claim is accepted, we move on to the fourth step: negotiation. The specific claims branch negotiates with the claimant First Nation on the value of the losses and prepares an authority to settle.

In the fifth step, the specific claims branch and the claimant First Nation agree on compensation and provision for settlement if agreement in principle is struck. The agreement is drafted by the Department of Justice and First Nation lawyers into a formal settlement agreement. Finally, the settlement agreement is ratified and implemented.

This is a long and painstaking process. There is a fast track procedure for claims less than $500,000 in which some of the six steps are shortened.

Where does the Indian Specific Claims Commission come into play? If in the course of these steps Canada turns down the claim, the First Nation has a number of options: it can withdraw its claim; it can move to litigation; it can present new documentation and legal arguments; or the First Nation can request a review of the department's decision by the Indian Specific Claims Commission. The commission has been established to resolve such disputes and it can subpoena records and witnesses. It can help the government and claimant First Nations arrange mediation.

The commission's 1994–95 annual report indicates an involvement in mediation of five claims. The commission also pointed out in this report that it had received 98 requests, 42 of which were in progress. The commission reported eight completed inquiries.

Let me tell members about one case where the ISCC was instrumental. In the Chippewas of the Thames inquiry, the Muncey land claim, the First Nation had rejected settlement twice before the commission became involved. The original point of contention about the surrender of land was resolved early in the ISCC process and a fresh settlement agreement was negotiated and ratified on January 28, 1995.

Let me briefly explain how the commission works. If the department has not accepted a claim, the commission can make recommendations on whether the First Nation has established that Canada has an outstanding lawful obligation. If the department has accepted the claim, but the First Nation disagrees with the compensation criteria, the commission can recommend which compensation criteria should apply to the negotiation and settlement of the specific claim.

There are five steps the Indian Specific Claims Commission goes through. First, it receives a First Nation's request for a review of the department's decision. Second, it decides whether or not to review the decision. Third, the ISCC gathers all relevant information from the First Nation and Canada in relation to the specific claim, including the opinions of experts. The ISCC will also go into the claimant community and record the testimony or information of the members of the First Nation. Fourth, representatives from both the First Nation and the government argue their case by setting out their interpretation of facts, legal views and conclusions. Finally, the commission makes its recommendations based on the existing specific claims policy.

The commission does have some limitations. It cannot consider a claim based on unextinguished aboriginal title. These matters would be the subject of a comprehensive claim under a separate policy.

What is the value of the commission? First, it provides an opportunity for a body other than a court to review Canada's decision. Second, the commission has been successful in bringing both sides together with an impartial, neutral third party as a mediator. The mediator has no decision making power but he or she does have the power to direct and interpret the exchange of information. This influences perceptions, preferences and demands of both parties and it often implies possible lines of agreement.

This is the system that now exists. The system has its challenges. First Nations have expressed a concern that the commission is named by the government and therefore, in spite of the best intentions, cannot shake off the appearance of bias. The process is cumbersome. The commission intervenes only after a First Nation has been turned down by the department.

We will explore many options in the course of debating the motion from the hon. member. However, what we must bear in mind is that no changes should be made without the concurrence of the First Nations.

The minister has been consulting with the First Nations and I am very confident that a consensus will be reached. In the meantime, this exploration of the issues arising from this motion is most welcome.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

[English]

CANADIAN EXECUTIVE SERVICES ORGANIZATION

Mrs. Rose-Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to relate the outstanding international volunteer efforts of my constituent, Mr. Bruce Decker of Grand Bend, Ontario.

Mr. Decker and his wife Jean recently returned to Canada from Romania where Mr. Decker had applied his expertise to a locomotive manufacturer in restructuring its marketing department. Mr. Decker offered his services under the auspices of the Canadian Executive Services Organization, a non-profit volunteer organization which among other valuable services has been providing advice to emerging market economies in central and eastern Europe since 1967.

CESO is supported by the Government of Canada principally through CIDA. In addition to government support, CESO is also supported by hundreds of Canadian corporations and 4,000 volunteers. It is this kind of commitment and dedication by thousands of other Canadians that has contributed to the high esteem Canada has earned throughout the world.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if you are fleeing from the law in any country in the world, go to Canada. The taxpayers will look after you.

Take for instance Melissa Harris from Florida. She is a suspect in a double slaying who has fled across the border to Winnipeg. At the taxpayers' cost she is applying for refugee status, from Florida no less.

This Liberal government is a disgrace led by a minister of immigration who will no doubt call this yet another isolated incident. Or if I back him in the corner again he will simply say that as the minister he has no jurisdiction over refugee boards.

Perhaps Canadians should take another look at the policies of this government which allow Americans to claim refugee status if they are criminals, like Charles Ng. What is more important to Canadians, their safety or Liberals looking for more votes?

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has put forth hastily concocted post referendum proposals that seem, rather than working to bring about a consensus on national unity, to be creating even greater disunity.

The amending formula which proposes four regions does not take into account the strong views of many westerners that the prairie provinces are quite different from British Columbia, the third largest province in Canada. Past constitutional reports acknowledge the importance of this by considering British Columbia as a region for the purpose of constitutional amendments.

A second major question which this proposal raises concerns the implications for the creation of new provinces. At present the Yukon territory, Western Arctic and the newly created Nunavut are not demanding provincehood. However, it is imperative that constitutional measures not be put in place which would prevent the creation of new provinces at some time in the future.

I call on the Prime Minister to clarify what the implications are of this amending formula for the creation of new provinces in his proposed act.

LAMBTON COLLEGE

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Lambton College, which is located in my riding of Sarnia—Lambton, recently signed a formal partnership agreement with the Polytechnical University of Nicaragua. The agreement provides for faculty and student exchange programs, professional development and management linkages, sharing of educational development, linkages with the private sector, and joint international ventures between our two countries.

Lambton College will work closely with its partners in Nicaragua on health care, sustainable development and entrepreneurship. The agreement represents a major accomplishment for the college's international program, an important social and economic contribution to the development of Nicaragua.

I ask the Canadian International Development Agency to join with the private sector sponsors in funding this important project.

TOBACCO PRODUCTS

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the member of Parliament for London—Middlesex, I wish to add my voice today to those countless numbers of Canadians who are calling on the federal government to take more stringent action against tobacco products. Such actions could take several forms, including declaring tobacco to be what it is: a hazardous substance.

It is my belief and that of many of my constituents that the use of tobacco represents the most serious avoidable threat to the health of Canadians today. In fact, this is much more than a belief; it is a proven fact which should cause governments at all levels to take whatever positive steps they can to address this enormous health threat.

I call on this government to enact legislation that will designate tobacco products as hazardous and strictly regulate its manufacture, marketing and distribution.

INSURANCE BROKERS

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during the past several months I have received numerous representations from insurance brokers in Simcoe North. These small business people have valid concerns about the possibility of chartered banks being permitted to aggressively enter the insurance business.

On the surface this may appear to be just two industries in competition over a business segment, but it is much more than that. It is about the survival of many hundreds of small insurance brokerage firms located in towns and cities throughout Canada. It is also about the consumers of insurance services who will receive less personalized, untailored insurance coverage from inexpert bank representatives pushing inflexible, preset insurance plans.

This government is very concerned with creating conditions in which small and medium enterprises can grow and prosper. I hope this positive attitude will prevail when it comes to the hundreds of insurance brokers across Canada.

PRIME MINISTER'S PROPOSALS

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as we all read in the newspapers this morning, the Prime Minister's proposals have been almost unanimously rejected by our major dailies' editorial writers and other observers. Alain Dubuc from La Presse, Michel Auger from Le Journal de Montréal, and editorial writers from Le Soleil, the Ottawa Citizen and the Ottawa Sun were not fooled by the simplistic and superficial initiatives announced by the Prime Minister on Monday.

• (1405)

They see them as a hastily improvised reaction, to save face, by a government incapable of delivering on the constitutional promises it made during the Quebec referendum.

The Prime Minister's proposals have been rejected in English Canada for being overly generous to Quebec, and in Quebec for falling far short of its traditional minimum demands.

This is a repeat of the response to the Charlottetown agreement, which was rejected by all parties.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when the government announces its efforts this afternoon to appease Quebec it will be showing its contempt for the people of British Columbia. By incorporating British Columbia into a veto region with the prairie provinces this government is demonstrating a profound ignorance of our people, geography and history.

A quick look at any atlas will show that British Columbia is a distinct geographical region. Contrary to what the Liberals believe, there is a difference between our Pacific coast and numerous mountain ranges and the wheat fields and gopher mounds of the prairies.

For too long the federal government has exploited British Columbia. We contribute more than our share to the federal coffers, but receive far less than we should when it comes to federal spending or representation in this House.

I agree with the leaders of all the B.C. provincial parties, including Liberal leader Gordon Campbell who denounced this proposal.

In its efforts to appease Quebec, this government—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Guelph—Wellington.

REFORM PARTY

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians may be facing something never seen before: smiling Reformers.

A Reform strategy memo leaked after a so–called brainstorming session has suggested that Reform members should smile more in public. It took 50 staff members and two years of discussions to develop this new and drastic strategy. No doubt its writers had to overcome the following questions: Would anyone recognize a smiling Reformer? How would being happy affect their doom and gloom policies? Would Reformers welcome a happy person into their party?

We know that Reformers may have difficulty adjusting to this smiling theory. Fortunately for them, their leader is not bound to act on this recommendation, but unfortunately for us we will not find the answer to the most important question: Can Reformers smile?

BRITISH COLUMBIA FRENCH–CANADIAN FEDERATION

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this year marks the 50th anniversary of the British Columbia French–Canadian Federation.

Last month, the federation held 50th anniversary celebrations; there was much to celebrate, including six community centres, two bilingual caisses populaires, three housing co–ops, French–language libraries, a weekly newspaper, an education service for francophones, education and training services for adults, immersion courses for students, a professional theatre company, a chamber of commerce, and French–language court services.

The 60,000 francophones living in Maillardville, Vancouver, Prince George, Kamloops, Kelowna, Powell River, Nanaimo and other communities throughout the province are proud of their heritage, their culture and their roots, which will always belong to them.

I would ask my colleagues to join me in wishing the British Columbia French–Canadian Federation a happy anniversary and in commending it for its 50 years of successful work and its commitment and dedication to the cause of the French–speaking community outside Quebec.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the House of an excellent initiative put forward by the Federal Office of Regional Development, in co–operation with the Business Development Bank of Canada.

Indeed, the setting up of a new fund called Idée–PME, with some $25 million in capital for commercial loans, is a remarkable example of the positive results that can be achieved when we put the expertise of two agencies to work in an innovative partnership. That partnership, and this is a word which our friends opposite are fond of, confirms the federal government's will to improve the performance of economic agencies in Quebec, whether public or private.

It also confirms that Liberal members are committed to fostering a business climate which will promote economic development and job creation, which are so important for Quebecers and their province within the Canadian federation.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will never cease to amaze us. On the very day he proposed a symbolic motion to show that he intends to recognize Quebec's distinct society status, he completely denied that distinctiveness by making an empty offer to all provinces, without distinction, regarding manpower training.

• (1410)

Reaching new heights of improvisation, the Prime Minister even had the nerve to use vocational training to try to show his good will, even though his offer does not in any way meet Quebec's unanimous plea for the transfer of powers and resources in this area.

The first time he has an opportunity to show that he respects Quebec's distinct character, the Prime Minister chooses instead to treat our province like any other. Should we remind him that it is Quebec, not Saskatchewan or Nova Scotia, that has been asking for years that the responsibility for vocational training be transferred to the province?

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister warns that this nation will fall apart if the federal government devolves some of its responsibilities. His favourite example is health care. If the health care system changes, he declares, Canada will cease to exist, as if Canada is nothing more than a collection of social programs. To Liberals, government spending is the glue that holds the country together.

The bonds of unity are stronger than any government program. We emerged united from two world wars, a conscription crisis and a decade long depression not by our programs but by our strength of character and the firmness of our resolve.

Canadian unity rests largely on shared values like justice, freedom, equality and the opportunity and challenge afforded by our great land. If we neglect these things, we will indeed lose our country.

The Liberals should listen up. Changes to bring about a smaller, less intrusive federal government are essential if we are to preserve the unity of the federation.

RECOGNITION OF QUEBEC AS A DISTINCT SOCIETY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during the referendum campaign, the Prime Minister promised to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. Now, he is putting forward new initiatives to fulfil his promise.

[English]

Unfortunately, the third party is once again putting its own political agenda ahead of Canada's by not supporting this initiative that will help preserve Canadian unity.

The third party's political manoeuvring is as apparent today as it was in 1989 when, in an article which appeared in Maclean's, the leader of that party compared the constitutional evolution of our country to horse trading. He was willing then to trade off the distinct society clause for something else. Clearly this form of trade off bargaining serves to create greater differences among the regions and the provinces instead of creating a sense of Canadian unity.

When will the leader of the Reform Party and his colleagues start putting Canada first as opposed to their own political fortunes?

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, thousands of Quebecers who watched the television program Enjeux were horrified at the dramatic consequences of the Chinese birth rate policy. One million infant girls are rejected every year and left to die in crowded institutions, just because they were not born male. They die of neglect in government operated nurseries.

By refusing to raise the issue of human rights with his Chinese counterparts, on the pretext that this would hurt our trade relations, the Prime Minister is condoning this shameful practice. It is desperately urgent that this government face up to the human rights situation in China and condemn the violation of the most basic rights of Chinese infants.

LEADER OF THE BLOC QUEBECOIS

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois reiterated once again that he is not interested in working to ensure that Quebec is recognized as a distinct society within the Canadian federation.

The leader of the Bloc suggested that he was more concerned with getting ready to be crowned leader of the PQ and appointed Premier of Quebec than with looking after the interests of all Quebecers.

[English]

By refusing to accept the federal government's proposal to recognize Quebec's distinct society, the leader of the Bloc has demonstrated that he is more concerned about preparing for his ascension to the PQ throne than responding to the demands of Quebecers.

[Translation]

The people of Quebec are finding out with dismay that the man they believed would champion their rights is actually prepared to sacrifice the recognition of distinct society for a separatist throne in Quebec. That is why the leader of the Bloc Quebecois has lost interest in distinct society.

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Phillipe Clement, Dean Cyr, Isaac Deas, Daniel Gingras, Clinton Suzack and Clinton Gayle. What do all of these names have in common? They are convicted felons who have either raped, killed or tortured innocent Canadians while under supervision.

These are not isolated cases. The list is much longer than those I have mentioned. For every name there is at least one victim whose life came to a violent, tragic end because their assailant was not fit to be walking the streets. Many of the families of these victims have pending lawsuits. They want to know why dangerous criminals are held in prisons without fences. They want to know why ruthless killers are given birthday passes to go to shopping malls with unarmed guards. They want to know why the decision making process over parolees is made by political cronies who are incompetent and costing innocent Canadians their lives.

• (1415)

All these atrocities fall under the portfolio of the solicitor general. It is high time he took responsibility and realized that when it comes to the safety of Canadians there is no compromise. Canadians are tired of living in fear.

RENEWAL OF CANADIAN FEDERALISM

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Globe and Mail reported a split in the phoney committee chaired by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. I am referring to the committee that is supposed to consider changes in the federal system, to follow through on the referendum promises made by the Prime Minister.

It seems that on one side we have five ministers, including three from Quebec, demanding thorough changes and on the other side, four ministers from Ontario who persist in their belief that Quebecers will be satisfied with symbolic gestures.

My question is directed to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. Are we to assume it was the profound split between members of his committee that led the Prime Minister to announce his proposals on such short notice, even before the committee tabled its report?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is impugning motive. We are working on various ways in which the Canadian federation could be improved.

Yes, we did discuss the issues of distinct society and veto rights, and the first results were there in the Prime Minister's announcement. We are now discussing other matters, including a more sensible division of powers between the provinces and Canada. We will submit our recommendations to the Prime Minister as soon as they are ready.

That ministers should differ in their opinions on various subjects is entirely normal in a party like ours that practices the democracy it preaches.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in view of the very deep split within the committee chaired by the minister, I want to ask him whether he would agree that the hollow initiatives announced by the Prime Minister show that he sided with the four ministers from Ontario who believe they can satisfy Quebecers' desire for change with this measly proposal.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in our committee, we consider the interests of Canada, including those of Quebec. The ministers express their views on the basis of their knowledge, experience and judgment, which is entirely normal.

My conclusion with respect to distinct society and the veto is that we are clearly on the right track towards making substantial changes in the way the Canadian federation operates.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I heard "on the right track"; a look at the newspapers is enough to see it is the wrong track.

I want to ask the minister whether he would agree that the government's initiative is off to a very bad start and that the government is heading up another blind alley, since as we saw in the case of Charlottetown, any proposal to Quebec will be seen as too generous by English Canada and not enough by Quebec.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our committee has approached the problems of unity from the perspective that we stayed together for 128 years and always managed to solve our problems, and also from the perspective that the French language was best able to thrive—and I saw this personally in the course of my career—while we were part of Canada.

The position on distinct society, which is gaining acceptance and which will be included in the resolution of the House of Commons, is also a recognition of aspects of distinct society, which developed in the Parliament of Canada and in the Canadian provinces. I repeat, it developed within Canada. The changes that are necessary can and should be made within Canada. In fact, that is the message sent to all Canadians, including the official opposition, by the vote on October 30.

• (1420)

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, one would certainly think in listening to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs that he has become a Pollyanna, since he is the only one pleased at this time with the situation in which he has placed himself and his government.

In the rush of reactions to the Prime Minister's announcement of his initiatives, the premiers of British Columbia, Alberta, even Manitoba have had some very harsh words to say about both the initiatives and the Prime Minister's attitude. All of the reactions triggered by the Prime Minister's proposals paint a picture of an increasingly divided Canada.

Is the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs aware that the reactions to the Prime Minister's proposals clearly demonstrate that the proposals are in serious jeopardy, even now as we speak, and that his government is headed for a constitutional impasse?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): On the contrary, Mr. Speaker. In connection with the distinct society, you have seen a large number of Canadian premiers, including those from the west, Mr. Filmon in particular, expressing their agreement. The Prime Minister has indicated that we would start with a House of Commons resolution on these questions, since we can do no more from the constitutional point of view at present, but that it was our wish to enshrine it in the Constitution.

What is happening with the distinct society question will also happen with the veto. The Prime Minister had promised during the closing week of the campaign that he would take steps to reinstate the Quebec veto lost by René Lévesque. We are going to reinstate it; this is the way to resolve the problems that exist in Canada. We have a committee looking at the other problems of the federation at this time, and it will be coming out with some conclusions.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs not agree that his proposals, his government's proposals, not only are dividing his own committee, the phoney committee, but also the cabinet and the caucus, as well as deeply dividing all of Canada?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would recommend that the official opposition come to grips with the fact that there was also divided opinion on the yes in Quebec, and that the yes side lost. When there is talk of divided opinions, the main place there is any division at this time is in Quebec, but it is also clear that the no side did win and that Quebecers—and this is a decision that you must accept because it is a democratic one—have clearly indicated that they want major changes, but within Canada.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, one of the most obvious lessons from the past is that unity proposals are divisive if their only goal is to appease one province or one group in Canadian society.

After the referendum vote, Canadians demanded fresh thinking on national unity and there was a widespread demand from all Canadians to reshape our federation.

The Prime Minister has responded to this demand, not by bringing a broad forward looking Canada package to the House but rather by bringing a narrow backward looking Quebec package.

My question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. When will the government bring a national unity package to Parliament that addresses the legitimate concerns and aspirations of Canadians outside Quebec as well as inside Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think Canadians from all regions of the country have said they want to keep Canada united.

[English]

When Canadians from all parts of the country went to Montreal to express their views, they were representing views from all over Canada, from British Columbia to Alberta to Ontario to the maritimes. Canadians are united on that goal to keep Canada together. They want the federal government to find the ways to solve existing problems.

• (1425)

It is normal that many views would be offered, some of which are contradictory, on the means by which Canada can be kept together. However in the present instance there is no doubt that we have the support of Canadians for the measures the Prime Minister has introduced.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during the referendum campaign the Prime Minister and the federal government showed that they were dangerously out of touch with the aspirations of Quebecers. Now with this half baked Quebec package, with nothing more than constitutional vetoes and distinct society, the government is showing that it is dangerously out of touch with the rest of the country.

There is nothing in these unity packages that addresses the concerns of the west, the north, Ontario or Atlantic Canada. In fact that absence of content merely alienates the millions of Canadians who are tired of this 30–year old federal two step to appease Quebec separatists.

When will the government change direction, abandon the status quo and develop a truly Canadian package for nation building, one that addresses the concerns and aspirations of Canadians outside Quebec as well as inside Quebec?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first, I ask the hon. member to recognize and acknowledge that the steps announced this week by the Prime Minister represent only the first steps in a strategy in the months to come that will make it clear that the government has a national vision for the future of the country.

Second, I invite the attention of the hon. member to the terms of the veto proposal the Prime Minister has put on the table reflecting the very approach taken by the Reform Party in its purported vision for the future. It requires regional consensus before any constitutional change could take place in the country. I would think the Reform Party as a regional party would support that approach and I expect it will.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the government's remarks, no matter which minister addresses it, that indicates there is even an interest in the constitutional and systemic demands for change in other parts of the country.

For example, I have been in the House for two years and I have never yet—

Mr. Young: Nobody noticed.

Ms. Clancy: Recall.

Mr. Marchi: What are you, a cowboy?

The Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary Southwest is about to put his question.

Mr. Manning: Mr. Speaker, in that period we have never yet seen the government give any priority whatsoever to the concerns and aspirations of British Columbia, the third most populous province in the country. B.C. is not even represented on the unity committee. It is not recognized by the government as a region in its own right.

The government is prepared to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. When is the federal government prepared to recognize British Columbia as an important province of Canada?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the third party emphasizes impressions. He wants to leave the impression that the British Columbia perspective is not reflected in these proposals, but the reality is quite different.

The hon. member should know, if he does not, that the constitutional amending formula already in the Constitution Act, 1982, requires unanimous consent of the provinces to any change falling within section 41 of the Constitution, an important list of changes.

British Columbia has a veto over any such change. British Columbia, with the other provinces, has a veto over any proposed change in section 43 of the Constitution, involving the interests of British Columbia or any adjacent province.

• (1430)

British Columbia can opt out, like any other province, of any change approved under section 38. The veto we will introduce this week will make it possible for British Columbia and any other western province to veto any other proposed constitutional change.

In that context how can the leader of the third party possibly suggest the western and the British Columbia perspective is not reflected in the Constitution?

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

The Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs was totally serious yesterday when he announced that the phoney committee he chairs, which is divided, as the minister has indicated, will continue its deliberations despite the initiatives announced by the Prime Minister. It will even submit recommendations to the Prime Minister by Christmas.

Are we to understand that the phoney committee is continuing its work because it plans to offer Quebec more than the Prime Minister did barely two days ago?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition is obviously obsessed with the word "phoney", which it must surely get from its own use of the word or from the example it provided with the regional commissions in Quebec, which were really phoney commissions.

The Bloc's questions are also becoming increasingly phoney, because the answer has been provided three times. The committee plans to submit its recommendations to the Prime Minister by Christmas. A few weeks are not going to bother us. However, in our report, we will clearly have to consider other options for solving the federation's current problems in connection with programs, activities, roles and jurisdictions.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the word "phoney" bothers the minister because it reflects the truth.

Does the minister not believe, rather, that the initiatives announced by the Prime Minister sound the death knell for the work of his committee, thus confirming beyond a doubt that the committee is phoney and was set up simply to create the illusion that Ottawa was preparing to offer changes to Quebec? This is the fact of the matter.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we had an example of phoney studies with the Le Hir reports, need I remind you. So, if the opposition and the Parti Quebecois need a refresher on good examples of bad studies, they have the very thing right in their own bailiwick.

As for our committee, we will continue to examine ways to resolve the federation's problems, because our goal is not to destroy Canada, but to build it. This is what the majority of Canadians and Quebecers have asked us to do, and, because we believe in democracy, we will continue to try to build Canada.

[English]

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is proposing a package of change that reminds some of us of the Charlottetown accord, an accord which we emphatically rejected three years ago. He should not be surprised when British Columbia and Alberta, the two most populous and the two wealthiest provinces in the west, have rejected his offer.

How can the Prime Minister justify cobbling together a package which supposedly addresses the concerns of Quebec but which is seen as a slap in the face to Alberta and British Columbia?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the proposal which is reflected in the veto bill, to be tabled later today, comes very close to what was known as the Victoria formula of 1971, an approach favoured by the province of British Columbia.

Under the Constitution at present, in the absence of the legislation we will table today, it will be possible for constitutional change to take place under Section 38 of the Constitution Act, notwithstanding that it was opposed by British Columbia and two other western provinces, even if they comprised more than 50 per cent of the population of the west.

This bill will make it impossible for that to occur.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the justice minister talks about the 1971 reality. I would ask him to leap forward if he could to the 1995 reality.

• (1435)

He ignores the fact that Canada is changing and that in a generation British Columbia will have as many people in it as Quebec. He ignores the fact that the concerns of the west can no longer be ignored. If he does not know that, he should go out west and he would know that.

Why is the Prime Minister proposing veto provisions for central Canada when he must know that British Columbians will never approve of this package?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should assume for a moment that the hon. member speaks for the people of British Columbia.

I thought it was the Reform Party which proposed that we should change the situation so that there is regional consensus required before constitutional change takes place, which is exactly what this bill does.

I ask the hon. member, since he derives from a riding in British Columbia, whether he has the agreement of his colleagues from Alberta for the proposition that B.C. should itself and alone have a veto on constitutional change.

[Translation]

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. Given the last minute commitment made by the Prime Minister a few days before the referendum with a view to swaying Quebecers, followed by the striking of a phoney committee with a foggy mandate, and by the hasty announcement on Monday of his proposals, it appears increasingly obvious that the Prime Minister is improvising on his own.

Given the general outcry in response to the Prime Minister's proposals across Canada, will the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs admit that the Prime Minister, faced with a profoundly divided Liberal Party, is acting alone on this issue to save his skin?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the contrary. Quebec has been demanding a distinct society clause for a long time, for years, for decades. It has been doing so to achieve a very important objective: to provide Quebecers with the security afforded by the recognition, by the federal government and the Constitution, of the distinctiveness of the language spoken by the majority of them, which is different from the language used in the rest of Canada, the uniqueness of their culture, and the particular traditions of their civil code.

The Prime Minister's motion finally gives Quebec what it has been demanding for years, that is recognition by Canada as a whole, since Parliament is the only place which represents all Canadians from every region. The Canadian Parliament has been asked by the Prime Minister to pass this resolution giving Quebec the recognition it has been demanding for years.

The fact that most premiers are now in agreement with respect to the distinct society shows once again that Canadians are now—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Laval East.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party was already profoundly divided on the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords. Faced with the Prime Minister's phoney proposals, which are worse than those of Meech and Charlottetown in terms of Quebec's expectations, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs would like us to believe that everything is sweetness and light with the Liberal Party. Give us a break!

• (1440)

Given the fact that both the caucus and the phoney committee are profoundly divided, and that the proposals are being met with negative reactions throughout western Canada, Ontario, the maritimes, and Quebec, is the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs aware that the Prime Minister—

[English]

The Speaker: The hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, once again, I would ask you once again to ask shorter questions.

If the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs wants to answer the question, I will allow him to do so.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the member that the Prime Minister has the support of everyone in the caucus and in the party.

No doubt this hurts the Bloc members who would like to rewrite history. It hurts them to see that most Canadians across the country support the Prime Minister. But we know that Canadians are able to see beyond politics and to accept a fact, a reality; they are able to accept that we recognize Quebec as a distinct society.

What is most unfortunate is that only the Bloc members will refuse the proposal.

[English]

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

While the Minister of National Revenue from B.C. contends that recognizing Quebec as a distinct society will not amount to very much, conversely the Minister of Natural Resources from Alberta said that distinct society status in Quebec would amount to something very substantial. One wonders whether it is substantial or not.

I ask the Prime Minister to explain how he intends to promote national unity across Canada when he is having such a problem getting unity even within his own cabinet.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the last few days the Prime Minister has shown a leadership that unfortunately will not be understood by the Reform Party because it does not understand either the word Canada or the word leadership.

I met a woman in a wheelchair during the Montreal march who had come from Peace River, Alberta. I met her in an elevator and she said to me: "Madam Copps, I do not speak French but I know you do and will you please tell Quebecers that I am here because I care for my country, and Quebec is a part of my country". That is why the vast majority of Canadians will support the Prime Minister and his leadership, unlike the cheap politics of the Reform Party.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, speaking of cheap politics, there is clear evidence that old style Tory–Liberal federalism and politics are alive and well as far as central Canada is concerned.

For instance, the unity minister says the west should sacrifice its own concerns for the good of the country.

• (1445)

I ask the Prime Minister if he would explain why western provinces should yet again sacrifice their concerns and support a unity plan that is aimed solely at appeasing the separatists of Quebec.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member talks about the western provinces and the regions. Certainly the Prime Minister has left the door open to a different Canadian configuration with the regions. In examining the proposition that calls for a recognition of four regions, he is actually following a study on Confederation written for the Canada West Foundation by the leader of the Reform Party, who called for the western provinces as one particular entity.

When the member opposite talks about the five regions of Canada and asks whether Alberta or British Columbia is a separate region, I would like to quote the House leader of the Reform Party, who says the five regions of Canada means British Columbia, not Alberta. The answer by the House leader of the Reform Party: "Not necessarily Alberta and British Columbia. All the provincial governments now have a say in the ratification formula".

When they want to talk about regions, I wish Reform members would ascertain whether they want regional status for Alberta or British Columbia.

MANPOWER TRAINING

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The Prime Minister announced two days ago that instead of recognizing the responsibility of Quebec in the area of vocational training, as we have all requested for many years, Ottawa intends to keep full control over the money it now spends on employment training by giving that money directly to the unemployed.

Can the minister confirm that, in the area of manpower training, the proposal that would have the federal government deal directly with individuals, bypassing the provinces, will prevent the provinces from implementing a true manpower training policy adapted to the needs of the labour market?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister made it very clear on Monday that the federal government was very much clarifying the respective responsibilities and we were transferring to the provinces a large number of responsibilities that had previously been under various regimes of shared programming.

For the member to claim that somehow there is now more interference is simply turning logic and reality on its head. We are making a very major departure for the province because we think that is a much better way of clarifying the role.

At the same time, I think everyone recognizes that under the Unemployment Insurance Act, as it was constitutionally agreed to in 1941 by all the provinces, including Quebec, the federal government has taken the trusteeship for those under the regime of that system and therefore we have a responsibility to the people in that system.

It is about time the hon. member learned a little about the real Constitution of Canada.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister has such difficulty explaining his positions that he always has to resort to insults. It is exactly because we, in Quebec, understand the very basis of the Constitution of Canada that we say that manpower training is a Quebec jurisdiction both on legal and constitutional grounds.

Can the minister confirm that what he is about to do, by giving money directly to the unemployed, is to keep control over national standards, choices and needs, in spite of Quebec's rights?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, frankly, it is the height of absurdity to claim, as the hon. member has just done, that under the unemployment insurance program, where people have paid premiums, we have no responsibility of helping to pay benefits. The reason people pay premiums is so we can pay benefits. That is the whole purpose of the program.

Furthermore, the system has worked effectively in the past because we have the ability to share that responsibility across the country so that people who pay premiums in one part of the country can help pay benefits in another part of the country where there are higher levels of unemployment. That is the genius of the system. In this country we have learned to share from region to region and not isolate ourselves behind a wall.

HIGH TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Mauril Bélanger (Ottawa—Vanier, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for Science, Research and Development.

It is a well-known fact that technology is an increasingly important element of the world and the Canadian economy. Could the Secretary of State tell the House what measures the government has taken and will take to support and reinforce the high technology sector of the Canadian economy?

Hon. Jon Gerrard (Secretary of State (Science, Research and Development), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier for his question.

[English]

The question gives me an opportunity to emphasize to Canadians that a priority of our government is to launch Canada into the knowledge age. To this end, we have undertaken to fund and develop a number of significant initiatives: the second long term space plan, CANARIE, PRECARN, TRIUMF, SchoolNet, the community access program, Canadian Technology Network, the technology partnerships program, the telelearning network of centres of excellence. In the west and Quebec there is the new knowledge based industries and ideas fund; in Ontario, a new NRC institute in London; in the maritimes, ACOA's support for federal–provincial technology agreements; in Ottawa, the technological development—

LABOUR MARKET TRAINING

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the federal government's Quebec package fails to heed the calls to decentralize social programs.

Giving labour market training to the provinces without giving them the resources indicates that the Prime Minister has decided to decentralize the federal debt.

Does the Minister of Human Resources Development admit that when he transfers responsibility without giving up resources he is transferring debt, not power?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister made it very clear that when we table, as we intend to do on Friday, the full package of employment insurance measures that have been developed, we will ensure that the full recognition of responsibility for education and training by the provinces is acknowledged.

We would be more than interested and prepared to work with each of the provinces to ensure that the effective delivery of benefits under the employment insurance program is targeted, customized, and tailored to meet each provincial need and that there are full resources for the people in each of those regions to ensure they have adequate means of getting back to work. That is what it is all about, working together to get people back to work.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member did not understand my question.

Effective labour market training requires that the provinces have complete control and adequate resources. Will the minister admit that he has absolutely no intention of giving up the purse strings for labour market training?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of doing that. We will be proposing on Friday a number of initiatives and regimes that will enable and allow the provinces to fulfil the responsibilities they have under the training regime.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

This morning, we learned from a Canadian Press article that the unemployment insurance reform to be tabled in this House next Friday will base benefits on household income instead of on personal income. This measure will deny thousands of jobless people access to unemployment insurance benefits.

Will the minister confirm that his unemployment insurance reform will make the family income a determining factor in eligibility for UI benefits?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the poor member is totally confused. That is one reason I suggest he wait to see what we present, rather than basing his judgment on various news reports and speculation.

There is far too much assessment being made of our package before anyone has seen it. I would recommend that before deciding whether they like the menu, they should first read it.

• (1455)

[Translation]

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister could at least read the newspapers.

And today, he could at least do one thing, and that is what I am asking him to do, which is to admit that, by taking into account not the income of the unemployed but rather the family income, he will deny thousands of women access to the unemployment insurance program, while continuing to require that these women pay their UI contributions?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member knew the dossier properly he would probably know that the child tax benefit, for example, where the federal government transfers $5.4 billion directly to aid families with children, is based on a family income test. As a result, most of the beneficiaries, I would say almost 80 per cent, are women and children.

It is about time the Bloc Quebecois began to be concerned far more about children and got off its hobby horse of separatism. The only way we will help poor children in this country is if all governments work together.

LABOUR MARKET TRAINING

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the fact that training programs should be delivered by the provinces is neither revolutionary nor unreasonable. Along with these responsibilities, is the minister prepared to give the provinces the tax points to go along with these responsibilities?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not within my mandate to give away tax points.

Mr. Young: Don't do it.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I have just received advice from my colleague, the Minister of Transport, not to do it. Of course I am always more than interested in his point of view and opinion.

On Friday I invite the hon. member to be in the House and to be available. We will be detailing exactly how we would be proposing to fundamentally restructure the employment insurance system in this country to first make sure there is strong support of income for those who are unemployed and need that support, and even more important, to ensure that we are able to provide a series of benefits to enable people to go back to work.

That is the key issue, how to get hundreds of thousands of Canadians back to work. That is the purpose of this government and that is the purpose of the reform we will present on Friday.

Mr. Dale Johnston (Wetaskiwin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I cannot imagine why the provinces would like to buy into a program like this when the minister is willing to give them the responsibility of the program without giving them proper tax points.

I would like to ask this minister if he knows the difference between downsizing and downloading.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what I do recognize is that when we talk about decentralizing there is a major difference between the position that has been constantly taken by members of the Reform Party and what I think many other Canadians are concerned about.

Canadians are telling us that we do not gain by transferring resources from one bureaucracy to another. We really should be transferring resources to people, to the private sector, to communities, to those who are best able to make decisions about how to get back to work.

The fundamental philosophy of the Liberal Party is to enhance the ability of individuals to make choices about their future. No more important choice can be made than to allow individuals to get back to work.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Recently some of our provincial colleagues have been discussing the creation of boot camps, particularly for young offenders. There is much research on the use of boot camps as a correctional tool. Can the minister tell the House what this research reveals about boot camps, youth and reoffending?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this government is in favour of what works.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rock: If what is meant by boot camps are properly managed facilities, properly financed, structured, intended for and capable of giving young people a sense of social responsibility, what it means to be a member of a group, developing a sense of self–esteem with proper follow up, that works and we would favour such an approach. If they are properly managed and if the investment is made, it has been shown to work.

• (1500)

Too many governments in this country and too many politicians would have us believe that the approach is toward a boot camp which is more out of Hollywood than anything else, where people are put in chains in the 1930s style to work in the hot sun. That may suit the purpose of a politician who wants to pander to a certain narrow element of the electorate, and there are such politicians. But this government is in favour of what works, and what works is a responsible approach to youth justice.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue, the senior minister for British Columbia.

British Columbians are outraged that first we were shut out of the cabinet committee on unity and now we are denied the same veto rights as Ontario and Quebec.

I ask the minister: Why was B.C. shut out of the cabinet committee on unity? When will the minister finally stand up for the people of British Columbia instead of showing total contempt for British Columbians by telling us that we have to wait for demographics until we have basic equality with Ontario and Quebec? When will he stand up for British Columbians?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am disappointed that the representatives of the NDP at a time when we need to nation build are looking for differences.

I can assure the hon. member that the minister for British Columbia is working very hard to ensure that British Columbia's voice is heard strongly and loudly in cabinet. I can also assure him that the regional veto proposal put forth by the Prime Minister, which is far better than the current amending formula, places in the hands of British Columbians the power to shape the Constitution more directly in the future than they ever had in the past. The Prime Minister never closed the door to future recognition of B.C. in a specific way.

I can say that at least on this side of the House we do not have one member of Parliament calling for a region of British Columbia and another calling for a region of Alberta, something that we see in the Reform Party.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the 104th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs concerning the federal electoral boundaries commissions reports tabled in the House and referred to the committee on Thursday, June 25, 1995.

[English]

While I am presenting the report, I want to thank members of the House who served on the subcommittees that did the work for the committee on procedure and House affairs at the hearing stage, ably chaired by the hon. members for Cumberland—Colchester, Leeds—Grenville, Dauphin—Swan River, and Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle.

• (1505)

There were 81 objections filed and the subcommittees heard the members who wished to be heard in respect of those objections. I know that all hon. members who appeared before the subcommittees were very much appreciative of their efforts.

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with section 22 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, the committee's documents required by the act will also be filed with you today for referral to the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada.

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 105th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding the membership and associate membership of the Standing Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS

TAXATION

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition that has been circulating all across Canada from coast to coast to coast. This particular petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories.

The petitioners would like to draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill, or the aged.

The petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill, and the aged.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of documents be allowed to stand.

[English]

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, on June 14, 1995 I put a notice of motion on the Order Paper that the government produce all business plans and outlook documents prepared by departments and other agencies. These are the documents that the government intended to publish under the new policy of outlook documents that were supposed to be tabled in the spring. By the end of the summer recess we were still waiting for some of these documents and therefore I put a motion on the Order Paper.

As of this date we are still waiting for the government to produce these documents. These are not new documents. They are ones that the government proposed be tabled as part of the new procedures in examining the spending of this government.

When can we expect to receive the documents we should have had months ago?

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I understood the outlook documents have been placed before the various standing committees of the House. Certainly all the ones for any of the standing committees which I serve on and have any responsibility for have received their documents. I am surprised to hear this from the hon. member, but I will undertake to look into the matter and get back to him as soon as possible.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

RECOGNITION OF QUEBEC AS A DISTINCT SOCIETY

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.) moved:

That

Whereas the People of Quebec have expressed the desire for recognition of Quebec's distinct society;

(1) the House recognize that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada;

(2) the House recognize that Quebec's distinct society includes its French–speaking majority, unique culture and civil law tradition;

(3) the House undertake to be guided by this reality;

(4) the House encourage all components of the legislative and executive branches of government to take note of this recognition and be guided in their conduct accordingly.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to rise in the House of Commons to launch the debate on the motion presented by the government to recognize Quebec as a distinct society within Canada.

• (1515)

I made three commitments during the Quebec referendum campaign: first, to recognize that Quebec forms a distinct society within Canada; second, not to make any constitutional change that affects Quebec without Quebecers' consent; and third, to undertake changes to bring services and the decision making process closer to citizens.

Less than a month after the referendum, the government is keeping its word and fulfilling its commitments. I would like to remind everyone that a majority of Quebecers said on October 30 that they want Quebec to continue to be a part of Canada and that they want changes to be made within Canada. The Government of Canada has understood that message, and the resolution we are debating today, as well as the bills on a veto and unemployment insurance reform, are testimony to the Government of Canada's respect for the choice of Quebecers.

By rejecting the option of separation promoted by the Parti Quebecois and members of the official opposition, Quebecers have called on their provincial government to act like a full–fledged partner and to work with us for the evolution of the Canadian federation. It is unfortunate for Quebecers that their government and the official opposition have not remembered that message. They refuse to respect the will of the majority and to represent all Quebecers, not just those who say the same things they do.

In fact, a few minutes ago, in the Quebec National Assembly, the Parti Quebecois refused to recognize the results of the referendum in a motion put forward by the opposition asking the National Assembly to recognize them. It is unfortunate that the Leader of the Opposition, who is likely to be the next premier of Quebec, is still talking as if the referendum campaign were still underway. The referendum is over. Quebecers have voted for Canada, for change within Canada. It is about time certain members of this House realized that.

[English]

Our government understands the lessons that had to be learned. The result of the referendum on October 30 has shown us we cannot take Canada for granted. The Canada we have built deserves to be defended against its detractors. Canada deserves to have its evolution safeguarded. That is what we intend to do.

The measures we initiated on Monday move in that direction. All our actions have just one goal: to ensure the unity and evolution of Canada in order to respond to the aspirations of all Canadians.

[Translation]

The purpose of the motion we are debating today is to have the elected representatives of Canada recognize that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada. As a Quebecer and a francophone, I understand and share the desire of my fellow Quebecers to have our difference recognized.

• (1520)

The motion put forward by our government goes to the very heart of what makes Quebec different. The motion specifies that this distinct society includes, and I quote: "—its French–speaking majority, unique culture and civil law tradition".

That definition of what makes Quebec different is just, true to reality and unrestrictive. I am certain that most Quebecers will recognize themselves in that definition of distinct society. It includes our traditions, our culture, our legal system and our French soul.

[English]

The debate we are having today on this motion is an opportunity for the members of the official opposition to show solidarity with and good faith in their fellow citizens. It is an opportunity for them to act positively to support the recognition of the distinct society of Quebec by the House.

I would not want to miss this opportunity to speak directly to Quebecers who, since October 30, since the distressing statements by Mr. Parizeau, since the unacceptable actions by Mr. Landry, have been feeling nervous and unwelcome.

Quebec is made up of a francophone majority. That is what makes it different. However, Quebec is also made up of Quebecers who have come from every part of the world. They are full fledged Quebecers and Canadians. On behalf of the Government of Canada I want to tell them today that we have not forgotten them. I assure them of our full support. They can count on us.

[Translation]

Canada is a country where diversity is respected, where we can recognize and affirm our differences. We reject the idea that a country must require its citizens to have a single, uniform identity.

The reality of Canada accommodates recognition of Quebec as a distinct society within Canada. The reality of Canada includes the reality of Quebec.

We are calling today on the members of this House to recognize that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada.

[English]

During the referendum campaign the legislatures of Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland passed resolutions recognizing the uniqueness of Quebec within Canada by virtue of its language, culture and legal systems.

Canadians throughout the country also showed their attachment to Quebec during the referendum campaign. All across the country spontaneous demonstrations were organized in support of Quebec.

Today I call on Canadians who demonstrated their attachment to Quebec during the referendum campaign to support our government's initiative to recognize Quebec explicitly as a distinct society.

[Translation]

With the support of Canadians, with the support of governments in the other provinces, and with the support of members of this House, I am certain that, if the Government of Quebec so wishes, we will be able to entrench that recognition of Quebec's distinct society within the Canadian Constitution.

• (1525)

But now is not the time for constitutional discussions, because the Government of Quebec and the Leader of the Opposition himself have indicated that they refuse to participate in such discussions. That is why the government has decided to show Quebecers that it is possible to recognize their society for what it is, by calling on the House to vote in favour of this motion.

Once it is passed, this resolution will have an impact on how legislation is passed in the House of Commons. I remind Canadians that the legislative branch will be bound by this resolution, as will the executive branch. This is a real, dynamic recognition, recorded in the very heart of our country's government.

I believe that this is the type of assurance and guarantee that the majority of Quebecers are looking for. And the Leader of the Opposition need do only one thing to indicate to them that he respects their vote in favour of change within Canada. Unfortunately, he has already indicated that he does not intend to do that.

Moreover, the Leader of the Opposition often likes to remind us of those who did not support Meech. And each time, memory fails him. Well, I would like to remind him that his colleague sitting right beside him, the member for Roberval, was a member of the National Assembly in 1987 and he voted against Meech.

The party which he intends to lead voted against Meech and against Charlottetown, and is about to reject for a third time in a row the recognition of the fact that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada.

The party he still leads today is about to do the same. History will remember that.

[English]

As it concerns the aboriginal people of Canada, my government is clearly on record as respecting their aspirations. We recognize the unique legal position of aboriginal people, including the protection of aboriginal and treaty rights in the Canadian Constitution and the inherent right of self–government.

This resolution, through which the House is being called upon to confirm the reality that Quebec is a distinct society, is not intended in any way to infringe upon or derogate from those aboriginal or treaty rights. This position includes the inherent right of self–government.

[Translation]

Quebec has long claimed a veto over amendments to the Canadian Constitution to ensure that it is a full participant in the evolution of the Constitution and to have protection against amendments that could diminish the powers, rights and privileges of the National Assembly and the Government of Quebec.

The Government of Canada recognizes the legitimacy of those demands. Indeed, we are where we are today because, in 1981, the PQ government of the time abandoned its traditional demand of a veto in favour of the current amending formula. As far as we are concerned, our party has always, always supported a veto for Quebec.

Furthermore, the Government of Canada also recognizes that a constitutional amendment is a serious measure. It should be based on a broad consensus. No region of Canada should be excluded.

• (1530)

[English]

That is why the bill requires that the Government of Canada first obtain the consent of Quebec, Ontario and two provinces from both the western and Atlantic regions representing 50 per cent of the population of each of those two regions before proposing a constitutional amendment to Parliament.

Some people will say that this proposal does not respect the principle of equality of the provinces. I will answer that equality of the provinces means that all provinces have the same rights to make laws, to make decisions and to set policies to serve the interests of their citizens.

Our proposal does not change that reality. As the Minister of Justice indicated during question period, to change the Constitution today with the amending formula that exists it requires four small provinces to block an amendment but only two big provinces to achieve the same goal. It is a sign that the weight of the population is already incorporated in the Constitution that serves the country today.

Others will say, and we have already heard them, that the bill does not do justice to British Columbia. At this point I directly address the people of British Columbia. With the constitutional veto ascribed to western Canada in the bill, British Columbia will have a larger say on the Constitution than it has ever had in Canadian history. With almost half the population of the west, British Columbia will wield unprecedented weight. Some people are trying to characterize this tremendous progress as a setback. We should not believe them. It is the opposite. It is the start of a new era of British Columbia's strength in Canada.

In extending its veto to Quebec, Ontario, the Atlantic and western regions, our government is directly inspired by the major principles of our democracy. It is a solid, tangible measure that reconfirms the government's willingness to use practical, essential means to protect all regions of Canada with regard to future constitutional changes.

[Translation]

At a time when all modern societies must deal with an ever–changing world and environment, a world in which borders are disappearing, Canada must adapt. Accordingly, the third initiative put forward by our government at the beginning of the week is a response to the desire expressed by all Canadians for their governments to become closer to citizens.

[English]

The reform that the Minister of Human Resources Development will table in the House on Friday is an example of the pragmatic approach we want to take to clarify the roles and responsibilities of the Government of Canada.

Let us be clear. We will not abandon our constitutional responsibilities to help unemployed Canadians re–enter the labour market, a constitutional obligation we have had since 1941. We will continue to act to get Canadians back to work in partnership with all those who share that objective.

It is important to recognize and respect the responsibility of the provinces in the areas of education and labour market training.

[Translation]

We appreciate that workers need training to keep their job or find a better one, and we are prepared to help them. But we will do so only with the consent of the provinces, respecting the priorities of each. We are putting forward a proposal for partnership, and our main partners in this area are the provinces. In Canada, we overcome our difficulties through a spirit of compromise and mutual respect.

• (1535)

The spirit of cooperation and partnership that inspires us should motivate us to continue building this country in an atmosphere of generosity and respect. The measures we are taking today mean change without revolution, progress without break–up.

[English]

In the final days of the Quebec referendum people across Canada demonstrated an outpouring of love for their country the likes of which I have never seen in my 32 years in public life. They spoke out in one loud voice of their deep, deep attachment to Quebec and of their yearning to keep Canada together.

I said to them then that I would not let them down. Mr. Speaker, today I stand before you, before the eyes of the whole nation, and say proudly that I have not let them down and I know that they will not let Canada down.

[Translation]

I want to say to my fellow Quebecers: You have demonstrated your commitment to Canada. I am telling you that we, in the House of Commons and across Canada, will show that we warranted your faith. You were right in believing that Canada can and will change to meet your aspirations and those of all Canadians, that Quebec can stand proud and tall inside Canada.

In the coming days we will hear from those who defend only their own interests. We know the agenda of the separatists. They want to destroy Canada.

And there are others in other parts of Canada who think that the way to win popularity and power is to divide, to attack, to pit Canadians against one another.

[English]

That is not the Canadian way. It has never been. The Canadian people are stronger, more open and more understanding than that. When the chips are down they stand up for Canada. That is what I ask them to do in the days and weeks ahead.

It is easier to attack than to work together. It is easier to shout than to listen. It is easier to destroy than to build. It is easier, yes, but it is wrong for ourselves, for our children and for our country. The shouters, the attackers, the destroyers have had their say. Now Canadians want to get on with building Canada. The initiatives we have tabled today and will table in the next few days will help us to get on with that job. I know Canadians across the country from B.C. to Quebec to Newfoundland and the north will support us.

• (1540)

[Translation]

That is why I call on all members of the House to support the motion of the government, which wants the House of Commons to recognize Quebec as a distinct society within Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: Dear colleagues, before recognizing the Leader of the Opposition, I will hear the hon. member for Sherbrooke on a point of order.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning the order in which the speakers will be recognized this afternoon. You will understand that the resolution before this House today is exceptional in nature and that, under similar circumstances, the House usually shows some flexibility.

Therefore, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask for consent, this afternoon—and I think that my hon. colleague from the New Democratic Party plans to do the same—to be allowed to speak immediately after the leader of the Reform Party and, should the time normally provided be expired, to disregard the clock, so that each of us has an opportunity to speak on the resolution just tabled by the Prime Minister.

[English]

The Speaker: I will go directly to the whip of the government and will take the other two points of order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I consulted with my colleagues about this issue earlier this day. I am pleased to report that we would consent to such a proposal and that we are willing to make the same offer to the hon. member for Yukon if she were to seek it.

The Speaker: I will recognize the hon. House leader of the Reform Party on the same point of order.

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, we have considered the matter and feel that we should use the regular order of speaking with regard to the resolution. If the government wishes to give up two of its slots as time goes on that is its business. We believe we should follow the regular order of speaking and not change the order of business.

• (1545)

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, as far as the hon. member's request is concerned, I would just remind him that, not so long ago, my colleagues asked for consent in debates of great importance to Quebec, and he consistently denied consent. Let him now abide by a narrow interpretation of the Standing Orders and have a taste of his own medicine.

[English]

The Speaker: The hon. member for Sherbrooke and the hon. member for Yukon have both asked for unanimous consent. The House, as I understand it, has refused this consent. We will now proceed to the hon. leader of the opposition.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that you have ruled on this, but I would like to register within the House a point of order on the fact that at a time when we are trying to look at the future of this country it is regrettable that the Bloc and the Reform Party do not accept the proposal of the member for Sherbrooke.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we just heard the Prime Minister's speech. I think we should point out that this speech is a distinct departure from the approach the Prime Minister has taken in the past two years. During the 1993 election campaign and the subsequent two years in this House, the Prime Minister's approach was extremely hard, rigid and, I must admit, consistent, in other words, he did not mention the Constitution, did not feel it was appropriate to suggest any changes and was quite satisfied with Canada as it is.

He took a similar approach during the initial weeks of the referendum campaign, so much so that he put his feet up and relaxed until the last week of the campaign, when he woke up to the fact that the yes side was surging ahead and had become a very real threat to the no side. His reaction was very nervous, very improvised and came on very short notice.

He quickly arranged for a very large meeting in Verdun on October 24, where he said the following—this was the new Prime Minister—and I quote: "We will keep open all the other roads to change, including administrative and constitutional means. Any changes in constitutional jurisdiction will only be made with the consent of Quebecers".

Back in the House, after a very narrow win by the no side, improvisation has been the name of the game in the federal government. First, it set up two committees—we still do not know what they are doing—which were short–circuited by the debate we are having today. One of the committees, chaired by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, is supposed to come up with and propose ways to resolve the current constitutional mess and deadlock. Second, we have the announcement the Prime Minister rushed to make on Monday about a resolution that would include a symbolic recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, a so–called veto and a vague delegation of activities in the area of manpower training.

• (1550)

The question is: What is behind this complete about–face by the Prime Minister, who has consistently fought the concept of a distinct identity for Quebec?

First of all, there were the circumstances. The Prime Minister was very surprised and even distressed by the almost irresistible advance of the yes side during the latter part of the referendum campaign. And it was fear, and fear is a very healthy reaction and also, according to the gospel, the father of wisdom, that inspired the sudden statements he made on October 24 and during the last days of the referendum campaign.

This surprising about–face is neither surprising nor an about–face, since the proposal is meaningless and a worthy successor to all the political positions taken so far by the Prime Minister since the beginning of his career with the federal government and on the federal scene. Words can be made to say what we want them to say, and the phrase "distinct society of Quebec" is no exception. Distortion is always possible.

The expression "distinct identity of Quebec" is a case in point. It may be useful to recall that its initial appearance in our constitutional vocabulary and on the political scene in Canada and Quebec actually dates back to February 1965 and the preliminary report of the Laurendeau–Dunton Commission, where the expression was used in a rather descriptive way, devoid of any political or legal content. It surfaced again, this time with a more formal meaning, in September 1970, when Mr. Bourassa, the newly elected Premier of Quebec who was attending a constitutional conference, actually used the expression in the meaning it has had more or less since that time.

However, starting in 1985, the term was to develop some very specific overtones, as in the Quebec Liberal Party platform in June 1985, before the election that would be held several months later, and this recognition of the distinct identity of Quebec was to become a precondition for any decision by Quebec to become part of the Constitution of 1982.

We must therefore examine the context. In 1982, Quebec sustained a blow, a blow with which everyone is familiar, and which was felt very strongly by everyone including the Quebec Liberal Party, which had always refused to endorse the Constitution, even condemning it in a vote in the National Assembly in November 1981. And in 1985 the Quebec Liberal Party, in an attempt to unravel the knot, to bring things out into the open, proposed that Quebec set the precondition to signing the 1982 Constitution—the Prime Minister's Constitution, the one that still has a blank at the bottom of its last page next to the name of Quebec—the precondition to any negotiation, of the unconditional recognition by the federal government and all of the provinces of Canada of the distinct character of Quebec.

Then, of course, on June 3,1987, came the signing of the Meech Lake accord. The real one, the real Meech Lake; not the one to which the Prime Minister refers all the time, which is his accord, the one he had watered down later on, and the one I shall speak about later, but the true Meech Lake accord. On June 3, 1987, all of the first ministers of Canada, provincial and federal, reached agreement for the first time in history on the signing of a constitutional accord which would have allowed Quebec to preserve its honour, to return to the constitutional family, and then to come on board with enthusiasm. The words "honour" and "enthusiasm" correspond to two separate phases. First of all, the return to the family with head held high, because our distinct character has been recognized, and second, enthusiasm in redefining the division of powers between Canada and Quebec.

I am recalling a context which I see as extremely important since it offers a very good explanation of the degree to which today's proposal, which is totally unacceptable and does not hold up, will not fly. It will not even make it into the history books, except perhaps as a footnote somewhere. It is a truly minimalist effort, nothing in comparison to previous efforts to attempt to settle the Canada and Quebec problem.

What was there in the Meech Lake accord of June 1987? Let us review this. First of all, there was entrenchment of the accord in the Constitution. Entrenching a formal agreement as part of the Constitution is by no means a trifle. This means there are consequences. This means the courts are obliged to take it into consideration, to apply it. They are bound by the clauses introduced into the Constitution.

• (1555)

You will note as well that the wording is extremely strong. So strong, in fact, that it greatly displeased the Prime Minister who has fought it ever since with all of his might. The formulation is that, henceforth—I shall describe it now. I will quote it verbatim in a few minutes—

Ms. Copps: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bouchard: I would appreciate the Deputy Prime Minister allowing me to speak. This is perhaps one of the last speeches she will have the pleasure of hearing me give in this House. Would she let me speak?

Mr. Speaker, the Meech Lake accord of June 1987—and it is important to keep this in mind—required the courts, from the Supreme Court on down, to interpret all of the Constitution, including the Charter, "in a manner consistent with the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society". There was nothing to qualify this, no definition of content which would thereafter represent a limitation, simply the strong and clear statement of the principle to be recognized.

This, therefore, constrained the courts in future to recognize and implement a principle which imbued the Constitution with a new spirit. Each and every provision of the Constitution, with the amendments and everything that dates back to 1867, was tinged with something new: the recognition of Quebec's distinct nature. It also introduced, formally, in terms of a legal instrument, a new criterion for interpreting all the provisions.

When I say all the provisions, I also mean the provisions of the Prime Minister's Constitution, the 1982 one. It, let us remember, did a lot of things. One of the things the 1982 Constitution effectively introduced into Canada and Quebec's legal and political landscape was the notion of a single country, a Canadian nation—this was a first.

This was the first time constitutional and legal texts talked about Canada as a single nation, the nation of Canada. The corollary, needless to say, was that Quebecers found their existence as a people being denied, implicitly, if not explicitly. Up to this point, there had been lots of discussion, but, under the Constitution of our forebears, the one we Quebecers agreed to, not the other one, the Prime Minister's, the prevailing spirit was that there were two founding peoples.

It was not expressed this way in so many words, but this is what our forebears had in mind when they agreed to sign the 1867 confederation agreement. Otherwise, Lower Canada would never never have agreed to sign the Constitution. This is what convinced Quebec parliamentarians of the time to enter into confederation, because they thought that French Canadians, as they were then called, could move about freely within Canada, could feel at home wherever they were and could be the equal of the other founding people everywhere.

What happened in 1982? A principle was introduced, which basically knocked the stuffing out of the concept many Quebecers had of Canada, including Quebecers who were still federalists.

The Meech Lake accord came back to this very point. It provided, in addition to the initial interpretation criterion—recognition of Quebec's distinct nature—for a second criterion, which was recognition—I will read the text, it is very short—that: "the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec, but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec, but also present in Quebec—"constituted a fundamental characteristic of Canada.

This extremely important principle is enshrined in the text of the Meech Lake accord. This means there is a duality. I am sure that many lawyers, with a little bit of imagination, could have argued before the courts that this implied the recognition of two peoples and not a single Canadian people with the existence and the identity of Quebec mixed in with the lot and therefore annihilated. That was in the Meech Lake accord.

So when they say the accord did have teeth, it is true that it was an important document. Furthermore, it recognized something very important. It was the fact that Quebec's distinct nature was not subject to the charter of rights and freedoms. This is a very significant principle and it convinced many Quebecers to accept the Meech Lake accord, despite the fact that many sovereignists opposed it. My colleague here, the member for Roberval, opposed it. I approved it. A lot of sovereignists like myself decided at the time to give federalists a chance—this has been referred to as the "beau risque"—and support Mr. Mulroney in this, which was leading to the recognition of something that had never yet been accepted.

This should be recognized as very important for it marked the beginning of the crisis that deeply divided the country and the Tory cabinet and led to my resignation and the resignation of several Tory MPs to form the Bloc Quebecois. It is important to note that the original Meech not only recognized Quebec's distinctiveness without limiting it, but also ensured that this recognition was not subordinate to the pre-eminent charter of rights and freedoms, which, as we know, is the Prime Minister's baby.

If someone should know that the first Meech Lake accord protected the principle of recognizing Quebec's distinctiveness against the application of the charter of rights, it is the Prime Minister. That is the reason why he was so vehemently opposed to it. As many people must remember, a milestone in the Prime Minister's philosophy and political journey was the very important speech he delivered on January 16, 1990, here at a university, in Ottawa, in which he sounded the death knell of Meech.

You may wonder why, since he was not even a member of Parliament at the time. He may not have been an MP, but he was a candidate—still undeclared, I think—for his party's leadership. He had not yet declared his candidacy, but everyone knows that the intention comes before the formal declaration. Everyone knew that this former MP and minister, who spoke before Ottawa university students on January 16, 1990, had every chance of becoming the next Prime Minister of Canada and that his words therefore had weight.

What he said at the time is very important, because it marked the fatal attack against the Meech Lake accord. The Prime Minister had a lot of credibility, and he still does, I think, with all Canadians, and perhaps to an even greater degree in English Canada. I am not criticizing him but at the time—at least in English Canada, where there was a great deal of muted, latent opposition to the Meech Lake accord—his voice was heard as being extremely effective in destroying any political chance of success for the Meech Lake accord.

What he did was to invoke basic rights and the need to preserve the effectiveness of the charter of rights. He said this, and I quote: "By proposing that the distinctiveness of Quebec society be affirmed in a constitutional interpretation clause", an effective interpretation criterion, as I said, "they are in fact splitting the country in two, with Quebec on one side and the other nine provinces on the other". In his speech, the Prime Minister was desperately trying to demonstrate that recognition of Quebec's distinctiveness should not be an interpretation principle, because it is too broad, because it would undermine the effectiveness of court rulings under the charter of rights, and that the substance of the Meech Lake agreement should therefore be drastically altered.

What the Prime Minister said in January 1990 throws an almost blinding light on his subsequent behaviour and successive positions, which are all in line with his efforts to water down recognition of Quebec's distinctiveness.

Why did the Prime Minister, who is an honest man, a responsible public figure who wants what is best for Canada—and no doubt for Quebec as well—throw such a monkey wrench in works that were bringing hope, at the time, for a moment of grace, harmony and agreement? Why did he do that? I respectfully submit—I could be mistaken, but this is a possible explanation—that he did it first because, in his opinion, and I respect his opinion, Canada is a nation. In his view, there is only one people in Canada, the Canadian people, comprised of a number of components, including one called Quebec.

• (1605)

The bottom line for him, and this is another principle of his, Quebec is like any other province. Quebec is one of the good little chicks around the federal hen.

Some hon. members: Ha, ha.

Mr. Bouchard: But he is a logical man, Mr. Speaker. I would never challenge his logic, since his logic leads him to conclude, and this is a characteristic of his position, if he does not recognize the distinctiveness of Quebec in its true sense, it is because he came to the logical conclusion that there is only one, real national government, namely Ottawa, to represent Canadian values, make major decisions, decide the basic trust of anything and everything happening in Canada and that the provinces are just that, provinces. They exist under the Constitution. There is not much that can be done about that. There they are.

Since they are part of the Constitution, the provinces have to be tolerated, but nothing keeps this government from cutting funding and putting the squeeze on them. The federal government is in trouble? It is experiencing financial difficulties? They just cut funding to the provinces, while keeping the tax money and points and without cutting taxes.

The provinces are actually viewed as some kind of arrangement, and they are respected as such, entities, administrative entities, perhaps huge municipalities in the eyes of the Prime Minister and other like–minded individuals, including his mentor, Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who tried relentlessly to impose as a reality a fiction of Canada.

These people are living with a fantasy of what Canada should be. Their vision of Canada is quite simple. Imagine a circle, the federal system; all around this circle, you have little squares, dots or what not called provinces and, in the middle, you have the basic national state. Very often, their speeches and attitudes have reflected some sort of weariness about the presence of the provinces, whether Quebec or the other provinces, provinces that have identities and aspirations. I know for a fact that the Reform Party has legitimate concerns about this.

So, you can understand now why this reasonable and responsible man did what he did in 1982. I do not think it is justifiable but, in 1982, this man, who had this vision of Canada, went as far as to impose it on Quebec.

Never in the history of this country—and I know a thing or two about history from my studies, and many—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bouchard: Indeed, I studied history and I am being modest in saying that I know a thing or two on the subject. And I am not alone in Quebec to have studied history. Bear in mind that Quebec's motto is "Je me souviens", which means I remember. If Quebec's identity has survived this long, it is because of its long memory.

Like many other Quebecers, as a student, I was not a sovereignist, but this did not prevent me from being critical of the confederation. And my criticism is on record. I might have put in writing as the editor of the student newspaper and all, but it never occurred to me that, someday, a democratic Canada, English Canada, a nation that is open, tolerant and respectful of individual rights, could actually rely on its weight to crush Quebec's wish, tear up the Constitution agreed upon by our forefathers in 1867 and replace it with another constitution that was not recognized by Quebec but imposed on Quebec, a constitution repudiated by every democratic entity and political party in Quebec, including federalist parties.

I would never have thought that this kind of thing could happen in my country. I would like to tell the Prime Minister, who feels that I refer to 1982 too often, that I can understand why that makes him uncomfortable. I can understand that, but I want to remind him of that sunny day when, along with Her Majesty the Queen of England, as Queen in right of Canada, and Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Ouellet, he signed, on the lawn of Parliament, the patriation of the 1982 Constitution. That day, which was a great day for the rest of Canada, is the day that Quebecers' desire to achieve sovereignty was exacerbated.

• (1610)

We can now see that, for someone coming back to lead the country, the original version of the Meech lake accord, that is the one signed by the then Prime Minister and by all the premiers of Canada, was a threat. He perceived that agreement as a terrible threat, as something which could undermine what he had accomplished, even by encroaching on the collective rights of Quebecers.

So, what did he do? He did a controlled skid. He realized that he should not oppose the recognition of Quebec's very distinct nature, that he could not deny that—indeed, it would have been somewhat preposterous to say that Quebec is not distinct, given all that distinguishes us, and at such a deep level too. So, he kept the expression, but did everything possible to make it meaningless.

It is at that level that his political work paid off. Make no mistake about it: he is a capable and formidable politician. I am among those who have the deepest respect for his political know–how, as demonstrated by his succeeding in diluting the concept of Quebec's distinct nature. What did he do after his January speech? He made sure that it would become obvious to Mr. Mulroney, who was then Prime Minister, that—

Ms. Copps: Your friend.

Mr. Bouchard: Pardon me?

Ms. Copps: Your pal, your buddy.

Mr. Duceppe: They have no class.

Mr. Bouchard: Mr. Speaker, they say that Mr. Mulroney was my friend, as though that was a bad thing. Yes, we were friends for 30 years.

Ms. Copps: What did you deliver?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bouchard: What do you have to say against Mr. Mulroney? What does she have to say against Mr. Mulroney? Let us hear it. What does she have to say?

One hon. member: Stand up.

Mr. Bouchard: This is not the place to discuss personal issues. The Deputy Prime Minister should not express any animosity she may have towards a person during this debate.

Here are the facts: at the time, that man, Brian Mulroney, was Prime Minister. He had succeeded in having the Meech Lake accord signed on June 3. No one had ever managed to do something like that in Canada. Never. Obviously, the Prime Minister is not on his way to achieve that either.

If I am not mistaken, the opposition organized by the current Prime Minister, then a possible candidate, and later an official one, for the leadership of the Liberal Party of Canada, convinced Mr. Mulroney and his entourage, of which I was no longer a member, that he had to negotiate with him. So, without many people knowing about it, I certainly was not awareof it, people decided to move closer to the views held by the future Prime Minister, so that he, since he controlled the leaders of the provincial Liberal parties, who were blocking the Meech Lake accord, could remove the obstacles and ensure that the accord would be signed, albeit with a revised content.

That agreement was reached by the so–called Charest commission. They agreed on diluting the content of Meech. The Quebec caucus of the Conservative party, which was under my responsibility, had pledged that the substantive provisions of Meech would never be changed. I believe it was in the last days of May that we learned there would be a Charest report, which had the support of the Conservative and Liberal parties and which diluted the recognition of Quebec's distinct nature to such an extent that the charter of rights would apply to it, thus having the effect of making it sterile.

That is when I resigned. I resigned, as did others, as a matter of principle. I had not come to Ottawa to support the views of the current Prime Minister. I had come here to fight them.

So that led in June 1990 to Meech II, son of Meech, watered down Meech, wishy–washy Meech, the Prime Minister's Meech which was even then rejected by English Canadians for still going too far. In Newfoundland, Manitoba and among English Canadians in general, two out of three surveys showed that it was still giving too much to Quebec, whereas it had become unacceptable for Quebec, even for those who had supported it until then.

• (1615)

Then came Charlottetown, where it was diluted still further. This is where they started to define recognition of the distinctive nature of Quebec; by defining it, of course, they restricted it. They started to put it on the same footing as equality between the provinces; distinct, equality for all. Everybody was distinct. Something for everyone, everyone on the same footing. It no longer had any meaning. The people rejected it. Not me, not the wicked separatists, but all of the people of Quebec, all of the people in English Canada.

So, bye bye Charlottetown.

What is this week's incarnation? What are they proposing to us now? I have to admit that I have a compliment for the Prime Minister: this last attempt to water down distinct character is the best yet. This time we do not need a lawyer's opinion appended to the resolution to know that it means nothing.

Remember, in the somewhat comic episodes involving Meech II, there was still some doubt, still some people who were wondering "maybe it does still mean something". Some lawyers signed a legal opinion that it meant nothing, which was appended to the Meech Lake accord.

This time, there is no need to pay any lawyers. There is nothing that needs to be appended; all one needs to do is read it to realize it means nothing. They took no chances this time.

Why? First of all because it leaves untouched the concept of a single Canadian people according to the 1982 Constitution. In other words, the Prime Minister saved his Constitution, the one that is not Quebec's, the one we did not sign but he signed on the steps in front of Parliament. His Constitution is intact.

There is only one Canadian nation; Quebec is part of all that and should live with it and blend in. The identity of the Quebec people? Sorry, some other time.

Furthermore, what we have here is just a simple resolution. Just that. So what does this mean in legal terms, a resolution by Parliament, by the House of Commons? It is a wish formally expressed by a group of parliamentarians but without any legal effect. The courts are not bound by this resolution. A lawyer could not even put it before a court, which would refuse to acknowledge its existence because legally, a resolution does not exist. It is nothing.

An hon. member: Wishful thinking.

Mr. Bouchard: Just wishful thinking. And even the House is not bound by this resolution. If the House passed the resolution, with the Bloc voting against it, of course, if the House, on the strength of its majority, were to impose adoption of the resolution, the very next morning the resolution would not be binding. The House could do anything at all. Imagine if the government were to change. What would our Reform Party friends do with the resolution and the so–called veto? We will talk about that one tomorrow.

It is just a mirage. This resolution is a mirage. Not smoke and mirrors, that would be too strong a term, because it implies there is more than meets the eye, and in this case, when you read the resolution, it is all there. So this is not a case of smoke and mirrors but a mirage.

It demonstrates a complete failure to appreciate what Quebecers want. I think that, when people have been in Ottawa for a few years, and it might happen to me because I have been here for some time—they tend to become a little isolated from what is happening in Quebec. It is almost inevitable. Being on the Hill is like living under a glass dome, and because we always breath the same oxygen, see the same faces, listen to the same voices, read the same newspapers and talk to the same reporters who are listening to us, we finally lose touch to some extent—not altogether, of course not—with what is going on out there.

Remember what it was like in the House the night the Charlottetown resolution was adopted. I remember. It was a very solemn occasion, of course. The whole House rose to adopt Charlottetown, all parties, all members. There were only six or seven members— The member for Beaver River was with us, members of the Bloc, in the corner, along the curtain, and we voted against the resolution. We almost felt embarrassed to do so. I told myself that evening: Could it be that the Bloc, having been in Ottawa for too long, has lost touch with reality, that it has failed to understand that Canadians and Quebecers want the Charlottetown accord? Could I be wrong? Could we, the dissident minority, the outcasts along the curtain, be wrong? Could we be wrong or could all these intelligent people who fly to their ridings every day, who meet everybody, who know the issues, who are advised by people who are extremely bright, people from the Privy Council, be wrong?

They were wrong indeed. The people proved them wrong. So I was saying that there is something in Ottawa that makes people lose touch with reality, at least with Quebec's reality. How can the Prime Minister think that Quebecers will be pleased to hear him say that he recognizes the fact that they are a distinct society? How can he think that this will make us, Quebecers, happy? We certainly know that we are a distinct society and we have known it for quite some time.

What we want is the means to make our own decisions, to plan Quebec's future based on our differences. That is what we want, but we are not getting it. There is nothing to that effect in the resolution.

What I am saying basically is that the Prime Minister and his colleagues are burying their heads in the sand. By constantly refusing to face reality, they eventually sink into some kind of surrealism. This is evident from the fact that, from Meech 1 to Meech 2 and from Meech 2 to Charlottetown, Quebec was always offered less and less. Maybe they offered a little less each time because they were tired by their previous effort.

They tried Meech 1, it did not work. They offered Quebec a little less in Meech 2 and, of course, it did not work either. They offered even less in Charlottetown, which was rejected by the people in a referendum. So what are they doing now? They are trying again, offering less than in Charlottetown this time. And they think that Quebec will go for it. They even think that Quebecers are fascinated by this debate. Well, they are not. I am sure they will not be listening to us today or tomorrow. I am convinced that they have now moved on to other things that are of greater concern to them.

It has now become the debate of the Prime Minister, who is just discovering the distinct society clause, who wakes up at night thinking about Quebec's distinct nature. Too late, Mr. Prime Minister, it is over. You can sleep at night and dream of things other than Quebec's distinct nature. It is a thing from the past, from the political past.

When I said that the government's approach borders on surrealism, let the people be the judge. On the one hand, as I have just shown, the federal government's offers are less and less meaningful, ever shrinking.

At the same time, and moving in the opposite direction, Quebec's demands are growing and are more attuned to the reality of the people of Quebec. Why? We have only to look at events in recent years. In May 1980: 40 per cent of Quebecers give their support to a soft question on something that ended up simply being a mandate to negotiate, to try to negotiate sovereignty–association. Charlottetown, 1992: the Accord reached by all parties and governments, including the Government of Quebec under Mr. Bourassa, is rejected. In 1995: sovereignty on a hard question, that is, the legal and political ability to proclaim sovereignty following a yes vote, 49.4 per cent vote in favour.

While Quebec, on the move toward sovereignty, is ever increasingly achieving its status as a people and wanting to assume this status with means that are rightfully its own, the federal government offers less and is surprised when the offer is refused. Is this surprising? Not to the people in Quebec, at least.

What I am saying in fact is that the whole debate on Quebec's distinct nature has largely lost its immediate relevance.

• (1625)

Why? First, because, in Quebec, everyone knows that it is impossible for English Canada to get its act together enough to propose something acceptable to Quebec on this point. This House is an example of English Canada, for once. I was talking about the other House, which is disconnected from the people of Quebec and Canada. At least this House shows us that, in English Canada, there are a lot of differences in opinion on the Prime Minister's vision.

Therefore, Quebecers, who see all this, know what happens in English Canada and have lived through 30 years of useless efforts, know full well that nothing positive will come in response to their basic expectations about the recognition of Quebec's distinct nature. It is also out of date, because it must be understood that the phrase "Quebec's distinctiveness" was a compromise right from the start. It is a phrase that Mr. Bourassa used out of political courtesy, out of political correctness, I would say, to avoid using the actual phrase "the people of Quebec".

He knew that to recognize the people of Quebec would scare the federal government and English Canada and that it would never go over. So Mr. Bourassa, who has a way with words, who must have read the old reports of the Laurendeau–Dunton Commission, found this phrase, included it in his speech, and ended up making it one of the conditions for Quebec's joining the 1982 Constitution.

But English Canada saw right through it. People have great instincts. I think that people in both Quebec and English Canada have very sound political instincts. English Canada realized, perhaps more or less consciously that, behind the phrase "Quebec's distinct society" lurked the phrase "the people of Quebec", and that is why they rejected the agreement. That is why they will always refuse to recognize Quebec's distinctiveness, as they have done so far. If we ask them, and if Quebec does not act to secure this recognition, they will always refuse. They will never let a Prime Minister of Canada turn this recognition into a legal reality.

I just said that I urge the Prime Minister to be realistic. I would also like to tell him that I want to preach by example and that we in Quebec now intend to face reality. First of all, everyone in Quebec is tired of talking about the Constitution. Everyone is sick and tired of hearing these phrases that keep changing year after year and month after month: special status, asymmetrical federalism—that one was quite a find; we never found out what it meant but it will probably be explained to us some day—, equitable federalism, cultural sovereignty, distinct society, and also "equality or independence" and then "masters in our own home", all this to go around in circles.

The people of Quebec know that we have tried everything, that we have gone through the dictionary, and that all these efforts have led nowhere. It is time for a reality check; the people have had enough of these debates. Second, we in Quebec have more pressing priorities like government finances. In Quebec, the integrity of our public finances—which, incidentally, are in better shape that the federal government's, but that is none of my concern since I am not responsible for managing federal affairs, while the Parti Quebecois may entrust me with the public finances of Quebec—is a basic requirement, not only as a matter of correctness or sound management practice.

No, in Quebec—and it is the same in Ottawa, I am sure—putting our fiscal house in order is a matter of restoring our ability to choose. Unless the government's financial base is restored, no one will have any choice any more. There is no point in holding debates on the environment, the Constitution, the future of political systems, export policy, social assistance or any other issue, if steps are not taken to ensure that the government will be able to make choices.

Any government that is in a financial squeeze has no room to breathe and can no longer carry out its basic function. That is why we in Quebec, if the Parti Quebecois puts its trust in me, will address this problem. I will not waste any time reading constitutional proposals made by the Prime Minister if they look anything like this. There are other priorities, but these will be dealt with in greater detail in Quebec City. We may participate in discussions. After all, we are still part of the federal system. I can see where the Prime Minister is coming from. I heard his plea the other day, when he said he was prepared to discuss in the interest of the people of Quebec and Canada. But in the meantime, anything that may be in the interest of Quebec will not fall on deaf ears if the Parti Quebecois puts its trust in me.

What Quebec wants, when all is said and done, with respect to the Constitution—a discussion that may continue tomorrow again, for the Prime Minister has yet another proposal to make to us tomorrow; the Prime Minister is suddenly becoming very active, hyperactive even, in connection with the Constitution—let us be clear right from the start, what Quebec wants, what we need, with respect to the Constitution, we know we cannot expect from either the federal government or English Canada. We know that we are the only ones who can give it to ourselves, take it for ourselves, and to the extent that our future as a people, the remedy for our present problems, the flowering of our economic, social and cultural identity, is linked to our status as a people. We now know, from the message we are receiving from English Canada, particularly after today's inadequate resolution, that it is up to us to give ourselves the status of a people.

We have nothing to ask for, nothing to beg for from the federal government and English Canada. We do not mean this arrogantly; we are merely speaking as adults. We have attained a sort of political maturity which comes from all of the conclusions we have drawn from all of those years of empty discussions, of going around in circles. English Canadians are also familiar with this; they are just as tired and disillusioned as we are. So Quebec knows that its rendezvous with the future is a rendezvous with itself, that it will involve a referendum, that it will address Quebec's sovereignty so that Quebec may come into its own as a people.

I would like to say to the Prime Minister that it might happen, perhaps not here in this House but one day—whether I take over the responsibilities I shall be seeking shortly or someone else does—that whoever becomes the Premier of Quebec might face him across the table. I hope that this will come to pass. My personal wish, in the interests of Quebec and of Canada, although I am aware that it is harder to convince Canada of this than Quebec, is that one day a premier of Quebec will find himself across the table from his federal counterpart, precisely for the purpose of discussing political systems.

But I would not want this Premier to stand alone like his predecessors, those who failed, who paid a high personal price and sometimes made Quebec pay a high price as well and caused strong tensions in relations between Quebec and the rest of Canada. Not that we did not send good negotiators. Not that the people who came here to negotiate on behalf of Quebec, as Premiers, were not competent. I would say we sent our best people. No one could be better than René Lévesque to negotiate for Quebec.

But from now on, the situation will be different, because the Premiers who will come to talk about the Constitution and political arrangements will come with a mandate from the people of Quebec. They will not be out to retaliate, to be aggressive, to be negative. No. They will come with respect but confident, with the confidence of a prime minister, a head of state, who has received a mandate for sovereignty from the people. In other words, we will negotiate as equals, and then we will be able to agree, and only then. As long as Quebec comes here as a province like the others, we will never be able to agree, because those who came here and failed when they represented Quebec were not always separatists, as the Prime Minister said. Very often, and I would say in most cases, they were federalists. But success escaped them as well.

Why? Because Quebec federalists are Quebec nationalists, first and foremost. They realize that Quebecers cannot develop their potential unless they do so as a group, and as such they must have the resources and the capability to define their own policies.

I am not saying we will no longer speak to each other. We will have to, all the time. We are neighbours and partners through our history and all kinds of connections. We are practically doomed to talk to each other. That being the case, and I offer this advice in all modesty to the Prime Minister, he will have to be careful not to waste the capital of good will that is left. If we keep tossing resolutions back and forth and discussing the kind of futilities we have before us today, it will create more false hopes and perhaps fuel feelings of resentment. Let us be careful.

Let us call some kind of truce where we can address our primary concerns. I just mentioned what we have to do in Quebec. I do not know when we will be able to come back to this discussion. It may be sooner than the Prime Minister thinks. Who knows? This time we will not let him know one year in advance. Let us create the climate that will have to prevail when we have this real meeting, this real discussion, where we will have to and, for the first time, be able to look realistically and lucidly, but with a chance at succeeding, at defining a new partnership between Canada and Quebec.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Every day, the Prime Minister has to face our questions, including questions on this motion. Could we have a question period for each member who addresses the House? I ask for the unanimous consent of the House and for the consent of the Bloc Quebecois to ask questions following this important speech by the leader of that party, maybe the longest speech of the century. I hope that the Bloc Quebecois will have the courage to accept our questions.

The Speaker: It is not a matter of courage. We have rules in this House. The member has asked for unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

[English]

We will continue with the debate. I say this only so that we all understand. The hon. leader of the Reform Party because of the rules will have 20 minutes and then there will be questions and answers.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today I address the motion of the Prime Minister calling on the House to recognize Quebec as a distinct society within Canada.

Let me begin by reminding the House why we are even considering such a motion at this time. As hon. members know, last month the Prime Minister came very close to losing the Quebec referendum on secession. It is now generally agreed that there are two principal reasons for this.

First, there was no sustained effort made by the federalist forces to make clear in advance of the referendum the terms and conditions Canada would demand in the event of a secession attempt. Thus the separatists were allowed to perpetuate the fiction that a separate Quebec would simply enter into a new and better economic union with Canada. Over 30 per cent of the people who voted yes on October 30 thought they could do so and still retain all the benefits of being Canadian.

The second was the demand for change in Quebec. The demand for real systemic change was grossly underestimated by the Prime Minister and the no side. Rather than countering the separatist dream with a federalist vision of a new and better Canada, the federalists offered the status quo plus administrative tinkering.

It was only in the last week of the campaign that the Prime Minister felt compelled by events to offer something to Quebec which could be construed as change. What he offered was not a new vision of the federalism of the 21st century, nor a realignment of federal and provincial powers, which has been demanded by large numbers of people inside and outside of Quebec.

What the Prime Minister offered were Mulroney leftovers, two items resurrected from the discredited Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords. These were the concept of a constitutional veto for the government of Quebec and a distinct society clause, the subject of the motion before us.

I remind the House that Reform favours a fundamentally different approach to confronting the separatist threat and preserving the federal union. Our approach is two–tracked. On the one hand, we offer a package of 20 changes in the federal system which can be accomplished without constitutional negotiation, changes which strengthen the power of the federal government to preserve the economic union, which strengthen the position of the provinces with respect to the natural resources, social services, culture and language, and which reform federal institutions to make them more representative and accountable.

• (1640)

At the same time, we insist on the development of a Canadian position on terms and conditions of separation, terms and conditions which Canada would insist on if any province actually attempts to secede.

I have vowed as a federal political leader that as long as I have anything to do with it, federalists will never go into another contest with Quebec separatists as ill prepared, as ill equipped and as ill led as they were the last time.

The next time, and it will be the last time, we will fight separatist dreams with a federalist vision of the future and we will fight separatist illusions with the naked truth about what separation from Canada really means.

Therefore I speak as one who fundamentally disagrees with the Prime Minister's strategy or lack of strategy on national unity and who feels that this motion and the other elements of the Prime Minister's Quebec package are backward steps.

Having said this, my colleagues and I have applied ourselves to the Prime Minister's motion to see if there is any way it could be amended to permit the statutory recognition of the historical, linguistic and cultural distinctiveness of Quebec without the negative consequences that have led to the rejection of previous attempts to accomplish the same end.

I have three proposals to make embodied in three amendments. I urge the government to consider these amendments carefully because in our judgment they are essential to giving the Prime Minister's motion even a 50:50 chance of gaining acceptance outside of Quebec.

Our first proposal pertains to safeguarding the equality of the provinces. During the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accord discussions, as many members will remember, the biggest single objection to the inclusion of any distinct society clause for Quebec was that it would confer on the Government of Quebec powers not conferred on the other provinces. In other words, the concern was and is that the distinct society clause would violate the concept of equality of the provinces.

The Prime Minister in his remarks a few minutes ago hastened to assure us this is not the intention of the federal government; it is not its intention to grant Quebec special powers or status by virtue of this motion. If the government really means that, it will have no hesitancy in supporting our first amendment to the motion, the inclusion of a clear statement that nothing in this resolution shall confer on or be interpreted as conferring on the legislature or Government of Quebec any new legislative or executive powers, proprietary rights, status or any other rights or privileges not conferred on the legislature or government of any other province.

This amendment is essential to reconcile the motion before us with the principle of equality of the provinces. This is necessary to get similar types of motions through most of the provincial legislatures.

Our second proposal pertains to safeguarding minority rights in Quebec. One of the legitimate concerns of minorities within Quebec, the English speaking minority, the aboriginal minority and other ethnic minorities, and the Prime Minister made reference to this, is that recognition of Quebec as a distinct society could be used by an overzealous separatist government to diminish their rights, in particular their educational rights and rights to freedom of speech.

The fears of such minorities were aroused on the night of the referendum when the premier of Quebec blamed ethnic voters for defeating the referendum, implying those voters were not part of Quebec's distinct society. The fears of such minorities will be heightened, not allayed, by clause 2 of the Prime Minister's motion because it says Quebec's distinct society includes its French speaking majority but says nothing about the distinct society's including Quebec's minorities.

• (1645)

A few minutes ago the Prime Minister said: "Quebecers who come from other parts of the world are full fledged Quebecers. We have not forgotten them". The reality is that he has forgotten to include them in the definition of distinct society included in clause 2 of his motion.

The Prime Minister will hasten to assure these Quebecers that it is not the intention of the federal government to allow the Quebec government to use any designation of Quebec as a distinct society to circumscribe the rights of minorities. Surely no federalist in this House and surely no Liberal would ever want this distinct society clause to be harnessed to the cause of ethnic nationalism by any Quebec government.

Again, if that is the case, and if the government is sincere in its claim, then it will welcome the second amendment to its motion, namely the inclusion of a clear statement that nothing in this resolution shall diminish or be interpreted as diminishing in any way the rights and freedoms of any resident of Quebec.

This amendment is essential to safeguarding minority rights in Quebec.

Mr. Chrétien (Saint–Maurice): It was in Charlottetown.

Mr. Manning: It is not in here.

A third proposal is to safeguard the integrity of Canada. There is one further change required to the Prime Minister's motion to ensure that it does not reinforce and assist the separatists in the next referendum on separation. The Prime Minister is well aware that for 20 years or more the separatists have been telling Quebecers that because Quebec is a distinct society, therefore it should be a sovereign state. We heard that again today. By affirming the first part of that sentence, which is what the Prime Minister's motion does, the federal government runs the risk of legitimizing the second part of the sentence.

Again, I assume the goodwill and good intentions on the part of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will hasten to assure us that it is not the intention of the federal government to allow the separatist Government of Quebec to use the distinct society clause to legitimize the division of Canada. If the government is sincere in that claim, then it will welcome and endorse our third amendment to the motion, namely the inclusion of a clear statement that nothing in this resolution shall deny or be interpreted as denying that Canada constitutes one nation.

[Translation]

In conclusion, I urge the Prime Minister to not follow in the footsteps of the former Conservative Prime Minister, who ensured Quebecers that these proposals were acceptable to the rest of Canada, when in fact they were not.

I ask the Prime Minister to tell Quebecers that his motion will not get the support of a majority of Canadians outside Quebec, nor will it get the support of the provinces. Only by amending it will that motion stand a better chance of being approved.

[English]

If the government will amend the motion as proposed, Reformers will support the amended motion, notwithstanding our belief that it will contribute little or nothing to the unification of the federation. However, if the government votes down these amendments, if it puts its commitment to distinct society ahead of the equality of the provinces, if it puts its commitment to distinct society ahead of minority rights in Quebec, if it puts its commitment to distinct society ahead of the unity and the integrity of Canada as one nation, then we will vote against the motion and we will encourage every citizen loyal to Canada to oppose the motion as well.

I therefore move:

That the motion be amended by adding immediately after the word "accordingly", the following:

"5. Nothing in this resolution shall:

(i) confer or be interpreted as conferring upon the legislature or government of Quebec, any new legislative or executive powers, proprietary rights, status, or any other rights or privileges not conferred on the legislature or government of any province;

(ii) diminish or be interpreted as diminishing in any way the rights and freedoms of any resident of Quebec;

(iii) deny or be interpreted as denying that Canada constitutes one nation".

• (1650)

The Speaker: Colleagues, of course we are going to entertain questions and comments for 10 minutes. I will take these amendments under advisement and I will return to the House no later than tomorrow's sitting, after I have had a look at them.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was intrigued by the hon. member's sudden concern for the minorities in Quebec. When we look at the platform of the Reform Party, one of its principal proposals is to repeal the Official Languages Act. As a matter of fact, it is not only to repeal the Official Languages Act but to replace it with a policy whereby Quebec would be for the most part French speaking and the rest of the provinces would be English speaking.

I can recall debating in the official languages committee time after time with the Reform representative on that committee, what I consider to be a very hostile proposal to the minorities in Quebec. It is a geographical type of bilingualism where Reform would recognize, maybe in the city of Montreal, bilingual rights, or in some other small part of Quebec, but for the rest of Quebec it would be entirely French speaking. By the way, it would sell out the French speaking minorities in the other provinces as well.

I am intrigued but not totally surprised by the approach of the leader of the Reform Party today. He seems to jump on any opportunity for political gain.

Does this mean that he is withdrawing his platform proposals to repeal the Official Languages Act and his proposals for geographic linguistic rights to now adopt a policy for all of Canada whereby we will recognize bilingualism?

The Official Languages Act has a balance within it whereby we recognize the rights of anglophones in Quebec and we recognize the rights of francophones outside Quebec, including Ontario, the west and the Atlantic provinces. Is that what he is now proposing or is he simply proposing this provision today for Quebec minorities but tomorrow for something else?

I remind him that this is not an amendment to the Constitution or to the legislation; it is put forward as a formal resolution of this House and a commitment to the Quebec people, but it is not a constitutional amendment or legislation. Consequently, his proposed amendments to the Official Languages Act would be more harmful to the minorities in Quebec than what he is proposing as an amendment to this resolution.

Mr. Manning: Mr. Speaker, somewhere in the hon. member's remarks there were about three questions.

First, we recognize that this motion is not a constitutional motion. We also recognize that senior members of the government have implied that if this is passed by the House it may be imported into the Constitution at a later date. That is why we gave it the scrutiny which we did.

Second, with respect to minority rights, in the area of language the Reform Party advocates more jurisdiction over language being given to the provinces and private associations. That will be more popular in Quebec than the current policy of the current government. The second thing we say however is that the sole role of the federal government should be the protection of the rights of minorities from discrimination on the basis of race, language and culture.

• (1655)

Our argument is that under our language policy the federal government is no longer both a player and a referee in the language area. It is just a referee and it can provide more protection by playing that role.

Third, if the hon. member is sincere, which I think he is, in wanting protection for the rights of minorities in Quebec, that would surely lead him to urge his colleagues to support at least the second of these amendments we have put forward.

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to hear the hon. member say he supports minority rights. However, people should be judged not by what they say but by what they do.

The member's party has held a position which has now been proven to be against the charter of rights, which is not to allow turbanned Sikhs in the RCMP. His party stood against that group to say they should not be allowed in the RCMP. Recently in the courts it was ruled that to keep them out would be against the charter of rights.

I would like to ask the leader of the third party whether he would support that ruling in the courts and whether he supports turbanned Sikhs in the RCMP.

Mr. Manning: Mr. Speaker, the question has nothing to do with this debate here today. Our point is the Reform Party is committed to the defence of human rights and the use of the power of the federal government to do that.

We argue that when the government gets to be both a player and a referee in a policy area, whether it is multiculturalism or linguistic policy, what suffers is its capacity to be the referee. Again I would say to the member if he wants to not just talk but to act, if he is really concerned about minority rights, he will support the second of these amendments we have put forward.

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday and today the third party and the leader of the third party talked about our proposal on the regions of Canada. We proposed four. He has said there should be five.

Is the fifth region B.C. or Alberta?

Mr. Manning: Mr. Speaker, it is B.C.

The other point the member misses which will come up when we discuss the bill, is that the bigger issue is giving this constitutional veto to the people or the government. We know that all the members here were embarrassed by the flip–flopping of the Prime Minister on that subject. One day he told this House that he meant to give that veto to the people of Quebec. Then he said yesterday that no, he was going to give it to the Government of Quebec. He was going to give a separatist government a constitutional veto over the Constitution of Canada.

If the hon. member wants to ask questions about that bill, he should direct them to the Prime Minister.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, you may rest assured I am not rising to sing. As a French Canadian, however, I am delighted to speak at this historic moment on the motion of the Prime Minister recognizing that the people of "la belle province" form a distinct society within our country and ensuring that our legislation and our actions will be guided by this reality.

• (1700)

A few weeks ago, Canadians from sea to sea showed their support for Quebec with a demonstration in Montreal and a number of other activities.

Our Prime Minister on our behalf and on his own, as a proud Quebecer and an honest Canadian, is confirming his commitment to recognize Quebec's distinct society. I applaud him on my own behalf and on behalf of the people of Madawaska—Victoria and especially on behalf of all the people of Canada who believe in the strength, determination and positive vision of his leadership for the future of our country and of our children, wherever they may be in this great and wonderful country.

During the referendum period, I canvassed people's homes. I also listened to the fine emotional speeches devoid of truth given by the separatist wizards in Quebec. How can anyone be trying, in a democratic and modern society, to lull Quebecers to sleep as in the time of Duplessis?

The PQ even spent millions on hidden studies to see if they could not come up with an extra dose of sleeping tablets so Quebecers would swallow all their speeches.

From his emperor's throne, the leader of the Bloc even dared tamper with the freedom of the women of Quebec—ah, white only and preferably old stock—telling them they should be pregnant and in the kitchen. I can assure you that if such a statement had been aimed at women in New Brunswick or Canada, the Canadian society as a whole, not just women, would have been up in arms and would have the leader, regardless of his political allegiance.

A while ago, I listened to the leader of the opposition, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois. I must say that, if I were in a position to give him an award, a trophy for his separatist theatrics, I would do it right now in recognition of the drama he added to the debate this afternoon.

I noted, among other things, that this great actor talked about the prime minister doing an about face concerning Quebec as a distinct society. This great actor who likes to talk about other politicians doing about faces should look at his own track record regarding his political allegiance over the past 20 years. When it was opportune to be a federalist, he espoused the federalist discourse, but when a separatist discourse became more opportune, he went that way.

The past 20 years in the life of this great actor will result in his being remembered in history books in Quebec as the number one actor in terms of the Quebec people and its future.

• (1705)

I can understand the total confusion of the Bloc Quebecois leader who, today in this House, must decide whether or not he will support the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, at a time when he is making grand political speeches as he prepares to embark on another great adventure, heading for political life in Quebec. I can see his confusion.

Honestly, does he really believe in the distinct society for Quebecers? Does he believe in it or will he try once again, for personal political gain, to trick the Quebec people into following him?

I would also like to remind the leader of the Bloc that, when they talk about respect, when they ask for respect for the Quebec people, naturally they must also respect all of the Canadian population, people like me, a French Canadian living in New Brunswick, not in English speaking Canada like the grand master of this terminology, former Prime Minister Mulroney, taught them repeatedly. He also spoke of tearing up the Constitution. I must admit he is a good pupil of the former Prime Minister of Canada.

Today's leadership will no doubt be followed by that of provincial premiers, who will certainly look after their own interests first. I would like to remind them that there must be some kind of basis for these interests, a foundation if you will. Since the foundation of our country in 1867, Quebec has been recognized, not in so many words but by institutions; just read the 1867 Constitution. Each pillar of the foundation supports our country, Canada, and is part of it.

My Quebec roots go back to 1642, when my ancestors settled in the Boucherville region and I am proud to be a French Canadian like the more than a million others all over Canada who feel close to the seven million Quebecers and share their pride.

I am one of those who want to build and not destroy, one of those who welcome the global challenges of the year 2000. We should join together, not go our separate ways like some egocentric politicians are preaching.

I did not sing, even though my heart and my head agree with this motion.

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but your time is up.

Do I have the unanimous consent of the House to give the member a few minutes more?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: Very well. You have two more minutes.

Mrs. Ringuette–Maltais: Mr. Speaker, I thank you and I thank my colleagues for this expression of great democracy in the House.

I thank our Prime Minister who fulfilled his commitments and those of Canadians from all across the country. Contrary to what these horror story tellers and these wizards have said, we did in fact act with respect and honour before, during and after the October 30 referendum, whether or not it suits these separatists who would like to swindle Quebecers out of a promising future within Canada.

• (1710)

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the comments made by the hon. member from New Brunswick, and I must say that it is true, that we on this side are very proud. We are very proud of our leader, because our leader has the courage to tell the truth in this House. All Bloc members are proud of their leader because, during the election campaign, he said things that were true, put historic events in their context, and made us proud of being members of the Bloc Quebecois.

The hon. member told us that she wanted to build and not to destroy. The goal of the Bloc Quebecois, of all Quebec sovereignists, is also to build, but to build Quebec, our homeland, our country, so that it can fulfil our aspirations. At the same time, we want to work with the rest of Canada.

We have proposed a formula for partnership with the rest of Canada. It was extraordinary. The Fathers of the Canadian Confederation, who represented Lower Canada, would tell us that we are right, over 120 years later, to propose changes in North America north of the U.S., because the current system no longer works.

The Prime Minister's proposal is a case in point. He cannot even approach his provincial counterparts to try to get something enshrined in the Constitution. All they are offering us is a motion of the House that is practically meaningless, that is not worth the paper it is printed on.

It is important, I think, to weigh our words in this House, to show Quebec a little respect. Quebec was one of the four provinces that founded this country, but the time has come to move on. The rest of Canada should understand this.

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I did not find a question in what the hon. member opposite said but, in his remarks, he complained about the Prime Minister's unwillingness to entrench the principles of distinct society in the Constitution, when the Leader of the Opposition himself is on record as saying that he did not want to deal with constitutional changes any more.

A minimum of consistency is indicated, do you not think? Public statements cannot be made to mean different things from day to day, depending on the circumstances. Our colleague from the Bloc Quebecois also indicated that he was in favour of a partnership with Canada. The Canadian federation is indeed a partnership between the ten provinces and the two territories. There is no bigger and better example of partnership than what we have right now.

Take the European Community for example. These countries are in the process of establishing a federation like ours because they have seen how successful this kind of partnership is. So, when I hear—

An hon. member: Come on now.

Mrs. Ringuette–Maltais: I guess some members of this House cannot take the truth when they hear it. When I hear members say that the system does not work—I would like the hon. member to comment on this—and talk about areas of responsibility and jurisdiction—

• (1715)

Personally, as a New Brunswicker, I find that totally unacceptable. I cannot understand that the people of Quebec would go along with that. Dropping out of school is a serious problem in Quebec in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. This is totally unacceptable.

At a time when the whole world is moving toward a major achievement in ensuring education for people of all ages, wherever they live, Quebec is stalling. And this is an exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

As for what the hon. member opposite said, I think he should take a good look at his government's policies.

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with great conviction that I support the Prime Minister's motion to officially recognize that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada, because of its language, culture, tradition and French speaking majority.

I am deeply attached to Canada. But I also freely chose to live in Quebec. I chose to do my best to promote Quebec's society and quality of life. I chose to raise my children in Quebec and have them benefit from what is truly the heart of Canada's history, culture, heritage and duality.

I live in Montreal, the urban gem of Canada. In spite of all the obstacles, constitutional and others, in spite of all the attempts to divide its French and English speaking communities, Montreal remains a city where the Canadian duality is felt daily, but in great harmony. It is a place where francophones and anglophones live and work in peace and real harmony.

Montreal is unique because of its cultural and linguistic duality, but also because of the contribution made by so many other communities which have given Montreal its unique character as a cosmopolitan, friendly, warm and extraordinary city.

I had the privilege, after a business career, to enter politics and begin my political life in Quebec's National Assembly. I wanted to do my best to make a contribution and help Quebec fulfil its goals.

While an MNA, I worked with two persons who are now members of this House, the hon. member for Beauharnois—Salaberry, and the hon. member for Roberval. We did not agree and we did not see things the same way, but we all worked to promote the well–being of Quebecers, because we felt that it was our common objective.

It was during my term as a member of the Quebec National Assembly that I had the opportunity to defend the Meech Lake Accord, to vote for the Meech Lake Accord, which was supposed to include for the first time in the Canadian Constitution the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, which would make Quebec a part of the Constitution of 1982.

I listened to the leader of the Opposition with a great deal of respect, with all the respect he is due, as he explained to us how and why he and the Parti québécois had not supported the Meech Lake Accord, why they had voted against the Meech Lake Accord and, after that, against the Charlottetown Accord.

• (1720)

Despite all these explanations, I am convinced that the fundamental reason is that, whatever the accord, whatever the proposal that is made to either party, the Parti québécois or the Bloc, which are fundamentally dedicated to Quebec's independence, will reject it. Whatever the proposal that is put to the sovereignists in order to make Canada work better, to rebuild Canada, to renew Canada, it is logical that these parties, the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti québécois, will reject it because, fundamentally, as the leader of the Opposition himself emphasized before the media, he is not interested in receiving proposals because, he said: "I am a sovereignist."

That is fair enough, but they should not try to delude us into believing that they considered these proposals objectively because, fundamentally, they do not believe in them, they do not want them.

I found it quite ironic that the Leader of the Opposition should give lessons to the Prime Minister telling him: "While you will take care of the Constitution, I will be doing something else, I will be putting Quebec's financial house in order". How ironical. We all know very well that the leader of the Bloc Quebecois' purpose when he created this party involved the constitutional issue of separating Quebec from Canada.

Since his election, before his election, every day in the House of Commons, the constitutional issue has been the principal subject of debate. The Parti Quebecois, the Bloc Quebecois' ally in Quebec City, naturally spoke about the constitutional issue and the separation of Quebec throughout the electoral campaign. That is what happened before and during the election of the Parti Quebecois and throughout its life in government up until the referendum. All they talked about was the Constitution, separation and independence.

Today, the Leader of the Opposition has the gall to tell us: "We will set the Constitution aside and we will deal with public affairs". Yet, it was the Parti Quebecois government that said, during the election campaign, it would choose another way of governing, of managing public affairs more efficiently. All that has happened in Quebec, all that the Bloc Quebecois has done since its election, has been to talk about the independence of Quebec. According to them, nothing is working in the federal government or in Canada, naturally.

Every day in the House, it is the same thing.

[English]

Montreal, the economic motor of Quebec and 50 per cent of its population, is severely sick. In many quarters of Montreal the economy is dying. Investment is drying up. Leases are being curtailed or cancelled. Anybody who knows and follows what is going on in Montreal today will say that it is a sick city. The economy of Montreal is in desperate straits.

Meanwhile, what have we done? We have spent time and money on commissions, studies and propaganda instead of looking after the well–being of the citizens of Quebec. Today we are told that at last this is what they are going to be doing.

[Translation]

I will vote with conviction for this motion, because I firmly believe that the place of Quebec, which is the heart and soul of Canada, is within Canada and that its destiny and that of Canada are intertwined forever. That is why, on the day the vote is taken, I will proudly stand and vote with conviction in favour of the prime minister's motion. I invite all hon. members to give it strong support.

• (1725)

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I know this is a solemn day and, if I may say, it is the day of awakening for Canada. This awakening has been triggered by the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister. I must admit that I find it rather amusing. Since our arrival here two years ago, we have been called all sorts of things. The favourite nickname given to us is separatists, but after two years this government finally gave birth to this resolution which is meaningless, in our view.

Why is this resolution meaningless? Why are the members opposite surprised by our reaction, by our position on all this? I am astonished. Actually, I think I understand. When the Prime Minister says he does not listen to Radio–Canada because he wants a good night's sleep, he has deprived himself of a good source of information. If the Prime Minister had listened to all the media without distinction in Quebec and if he had read all of the newspapers, he would already know that Quebec has already stated loud and clear what it wants.

What we see here today is no response to that. And one should not be surprised. Some of my colleagues from the Atlantic region understand pretty well what I mean because I have been telling them for two years what sovereignty is all about and what the difference between a sovereignist and a separatist is. This is the period for questions and comments, but I think I will focus on comments tonight.

I have been explaining to them for two years the difference between a sovereignist and a separatist. Mr. Speaker, you were here when the issue was raised in this House and I told the House what Quebec wants to be, because if you want to inform people you have to repeat the message people wish to convey. This is why I had explained that a sovereignist is someone who is able to assert and accept himself.

I believe they understood in part what it means to be a sovereignist or to assert oneself. My honourable colleagues have even used the expression in a bill, which says that Canada wants to affirm its sovereignty over its oceans. I have nothing against that, but we have been blamed for two years for using the same expression.

What are we to think when the members opposite try to scold us? We have been told that the regional commissions on the future of Quebec were phoney. They have once more deprived themselves of an incomparable source of information. Mr. Speaker, I can see that you are getting impatient. I will now stop speaking but first I wish to say that I will continue my colleagues' education on what Quebec really wants. May I add that they really did not choose the right way today.

Mr. Lincoln: Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. First of all, perhaps the member should talk to his leader, who said that there was no difference, describing himself as a separatist in Washington. I think that, in his mind, the words sovereignist and separatist had the same meaning. He boasted about being a separatist in Washington and was very proud of that. So I thought there was no difference, taking the Leader of the Opposition at his word.

The member talks about Quebec as if he was speaking on behalf of all Quebecers. Let me remind him that, on referendum day, a little over 49 per cent of Quebecers voted in favour of his option, but the majority voted for the other option. So it seems to me that the majority of Quebecers have stated their position. If it changes some day, then so be it. However, for the time being, what counts is that we have won a totally democratic referendum despite a totally vague question.

We won a referendum in which Quebec clearly chose to follow the lead given by the Prime Minister, which is to have recognition of the distinct society, to give a veto to Quebec and to sort out jurisdictions. That is what we will do, and that is what we are in the process of doing.

POINTS OF ORDER

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell,Lib.): A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Deputy Speaker: It being 5.30 p.m. this is now private members' time. Perhaps there is a compromise that if we allow this point of order we can add time to private members' hour so that members will not be deprived of any of their time.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, as members know, an amendment to the main motion was introduced by the Reform Party a little while ago by the hon. leader of the Reform Party.

I have had an opportunity to examine the motion and I want to briefly indicate to the Speaker that I contend the motion is irreceivable and out of order. The motion confers—

An hon. member: That is debating the motion.

Mr. Boudria: I am not debating the motion. I am challenging the receivability of the motion. I understand Mr. Speaker will be ruling on it tomorrow morning and it is customary for us when a motion comes into the House to argue whether—

The Deputy Speaker: As indicated before, this time will be added to the private members' hour. The hon. member cannot be interrupted on a point of order. When he is finished I will hear other members on the same point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the amendment in question refers to conferring on the legislature or the Government of Quebec new executive powers, propriety rights and so on. It also refers to privileges not conferred on the legislature or the government of any province; in other words, provinces including Quebec but possibly other provinces as well.

Our parliamentary precedents, Beauchesne's sixth edition, page 176, citation 579 says:

> (1) An amendment setting forth a proposition dealing with a matter which is foreign to the proposition involved in the main motion is not relevant and cannot be moved.
> (2) An amendment may not raise a new question which can only be considered in a distinct motion after proper notice.

It is on those two points that I believe the amendment is irreceivable. I have indicated that it introduces two new concepts in subsection (i) which are not referred to in the original motion.

Mr. Speaker will also be guided by the decision of 1923 when the Speaker of the House decided that the report of a parliamentary committee as a prerequisite to accepting a particular initiative was a new concept because it was not in the main motion and was therefore out of order. Similarly, subsection (i) of this amendment is out of order.

[Translation]

Second, I want to point out that, on October 16, 1970, Mr. Baldwin moved the following motion: That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "that" and adding the following: "the government should forthwith introduce legislative proposals to meet the conditions referred to in the motion".

That was a totally new element which was not in the original proposal. Consequently, it was out of order.

For these two reasons, I argue that, when you make your ruling tomorrow morning, it will be to the effect that the amendment proposed by the leader of the Reform Party is out of order.

• (1735)

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, obviously you cannot rule on this immediately. This is why the opposition whip is asking you to do so tomorrow morning and to ponder the issue this evening.

I submit that the point of order should have been raised before 5.30 p.m., during debate on the motion, and that if we agreed to hear that point of order, it was not to prolong a debate which could no longer be extended. Otherwise, we will never again get unanimous consent to hear a point of order outside the period provided for such a debate.

I submit that the point of order dealing specifically with the debate should be raised tomorrow, or the next time we discuss the resolution. I also submit that the Speaker in the Chair will not be able to make a ruling, because he must ponder the issue. You can no more do it immediately now than he could do it immediately then, otherwise it would be too easy to resort to the tactic. They want to save time and raise a point of order outside the period provided and ask for your ruling on it tomorrow morning. That is too soon.

I submit that we should follow up on the point of order. We know that there is one coming, but we should act as if we had not heard it, and entertain it in the period reserved for this debate. Otherwise, we will be getting around the rules for the sake of it and also to achieve indirectly what cannot be done directly.

[English]

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, while I have some sympathy with what the whip for the Bloc Quebecois has said, you have allowed a discussion of this because of the request made by the government whip and I would like to respond to his comments.

I assure the House that not only did we verify the contents of the motion but it was reviewed by the table prior to presentation by the hon. leader of the Reform Party.

The chief government whip alleges this is not relevant to the motion before the House. Relevance under citation 568 of Beauchesne is a criterion. I will explain very briefly why the amendment is relevant:

> (5) Nothing in this resolution shall:
> (i) Confer or be interpreted as conferring upon the legislature of the Government of Quebec, any new legislative or executive powers, proprietary rights, status, or any other rights or privileges not conferred upon the legislature or government of any province.

Point three of the motion states "the House undertake to be guided by this reality", that being the reality of Quebec's distinct society.

Point four states that the House "encourage all components of the legislative and executive branches of government to take note of this recognition and once again to be guided in their conduct accordingly".

Since we are instructing not only the House but the legislative and executive branches of the government to be guided in their conduct, it is clear they have an unlimited range of options in terms of how to implement this guidance. Subsection (i) of the amendment simply refers to a specific route they may take that shall not be considered. Therefore it is highly relevant to the motion.

Under citation 569 of Beauchesne adding words to a motion is an acceptable method of adding additional relevant material. Citation 567 instructs that these amendments can be made to increase the acceptability of a motion. Once again, since the stated intention of the leader of the Reform Party is to make this acceptable, not only to the members of the House but to a broader section of Canadians, it is perfectly in order.

I hope the government will make every effort to accommodate all Canadians in what is, after all, said to be a unity resolution. That would be a wiser use of time than trying to construe that the equality of provinces, the equality of citizens or the very integrity of the country is out of order on the floor of the House of Commons.

The Deputy Speaker: I thank all three hon. members for their interventions. I agree that it might have been better to deal with this point of order during the debate rather than in private member's hour. However, the Speaker is seized with the matter. The interventions, having heard them tonight, will be available in the blues and the Speaker will be able to consider the interventions of all three members when he makes his ruling tomorrow. That is one of the reasons the Speaker was anxious to hear the interventions tonight.

It is certainly now 5.30. The House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

CANADA WATER EXPORT PROHIBITION ACT

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops, NDP) moved that Bill C–202, an act to act to prohibit the export of water by interbasin transfers, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see so many colleagues in the House during this private members' hour. There is a lot of interest in this topic and I indicate my appreciation for that and also my appreciation to my hon. colleague for Regina—Lumsden for seconding this motion. I know he has had a longstanding interest in the subject material that is embodied in Bill C–202, as well as many other members of the House who over the last number of days have contacted me with an indication of their support, that they will endorse the principle of this bill at second reading and will vote in favour of it.

If this bill passes it would prohibit any company or any organization from diverting water from a Canadian river basin into, in this case, an American river basin for export purposes.

One might ask what prompts this bill at this time. A few days ago one of the officials responsible for the environmental aspects of the North American Free Trade Agreement made a speech in Montreal.

He said high water consumption and pollution could trigger disputes within the North American Free Trade Agreement. He urged Canadians to better manage their water resources and said that while Canada has sovereignty over its water, the resource is also a global treasure, much the same as the Amazon rainforest is a global treasure, that the world per se depends on it. Implicit in his remarks was that the North American continent depends on Canadian water.

He closed with this:

> Pressure on Canada to increase exports to the United States will mount as scarcity becomes more widespread. Canadians therefore have an interest in encouraging their American neighbours to better manage their water too.

As late as November 9, 1995 in Montreal one of the key representatives to the NAFTA warned us as Canadians that a water crisis is pending in the United States and that the United States is obviously considering Canada as a source to relieve this pressure in the future.

We also want to acknowledge that water diversion schemes per se are not new. These are concepts that have been around for some time. We are well aware of the grand canal project enthusiastically promoted by Simon Reisman, one of our key trade negotiators with the United States.

Another is the North American water and power alliance, commonly called NAWAPA; coming out of California a massive scheme to divert western Canadian rivers into the southwestern United States and northern Mexico.

There was also a project to pipe vast quantities of Great Lakes water to the high plains states in the southwest to replete their depleted aquifer, a 1984 scheme. A few years later there was a proposal to feed New York City's vast population with Lake Ontario water. A few years later came a concept involving the blasting of a 400–mile canal from Lake Superior to the Missouri River in South Dakota at a cost of $30 billion.

There was also a proposal to construct a canal from Lake Erie to the Ohio River, again to move water and shipping between the two countries. There was also a federally funded plan to drill a hole in the bottom of Lake Michigan and drain the water through bedrock layers for southern Illinois cities.

• (1745)

I have a list here. I could go on and on, but I make the point that there has been a long list over particularly the last two decades, when water diversion was an entrepreneurial interest by some very creative people, primarily to move Canadian water to the United States.

Anyone who has travelled in the southwestern U.S. and northern Mexico will acknowledge that the water sources there are presently being used to their maximum. The Colorado River often dries up before it actually reaches the ocean because all the water is used up. Also, one could wade across the Rio Grande River at El Paso probably without even getting their knees wet, which indicates that massive river system is exclusively used for domestic, agricultural, and industrial water needs.

We acknowledge that virtually all of the major aquifers in the southwest United States and northern Mexico are being depleted on a daily basis. When one travels through the area and talks to people who are responsible for water resources for the future, virtually everyone assumes that Canada will one day be their salvation, that Canada's fresh water, which people in Mexico and the United States assume is being wasted, will be diverted one way or another for use in the southwestern United States and northern Mexico.

Major industrial development, agricultural expansion, and population increases are occurring in that southern sun belt. There has been vast industrialization of Mexico, particularly in the maquiladora zone, where just in the last few months hundreds of new industries have started up, all with some need for water. The case is clear that increasingly there will be a need, much earlier than anticipated even a few years ago, to obtain vast amounts of water. I can say that our American friends to the south almost exclusively look to Canada as a source for that water to make up for their shortfall.

I think it is fair to say that over the last couple of decades the hope was that this matter would go away. All levels of government had not taken any decisive action up until very recently in the hopes that this was a problem that hopefully would never occur. I refer particularly to the governments of British Columbia and Ontario—there may be others, but I am not familiar with them tonight—which passed legislation in their provincial legislatures banning exports of water from their provinces.

We have to acknowledge that there are two levels of government involved in the management of water resources in Canada. Under the Constitution Act the provinces exercise direct control over many aspects of water management within their boundaries. Water is a natural resource and provincial governments have jurisdiction over it within their own boundaries. They are therefore able to legislate in the areas of domestic and industrial water supply, pollution control, hydroelectric power development, irrigation, recreational use of water, et cetera.

However, again because of the Constitution Act, the federal government has jurisdiction over inland and ocean fisheries, including their protection and particularly the protection of river basins. In addition, Parliament has the residual power to legislate for peace, order and good government of the country, including the regulation of trade and commerce. The federal government is responsible for conducting relations with other countries, which is extremely important with respect to water because so much of Canada's water resources are in boundary water basins.

We basically have two areas of jurisdiction: provincial jurisdiction for use within the province; and because it could become a matter of international trade and because international trade and commerce is a federal responsibility, there is a need for the federal government to become involved in this as well.

As I have said, some provinces have taken the only action at their disposal and have passed legislation prohibiting this type of interbasin sale of water. My thesis would be that may be fine and dandy, but the federal government must also act. Some people have said that there is a federal policy. Some years ago, back in 1987, Canada tabled a water policy, which was essentially a statement of what the government would like to do in the future. It has no legislative authority. There are no regulations or laws or statutes attached to it. It is simply a policy and nothing more. Part of that policy states that "the Government of Canada will take all possible measures within the limits of its constitutional authority to prohibit the export of Canadian water by interbasin diversions".

At the time I was in the House and I thought we were finally going to make some headway in this area. I was absolutely thrilled some months later on August 25, 1988 when Bill C–156 was tabled in the House. It was entitled the Canada Water Preservation Act, an act to prohibit any export or diversion of boundary waters for the purpose of export. We thought we were finally going to have legislation passed in the House that would indicate the will of Canada in this area. Unfortunately, Bill C–156 died on the Order Paper and it has never been reintroduced. Today we do not have any federal legislation that would prohibit the export of water from Canada in terms of interbasin transfers to the United States for eventual sale into Mexico. That is the purpose of Bill C–202.

Part of the motivation for this came from a number of schemes, one from my own constituency, namely on the North Thompson River. This scheme was intended to divert about 50 per cent of the water flow of the North Thompson River into the Columbia River basin, which would eventually travel through various water basins in the United States for eventual sale in the Los Angeles area. Since this scheme was proposed formally to the provincial government in British Columbia, people obviously have opposed it in light of the fact that there is an absence of federal legislation. Of course they are concerned that NAFTA opened the door for this type of enterprise, which I will discuss in a moment.

Many communities rallied quickly. Over the past few months I was able to table in the House 123,000 names of people from a variety of communities throughout British Columbia and various parts of Canada but particularly from the communities of Kamloops, Heffley Creek, Raleigh, Westsyde, Barrière, McLure, Avola, Vinsula, Clearwater, Black Pines, Chu Chua, Birch Island, Blue River, Louis Creek, Whispering Pines, and many others within my constituency, to say nothing about cities, communities, and rural areas throughout all of British Columbia, much of Alberta, and other parts of western Canada. There has been an overwhelming negative reaction to this proposal.

There have been times when people have said that NAFTA protects us from this. I want to reject that. NAFTA includes water as a good under the terms of the agreement. I would emphasize the word "good". We could also use the term "commodity". Article 102 of NAFTA sets forth the objective of the agreement "to eliminate barriers to trade and facilitate the cross–border movement of goods and services between the territories of the parties, to increase substantially investment opportunities in the territories of the parties, and to establish a framework for further trilateral, regional, multilateral co–operation to expand and enhance the benefits of this agreement".

Basically it says that the purpose of NAFTA is to eliminate barriers to trade in goods. Water is a good. Therefore, fundamentally this is one of the purposes of the North American Free Trade Agreement.

It goes on to describe this more accurately. It is important to take a moment to do that. Goods are defined in article 201 of NAFTA as products that are understood in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, or now the World Trade Organization. This means that any good covered by a GATT tariff heading is subject to all the provisions of the agreements themselves unless explicitly excluded.

A number of areas in NAFTA were excluded specifically. Raw logs, beer, and two or three other items were mentioned specifically as being exclusions from the North American Free Trade Agreement.

An hon. member: What about water?

Mr. Riis: Water was not mentioned. The evidence has shown that water was never part of the discussions. The negotiators now have admitted that. The politicians involved in the negotiations have said that water was never even mentioned in any serious way.

• (1755)

Therefore, to understand the basis for the inclusion of water in the trade agreements one must first look to the relevant section of the harmonized commodity coding system of GATT. The harmonized commodity coding system for classifying goods for customs tariff and other purposes adopted by the GATT include the following: "2201: It includes waters, including natural or artificial mineral waters and aerated waters not containing sugar or sweetening material nor flavoured, including ice and snow". It then goes on to article 2201(90) and lists all other water.

Let me provide a clarification of this harmonized commodity coding system. The GATT harmonized commodity description and coding system explanatory notes were adopted by the GATT signatories. The explanatory notes state the following: "This heading covers ordinary natural water of all kinds, other than sea water. Such water remains in this heading whether or not it is clarified or purified".

I could recite a whole number of these subsections and the technical aspects of NAFTA, but fundamentally it states that water, under the World Trade Organization and under NAFTA, is considered a commodity or a good. This obviously causes people a great deal of concern.

I think it is fair to say that at a time when NAFTA opens the door to this type of export and knowing that we have to treat, as a result of NAFTA, American and Canadian entrepreneurs on a level playing field and that we cannot discriminate against Americans in favour of Canadians, since Canadians right now are diverting water within the country, exporting water, and selling water in a variety of forms, an American entrepreneur can now use NAFTA and come forward and do the same. They could export water from the North Thompson River in British Columbia to the Los Angeles basin.

I think it is also clear in international law. I am not an international lawyer, but I have talked to many of them. They say that if it comes to a dispute in this area, provincial legislatures will not have much impact. Even national legislation will not have much impact, although this is what we are doing tonight. The provisions of the international trade agreement between three sovereign nations will be paramount if there is a dispute. Of course a dispute settling mechanism panel will take into consideration that the three signatories to the North America Free Trade Agreement have agreed, as per the schedules I have indicated, that water is a commodity, just like coal or codfish or wheat or anything else, to be bought or sold among three countries.

For that reason and to give us some influence at that international dispute settlement mechanism table when the time comes, I think we should pass this legislation to very clearly indicate where the people of Canada stand on this issue.

For Canadians water is something special. I think we all agree that water is a commodity unlike cod or timber or nickel or whatever. It is virtually like blood itself. It is the life of Canada. Water is something very special in the Canadian psyche.

I urge my colleagues to pass this legislation in order to send a very clear message that this is where Canada stands.

[Translation]

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Kamloops on this bill concerning our water resources, which are so obviously valuable for our communities and all of Canada.

We wholeheartedly share the hon. member's goal to conserve our water resources and to keep a tight control over the development of these resources. But at the same time, with all due respect, we think that the hon. member's approach is too narrow, and that the whole issue of water resources should be looked at in a much more comprehensive and integrated way.

We think the whole issue should be looked at in the broadest context possible.

• (1800)

[English]

Water is our most precious resource. We have the greatest freshwater reserves of the world. It behoves us to use them wisely. Our jobs, our economy, our quality of life, our environment, our farming and our forestry depend on water. All other resources depend on water for sustenance.

It is clear that we have to control our water exports. At the same time we have to do more than look at interbasin transfers or interbasin exports. For instance, today a large part of the water exports are being carried out through supertankers which load water from our coastal areas, lakes, streams and rivers, and carry it to other parts of the continent and beyond. We have to look at that type of export. We also have to look at the draining of water resources such as the mining of our groundwater reserves that might go southward.

I agree with the content of Bill C–202. It is in sync with the present water policy of the federal government which opposes water exports through interbasin transfers. We should look at the whole question of water in a formal, comprehensive manner, looking at not only the exports themselves but the use of water, water conservation and conception, the impacts of the use of water on ecosystems generally and the impacts of various processes such as industrial manufacturing and others on our water. We must also take into account the jurisdictional question, the input of provincial and municipal governments that deliver our water and have much to do with the retailing of water to Canadians from coast to coast.

The government has been looking at the water issue for some time now. For some 10 years there have been consultations and workshops. We have decided to accelerate the process. We are reviewing our water policies and our water legislation. Throughout next year we will consult broadly across Canada to find out from Canadians and various levels of government that have a clear interest in and responsibility for water issues how we should deal with the question of water comprehensively, including the key question of water exports.

We fully back the principle of the bill. At the same time our decision is that a much more comprehensive approach has to be taken. We want to look at the full range of water exports, including supertankers and the mining of groundwater. We do not want to limit the study and future legislation to the question of exports. We must treat water issues much more broadly, look at an ecosystemic approach, treat water as the most precious resource of the 21st century for us and for generations that follow.

To our aboriginal people water is the essence of life. They see streams, lakes and rivers as the veins and the arteries in the body of mother earth. They say that the cleaner the water flows, the cleaner the arteries and the veins in the body of mother earth. They also say that the healthier the veins and arteries, the healthier mother earth.

• (1805)

I thank the member for Kamloops for having brought the subject forward and enabling us to discuss it. I commit myself to the issue being looked at very broadly by the government in an overall consultation next year which hopefully will lead to comprehensive legislation on water for Canada.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak about the bill introduced by my colleague from the NDP, an act to prohibit the export of water by interbasin transfers.

The purpose of this bill, introduced by the member for Kamloops, is clear from the title: to prohibit the export of our water by interbasin transfers.

Many questions come to mind, which are not answered in this bill. These questions occurred to me after I read an article by Louis–Gilles Francoeur, published yesterday in Le Devoir. Its title is rather instructive. It is a question: "Scientists' recommendation: fresh water under federal control?"

The journalist was referring to the report by the Canadian Water Ressources Association and to the Canadian Global Change Program, which recommends that the federal government get involved in managing fresh water resources, especially by taking over control of the main hydrographic basins, such as the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes.

This report, published in August under the auspices of the Royal Society of Canada, suggests that the federal government review its 1970 Canada Water Act in terms of the new outlook and the new circumstances in this area.

The bill presented by the member for Kamloops is similar, since it suggests that the federal government get involved in the export of its water resources.

I will now go back to the report, which Mr. Francoeur quotes extensively in his article. It says: "The way the situation is evolving, management of fresh water, a provincial resource— again, a strictly provincial resource— could become a constitutional issue, like many other environmental management issues, for that matter. Water resource management is a strategic issue, particularly in Quebec, considering the importance of hydro–electric power".

In light of this quote, one can clearly see that fresh water and the management of this resource is under the provinces' jurisdiction. I do not know if the member for Kamloops consulted the authorities in his province, British Columbia, before introducing his bill. I am sure his province would not agree to give up this jurisdiction. In fact, if his province, or any other, decided to export water by interbasin transfers, could they not do it since it is a matter of provincial jurisdiction?

I cannot see how the federal government would once again intrude on matters of provincial jurisdiction. We know that it is a habit dear to the Liberals, especially with regard to the environment, but for a New Democrat to get into the fray, asking the federal government to put its big fat paws into his own province's business, is beyond me. I cannot see what the member is trying to do with his bill. To protect water? To conserve water? These are matters of provincial jurisdiction. Does the member not trust his provincial government in this respect?

As a matter of fact, his province, the member will correct me if I am wrong, made its position very clear with Bill C–9, The Water Protection Act, tabled by the minister Moe Sihota. I would like the member for Kamloops to tell us more about this piece of legislation. Right from the start, minister Sihota stated his intentions on this matter.

In a press release issued on April 27, 1995, Mr. Sihota said, and I quote:

[English]

The key is for the province to have control over that development, not the federal through NAFTA or the United States.

• (1810)

[Translation]

I believe it is quite clear. Minister Sihota wants to deal with water himself because it comes under his jurisdiction, "not the federal", as he said so well in his press release .If the Environment minister of his own province says that he wants control over this matter and is telling the federal government not to interfere, why does the hon. member for Kamloops seek to impose a new act on his province and on the others? Would it not be better to leave the question of water management to the provinces, like British Columbia, that have jurisdiction over it?

Unfortunately, I have not looked at this issue with regard to the North American Free Trade Agreement. We should certainly look at this question of water exports, or trade in water, in connection with this agreement.

I sense that, once again, this will be served to us with an ecosystem sauce, that is to say, we will be told that we should consider the large living systems as a whole, because they justify Ottawa's interference with provincial jurisdictions. The report referred to before is asking Ottawa to develop a strategy for interconnected basins. Under this strategy, Ottawa would look after large basins like the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence, while provinces and municipalities would manage small basins in accordance with federal policies.

I will read to you two paragraphs from Francoeur's article, which show clearly the interfering intent of the federal government. It says: "Ottawa proposes to reduce the role of the provinces, which own water resources, by drowning their constitutional responsibilities in a sea of intervenors. For example, the report suggests that we create a consortium with representatives of the public sector (federal, provincial, territorial and municipal governments), the First Nations, the universities, the colleges and private sector businesses, which would tackle various problems related to water on a national and international level. The scientific societies' report also suggests that we extend federal jurisdiction to estuaries like the St. Lawrence estuary and to coastal zones, which are provincial properties, in the context of a global approach focused on ecosystems and interconnected drainage basins."

This report puts forward the same arguments the federal government uses to justify interfering in provincial jurisdictions. Ecosystems, the nation, globalization, always the same ingredients the federal government uses to push the provinces around. Unlike Obelix, who was the only one to fall into the kettle of magic potion, all the federalists have been cooked in the same pot. The hon. member for Kamloops is no exception because his bill reflects perfectly the centralizing views promoted by the federal government in environmental matters.

Finally, the report goes on to say that Environment Canada should enhance the protection of fresh water ecosystems by assuming jurisdiction over fresh water fishing. Yet, since 1922—

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Oh, my God, it is unbelievable.

Mrs. Guay: Mr. Speaker, if the members opposite listened they might learn something.

Yet, since 1922, Quebec has been managing fresh water fishing within its boundaries, which shows the inconsistency of a system where water belongs to the provinces and the fish belong to Ottawa.

It is clear from this report that fresh water is under provincial jurisdiction. In B.C., minister Sihota goes even further by legislating trading provincial water.

In a federal paper entitled Media Backgrounder Federal Water Policy—Executive Summary, we read this, and I quote:

[English]

> —the provinces exercise direct control over many aspects of water management within their boundaries. Their competence to legislate in water matters derives from their jurisdiction over management of public lands, property and civil rights, and matters of a local and private nature. Provinces, therefore, have authority to legislate in areas of domestic and industrial water supply, pollution control, non-nuclear thermal and hydroelectric power development, irrigation and recreation.

[Translation]

Moreover, in Quebec, the Gérin-Lajoie philosophy, which says that Quebec's constitutional jurisdiction should be extended to its international relations, has been the object of an undeniable consensus since 1965.

• (1815)

If we combine all this, that is, provincial jurisdiction over water, the provinces' wish to take charge of their international relations, as the member for Kamloops' province does through its Water Protection Act, and if we add to that the federal government's mediocrity, or even paucity in terms of the environment, it must be recognized that Bill C-202 is not a desirable bill.

[English]

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like a point of clarification. Does debate on a private member's bill go from one side of the House to the other?

The Deputy Speaker: Usually, but we try to give all three parties a chance to speak first. According to my list, it is the hon. member for Peace River who now has the floor.

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there is quite a bit of interest in this bill. We have been interested for some time in the matter of water and water exports.

It is a pleasure for me to speak to Bill C-202, which is an act to prohibit the export of water by interbasin transfers. I know the hon. member for Kamloops has been following this issue for quite a few years. Since he is from British Columbia, I can understand his interest in the subject.

Contrary to what the previous speaker stated, these rivers quite often run through more than one province and quite a big area is affected.

We in the Reform Party have also been interested in the topic of water exports. Our 1993 blue sheet, which contains the Reform Party's principles, policies, and election platform, states that the Reform Party supports the position that notwithstanding the inclusion of water in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the North American Free Trade Agreement, exclusive and unrestricted control of water in all its forms will be maintained by and for Canada and both free trade agreements should be amended to reflect this.

The blue sheet went further to state that until federal policies related to the free trade agreements are initiated and Canada's control over water resources is established within both free trade agreements, the Reform Party would not support the implementation of the North American Free Trade Agreement.

I believe we are covered here. However, in examining the research I can see that there are cases that can be made for either side of the argument. The first argument is that the free trade agreement and NAFTA entitle the United States to a certain share of Canada's fresh water. The second argument is that the trade agreements do not entitle the U.S. to our water. I would like to address these two arguments. I will speak about the second argument first, which is the Canadian government's official position.

Water was never mentioned during the free trade negotiations. The free trade agreements are commercial agreements, which deal with traded goods and services. Of course bottled water is a traded good, but water in rivers and lakes is by no stretch of the imagination a traded commodity, so what is the big fuss?

Furthermore, the Canadian government amended the implementing legislation to the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement by stating that none of the free trade agreement provisions, such as the proportional sharing agreement, applied to natural surface or ground water, other than article 401, which deals with tariff elimination.

It would seem that our water is secure. Just to make triple sure there is no room for misunderstanding or legal manoeuvres by the Americans, in December of 1993 the governments of Canada, Mexico, and the United States put out a joint statement, which states that "NAFTA creates no rights to the natural water resources of any party to the agreement. Unless water in any form has entered into commerce and has become a good or product, it is not covered by the provisions of any trade agreement, including NAFTA. Nothing in the NAFTA agreement would oblige any NAFTA party to either exploit its water for commercial use or begin exporting water in any form. Water in its natural state in lakes, rivers, reservoirs, aquifers, water basins and the like is not a good or product and is not traded and therefore is not and never has been subject to the terms of any trade agreement".

The official argument goes even further, to state that international rights and obligations respecting water in its natural state are contained in separate treaties and agreements negotiated for that purpose. Examples are the United States–Canada boundary waters treaty of 1909 and the 1944 boundary waters treaty between Mexico and the United States.

● (1820)

It would seem that any reasonable person would be completely satisfied that all the t's had been crossed and the i's dotted. But of course we are not all lawyers. Lawyers can find tiny holes and drive trucks through them. Before we know it, water could be making its way south of the border.

Let me give some mention of the other argument, the one that says we have goofed and we have allowed the trade agreements to be finalized without specifically exempting water in our rivers and lakes.

The argument could be made that water is a good under the free trade agreement and NAFTA. This is because both trade agreements state that a good is one that is understood to be a good in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Sure enough, the GATT tariff schedule has a heading for water, which is very broad. The heading, numbered 22.01, is reserved for waters, including natural or artificial mineral waters and aerated waters, not containing sugar or any other sweetener matter for flavouring, plus ice or snow.

With that kind of a description, it would seem that natural water of all kinds, other than sea water, could be classified as a good. Since the trade agreement says we must allow all parties to the agreement the same rights in respect of trade in goods and services, we could be forced to give the United States and Mexico the same rights to our water resources that we now enjoy.

Fancy lawyers notwithstanding, I would like to think that the side agreement signed by all three governments carries a lot of weight. Even though the free trade agreement and NAFTA were never changed to include clarification about Canada's sovereignty over its water resource, a mistake we could rectify if we have a chance to open this agreement again to allow a new country in, I believe we still are protected and can never be forced to sell our water to our neighbours in the drier climates.

Of course our final safeguard is that we can always opt out of NAFTA or the free trade agreement. That is our bottom line: if we are not happy with what we are expected to deliver, we have the right to opt out. All we have to do is provide our neighbours with written notification six months in advance.

Let me get back to the bill under debate. I agree fully with its contents and intent. I do not think that any party in Canada, no matter what its political stripe, would support the exporting of water by interbasin transfer. Apart from a threat to our sovereignty, water exports also carry ecological risks. Interbasin water transfers can introduce parasites and other organisms to new environments, which could have a very negative effect. A good example of this is the introduction of zebra mussels into the Great Lakes by ocean–going vessels.

Other problems occur when the flow of fresh water is reduced in estuaries where sea water and river water mix. This upsets the saline balance of the water and has detrimental effects to the birds and fish that depend on that particular ecosystem. It is also reported that dams can cause a change in weather patterns and climate and can cause mercury contamination in the food chain.

I would agree with the hon. member for Kamloops that more research could be done into the effects of interbasin transfer. To that end, I would agree to sending Bill C–202 to committee for further study.

I support this bill, although I am not entirely sure that it is necessary or that we are not sufficiently protected already. However, if there is any concern at all that we are not, let us pass this bill. It can be added as a further safeguard we can take to protect our very valuable water supply.

The Deputy Speaker: A point of order, the hon. for Kamloops, who has already spoken on the matter.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have a very short point of order before my friend from Broadview—Greenwood participates in the debate.

In light of the suggestion by my honourable friend who has just spoken for the Reform Party, I wonder if I could ask you, Mr. Speaker, to ask the House whether there would be unanimous support to put a motion on the floor to send this matter to committee for further discussion and examination.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

An hon. member: No.

The Deputy Speaker: There is clearly not unanimous consent.

• (1825)

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to my very first speech in the House of Commons in 1988. This was the issue I talked about when I opposed the free trade agreement; that water was a part of the free trade agreement.

I congratulate the member for Kamloops for bringing this private member's bill forward. On this issue we should have a general debate. Basically our country is water blind when it comes to understanding the complexities and depth of what is going on around this issue.

When I left high school and went to study in Texas I kept in touch with a few of my friends over the years. When I was running in 1988 for the first time to become a member of Parliament I received a call from an old college classmate of mine who said in that free trade agreement there has to be something dealing with water.

I asked my good friend Bert Edmunston to tell me more. He said the chief free trade negotiator for President Ronald Reagan was a personal friend of his and spent his entire life, including his Ph.D. thesis, studying North American water management, Clayton Yeutter. He worked as a young political assistant for Congressman Jim Wright who spent most of his time studying North American water management.

My friend, even though he was in Houston, an American looking out for the United States, gave me a little friendly heads up that there has to be something in that agreement dealing with North American water management.

I then talked to a few other people, lawyers and experts, much more expert than I was on this issue. I was going to focus on the whole issue of unfettered foreign investment, something I was opposed to, chapter 14. However, when this water dimension came into the deal that got my interest even more.

I remember standing on the other side of the House saying to then Prime Minister Mulroney: "If water is not part of this free trade agreement and yet there is so much worry about it, why do you not ask your friend, President Reagan, for a one–page protocol letter signed by him and you stating water is not a part of this deal? That would put all Canadians across Canada at ease." As the member for Kamloops said, whatever we do in the House or in any provincial house on the whole issue of water is subservient to the free trade agreement.

I could not sell Prime Minister Mulroney on getting a one–page protocol letter exempting water and of course the deal went through.

However, that very first month I was elected I discovered as an MP I had access to the Library of Parliament and the researchers. I remember asking them to find out a little more about Clayton Yeutter's Ph.D. thesis. Apparently it was on the whole issue of water. Lo and behold, about four months later his Ph.D. transcript from the University of Nebraska, pulled off microfiche, landed on my desk. It was about 700 pages on how the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers was to replumb the entire North American system. I remember after I received that Ph.D. thesis of Clayton Yeutter sending him letters complimenting him on this great thesis on how to replumb the North American water system. I asked him if he would comment as the chief free trade negotiator on whether it was in or out of the free trade agreement.

• (1830)

I never had an answer to the first letter, the second letter or the third letter. Therefore we must have our heads up on this issue.

I can remember the hon. member for Kamloops in opposition presenting thousands of petitions on the floor of the House, giving us a heads up on interbasin transfers. We have to deal with this issue.

To the member for Kamloops, his private member's bill today is in the right direction but it is too narrow. The member has said no interbasin transfers. As my colleague the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment knows, we already have an interbasin transfer from Lake Ontario into the St. Lawrence. That is one of the reasons we can maintain Montreal as a port. If we ever stopped that transfer from Lake Ontario, a joint decision made by the International Joint Commission, Montreal would not be a port.

This of course is something that was never discussed during the last referendum. Our friends who want to create their own country do not realize that Canada and the United States together, nation to nation, decide on the flow of water from Lake Ontario. We happily maintain Montreal as one of the great ports of the world. That in a manner of speaking is basin transfer.,Maybe

I am happy to participate in this debate today. It touches on an issue we will have to deal with in a comprehensive way over the next three to five years.

A chapter in one of the books by the former premier of Quebec, Robert Bourassa, dealt with the grand canal, the recycling of water from James Bay up over Mount Amos, down into the Georgian Bay system, through the French River, into all the Great Lakes and through Lake Michigan into the United States. This chapter had a contribution by Tom Kierans from Newfoundland who spent his entire life working for that great U.S. firm, Bechtel Group Inc. I am intrigued by this idea.

What I am trying to say is this is an issue we will have to face up to. Fifteen years from now our American friends will not be able to carry on without Canadian water. What will we do?

The member for Kamloops, who has been consistent on this issue and is pricking our conscience and our thought process here again tonight, is giving us a heads up on a very important issue. I hope through my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment, and other colleagues we can take this issue on in a comprehensive way in the not too distant future.

Maybe, as the member said in his speech, there are many different factors in this equation, many intricacies related to our first peoples, our aboriginals, and our whole environmental system. There are the different types of waters, processes and everything else that we have to deal with. I hope we can get into that in the not too distant future.

With respect to my colleagues from the Bloc, water is really not a provincial debate or issue. When we look at the way 65 per cent of our waters flow north into James Bay, when we see the way waters flow back and forth, if there was ever a reason for my colleagues across the floor to convert from Bloc Quebecois to Bloc canadien, it is around the whole issue of water.

Unless we have a strong national government managing our water resources for the interests of all Canadians, the entire community is in jeopardy. The best way to secure the precious resource of water for all Quebecers is by making sure the national Government of Canada is working on behalf of all Quebecers. Quebec alone would not have the same capacity or the same thrust.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to seven petitions.

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–363, an act to amend the Criminal Code (juvenile prostitution).

He said: Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today to introduce this private member's bill for first reading. It provides that a Canadian citizen be tried in Canada where that citizen has sexually exploited children overseas.

We all know there is a multibillion dollar sex trade, particularly in Asia. Other countries, in particular the United Kingdom and Sweden, have taken measures to ensure that their citizens who commit crimes against children, which is surely one of the most heinous crimes we can imagine, are tried in their home country.

Article 35 of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, which Canada was instrumental in implementing, states that governments have the obligation to ensure that children are protected from all forms of sexual exploitation.

I recommend the bill to the House. I congratulate an organization called End Child Prostitution in Asian Tourism, which has worked very hard to ensure that this trade be stopped.

PETITIONS

SOCIAL REFORM

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present a petition to the House. The petition is signed by people from all across the national capital region: Ottawa, Nepean, Gloucester, Orleans and so on. It has to do with same sex benefits.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the petition I am presenting today comes from the constituents of Yorkton—Melville. It states: "We, the undersigned citizens of Canada, wish to draw to the attention of the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada that a very vocal minority of citizens are requesting Parliament to institute a dual marketing system for wheat and barley.

Therefore, your petitioners request that Parliament continue to give the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly powers in marketing wheat and barley and also request that Parliament expand further the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly powers to include all grains and oilseeds".

• (1005)

BOVINE GROWTH HORMONE

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of my constituents in Regina—Lumsden who are concerned and opposed to the approval of the synthetic bovine growth hormone known as BGH or BST, the drug injected into cows to increase milk production.

The petitioners call on Parliament to take steps to keep BGH out of Canada through legislating a moratorium or stoppage on BGH use and sale until the year 2000, and examining the outstanding health and economic questions through independent and transparent review.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS ACT

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.) moved that Bill C–110, an act respecting constitutional amendments, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

He said: Madam Speaker, Bill C–110 represents the fulfilment of one of the three undertakings made by the Prime Minister during the referendum campaign. At that time, the Prime Minister made a commitment not to amend the Canadian Constitution without the consent of the people of Quebec. But the bill goes much further. It also ensures that no constitutional change will take place without a regional consensus.

Let us be very clear: this initiative, the resolution respecting Quebec's distinctiveness, and the initiative that will follow tomorrow, are in no way the sum total of our response to the Quebec referendum or to the issue of national unity. Rather, these three commitments should be seen as important first steps.

[English]

It was in front of a rally of over 100,000 proud Canadians in Montreal that the Prime Minister promised change. He made a commitment and now he has delivered.

On that day he made it clear that to implement change he would need the support of those same proud Canadians and their friends who came from coast to coast to Montreal. The time for this renewal starts now.

We need the support of those Canadians and Canadians from all across the country to confirm the faith of the majority of Quebecers who voted no to separation on October 30.

The steps we are taking this week in combination signal a new beginning and a reaffirmation of our desire to remain united.

[Translation]

Bill C–110 should be seen in the context of this renewal. Yesterday, the Prime Minister spoke eloquently before the House to the resolution recognizing Quebec's distinct society.

That resolution represents a solemn commitment, the fulfilment of a pledge, and this Chamber's genuine expression of respect for the people of Quebec. True, this resolution will satisfy neither the Parti Quebecois nor the Bloc Quebecois.

• (1010)

As we know, sadly, nothing short of breaking up this country would satisfy them. But, as the Prime Minister said yesterday, it is easier to destroy than to build. This government is interested only in building a stronger, more united Canada.

[English]

As the Prime Minister asserted yesterday, the resolution through which the House is being called on to confirm the reality that Quebec is a distinct society is not intended in any way and does not infringe on or derogate from aboriginal or treaty rights. This position includes the inherent right to self–government. We recognize the unique legal position of aboriginal peoples, including the protection of aboriginal and treaty rights as found in the Constitution.

Tomorrow my colleague, the Minister of Human Resources Development, will table a bill transforming the unemployment insurance program into an employment insurance program. This will represent the latest step in the practice established by the government in the two years since we have taken office; a practice of co–operating to end duplication with other levels of government as we work toward our common goals of creating jobs and achieving economic growth.

We reaffirmed that commitment during the referendum campaign. Tomorrow will mark an important step in that continuing process.

[Translation]

During the referendum campaign, we assured the people of Quebec that the Canadian Constitution would not be amended again without their consent. That was a solemn commitment. Yet, the Government of Quebec stands in the way of our modernizing the federation and stays on the sidelines by itself. It refuses to participate.

As Canada begins its renewal, we need a practical way of assuring Quebecers that we will not proceed without them. What we have done is to provide a strong political commitment, backed by the force of law, that we will use our veto to oppose any change that, in the opinion of Quebecers or people from any other region, goes against their best interests. This simply acknowledges the reality. There is no point in adopting changes that do not have substantial support in all the regions of the country.

[English]

Allow me to deal briefly with the contents of Bill C–110. May I emphasize at the outset that this legislation does not initiate or represent constitutional change. It is essential to emphasize that the adoption of this bill by Parliament will not result in any change in the amending formula provided for in the Constitution of our country.

All of the features of Part V of the Constitution calling for provincial agreement in various forms, depending on the nature of the proposed amendment, will remain entirely as they are at present. In particular, the general formula for amendment requiring the approval of two–thirds of the provinces representing 50 per cent of the Canadian population will remain exactly as it is at present.

What this bill does achieve is to make the federal veto over constitutional change available in such a way as to ensure that no such change will take place without regional consensus. Simply stated, the federal government is providing by law that such support will not be forthcoming unless certain conditions are met. Those conditions involve the support of every region of Canada.

Let me spend a few moments setting out in a summary way that which is already well known to members of Parliament; that is, the features of the present amending formula contained in Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 and that will continue unchanged after this bill is adopted.

• (1015)

Each and every one of the provinces already has a veto on many categories of proposed constitutional amendments. For example, each and every one of the provinces has a veto on all changes that require unanimity; that is, those matters that are touched on by section 41 of the Constitution Act. These involve changes to the office of the Queen, the governor general, the lieutenant governor of a province. They involve changes in provincial representation in the House of Commons and the Senate, the use of the English and French languages, and the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Under section 41, every province, from Newfoundland on the east to British Columbia on the west, has an absolute and unconditional veto over any amendment referred to in section 41.

The second type of change contemplated by the Constitution and the second kind of veto provided in part V is dealt with in section 43. Whenever there are proposed changes that affect one or more but not all of the provinces, those provinces affected by the proposed changes have an absolute and unconditional veto over any such amendment. Think, for example, about the resolution of boundary questions between provinces that neighbour each other, or instances such as the amendment permitting the construction of the fixed link between the mainland and Prince Edward Island. Without the concurrence of the province or provinces affected by changes under section 43, those amendments will not occur.

The third kind of change in respect of which there is a virtual veto is under the general amending formula in subsection 38(1). It is provided in subsection 38(3) that where there is any amendment approved by seven provinces with 50 per cent of the population, if it involves the reduction of any provincial power, right, or privilege, any province can opt out. In that section, the veto is exercised in a negative sense by the objecting province opting out of the proposed change. Under section 40, where such an opting out takes place in relation to matters involving culture or education the federal government is obligated to compensate the dissenting province financially.

It is therefore clear that each and every province, from Prince Edward Island to Alberta, from British Columbia to Newfoundland, has a veto either directly or indirectly over almost all categories of constitutional change.

The only area that exists at present where there is no veto is where the general amending formula applies and where the opting out provisions of subsection 38(3) do not arise; in other words, those amendments that do not involve taking powers away from the provinces. We are therefore dealing with those categories of amendment that would, for example, add powers to the provinces, enlarge the territories of existing provinces, or deal with all the other matters listed in section 42 of the Constitution.

The effect of Bill C–110 is to provide a regional veto for any of the changes in respect of which the individual provinces do not already have direct or indirect vetos. The additional regional veto that is contemplated by this legislation will be provided not by constitutional change but rather through a commitment by the Canadian government to introduce such changes only when regional consensus is demonstrated.

In effect, the federal government is putting in place a set of criteria that will guide the future use of its own veto power. The seven and fifty amending formula is still in place. Bill C–110 is merely a discipline the federal government imposes on itself.

[Translation]

Canadian history shows that the idea of a regional veto has often been supported by many responsible proponents. Indeed, at the Victoria constitutional conference of 1971, the federal government and all 10 provinces agreed to a constitutional amending formula that was, in general terms, very similar to that proposed in Bill C–110.

This approach was ultimately rejected, for other reasons, by a subsequent decision.

• (1020)

Let us keep in mind, however, that the Victoria formula as it was then called had the original support of all eleven governments.

Similarly, the 1991 report of the Beaudoin–Edwards Committee contained a proposal almost identical to that in Bill C–110. Finally, at its 1992 policy convention in Hull, the Liberal Party of Canada endorsed certain specific amending formulas, including the very formula set out in this bill.

As members will see, this bill provides expressly that no minister of the crown may introduce a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution unless such an amendment has the consent of a majority of the provinces. Which begs the question: What is meant exactly by "the consent of the provinces"?

First, let me point out that it will be up to the federal government to determine what this phrase means every time a new situation arises. Depending on the circumstances, the federal government might interpret as consent, for example, an expression of consent by the provincial government of the day, a resolution of the legislative assembly, or a direct expression of the population's agreement through a referendum.

[English]

There are those who may argue that Bill C–110 is unconstitutional because it represents a unilateral attempt by the Canadian government to amend the Constitution. I gave careful consideration to this question before certifying the bill as constitutional, as it was tabled in the House yesterday.

Let me express my sincere conviction that Bill C–110 is valid federal legislation. It does not amend the Constitution in any way. Indeed, it is complementary to the constitutional amending provisions.

The House of Commons is the only legislative assembly in Canada with a complete veto over almost every conceivable type of constitutional change. That is so because as a practical matter no such change will occur if it is opposed by the House of Commons.

Bill C–110 simply represents a reflection in legislative form of the policy of the Canadian government with respect to the circumstances under which it will lend its support to constitutional change where the provinces do not already have a veto.

In my respectful view this legislation is much in the same category as those provincial statutes by which certain provinces have bound themselves to support constitutional amending proposals only after a referendum has been held in which the people of a province express their support. I refer specifically to the legislation in both Alberta and British Columbia, which imposes on those provincial governments exactly that constraint or discipline.

Accordingly, the bill is neither intended to nor does it amend the Constitution directly or indirectly. It simply sets out the circumstances under which the Canadian government may support constitutional change.

Another question that arises is whether there are four regions for these purposes or five. As the Prime Minister asserted in his remarks yesterday, some are already suggesting the bill does not do justice to British Columbia. This is simply not the case.

The changes in this legislation are a significant step forward for British Columbia in the constitutional process. These steps are the clearest recognition we have had to date of British Columbia's growing importance within Canada. The voices of British Columbians are being heard in Ottawa and throughout Canada. Let there be no mistake about that.

• (1025)

As the largest western province, British Columbia will obviously have a major voice in determining whether regional consensus exists in the circumstances contemplated by Bill C–110. The arithmetical reality is that British Columbia, with the support of only one other western province, could block any constitutional change affected by Bill C–110. This represents a significant increase in British Columbia's role in the amending process. The situation at present in respect of amendments to which Bill C–110 would apply is that change would be possible without the consent of three western provinces, even if the three dissenting provinces together represented a majority of the population in the western region.

The population of British Columbia is expected to surpass 50 per cent of the total of the western region early in the next century. This will mean that under the provisions of Bill C–110 British Columbia on its own would ultimately be able to block any amendment. This will represent a major improvement and significant recognition of British Columbia's place in Confederation.

This issue should surely be kept in perspective. We speak in this bill of a veto. A veto does not initiate constitutional change, it blocks it. What we are talking about is the ability of a region to stop an amendment to the Constitution.

I remind members as well that the Constitution requires that a conference convened by the Prime Minister and including all first ministers must be held before April 1997, expressly for the purpose of discussing the amending formula in part V. The issue of British Columbia's involvement in the veto process could very well be put on the agenda of that conference for full discussion.

[Translation]

There are those who suggest that Bill C–110 will make it impossible for any government to amend the Canadian Constitution. I fundamentally disagree.

First of all, the amending formula remains exactly as it is today. Part 5 remains unchanged. The general amending formula will still require the consent of seven provinces representing over 50 per cent of the Canadian population. Bill C–110 simply provides that a regional consensus must be achieved before the Canadian government can effect any changes.

It is difficult to imagine that the federal government would endorse constitutional change without the support of all regions. Bill C–110 requires that a majority of provinces, namely six, express their support for or consent to the proposed changes before Ottawa can participate.

That is, of course, a smaller number than required in Part 5 of the Constitution, and I emphasize as well that there is no national population threshold.

[English]

I suggest that Bill C–110 will strengthen the constitutional fabric of this country, not by changing the Constitution but rather by making plain the circumstances under which constitutional change can be carried out.

This bill is a measure that reflects the importance of the regions of Canada and ensures their participation in constitutional renewal. In a sense the bill is a bridge, because we can expect that the amending formula will evolve in the years to come. There is no doubt that at some future point the amending formula will be reviewed and no doubt improved upon. In the meantime, by this legislation the federal government is ensuring that amendments will occur only when they have the support of all regions of the country.

As I said at the outset, this bill and the other initiatives introduced this week are not in any sense the only response by this government to questions of national unity. Rather these initiatives are the first steps. They represent new beginnings. We undertake them with renewed hope and optimism for our future as a country. Let us proceed in that spirit and put Canada above all else. Let us put Canada first.

• (1030)

I commend the legislation to the House and I urge all members to support it.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Madam Speaker, we are engaged here in a continuation of the discussion of the recent attempts by the Prime Minister to amend the Constitution. I feel that the contribution made to the history of Canada and Quebec constitutional law by Bill C–110 will be fairly negligible. It will add a page to the federal statutes, but that is as far as it will go.

Before entering directly into an examination of the content of Bill C–110, I would like to try to destroy a myth, if I may—although myths are virtually indestructible—the myth that René Lévesque lost Quebec its right to a veto. Yesterday again we heard the Prime Minister tell the House that Quebec had to be given back its veto because René Lévesque had given it up. That is something we hear all the time on the Hill as a self–evident truth, but something that is totally contrary to the facts.

I note that the Minister of Justice, with his familiarity with law and jurisprudence, has taken great pains to avoid repeating such an enormity. We are well aware that the reason why Quebec is in the vulnerable situation it is with respect to constitutional change is that the Supreme Court, in a 1982 decision, its second decision on constitutional challenges raised because of the 1982 patriation, found that the veto Quebec believed it possessed, the veto everyone believed Quebec possessed, which had always been respected because the general perception was that the Canadian Constitution could not be altered without Quebec's consent, had never existed.

The Supreme Court analyzed the Constitution and found, after examining all elements which might make it possible to confirm the existence of a veto, that Quebec had no veto and never had had one. Now, that is a ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada. As a result, people ought perhaps in future to refrain from stating that if the necessity for Quebec to obtain a veto is central to the whole constitutional debate, is not as a result of René Lévesque's being so careless that it was lost, but has never existed in the opinion of the Supreme Court. The proof lies in the second challenge in 1982, when Quebec, which now stood alone, attempted to block unilateral patriation by invoking its right to a veto.

You will recall that in the first attempt, in the first case, in 1981, Quebec had seven other provinces on its side and was successful in blocking patriation, this time by convincing the Supreme Court that a reasonable measure of provincial consent was necessary for proper patriation and major change to be possible. The Supreme Court had concluded that, with eight provinces dissenting and only two supporting the federal government, the reasonable measure of consent needed to authorize the patriation of the Constitution and the amendments it contained had not been reached.

It was in the second attempt, when Quebec found itself alone, that it tried to block patriation and exercised its right to veto. At the heart of the 1982 constitutional challenge, which the Supreme Court decided on, just before the act of patriation was signed, but still in 1982, the court concluded that the argument did not hold in this case, because Quebec had no veto.

I would just like to say this so it appears somewhere in Hansard, here, in this wash of gratuitous remarks to the effect that René Lévesque lost the right of veto, that someone rose, namely the Leader of the Opposition, who was on one of the teams of lawyers at the time, to point out that the Supreme Court never said René Lévesque had lost the right of veto. On the contrary, it said we never had it. Hence the present debate, which is part of a long series of abortive attempts to introduce the right of veto into the Canadian Constitution.

• (1035)

Earlier, the Minister of Justice provided a quick overview of the various attempts that have been made, from Victoria, more specifically the Pepin–Robarts Commission, to the various task forces that were set up during the constitutional debates that preceded the Charlottetown accord, to show there had been a number of formulae. The formula used in Bill C–110 is somewhat like the Victoria formula in which Quebec is considered a region and could therefore, if the government is rightly talking veto, have its own veto too.

But what is the reality of the situation. I contend, and the Minister of Justice was careful to avoid saying it, that there is no way this bill can be said to give a veto to Quebec in particular or to other provinces and regions. There is no way anybody can claim this bill provides for a veto, for two basic reasons.

First, veto power is given only if everyone wants it to be. As soon as someone objects to its being given, the right vanishes. Consensus is at the very heart of the according of veto power. Unanimity is essential. All the provincial legislatures and the federal government must be in agreement. What we have before us is nothing more than the federal government's wish. Where is the support of Canada's provincial legislatures? There is none.

What we do have are statements making it very clear that at least two, and maybe more, provinces have refused to support this veto bill. Only one need refuse for it to never exist.

This means there is a basic flaw in the plan for establishing a right of veto. The reality of the situation is that we do not have here the conditions necessary for a veto to be given.

The second reason has to do with the definition of a veto. The right of veto is an absolute guarantee. It is written into the Constitution and cannot be withdrawn without everyone's approval. It serves to permit one of the interested parties to block constitutional change.

It should be binding on everyone under the constraining effect of the Constitution, the country's supreme legislation. Where will this bill end up after being passed by a majority of the members in this House? It will end up gathering dust in the federal statute books, where it will remain. It will never be enshrined in the Constitution or invoked to bind anyone outside this House because it is not, in fact, a right of veto.

They will tell me: "Yes, but Parliament will be bound, the federal government will be bound, since a bill was passed". Not really. It will be bound only so long as the act remains in the federal statute books. It will no longer be binding, even on this government, as soon as one minister or another rises to propose that this bill be withdrawn and replaced with another one. One piece of legislation replacing another. The legislative process hinges on having the same forum, the same vehicle, namely the House of Commons, pass a bill to amend another piece of legislation.

In any case, we know full well that, fortunately, governments do not last forever, that there are elections in a democracy, that there will be a federal election in two or three years, that another government will be formed, perhaps by the same party, but possibly by a different party, why not? As for the Bloc Quebecois, it will certainly not be in the running, so that the only other party in this House likely to come to power is the Reform Party. What will be the first bill tabled by Reform should it come to power? The bill to withdraw Bill C–110. Which means that Bill C–110 is nothing. It amounts to smoke and mirrors.

So, Madam Speaker, I trust you will allow me to spare you and not spend too much time repeating that this bill contributes absolutely nothing to the debate, that it is, at best, a diversion, a show put on by the Liberal government to silence criticism about failing to act on the constitutional issue, making empty promises and misleading the people. This way, for the next two or three years, the Prime Minister will be able to keep telling us, until we are sick and tired of hearing about it: "We granted Quebec the right of veto through Bill C–110. We granted Quebec the right of veto through Bill C–110. We granted Quebec the right of veto through Bill—"It will become quite annoying to hear him say that over and over. That is not true, but he just will keep on repeating it all the time. Over, and over again.

Those in the know, all those who examine the constitutional issue, who are courageous enough to keep looking into it from time to time, who overcome their mental fatigue to ponder these matters again, know that Bill C–110 is just one of those political ploys that do not really change anything in the problem Quebec and Canada have in this regard. And I suspect that the Minister of Justice would be the first one to recognize that, he who, a moment ago, gave a very neutral, factual and, I would say, professional description of his approach by setting out very clear limits, reassuring English Canada in the process.

I noticed, in the remarks he made in English in particular, that he made a point to remind everyone that the Constitution will remain unchanged. "Do not assume that this is a constitutional change. This will have no effect on the Constitution. The federal government is just exercising self–discipline". I heard a speaker use the word "discipline" earlier, in English. The federal government will exercise self–discipline, restraint, before granting too much to Quebec, of course. To anglophone listeners, the government is describing this initiative as a way to refrain from giving too much to Quebec, to resist the urge to do anything like that.

This leads me to believe and shows us that Bill C–110, in fact, has a pernicious effect in that, since the Canadian Constitution is so complex and twisted in certain respects, this bill, and that is a paradox, will in no way solve the current problems, but will make it even more difficult to transfer the powers that the federal government might be willing to give to Quebec.

I can see the day when members from this side of the House will rise to ask the Prime Minister: "Are you going to transfer manpower to Quebec, along with the real powers provided for in the Constitution? Are you going to enshrine the transfer of manpower in the Constitution? Are you going to do that? Are you going to also transfer the related funds?" The Prime Minister will reply: "I cannot do that. Bill C–110 prevents me from doing that. I have imposed self–discipline on myself. I have forbidden myself to transfer anything to Quebec". Since he is a law abiding person, the Prime Minister will no longer be able to do anything for Quebec, when he wanted to do so much.

I end with the conclusion of the Minister of Justice, who said: "Listen, this may not be much"—and he is right—"but it is only the first step. It will be improved. We will continue to work. The committee has an important task. That committee, which is chaired by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and which will explore avenues for change, will come up with other proposals just as inventive as Bill C–110". The minister adds: "Do not lose heart just yet. True, there is not much in this, but we will improve things". The fact is that, never in the history of constitutional negotiations and talks involving Quebec, the federal government and the rest of Canada, was an initial proposal improved on. On the contrary, every initial proposal made was later scaled down, watered down, split, doctored or dolled up, and in the end became almost meaningless. Now we are told: "No, this time we start small, but end up with something big". We will talk then.

• (1045)

For the time being, let us simply say that this sham fails to convince, and that we will not give it any credibility by voting in favour of the bill. On the contrary, we will oppose this legislation and, in Quebec, we will move on to a more immediate, pressing, serious and imperative agenda, given the need to put our fiscal house in order, to create jobs and to do something about education and culture.

We will see what happens after that.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am rising today to address Bill C–110, an act respecting constitutional amendments, and to state clearly our opposition to the bill as it is now drafted. I also hope to propose some things that the government will think about in terms of altering this legislation which may make it more acceptable.

[Translation]

I want to say that we, the members of the Reform Party, certainly oppose that bill, which gives a veto power over constitutional amendments to certain provinces, but not to others. More importantly, it denies Canadians the possibility of playing a role, by way of a referendum, in amending the Constitution.

[English]

I must admit that in the last two or three months I have been wondering what exactly it is we are doing in this place and why we are really here when it comes to the question of national unity.

I had prepared a fairly long speech to discuss the constitutional amending formula and some of the considerations in that historically. I probably will not give it today. Instead I want to concentrate on a few other comments, things that I feel about this situation which I think need to be said.

When I say I wonder why we are here, as intergovernmental affairs critic for my party I want to share some of the frustrations we have had. Monday morning the government did not even know it was making an announcement on national unity. We contacted the government and were told that by the office of the intergovernmental affairs minister. Certainly nobody in the press gallery was aware of it.

The announcement was made Monday afternoon. Even yesterday morning no copy of the bill was available. We were told it was in the extremely complex process of being drafted, after notice had been given. Then we got the bill and it is all of one page. There is no doubt that the drafting required a lot of time and a lot of complex decisions which prevented it from being shown to anybody until a few minutes before it was tabled.

We saw what happened when we tried to get a constitutional amendment at Charlottetown. We ended up with 60 clauses. It took months and they could not even produce a legal text. This is the kind of the role we see here.

What is more important is this is a bill about the amending formula. The amending formula is an important question. Frankly I do not really think this bill has much to do with an amending formula in the Constitution. I do not think much thought went into this position.

Judging from the comments of both the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister when we have questioned them in question period it is very clear there are concerns other than the amending formula. We seldom get any responses that try to justify or explain why this particular formula would be a good one.

Instead, what is obviously a preoccupation in the government and in the country is the very deep denial about the nature of the events in the province of Quebec and where it is really going. The deep denial this country has been in for a long time is that there is a very simple solution to this problem, that somehow there will be some constitutional or non–constitutional concession and all we do is present it. It will address Quebec's historic demands; it will embarrass the bejeesus out of the separatists; the whole movement will collapse and then everything will be solved.

We have heard this story over and over again for 30 years. Attempts have been made to go along with that approach and frankly, they seem to have made the situation worse. The most notable was in 1982 when nine provincial governments and many people were persuaded to pass a major constitutional package against the wishes of the separatist Government of Quebec. This was done as a method of dealing with our unity crisis to fulfil the commitments of the then Prime Minister to the people of Quebec during the referendum. We know that has led to a much more profound crisis than we had to begin with.

As this crisis gets worse and worse, governments and the Liberal Party particularly seek to find enemies of Canada everywhere. Now the enemies of Canada are no longer just in Quebec among the separatist movement; we are now told there are enemies of Canada in great numbers in Alberta and in no less than the premier's office in Newfoundland. There are enemies in British Columbia. Everywhere there are enemies who will not put aside their narrow views in order to save the country.

Let me go to our position on the amending formula and make it very clear. The Reform Party will not agree to any change to the amending formula for federal ratification unless it is done by national referendum. It does not matter whether there are four regions, five regions, 10 regions, or if we make every constituency of this House a region.

It is not good enough to have 10 votes of 10 provincial premiers. We want there to be 30 million votes, the population of Canada in a national referendum to discuss federal constitutional amendments. If we get that, we can be more flexible about the nature of the federal geographic approval process. We have a constitutional amending formula for provincial approval today and that amending formula is satisfactory to us as a formula for provincial approval.

The position that the Minister of Justice has presented, I would state with respect, does not make any sense. The government says it is not a new formula for constitutional amendment. It is not a constitutional formula because it will not be in the Constitution. That is clear enough, except that it is the stated intention of the government that these proposals will be brought into the Constitution at some point.

The government is proposing a new formula for constitutional amendments involving provincial ratification. We already have a formula in the Constitution for provincial ratification, the seven and fifty formula. There are difficulties with the seven and fifty formula. The minister accurately outlined some of those difficulties.

The reason for that formula is that when dealing with provincial governments the provinces decided that they did not want any one government to have a veto because that was a very risky situation with the concentration of executive power there is in this country. I will get on to that more later.

The new formula obviously violates what the provinces themselves wanted in selecting the current provincial amending formula. The Minister of Justice has tried to make an argument that it is not unconstitutional for the federal government to unilaterally amend the provincial ratification formula even in a non–constitutional way. He has an argument there because the federal government can clearly delegate its powers.

Why it would want to delegate powers to the provincial governments in an area where the provincial governments already have a formula is unclear to me. We will have two rounds of provincial ratification and no real federal ratification. This is completely unclear to me. In any case, this is what they are proposing to do.

The delegation which is proposed here delegates that authority in a way that gives some provincial legislatures more authority than others.

It is on that ground that some provincial legislatures, in particular the legislature in my province of Alberta, may well attempt to take this to court and have it declared unconstitutional. Alberta may challenge that and I would encourage it if it sought to do so because in the area of governmental powers all of the provinces should be treated equally.

As well the Minister of Justice has argued, and I am a bit mystified at why he is even making this argument, that there are already plenty of vetoes in the Constitution which is true enough. There are already plenty of vetoes in the Constitution. That does not change the fact that for the areas he is proposing vetoes, he is proposing to give some provincial governments and not other provincial governments vetoes. This will be rejected by the population in large parts of the country, but particularly in western Canada. Western Canada will reject it because it reflects a vision of the country that does not at all reflect the way westerners see the country.

I was born and raised in Toronto, so I can understand the central Canadian perspective. Unfortunately it is simply not a complete perspective of the country. It is interesting, when looking at the four regions there is Ontario and Quebec, the two original provinces before Confederation. Then there is Atlantic Canada and of course, it is a group with a small population. In the original Constitution we had recognized three regions, but then there is out there: western Canada and all of the Rockies, all of the prairies, all of the north. That is just one area.

If we were to ask a westerner what the regions were, I am sure he would say they are the prairies, the Pacific, the north and the east. That would be the formula that would be proposed.

This will obviously be rejected even more in British Columbia than it is anywhere else. British Columbia is obviously a distinctive and strong region with a vibrant economy, a great future regardless of what happens politically in this country. It is growing. It is larger both in terms of geography and population than all of the Atlantic provinces combined. It certainly is not going to view itself as part of some western region. Why then has it been defined this way? It is important to say something about this because it does reflect the nature and the inadequacy of the thinking behind the bill.

The Minister of Justice talked about renewal. What does this particular formula have to do with renewal? When we asked why this formula came about, we did not get an instruction about renewal; we got an instruction from the minister and from the government about history.

In 1971 the Government of British Columbia as part of a wider constitutional package that was eventually rejected, agreed to a formula that involved four regions. In 1971 Ken Dryden was a rookie playing goal for the Montreal Canadiens. The United States was still at war in Vietnam.

The premier who signed that deal— and I do not mean to besmirch his memory, the premier has long since passed away— not only is he and his government out of power, the party he represented does not even exist in the province of British Columbia. The premier is dead and we are using him now as the reason we are bringing forward a a proposal for a constitutional amending formula in 1995.

Then we got a second set of reactions. This morning the Minister of Justice seemed to concede that B.C. should have a veto or should be moving that way because of its population. I ask the House to think a little bit about this. The argument is that sooner rather than later, British Columbia will have a majority of the population in western Canada so it will have a veto.

What does this mean? This means that under the formula proposed by the government, the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba would have no say whatsoever in constitutional amendments, none whatsoever. They can be isolated in the seven and fifty formula and their consent would not even have to be requested to fulfil the requirements of Bill C–110. We would not even need to know what their position was.

This is an absolutely incredible position and explains why in Alberta there is a reaction. Some circles have called for an Alberta veto.

Across the country there is a particular concern that this gives a veto to the government of Quebec at the very time when it will be led not just by the separatists, but by the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois who will become the future premier of Quebec. He is not only committed to taking Canada out of confederation, but unlike Rene Levesque, is not willing to entertain any constitutional amendments whatsoever.

During and since the referendum when the Prime Minister has been asked him about his speech in Verdun, he talked about trusting the people. He told us we had to trust the people in the referendum. The people defeated the proposal by Mr. Parizeau. Now the Prime Minister does not trust them. Now he is prepared to trust the Leader of the Opposition. This position contradicts his previous statements on constitutional reform. It contradicts resolutions the Liberal Party passed in 1992. It contradicts his statement about trusting the people and giving the Constitution to the people. It even contradicts statements he made recently in the House.

We have to ask why the Prime Minister would do this. I want to try and be fair to him. The Prime Minister has been in politics for 30 years. He has had a very successful political career. None of us would debate that. He has shown from time to time some very clever political judgment, regardless of what anyone says.

He said he would trust the people. He said he would give the people a say. He said he would give the people of Quebec a veto. Now he is doing the opposite. He is giving the legislature of Quebec a say and not the people. A couple of days ago when I asked about this, he said this was even more democratic. This was really democracy. The people of Quebec chose this legislature and that is who we are trusting.

I have pointed out on more than one occasion in the past that if we had left the decision on the separation of Quebec to the legislature of Quebec, it would already be a separate country if that is where the decision is to be taken. It is the people of Quebec who have decided repeatedly not to separate.

Why is the Prime Minister doing this? He is doing this for the very reason that it is being criticized. He is doing this precisely because it gives a veto to the leader of the official opposition, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois. The Prime Minister can stand and say: "I gave you a veto. I gave the people of Quebec something through you and you turned it down. You are the bad guy". That is what he wants to say.

Why does that matter? It matters because for 30 years the Prime Minister has been a fighter for Canada in Quebec against the Quebec nationalist movement. It is a fight that looks more and more in jeopardy as there has been a long term rise in support of this movement through the decades.

As with all nationalism, this movement says that anybody who has a sense of wider loyalties is a traitor. The Prime Minister, because he sees himself as a Canadian, believes it is some kind of a sell–out.

It reached a pinnacle in the last couple of years when the Prime Minister became the first Quebecer in our history to be elected Prime Minister without substantial support from the French speaking areas of Quebec. He also was aggravated, when in the referendum campaign, his interventions did not seem to have a particular affect on the population.

• (1105)

The Prime Minister has decided to strike back. It is a perfectly understandable response for somebody who has been in the position he has been in, for somebody who must feel the way he feels, given the way events have gone and given the way he has been treated from time to time, particularly in his own province. From his perspective it may also be a response that is necessary politically as a federalist Quebecer.

I suggest it will not work. The Leader of the Opposition, as we all know, is a smart enough fellow, which he demonstrated again today. He is not going to have any problem playing around with this argument. That is what he will do. Whether his arguments are right or wrong he will be able to deliver an effective argument against this motion.

The Prime Minister should also know from his own history that success in politics is about being able to see that one's own feelings or one's own reactions should not interfere with one's own judgment or with the broader interests that are at stake.

Canada needs an approach in looking for a new constitutional formula. That is what we should be looking at here. Canada needs an approach that is good for the country and good for Canadians. I suggest there are many things wrong with this bill. In particular a veto for the premier of Quebec is not in the interests of all Canadians. It is not in the interests of this country.

What is in the interests of this country at the federal level is what we have: a provincial ratification formula which I believe is as good as it is going to get. At the federal level we need a national referendum for the people of Canada. We should be trusting the people of Quebec who have voted against separation. We should be trusting the people who went to the Montreal rally who were not there to endorse some bills and resolutions which they had not seen. We should be trusting their judgment. We should also be trusting the people who did not go to the Montreal rally. They were millions of Canadians, many of whom I suspect considered they would go but had second thoughts because they said: "If I go there am I going to find that my name is being used to back some agenda by some group of politicians that I had never endorsed?"

Those people in Quebec and outside of Quebec need a say in constitutional amendments. It is only by trusting the people that we are going to get anywhere. We will certainly vote against this bill the way it is. I ask the government to seriously consider looking at this proposal again to give the people a say over constitutional change at the federal level.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been consultations among all parties in the House. I believe you would find unanimous consent for the following motion. I move:

> That, notwithstanding any standing order if, on Friday, December 8, any division is demanded with regard to any business pursuant to Standing Order 81, the said division shall be deferred until 15 minutes before the expiry of the time allotted for Government Orders on Monday, December 11, and immediately after the disposal of the said division, the House shall dispose of all other business relating to the business of supply in the manner set out in Standing Order 81(17).

Madam Speaker, a copy of this motion has been given to both opposition parties present in the House and I believe you will find unanimous consent for this motion.

(Motion agreed to.)

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I wish to indicate that pursuant to Standing Order 43(2), Liberal MPs speaking on this bill from hereon in will be sharing their time with 10 minutes for every speaker.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–110, an act respecting constitutional amendments, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Madam Speaker, there are defining moments in the history of a nation. I had the privilege of being a part of one of those defining moments. It was not a political agenda. It was not a politician's agenda. It was an expression by the people of Canada, on the eve of a very important referendum about their futures, to come to the heart of Canada, the city that probably best embodies the distinctiveness of Canada and the distinctiveness of Quebec, to come to Montreal.

• (1110)

I spoke yesterday about a woman I met on an elevator in a hotel who had come in a wheelchair with her husband from Peace River, Alberta. She said to me:

[Translation]

"Mrs. Copps, I cannot speak French like you do, but would you please tell Quebecers that Quebec is an important part of our country, Canada, and that they are a distinct society".

I know it makes the separatists sick to see that Canada has a heart that is generous enough and I can see why.

[English]

I was in Montreal with 150,000 Canadians who came from every part of this country because they believed that we have a nation worth saving. They believe that Quebec is a distinct society. There is a reason we are different from our neighbours to the south, there is a reason that we have—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps:—there is a reason we are different and generous.

[Translation]

There is a reason why, last week, we were able to pass a bill on firearms and there is a reason why we have a universal health care system; it is because, at the dawn of our history, when we made the decision to become a country, we held as a fundamental principle that there are two peoples.

The hon. member can laugh, but my ancestor was a member of the Louisbourg government before anglophones ever came into Canada. My maternal grandmother was born in England. We can find solutions. That is why, last year, on Canada Day, the Leader of the Opposition said Canada was the most democratic country in the world.

[English]

Canadians know that nothing we do will ever satisfy the Bloc Quebecois. Unfortunately the Reform Party has shown that it is incapable of understanding the meaning of building a nation and the setting aside of regional differences for the good of a nation.

If Bloc members were offered the world they would want the moon. If they got the moon they would demand the sun. If they got the sun they would demand the galaxy. If they got the galaxy they would want the universe. If they got the universe they would demand heaven. If they got heaven they would claim that the angels were in a federalist conspiracy to centralize power.

We have listened to the opposition parties. It is really very sad. I have a lot more faith and confidence in the people of Canada and the good judgment of those 150,000 people.

[Translation]

The Bloc wanted to know if campaign managers had paid for this, who had taken the school bus? Steelworkers from my riding, who had never been involved in politics in any way, rode in a school bus for ten hours to go to Montreal to express their solidarity and recognize what you know and what we know. It is a fact, Quebec is a distinct society, and that is why since the beginning of our history we have been different. Why did I say during the referendum campaign that Quebec is the heart of Canada?

• (1115)

If our nation is respectful of individuals and communities, it is thanks to French speaking Canadians, who were able to survive throughout the history of North America. You were all by yourselves. Some could not keep their language, but you were all by yourselves and you managed to survive because you knew how to build a community. You have embraced the principles of sharing through institutions such as the caisse de dépôt and the co–op movement. Your contribution to the fabric of Canada is what makes up the soul of our country.

Some people tell us: "Mind your own business." If I am a Canadian, I am not an Ontarian, I am not an English speaking Canadian, I am simply a Canadian who believes her country, without Quebec, would be an empty shell. My country, without Quebec, will lose all we have achieved together. Admittedly, we have problems. There are always problems. But are we generous enough and open minded enough to accept wholeheartedly the changes that need to be made?

[English]

Canada is not about cutting the best deal for oneself. Canada is not about carving up power among politicians. Canada is about building a hope and a dream for people around the world who look to Canada for inspiration from a country that can make its differences work.

Let us look at the globe today. People with far greater differences than ours are making enormous accommodations and throwing off centuries of bitterness, centuries of historic hate. We see peace in the Middle East. We see peace in Northern Ireland. We see the peace process in Bosnia. Bitter rivals are laying down decades and centuries of hatred and destruction and they are finding accommodation. We thank God that in this country we do not have such hatred to overcome.

[Translation]

The city of Shawinigan is twinned with mine. It was my father, a guy from Northern Ontario who spoke French slang, who twinned those two cities in the sixties. What do working people in Shawinigan and Hamilton want? They want us to be able to give the best to our children.

My grandmother was a widow, who raised six lads in Northern Ontario. She was penniless, and could not afford university for her children. Neither my father nor my mother went to university. But all their children did because, in the sixties, we tried to improve the situation in Canada to give more opportunities to more people.

Our current fiscal circumstances are difficult, and we live in a period where we tend to withdraw into ourselves. But is that the way to have a strong country in the next century? The country we have can be a leader in the world and meet the challenges of the 21st century. I sure of that.

[English]

This summer in my riding of Hamilton East we will be twinning with families from Shawinigan. One hundred and fifty Shawinigan families are coming to Hamilton for the 150th birthday of my city.

I am not afraid of public reaction to distinct society and veto rights. I am not afraid of people's reaction. The people said very clearly and in great numbers in Montreal that they were prepared to embrace real change. They were prepared to understand that the distinctiveness of Quebec forms an important part of the heart and soul of Canada.

We are not hearing here today the voices of the people. They are the voices of the power brokers and the politicians who want to carve Canada into little pieces. The Bloc has an agenda. It wants Quebec without Canada. The Reform clearly wants a Canada without Quebec. Will regional expressions of difference, of making us smaller, of cutting us into little pieces, giving a little power to a politician here and taking a little power away there solve our problem? I know what will solve our problem.

• (1120)

[Translation]

What will solve our problem is the linguistic heritage we got from French speaking Canadians, if we prove able to meet new challenges thanks to the generosity and historical background of our country.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry to interrupt but the minister's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Madam Speaker, today, I can understand the emotion the minister is feeling as she comes to realize how little she can do to change the situation for which her government is responsible.

She also realizes that what she is offering on behalf of her government, because she is part of that government, means almost nothing to the people of Quebec. What I want to tell the tearful minister we saw today is that she should have shed her tears when her leader, the current Prime Minister of Canada, killed the Meech Lake agreement. That is when she should have shed tears.

She should also have cried when the Prime Minister of Canada—who was only the leader of her party at the time—skulked around and tried to influence the Charlottetown accord negotiations. She should have shed tears then to try to convince him to listen more closely to what Quebec was saying.

She should also have shed tears these last two years every time her government held a caucus meeting to say no to Quebec and to the historical demands of our province. That is what she should have done.

Today, her tears come a little too late, and she has only herself and her own government to blame. I think the Leader of the Opposition made it clear yesterday and again today that we can expect nothing new from English Canada. We can expect nothing new from the other side because, besides paying lip service and telling us: "We love you, Quebec", they have come up empty–handed.

So, please, let us have a little less fuss and a little less show of emotion here. Let us try to remain clear–headed in our remarks and our approach in this House and have a very civilized debate, which is what we, in the Bloc Quebecois, intend to do.

Ms. Copps: Madam Speaker, I was there for Meech Lake. I voted for Meech Lake. I worked hard for Meech Lake to pass, but someone jumped ship before it did.

I am clearly not a dear friend nor a real chum of Brian Mulroney's. But the one who stabbed him in the back by jumping ship one month before the end of Meech was the Leader of the Opposition.

When he was needed and the pressure came on, Mr. Bouchard left. I was there till the end to support Meech Lake. The one who was not there, the one who resigned and did not have the guts to speak directly to his real chum, his dear friend Brian Mulroney, that one was Lucien Bouchard. An if you are looking for one who did that, I am not the one—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The time has now expired. We should refer to members by their official titles.

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: Madam Speaker, I was there till the end. I know how hard it was. But one thing is sure with the Leader of the Opposition and that is that every time life becomes harsh, he takes off. He left the federal cabinet one month before Meech failed, without even having the decency to speak directly to Prime Minister Brian Mulroney because the pressure had become too much for him.

Mr. Bellehumeur: That is not true. He resigned after Meech Lake.

Ms. Copps: It is true. Pardon me but he resigned one month before the Meech Lake failure. To refer to history, you have to at least know it. I know it, I lived through it, I was here and the one who jumped ship before the end was Lucien Bouchard.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the veto seems to be falling back on the old premise that Quebec supports the concept of two founding nations.

Would the hon. member who just gave such a heart rending emotional speech care to comment on the La Presse Gallup poll released this morning? It stated that 42 per cent of Quebecers polled support the 10 equal provinces scenario while only 37 per cent polled actually believe in two founding nations. The government clings to an outdated way of thinking.

Ms. Copps: Madam Speaker, I tried to point out that if we are to build a future as a country we have to understand our past. We have a country that is generous. It is known around the world as being unique. We have a country where one–third of Canadians claim neither English nor French as the mother tongue. I am very proud in the riding of Hamilton East to represent them in Parliament. Why do we have this generosity of spirit?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order. The time has expired.

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am happy to rise in support of Bill C–110. If there is one overriding purpose here it is to put an end to the 30–years war.

For the last 30–35 years since the quiet revolution in Quebec the best minds in Quebec and in Ottawa have been preoccupied with a constitutional debate. It is good fun. It has brought forth an army of special constitutional carpetbaggers and others, highly paid professional lawyers, professors who are available to give opinions on either side, open line talk show hosts and journalists who have grown up in one profession. They will all be sorry to see it go but it must end.

There are more important problems today. Those are the economic problems that face us all of creating jobs, unemployment, and promoting economic growth.

Even within the narrow area of government and public administration the excessive preoccupation with a Quebec problem too narrowly defined has been at the expense of examining rationalization and modernization of the constitutional governmental system. It is time to move on. What we can call the Chrétien package is an attempt to do that on a basis which the country will accept.

It does have the two elements, the distinct society and what perhaps incorrectly has been called the constitutional veto. I was not part of the committee that drafted it, but in an open caucus where all ideas were put forward I brought together ideas that reflect those of my own constituents and the people in British Columbia who want one Canada and want Quebec to be part of it.

If distinct society is defined it should restate what historically is a matter of faith but also law, has been accepted by Canadians and is reflected in those great constitutional international acts of 1759, 1763, 1774 and onward. In so far as changes are made, they should not be formal constitutional amendments and thus be a roadblock to constitutional change in the future. That has been done. These matters are recorded in acts of Parliament and in accordance with the sovereignty of Parliament. Within the constitutional limits established by the Constitution they are capable of being re–examined and changed by ordinary legislation.

• (1130)

In a certain sense these are yesterday's problems. The attempt is honourably to dispose of them and to move on to the new problems, to get away from this excessive preoccupation of the last 35 years that at some times seems to occupy 85 per cent or 90 per cent of the time in Ottawa and Quebec City. That is much too much.

Since Bill C–110 is directed to the issue of constitutional change and its process, the issue of how do constitutions change has been raised. We have to recognize honestly that the constitutional amendment of 1982, chapter V, is a réforme manquée. It was an attempt to make a change, but it was not made.

Under the old conventional system that ultimately turned on an act of the British Parliament passed at the request of Canada, the Constitution had a large degree of flexibility. Today it is rigid, virtually impossible to change. In fact the only two measures put forward in the last 13 years, Meech and Charlottetown, have both failed.

So we do face the paradox that we have a rigid constitutional system and indeed any attention to this in a certain sense borders on being frustrated in the future.

Constitutions are living documents. If they are not, they fail. Constitutions do change. Large masses of our constitutional law change by constitutional convention and custom.

I would have said that the role of the Senate as a non–elected body conventionally follows that of the House of Lords. If you do not have the legitimacy of election, you do not interfere with legislation that is passed by a democratically elected lower house. I notice the Senate has been avoiding this in recent days. We may perhaps have to remind it of this.

I simply point out that constitutional conventions through executive glosses is one way of changing a constitution. Constitutions change by judicial legislation. In 1982 I and others suggested to Prime Minister Trudeau that we consider a constitutional court, as they now have virtually throughout Europe in this post–communist reform and in Germany and other countries. Even so, the constitution changes through judicial interpretation.

Lastly, a constitution changes through the exercise of constituent power. Ultimately, all constitutional power comes from the people. It is quite clear that the country has the capacity to renew itself through an act of total revision at some time. It is not defined in the Constitution, but it is the ultimate source of power.

For those who worry too much, and I think unnecessarily, on reading this law and ask if we have put ourselves into a second constitutional strait–jacket after the 1982 amendments, the answer is no. I believe this generation of Canadians and British Columbians, many of whom I have taught, the many hundreds of thousands who have communicated their desire for one Canada, all have a rendezvous with the Constitution Act, if not this year then certainly by the end of the century. I think the new plural society we are getting in Canada today makes us a very unique country, a very distinct country in relation to the rest of the world. Multiculturalism is a living example of co–operation. I think we will find people will sit down and ask for a new constitutional charter, but not now. These people still have to be integrated in the political process. But it is occurring, and it is occurring before our eyes.

In the meantime, the government is committed to pressing for constitutional change in other areas, using the fact that by executive example and discussion and negotiation—friendly relations and co–operative federalism—the system can be changed. Transfer of power, not in an abstract sense, with those battles of the 1960s and 1970s before the courts, but identifying common problems all three levels of government need to work on together, is what the government is focusing on.

We have seen this in the third element in the Chrétien package that has been brought forward. It is going to occur in many more areas, such as in the electoral system and actions on the Senate, which may require going to the Supreme Court. We cannot do it through the 1982 amending procedure. There is the role of the cities. We are responding to the new transnational societies of which Canada is a part. This is key to the 21st century. All these things are going on.

• (1135)

The Prime Minister has responded to the Quebec referendum vote in a way that can rally enough support throughout Canada. It has to be an all–Canadian response. However, constitutional change will go on. We will see more and more emphasis on co–operative federalism, change through give and take and discussion at all levels of government. Federalism, if it involves power sharing and common decision making, also recognizes that federalism is more, as Prime Minister Trudeau once reminded us, than a collection of shopping centres. There is a national role, national norms.

That is the challenge. The message is let us move on and bring peace to the Thirty Years War. Let us move on to the real economic and social problems. If we get that message, frankly, we have done honour to those who voted in the Quebec referendum on both sides and we have done something the people of Canada will understand and support.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I congratulate my colleague on a very eloquent speech.

I had a chance to travel abroad on a trade mission and I met with many government officials in different countries. The first thing they asked me about was what is happening in Canada.

Canadians, including those in the province of Quebec, have to look at Canada from the outside. We have to leave the country for a while in order to appreciate what we have in Canada.

On an annual basis, in excess of ten million residents of other countries want to come to Canada. They believe, as do I, that this is the finest country on earth.

It is beyond me why my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois will not consider what the government is proposing and try to make it work. Give us a chance to make it work. That is the hope of many of the people in my constituency who have written to me or called my office. They have asked me to stand in the House to call on my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois to make an attempt to make this work.

I want to ask my fellow caucus member if he has heard from his constituents who have come from different parts of the world. Have some of those people shared their feelings about their love for Canada? If they have, I would like him to share that with the House.

Mr. McWhinney: Madam Speaker, I am happy to respond to my colleague, who is one of the most thoughtful members of our party and very much dedicated to the building of a new pluralistic Canada. We are a community of communities, in the sense Martin Buber offered. The interesting thing is that this society works. People are co–operating. People are working together. We are integrating the new communities into the political processes.

I told the Prime Minister the other day that British Columbia is the most distinct society of all because we have more national communities integrated into the political processes and working together. The message British Columbians are sending is that this country can function as a plural society. It is doing it already.

One understands the distinctiveness of the French language and French culture in Quebec. We are prepared to respect that. However, we ask for similar respect for our distinctiveness, our culture, and the recognition that the larger Canada brings together all these elements into a new national outlook.

I believe the reason the Prime Minister is receiving these messages from all around the world is because we have succeeded. This is not Bosnia–Herzegovina. I could name many countries around the world where nationalism exists in an intransigent sense. We have found the formula, and that is the message we are trying to carry in our approach to constitutional governmental change, change in the federal system in the balance of our term.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask something of the member for Vancouver Quadra. In law, as you know, we often say that the greater includes the lesser. However, in the bill tabled this morning, it seems that they are saying that the lesser includes the greater.

I am totally confused. We rejected a lot more in the Meech Lake accord, but they are now saying that, in this proposal, they are responding to the wishes of Quebecers who voted no. Yesterday, they talked about the notion of distinct society in an insipid and dull declaration, just like we do with motions dealing with the national scouts week. Yesterday's motion had a similar effect. Today, a bill was tabled and I would like to ask the member how he can expect that we will accept something that we have already rejected in 1992, which was a lot more than this?

Mr. McWhinney: Madam Speaker, I would to say to the hon. member that I worked as constitutional advisor to many Quebec premiers. I was a member of the commission on French language and language rights in Quebec. For my part, I always believed in the tremendous potential and flexibility of the federal system, which can decide that bills such as premier Bourassa's Bill 22 and even Bill 101 can still be essential parts of the Government of Quebec as well as of our Canadian federal system.

The message in all of this is that the existing flexibility of our constitutional system will stay. We must have faith in the future. We are ready to give Quebec what we can under the existing Constitution, which is very flexible.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Madam Speaker, here is a perfect example of why the Bloc Quebecois has its place in Ottawa. We are here to face a government that is constantly insulting the intelligence of Quebecers. It is with great reluctance that we are debating Bill C–110, which will go down in history as the last insult the federal government inflicted upon Quebecers.

Bill C–110 proposes a formula to amend the Constitution of Canada. It is simply a federal statute with all that it entails. It does not change in any way the amending formula since the procedures for amending the Constitution of Canada can be modified only through the procedure set out in section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982. I will come back to this later on.

This bill does nothing but restrict the federal government's discretionary power to propose resolutions authorizing constitutional amendments. All in all, the federal government, being generous as it is, is lending to the provinces its constitutional veto. This bill brought forward by the Prime Minister and his associate, the Minister of Justice, adds to the numerous amending formulas already provided for in the Constitution Act, 1982.

It will take a Ph. D. in constitutional law to be able to understand all that. Let us take a look, if we may, at the amending formulas already provided for in the Constitution of Canada. Four legal procedures for amending the Constitution are set out in sections 38 to 44, Part V, of the Constitution Act, 1982. The most demanding formula applies only to fundamental changes to the Constitution.

Amendments in this category must be authorized by resolutions of the Parliament of Canada and of the legislative assembly of each province. That is what we call the unanimity formula. There is also another amending procedure for changes in the distribution of legislative powers between the federal Parliament and the provincial legislative assemblies.

• (1145)

It is the same procedure that must be followed to amend most of the provisions of the charter of rights and freedoms.

The changes must be approved by Parliament and at least two–thirds of the provinces that have combined populations of at least 50 per cent of the population of all the provinces. This is what we call the seven and fifty amending formula. It provides that major amendments could be made to the Constitution without Quebec's consent, because if Ontario were among the seven consenting provinces, the population requirement would be met.

The third formula relates to amendments concerning one or more provinces. They include changes to provincial boundaries and the use of English and French within a province.

The fourth procedure is found in section 44 of the Constitutional Act, 1982. It concerns changes to the executive branch of the Canadian government, the Senate or the House of Commons.

Now the Minister of Justice is proposing a fifth amending procedure. In the future, one will have to be very clever to be able to amend the Constitution.

Not only is the bill introduced by the Minister of Justice an insult to Quebecers, it is the deathblow to the Constitution.

The minister insults us by pretending to be following up on the promises made by the Prime Minister during the referendum campaign. He takes us for turkeys and is trying to shove his right of veto down our throats. He is debasing the concept and letting four regions of Canada use the federal's right to veto.

If anyone in this House believes that Bill C–110 does more than simply lend something from the federal to the provinces, he or she is sadly mistaken.

Not satisfied with adding to the constitutional jumble, the minister is strutting around saying he has a new formula for us. But it is a rehash, a déjà vu.

What the minister is serving up is a diluted version of the 1971 Victoria formula spiced to the taste of the day. Federal mandarins have not waited long before showing their true colours. The only solution found by this hypocritical government was to brush away the cobwebs from the Victoria formula of 1971 and take the right of veto out of it. A new and improved formula. What nonsense.

When the Prime Minister, through the Minister of Justice, introduces a bill proposing a regional right of veto and a motion dealing with the distinctiveness of Quebec, he adds insult to injury. He could not care less about Quebecers.

Neither the present Prime Minister nor his successors will be legally bound by the amending formula. If, God forbid, it should become a law this formula would be an ordinary act like any other act and it could be repealed any time by the federal government.

But how can we debate something we do not want to talk about any more? The Victoria formula was one of countless negotiations on constitutional reform. Those negotiations have been held ad nauseam but to no avail, except perhaps to deprive Quebec of the means it needs to develop itself in the Canadian federation.

Efforts to corner Quebec have been such that the province is stifled and can only survive by acceding to sovereignty. The justice minister is wasting his time and ours. Do you believe that after all the affronts it has been subjected to, Quebec is going to accept such a proposal? I remember. Like all Quebecers, «Je me souviens.»

Let us remember the so–called Saint–Laurent amendment of 1949, the 1960 Fulton formula, the 1964 Fulton–Favreau formula, Quebec's refusal of the Fulton–Favreau formula, the 1971 Victoria formula, the attempts by Pierre Elliot Trudeau in 1976, the 1978 and 1979 conferences, the Pepin–Robarts formula, the conference of September 1980, the patriation project of October 2, 1980, the infamous patriation of the Constitution in 1982, the 1987 Meech Lake Agreement, Meech II and its defeat in 1990, the Charlottetown accord and its defeat in 1992.

We will remember those 35 years of constitutional setbacks. The most recent affront sustained by Quebec is one too many. The Prime Minister of Canada, through his Minister of Justice, is today signing the death warrant of any possible constitutional reform.

The Prime Minister is swaggering about and boasting about his empty proposals. He has a short memory. He should play the recording of the address he made to the nation four days before the referendum of October 30.

I will never forget the sight of a desperate Prime Minister who did not have a clue about what promises to make next in order to win votes. A contrite and humble man.

Many believed in this Greek tragedy. Many fell for it and believed the Prime Minister's promise to make changes. Today, the Prime Minister is patting himself on the back, but there is nothing to be proud of. Bill C–110 is a big bubble that is bound to pop sooner or later. Everything has its limits.

The real purpose of the Prime Minister is to muzzle Quebec by stopping any future constitutional change. His right of veto is nothing but an illusion aimed at drowning Quebec in the Canadian sea. One people from coast to coast, with a wall to wall nationality.

This bill is a rehash of the 1971 Victoria proposal. In an article entitled "Modifying the Constitution or mummifying Quebec", in Le Devoir of May 15, 1971, Jacques–Yvan Morin had this to say about the Victoria formula: "You do not have to be a rocket scientist or even a sociopolitical expert to see what insurmountable problems Quebec will experience as soon as it tries to gain some significant change. Not that the amending formula is bad in itself—it would be perfectly acceptable in a homogeneous English state—but it does not take into account Quebec's aspirations or rather, it does, but to quash them".

I go on with the quote: "All in all, the anglophone provinces and the federal power are telling Quebec it can seek more powers and make as many major plans as it wishes, but it is only through them that it will achieve these goals. The new formula is the antithesis of the peoples' right to self determination. Under a benevolent exterior, federalism is in fact hiding dregs of colonialism".

Although this was written 24 years ago, it is surprisingly contemporary. This is to say that the federal government has not progressed that much since then. It is still intent on mummifying Quebec. Between the Victoria formula and the Meech Lake Accord, Quebec was taken for quite a constitutional ride in 1982.

As we remember, in 1980 Pierre Elliott Trudeau, the then Prime Minister, and Jean Chrétien, his trusted lieutenant, had solemnly sworn to renew the Constitution, taking into account Quebec's interests. The Constitution forced on Quebecers in 1982 decreases Quebec's fields of exclusive jurisdiction. Moreover, Ottawa gave itself authority to amend the Constitution without Quebec's agreement. Quebec's right of veto disappeared. As a result, Quebec has had no say on constitutional amendments likely to change its political future.

The unilateral patriation of the Constitution substantially reduced Quebec's legislative powers in matters of education and language. Since the patriation of the Constitution in 1982, the federal government has had a field day. It has continually intruded on matters under Quebec's jurisdiction, especially regional development, manpower training, cable television and several cultural areas.

• (1155)

Then the whole constitutional process got bogged down at Meech Lake.

When we talk about Meech Lake, we talk about the accord signed in June 1987 by the eleven first ministers of Canada. It was aimed at reintegrating Quebec into the Constitution "with honour and enthusiasm". There again, the results reflected the ill will of the federal government and of the English provinces.

Quebec had offered to sign the Canadian Constitution provided five minimum conditions were granted. Namely, distinct society status for Quebec; more power in matters of immigration; limiting federal spending power in Quebec's fields of jurisdiction; Quebec's participation in the appointment of judges to the Supreme Court of Canada; and finally, the right to veto constitutional amendments.

In June 1990 New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Manitoba reneged on their signature, thereby sinking the accord. Despite last minute negotiations at the premier level, Manitoba and Newfoundland refused to ratify the accord.

The day after its failure, the Prime Minister, who is now pushing a bill which is not worth the paper it is written on, embraced one of the most vociferous opponent to Meech, the Premier of Newfoundland, Clyde Wells. A Canadian version of Judas' kiss. I remember quite well, Madam Speaker.

The failure of the Meech Lake Accord, which was to be the answer to the basic requirements of Quebec and bring the province back into the constitutional bosom with honour and enthusiasm, definitely proved that Canada refuses to recognize, among other things, the distinct character of Quebec. This week, the Prime Minister went so far as to reduce the distinct character to the level of a simple resolution of the House of Commons, without any legal meaning.

We can certainly congratulate the Prime Minister for his consistency. He remains as sly as ever.

Let us continue our constitutional tour. In August 1992, the Charlottetown Agreement was signed by all representatives of Canada: ten provinces, two territories, four aboriginal organizations and the federal government. It was a "made in Canada" response to Quebec's legitimate requests.

That agreement was a watered down version of Meech Lake and Meech Lake number two. Among other things, it recognized Quebec as a distinct society, accepted the transfer to Quebec of all responsibilities in the cultural area and stated that the federal government would withdraw from municipal affairs, tourism, recreation, housing, mining and forestry.

On October 25, 1992, 57 per cent of Quebecers rejected the Charlottetown accord. They considered, with reason, that the agreement would give them only crumbs. The rest of Canada also turned down that agreement. English–speaking Canadians voted against it because they thought it gave too much to Quebec. Again another striking example of their love for Quebec.

In spite of his commitment to negotiate on a one to one basis with the federal government, Robert Bourassa agreed to negotiate with representatives of nine provinces, two territories, four aboriginal organizations and the federal government. He even approved the agreement which gave Quebec even less than the Meech Lake Accord.

For 35 years now, Quebec's requests for more power in the cultural, social and financial areas have been constantly rejected by the rest of Canada.

Again today, the federal government is laughing at Quebecers with this bill. I say this to the government: the constitutional circus is closed for good; stop acting like clowns.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member spent a lot of time talking about the process and much time lecturing us on the history of the last thirty years.

Like me, millions and millions of Canadians were not here during the last thirty years.

• (1200)

They were not here in 1947, nor in 1911. Millions and millions of Canadians came after that. Like me, these people and the rest of Canada are interested in finding a permanent solution. We are not interested in the process, we are interested in the objective. We want to find a solution which is comfortable for the francophones in Quebec and the anglophones and allophones in the rest of Canada.

Everywhere in the world we see borders being taken down. If you take the example of the European Union, you can see that borders are disappearing fast, even in France.

With the new information technologies there are ever fewer borders between countries all over the world, whether in Asia, in Europe, in Africa or in North America.

I wonder why our colleagues do not stop being so vicious, so idiotic and so indecisive. Why do they not give us a clear picture of what they want? Do we want to build a multicultural, multi–ethnic and multi–community country for all Canadians? Or is the final object the separation of Quebec from the rest of Canada?

Indeed, we are wasting time talking about process and history. I was not here in 1841 and I am not interested in what happened in 1841, in 1857 and in 1911. What I am interested in is a modern country, because Canada is the best in the world. The best country in the world, as we have been told twice by the United Nations.

I ask my colleagues to focus on the real problems of Quebecers; the real problems are the economy, the unemployment rate and the political instability that are affecting many business people who are thinking about investing in Quebec or doing business with Quebec. Thanks to my colleagues from the separatist party in this House, they are saying: we will wait until there is stability.

Let us hurry up. Let us work with the Prime Minister, with the current government, because this government is willing to find a permanent solution to this crisis. The time has come. The time has come to let go of things that happened 2,000 years, 200 years, 20 years, 30 years ago. Let us talk now about the future.

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, I am quite astonished to hear a member of Parliament tell us that he is not interested in the past. I must admit seriously that this is inconceivable, when we know that analyzing the past allows us to avoid making the same mistakes.

Mr. Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): The past is the key to the future.

Mrs. Venne: As my colleague just said, the past is indeed the key to the future.

That someone would have such a vision of society is really astonishing, but I do not want to insist further. I think that he just got carried away.

On the other hand, when he asks us if we intend to build a country, then obviously, we say yes. That is our goal. We want to build a sovereign Quebec, an independent Quebec.

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux–Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have two comments for the hon. member opposite. First, I must point out that the purpose of the European Union is not to eliminate borders, but to preserve its member states' sovereignty while delegating, collectively and sovereignly, some of their powers to a common authority. In other words, the European Union is doing precisely what we intend to do in Canada. It is showing us the way.

• (1205)

My second comment concerns the best country in the world. I have had enough of hearing that Canada is the best country in the world. If Canada is so terrific, it is not because it is a federation. It is because Quebecers and Canadians are active, inventive and energetic people, but it really has nothing to do with being a federation, because many other federations exist where there is no prosperity, Russia, for example.

The system is not what makes us a good country, Canadians and Quebecers do. If the country was split in two, both halves would still have the same qualities, because, when you slice a cake, each slice is as good as the whole cake.

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, I can only commend my colleague for Blainville—Deux–Montagnes for his excellent comments. I totally agree with his words.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely delighted to take part in this debate today.

It is very interesting that I have the opportunity to make my remarks on behalf of the people of Halifax and Nova Scotia in the wake of that impassioned intervention by my hon. colleague from the official opposition. There is no question that this is the best country in the world in which to live. I am not going to argue the whys and wherefores with the hon. member because a universal truth is a universal truth. The universal truth is that Canadians from sea to sea to sea are the most fortunate people on Earth.

I come from what is normally known as a have not part of the country. It is quite true that there are many things that we have not in Nova Scotia. However, one of the things that we have, one of the things we opted for and one of the things we chose was Canadian citizenship. It is something we hold most dearly and most preciously.

It is not merely because we live in Nova Scotia, which I think is the best place in Canada to live, just as I know my hon. colleague, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, thinks that Toronto and its environs is the best place in Canada. I know that my hon. colleague from St. Boniface thinks that Manitoba is the best place to live and my colleague from London thinks that London is the best place. My colleague right over there from Alberta thinks Alberta is the best place to live. We all look at the rest of the country as the setting for our own particular jewels.

I want to speak today to the passion which came from my colleague from the province of Quebec. I understand that passion as I think we all understand it, but that does not need to diminish our Confederation or our country.

On Saturday I attended a meeting back in my riding. I sat next to a prominent Nova Scotia businessman. He raises money for all sorts of good causes, one of them being the Liberal Party. He told me he had been called upon by the premier and the minister of public works to help raise money to ensure that students and seniors who wanted to go to the rally in Montreal were able to go. He said that in over 20 years of being a fundraiser for various charitable causes and various political causes, he had never raised money so quickly. There was such a good response and such an absolute desire on the part of the people he called to contribute and to help because it was for our country.

• (1210)

In my own family, my father's two surviving brothers went to Montreal after World War II and raised their families there. It is very interesting because my cousins in Montreal are a microcosm of Canada. Some of them have Irish last names, some of them have English last names, some of them even have Italian last names, and some of them have French last names.

In my family while we may not be pure laine, we are purely Canadian. My cousins who live in the greater Montreal area will say that they are Quebecois and they are proud Quebecois. They and their children will continue to be proud Quebecois.

The whole point of this debate, the whole point of this resolution is to follow up on a promise made by the Prime Minister on the responses of Canadians right across the country to the fact that Quebec is indeed a distinct and integral part of the Canadian federation, a distinct and integral part of the Canadian identity. We could no more see Quebec leave our federation than we could as individuals cut off an arm or a leg, or lose an eye.

As we debate this here today and in subsequent days, it is terribly important for each of us to listen to each other and to understand that one region of Canada does not seek and never has sought, at least not in modern times, to defeat or humiliate the other side.

That day in Montreal when I saw 150,000 Canadians converge in that square, I knew I was part of something very special. I knew that approximately—numbers are hard to be absolutely sure about—40,000 Canadians came from the other regions of Canada. There were 150,000 people in the downtown core of Montreal. It is clear that a vast majority of the people in that downtown square were Quebecois. They were people who were saying to their fellow Canadians: "We want to stay. We want to hear from you that you understand we are different".

Whether we are from Quebec, Newfoundland or British Columbia, we do understand that there is a distinctiveness and a difference in our fellow citizens in la belle province. We know their language, although that too is shared with francophone Canadians in almost every other province and territory. We know their culture and the incredible richness that is the ongoing Quebecois culture within the Canadian mosiac is something that every Canadian benefits from, not just those within the borders of Quebec itself. We know Quebec's civil code again makes them different and distinct from the rest of us.

Every single one of us celebrates that difference. We celebrate the fact that we can share. We can build a Canada that is a better place, whether one's language is English or French, whether one's ancestral origin is western Europe, eastern Europe, Africa, the Far East, or whether one is an aboriginal Canadian. None of these things matter in the desire to make a better place for our families, our children and our communities. I do not want my friend over there to be upset or to take this the wrong way. What matters is that this country is the best place in the world to live, whether you live in Quebec or Manitoba or Nova Scotia. Yes, we have problems, problems that those of us here in the House must work together to solve.

Most of us in the Chamber have had the opportunity to go elsewhere. We have seen the Russian federation. We have seen countries of the world where people are clamouring to come to Canada, to Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia. We are trying to make them clamour to come to Nova Scotia too. Some day they will find out that is a good place to live as well. They are clamouring to be part of this incredible and unique and crazy idea which is Canada.

I think we all understand the desires for recognition in the hearts and minds of our colleagues from Quebec. We are saying that there are similar desires in different areas for all Canadians. We cannot maintain this incredible and bizarre idea, this federation, this country, by standing back and hurling implications at each other. It cannot be done by being accusatory or by suggesting motives that are less than applicable in these situations. It is done by reaching out to each other the way we reached out in Montreal on that incredible Friday and the way all Canadians, English and French and allophone continue to reach out to each other.

As many have said, this resolution is a step in that direction. It is something that the federal government, the Prime Minister and those on this side of the House sincerely believe is a response to the things the people of Canada asked us to do, including the people of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what the hon. member opposite was saying, and I would like to comment on some aspects of her speech.

For instance, she made a big thing of this reaching out to us by people from western Canada, from Vancouver and Saskatchewan and the other western provinces. I want to tell her I do not question the feelings of love and affection these people showed Quebecers, except that it was made very easy for them. For instance, air fare from Vancouver to Montreal probably costs from $2,000 to $3,000, and these people got their tickets for $150 or $200. Now what if the situation was reversed? If Quebecers wanted to go and visit Vancouver, I am not so sure people would do us a favour and offer us tickets at $150 a piece. One starts to wonder how genuine this love and affection was. It was a great opportunity to visit Montreal on the cheap.

And I also noticed in her speech that she referred to Canada as a wonderful host country for immigrants. I agree, but what difference would it make if Quebec became sovereign? Immigrants who want to go to Vancouver or Halifax, or Saskatchewan or Quebec would still be able to go there.

• (1220)

In our blueprint for a Quebec society, we did not say that if Quebec became sovereign, we would stop immigration. I think the civility and warmth that are typical of Quebecers would make Quebec a very good host country for immigrants. I see no problem there. Why this claim that immigration can only work within this so–called great Canada? I do not understand.

Are you implying that a sovereign Quebec would not be a good host country for its immigrants? Is that what you mean? Is this Canadian federation the one and only panacea? Is it impossible for a sovereign Quebec and English Canada to each find their own way outside this Canadian federation instead of going on as we have done for the past thirty years and wasting time, money and effort, on all this constitutional wrangling?

In Quebec, successive provincial governments from Jean Lesage to Mr. Parizeau have tried time and time again to find ways to stay in Canada, but they never succeeded. Are we going to go on for another thirty years about Meech Lake, Charlottetown and constitutional problems? We are fed up. We want to go on to other things. We have tried everything, but nothing works.

We never managed to reach an understanding. What makes you think that by continuing the constitutional debate between English Canada and Quebec, we would manage to agree? When I consider all the attempts made during the past thirty years, I see no reason to believe that continuing this useless debate will accomplish something positive. Instead of this endless bickering under the same roof, we would be much better off as good neighbours.

Ms. Clancy: That, Mr. Speaker, is unfortunate. I did not say anything about Quebec not welcoming immigrants. The province has a good immigration agreement with the federal government.

[English]

At no time did I suggest that immigrants were not welcome in the province of Quebec. I did make reference to the question of pure laine and by implication to the remarks by Mr. Parizeau. However, I do not by any means attribute those to Quebec and its history of welcoming immigrants.

It was unfortunate my colleague cast the kind of aspersions he did in his opening comments. It is clear that he looks the wrong way. He should have listened to my remarks. Perhaps he is not aware of it, but I am not from western Canada. I do not know what the situation was vis–à–vis the airlines.

I have flown to western Canada many times, to your city, Mr. Speaker, and to cities farther west. If the hon. member is not aware of it, even for $50 to get on a plane and fly from Vancouver or Calgary to Montreal, go to a rally for two hours, get back on a plane and fly back to Calgary or Vancouver is not a joy ride. It is exhausting, tiring and cramped. If it is not done out of love then there are thousands of people in western Canada who possibly need to have their heads examined for doing this.

The hon. member is really reaching when he suggests that people took advantage of cheaper air flights to have a good time in Montreal, not that Montreal is not a city where a wonderful time can be had. But I would suggest that very few people had the opportunity to do that on that Friday. Time schedules were very tight.

Second, as the hon. member heard me mention in my earlier remarks, my good friend, the fundraiser, raised all that money joyfully. People just rushed to contribute. Many people from Nova Scotia came at no cost at all because the money was raised by contributing businesses in Nova Scotia. Again, those people did not have any time to enjoy the benefits of Montreal. They went to speak from their hearts to their love of country and their love of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start my speech by looking at the situation in which we now find ourselves. I think that Canadians, including Quebecers, have a better understanding of the role played by the Prime Minister of Canada and his government. They understood it yesterday and they understand it even better today.

If we look at the current situation, we have on one side the Bloc Quebecois, which wants to separate. They use words like "sovereignty" but we know that it really means separation. No wonder they refuse to even look at this proposal, to review it, to consider the possibilities. No. What they want is their own country, period, no negotiations, no flexibility, no open mind, no nothing.

On the other side—as Canadians can see—is the other extreme. All they have to say about the government's proposals is, "No, no, no, they are giving too much to Quebec and Quebecers". I find this alarming. The two extremes here in this House refuse to make any efforts to consider what the government is proposing.

[English]

I mentioned in the House yesterday that I had checked Maclean's of 1989. In one edition in a specific article the leader of the third party suggested that distinct society had certain possibilities. In fact he stated quite clearly that words were not important if people really wanted to get together and work things out. That is what is said in that article.

All of a sudden, no. Why would he think that in 1989 and have no openness today? It is quite clear. From his perspective and that of his advisers there appears to be an opportunity for his particular party, his particular view of Canada, his particular set of policies. Is it Canada first? Absolutely not. It is the party first and whatever happens to Canada, so be it. I find that most unfortunate.

It is also interesting that the question of the regional veto is also one that the Reform members have supported. They want a regional veto to stop certain amendments. I have found that most interesting.

All of a sudden when we propose a veto that does not make a constitutional change, which would give additional protection to the provinces, which adds and does not take anything away, do you think Reform members would explain it that way? Would they attempt to talk with Canadians and say: "This is not necessarily what we wanted exactly but we have a proposal that is not terribly dissimilar to this?" Of course not. Why not? It is quite simple. Again, it is their political agenda. It is their political party that comes first, not Canada. That is unfortunate.

That is why some people see them as two sides of the same coin; that is, we have one party that clearly states and the other party whose members try everything in order to crush, to deride, to set aside, not to look at openly, the proposals that are being made by the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada.

[Translation]

"we want to separate from Canada, we want our own country".

Their policies hold a lot of contradictions. They suggest that they do not want this regional veto, but they have a regional veto on their books. They want one for B.C. but not for Alberta. The last time I checked they were pretty close in population. I guess that is what they want, I do not know. Perhaps they want one for all of the provinces. Perhaps they do not know what they want.

[Translation]

I now come back to the issue of distinct society. Distinct is defined as including the language, culture and institutions unique to Quebec. I find this quite commendable and acceptable. Like the vast majority of Canadians, if they made an error in judgment, they will soon find out.

• (1230)

What is interesting, as you know, is that we now need unanimity on a number of issues to amend the Constitution. Nothing can be changed without the provinces' unanimous consent on a number of issues, on which I will elaborate later.

There is another clause providing that no changes can be made without the consent of seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the population. This bill deals mainly with the principle that the 7–50 formula cannot be implemented without the support of the four regions. These regions include Ontario, Quebec, western Canada—which means British Columbia and another province—, and the Atlantic provinces. This means two provinces representing 50 per cent of the total population.

What is really frustrating is knowing full well that the Constitution remains unchanged, that a little something extra has been given to everybody, that they already have a proposal in hand fostering this kind of veto and that they feel their party should come first, and the country second.

I would now like to use the little time remaining to answer the most commonly asked questions. "Why not table a constitutional amendment?", our constituents ask. But we know that the leader of the Parti Quebecois, the potential Premier of Quebec, has already made it clear that he does not want any constitutional amendment. That is clear.

The purpose of this bill, on the heels of the Quebec referendum, is to show where the elected representatives of the Canadian people stand on this issue, and we will soon know it. We also know that the Constitution requires that a first ministers' conference on the amending formula for the Constitution of Canada be held by April 1997. Constitutional amendment proposals, if any, will be considered at that time. This bill would in fact bridge the gap until then.

There are other questions.

[English]

For example, what is covered and what sorts of future amendments would be blocked by this bill? The real impact will be on the amendments covered by the same seven and fifty rule, as I have mentioned, changes to the division of powers in favour of the provinces, changes to certain provisions relating to federal institutions, extensions or additions of provinces in some general amendments.

Another question that is frequently asked is how does this bill differ from what is already in the Constitution. This bill does not change the Constitution or the amending formula. They know that, but of course they are not going to say it. It simply indicates how the government will conduct itself with respect to its own veto. It is willing to loan out its veto. That is what it does.

There are significant vetoes already in the Constitution for provinces individually. For example, each province has a veto over matters requiring unanimity, such as the composition of the Supreme Court and the amending formula itself. Each province has a veto over any changes in its boundaries or the constitutional provisions specific to a province.

In addition, there is the right to opt out of amendments transferring provincial jurisdictions to Parliament and to receive reasonable compensation if the amendment pertains to education and other cultural matters. This gives another type of veto to a province.

The bill creates a regional veto, in effect, with respect to changes to national institutions such as the Senate and the Supreme Court, the creation of new provinces, and all amendments that transfer power from Parliament to the provinces.

Another question raised is whether the Constitution already provides provincial vetoes—does the bill provide for any double veto? There are all kinds of amendments whereby provinces already possess such a veto, such as changes to the composition of the Supreme Court or to the boundaries of a province. They are expressly exempted from the operation of the bill. So too are amendments from which provinces can opt out under subsection 38(3), those which derogate from provincial rights and powers expressly exempted through the operation of this bill.

• (1235)

Would the regional veto formula make it more difficult for Quebec to separate? One view of the constitutional amending formula as it stands now, which is a very common view, is that the consent of all provinces would be required for Quebec's separation.

How would the regional veto formula work in practice? This is a particularly important question because it is the very heart and soul of the issue. When at least six provinces, including Ontario and Quebec, two Atlantic provinces with over 50 per cent of the Atlantic population, and two western provinces with over 50 per cent of the western population have indicated their consent by resolution, referendum or government approval, et cetera, the federal government would be free to proceed with resolutions in the Senate and the House of Commons. If one or more of the regions fail to provide their requisite consent, the federal government would not proceed with resolutions, even though seven or more provinces with over 50 per cent of the population had adopted resolutions under the current amending formula to authorize the amendment.

We have talked about the kinds of combinations that would be required for western and Atlantic provinces to get a veto under the regional formula. I want to repeat this because I think it is important. In the Atlantic provinces, Nova Scotia and either New Brunswick or Newfoundland would have a veto. New Brunswick would be in the same position with either Nova Scotia or Newfoundland as would Newfoundland with either of the others. P.E.I. would not have a veto except in combination with two of the other three.

In the west, B.C. with any other province would have a veto. Alberta would have a veto with B.C. but not with either Saskatchewan or Manitoba alone. Saskatchewan and Manitoba together would not have a veto.

[Translation]

It is important to note that we are not dealing with a new veto. The bill indicates only how the existing veto is exercised at the federal level.

I am running out of time. That is unfortunate, because I would have had so much more to say. But I will conclude with, perhaps, one last comment.

As I pointed out at the beginning of my speech, these proposals concerning a distinct society, this bill and the right of veto are all part of an effort to build a better country, a country in which people work together and better understand each other.

The Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the hon. member's time is up. Is there unanimous consent to give the hon. member more time?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I think that our hon. friend from St. Boniface has said enough for now. He will have an opportunity, during questions and comments, to expand on his thoughts concerning the bill before us.

I have a comment for him. Then, I will give him the opportunity to respond to my comment.

I listened very carefully to what our colleague from St. Boniface said. More often than not, in fact I should say usually, he takes things seriously. Having held important functions in Manitoba, he is familiar with the meaning of the words and concepts we are dealing with and he can fully grasp them and deal with them. He must know what this bill we are debating means and how far–reaching it is.

Indeed, I am surprised, to put it mildly, that he is adding so much confusion to the debate. One thing is sure—he said so himself several times in his remarks, both in French and in English—the bill before us does not change anything at all. What we have here is the status quo, no change. If this bill does not change anything, why table it in this House? I will go into this further later today.

You will probably be amazed to hear what has prompted the government to put this bill forward at this point in time. But what I want to emphasize right now is the element of confusion introduced by the hon. member for St. Boniface in his remarks by insisting and suggesting that this bill will actually change something and that a lot noise of noise can now be made around Quebec's new right of veto on any future constitutional change. That is wrong.

At the same time, he says the bill does not change anything, that what we have here is the status quo, that the good people of English Canada, outside Quebec, have nothing to worry about, because there will be no change. Supposedly, all they are doing, the only impact this bill will have will be to give the federal government a new set of rules to go by, under which it will try to determine if the changes it contemplates would garner the support of a number of provinces or certain regions of Quebec and Canada. That is what he is telling us, but basically what he is saying is that there will be no change.

I would personally like the hon. member for St. Boniface to tell us which part of his remarks we are to believe. Which part should we give credence to? The part where he tells Quebecers: "You will have your veto"? Or the one intended for people outside Quebec, which says: "Nothing will change"?

Could the hon. member clarify?

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer the hon. member's question.

It was certainly not my intention to add to the confusion, and I apologize if I did. I thought I was clear when I said that, for example, provinces currently have a veto. All the provinces have a veto over certain issues. I also said that, as regards other issues, the support of seven provinces representing 50 per cent of the country's overall population was required. I added that this bill would be used to see if we could activate that 7–50 formula.

The member who just accused me of adding to the confusion is fully aware of the situation. This is what is annoying and, if it were not also funny, I would really be upset.

The member is the one adding to the confusion, because he claims that what I said is inaccurate. I invite him to check my notes, to look at Hansard and to rise in this House to publicly refute my comments if he thinks they are contradictory. There is no contradiction. It is the constitutional status quo. There is a new mechanism to ensure that some elements of the Constitution are used in a certain way. It is wrong to claim that this will not increase the power of Quebec, Ontario and the other provinces. The member knows that.

I also want to point out that he did not allude to the distinct society concept. I suppose he will again accuse me of adding to the confusion. There is no confusion. We recognize Quebec as a distinct society, because of its language, culture, and unique institutions. There is nothing complicated in that and it is absolutely fair.

If the member is willing to co–operate, I am prepared to do the same and to clarify our terms. It is unfair and wrong to use a term such as English Canada. There is no such thing as an English Canada. We live in a country called Canada, which includes a number of provinces and territories, and the member knows that as well as I do.

In making such a comment, he tries to put in the minds of Quebecers the notion that French is spoken in only one part of the country. I, for one, am proud to speak French. Some people back home, and west of it, speak it better than I do. There are quite a few of them. As the hon. member knows, there is also quite a large number of people in Atlantic Canada who speak French and who are proud to do so.

• (1245)

It is misleading to use the expression English Canada, as the hon. member did, because it is both inaccurate and wrong. I must say that he is not the only one to do so. I would appreciate it if he and his colleagues made a commitment to stop using that expression.

[English]

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the Chair that I will be splitting my time with the hon. member for Vegreville.

As I speak to this unity debate I am very mindful that I represent all of the people of Edmonton Southwest. I represent everyone whether they voted for me or for someone else. It is absolutely essential that members of Parliament remember the fact that we represent every one of our constituents and that all 295 of us in combination represent all of the people of Canada, whether they voted for us or not.

When I go home tonight I will be seeing my brand new granddaughter who I have not seen a lot of because I have spent so much time in the nation's capital in Parliament. Everything I do is directed toward my children and grandchildren. It seems reasonable that we in the House should have our eyes firmly fixed on the future.

The tragedy is that so many people of Canada are represented by members in the House who have their eyes firmly fixed on the past. While we all recognize that the foundation of the future is the past, we cannot live in the past. There is nowhere to go. The past is dead. There is nothing in it for us. If we as a nation continue to live in the past, we are never going to spring into the future which belongs to our children.

Our generation and preceding generations have managed to somehow magically saddle our children and grandchildren with a debt which has been built up over a number of years. In addition to that we have saddled them with a relationship of our constituent parts which has been fractious and has not worked smoothly for all of my adult life.

The rest of the country has tried at various times to coerce or to buy the affection of Quebec through constitutional changes, quasi–constitutional changes, outright money or outright advantage. For instance, to satisfy the people of Quebec the now infamous CF–18 maintenance contract went to Quebec. None of this has worked. Constitutionally, we are still at exactly the same place today as we were 30 years ago.

All the primary protagonists of this debate are from Quebec. Every damned one of them is from Quebec. The Prime Minister is from Quebec. His primary advisers are from Quebec. The leader of the Bloc Quebecois is from Quebec. Obviously all of the Bloc is from Quebec. We have to ask ourselves why the rest of Canadians are being dragged along as helpless spectators as these people go through their never ending Gordian knot they got themselves into. It is almost as if the leader of the Bloc and the Prime Minister both represent the past. They are bound so tightly to the past that they are unable to see the future. They are unable to see how Canada has grown and how Quebec has grown since the silent revolution.

I ask myself, why in the name of God are we trying to satisfy the separatists? Why are we trying to satisfy people who would break up the country at the expense of federalists? What is it in the nature of this debate that causes us to be so shortsighted that we would risk the future of the country, that we would risk the west of the country in order to satisfy separatists in Quebec who will never be satisfied?

It is our responsibility to build for the future, not for the past. Our responsibility is to our children and our grandchildren and to their children, not to our grandparents and our parents. It is to the future, not to the past.

On the record I would like to quote from a book entitled Rights of Man by Thomas Paine, one of the architects of the American constitution. The American constitution has lived for all these hundreds of years because it is flexible, because it is living, because it has room for everybody in its constituent parts to grow. He states in his book:

> It is the living and not the dead that are to be accommodated. When man ceases to be, his power and his wants cease with him; and having no longer any participation in the concerns of this world, he has no longer any authority in directing who shall be its governors, or how its government shall be organized, or how administered.

Members would recognize the corollary of that in which he states: "The vanity and presumption of governing beyond the grave is the most ridiculous and insolent of all tyrannies". What he is saying is that each generation has the right and the responsibility to govern for its time and should no more bind the hands of future generations than our generation should be bound by the past. This then brings into play the whole notion of whether or not a veto is reasonable in a democratic federal state for anyone under any circumstances based on the notion of tying the hands of future generations.

Everybody had a reason to vote against the Charlottetown accord. Mine was that I did not think it was responsible for our generation to tie future generations into a Constitution that would be so inflexible it could not be changed. Is that any legacy to leave to future generations? Do we have that little trust in our children and our grandchildren that we would bind them to a Constitution in cement?

This brings us to part two of the Prime Minister's new amending formula. If we saw our country from outer space or if we came to this country and we saw this as a blank canvas, how would we and what would we do to make it work? Surely in this country which extends over 5,000 miles from one coast to the other with just 30 million people in it, there is elbow room for everyone. Surely we can figure out a way that we can live together in peace and harmony and with mutual respect. Surely this is not an impossible situation.

The suggestions we have brought to the table concerning the amending formula or veto keep in mind that all of us, every single human being in this country and in this world, are equal by virtue of the fact that we are human beings. When we gather under an apple tree or when we gather in a room and we determine what rights we are going to have, we do not do so based on whether we are male or female, whether we speak French or English, or whether we are black or white. We gather together and through commonality we have governance because we are human beings, because it is in our best interests and our common interests.

How would we go about doing this? How would we make our country work if we had a clean slate and we could start from scratch? It seems to me that if one group in our country feels threatened and feels that the only way the group can protect its future is through a constitutional veto that gives it the authority to ensure that nothing in the future without its consent can have impact on the group's language, culture, civil code or the way in which it has evolved as a society, what is wrong with that? It is a recognition of the obvious, that Quebec is a distinct society. Of course Quebec is a distinct society.

How do we go about recognizing that without at the same time suggesting to other Canadians that they are less distinct or somehow not favoured? We do this with an amending formula based on the regions of the country, but most important the ratification is done by the people through referenda, not by the Parliament and not by the legislatures.

The reason for this is very important. Most Parliaments and most legislatures can have a decided majority yet that majority may only have received a minority of the votes cast. This Parliament is one such example. The Liberals have a huge majority of seats with a minority, 43 per cent, of the votes cast.

The only way we can possibly ensure that changes to the Constitution will bear the imprimatur of the people is to ensure that these changes are ratified through a referendum. That is one exceptionally important reason.

The regions are important because they are and have always been homogeneous groups. The region for Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba has always been referred to as the prairies. Everybody knows that. No one has ever described British Columbia as the prairies. British Columbia is growing at a great rate and in one generation will equal the population of Quebec. Alberta is growing more quickly but is balanced by Saskatchewan and Manitoba. It works, and if it works why should we be tied to an amending formula which came from people who woke up from a Rip Van Winkle sleep and said: "Let us just drop the Victoria amending formula on top of this today". That is not the kind of flexibility we require.

The final comments I would like to put on the table today have to do with how we got into this mess in the first place. How did we go about giving legitimacy to this notion of two nations? How did that come to pass?

We have been blessed with some very fine Canadians over the years. One such very fine Canadian was Eugene Forsey. Eugene Forsey was a constitutional scholar. He was recognized by friends and foes alike as one of the paramount constitutional scholars in our country. All his living life he supported the New Democratic Party. In 1961 he left the party because of the notion of two founding nations which it never was; it was one nation from the very beginning.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in a hastily planned and executed press conference the Prime Minister announced the Liberal government's agenda for change.

The package the Prime Minister has put forward is both negative and divisive. He offers Quebec distinct society status which Meech Lake and Charlottetown have demonstrated to be divisive. He is offering the regions of Canada a veto power, which means the ability to stop change instead of the ability to offer change, change which is so badly needed in this country.

The Prime Minister gives the provinces control over manpower training. While this might be a step in the right direction, he chose not to go all the way. He offered the provinces the responsibility but the federal government still controls the purse strings.

• (1300)

Bill C–110 proposes to divide Canada into four regions: the western provinces of B.C., Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba; Ontario; Quebec; and Atlantic Canada. The bill gives the four regions a veto over any constitutional amendment which includes changes to national institutions and the creation of new provinces and amendments regarding the distribution of powers. Currently only the House of Commons holds a veto over most constitutional amendments.

The bill is not a constitutional amendment or even an amending formula. It is simply an unenforceable code of conduct for the federal government. The bill promises the federal government will oppose any constitutional amendment, even one Ottawa puts forward, unless the amendment is consented to by the four regions.

The four regions proposal is a slap in the face to western Canada. If all the west, the netherlands as the Liberal government seems to consider the west, is allocated as one region, obvious problems come forth. If sometime in the future B.C. has a population which exceeds the combination of the population of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta, and that seems very likely, Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan will lose all real power in terms of constitutional change.

First, they lose it to B.C. because if B.C. becomes more populous than the other three provinces together it will have a majority which will carry under Bill C–110.

Second, under the provincial government ratification procedure now in place a change will be able to get the required support of seven provinces without getting the consent of Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba. Clearly the three prairie provinces lose out under this proposal.

Under the legislation if a region refuses consent it vetoes constitutional change. Because the bill is vague Quebec would be able to veto constitutional change through a written statement from the premier, a resolution from the National Assembly of Quebec or a province–wide referendum.

Therefore the bill would provide a veto of any constitutional change the province of Quebec or Ontario did not want. This change gives the current separatist premier of Quebec a veto over any constitutional change. How much sense does that make? I will touch on that subject a little later in my speech.

The bill is not part of the Constitution and therefore the existing amending formula still applies. If the existing formula still applies and we add the new formula, it would not only give central Canada a veto but it might require unanimity.

Bill C–110 would create a system where there are two rounds of provincial ratification with little federal say in constitutional amendments. Under the current system each province has its say. The federal government, presumably acting on behalf of a united Canada, the country as a whole, is a necessary and vital part of the process.

Under the legislation the government proposes to delegate the important responsibility of constitutional change not to Canadians but to provincial legislatures. The provinces will be consulted twice: once under the old amending formula and once by the federal government in determining whether to apply its veto in support of provincial concerns.

The provinces will look after provincial interests and the federal government will ensure that provincial interests are respected. With the federal veto delegated to the provinces, no one will be looking out for a united Canada, Canada as one country, which is what Canada is.

• (1305)

Can the government not see that Canadians deserve more? They deserve carefully thought out proposals made in the open and not behind closed doors and not by a top down centralist government. They deserve forward thinking proposals, not the reheated leftovers of the failed Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords.

In contrast to this negative and certainly divisive approach by the government the Reform Party has offered Canadians a new and better Canada through our new confederation proposal. The proposal includes a plan to modernize and decentralize the federal government by transferring certain powers to the provinces and the people while strengthening other federal powers.

The proposal also includes a plan to renew certain federal institutions. Among the 20 proposals Reform would guarantee provincial control over natural resources, language and culture. Reform would change the federal role with regard to provincially administered social services such as welfare, education and health care. Reform would foster co–operative agreements rather than impose unilateral standards which are enforced by threats to withhold federal funding.

In addition, the proposals would provide for a further decentralization of powers through an overhaul of federal institutions, for example Parliament, the Senate, the Supreme Court of Canada and the Bank of Canada.

These measures would give the power to the people and to the provinces where it is needed. In turn, it would reduce duplication and interference from Ottawa in areas where it is not needed or desired. Canadians have long been concerned about the concentration of too much power in the hands of the federal executive and the cabinet. The proposals give Canadians a new and more accountable system of government for which they have been asking for some time. I believe Canadians want change. They do not want more constitutional wrangling. The proposals can be realized without reopening old constitutional wounds.

The proposals that have been presented demonstrate once again the lack of a democratic approach on the part of the government. We have seen in the past the lack of democracy in legislation, for example Bill C–41 and Bill C–68, the gun control bill, where MPs who dared to vote against the government—

The Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but the hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out regardless, and particularly to bring it to the attention of our viewers today, that this is a historic day for Canadians and for all Quebecers as well, of course.

Yesterday the Prime Minister announced recognition of Quebec as a distinct society. Of course, we spoke about a resolution. Today it was decided that we would speak of a veto right for Quebec, as well as for three other regions of the country, of course.

Quebec has also experienced in recent months, in recent years in fact, a debate which has forced the population to make a choice. And the choice Quebecers made in the referendum on October 30 showed that they want to remain within the Canadian federation.

I count myself among those who acknowledge that discussions were stressful at times and that, unfortunately, the Leader of the Opposition did not hesitate to divide Quebecers.

• (1310)

Several conclusions may be drawn, I believe. What people want is change. But some, Quebecers in particular, want change without a break–up. This is undeniably the conclusion reached from the referendum, its results and the interpretation we have made of them after consulting the pollsters. Very nearly two thirds of Quebecers want the Government of Quebec to reach agreement with the Government of Canada in order to move ahead with change, not only changing the Constitution but also, and above all, addressing economic and job creation issues.

I listened with a great deal of attention and interest to the speech the Leader of the Opposition gave yesterday afternoon in this House. I found it regrettable that the Leader of the Opposition, who has always claimed to be a spokesman of sorts for some of the people of Quebec, does not wish to acknowledge that Quebec is a distinct society and is not prepared to support us, the Government of Canada and the people of Canada, in finally recognizing Quebec as a society that is distinct by virtue of its language, laws and culture. I find it unacceptable that a leader, a member from Quebec like the Leader of the Opposition, will not line up on our side to defend the true interests of the province and of those whom we represent.

For some time now, and today in particular, I have had the impression that a number of opposition members will again put federalism on trial, but will unfortunately not take into consideration the progress Quebec has made within the Canadian federation in the last 130 years.

We are well aware that there are only seven million French speakers in Quebec. I have also learned that there are nearly 800,000 or a million allophones, anglophones and so on, who are, of course full fledged members of Quebec society.

However, within the Canadian federation, despite our constitutional differences over the years—which I have had nothing to do with—we are well aware that the average Quebecer has made incredible gains in contrast with individuals in other societies and other countries, which are less well off than Canada and the people of Quebec.

I believe the Canadian federation has, nevertheless, helped build the bases of our distinct society. We have created a telecommunications network, through all sorts of federal offices, Radio–Canada in the 1930s and the National Film Board. We nevertheless allowed Quebec to look after cultural matters and especially to sign agreements not only with other provinces, but even with foreign countries in order to strengthen and guarantee French where I come from, that is, in Quebec. With the close co–operation of the Canadian government, we have assured the influence of the francophone culture not only within Quebec, but elsewhere in the country as well.

We must not forget that francophones may be found in other regions of the country. I am back from a business trip to western Canada. I met francophones in Alberta and in Manitoba. The communities there are dynamic. They depend a lot on the presence of the federal government and on good relations with other communities, including the anglophone community.

I find it unfortunate that, during the referendum, there was an effort to exclude and isolate the French fact outside Quebec.

• (1315)

You know, there is close to one million francophones outside Quebec. Close to 450,000 young anglophones are in French immersion. I believe that this presence was intentionally minimized by the opposition for purely symbolic reasons, but mostly for political expediency.

I believe it is important to tell Quebecers that we are not the only ones, that there are other francophones in Canada. As a matter of fact, we had the privilege to hear one of those, a member from Manitoba, speak in this House, in both official languages, of course. I often have the opportunity to listen to members either from Ontario or New Brunswick. I find it remarkable that, in this country, and especially in this House, there is an increasing number of members, not only anglophones but people of Italian descent or of other ancestries—we have members from all over the world, I believe—who speak French fluently.

If we look at Canada today, especially the make–up of this House of Commons, particularly on this side, it is obvious that bilingualism has allowed French to gain ground across Canada, which is an important breakthrough. I got a note telling me not to hesitate to speak about francophones, indeed, encouraging me to do so.

I noticed, during the referendum campaign and increasingly in the media, that Quebecers have come to one important conclusion. Increasingly, they have come to recognize the presence of francophones outside Quebec, who have a very significant role to play. I admit that I am digressing, but I wanted to show that Quebecers are not the only francophones in Canada. We must support and work in close co–operation with those who are promoting French throughout the country.

I truly believe that, with the help not only of the people of Quebec, but also of people outside Quebec, we are finally going to recognize Quebec as a distinct society. With this in mind, we are inviting the Leader of the Opposition to support us. It is very important, not only for Quebecers, but for francophones outside Quebec, who, from now on, can rely—and why should they not—on the Quebec government taking an active part in the Canadian federation. This is what we are seeking.

I believe that Quebecers, and Canadians as a whole, are sick and tired of constitutional debates, but I believe that we must seize this opportunity to recognize Quebec for what it is and, of course, Mr. Speaker, before you rise—

The Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, dear colleague, your time has expired.

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to give the member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine the opportunity to finish his speech, since I realized from his reaction that he wished to have a few more minutes. So, the fact that we are now moving into comments will certainly allow him to continue.

However, I would like to make a few remarks concerning his speech because, as he rightly mentioned, what the member tried to do during the few minutes that he spoke was to tell us how English Canada—even though our colleague from St. Boniface does not want us to use that expression—loves us and how it recognizes the importance of the French fact, since he emphasized that several Canadians are now taking French courses, which is a fact and a good thing.

It is also well known that Quebec is where we find the greatest number of people who can speak both languages, French and English. On an individual basis, everybody recognizes the importance of speaking both French and English. I will add that, in Europe, it is not two languages that most people speak, but three, four and even more, and sometimes very complicated languages, much more complicated than French and English.

Having said that, and with all due respect for our colleagues opposite, that does not solve in any way the political situation in Canada. That does not solve the political and constitutional problem that that federalists have been struggling with for many decades, and trying to solve in all kinds of ways. It is important to point this out because, every time government members stand up in this House, they tell us that it is the separatists who are preventing constitutional changes. At the present time, that is the only argument that they are using to say that, unfortunately, they cannot change the Constitution. The Prime Minister, almost with tears in his eyes, as well as the Deputy Prime Minister, with her crocodile tears, tell us: we cannot bring about constitutional changes. The Leader of the Opposition, who will become Quebec's Premier, said right away that he did not want any changes.

That is the whole debate in a nutshell. Even though I recognize the facts raised by the member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine concerning the importance of the French aspect, I wish that he would speak a little more substantively about the bill itself.

Mr. Gagnon: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member opposite for his openness and his generosity and I hope other members will follow suit.

There is no doubt that, in all this, Canada has been able to follow a peaceful approach where other countries have resorted to violence. What I find extraordinary in our country is the fact that it is because we have a flexible system that we are always in the middle of some negotiations.

Unfortunately, things are different in France and even in the United States. When it is time to make changes, to move on as a society, these countries are unfortunately stuck with constitutions which often are inflexible and very difficult to change, especially if the changes are to reflect the reality we face at the turn of the century.

The previous speaker just said again what all Quebecers know already, which is that the Leader of the Opposition, once he becomes Premier of Quebec, will reject every constitutional agreement with Canada. One thing is clear: his only objective is the separation of Quebec, the end of Canada.

One of the highlights of the last century has been, of course, a true political and economic feat, which will endure only if we can rely on the support of the opposition and the Leader of the Opposition and next Premier of Quebec, in order to recognize Quebec as a distinct society and to recognize its veto within the Canadian federation.

[English]

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in the House today to speak on a subject that is near and dear to my heart. However, I would like to take it in a slightly different direction and speak of my own riding.

My riding is at the head of Lake Ontario, near Hamilton. It is probably as anglophone a part of the country as we could possibly hope to get. Yet the first European who set foot in my riding was René Robert Cavelier de La Salle. He came there in 1682. He came by canoe through Hamilton harbour, climbed the escarpment by a stream and visited an Indian village near the present town of Waterdown.

• (1325)

Around my riding there are signs everywhere, vestiges of French explorers. Just two miles from my village there is a creek called Fairchild Creek. This is a reflection of the coureurs de bois who explored the Grand River and its tributaries in the 17th century.

La Salle was exceptional. I do not wonder that my Bloc colleagues are very proud of their heritage when we think of this man who in 1682 came to the Hamilton area and then for the next 10 years explored everywhere around southern Ontario. He was searching for the Ohio River, which he believed would lead to the orient. In doing so, he was the first man to build a ship for the fur trade on Lake Erie at Niagara Falls. He also became a great entrepreneur in the fur trade at Kingston, which at that time was Fort Frontenac.

I say this to point out that the early people of New France represented the most fantastic spirit of adventure we could wish to find anywhere in the world.

What of myself as an anglophone? I can parallel that. On my mother's side of the family there were United Empire Loyalists. They settled in the United States in the 17th century and after the American revolution came to my area, the same area La Salle explored, to settle when they fled the Americans. Here we have a situation of my ancestors, like the ancestors of my Bloc Quebecois colleagues and my Quebec colleagues, who have this wonderful spirit of adventure.

I could look at my own father. My father came over to the country in 1924, leaving England at the age of 17. Again we have this sense that we share. Whether we are French or English speaking, we share this very Canadian sense of adventure, the sense of reaching out and trying brave new things to do.

When I was a young man I tried to cross the Sahara Desert to visit Timbuktu. As I crossed the Mediterranean I met another young man. We recognized one another because of our passports. He was another young Canadian from Quebec who was on the same type of adventure I was. There we were, doing what I think is one of the things that unite us as a people, whether we speak English or French, a people who have a true spirit of adventure.

Mr. Speaker, if you travelled the world now you would find young Canadians, both French and English speaking, in every corner of the globe on similar missions of adventure.

I mention this because separatism, the movement we see today to withdraw Quebec from Confederation, is not in the best tradition of our ancestors. It is a defensive reaction. It is building walls. Separatism today is fear rather than bravery. That is a great shame. What has made this country the richest nation in the world and the greatest trading nation in the world, whether we speak English or French, is our spirit of adventure we have inherited from all our ancestors.

To return to my history lesson, La Salle did not find the Ohio River. A decade later, after running around in southern Ontario and making a killing on the fur trade, he crossed over to the Mississippi River and explored the entire length of the Mississippi. He arrived there in 1682 and claimed the entire territory for France. Thus, Louisiana was born.

Louisiana became a far richer colony of France than Quebec. It was on the edge of the Caribbean. In those days the resources were much richer in that region than they were in the frozen north. What happened to Louisiana? In 1803 Napoleon sold it to the Americans. The Americans did not move in and change Louisiana into an English speaking state. They were totally laissez–faire about the situation. Louisiana was left alone with its language and culture. However then, as today, there was an enormous economic boom in North America. The west was opening up, the Mississippi was opening up and there were entrepreneurs everywhere.

The net effect of the freedom that Louisiana had as a state of the United States, rather than the protection it had when it was a French colony, was that within a century it lost most of its French culture. The French language was replaced by English. Now this former French colony, which was bigger than Quebec, is merely a shadow of its French self.

That is the kind of danger that is presented by the prospect of Quebec's separation today. The reason Quebec still exists, perhaps some of my Bloc colleagues will not agree with this vision of history, is that there were accommodations reached between Britain and Quebec right at the beginning, right after the conquest. This spirit of accommodation has been a characteristic of Canadian society ever since.

The other thing that makes all of us Canadian is that for centuries we have had to accommodate our differences. Our most fundamental difference was language, and not just in Quebec, but in northern Ontario and Acadia. Nevertheless, that is what has sustained Quebec all those years.

We now come to Bill C–110 and the distinct society resolution. I feel these two things are very important moves. There is the spirit for separation in Quebec which has always been with us and will always be with us. There is nothing wrong with that but right now there has been a resurgence. There are more people in Quebec now than ever before who are afraid of losing their language and culture. We in the rest of Canada cannot afford to see that happen because so long as Quebec retains its language, its culture and its traditions, then the rest of Canada has to accommodate and make room for something that is an essential difference.

It makes us a society that is truly tolerant and truly generous. That is why the rest of the world sees us as the best country in the world in which to live. It is not because we speak English, not because we speak French, but because we tolerate one another and we have a spirit of generosity that goes back through the centuries.

I hope the people in Quebec are listening to this and understand that the movement toward separation is a movement that will hurt us all. It will hurt those who speak English as well as those who speak French.

Debate is good. It is always good for us to come to Parliament or anywhere in the country, examine our differences and come to understand one another once again. However, separation is not the answer. The movement with respect to Bill C–110 and the distinct society resolution are a form of reassurance from all the people of Canada that we need to stay together and respect one another.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the speech made by my colleague opposite.

First, I would like to tell him that for us, Quebecers, sovereignty does not mean establishing borders or putting up walls between us and the rest of the world. Quite the contrary. I think Quebec sovereignists have shown, through the kind of partnership they have proposed to the rest of Canada, that they are open, that they want to sit down and talk, that they want a change at this point in their history.

• (1335)

So I hope the member has understood that also. In his speech, he talked about other places in the world where there are francophones. Louisiana in one of them. We know that Napoleon sold Louisiana to the Americans and that the small community living there at that time decided to let itself be assimilated.

Today, the French culture in Louisiana is nothing but folklore. There are still some people who speak French, but they are very few. It must be understood that these people were assimilated because they were in the United States of America, where English is the only official language. We do not want this to happen to Quebecers.

What we want is to control the economic and political instruments that will allow Quebec to grow and to secure its future. We will have to start all over again, to explain, as the member said, that sovereignty is something that will not die. But I want to tell the member that the sovereignty of Quebecers and of Quebec is something positive, something dynamic.

It is a movement that is leading us into the third millennium in a positive way. A people who decides to take control of its own destiny, that is just fantastic. I remember the night of the referendum when Claude Ryan, former leader of the Quebec Liberal Party, said: "The rest of Canada will have to recognize Quebec as a distinct people in the Canadian Constitution". Today, what we are being offered is a motion of the House that is valid only if it is supported by the majority. So I think what we are discussing today is entirely different from the offer Quebec would like to see.

We are not afraid of losing our language and our culture, and sovereignty which, as I said earlier, is a positive thing, is the reason why we are not afraid. However, we must go about this intelligently. We must have the means to ensure our survival, and we will have them in a sovereign Quebec. As I said yesterday here in the House, when the Canadian Confederation was established, an understanding was reached. Today, more than 125 years later, it is time the rest of Canada realized that we are talking about the future and the very survival of this Canadian territory.

So I would like the hon. member to comment and try to understand the position of Quebecers, which is very positive.

[English]

Mr. Bryden: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague. Sovereignty, as he describes it, and separatism look inward. He has to admit the separatist movement is building walls around Quebec.

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): You see the walls. We do not see them.

Mr. Bryden: There are walls and the rest of the world sees them as walls. I tell the hon. member that those walls will be broken down without the protection of Canada.

That is what happened in Louisiana. Economic forces, business forces and global forces destroyed the French culture in Louisiana. The same will happen to Quebec unless Quebec has the rest of Canada and the faith of anglophones like me who believe we share a tradition. We are generous with one another.

If Quebec rejects the rest of Canada, including other people in Canada who speak French—

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): That is not true.

Mr. Bryden: Oh yes, it will be the end.

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): C'est complètement faux ce qu'il dit là.

Mr. Bryden: The lesson my hon. colleague should appreciate is the lesson of Louisiana.

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): Ça, c'est au siècle passé.

Mr. Bryden: It happened in Louisiana in about 60 years and Louisiana had state rights. It was a loose federation, far looser in the United States at that time than Canada today. Louisiana's culture disappeared under the pressure of economic and business forces within about 60 years.

• (1340)

Were Quebec to separate and not have the genuine partnership that exists in the Canadian Confederation today, especially with the Americans just south of the border, there would not be anyone speaking French anywhere in the business community of Quebec. That would be a shame because it would be the end of a culture.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter this debate, since I feel it is important to establish the government's intentions in tabling Bill C–110. It is not my intention in the next few minutes to react to the interpretation of history given by the Liberal member who just spoke. I would simply advise him to do some sorting out of his historical reference books. Drawing a comparison between Louisiana and Quebec is not only nonsensical but an insult to the reality of Quebec.

What I would like to do instead is talk about Bill C–110 and the veto.

To begin with, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out this morning, when reference is made to the right of veto, this generally means a procedure or rule that is a key element in a constitution. With such a rule, changes of a constitutional nature cannot be made without the agreement of one part. In the case of concern to us here, the case of Canada, what is involved is a part of Canada without the agreement of a certain number of provinces plus the federal government.

This is, therefore, an important measure. So important that, over the past 20 or 25 years, the federalists have discussed among themselves on a number of occasions the necessity of arriving at a formula for amending the Constitution, which would include this famous right of veto. Naturally, there was the Victoria charter, which referred to a regional veto, a bit like Bill C–110. The Pepin–Roberts Commission referred to a regional veto as well, but one supported by a Canada–wide referendum in which a majority would be required in each of the four or five regions of Canada.

The 1982 Constitutional Act, the one that governs us at present, assigns to each Canadian province the right of veto in several areas for amending the Constitution and the institutions, among other things. The Meech Lake accord also contains the same right of veto. The Beaudoin–Edwards committee spoke of a regional veto. So did the Charlottetown accord.

What I would like to point out with this reminder is that the right of veto has always figured prominently in Canadian political discussion, in the political speeches of federalists, sincere ones, who wanted to improve Canada and Quebec's situation. Never, however, have we been able to reach an agreement that would respect the rights of both Quebecers and Canadians. Never.

That is why the Trudeau government accorded the right of veto to all provinces in 1982, in desperation, and this is how the situation stands now.

• (1345)

So, if we want this right of veto to mean anything, there must be constitutional changes. Because he could not do so—and not because the Leader of the Opposition may eventually go to Quebec City, but because he could not convince the anglophone provinces to agree—the Prime Minister, reacting to the results of the referendum on October 30, decided to table a bill in the House, which has no constitutional significance, a bill which will force the present government to take certain criteria into account before it proposes constitutional change, if it really wants to, because it can amend its bill at any time.

However, as the Prime Minister has already said he does not intend to make any proposals so long as the nasty separatists are in power in Quebec, the bill will never be implemented in any case.

This is where I want to point out the intention of the government and, particularly, of the Prime Minister. This bill is nothing more than a hoax. I would even describe it as skulduggery, because it is misleading Quebecers by implying that the right of veto is a guarantee of Quebec's future constitutional rights.

This is wrong, absolutely wrong, because, in the same breath, most of the speakers on the government side have made a point of saying in their speeches—the Prime Minister first and then the Minister of Justice this morning in tabling his bill—that the bill changes nothing in the existing formula, in other words, it is the constitutional status quo.

Quebecers must understand that the government and the Prime Minister are simply trying to waste time in this House with this hasty bill, which has no effect.

Some will say I am being hard on the Prime Minister. With your permission, I would like to turn to what the Prime Minister has said in the past.

Let us look first at his speech in 1990 as he was preparing to enter the Liberal Party leadership race. The current Prime Minister, who was then a leadership candidate, said, right here in Ottawa, to University of Ottawa students, that, as a candidate to the Liberal Party leadership and future head of the Canadian government, he was opposed to any form of veto, for any province. He basically said that a province wishing to oppose constitutional changes could do it if it had a veto. He did not specifically mentioned Quebec, but he was certainly thinking about that province, since Quebec has always been the one asking for such changes.

In addition to a veto power, the concept of distinct society is supposedly recognized in the motion tabled in this House.

• (1350)

Again, this is a big joke. The Prime Minister is trying to make Quebecers, but particularly Canadians, believe that he recognizes the principle of distinct society. Yet, during the referendum campaign, he ridiculed that principle by making an analogy to his own linguistic skills. He said: "There is no need to put the distinct society principle in the Constitution. Everyone knows that I am distinct. Just listen to me speak English".

At the time, the leader of the Action démocratique condemned the Prime Minister's comments, saying that it was contemptuous of Quebecers to make such an analogy between the notion of distinct society and the impossibility or difficulty of speaking English. As the Prime Minister himself demonstrated.

This is what the Prime Minister thinks of the distinct society and the right of veto. Today, because it tabled a bill and a motion on the concept of distinct society, the government would like Quebec members to applaud and say: "Mr. Speaker, the issue is finally settled. Quebec is now recognized as a distinct society and it has a veto power. Let us move on to other matters".

No. Quebecers are not fooled by all this. They are fully aware of the federal government's deceit in tabling this bill and this motion, and they will react strongly. In that sense, the Leader of the Opposition who, in a few months, will lead the Quebec government, was right, is right and will be right to say no to such trickery and deceit.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite is at it again with his emotional blackmail.

A debate at least two–months long has already been held on the referendum. At times, it was quite intense, very emotional. We heard from both sides, supporters of the yes camp and supporters of the no camp, those who were for Canada and those who were against Canada, those who wanted to give Canada a chance and those who did not.

Those who wanted to give Canada a chance won. The democratic result of the referendum was a yes to giving Canada a chance. On the evening when the results were announced, I was out of the country, unfortunately, but I saw the Leader of the Opposition on television. It was a very emotional moment. I stayed up all night and watched the Leader of the Opposition on CNN International as he said: "The democratic result of the referendum must be respected".

I found it very interesting, contrary to what Mr. Parizeau said, that he chose not to respect the results. At the time, the Leader of the Opposition and leader of the yes camp in Quebec said that the referendum results were to be respected. But what is happening today? Just the opposite. No respect for the Quebec referendum results; total disregard for the basic principle of democracy in Quebec, in Canada and in every international standard.

• (1355)

Nowhere else in the world do you have a group like the one we have here in our federal Parliament, a Parliament representing the people of Canada, Canadians from coast to coast.

In no other country in the world do you see people like the members across the way, rise on their feet and announce with great pride their plans to tear apart the best country in the world. They want to tear apart and break up a great country, a fantastic country.

The Prime Minister said, and my colleagues on this side also said so time and time again: this is not going to happen, because the best country in the world just cannot be broken up. What the government decided to do and managed to do is to present concrete proposals, and we expect opposition members to act with common sense, to respond with common sense, to respect the democratic result of the referendum, to sit down at the table and to negotiate honestly, without any hypocrisy, and to stop using the words "sovereignism" and "independance". They should talk in a positive way, saying that Quebecers voted to give Canada a chance.

Then we would have a real debate. Then we would really be able to talk face to face. So, I ask my colleague if it would not be better for him and for his colleagues of the Bloc to sit down with the federal government and to tell us what they really want. They are not satisfied with that, but what do they want exactly? They want to put that in the Constitution, but they do not say so. They do not dare say what makes sense.

What I have heard today is nothing but blackmail, a history lesson, another explanation of what happened 20 years ago. Several members of that party voted against the Meech Lake accord and the Charlottetown accord. I want to ask the member—

The Speaker: I think the question has been put. The hon. member has one minute to respond. We will give him the chance.

Mr. Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I would ask my colleague from Ottawa–Centre to sit down and go back to sleep, like he did the night of the referendum, since he obviously did not listen until the end to what the Leader of the Opposition said. Not only did the Leader of the Opposition, who will become Quebec's Premier, say that he would respect the results of the October 30 referendum by making sure to deal with the problems facing Quebec, that is, public finance, he also said that the federal government was expected to act and to propose real changes.

So, what do we have here? I said it earlier: trickery and deceit. The next time we will talk about the Constitution in Quebec, it will be about Quebec's Constitution in an impending referendum.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, in the 1994 budget the government announced cuts to UI, which hit Atlantic Canada the hardest. Of the $2.4 billion that was cut, $634 million came from Atlantic Canada. Our region, with 8 per cent of Canada's population, suffered 27 per cent of the UI cuts. Now we hear it is going to happen to us again.

A large portion of the Atlantic Canadian economy has a seasonal nature. I agree that we have to implement measures that allow the region's economy to grow and evolve, but what the government is proposing will not do that. Even the Liberal premier of New Brunswick has called the proposed UI plan devastating for our region. He has also said that he believes it will merely push people from UI to welfare.

I support thoughtful measures to get our deficit under control. We need to help people to help themselves. I fear this is what the government's UI plan will not do. I urge it to reconsider. In fact, this plan is one I would expect from the Reform Party.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Davenport.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Environment Canada recently charged the Noranda forests mill in Thorold, Ontario, with 150 apparent violations of the Fisheries Act and pulp and paper effluent regulations.

If we are to have sustainable development we need regulations and their enforcement to protect water, fisheries and health from damaging activities. This example shows the importance of Environment Canada in maintaining properly monitored and enforced federal environmental regulations.

SAME SEX COUPLES

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal cabinet is giving rights to same sex couples that members of the House have not approved and the public do not support.

I rise today to condemn a Liberal Treasury Board directive leaked last week which extends a number of spousal benefits to homosexual and lesbian partners who are not formally recognized as being legally married.

During the debate and a free vote on Motion No. 264 in the House last September members refused to grant legal recognition of same sex couples, defeating the motion decisively. Treasury Board officials have defied the will of members of the House by giving homosexual and lesbian couples the same rights as legally married men and women.

On behalf of the majority of my constituents, the majority of Canadians and the majority of MPs in the House I demand the Liberal government bring any extension of government benefits to same sex couple relationships to the House for a free vote.

RIPPLES INTERNMENT CAMP

Mr. Andy Scott (Fredericton—York—Sunbury, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last week I attended a ceremony marking the site of the Ripples Internment Camp near Fredericton. This camp was originally constructed to accommodate Jewish refugees during the second world war and was later used as an internment camp. The organizing committee hopes eventually to rebuild the camp along with a museum to keep the camp's memory alive.

Canada has a long history of accommodating refugees, a history of which it can be proud. However history tells us that mistakes have been made. We must learn from them, grow and make sure we recognize our international obligations to those oppressed around the world.

It is important to remember what happened during the second world war because history must live. I commend Ed Caissie and the rest of the committee for reminding all of us of the horror of the Holocaust.

SEVEC

Mr. Ivan Grose (Oshawa, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish today to recognize the achievement of one of my constituents, Miss Amy Kaufman. Tomorrow Miss Kaufman and five others from across Canada will present themselves at Government House to receive the 60th Anniversary Award of the Society for Educational Visits and Exchanges in Canada.

SEVEC is a not for profit association run by teachers that organizes educational visits and exchanges. Its aim is to create and promote enriching educational opportunities within Canada for the development of mutual respect and understanding.

Miss Kaufman spent two weeks in Quebec last year as a participant in a SEVEC program. She was struck by both the similarities and the differences between our two peoples. She was especially impressed by the depth of friendship and understanding that can be achieved in so short a time, an interesting observation.

I ask all members to join me in recognizing Miss Kaufman, a proud Canadian.

FTQ CONVENTION

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on Monday the Leader of the Opposition and I attended the opening of the 24th convention of the FTQ, Quebec's largest labour federation.

I think it is significant that there were 1,500 delegates at this historic convention, which was focussed on employment. For the first time, the presidents of the CSN and the CEQ were invited to attend. In an extremely courageous speech, FTQ president Clément Godbout spoke of the major challenges to the trade union movement now and in the years to come. The labour federation wants to fight against the emergence of an increasingly powerful right and in support of labour legislation reform, union–employer partnerships, and increased power over the way work is organized.

It is therefore important to congratulate those behind such an initiative aimed at enabling Quebec decision makers to undertake an in depth examination of tomorrow's Quebec.

I would also like to wish FTQ past president Fernand Daoust a prompt recovery; he was injured in an automobile accident the day before yesterday.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the environment minister's decision to sign an interim order banning the export of PCBs to the U.S. defies logic, especially since the EPA in the U.S. has recently reversed its decision to allow PCB imports for destruction.

This reversal enables Canadian companies to safely dispose of their stockpiled PCB contaminated waste at the lowest possible price and in the safest possible manner. The minister ought to be elated. Unfortunately she has decided to ban PCB exports to the U.S. despite the fact that Canada exports over 100,000 tonnes of waste to the U.S. each year.

• (1405)

The distance now that the PCBs have to travel are much greater when shipped across Canada than when shipped to the United States. Canadian companies are also paying an extra $150 million to do this.

Considering the overwhelming information in support of allowing PCB exports to the U.S., I urge the minister to reconsider her government's position, do the right thing, and stop pandering to the protectionist stance that does little to help the overriding goal of PCB removal.

GLOBAL VISION

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to inform the House of the completion of the global vision program for 1995 and the release of the annual report.

As parliamentary chair I am pleased to announce that this non–profit organization was able to conduct cross Canada regional seminars involving over 800 students. These young people met with industry and government experts to discuss issues involving science, trade and technology, and to acquire the skills needed to compete in the new global economy.

In addition, the junior trade corps program allowed 18 participants to visit Taiwan in the Republic of China in August. I thank the many sponsors of the global vision program. These include Canadians Airlines, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, Canadian Heritage, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, FEDNOR and Western Star Trucking.

I personally thank Mr. Jason Yuan and his staff at the Taipei economic and cultural office. Without his assistance and the co–operation of the Republic of China's foreign affairs department and the China Youth Corps, our trade mission to Taiwan would not have been possible.

INTERNATIONAL HIV–AIDS DAY

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, December 1, is International HIV–AIDS Day. On the same day last year our Prime Minister was one of the cosignatories of the Paris declaration.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that Canada followed up on this summit by creating a task force on Canada's international response on HIV–AIDS.

On this day, the theme of which is "Share rights, Share responsibilities", I would like to acknowledge the important role played by nongovernmental organizations such as the International AIDS and Development Coalition, the International Council of ONGs against AIDS, the Canadian AIDS Society, the Canadian Public Health Association, the Global Network of People Living with HIV/AIDS, the réseau international francophone d'intervention SIDA and the International Community of Women Living with HIV/AIDS.

SOVEREIGNIST ARTISTS

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal and Reform members of the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage have openly declared a witch hunt. The representatives of Canadian unity are against sovereignist artists, like Marie Laberge, getting federal funding.

Obviously, ridicule has never killed anyone. Quebec sovereignists still continue to send their tax money to Ottawa. Each year, the federal government collects $30 billion from Quebecers. Do the members of the committee seriously think that the federal government could deny access to its programs to 50 per cent of Quebec's population? As Franco Nuovo put it so well in the Journal de Montréal, Canada Council grants are not given out to "serve the allegiance and political stripe of artists, but to recognize and support talent and excellence in the arts world in Canada".

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are astounded to learn that our human rights commissioner feels it is inappropriate to comment on human rights abuses in China. His tolerance of forced abortions and his inability to pass judgment on the execution of political dissidents show shameful disdain for women's rights, equal rights and human rights.

We must tell China that this policy is wrong. As Canadian Human Rights Commissioner it is his responsibility to lead, not to follow. He has a moral obligation to help bring about change in areas where the humane treatment of people is rejected. He must do this by showcasing Canada as a model of democratic tolerance, a champion of human rights and a defender of the exploited.

We cannot sit idly by, as women, children and others suffer abuse at the hands of inhumane governments. Instead of resigning himself to indifference, Max Yalden should resign, himself. If he refuses, the government must remove him from office as he clearly lacks the courage to promote and represent Canadian values internationally.

CSN PRESIDENT

Mr. Robert Bertrand (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the sovereignist's sovereignist Gérald Larose, president of the CSN, delivered a hefty blow to the Quebec Premier's economic strategy, labelling it devastating. He went on to say, and I quote: "We have the vague impression that, having failed to control all our levers during the referendum, the Government of Quebec wants to take the shortest route and throw itself wildly on spending to avoid sinking like the Titanic".

The union leader's barrage against the PQ government has failed, however, to wound the claimant to the throne, whom nobody wants to upset. The union leader's whole strategy reeks of opportunism and should be condemned, given the benefits his organization has always enjoyed from its affiliation with the PQ.

DIABETES AWARENESS MONTH

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to remind members of the House that November has been proclaimed Diabetes Awareness Month by the Canadian Diabetes Association.

Over one million Canadians including many members of my own family have diabetes, a major cause of premature death, blindness, kidney disease, heart disease, stroke, limb amputation and other significant health problems. The chances of having diabetes increase with age. It affects more than 13 per cent of Canadians between the ages of 65 and 74.

The Canadian Diabetes Association supports diabetes research and provides a wide range of services for and on behalf of persons with diabetes and their families. I am proud to say the federal government also plays an important role by supporting diabetes research, with the Medical Research Council of Canada being the country's largest contributor to diabetes research.

I ask the House to join with me in wishing the Canadian Diabetes Association and its many volunteers a very successful Diabetes Awareness Month.

RENEWAL OF CANADIAN FEDERALISM

Mr. Denis Paradis (Brome—Missisquoi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is the dawning of a new age. During the referendum campaign, the government promised change. Now, change is under way. First, the members of this House are to vote on recognizing Quebec as a distinct society with its own language, culture and legal tradition.

Also, we have before us today a bill granting a veto to Quebec, to the people of Quebec, and to the other regions of Canada. This makes for a great start. That is what I call delivering the goods. And we must continue to ensure that the changes contemplated also apply to our way of doing things. In the context of these changes, I urge all hon. members of this House, regardless of their political affiliation, to work at making this country of ours, Canada, the country of all Quebecers and all Canadians.

PETER JACOBS

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Peter Jacobs has lived almost all his life in Kahnawake. He was adopted at the age of three weeks and has contributed to this Mohawk community for 40 years. Even though he is a status Indian under the Indian Act, Mr. Jacobs has now been excluded from the register by a Kahnawake band council resolution which in effect has stripped him of his status as a member of this band and of entitlement to all related rights.

Without prejudging a highly technical issue currently before the Canadian Human Rights Commission, the members of the Bloc Quebecois would like to express their strong disagreement with this act of discrimination and exclusion, which would appear to be based on race and ethnic origin.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it seems that Quebecers will once again have to pay for the lack of courage and conviction of the person who let them down almost one month before the failure of Meech. In a speech befitting a never ending soap opera, the leader of the opposition said once again yesterday that he will not support the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society.

The Bloc Quebecois leader refuses to accept Canada's offer to co-operate, preferring to concentrate on his emotional speeches, in which he keeps crying over old stories of humiliation and rejection. Quebecers are discovering, regretfully and somewhat late, that the person who is asking them to put their confidence in him is only interested in his career and imminent crowning as Quebec's Premier. Unfortunately, he refuses to acknowledge the consensus among Quebecers to be recognized as a distinct society and to have a veto power within the Canadian federation.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in an all out attack against the federal government, Premier McKenna of New Brunswick, a faithful ally of the Canadian Prime Minister, strongly condemned the UI reform proposals.

Mr. McKenna warned that, by directly targeting workers in Eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, these reforms will create what he referred to as "an unprecedented political backlash". Mr. McKenna's scathing attack is similar to the stand of the official opposition on the new cuts in unemployment insurance Ottawa is about to make.

Does the Minister of Human Resources Development agree that, as stated by the Premier of New Brunswick, these new cuts will come down hard on seasonal workers in Eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again the Leader of the Opposition, as he has done so many times in the past, is exaggerating the comments.

We had a very useful meeting with the Atlantic premiers. We were able to deal with many of the concerns they raised. If the hon. leader of the opposition were more careful in his research and analysis he would know that when they came out of the meeting they actually said they found the approach we are taking to be quite praiseworthy and one they wanted to support.

I quote Premier McKenna directly: "Several features of the reform will be very positive in terms of making it worth while to work and there are a number of elements of the reform that we find praiseworthy". Mr. McKenna, after having had the opportunity to find out the real direction and approach we want to take, as opposed to all the suppositions, allegations and paranoia the Leader of the Opposition puts forward, actually finds this praiseworthy.

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have not met Mr. McKenna recently, but I saw reports in the newspapers this morning that he condemned the minister's reforms and warned they would create an unprecedented political backlash. And I am fully aware of the fact that Mr. McKenna is a Liberal like the minister himself, so he cannot be accused of being soft on policy.

I want to ask the minister whether he realizes that young people and women will be the main victims of his reforms, since these will tighten UI criteria by substantially increasing the number of hours and weeks worked.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition once again totally contradicts himself.

When he made his announcement that he would become leader of the Parti Quebecois and the future premier of Quebec, he said he had one major ambition, jobs, and he wants to work with people to do this. That is our ambition as well, to transform a system that has been around for 50 years and over the years has developed a number of problems in terms of giving people the tools and the opportunities and the encouragement to go to work. That is why we are changing the system, so we can help people go to work.

I say to the hon. Leader of the Opposition if he believes, as he said he did during the referendum campaign, in partnership, I am prepared to be a partner with the hon. Leader of the Opposition when he becomes premier. I would like to work with him to create jobs for Quebecers. Is he prepared to be a partner with us in creating good, serious jobs for Quebecers once he becomes the premier of Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Leader of the Opposition, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister tells us his reforms are intended to create jobs. Would he agree that, in fact, his reforms are intended to get people off unemployment insurance so they will have to go on welfare, all of which will add to the bill the provinces will have to pay?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, they will not. There will be a number of initiatives that will help people who now find themselves without the tools or resources to get back into the workforce. They will be given that opportunity.

• (1420)

Unlike the minister of social security in the Government of Quebec, who cut back welfare payments and took away the very incentive, the very resources, the very income being used to help people on social assistance to go back to work, we are attempting through the reform and modernization of the employment insurance system to give those tools back to people so they can go back to work.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The Globe and Mail reported this morning, in even greater detail, how much the second so–called UI reform package is out of touch with the labour market, where precarious jobs are no longer the exception but rather the rule.

In fact, the UI reform will discourage young people by making it harder to qualify for benefits, with work requirements going from 12 fifteen hour weeks to 14 thirty–five hour weeks, even in the regions hardest hit by unemployment.

Does the Minister of Human Resources Development confirm that one of the first and most painful effects of his reform will be to ensure to an even greater degree that thousands of young people, who often can find only precarious jobs, are excluded?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be tabling in the House of Commons tomorrow the full details of the new employment insurance package.

We will be, as part of our courtesy, giving a full briefing to the hon. member and other members of the opposition. We intend to extend coverage for unemployment insurance, to take into consideration the new workplace, where there is a lot more part time work, a lot more multiple jobs, a lot more people dealing in a workplace that has a lot more flexibility to it.

That is part of the problem with the existing system. It was designed 50 years ago. It does not accommodate the new world of work we are into. That was one of the key recommendations of the committee that studied it, of which the member was a part. The committee recommended that we find a system that more accurately fits the reality of the new world of work. That is what we have done.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if the minister had briefed the official opposition and the third party first, before briefing every member of the media in town, we would not have to rely on what journalists say. At least, journalists are doing a good job. And I doubt there would be any evidence to the contrary.

Here is my question: Does the minister not realize that by making it even more difficult to have access to UI, a fact confirmed by every information leak, he will force onto welfare a good many women who are desperately trying to find a way out of poverty?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, please excuse me if I allow myself to smile. The hon. member is complaining about the fact that we were briefing journalists.

It was the hon. member who week after week was waving papers, studies, and leaked reports from her friends in the CSN who purported to know what was in the report. If anybody is responsible for the misinformation about the new program, it is the hon. member for Mercier. She is the one who has been responsible.

Fortunately tomorrow the hon. member will have an opportunity to see what the program is really all about.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government has tabled its package of proposals for Quebec, which lo and behold have been rejected by the PQ Government of Quebec and by the future premier of Quebec.

In advance of the next referendum, will the government also be taking other steps? Will it table not only the proposals it has tabled for positive change, but will it also make clear to Quebec in published documents the likely terms and conditions of separation and the real costs of separation?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, unlike the Reform Party, we are not salivating at the prospect of a referendum.

The majority of Canadians and the majority of Quebecers do not want a referendum. What they want is for the Government of Canada to work in a constructive way with provincial partners across the country and with workers to get Canadians back to work. That is exactly the agenda we intend to pursue.

• (1425)

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I hate to inform the Deputy Prime Minister that bad things can happen even if you wish they will not. It is a rule of life.

Regardless of what the Canadian people or even the Quebec people think, it is clear what the plans of the Quebec government are. I ask the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs once again, is the government consulting anyone—Canadians, think tanks, the C.D. Howe Institute, the Canada West Foundation, the business community? Is the government consulting anyone on the terms and conditions of separation and the contingencies to plan for in the event the Government of Quebec goes down this path?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we know that Canada will not go down this path because we are taking the necessary steps and we will continue to take them so that Canada remains a united country.

The group on unity, as I have mentioned, is looking at present at all kinds of constructive ways in which we can deal with the differences that exist among the various parts of the country. We do not want to underline these differences. We prefer to underline the points that are common all across Canada, among all Canadians. The solutions we will bring are solutions that will help us to remain together.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this minister assured the House that the PQ would lose the provincial election. He assured the House that the government would win the referendum by a strong majority. None of the things this government has assured us have come to pass.

This time, if it will not at least prepare its own position on the eventuality of another referendum, will it at least insist through a formal request that the Government of Quebec table its proposal for separation, its so–called sovereignty partnership, so that before a referendum all Canadians, including Quebecers, can judge the credibility of these proposals?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when we indicated that we were going to look at the results of the referendum and deal with them, we also indicated that we were going to look at the real solutions to present day problems. The real solutions are not the splitting of Canada into various parts, even though the Reform Party sometimes gives me the feeling that this would be its preferred option.

The best way to prevent that from happening is clearly to give good government. We have won the referendum, not lost it. The best way is to deal with the problems that presently exist, not start planning for the worst.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Every scrap of information on the UI reform, whether leaked or not, points to the fact that women, young people and seasonal workers will be the main victims of the reform about to be introduced by the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Does the minister recognize that his reform will penalize women twice over, by limiting their entitlement to benefits because of the longer work period required, and by making this entitlement dependent not only on recipients' incomes but also on their spouses' incomes?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, just a few minutes ago the hon. member's colleague was complaining about the leaks and the fact that they did not get the proper information. Now the hon. member is using other leaks or misinformation to make an allegation or charge about the impact of the study.

The reality is that tomorrow we will present a fully comprehensive indication. The hon. member will find that the purpose and the direction we have adopted is designed to give more support for women coming into the workforce, to provide extended coverage for those in part time work, to provide for a stronger element of resources for people to get employed.

It would seem to me that the sooner the Bloc Quebecois starts getting itself interested in the issue of defending and promoting jobs as opposed to defending unemployment, it might be an awful lot better off.

• (1430)

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, here is my supplementary question.

Does the minister realize that his reform will jeopardize 20 years of sustained efforts on the part of women to achieve greater financial independence?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is a very simple fact. Last year, because of the change in the emphasis of our employment programs, the number of women in Quebec who participated in our employment programs actually increased. Furthermore the new employment equity bill which we hope the Senate will return before Christmas will be providing further opportunities.

When the hon. member says we are ignoring the cause of women, frankly she does not know what she is talking about.

NATIONAL UNITY

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister pleaded with Canadians to support his Quebec package of Mulroney leftovers: distinct society and constitutional veto. However the government does not have the courage to let those very same Canadians vote directly on the package. Instead of trusting Canadians, the Prime Minister has decided to ram the proposals through Parliament.

Because the government will not trust the Canadian people with the country's future, will it at the very least call off the Liberal whip and allow a free vote on the Prime Minister's Quebec package?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the Canadian people are a lot bigger and a lot more generous than the Reform Party gives them credit for. The Canadian people support the initiative of the Prime Minister. Frankly, my phone has been ringing off the wall with people complaining about the disgraceful performance of the Reform Party in the debate about Canada.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians voted no on Charlottetown and I suspect if the government had the courage to ask them to vote again they would again vote no, loudly and clearly.

The government talks about equality but it learned absolutely nothing from Meech Lake and Charlottetown. If the national unity package is to have any hope of succeeding, it must win the support of Canadians. It has to be by Canadians. It needs to be for all of them and it must receive popular ratification.

Canadians are sick and tired of being used as the Liberal government's personal political pawns. They want the first say and they want the final say when it comes to these things. Will the government commit to holding a national binding referendum on any constitutional change so that the Canadian people, not provincial governments and federal politicians, have the final say as they were allowed to do with Charlottetown in 1992?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member makes claims about the positions of the government, she would be well advised to read what her own leader had to say on the issue of distinct society back in 1989. He said in an interview on the distinct society clause: "At a strategic level I think we could accept some kind of trade–off between Quebec and the resource producing regions". That is what Preston Manning had to say about distinct society then. Why is he saying something different now?

The Speaker: Colleagues, I remind you to please address each other by title rather than by name.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

In his full–scale attack against UI reform, the Premier of New Brunswick, a faithful constitutional ally of the Prime Minister, accused Ottawa of revamping the UI program on the backs of workers in eastern Quebec and the Atlantic provinces.

Does the minister endorse the New Brunswick Premier's statement that his reform is a deliberate attack against the Atlantic region and eastern Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will tell the House what words of the hon. premier of New Brunswick I do agree with. He said in today's Saint John Telegraph Journal: "Several of the features of the reform will be very positive in terms of making it worthwhile to work and there are a number of elements of the reform that we find praiseworthy".

• (1435)

[Translation]

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): I have a short question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister share Premier McKenna's opinion that his UI reform will cause an "unprecedented political backlash" east of Ontario? That does not sound like someone who agrees with the minister.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again I want to point out that the meeting last evening with the four Atlantic premiers was a very useful and helpful exchange. We were able to share concerns.

What is more, the four premiers of the Atlantic region, unlike the hon. member and his colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois, understand good information. They do not deliberately go out to create distortion. In fact, when they were given the opportunity to work with and understand the facts, they came out and said as Premier McKenna did that they found the reforms praiseworthy.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a recent memo confirms Indian affairs is planning to throw money at resolving some outstanding issues it has been dragging its feet on. This is a payoff to silence Quebec's aboriginal people during the dream team's constitutional talks in Quebec.

While I can understand that Quebec natives want to see their issues resolved, blatantly bribing them to keep quiet during the Quebec round of talks is an insult to them and to all Canadians.

Will the minister of Indian affairs confirm whether one of his ADMs is responsible for this policy position, yes or no?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the member is referring to the article in the Globe and Mail and several others, I did not see that memo. I never asked for that memo and if I have to read it in the Globe and Mail I am not going to pay much attention to it.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was not asking the minister whether he had seen it or heard of it. I was asking him whether his ADM is responsible for it. Does the buck stop with him and his department or not?

We believe in the equality of all Canadians but clearly this Liberal government does not. This week the Prime Minister is adding a new class of citizens by recognizing Quebec as special and giving Quebec distinct society status. Now we learn that the department of Indian affairs is considering granting premier status to Quebec native leaders.

Apparently the Liberals intend to grant distinct status to two groups so far: the Quebec separatist government and Quebec native leaders. How many more do the Liberals intend to recognize?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a couple of weeks ago the Reform Party put out its policy on aboriginal people. We waited two years for what is now its interim policy. It was received as follows: Blaine Fable: "Earth calling Preston"; Blaine Fable: "Silly and bizarre"; Erasmus: "It's like reading something from the 1920s"; and John Edward: "This is pretty much a bunch of cheap shots from the Reform Party". These are aboriginal leaders.

The Reform Party knows nothing about equality. If it knew anything about equality, all 42 members who voted against the B.C. treaty process would have been in here voting for it.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Indian Affairs.

The document signed by Deputy Minister Jack Stagg, which all the media reported on this morning, recommends that the government pay money to the aboriginal communities in Quebec, in return for their support for the federalist side in the last referendum, and also, in the words of the deputy minister himself, to buy their silence while the federal government tables constitutional proposals to satisfy Quebec.

Since the media all reported on this document, I ask the minister if he bothered to summon this person, who is not just anybody, but the person responsible for his department's strategic directions and policies. Has he since summoned his deputy minister to find out if he did in fact write this memo?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my former answer, I did not ask for that document and I did not see that document. If it is accurate as far as the Globe and Mail then it is a pretty silly document.

If the hon. member wants to know what my deputy minister, my ADMs or my regional directors general have to do, there is an even more significant document which is accurate and free. It is called our red book and we follow it.

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister is trying to dodge the issue. His deputy minister, who is very well known, who is responsible for the department's strategic directions and policies, did in fact write a memo. I want the minister to tell me if he did summon his deputy minister and ask him for his version of events.

I am not interested in the red book. I am quite familiar with it, I studied it, and there is room for improvement on aboriginal issues. What I want to know is this: Did the minister summon his deputy minister and can he admit that he promised the aboriginal communities in Quebec that he would compensate them for their support for the federalist cause in the last referendum?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our policy in Quebec is clear and apparent and I think my friend does support it.

We are working with the James Bay Cree on their issues. We are working with the province of Quebec and with the Huron which has signed a treaty with the province of Quebec. We have made offers to the Attikamek–Montagnais in the north of Saint–Laurent of $400 million with the Quebec government. He says to work with the Quebec government. We are working with the Attikamek–Montagnais, the Innu. We are working with all of them.

Our policy is our red book. Everybody who works for our department is supposed to follow that red book.

SRI LANKA

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the continuing conflict in Sri Lanka is a matter of great concern to many Canadians, including many in my riding of Rosedale who have come here from Sri Lanka.

Would the Secretary of State for Asia–Pacific inform the House of Canada's position on the Government of Sri Lanka's military operations in the north which have displaced so many innocent civilians?

Hon. Raymond Chan (Secretary of State (Asia–Pacific), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are all very concerned about the continued conflict in Sri Lanka. Recently when I accompanied the Prime Minister and my colleague, the Secretary of State for Latin America, with the heads of the Commonwealth meetings in New Zealand, I sought out the Sri Lankan foreign affairs minister to express our concern to him.

Canada does not believe there can be a military solution to the conflict. We urge all parties, including the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, to negotiate a lasting political settlement. The LTTE must accept that there is nothing to be gained by continued guerrilla warfare and acts of sabotage. Also, the Sri Lankan government should recognize that only a negotiated political settlement will bring peace to Sri Lanka.

THE DEFICIT

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the provinces are leading the federal government again. Yesterday Ontario announced a balanced budget plan. Nine out of 10 provinces have a balanced budget plan in place.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. When will the government announce to Canadians a balanced budget plan?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not enough to simply have a balanced budget plan which stretches years out. What is important is to have in place a process that will enable the government and any government to consistently hit its targets, to maintain a steady downward tract both in the deficit and the GDP ratio and that is what we have done.

That is why for the first time in over a decade a Canadian government was able to stand up and say that it had beat its deficit targets.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if the targets are easy to reach, anybody can do it. The real litmus test of financial or fiscal responsibility is a balanced budget plan and a budget plan that can be reached. In Canada there are only two governments that do not have a plan: the separatists in Quebec and the Liberal government here in Ottawa.

Is the finance minister, according to the answer that was just given, telling Canadians that when he tables his budget in the spring there still will not be a balanced budget plan?

• (1445)

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have been very consistent. We have said that we are going to operate on the basis of rolling two–year targets and that is what we are going to continue to do.

The hon. member talks about last year's budget target being an easy target. If that was true, then the allegation also would be true. It was a very difficult target to hit. In three years we will have taken the deficit from 6 per cent of GDP down to 3 per cent.

As far as proof that it was a very difficult target I would only cite the leader of the Reform Party and the hon. member who last year stood up and said that we would never hit that target, that the sky was falling and we had to have countless mini–budgets. We did not have mini–budgets. We beat the target that member said we could never hit.

TELEFILM CANADA

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the heritage minister.

The committee in charge of reviewing the mandate of the National Film Board, Telefilm Canada and the CBC has postponed until January 15 the tabling of the report that was supposed to be released today.

The Quebec motion picture and television production industry is very disturbed by rumours of Telefilm Canada being dismantled. In a letter to the Prime Minister, spokespersons for this industry have condemned the government's plans to abolish Telefilm.

How can the minister reconcile delaying the tabling of the Juneau report until January 15 when budgetary decisions have to be made now about three major Canadian cultural institutions, namely the National Film Board, Telefilm and the CBC?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that I would have liked to have received this report today, but that is not the case. I have spoken to the chairman of the mandate committee, and have pointed out to him that I fully intend to have the January 15 deadline met. At that time, I will release the report.

As for the relationship between mandates and budgetary decisions, it is clear that we will need to work faster, and we will.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister intend to grant the private industry and audiovisual industry's request, which is a real cry of alarm, that Telefilm and the resources allocated to the motion picture and television production industry be maintained?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our colleague mentioned earlier that the government was planning to dismantle Telefilm Canada. I would like to know where she got that information. How could we plan to do so, when we have not yet received the report, which, as she just said, will be tabled on January 15? Decisions will be made at that time.

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, for the second time this year the OECD has proven that the Liberal economic and social policies are failing.

The Liberals have driven growth down to 2.3 per cent from 4.2 per cent. They have increased taxes and killed jobs. They have driven more people on to welfare and closed more businesses.

If the Minister of Human Resources Development really cared about the 1.2 million people he has left unemployed, would he not create jobs by rolling payroll taxes back by more than the wooden nickel he is?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question reminds me of that very felicitous phrase used by her colleague from Calgary when referring to the Minister of Health. It seems that like dogs the members of the Reform have a fascination with trees.

In response to the question, the hon. member knows that tomorrow we will be presenting an employment insurance package. I think the hon. member will find there will be a number of initiatives in that package that are designed to help Canadians get back to work and, in particular, to provide incentives for the business community to create jobs.

• (1450)

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I do have a sense of humour, so I will let that tree comment pass.

The Minister of Human Resources Development is a tax junkie. He gets his fix by funnelling billions of dollars from UI into wasteful job creation schemes and into deficit reductions. However there is hope for recovery. The minister can register today in a 12–step program to break his tax addiction.

Will the minister commit to breaking his tax addiction by rolling payroll taxes back by more than a wooden nickel?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's sense of humour. It is always nice to discover that somebody in this House has one. It is a refreshing change.

However, the hon. member should check with statements made by the finance critic for the Reform Party. He was complaining about all the problems related to the deficit. Now the hon. member wants us to take away even more money, which would add to the deficit. It would seem to me that sooner or later the Reform Party should get its act together.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it has been 25 years since the Royal Commission on the Status of Women outlined its concern with regard to women's economic status, specifically, various aspects of their paid and unpaid work.

Could the Secretary of State for the Status of Women please inform the House what the government is doing to improve the economic status for women?

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, while it is true that the royal commission looked at the economic status of women and related that as well to ensuring that violence against women would be reduced, we also brought in the whole question of employment equity and the right of women with equal competence and merit to have access to fair jobs and to break the glass ceiling, as it is called.

At the same time, we have recognized that the unpaid work of women and men is of great value to our society. It was an issue we brought to the meetings in Beijing. The issue of unpaid work and its value is now part of the platform for action out of Beijing. Canada is the first country in the world that will measure both the work and the value of unpaid work to our society as we push and promote women's economic access to independence in our country.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Anatoli Delets and his family came to Canada from the former Soviet Union in 1992. Their refugee claim has been turned down and this family, despite having integrated well into Quebec society, will soon be deported to Moldavia. There is every reason to believe that they will be subject to the same persecution as they were before they left that country, for Mrs. Delets is Jewish and is not considered a Moldavian under that country's laws.

How can the minister explain that, instead of exercising his discretionary powers to allow the Delets to become permanent residents, he has allowed employees of his department to arrest Mr. Delets and place him in a detention centre awaiting deportation, which will take place as soon as his wife is released from hospital?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the people the member refers to had full due process under what can argued to be the best refugee determination system in the world. They have also received a humanitarian and compassionate review from my department as well.

There was also the possibility of trying to facilitate in response to the family, rather than going back to Russia perhaps for a facilitation into Israel.

It is absolutely unfair for this member, given the statements that have come from that side of the House with respect to immigrants and the role they can play in society, to suggest that Canada has been unfair to them.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Delets is ill in hospital. Where is Canada's humanitarian policy? Does the minister not believe that it is his duty to show compassion when there is every reason to believe that the Delets family faces incalculable risks, since the Moldavian embassy in Washington has notified them that they are no longer welcome in that country?

• (1455)

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when it comes to compassion and how we treat Canadians from various ethnocultural backgrounds, we need no lectures, no lessons from that side of the House.

No one suggested we would take her out of the hospital and deport her. There were rumours suggesting that we were going to deport part of the family and leave the other part in Canada.

Members of Parliament from our side made representations to the ministry and officials with respect to a compassionate deportation. We have shown that compassion. We have not forced anyone from a hospital bed. To make such allegations is simply a reflection of the manipulation for which his party is well known.

HIV–AIDS

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when we toured the Saskatchewan penitentiary in Prince Albert the guards expressed concern that neither the guards nor the prisoners were aware of inmates who were HIV positive. They did not even know which inmates had AIDS.

Can the Solicitor General of Canada tell us when he will protect the lives of guards and prisoners by making HIV–AIDS testing mandatory for all prisoners?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a year ago there was a report of an expert committee on this matter.

The correctional service is moving to implement almost all the recommendations of the committee designed to control the spread of AIDS in federal prison institutions and have a safer atmosphere for inmates generally.

There is an increased use of testing but mandatory testing raises important legal and constitutional issues which are still being considered. We are working to deal with the issue in the spirit and light of the recommendations of the expert committee.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it logically follows then if the solicitor general is not willing to make HIV and AIDS testing compulsory, that the government and the minister will be liable for damages when other prisoners and guards contract HIV or AIDS while under his care.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Correctional Service of Canada has been moving for over a year to implement the recommendations of the expert committee on AIDS. This includes a greater degree of HIV testing as well as a number of other measures to control, limit and lessen the spread of AIDS.

I would think that if the hon. member is concerned, he would read the report of the committee and support us in implementing its recommendations.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the wheat board.

In the 1970s, farmers bought hopper cars through the wheat board and governments bought hopper cars because railways refused to supply cars for shipping grain.

Recently the minister's SEO committee recommended that farmers pay $1 per tonne for the purchase of the government's 13,000 hopper cars. Although farmers would pay for them, ownership would revert to the railways.

Since the deregulated U.S. style system this government is emulating has one abiding rule, if you want rail service, you had better own rail cars, why does he not instead allow the wheat board to own the cars on behalf of farmers?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is referring to a report that has been received by the government from a group of senior executive officers in the grains industry, including a number of farmers, which has come forward with some ideas about how to deal with hopper car ownership and rail car allocation issues.

That report is presently being discussed among farm organizations in western Canada. As yet the government has taken no decision with respect to our response to that report.

One point is important to note. The report represents a consensus among a widely divergent range of interests. It is not entirely fair to the situation to single out one recommendation relating to car ownership and not also observe that another recommendation from the SEO's group to balance that recommendation was referred to by the hon. gentlemen. Another recommendation from that same group was to maintain a maximum limitation on freight rates for a period of one full decade.

AIRLINE SAFETY

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Considering that pilot safety is one of the most serious issues facing the Canadian airline industry today, can the minister tell us when he will implement the flight duty regulations introduced this summer?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of how the pilots and the attendants spend their time, how many hours they are allowed to work, has to be taken into account as a result of extensive consultation with the industry. We have also looked at what happens in other countries. We have tried to strike as fair a balance as we can.

I am pleased to advise the hon. member that we will be introducing and implementing those new regulations late next spring.

The Speaker: This brings to a close the question period.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it would be appreciated if the Government House Leader would announce the business of this House for next week.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today and tomorrow the House will consider second reading of Bill C–110, the bill on the regional veto. If this is completed, we will call Bill C–108, the housing legislation, followed by Bill C–99, the small business loans bill.

On Monday the House will deal with the motion now on notice in the name of the Minister of National Defence regarding the Bosnia peace process. Tuesday shall be an opposition day. On Wednesday we will return to the resolution concerning a distinct society. Next Thursday and Friday shall be opposition days.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–110, an act respecting constitutional amendments, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to speak on this matter today, especially in light of some of the comments made earlier by different members, in particular from the Reform Party.

In discussing this piece of legislation we have to look at what has already taken place and the rules that are presently in place. We have to look at the existing rule, the seven, ten, and fifty rule, requiring seven provinces out of ten to agree, with fifty per cent of the population. Under this particular rule, the Atlantic provinces, if they all agree on not supporting an amendment, have a veto. Ontario has a veto simply by virtue of population. The western provinces, if four of them get together, effectively have a veto as well. The only region of Canada that does not have a veto under the rule is Quebec.

It is not a matter of fairness when one region of Canada does not have a veto when three regions already can effectively veto legislation. We have to look at rectifying this situation.

Under Bill C–110 there are four regions, which have been referred to many times. One has to read Bill C–110 closely to determine that it does not deal with vetoes; it simply deals with the consent that is required to effect a constitutional amendment. Under the bill the consent of Ontario is required, the consent of Quebec is required, and two or more of the Atlantic provinces that have a combined population of at least 50 per cent of the population of all the Atlantic provinces, as well as two or more of the western provinces that have a combined population of at least 50 per cent. The rules change somewhat when moving to the second step.

I suggest the people of Saskatchewan now are better off. Under the previous rules it was quite difficult for Saskatchewan to stop legislation. It was difficult for Saskatchewan to deal with legislation because to exercise the veto all four western provinces had to agree. Under this rule, however, Saskatchewan along with B.C. or Saskatchewan along with three of the western provinces can stop legislation. It is much more effective for the province of Saskatchewan than in the past.

For a small province like Saskatchewan this is most helpful. The population of Saskatchewan is small, but it is being treated very well by Bill C–110. Saskatchewan's position has improved, but it has not improved at the cost of any other province.

I have listened to the speeches of Reform members. They indicated there should be five regions, with B.C. having a veto, or even six regions, with B.C. and Alberta having vetoes. It appears they are willing to cut loose Saskatchewan and Manitoba because there should not be two provinces in one region having a veto with such a small population. I find it interesting that the Reform Party would cut loose those two prairie provinces by having vetoes for the two most westerly provinces. It would cut them loose and they would not have a say in constitutional amendments. Are the occupants of these two provinces simply chopped liver?

The federal government has considered all the regions of the country and all the provinces, no matter how small the population. Saskatchewan was considered, Manitoba was considered, and provinces such as P.E.I. were considered.

To hear Reformers speak, it certainly appears that the Reform Party is willing to abandon Saskatchewan. The Reform Party has not proposed anything for Saskatchewan and Manitoba. It has not proposed anything because the Reform Party has abandoned us. Let me remind the Reform Party that in the next election the people of Saskatchewan will not forget what Reform has done.

The suggestion has been made that British Columbia may reach 50 per cent of the population in western Canada. That is a possibility. If any more people from Saskatchewan move to British Columbia, it should reach that sooner than we may think. That has certainly happened in the past. However, Saskatchewan can hold its own and may attract a few people back to Saskatchewan from British Columbia and may hold its own for the next number of years.

• (1510)

If British Columbia reaches the level of having 50 per cent of the population, some of the speeches made today by the Reform Party indicate that in effect British Columbia would have a veto and none of the other provinces in the west would have any effect. This is absolutely not true.

Two or more provinces with 50 per cent of the population in the west must consent to a constitutional amendment. Yes, British Columbia may get a veto if it has 50 per cent of the population, but even if British Columbia wants to consent to legislation, the other three prairie provinces can stop that legislation even though they do not have 50 per cent of the population. In effect, both areas have a veto. British Columbia has the veto and the prairie provinces have a veto.

Again, it appears this is a little too much for some members of the Reform Party to indicate in the House. They want to show that we have not given any consideration to the prairie provinces, which is absolutely false. All areas of Canada have been considered by the Liberal Party. In particular, all small provinces have been considered, whether they are in the prairies or elsewhere.

The Reform Party has complained that B.C. does not have a veto now, and then says that if it does the prairies will not have any say. As I have indicated, this is not only wrong, it is false and a misrepresentation of what is in Bill C–110.

It certainly would help if the members of the Reform Party, before they start speaking in the House on a bill like Bill C–110, read the legislation. It is very short; it is one paragraph and two subsections. It is not very difficult to go through. It would maybe take a minute if they concentrated on it, half a minute if they went through it quickly, five minutes if they wanted to reread it. Simply going through it in that manner, they could and would determine that both areas have a veto built in. British Columbia, when it reaches 50 per cent of the population, would have the equivalent of a veto. The three prairie provinces together would also be able to stop legislation, because consent requires two provinces in the west.

We have accomplished what the Reform Party has been talking about. Unfortunately the Reform Party has not seen this today.

That is a perspective from a small province in western Canada, the province of Saskatchewan, which is benefiting from Bill C–110, as do many other regions of Canada. And it is benefiting not at the expense of any other province.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is very interesting to hear a member from the province of Saskatchewan oozing around this question of what the legislation will do for or to the small provinces. I am glad he has cleared this up, because we know that Saskatchewan has not been relegated to fourth class status but only to third class status. This is progress. I really do appreciate the hon. member's words.

When he goes home to Saskatchewan and is able to present his case before his electors, I am sure they will be thrilled beyond measure by this. If the name of a certain Norwegian during the last war, which Beauchesne will not let me mention, is ever raised at one of his meetings, he will know what they are talking about.

Mr. Bodnar: Mr. Speaker, it is nice to hear comments from a member when he refers to oozing around this. Unfortunately I do not know what he means by oozing. The reference that we are not relegated to fourth class but to third class is absolutely false and shows a complete misunderstanding of what is in Bill C–110.

• (1515)

Under the existing constitutional formula the province of Saskatchewan could only stop a constitutional amendment with three other provinces. That would require all four provinces in the west to stop a constitutional amendment. Under this legislation, Saskatchewan with three of the smaller provinces in western Canada could stop the legislation or Saskatchewan and British Columbia could stop an amendment.

This is a tremendous improvement for the province of Saskatchewan. I simply ask that the member perhaps look at the legislation first.

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to participate in this important debate. Bill C–110 may be one of the smaller bills we will debate in the House. Although it is only comprised of one clause it is certainly one of the most important.

This past Monday the Prime Minister announced three key initiatives: to recognize that Quebec forms a distinct society within Canada; to undertake changes to bring government services and decision making closer to citizens; to ensure that we do not make any constitutional changes that affect Quebec without the consent of the Quebec people.

Bill C–110 is an important component of our commitment to a united Canada. It is also proof of our government's willingness to make positive and substantial changes to the way Canada works. As the Prime Minister and the government have proven time and time again, when we make a promise we keep it.

Liberal governments in the past have offered strong support for regional vetoes. The action we are taking now transforms the principle we have long supported into reality.

I will take a few moments to go through some of the specifics of the bill. As it currently stands in Canada's Constitution, only the federal government has the specific veto over constitutional change. This legislation will change that.

By implementing Bill C–110 we will now require consent of all Canada's regions, Quebec, Ontario, Atlantic Canada and the west, before any constitutional amendments that affect them can be proposed in Parliament. In the case of Atlantic Canada and the west, consensus much be reached by two or more of the affected provinces representing more than 50 per cent of the region as a whole.

In tabling the bill our government is keeping a commitment we made to the people of Quebec. We also recognize that the constitutional amendment process is of interest to all parts of the country. That is why we are lending our veto to Canada's four regions.

The one clear message we heard on October 30 was that the status quo was no longer acceptable. I have also heard this message from my constituents in Annapolis Valley—Hants. During the referendum campaign and in recent weeks I have spoken with many people on the issue. I have received numerous telephone calls and letters from constituents who have offered many valuable ideas and suggestions. I have moved those suggestions on to the appropriate people.

In Annapolis Valley—Hants people have said clearly that they want Quebec to stay. They have also clearly expressed their desire to be heard on any future constitutional issues. The implementation of a regional veto will achieve both these goals.

It responds to the concerns of Quebecers. For many years Quebec has called for a veto on amendments to the Canadian Constitution. By implementing Bill C–110 we are saying that we want Quebec to be an active participant in the evolution of the Canadian Constitution.

• (1520)

The bill will also protect Quebec against amendments that could diminish its powers, rights and privileges. The government recognizes the legitimacy of Quebec's concerns. Bill C–110 offers strong recognition of the fact that as the nation evolves we must work to ensure constitutional changes are acceptable to all Canada's regions. We also recognize that constitutional change cannot and should not be made if a substantial portion of Canada's population does not approve.

In the final days leading up to the no vote the nationwide grassroots outpouring of public sentiment was a significant factor in the no victory. The giant 150,000–person pro–Canada rally in Montreal was an emotional watershed in Canadian history. Tens of thousands of Quebecers came out and declared their desire to remain in Canada. Canadians from every province came to Quebec to say loud and clear: "We want you to stay".

I was fortunate, along with other members, to have the opportunity to be at that rally. That morning I was in Dorval airport waiting for the unity plane to arrive from Halifax to join with my fellow Nova Scotians and Atlantic Canadians in delivering a message of unity. It gave me the opportunity to share their deep affection for the country. I never felt more proud to be a Canadian.

Some people say Canadians do not wear their flag on their sleeves and do not show their national pride. When the chips are down Canadians are the proudest people of any nation on earth. Now is the time for us to repay the confidence the people of Quebec have shown in us. It is time to prove to Quebecers that their trust is not misplaced.

It is true the initiatives we are now debating will not satisfy leaders of the separatist government in Quebec or separatist members in the House. Quebec leaders have been very vocal in their refusal to negotiate with the federal government. However in so doing they are doing a disservice to their constituents. The people of Quebec are more reasonable than the extremist leaders of the yes camp. These changes will help to restore their faith in Canada.

I support the bill because it addresses the concerns in Quebec and the desire of citizens in all Canada's regions to be heard on constitutional issues. This initiative shows that we have listened to the call for change. We have listened to the people of Quebec and we have listened to our constituents. Now is the time to move forward.

Canada is a continuously changing and evolving federation. By supporting Bill C–110 we can be sure future change will be beneficial to Quebec and all other Canadian regions.

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will be splitting my time with the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster.

It gives me pleasure as a loyal Canadian to rise in the House today to speak to Bill C–110. It is a privilege to stand in the Chamber to outline the reasons I oppose the bill. As someone who was not present as a member of the House when the previous Parliament debated the Meech and Charlottetown initiatives, I nonetheless have an eerie feeling of déjà vu. If the legislation were some grade B horror movie they could very well have called it "Son of Meech".

• (1525)

I must preface my opposition to the bill by noting an old saying I have heard several times in the House: those who do not learn from the mistakes of the past are destined to repeat them. History, or so it would appear, is not a subject with which the framers of the legislation are even remotely acquainted. Those historical remarks come very close to describing the thoughts of all Canadians on the bill.

I listened to the Prime Minister yesterday and I looked at the bill before the House today. I cannot help but ask myself if the Liberal government has not learned anything in 30 years of constitutional wrangling. The answer would clearly appear to be a resounding no. This would be much the same response Canadians everywhere would give to this package if, and it is a big if, they could be given a say in its acceptance or rejection.

The bill does not give the power of veto to the people. It is the very worst kind of top down decision making because it gives the final say to politicians. To this I ask again if hon. members on the other side have learned nothing. Worse yet, this initiative along with the motion tabled in the House yesterday is an action born out of desperation. It is the worst example of so–called leadership we have seen in recent memory.

Without consulting his caucus, the unity committee, the premiers or the Canadian people, Mr. Chrétien has unilaterally offered further appeasement to Quebec separatists.

The Speaker: Order. I know it was probably a slip but we refer to other members by their titles and not by their names.

Mr. Ringma: Forgive me, Mr. Speaker. It was an oversight. I meant the Prime Minister.

In any event I ask the Prime Minister and the government if they have not learned anything from the past. It is clear that the Prime Minister has not. He is determined to allow history to repeat itself. Following his speech yesterday on the other half of this initiative, the hon. member for Beaver River was moved to say it was like listening to former Prime Minister Mulroney defend the Charlottetown accord.

In addition to telling the past, history also affords us the ability to gaze tentatively into the future. That is why when I look at the bill I see past failures along exactly the same lines as those being proposed here.

The bill seeks to implement an amending formula similar to that contained in the Victoria charter of 1971. However, just as insulting to Canadians, the formula was rejected at the time by provincial premiers. The initiative before us does not take into account the realities of today's Canada, that the people of the country want a final say in how their Constitution is amended through referendum. They do not want the process controlled from beginning to end by the political elites of the country. That much should have been learned by the government following the Charlottetown accord.

The bill would certainly place a constitutional straitjacket on any certain constitutional changes, no matter how desirous they might be. The bill would allow the federal government to withdraw its support for any proposed change if either the premier of Ontario or the premier of Quebec did not like it.

• (1530)

In addition, as this bill would not be part of Canada's Constitution so far, the old amending formula would apply as well. The combined effect of this situation means some bizarre form of double jeopardy would apply to proposed constitutional amendments. That is not good.

Beyond that, this bill would not be acceptable to many Canadians because it gives the separatist Government of Quebec a veto over the Canadian Constitution. I ask that the members on the government side think about the consequences of that action for a moment. A separatist government would now be handed a de facto veto over the Constitution of a country it has decided to break apart. Has the Prime Minister thought about the consequences of such an action?

From a personal perspective as a representative from the province of British Columbia, I am offended by this bill. Implicit in it is the notion that British Columbians are relegated to second class status in Confederation. I would also remind members across the way that along with Alberta and Ontario, B.C. is one of the three net contributors to Confederation. All that this legislation serves to do is perpetuate the mindset within the federal government that B.C. and the west is a colony.

When I was a boy in Vancouver some 50 or 60 years ago, I was conscious of a separatist movement within British Columbia at that time. It came about because it was resentful of the treatment accorded the west by central Canadian interests. It seems to me that precious little has changed since then, despite the fact that B.C. is now the third most populous province.

I have a warning for the government across the way. Proposals such as Bill C–110 before us are sure to rekindle the separatist fire in the west. That is something we do not want to have happen.

As a loyal Canadian, I will be voting against this bill every step of the way.

I further encourage members opposite to join with me and do the same if they think about the constitutional consequences of this bill for Canada, if they believe in their heart of hearts that the people of this country, not the governments, are the ones who know what is in their best interests. If they understand the lessons that 30 years of constitutional bickering have taught us, if they truly understand all those things, then they must vote against this bill. To do otherwise is an affront to all Canadians.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Cowichan and the Islands misunderstands the intent of Bill C–110. He claims that the people would like to have the final say in constitutional matters. Bill C–110 does exactly that. Let me explain to the hon. member.

If his great province of British Columbia, a province in which I resided at one time, would like to cast a veto and would like to borrow the federal veto but before doing that it wants to go to the people of British Columbia in a referendum to sanction that action, that is allowed for in Bill C–110.

Bill C–110 in no way stops the people of British Columbia from taking a decision on a constitutional matter. That includes the veto. If the member wants the veto of the province of British Columbia sanctioned by the people, for heaven's sake go right ahead and do it.

I can assure the member that under this legislation, if the province of British Columbia comes to us along with another province in the western region and says, we want a veto cast because we have held a referendum and the people in our province have asked for the veto, it will be respected under this law. There can be no other interpretation. You can respond to that if you like.

• (1535)

The Speaker: Order. I encourage all hon. members to address the Chair instead of speaking to one another.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The previous speaker kept referring to something other than the motion before the House.

The Speaker: We are going to have an answer here from the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan if he cares to have the floor for a minute or two.

Mr. Ringma: Mr. Speaker, the main response I would have for the hon. member is that the intent of this bill is not directed at British Columbia or the west. The intent of the bill is another sop to the separatists of Quebec. That is its total intent. In effect, the west is disregarded, as it has been, as I tried to point out, for the last 50, 60, 70 years. It is a continuation of the same old thing.

Anything the member might say about what wonderful things this will do for the west I reject as nonsense.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the House for the opportunity to speak to Bill C–110.

This is a serious time in the history of our country. I see all the empty chairs across from me. I cannot speak to members who are not here, but you would think there would be more than two Liberal members in the House.

Mr. Harvard: Respect the rules.

The Speaker: I ask all hon. members to refrain from mentioning whether the House is full or empty, who is here and who is not. There are traditions.

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, I know that many Canadians are watching as we debate Bill C–110 which would give veto power over constitutional change to four regions in Canada, one region being the region I am from, western Canada, four provinces with a population of over eight million.

I have been requesting feedback from the province of Saskatchewan. Early indications are that there is absolute rejection of the proposal put forward by the government in Bill C–110 and also in the motion we debated yesterday, the motion on recognizing the distinct society as a special status for the province of Quebec.

I plead with the government to reverse its direction, reverse its position and walk away from the failures of the past, the closed door approach, and embark on a new course of action, an open and an honest approach with clear proposals that are made open to members of the public, that they can access those proposals and that they can also express their opinion in quantifiable ways.

I want to talk about past performance. When we have gone down this road before what has happened? We have two classic examples, the Meech Lake accord and the Charlottetown accord.

I grant that with the Charlottetown accord there was a referendum and Canadians were able to express their opinions. From one end of the country to the other they said no to the Charlottetown accord. They said no in the province of Quebec, but they also said no in the province of Saskatchewan, the province of Alberta, the province of British Columbia and even the province of Nova Scotia.

How do we come up with these concoctions, particularly the Meech Lake accord and the Charlottetown accord? How did we develop something that was rejected so adamantly by Canadians?

It started out with 11 people behind closed doors. If you go back to the Meech Lake accord, it was 10 premiers and the prime minister. It was Prime Minister Mulroney, the Conservative prime minister. They got behind closed doors and began a wheeling and dealing session. We are opening the opportunity for another wheeling and dealing session with Bill C–110.

What happens when they start wheeling and dealing behind closed doors? In Saskatchewan, Premier Devine sat at the table and said: "I will go along with this Meech Lake accord idea, but I want something for it". What did he ask for? He got a billion dollars for the agricultural industry. It was a difficult time for agriculture, so he said: "I will sell my soul for a billion dollars".

I spoke shortly after that decision with an aide of one of his MLAs. This was during the time of the GST debate when the federal government was trying to implement the GST. I said to this member's aide: "Why did our provincial government agree to lend support? Why are we going on with the GST and why are we going along with the Meech Lake accord concept?" Very honestly this assistant said: "You have to do something to get a billion dollars".

• (1540)

We have paid billions of dollars in GST to get that billion dollars. As a province we signed on to the Meech Lake accord even though the people of Saskatchewan opposed it.

Closed door negotiations without including the Canadian public is wrong. More than that it is dangerous. It very costly. It detracts from the reputation of politicians. It gives us a bad name.

We got our billion dollars. Newfoundland got Hibernia. Joe Ghiz in Prince Edward Island got the fixed link. Mr. Bourassa thought he was going to get a special deal for the province of Quebec. We all remember there was a big news story when his staffers got caught talking on a cell phone. They were debating whether or not he had sold out too cheaply, whether he gave up too much. In this cell phone conversation that was recorded some of his assistants felt that Mr. Bourassa had settled for too little.

That tells us they were wheeling and dealing behind closed doors. They were wheeling and dealing with our future. It is wrong. It is dangerous. It is sad that this government is embarking on the exact same course with the implementation of Bill C–110. It needs to be defeated. It will not be accepted by the Canadian people if they have any say in whether it is a success or not.

The same thing was going on in British Columbia. The wonderful thing about modern technology is that some of these politicians get caught. They get tripped up. One of the B.C. cabinet ministers, Moe Sihota, was in the interior of B.C. He did not realize there was a reporter or a camera there or he was not thinking. He talked about how B.C. had got the best of the deal at other provinces' expense.

There was outrage in the province of Quebec. People realized there was wheeling and dealing behind closed doors. There are winners and losers. The winners are not the people. The winners are the politicians who are trying to get re–elected by making these deals behind closed doors. It is shameful and it is disgusting.

What happened with the province of Alberta? Mr. Getty wanted something but it has not lasted. He got the election of a senator. We have elected one senator to the other place and that was through wheeling and dealing with the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords. This one happened to be in relationship to the Charlottetown accord. That was his plum and it did not even last. He got one senator elected and after that we just slipped back into the old patronage system where friends of prime ministers are appointed to the other place. It was not a very valuable plum that the premier of Alberta received from his wheeling and dealing behind closed doors.

The previous prime minister, Mr. Mulroney, has been in the news a great deal lately. He was involved in this wheeling and dealing. How did he describe this whole process? He described it as the rolling of the dice. Do you remember that, Mr. Speaker? You remember how incensed Canadians were. It began the demise of the former prime minister as Canadians began to realize these people were not looking out for the best interests of Canadians. They were out to protect their own hides and wheel and deal and see what they could get. They were gambling with our future. It was repulsive to Canadians then and I assure the House, as sure as I am standing here, it is repulsive to Canadians today.

If we give the regions a constitutional veto through their governments alone and bypass the people, there will be wheeling and dealing again. As sure as I am standing here there will be closed door negotiations. They will be sitting in a hotel room somewhere deciding who gets how many senators. They will deciding what distinct society means. They will be deciding what special privileges this confers on the province of Quebec. They will be deciding what plums the province of Ontario gets, if they go back to this wrongful way of deciding our country's future.

It is time for a new direction. It is time to bypass governments and their whips. It can be said these 11 people represent the electorate because they were voted in. I have been here long enough to know that the way the electorate are represented in this House is by way of the traditional party whips who whip their members into voting for legislation. I have been told and I believe that the same thing happens in our provincial legislatures.

You have given power to eleven people without giving true accountability to the public if you allow the provincial governments to have a veto, bypassing the people and not allowing them to speak their minds through a referendum. In most cases Canadians will reject the approach of determining our country's future behind closed doors.

I conclude by expressing how important this is. We are not talking about fishing violations. We are not talking about registering a pesticide. We are talking about the future of our country. We are talking about the operations manual for the future of our country. This will have an impact on my three children. It will have an impact on our grandchildren. It will impact future generations, who will ask how eleven people managed to wheel and deal their future away and no one rose to speak against it.

I am standing against this process. It is wrong. It is harmful to Canada. It is harmful to our reputation as a democracy. It cannot go on. It has to stop. Canadians keep telling us to stop. When will the government listen and abide by the wishes of the people?

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have to rise again because I cannot believe what I am hearing from the other side of the House.

Bill C–110 has to do with lending the federal veto; it has nothing to do with enabling a constitutional initiative. This has nothing to do with a province wanting to change the Constitution. This is simply a matter of a veto, providing it through federal legislation, offering it to the four regions of the country.

I do not think a service is provided to the Canadian people when this kind of disinformation is disseminated across the country by the Reform Party.

Let us get this straight: this piece of legislation does not change the Constitution one iota. This is a narrow initiative having to do with the veto, having to do with offering the federal veto to the four regions. It is as simple as that. It is unjust, it is wrong, and it certainly is spreading disinformation to speak otherwise.

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, in responding to the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James, we are not talking about a change to the Constitution, but about a new constitutional procedure that could be implemented under the seven and fifty rule.

We are talking about using the legislatures of the provinces twice to try to implement something behind closed doors, rather than going to the Canadian people to ask them directly what their opinion is and then having that ratified by the seven and fifty formula, seven provinces with fifty per cent of the population agreeing to the constitutional change.

This is a very dangerous bill. It is trying to pit province against province. It is trying to find out who will put forward the best deal. B.C. and Manitoba in the western provinces, or Nova Scotia and Newfoundland in the Atlantic provinces, can somehow concoct a deal with the federal government, with the support of Ontario and Quebec, to change our Constitution without going to the Canadian public. Once that is done, the second step is much easier, which is getting seven provinces with fifty per cent of the population to agree to the constitutional change. It is sneaky, it is crafty, and it is wrong. It should be stopped.

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House today to speak on Bill C–110, an act respecting constitutional amendments. I applaud the Minister of Justice for bringing forth such legislation at a time when our country is looking to its politicians for direction. I feel that this legislation is an important first step toward involving the provinces more directly in the introduction of constitutional amendments that directly affect their respective citizens.

I was in Verdun on the Tuesday before the referendum and I heard the Prime Minister's commitments to Quebecers and to Canadians. I was in Montreal on the Friday for the incredible unity rally with a large delegation from my South Shore riding and with some of my family. I experienced the incredible goodwill and outpouring of affection for Quebec and of course for Canada that occurred in Montreal. There were 150,000 of us, but we represented many more.

Those of us who were there and the many others we represented came away from Montreal with a renewed commitment to Canada and a greater understanding of what this country is all about. We also recognized that there would have to be changes in the federation of Canada, not only a recognition but a will to see that this would be done. We left Montreal fearful for Canada but confident and recognizing that after the vote the promised changes would have to be implemented.

After an agonizing Monday evening we all woke up on Tuesday morning realizing that we had almost lost our country, almost lost Canada. We also woke up with a renewed will to do what had to be done to ensure that Canada was not destroyed. There was a recognition that Quebecers voted for change but change within Canada.

This bill and the distinct society motion are both a fulfilment of the Prime Minister's commitment made in Verdun and a beginning of the change Quebec voted for, which Canadians support.

In a federation like Canada there is a delicate balance of power between the provinces and the federal government. Throughout our country's history it has not been easy to maintain this balance and appease the entire country. Let us face it, Canada is both the most decentralized country in the world and the largest. People want to maintain their own identity associated with their respective province. Yet many of our most fundamental services are centralized in the federal government.

I feel very close to my home province of Nova Scotia and to Newfoundland, my province of birth. Yet I am most certainly a federalist. It is important to maintain certain services at a national level so that this diverse country remains the same in some ways and creates a common bond among all Canadians.

I believe this bill is very important to Canada as a federation. It is not easy for any federal government to accommodate all facets of its society. This bill is a step toward hearing the voices of the provinces, especially in cases where amendments put forth by the government could be detrimental to a particular region of the country.

As I said previously, Canada's federation is a balancing act. The desires of all provinces must be taken into consideration and given their due weight in the entire scheme of things. The way in which the veto power will work I am sure was not an easy thing to determine. However, the formula that has been decided upon is in my view satisfactory. This particular formula is a replica of the formula contained in the Victoria charter, which has been discussed in constitutional circles for decades. Even as recently as 1991 this formula was recommended for adoption.

The provinces will now be doubly protected in constitutional matters that directly affect them. This, in conjunction with the Prime Minister's motion on distinct society, is part of what Quebec has been asking for. I believe the other provinces will be pleased to have the same power to veto.

The balancing act I have mentioned is not only between the federal government and the provinces, it is also among the provinces. Provinces, like people, feel it is paramount to maintain equality with their counterparts and receive equal treatment. That is why I am pleased this bill will make regions within Canada equal to all other regions. Most important, the veto will involve all ten provinces, not just one. The balance has been maintained.

Coming from a province the size of Nova Scotia, I am pleased that the veto has been extended to all of the regions. It will serve as an added protection to all provinces, especially for smaller provinces, as in Atlantic Canada. The fact that the provinces included in the regions are either alone or grouped together with provinces with similar demographics makes the bill both fair and equitable.

• (1555)

The new veto is especially important to Quebec. Quebecers should have the right to halt a constitutional amendment that could endanger the preservation of their distinct culture, language, and civil law. It is unfortunate, however, that the Bloc Quebecois will not accept this bill as a first step toward what should be our common goals. The Bloc will do everything in its power to discredit this type of action, although any other action, be it constitutional amendment or whatever, would prove to them to be unacceptable.

The agenda of the official opposition is to have Quebec separate from Canada. Hon. members opposite should accept reality and come to the realization that Quebecers voted to stay within Canada. We on the government side have recognized this fact and are dealing with it. This bill is a first step toward improving our country and making some necessary changes.

While the Bloc will argue that this bill does not go far enough, the Reform Party will argue that it goes too far. The Reform Party will agree to change only if that change means nothing. There are some members of Parliament who would like to separate Quebec from Canada. There are other members of Parliament who would like to separate Canada from Quebec. These people will never be satisfied.

The Constitution is up for review before April 1997. It will be counterproductive to have constitutional talks now rather than waiting for the review to take place so that we know if and where changes are needed. This bill, as I have said, is the first step toward fixing what needs to be fixed in Canada. I believe it will be quite productive to deal with one issue at a time, as the Prime Minister is presently doing.

Quebecers who voted in the referendum want Parliament to prove we are listening to them. Canadians who wished they could have been at the rally in Montreal want Parliament to prove we are listening to them. Canadians want Parliament to make sure we do not lose sight of the forest for the trees.

I hope those Canadians who invested their hearts in the rally in Montreal will see that Parliament is working hard to make a difference for the better. I hope Quebecers and all Canadians will encourage their members of Parliament, regardless of their party affiliations, to vote for this progressive course of action.

This bill is central to the accommodation of the diverse cultures that are evident in Canada's four regions.

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure today to speak in favour of the actions being undertaken by our government to further the process of ensuring a united Canada. Our actions will recognize the reality of Quebec as a distinct society, increase veto power, and move to eliminate duplication in the area of training.

Prior to the victory for national unity in the recent referendum in Quebec, Canadians from all provinces told us they wanted Quebec to stay in Canada. They told us they understood Quebec's frustration, understood that we must make changes to address the needs of our fellow Canadians in Quebec. They told us they recognize the depth of the emotion and they understand its source.

We promised Quebec and the rest of Canada we would deliver change to them. We promised them this was not just lip service, but an actual desire, willingness and commitment to achieve change for lasting unity in Canada.

I contrast that to the actions of the third party, whose solution to this problem is to pit region against region, one part of Canada against another part of Canada, and whose view of this nation is one in which national standards are gutted so that the right become richer and the poor are abandoned.

We in the Liberal Party believe in Canada, a Canada that includes our historic First Nations, the founding European people, both French and English, and the many who have come since who have added to the diversity of this great country.

• (1600)

We believe in a Canada in which its citizens collectively have accepted a social responsibility to maintain a social safety net, including health care, education, security for seniors and income support for the unemployed. Most of all, we believe in a Canada built on compassion and inclusion, not the hate and the division preached by some in this country.

Part of the action we are undertaking addresses one of the issues of foremost importance to Quebec. It recognizes that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada. It recognizes those items that make Quebec distinct: a French speaking majority, a unique culture, and a tradition of civil law. These distinctions are not new. They do not exist at the expense of other parts of the country. It is time that Canada officially recognized this reality.

Our initiative to recognize Quebec's distinct society within Canada is part of our overall commitment to change. That includes the concepts in Bill C–110 which gives all of the regions of Canada, including Quebec, a veto in matters of constitutional change.

As a result of this bill, we will require the consent of Quebec, Ontario and the Atlantic and western regions before any constitutional amendments will be accepted by the Parliament of Canada. This will ensure that all provinces will be active participants in any evolution of the Canadian Constitution. It will protect the regions of Canada against amendments that could potentially diminish their powers, rights and privileges.

We are also introducing measures to give the provinces jurisdiction over training to eliminate program overlap and to give all provinces the flexibility they need to deliver training effectively. These are strong first steps toward refining our relationship with Quebec and building a stronger Canada. These are part of our commitment to Canada and to all Canadians.

We live in the greatest country in the world. All members and our constituents, we are Canada. What we do in the House affects all Canadians. Our goal is to preserve all that is great about Canada and to change that which needs to be changed. These are the reasons we will achieve lasting unity. By working together, by listening to each other, by honouring our commitment to change, we demonstrate our commitment to each other and to the country. That will be our legacy to future generations of Canadians.

I think we are on the right track. Members of the third party think we have gone too far. Members of the official opposition think we have not gone far enough. I believe both of these parties have not thought this through. They are fighting to gain control for their own self–serving purposes while our government is fighting for Canadians and for Canada. That is what is important now. Our actions speak louder than their words.

Several weeks ago I was on a bus that came from my riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka. It was filled with constituents who wanted to be at the giant national unity rally in Montreal to show Quebecers they were committed to a united Canada and to making change so that Canada works better for all of its citizens.

As parliamentarians, we are now charged with the responsibility and the privilege of following through with our promises, of living up to the faith and the trust that Quebecers and Canadians placed in our hands following the referendum. We will not let our country down. We will proceed logically and practically to build on Canada's strength to work for conciliation and to better the lives of all our citizens.

These measures are both important and meaningful. What is more significant, they are achievable in the short term. We can simply recognize the reality that Quebec is a distinct society, that all regions of Canada want to have a say in constitutional change and we are doing that quickly and expeditiously.

The action can later be entrenched in our Constitution if we so desire, providing Quebec indicates its desire to do so. Granted, if the Leader of the Opposition becomes the next premier of Quebec he has already indicated that he certainly does not want Quebec's distinctiveness to be entered into the Constitution.

• (1605)

The member for Lac–Saint–Jean talks from both sides of his mouth, as they say. He demands change for Quebec but when it is offered, even before the details are known, he rejects not the proposal but the very fact that it is offered. He does not appear to care about trying to make Quebec a better place in which to live. He certainly does not care about Canada as he constantly ignores the oath he took when he came to this place as he tries to destroy this country. He cares only for power and his place in the sun.

I believe in my country. I believe in a united Canada from coast to coast to coast. As proud Canadians, we will not soon forget the overwhelming show of support we saw for national unity across Canada leading up to the referendum in Quebec. We will not forget that historic moment on October 30 when Quebecers voted to remain in Canada.

I am very pleased to add my support to my government's pledge for lasting national unity. I am pleased we will achieve our goals quickly and that we will soon return to our task of building an economy in which jobs and growth occur.

I pledge my continued support for this great country, Canada. All of us in this place are here for what will be a blink in Canada's history. In that short time I have a sacred duty and an obligation to my children and my children's children not to let the forces attempting to destroy this country succeed. The people of Canada will stand united and the Government of Canada will ensure that together we remain one strong nation both proud and free.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member criticized our leader for saying he did not agree with the distinct society resolution proposed by the government and did not agree either with the veto proposal.

I think the hon. member failed to realize that the distinct society proposal does not give Quebec any power, any opportunity to be distinct.

In fact, what we want is not a piece of paper that offers meaningless recognition of the distinct society concept. Our leader reminded the Prime Minister of this yesterday. So I think the hon. member did not quite grasp the purport of this offer.

First of all, it is not an offer that will be entrenched in the Constitution, and by the way, at the same time they are saying we have a veto. Today, they announced Quebec had a veto. However, they are giving the same veto to the other regions as well. If you give a veto to everyone, it is no longer a veto. It becomes meaningless, because the other regions could use their veto to block Quebec's legitimate demands.

I think this is a trap. They would have Quebecers believe that the government is responding to their aspirations by offering a veto and recognition as a distinct society. I hardly think Quebecers will fall for that.

I have this question for the hon. member. Did he realize what was involved or was his speech prepared by the Prime Minister's Privy Council Office or would he just have Quebecers believe they are not smart enough to understand what the government is offering us today?

[English]

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the hon. member, I will answer very plainly.

• (1610)

If the Bloc Quebecois really believes that Quebec is a distinct society, if it really believes that Quebec should have a veto, if it really believes in the decentralization and the turning over of manpower training to the provinces, then Bloc members can prove it very simply and very clearly: vote for the resolution, vote for Bill C–110 and do what they say.

When the hon. member talks as he just has, all he is doing is listing a series of excuses of why Bloc members will not do what they said all along they wanted to have happen. It is all political double–talk. If they want Quebec to be a distinct society, then they should vote for the resolution. If they want Quebec to have a veto, then they should vote for Bill C–110. If you want control over manpower training, then vote for Mr. Axworthy's reforms when he brings those forward. It is fairly straightforward.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Colleagues, I understand the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka has concluded his remarks. I will simply remind the House in two areas. In the one instance all interventions must be made through the Chair and not directly across the floor from one member to the other, and members should be referred to either by their riding or their portfolio.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the comments made by my hon. colleague from Parry Sound—Muskoka.

When we look at Bill C–110 we are looking at nothing new. We have looked at this kind of approach to the unity question in Canada for the last number of years and it is a failure. If anyone questions the failure of this kind of approach as contained within Bill C–110, all we have to do is look across the floor every question period and see the evidence of that failure which sits 53 strong in this House. For years and years and years we have heard this same kind of approach and it has failed.

One of the most discouraging aspects about this bill is the process. At least two premiers have expressed vehement opposition to it. If the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka believes it is just us Reformers who are trying to split factions and have factions fight against factions, let me quote from the front page of the Globe and Mail. Mr. Roger Gibbins, a political scientist at the University of Calgary, says: "This is little short of a constitutional coup d'état by the Prime Minister". Mr. Philip Resnick, a political scientist at the University of British Columbia, states: "The Prime Minister hasn't just got a Quebec crisis on his hands, he may also have an incipient revolt of the western provinces on his hands".

I would ask the hon. member to consider those comments. We are getting all sorts of comments like that from our western colleagues. Surely there must have been some lessons learned from the Charlottetown accord and the Meech Lake accord. Surely that top down approach in process alone spells doom and failure in terms of acceptance by the people of this country, particularly in the area where I am from.

I ask my hon. colleague if he would respectfully address those areas that we have to deal with in dealing with this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I would simply ask the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka for his co–operation for a brief response. When members are splitting their time, the time of five minutes for debate is very short. Therefore the questions must be put succinctly and we must hope that the responses are brief also.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I will be brief but I will not be able to address everything the member raised.

This is a time in Canada when we need to put the nation first. It is possible to be regionalistic in an approach. It is possible to put the interests of our region first. However it is not appropriate in this case. In this case Canada has to come first. Canadians have to come first. That is what we ought to do.

• (1615)

This plan will work. These measures will work. There is a time when it might need to be constitutionalized, but we are not talking about the Constitution today. We do not want to get into a long series of where we were in the late 1980s and the 1990s. We have an economy to deal with. We have jobs to create. Let us get this done. Let us do it quickly and do it in the interest of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity today to speak to Bill C–110, which deals with the regional veto.

First, we can say that this year, which is now drawing to a close, was the year of the referendum on the future of Quebec. In fact, on October 30, nearly 94 per cent of registered voters exercised their right to vote. It was an exemplary and laudable exercise in democracy. In this referendum, 50.6 per cent of the population of Quebec said no to the sovereignty and partnership proposal of the Quebec government.

We accept the outcome, although the margin was very narrow, because we always said, unlike Jean Chrétien, that we would abide by the verdict—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I simply want to remind the House that members should always be referred to by their riding or their portfolio. In this case, the Prime Minister.

Mr. Bergeron: I stand corrected.

Unlike the Prime Minister, we always said we would abide by the decision of Quebecers.

Democracy is the very foundation of the sovereignist movement, which will be guided in the pursuit of its ideal by a respect for democratic values and principles, while abiding by the democratic decision made by the people of Quebec. Meanwhile, it behooves us to keep calm and pull together after this vote of historic importance, until our next rendezvous with history.

However, the extremely close results of the referendum should give the no side something to think about. The ball is now in the federalist court. They will have to move with those winds of change they claimed to feel, all of a sudden, during the latter part of the campaign when the yes side was ahead. But they must realize that after this referendum Quebecers will no longer be satisfied with merely cosmetic changes to outmoded and meaningless formulas or with vague and inconsistent administrative and legislative reforms.

The vote on October 30 clearly indicated the desire of Quebecers to be recognized for what they are, a people. To provide that recognition within the Canadian federal system, major constitutional changes will be necessary.

The question was, would the federal government be willing to make those changes and would it be supported by the provinces and the rest of Canada?

The howls of protest that went up in English Canada indicated it would probably never respond to the legitimate aspirations of Quebecers. As for the Prime Minister, considering his past record, he seems clearly incapable of keeping his promises.

Promises for change were hastily drafted by the federalist camp during the last days of the referendum campaign. These promises were not made in a flurry of enthusiasm; quite the contrary, they were motivated by fear that the yes side would win.

Last Monday, we saw the apotheosis of the panic operation that started during the last weeks of the referendum campaign. As soon as the Leader of the Opposition came on the scene to lead the yes side, the federalist forces realized there was a real possibility they would be defeated.

To prevent this from happening, the Prime Minister, in a last ditch effort, promised Quebecers that changes would be made in Canadian federalism if the no side won. It was the threat of defeat, nothing else, that forced the federal government to promise what it cannot deliver. That is obvious if we consider, in chronological order, the statements made by Prime Minister.

Given the speech made in early October in the Maritimes, in which he ridiculed the idea of enshrining Quebec's distinct nature in the Constitution, and given his stubborn opposition, until October 24, to any change in the federal structure, we can only conclude that the Prime Minister has an aversion to the issue of Quebec. In fact, the promises for change he made in the last week of the referendum campaign were vague, and no specific proposal was put forward at the time.

Remember what the Prime Minister said, on the evening of October 30: "For the second time in 15 years, we went through a difficult and emotional period. We must now contemplate innovative solutions, so as to never again go through such an existential crisis". Let us not forget that, even at the very end of the referendum campaign, the federal government did not have any concrete and innovative constitutional proposal to make to Quebecers. The government knew that it had to make some kind of an offer, but that was it.

The very narrow no side victory forced federalists to quickly make proposals to Quebec. The federal government hastily set up a cabinet committee to make such proposals. However, from the moment it was set up, it was clear that this was a phoney committee, with no real mandate and no real power. The same goes for the Quebec Liberal Party, which adopted a constitutional position, if you can call it that, only last weekend. Everything was done on the spur of the moment by people who are still unable to listen to and agree with the will of Quebecers.

The deafness of the federalist leaders became even more apparent on Monday, with the federal government's proposals. These proposals deal with three specific issues: manpower training, Quebec's distinct nature, and the granting of a regional veto. In the Prime Minister's mind, these proposals give concrete expression to commitments made during the referendum campaign. But what do these proposals really mean? Nothing, absolutely nothing, because they will be entirely dependent on the mood of the government in office, since none of the proposals will be enshrined in the Canadian Constitution.

At best, these proposals will become trivial motions that are not binding on anyone. This is what the Liberal government opposite is intending for the concept of a distinct society. At most, they will be tabled and passed in the House like ordinary legislation, which may be revoked at any time by this government or by some future government. This is where the government wants to relegate manpower training and the right of veto.

What is really apparent in the November 27 proposals is the irreconcilability of Quebec's traditional claims with English Canada's position. We can see, in reading Bill C–110, that never before has the granting of a veto been so devoid of value. Let us be honest, this veto, which is apparently being offered to Quebecers is simply on loan, so long as Quebec does what the federal government wants.

To illustrate this, we have only to look at the present position of our colleagues in the Reform Party on the veto for the regions and recognition of Quebec as a distinct society. Reformers clearly see Quebec as just another province and therefore will never accept the concept of a distinct society, even if it were to mean nothing—which in fact it does. Obviously, the same applies to the veto for the regions, which to them means giving a sovereignist government a veto over Canada's future, at least that is what they claim.

The Leader of the Reform Party has already indicated he would revoke the veto of Quebec, Ontario and the other regions in Canada if he ever came to power. In saying so he reveals ever so clearly, even before it is enacted, the ridiculousness of the Prime Minister's proposal. Given that the veto proposed for Quebec would be granted only through ordinary legislation, the Reform Party, once in power, could simply repeal or amend it.

• (1625)

Paradoxically, the mechanisms that are supposed to prevent amendments to the Canadian Constitution without the consent of Quebec could be dropped just like that. In fact, since the veto powers of Quebec and the other Canadian regions are not entrenched in the Canadian Constitution, it will always be possible for a political party like the Reform Party, for instance, to deprive Quebec of its veto.

The same applies to the distinct society resolution. Here again, a future Reform Party government would have no compunction about revoking this simple resolution, thus abolishing a meaningless concept.

The bill before us today illustrates the authoritarian and paternalistic approach of the Canadian government, which is refusing to safeguard the interests of Quebec. All this reminds me of an old trick people use to play. They would take a wallet that was ostensibly full of money and put it on the ground, attached to a fairly thin thread that would be practically invisible to the potential victim. Then they would squat behind a bush and wait. As soon as the victim saw the wallet he would try to pick it up, but every time, the other person would jerk the thread and pull the wallet away. This could go on for some time until there was no more thread left to pull or the victim realized what was going on or simply gave up. In fact, until the victim gave up chasing after something he would never be able to get.

This is like the Prime Minister's constitutional promises. This week it was obvious that he wanted to give the impression there was a nice package for us on the table while in fact, he has the proverbial thread which he can use to take the package back, if he wants to.

Furthermore, and this is an important point, Bill C–110 gives the federal government considerable latitude when it must define what constitutes the consent of a province. Of course, this was all planned by the federal government, because it wants to keep the latitude it needs to test the veto granted to a region. There are at least seven ways for a province to signify its consent or refusal to Ottawa.

It could be a resolution of the legislative assembly, an order in council, an order signed by a provincial minister, an order signed by a province's lieutenant–governor, a provincial referendum organized by a province, a federal referendum in one or several provinces, or a vote by the federal members of a given province.

It could easily be imagined that the federal government could hold a referendum in Quebec to get the province's agreement, sidestepping the government democratically elected by the people of Quebec.

On the other hand, the federal plan to give a veto to the regions is already meeting strong opposition on the part of some English provinces. For instance, Alberta is against this principle because it believes that all provinces are equal and, as such, it cannot accept not to have its own veto.

British Columbia is also opposed to the idea of a regional veto since, under the present formula, it does not have one. Moreover, Mr. Harcourt, the province's premier, believes that British Columbia should have its own veto since, in his opinion, it is a region in itself. We can see that this right of veto—as pointed out recently by columnists, observers, and Quebec political analysts—, and the vague and insipid principle of a distinct society are far less than what Quebec has always asked for. Some even say that there is a long way to go before meeting Quebec's historical demands.

I would even go so far as to say this is a real setback for Quebec. This is unacceptable. As soon as each region obtains a veto, and is therefore able to impact on the decisions of the federal government, this government is no longer in a position to entrench the principle of distinct society or the special veto for Quebec in the Constitution. The federal government will no longer be able to recognize these principles in the Canadian Constitution if the other regions obtain a veto on all federal actions and all constitutional amendments. The government therefore knows that it is guarding itself against any constitutional entrenchment of the very principles it is trying to sell us today.

At the individual level, on the subject of a veto for Quebec, there is evident dichotomy between public opinion in Quebec and in the rest of Canada.

A Gallup poll conducted November 8 to 13, where 1,005 persons were polled, showed that 66 per cent of Quebecers want Quebec to obtain a veto. On the other hand, only 10 p. 100 of the people polled in other provinces support that concept. In fact, 78 per cent of respondents in the prairies, 77 per cent in the Atlantic provinces, 70 per cent in British Columbia and 68 per cent in Ontario are opposed to it.

These data clearly show that, outside Quebec, the support for a Quebec veto is slight. This confirms that Quebec could easily lose its veto after a change of government at the federal level since any future federal government will certainly want to obtain the support of all Canadians and that will be at the expense of Quebec.

Finally, what can we say about this federal initiative launched in chaos and panic only a few weeks ago? As I have just said and explained, the Ottawa's proposals, meant to fulfil the promises the Prime Minister made to the Quebec people during the last referendum campaign, are nothing but smoke and mirrors. The truth is, we are facing a large scale camouflage operation whereby the federal government is trying, once again, to hide from the people the fact that it is unable to radically change the Canadian federal system.

Quebec has always had legitimate demands and aspirations within this system. But these demands and aspirations were never met. Realizing that, after the referendum on sovereignty, the demands would be higher than ever, the Canadian Prime Minister did not even try to find a solution to the problems plaguing the country he is heading. Instead he tried a bit of sleight of hand and gave us crumbs.

As I said, the Prime Minister is trying to put one over on us; he would have Quebecers believe that he is making a grand gesture towards Quebec, but what he does not say is that his grand gesture means absolutely nothing.

Not only is the Prime Minister's action totally meaningless, he is trying to make the population believe that he cannot do more in the area of pseudo–changes because the sovereignist government in Quebec would prevent him from going ahead with them in any case. For the federal government it is a way of blaming others for its problems.

The Prime Minister has taken great care to avoid saying that his proposal for amending the Canadian Constitution would meet with strong opposition, perhaps an even more so from some of the other Canadian provinces than from Quebec itself. Instead, he has blamed the sovereignist government, refusing to acknowledge—when the federal government is asking us to acknowledge the people's verdict—that the people of Quebec elected that government democratically and legitimately and—I would remind our colleagues opposite—they elected a majority of sovereignist members in this House as well.

Knowing that, how could we accept offers from the federal government that are so weak they are light years away from the Meech Lake accord and from Charlottetown proposals, which also meant nothing or next to nothing.

• (1635)

How could we accept something that is even less than what Robert Bourassa himself never accepted? How could we ever claim to have the moral and political authority to put ourselves in a position of extreme weakness relative to the rest of Canada?

No, the Bloc Quebecois, which I am part of, will never agree to such a window dressing operation by the Canadian federal government. We will not be the accomplices of the Prime Minister of Canada in this senseless approach. The Bloc Quebecois will therefore vote against this bill, because it means absolutely nothing for Quebec. It is a meaningless bill and, furthermore, it does not provide any guarantee for the future, any guarantee for Quebec.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to see that the opposition is not necessarily ready to recognize the people's verdict of October 30, because the other day, as you know full well, members of the Liberal opposition in Quebec asked the Quebec government and its Premier to respect, and above all to recognize, that verdict.

I find it strange that the PQ government refuses to recognize the fact that Quebecers have chosen to remain within the Canadian federation.

Having said that, I still have a few questions for him. For Quebec, the motion as tabled, the resolution in question, is aimed at regaining a veto that was abandoned by the former PQ government, the 1981 government of which the hon. member for Mercier was a member. I find it strange that they do not want to regain this veto that the PQ government forsook in 1981.

We are talking about change, about sincere change. The other day, opposition members accused us federal Liberals of dragging our feet. They said that they were still waiting. That the referendum was over. We have now come up with a serious proposal, which is obviously a step in the right direction, but I must tell you that, while we are in favour of enshrining this veto, and especially Quebec's distinct society, in the Canadian Constitution, we are asking the provinces to invite the Canadian Parliament to entrench this concept, this Quebec reality, in the Canadian Constitution.

That is why we are asking the opposition to do the same thing, because the Leader of the Opposition, as we know full well, supported the concept of Quebec's distinct society not so long ago. Unfortunately, they are not ready to do so, and that is why we made a formal commitment not to enshrine anything in the Canadian Constitution without the support and consent of Quebecers, and above all of their National Assembly.

I urge the hon. member of the opposition to pressure his leader, who will likely become Premier of Quebec, into making a public commitment today in the House of Commons to tell Quebecers that he, too, will recognize Quebec as a distinct society and ask Parliament to ensure that this principle is entrenched in the Canadian Constitution.

Mr. Bergeron: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine for his comments more than for his questions, since there were few questions in his comments.

I would say that we, of course, recognized the decision made by Quebecers on October 30, as evidenced by the fact that we are still sitting as members of this House and taking part in proceedings. We as Quebecers are still paying our taxes to this government and complying with federal laws and regulations. We therefore respect the decision made by the people of Quebec.

I would remind my esteemed colleague from Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine that Quebecers simply rejected a proposal from the Quebec government. Their no vote does not mean that they are willing to accept just anything. Despite the claims made by our friends across the way, the no vote is no indication of Quebecers' attachment to Canada.

They simply rejected a proposal. That is all. One thing is for certain: by voting no, Quebecers did not indicate that they would be happy with any symbolic trifle like what the government is now trying to sell us. Accepting this kind of trifle does not imply a recognition of the decision made by Quebecers. Rather, it is the government that does not abide by their decision by trying to pull the wool over their eyes.

As for that famous right of veto, the government continues to try to fool us, to have Quebecers believe that at one time they had such a veto, that they could have used it but that the then premier of Quebec gave it up. The fact is that the Quebec premier of the time did not give up anything. The Supreme Court, that august assembly of Canadian judges, ruled that Quebec never had any veto. Therefore, we could not give up something we never had.

The government wants us to believe that this bill will re-introduce this vague notion of veto power, which never really existed, as confirmed by the Supreme Court. In order to be valid, that power would have to be enshrined in the Constitution. However, this is not what is proposed in the bill, quite the contrary. The bill ensures that neither the concept of distinct society, nor Quebec's veto power will ever be entrenched in the Constitution since the other Canadian provinces, or regions as they are now called by the federal government, could use their own veto to oppose the entrenchment of these two basic concepts.

The member opposite should know that, traditionally, constitutional negotiations have always carried high expectations but invariably produced very little. Now, the government would have us believe that, for the first time in history, in spite of the current political situation, these meagre and minimalist proposals will ultimately turn into big and beautiful things for Quebec and the rest of Canada. It goes without saying that no one believes that except, of course, the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine.

As for the concept of distinct society, the hon. member should know that Quebecers have reached the point where they will definitely not settle for anything less than their recognition as a nation. Quebec is a nation and wants to be recognized as such, and not merely by a vague and meaningless motion in this House.

As for accepting the results of the October 30 referendum, the hon. member should know that we could never—as indicated by the current leader of the opposition and future Quebec premier—accept less than Meech, which was rejected, and Charlottetown, which Quebecers rejected. What is being proposed now is not even close to Meech, and not even remotely close to Charlottetown.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I shed a tear for truth. From time to time in the chamber truth comes under great strain and I think this is one of those times.

Earlier in his speech the hon. member for Verchères described himself and other separatists in the province of Quebec as victims. They live in Canada, one of the greatest countries in the world and he has the gall to say he is a victim. We have one of the greatest charters of rights and freedoms in the world and he says he is a victim. He stands in the highest court in the land he spouts his separatism and his separatist complaints and he describes himself as a victim. Give me a break.

The member says that the ball is now in our court. Exactly and what is the Prime Minister doing? He made two specific promises in the referendum and he is acting on those promises right now.

The member says that Bill C–110 is a watered down approach. What was Meech Lake? Was it watered down? Was it acceptable to the separatists? No. What about Charlottetown? Was it watered down? Was it acceptable to the separatists in Quebec? I do not think so. Is there anything on the face of the earth that would be acceptable to the separatists in Quebec short of giving them a new country? The answer is no. He can answer the question, yes or no. If he wants to be honest he will say no.

• (1645)

[Translation]

Mr. Bergeron: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James for his question.

First, the hon. member would certainly do well to reread my speech tomorrow in Hansard, for I never claimed that we were victims. Quebec has gone far beyond that in its historical development. Quebec is not a victim, it is simply a people.

I did say that the ball is now in the federalist court—I hope he is listening in the foyer—the ball is in the federalist court, but the federalists should not keep the ball to themselves.

That being said, I would like to get back to his statement that separatists, as he calls them, were in disagreement with the Meech Lake accord and with the Charlottetown accord. First, it has to be said that if he goes over the history of this again and if he tries to remember the events that led up to the Meech Lake accord, he will realize that there are people who are sovereignists today who, at the time, were in favour of Meech.

The Leader of the Opposition is a fitting example. He was in favour of the Meech Lake accord. The hon. Leader of the Opposition was in favour of Meech.

The Meech Lake accord, which represented the most minimal conditions Quebec had ever put forward, having been rejected, how could we, the sovereignists, accept less that Meech with the Charlottetown accord?

Of course, to answer the hon. member's question, all of the sovereignists were against Charlottetown.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before I hear the hon. member on a point of order, I just want to say that the word "dignified" was used and I am very pleased to see how dignified this debate in the House of Commons is.

The hon. secretary of State on a point of order.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask, through the Chair, if there is unanimous consent to extend the sitting until 11 p.m. tonight, so that we can go on with this debate on Bill C–110.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

NOTICE OF TIME ALLOCATION MOTION

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it was not possible to reach an agreement pursuant to Standing Orders 78(1) and 78(2) with respect to the proceedings at second reading of Bill C–110, An Act respecting constitutional amendments.

Therefore, I give notice that, at the next sitting of the House, pursuant to Standing Order 78(3), I will be moving a time allocation motion for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at that stage.

[English]

CONSIDERATION OF SECOND READING

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the series of motions and the legislation before us today essentially come down to three items: the issue of the regional veto, the distinct society and attempts to further improve the economy of the country with more devolution and reorganization of economic activity between the provinces and the federal government.

This all must be considered in light of the fact that in approximately 18 months a meeting between the provinces and the federal government will be required to consider the 15th anniversary of the 1982 agreements with respect to amendment and that must be borne in mind at all times. As described by the Minister of Justice, this is a bridge to the meeting which will take place 18 months hence. Those who would like to have the motion, the resolution and the economic measures expanded to something greater should recognize that.

• (1650)

Some of the suggestions I have heard, particularly from the Reform Party, would take over a year to implement. There would have to be a full discussion, meetings and the whole long rigmarole which we remember from Charlottet own. It should be understood that this is not a substitute for the 1997 meeting which will be held between the provinces and the federal government.

The distinct society definition is quite limited. The wording has been very carefully chosen. It is that the House recognize that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada and that the House recognize that Quebec's distinct society includes its French speaking majority, its unique culture and its civil law tradition. These are important parts of the Canadian reality which are generally understood and accepted across the country. Wherever one may be in Canada it is well known that there are these three elements of Quebec society which distinguish that society from the societies of all other provinces and territories.

It is also important to recognize that Canada is not a homogeneous country. It is a country of many variations: regional variations, variations in its population, where it came from, how settlement has developed and how attitudes have developed. It is that diversity which we celebrate so often and which makes Canada one of the more unique countries of the world. It is an important part of the Canadian reality. It was that long before 1867.

We have to remember that diversity means there are differing needs and differing aspirations in the different regions of the country. Historically, provincial differences have dictated the need for different approaches. The British North America Act and the changes which were implemented in 1982 with the Constitution have made it perfectly clear that we have historically recognized those differences. If we go back beyond 1841 we will find that the differences within Canada have always been recognized in constitutional documents. It is one of the reasons so much of the country has been able to flourish. It is the reason for which we are the envy of the world.

Acknowledging Quebec as a distinct society is part of something perfectly logical and natural. It is not something which is being forced on any part of the country. It is a recognition of differences of which we have all known since our first days as Canadians. It is part of the evolution of Canada to recognize that distinctiveness and to make the accommodations which the bill and the resolution put forward. It is also a recognition of the affection and considerable pride which Canadians have in Quebec, which we saw in the few days before the referendum vote.

I would like to speak about the veto. These changes have not come completely out of the blue. They have been discussed before. Veto provisions were discussed at the time of the Victoria charter in 1971. Vetoes have been discussed at many constitutional conferences, in the press and elsewhere. In no way is this some sudden imposition of a formula which has been devised. It is a responsible recognition that over that long period of time certain basic understandings of the nature of the country have become evident with respect to the Constitution and the veto, particularly with respect to the 1982 changes.

• (1655)

Again I would stress that the current formulae for changing the Constitution are in four categories. You have some changes which would require the federal government and all the provinces before there could be a change. Others affect only a single province and the federal or perhaps even single provinces themselves and their neighbour. In addition you have this category which is the seven provinces and 50 per cent of the population.

All that is being put forward is that the federal government is limiting itself by legislation in the manner in which it will exercise the federal veto. It is not a constitutional change and that should be recognized. It is not a question of embarking on some great adventure as has been attempted by previous governments with Meech and Charlottetown where there were many things incorporated as well as the issue of the veto.

I will turn to the veto with respect to western Canada and in particular with respect to British Columbia, my home province. At the present time for British Columbia to succeed it would have to impose a veto on constitutional change under the seven and fifty formula. It would have to have the support of three of the smaller provinces, so there would be four provinces opposing. In other words, the seven provinces requirement would not be met. Or else British Columbia would have to go in with one of the bigger provinces and thus, get 50 per cent of the population opposing.

The present proposal which does not change the Constitution is that if British Columbia opposed a constitutional change and it got one of the three western provinces to agree with it, then the federal government would not proceed with the constitutional change. Thus there is the so–called veto. The veto remains with the federal government but it would be exercised in that way. That is very important.

There is a substantial change proposed with respect to the powers of British Columbia on the veto. That is why I thought it appropriate that the headline in the newspaper pointed out that B.C. and Quebec were getting changes and the two provinces were listed side by side.

Second, when British Columbia gets to the position of having 50 per cent of the population of western Canada, then of course it will essentially have the veto of its own in the same manner as Quebec and Ontario.

At the present time British Columbia is about one–third the size of Ontario and about one–half the size of Quebec. In the not too distant future, because currently British Columbia has a about 44 per cent of the population of western Canada, it will reach 50 per cent; when, I do not know. All I know is that over the last 15 years British Columbia has dramatically expanded with an increase in population of something approaching 29 per cent. It is important to recognize that there has been substantial gains and this trajectory, this trend is likely to continue.

I turn to the point that this will somehow prevent future constitutional change because there will always be provinces which will oppose it. Obviously we will never get constitutional change, for example, with respect to the Senate. I do not think we should sell future generations of Canadians so short. They will be capable of making intelligent decisions, just as we have been, just as our forefathers and mothers and all past generations have been.

Why do we have to suggest that they will be unable to handle the matter of constitutional change to take care of the differences that I spoke about at the outset of my speech in an acceptable manner? Obviously they will be able to do that and we should trust them to be able to do that.

Mr. Speaker, I am sharing my time with the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

This is a responsible package which will help hold us as a country together and allow that diversity and development and ability to continue to remain the world's leading country in the future.

We want a united Canada in British Columbia. We are willing to recognize that there have to be some trade–offs. Not everybody can get everything all the time. There has to be some recognition that to keep Canada going we cannot simply be a people who say no to everything.

• (1700)

When we have a whole country to govern there must be trade–offs. This country we are trying to govern happens to be the best country in the world. I think it is well worthwhile to make the trade–offs to keep it together and that is what this package is all about.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before proceeding to the five minute question allocation to the hon. minister, it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Jonquière, Committee chaired by Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs; the hon. member for Parry Sound—Muskoka, Confederation Life Insurance Company.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, according to the minister of National Revenue, the veto will improve the Canadian economy and, since Canada has a highly diversified make–up, this diversity will also help to improve the Canadian economy. He never mentioned that the most important aspect of this diversity is that Canada is made up of two nations. They never say this. He did not mention it.

He also said that Canada is the best country in the world, that we are the envy of the world. I find it strange to still hear that today when Canada has an 11 per cent unemployment rate and when there are more people on welfare in Quebec than at any other time in the history of our country. This is beginning to sound strange.

He also said that the veto will help to amend the Constitution. I find that strange and utterly unacceptable since the more vetoes there are, the less the chance we have to amend the Constitution. To me, what the government is proposing and what the minister is saying all boil down to the fact that these numerous vetoes will mean that it will be impossible to amend the Constitution. It is as simple as that. This a trap that the federal government is setting for the Quebec government because, with this veto, it will be impossible to amend the Constitution.

Would the minister please tell me how these vetoes will make it easier to amend the Constitution? As you know, it is quite the opposite. I would like him to prove that.

[English]

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, the first point made was that somehow the veto was linked to the economy. Let me put it this way. The economy will benefit dramatically from getting the wrangling of constitutional issues such as the referendum and separation out of the way. The economy will improve when we deal with these measures here in the House quickly and get back to the real agenda for all Canadians, whether they live in Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia or any other province. We must get the economy back in shape, get interest rates down and get the unemployed that the member's party has never linked before to the issue of constitutional development. Fortunately you now have and I think it is about time that you recognized the linkage between the—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I remind hon. members to make their interventions through the Chair. Sometimes it can be very helpful.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, you will note that the hon. member for the first time is linking these constitutional issues with unemployment. It is about time the Bloc recognized that because it is very important.

The member goes on to say that there can be no change and vetoes will be there. Vetoes provinciate, he is right. Does he regret that we are giving or establishing a veto for Quebec so that the constant refrain that Quebec will be forced to accept changes from other parts of Canada will suddenly disappear as a complaint, a whine, a constant background noise that we hear from the Bloc Quebecois? Maybe that is the Bloc's concern. The issue is that if there are major changes the regions of the country, Quebec, Ontario, the maritimes, the west, or British Columbia do not want, then there is no point in proceeding with the changes because they are unacceptable to the overall.

• (1705)

Let us not get entirely hooked up on the issue of constitutional change. These are not constitutional measures. It is an example of the ingenuity of Canadians. It is an example of the ingenuity of the Prime Minister in overcoming problems without necessarily going back to the Constitution. If in the future people would like to see changes, administrative arrangements that would improve the system of government of Canada, I will bet that future generations of Canadians will be just as good as we are at arranging them outside as well as inside the Constitution.

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to stand here today to enter this debate. As Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, I will start by repeating what the Prime Minister said yesterday vis–à–vis aboriginal people:

> As it concerns the aboriginal people of Canada, my government is clearly on record as respecting their aspirations. We recognize the unique legal position of aboriginal people, including the protection of aboriginal and treaty rights in the Canadian Constitution and the inherent right of self–government.

What does that mean? It means we must listen, and I address the separatists, when Grand Chief Matthew Coon–Come of the Cree says that ideological separatists will not treat them like cattle, moving them from one territory to the other. We must listen when the Inuit vote 95 per cent no and when the Crees vote 96.3 per cent no, and when the Montagnais vote 99 per cent no. We will listen.

The Prime Minister has proposed that Quebec be a distinct society. He has proposed that we will make no constitutional change that affects Quebec without consent and he has delivered. I want to be here when the leader of the Bloc stands up and does not support this because it tells me his agenda is simple separation. It tells me that when he looks out his window to look at the French fact in Canada, the only thing he sees is his own reflection.

Maybe I am losing it. I sit here day after day and see the hon. member for Bourassa who is from Chile. He is a political refugee who has come to this country. Oddly enough, this country Canada is an Iroquois name that means the village. Quebec is a Micmac name which means where the water overflows. The hon. member for Bourassa sits here and he debates and thinks in a British institution whether he should be called by a Mohawk name or an Iroquois name, while taxpayers pay his salary. If he thinks long enough and gets re–elected he will get a pension. Only in this country Canada would we be that tolerant. What a democracy, but that is a fact.

Oddly enough, 15 years ago I gave my maiden speech in the House. I was sitting over there. The maiden speech is a member's most important speech. You come with your life experience and you want to say what is important to you. My maiden speech was about the French Canadian fact in Canada, their contribution to the national character of the country. I had come off the CRTC where I sat with Rhéal Therrien, the vice–chairman then. He would say to me a country is not a piece of paper; it is a frame of mind.

It was so important to me to get my life experience on the record. As the member of Parliament for Sault Ste. Marie I spoke about the French Canadian fact in Canada. I spoke about the importance of biculturalism and multiculturalism. To that I would add the culture and the aspirations of the First Nations people of this country.

You see me every day fighting for aboriginal rights, but I fought just as hard for French Canadian rights because I come from a part of the country with 700,000 franco–Ontarians. You do not want to even seem to acknowledge that there are places—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order.

Mr. Irwin: The Bloc does not want to even acknowledge that there are places like Dubreuilville, Chapleau, Timmins and Sudbury in Ontario where there are 700,000 francophones. What will happen to them? The Bloc does not care.

• (1710)

We have lived with these people for generations. They are our family. They are our neighbours. We share our schools with them. Bloc members do not care. I am convinced of that. They do not care about the Acadians. They do not care about the franco–Manitobans. They only care about their agenda.

Members of the Bloc talk about Cartier, Champlain and LaSalle. These are Canadian heroes and they are as important to my history as they are to any separatist. The Guy Lafleurs and the Cardinal Légers and the giant French Canadian community in industry and science and on the international stage. I remember them.

I remind the separatists that except for a few months, in 25 years, in a quarter of a century of leading this country, all of the Prime Ministers have been from Quebec. I remind the Bloc that we are the party of Laurier who cared about French Canadians in Quebec, who cared about French Canadians outside Quebec, who cared about Canada on the world stage. If Laurier were looking down today at the leader of the Bloc, he would weep.

I cannot say much more for the Reform members who thought Meech was too extensive. They opposed Charlottetown because it was too extensive. Today, I heard they cannot support this because it is a single page. I saw the way they voted on the aboriginal issues. I see how they treat the francophones here.

I was shocked when the Reform Party that wants us to sing "O Canada" in this House said that 50 per cent plus one on a faulty, fraudulent question divides and destroys this country. This generous, historical piece of property on this planet, and Reformers would destroy it with 50 per cent plus one. I used to find the Reform interesting. I now think the Reform is dangerous if that is the philosophy its members are spreading across the country.

I do not know how I can convince the Bloc members. What they are destroying is the spirit of the French Canadians. These are the people who were at the foothills of the Rockies, who explored Hudson's Bay, who opened up the Mississippi.

I returned from Williams Lake, Alberta the day before yesterday. North of Williams Lake is the town of Quesnel, British Columbia. I just happened to be there. I remember this point from 15 years ago. Maybe it was part of the point I was going to speak on today. Who knows how the creator works. Fraser is the explorer who found the mighty Fraser. He got it named. He had a better publicist but those people, all nine of them, who paddled his canoe were French Canadians and the aboriginal people in that area showed him the way.

That is my Canada. That is my concept of who we are. It has been 15 years that I have been prepared to fight in my area of northern Ontario for the aspirations of francophone minorities until the very day I die. I am prepared to stay here and reaffirm my commitment.

When I vote on the resolution next week, I will not be doing it with timidity. I will not be doing it as the leader of the separatists say, because it is politically expedient. I will do it with pride because I believe it is important to my country.

There were 150,000 people who came to the Montreal rally. There were French Canadian federalists there. It is a misconception when we say that the people in Quebec are separatists. There are staunch French Canadian federalists in Quebec and they were at that rally, but we were there together. Why? To say that we love this country.

The leader of the separatist party mocks that love. He mocks it. He tries to destroy former Prime Minister Trudeau by mocking him. He tries every day by mockery to destroy our present Prime Minister. If Louis St. Laurent or Laurier were here today, the separatists would do the same thing. I see it every day. That is their agenda.

• (1715)

In my city of Sault Ste. Marie we had 2,000 steelworkers show up at an opening on a Friday or a Saturday. There were two days that went together. They took their hats off when we were singing the national anthem. It was amazing. I have never seen that. It was cold. The next day 1,000 people showed up in Sault Ste. Marie. They raised Canadians flags and Quebec flags. I looked down and saw young people there saying "We love you, we want you to stay". It was the first meeting for these little kids, and they looked at me and said "Do not destroy this country". That is my Canada.

The Haida people of B.C. have a creed. They say "We do not inherit this land from our ancestors, we borrow it from our children". That should be our creed.

My forefathers came from Italy and Ireland. They were very poor. From the Irish I learned that we have to pay something back. I am the fourth politician in my family. My grandfather Alfred was a councilor; my uncle Tom was a mayor; my uncle Fred was a councilor; I was a mayor. They said "You must pay something back".

From the Italian side, my grandmother, without even knowing the language, had to go from Rome by train, then by boat to Halifax all the way up to Sault Ste. Marie to meet my grandfather. She could not speak the language. She had eight kids. If she could be here and see today that her grandson is a member of Parliament she would be so proud. She taught me that this country is the best country in the world. It is.

I do not know if there is an afterlife. I hope there is. If there is, I am sure that Laurier, my grandmother, and my grandfather are up there saying "Go for it". That is what we should be doing.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I just want to comment briefly on what the Minister of Indian Affairs said.

First of all, there is something I do not understand although I have been here in Ottawa for a number of years. Why is the federal government using aboriginal peoples in many cases to discredit Quebecers? Perhaps he will admit it today, since only yesterday, his deputy minister admitted they would have to give aboriginal people in Quebec financial compensation for voting no.

I also remember that a few years ago, they used aboriginal people to file claims in New York to prevent the Great Whale project from going ahead.

It is rather amazing to see the minister stroking aboriginal people today and trying to tell Quebecers that he loves them and wants to promote economic and social development, when meanwhile, the same minister is using aboriginal people to prevent Quebec from developing its hydro potential, for instance. Those are a few examples.

Of course, it is not easy to prove all that, but anyone who is the least bit intelligent and has an interest in economic development and politics is aware of this, and Quebecers are very much so. Aboriginal people were consistently used to obstruct megaprojects in Quebec, probably to promote other sources of energy like uranium or western oil. This is atrocious.

If the Minister of Indian Affairs thinks we can trust him, he is wrong. We have seen too much evidence to the contrary, and Quebecers are not easily fooled.

He referred to the people in Sault Ste. Marie, and I agree with what he said and I want to thank them. I suppose they wanted to apologize for what they did two or three years ago, when they trampled Quebec's flag. I imagine he remembers that. Of course these people wanted to apologize, and I understand that and appreciate it. We remember very well what happened. It was on all the TV channels. The people of Sault Ste. Marie trampled the Quebec flag two or three years ago. Today, they want to apologize. We are pleased that they did, and we appreciate the gesture. But people should stop trying to fool us.

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to read my speeches and look at my record. I would not be here in the Prime Minister's cabinet if I in any way felt the way this member says I do.

Why are they worried about the separatists in Quebec? It is because you have a premier talking about "the ethnics". You have a vice–premier, and you know what he did. You have a member in the Quebec legislature who calls the aboriginal people gypsies. You have Max Gros–Louis, chief of the Hurons, who is saying the separatists are racist.

The separatists are living a lie. They say that Canada is divisible but not Quebec. That is a lie. There is such a thing as the 1898 line. There is such a thing as territorial integrity. There is such a thing as Cree territory, Mohawk territory, Abenakis territory, Micmac territory. Every time the separatists put that lie out, this minister is going to repeat what I said in Quebec at every house, at the UN and at Geneva.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Having passed the five hours of debate, we now go to the next stage of debate, which is ten minutes without questions or comments.

If I might ask the House for its co–operation, it is 5.23 p.m. and the hon. member for Calgary Southeast would be given a full ten minutes. I would not see the clock at 5.30 p.m. until three minutes past, so she would have her full ten minutes.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the consent of the House on that suggestion.

The last thing I heard last night before I went to sleep was Jason Moscovitz on "The National" talking about the dreariness of this debate and how we were again looking at the discussion that had come up during Meech and the Charlottetown accord. There was a dreariness in all of this discussion because the House was mostly empty, the galleries were devoid of people, and there was no one around with any passion or enthusiasm to talk about the matter of Canada.

When I woke up this morning I thought I wanted to capture some of that in what I have to say today because I think it is important we remember what brought us here. I thought I would like to direct my comments from where I sit. Where I sit in the House of Commons is a very special place for me, because I have watched for two years the House of Commons work together, pull together when we needed to and have debates that were reasoned.

Over time something has happened. Now we have this rancorous, bitter exchange across the floor of the House of Commons. I wondered about that as I reflected on the throne speech of January 1994. I recall what the leader of the official opposition said that day about his responsibility as an opposition party: "We intend to take these responsibilities seriously and we will do so loyally, correctly, and with due resolve. We know that is what Quebecers expect us to do, and they would never forgive us if we deviated from this path".

Although that was a very tough foreshadowing of this debate today, I believe that what the hon. Leader of the Opposition was saying that day was that he wanted to work within a democratic environment for the good of his constituents and for the rest of Canada. His vision was one we should never forget to respect, because his vision is his own vision, as the Prime Minister's vision is his vision and the leadership of our party carries our vision.

None of us respects that. We have forgotten that we should co–operate and that our professional lives are within these walls. The rhetoric we hurl across the floor has become meaningless. No wonder everyone feels so embittered.

On that day the Prime Minister said: "By working co–operatively to create economic opportunity, by restoring common sense to our public finances, by rebuilding a sense of integrity in government, and by pursuing a positive and innovative agenda for our society, my ministers are convinced that Canadian unity will be preserved and enhanced". Where have we come from that day to today, when we are talking about constitutional amendments, constitutional veto, distinct society? He made a promise to Canadians two years ago that it would not be that way in the House of Commons.

Our leader, prior to the election, said on October 12, 1993: "I personally believe that the Canadian people have the capacity and the desire to define not only what this election should be about, but what kind of Canada they want for themselves and for their children for the 21st century. In other words, I believe it is possible for a new vision of Canada itself to emerge from the bottom up if we begin to truly let the people speak their hearts and minds".

We came here as a different party with a different vision. We never were told that the difference was a good thing; we were always told it was bad. No one could define that difference in terms of a new idea, a new vision, a different way of looking at this country. We were always told we were bad. We were poor performers in the House of Commons. The press gallery said that our ideas were poor. How could a bunch of hayseeds or rednecks from the west ever have a good idea to put forward? It was our vision and it should have been respected in that context, but it never was. Part of the reason it never was is why we are here today debating constitutional matters and distinct society.

I ask all members to remember why we are here. Our constituents sent us here. We have forgotten about that representation. We are not simply preparing for an election in 1997; we are renewing and retooling Canada for 2050. That is something we absolutely must not lose sight of in this debate, that we are retooling our vision for this country for the next millennium, for our children and for their children. We are really leaving them with one hell of a mess. Excuse my language.

The issue of unity does not reside in a unity committee, a small committee with a small number of people who have small ideas. Those ideas are going to capture the hearts and minds of the country if they go out to the people. It is the people of the country who are going to make the difference. They are the ones who drive the engine and the heart of Canada. We can sit here and debate this issue until we are all white with exhaustion and fatigue and we can be embittered. But I believe we have a country worth working together for.

It must be that westerners understand there is an opportunity to become involved in a debate, but so too must Quebecers and easterners recognize there is an opportunity for us all to debate. It should be taken out of the House of Commons and placed into the hands of the people of Canada.

Eugene Forsey wrote in his memoirs: "I have faith that Canadians, both English-speaking and French-speaking—would be able to face the future united—'One equal temper of heroic hearts/—strong in will/ To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield'". That is what we must do in the House. The bitter rhetoric we hear every day must give way at some point to argument that is reasoned, to ideas that are new, to a vision that will take us into the next millennium. My fear is that we are not moving in a direction whereby we are recognizing one another as colleagues and as Canadians.

The hon. member of the official opposition has become a very embittered politician. I have seen that over two years and from where I sit it is sad to see.

The Prime Minister, this man who had the hopes, hearts and tremendous support of Canadian people, has become shrivelled in his ideas, in his demeanour and in his approach to the country. We are back to this dreary Meech and Charlottetown debate.

I am not saying that the Reform Party has all the answers, but until we start talking together as Canadians even the best of visions will have no place to go but in its own entrenched little part of a balkanized country. It is my hope and prayer that will not happen.

I cannot support the bill because it would concentrate the power in the hands of governments and not of Canadians. I remember why I was put here by my electors in Calgary Southeast. It was to carry their hopes, their dreams and their visions for a Canada into the third millennium.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.30 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

PROTECTION OF PERSONAL INFORMATION OBTAINED BY CERTAIN CORPORATIONS ACT

The House resumed from October 26 consideration of the motion that Bill C-315, an act to complement the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals with respect to personal information about themselves obtained by certain corporations, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak in the House tonight on an issue of grave importance, the protection of personal information. I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-315, an act that will help to protect the privacy of Canadians. Since Bill C-315 was last in the House much has happened on the issue. Several groups have called for federal government action to protect the personal information of Canadians.

First, the Canadian Standards Association has expanded on its voluntary privacy codes and its desire for implementation of those codes.

Second, the Public Interest Advocacy Centre based in Ottawa released a document entitled "Surveying Boundaries: Canadians and their Personal Information".

Third, the Information Advisory Council established by the Minister of Industry continues to push for recognition of its privacy recommendations.

The protection of personal information is a serious concern for all Canadians. If we do not begin to address the unauthorized collection and exchange of personal information about unsuspecting Canadians now, we may not be able to stop it at all in the future.

Bill C-315 gives us the opportunity to counter the invasion of personal privacy before it gets out of control. New technology and universal access to the Internet have accelerated the problem and immediate government action is critical.

I quote from The Economist:

> Individually, most new technologies are introduced for perfectly benign motives. Their cumulative effect, however, is to cast a shadow over personal privacy. Is it really acceptable for most of your actions, even the most mundane, to be recorded and then sold to the highest bidder? Most people take their privacy for granted but are outraged when it is breached.

The growth of computer technology makes tasks easier for Canadians, but at what cost? I am very concerned that Canadians have their privacy compromised every day without their knowledge. Companies routinely collect information about them every time they use a credit card, buy something over the phone or subscribe to a magazine.

An Industry Canada paper released in October 1994 stated:

> While each technology brings different capabilities, they all contribute to a completely unprecedented capacity for the surveillance of every man, woman and child, whether as a customer, student, employee, patient, taxpayer, or recipient of government services. It is this growing trend for information systems to place limits on our freedom, on our life's potential, that privacy advocates and science fiction writers alike find utterly chilling.

• (1735)

What will Bill C–315 do? It tries to curb the collection and exchange of personal information. This could include names and phone numbers, business addresses and phone numbers, any identifiable physical characteristic, religion, national or ethnic origin, age or other information about education or financial history. The information is recorded in many ways: electronically such as on a floppy or hard disk, manually on paper or microfilm, or virtually such as in computer memory or an electronic network.

Bill C–315 would require all companies covered by the Canada Labour Code to abide by some very strict privacy protection guidelines. Before selling any list containing an individual's personal information, the person would be sent a notice that, first, personal information about the individual as listed in the notice is held by the company; second, permission is needed to keep the person's name on the list; and, third, the person shall be told his or her name can be removed at any time at no cost.

In addition, any corporation using a purchased list shall send to everyone on the list a notice containing the source of the information, a description of the information held and a statement outlining how individuals can have their information removed. Companies receiving a removal request must comply within 10 days and confirm with the individuals that their requests have been acted on.

Non–compliance will result in a summary conviction. For a first offence a company or individual would face a fine of up to $5,000. A repeat offence could double the maximum fine to $10,000. Charges would have to be laid within one year of the offence.

The member for Cariboo—Chilcotin who introduced the bill would be amenable to increasing the sentences if the industry committee studying the bill believed that they are too weak. It might also look at strengthening the bill to prevent the rental of information lists.

In September the Canadian Standards Association released a set of privacy codes after wide consultation with several agencies and associations. It sought to develop its code at a time when there was growing debate about the range of innovative approaches to the protection of personal data on the information highway.

There is one big problem with the code. Adherence is strictly voluntary. While the code may be good, it is merely a band–aid solution and has no teeth to protect consumers from greedy companies with no regard for their personal privacy. By the association's own admission none of the codes has any explicit statutory force in contrast with the privacy codes developed under the mandate of legislation and the oversight of a data protection agency.

In addition, the association also admits that ultimately the success of the CSA model code will depend on the various incentives that might operate to encourage registration. Several are noted and discussed: moral suasion, the desire to avoid adverse publicity and the use of the privacy standard for competitive advantage.

Is this realistic? Companies that profit from a $300 million a year industry will hardly be overcome with moral suasion or a concern about adverse publicity. While the CSA code may convince some organizations to operate more responsibly, most organizations will only use it when it is convenient for them or if they must comply.

The CSA notes that in New Zealand and the Netherlands where privacy codes have been complemented by statutory regulation, there is more effective protection of their citizens. In Canada combining the CSA's code with the legislative teeth of Bill C–315 will provide consumers with real privacy protection.

The Public Interest Advocacy Centre is a non–profit group that is also focused on the protection of personal information. In a recent paper it investigated whether there is a problem. It found that 76 per cent of Canadians believe they have less control over their personal information than they did 10 years ago; 95 per cent of Canadians want to be informed about collection processes and about the uses to which their personal information may be put; 94 per cent insist permission be sought and given before any information is passed on to another organization; and 86 per cent want to understand how new technology can affect their personal privacy. It is clear from the research done by the organization that Canadians are very concerned about their privacy.

• (1740)

Bill C–315 would establish statutory protection without the requirement for any new taxes. It is the missing link advocates are calling for. The member for Cariboo—Chilcotin has assured me he would support changes the industry committee might suggest when it examines the bill. We must act soon. Every day we dawdle, more personal information about private citizens will be collected and sold.

I conclude with a quote from a book called "A Consumer's Survival Guide to a Cashless World":

> As consumers we often feel powerless to change the status quo, but public pressure can succeed when enough people get excited about practices they feel to be wrong or unfair. The only way it will change is for us as consumers and citizens to demand fuller disclosure, stronger privacy protections and better security procedures.

We can wait no longer. Consumers and citizens want and need to see changes to the rules that protect personal information. Bill C–315 is an answer to a concern that each and every member of Parliament shares with his or her constituents. I urge the House to support the bill so we can begin to protect the personal privacy of all Canadians.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when Bill C–315 was first debated in the House in the month of October I must say I was impressed with the information the hon. member brought to us in support of the proposed bill. I understand the original complaint brought to the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin was from an individual who found himself on the mailing list for pornographic materials and was unable to stop the material from arriving. While this may not be the most damaging type of abuse of personal information, many Canadians would agree it is one of the most annoying and can leave people feeling helpless and frustrated.

The bill the hon. member has put forward, however, would do nothing to stop this kind of privacy invasion. While I share the concerns expressed by the Reform Party about this kind of abuse, if Parliament is to intervene with new legislation, we had better be sure we are doing something which actually fixes the problem.

Here are some of the flaws in Bill C–315. First, it would apply only to corporations. Many operators who do this kind of thing are individuals or small partnerships and would not be covered by the legislation.

Second, it applies only to the narrow range of corporations engaging in a federally regulated activity. This would include those in the banking, telecommunications and broadcast industries but not small entrepreneurs.

Third, it does nothing to solve the problem of operators setting up outside our jurisdiction, such as across the U.S. border.

Fourth, it addresses only the issue of people's names appearing on lists or nominative lists, as the practice is referred to in the Quebec privacy legislation that covers the private sector.

Technologies are changing and developing quickly these days. Information is being collected and messaged in new and different ways. It may soon be out of date to talk about lists because information travels easily and is gathered automatically. It is no longer necessary to hand someone a computer tape to trade information.

In addressing the protection of personal privacy we ought to talk about the use of personal information in the broadest possible ways. The rules we come up with should address every sector of the economy, not only the direct marketing industry.

Instead of working on the bill we should support the work that has been ongoing for several years at the Canadian Standards Association, the CSA. The consensus committee passed a model privacy code in September of this year, the result of three years of work in a committee with representation of industry, consumers and federal and provincial governments.

This code of fair information practices is soon to be published as a national standard for Canada. This initiative has the support of a broad range of private sector organizations including the Canadian Direct Marketing Association.

• (1745)

On October 3 of this year the president of the Canadian Direct Marketing Association called on the Minister of Industry to introduce legislation in the House that would use the CSA standard as the basis for legislation federally and to encourage the provinces of Canada to do the same in their jurisdictions.

I understand that the issue is being studied by the departments of industry and justice with a view to developing solutions that will work for the protection of personal information in all sectors of the economy and across the country. This is a huge and complex issue because the increasing availability and use of personal information and consumer profiles to target service delivery affects virtually every sector of the economy in some way or the other.

The protection of personal privacy was identified as a key priority early in 1994 when my colleague, the Minister of Industry, established the Information Highway Advisory Council to advise him how to make the most of the new possibilities brought to us by the communication networks. The council studied the issue, consulted experts and produced a number of recommendations on privacy.

First, the federal government should act to ensure privacy protection on the information highway. This protection shall embody all principles of fair information practices contained in the Canadian Standards Association draft model code for the protection of personal information. To this end, the federal government should continue to participate in the development and implementation of effective national voluntary standards based on this model code.

Second, the federal government must take leadership in the implementation of these principles through the following actions: in co–operation with other levels of government that share responsibility for various sectors of activity on the information highway, it should establish a federal–provincial–territorial working group to implement the privacy principles in all jurisdictions.

It should create a level playing field for the protection of personal information on the information highway by developing and implementing a flexible legislative framework for both public and private sectors. Legislation would require sectors or organizations to meet the standard of the CSA model code, while allowing the flexibility to determine how they will refine their own codes.

In co–operation with the CSA working group on privacy, and other interested parties, it should study the development of effective oversight and enforcement mechanisms; establish a working group to co–ordinate the development, demonstration and application of privacy enhancing technologies for the provision of government services and information; update and harmonize appropriate privacy protection policies, legislation and guidelines applicable to its own operations and to the delivery of government services and information.

Third, Industry Canada should establish a working group that includes representation from the private, provincial and federal governments and consumer organizations for the purpose of increasing public awareness and understanding about privacy issues and personal privacy rights through the preparation and dissemination of educational materials and encourage the CSA to advance its privacy standard in international standards fora.

There are several other recommendations on encryption, educational and health records but I will not take up more time to read them. As members can plainly see, this is already a tall order that the advisory council for the information highway has presented to my colleague, the hon. Minister of Industry. I know the Department of Industry is engaged in discussions with other departments involved in the privacy issue, notably the Department of Justice.

This is a complex issue. Serious work has already been undertaken by the government to address the problem. I believe we should wait until the Minister of Industry has studied the recommendations and can report to us on progress.

Finally, we need more protection for personal information than is offered by Bill C–315. I say we should get on with the work and not take a detour down this path.

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this debate on the bill tabled in this House by our colleague, the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin, which is aimed at protecting the privacy of individuals with respect to personal information about themselves obtained from certain corporations.

• (1750)

This is a very important issue in the world in which we live, an issue that, too often, is not taken seriously but that has major consequences in people's lives.

It is no secret that just about any personal information is now available for all kinds of purposes to almost any individual or corporation wishing to obtain this information. In the business world for example, everyone knows that our personal credit records can be put under the microscope by all kinds of institutions interested in digging into our past. Everyone also knows that, more often than not, information on our lifestyles and consumption patterns falls into the hands of all kinds of individuals and corporations whose goals may be questionable, without most governments being concerned about it.

In this regard, I say right off the bat that although the bill tabled by our Reform colleague does not, as the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James just pointed out, meet all our expectations with respect to this problem, it places it in the public domain and urges the federal government, which so far has been negligent in this area, to examine the problem and, hopefully, come up with more restrictive legislation in the near future.

What I also like about our Reform colleague's initiative is that he refers to the Quebec legislation. In introducing his bill, he referred to the fact that, in 1994, Quebec enacted legislation to protect personal information not only from public institutions but also from private enterprise. This legislation was Bill 68, which, as I mentioned, was enacted in 1994.

I said earlier that Bill C–315 is quite commendable as far as its goals are concerned, but that it has flaws, which should be pointed out. First of all, the bill refers to the sale of information. Any federally registered company wishing to sell information on a group of individuals would have to notify each of these individuals of its intention and of the personal information in its possession, and to obtain his or her consent. Never can we in any way prevent companies from providing information or exchanging lists, provided the lists are not actually sold.

So, there is some kind of a loophole there that should be looked at and plugged if at all possible. There is also, as I said earlier, the requirement to send a notice concerning the sale of any list of individuals. But, even if this bill is passed, nothing will stop companies from selling information on one individual at a time.

• (1755)

These two examples show that there are deficiencies in the bill put forward by our friend from the Reform Party, deficiencies that must not be overlooked. As the hon. member from the Liberal Party suggested earlier, perhaps in a future bill we can take all of this into account and come up with ways to prevent this kind of problems.

Another point I wanted to raise is the small fines for non–compliance. The bill provides for fines of $5,000 to $10,000. I was listening to the hon. member from the Reform Party who spoke before me talk about the huge profits generated by the sale of this kind of information. It stands to reason that imposing such small fines is not likely to discourage companies from breaking the law. We should therefore make sure that fines are much larger, stiffer.

Another deficiency of this bill concerns the type of personal information covered by the act. A full list, a rather long list in fact, can be found in clause 2 of the bill. Again, it is not quite complete.

The problem in making a list is that you can forget to include major elements. I would like to point out that there is no mention, in this list, of political affiliation. I gather that this information is not considered personal in nature. Criminal record, work experience, place of birth, sexual orientation and mother tongue are not included or listed either in clause 2 of the bill, while I would think this information as strictly personal information that needs to be protected under a bill like this one.

To conclude, as I said at the outset, although the bill contains major deficiencies, it at least has the merit of being a first. It is a step in the right direction, as the first piece of legislation introduced by the federal government to protect personal information.

This debate is also an opportunity to alert the public to the real danger of not having legislation on the subject. In a way, as limited as its scope may be, it is difficult not to support this bill.

I would like to point out, since our colleague from the Reform Party referred to the Quebec legislation, that the latter is much more meaningful and precise. I would hope that when this act, if passed of course, is amended in the future, we should be able to refer to the Quebec legislation to ensure that personal information is better protected.

This goes to show, once again, if you do not mind my saying so without a trace of parochial spirit, that in many areas like this one, Quebec's know–how can easily be exported. People are welcome to refer to our legislation; they will not be disappointed.

I will close on this, just adding that the Bloc Quebecois supports the bill put forward by our colleague from the Reform Party.

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, while I agree with the spirit of Bill C–315, I am not in a position to support its content, which I find narrow and burdensome, particularly in consideration of the much broader and flexible measures presently being looked at.

Bill C–315 has a narrow focus when broad based measures are needed to ensure the level playing field for industry while protecting the privacy of Canadians. With advances in information and telecommunication technologies, the privacy of consumers is at risk, but this bill does not provide the type of broad based protection which is necessary.

As part of a global economy, we can expect that cross–border consumer transactions will increase and with them a related growth in direct to home sales of the type which make regular use of mailing lists in order to gain access into the homes of Canadians.

Mailing lists, when combined with other transaction related databases such as credit ratings and financial accounts, can be assembled into profiles of individuals. These records can cross national borders, be exchanged, resold, reused or integrated with other databases, often without consent or remuneration, for purposes unrelated to those for which the data were originally collected.

Consumers are frustrated and angry when subjected to perceived intrusions by commercial interests into their personal domain. Personal information privacy is an issue of considerable importance to Canadians as has been revealed by numerous surveys in recent years.

Bill C–315 has a very narrow focus. It applies only to the sale of lists containing personal information when in reality the normal business practice is the rental of such lists. The bill focuses narrowly on lists when in fact a vast amount of personal data can be blended and put together from the type of consumer transactional data currently exchanged between firms or within large organizations.

The bill applies only to federal corporations, while mailing lists and other information is often transferred between provincial corporations, individual proprietorships and partnerships.

If passed, the result would not be a level playing field of clear and consistent privacy rules applying to all sectors, but rather a patchwork quilt of uneven privacy obligations from sector to sector, firm to firm and jurisdiction to jurisdiction.

Other initiatives currently under way might provide a better approach. We are currently studying these options. Most notable is the Canadian Standards Association model privacy code. The CSA code sets out 10 principles governing how personal information should be collected, retained, kept up to date, used and disclosed by the private sector.

Adoption of the code by firms using mailing lists would tend to ensure that consumers are informed of the existence of such lists, given the opportunity to consent to their use and verify their accuracy.

The CSA code is voluntary, but I propose and support that it become the basis for flexible framework legislation. The Canadian Direct Marketing Association, the Information Highway Advisory Council and Canada's privacy commissioner all agree. The CSA model privacy code represents a potential basis for the development of flexible national standards.

I agree with the spirit of Bill C–315 and applaud the efforts of the hon. member in this regard. However, I am not in a position to support its contents as I find it too narrow, particularly in consideration of the much broader, flexible and less costly measures available to us.

I will continue to work to convince the government to introduce broad based and enforceable privacy protection for Canadians' personal and financial information in the marketplace. I feel that such legislation is important to my constituents. It is important to all Canadians. The legislation that we can accept must be enforceable, must have teeth and must apply to institutions like banks. It must also consider new technology like the Internet.

This bill is too narrow and does not create a comprehensive framework to deal with the real privacy concerns of all Canadians. I commend the hon. member for his efforts but I fear his bill does not go far enough.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on this bill. I must start off by saying that I applaud this initiative on the part of my colleague and can see the good intentions behind it. I do, however, also believe, having seen the criticisms of it, that it contains certain weaknesses which I would like to point out. At the same time, I would like to review the entire matter, propose some potential solutions, and point out why it will be very difficult to proceed with such a bill.

As I have said, this is a well intentioned bill but one with a number of weaknesses which have already been described by a number of my party colleagues and by at least one member of the opposition.

[English]

If we were to send the bill to committee and try to correct it we might lose some significant time trying to redirect an approach which some people would believe is too narrow to address all of the concerns Canadians continue to express about the protection of their privacy. That is not for me to decide by myself. Let me share with the House why.

Every time we open a newspaper we see another story about the abuse of personal information with the potential that new technology has to invade our privacy and provide surveillance of our every movement. Even the chairman of Microsoft, Bill Gates, in an article which appeared in the Ottawa Sun on September 20 of this year pointed out the need for government action and indeed legislation to protect privacy in the face of new technologies which he would be well placed to understand.

He used the example of software programs which would replace human travel agents and track customers' tastes and preferences to give the best possible service.

He states in the last two paragraphs of that article: The marketplace may be able to resolve some of these issues. For example, customers may learn to avoid travel agencies that don't share personal profiles, or that share them too freely.

"But the marketplace will not resolve every privacy issue. Neither will technology. What is needed is a great deal of unrushed debate, leading to intelligent public policies".

I doubt that these new automated travel agents would be covered by Bill C–315 and we need to consider how serious a problem this might be.

I applaud the hon. member for bringing the issue of privacy protection to the attention of Parliament. I believe that he has done what he ought to do. I believe that we could follow Mr. Gates' advice and start a process of unrushed debate leading to intelligent, profound public discussion on a policy that will meet the needs of today's society, not necessarily by accepting this bill and fixing it but by building on the work that has been done in Canada where we have among other initiatives the first data protection legislation in North America to cover the private sector. I refer to Bill 68 in the province of Quebec.

We need a far more comprehensive approach to these problems. The government has been doing the groundwork necessary to provide greater privacy protection. I would like to talk a bit about this work and about a better way perhaps to address the hon. member's concerns.

My first point is that the Canadian Standards Association model privacy code provides a basis for a broad based approach to privacy protection.

The Information Highway Advisory Council has recommended to the government that it bring in flexible framework legislation based on this code and that it work with the provinces to find a way to get a standard of fair information practices incorporated in the areas where it does not have jurisdiction.

On October 3 the Canadian Direct Marketing Association echoed this, calling on my colleague, the Minister of Industry, as minister responsible for consumer affairs, to table framework privacy legislation in the House of Commons. The CDMA has been a key player in the development of this national standard for the protection of privacy under the aegis of the Canadian Standards Association. I applaud not only its efforts in helping to develop this code but the leadership that it has shown in recognizing the merits of the legislation.

The House will recognize that it is not often that industry calls for more legislation. I think this action underlines the importance of privacy in the minds of consumers and the need for us to look at it carefully in all of its aspects. In particular, we must respect both the rights of the citizen and the information needs of industry when we think of legislation.

There are legitimate needs for personal information gathering in each sector. Banks need to gather information to assess credit risk, medical researchers need to conduct long term health studies to determine the effects of drugs, environmental concerns and health practices. Direct marketers do not want to send special offers for lawn mowers to folks who live in apartment buildings. Market research helps us as a society to tailor product innovations to the needs of consumers. These are good uses of personal information and we do not want to shut down the use of personal information.

Bill C–315 could shut down federally incorporated businesses doing direct marketing through the use of lists because while the bill speaks of obtaining the consent of each consumer, which sounds to be a reasonable enough option, the administrative burden and liability involved in this process would cause businesses to drop the activity altogether in a number of cases.

This may or may not be the goal of the hon. member but I believe both consumers and Canadian business deserve a more careful approach to the problem and one in which they can actually participate.

The Information Highway Advisory Council made a number of other recommendations concerning the protection of personal information, including the use of technologies which protect privacy. It called for the banning of scanning devices which monitor cellular transmissions. It called on the federal government to form a federal–provincial–territorial working group to start a dialogue about some of these important issues and work together for harmonized solutions. It called for the CSA to continue its work and for the consensus group which crafted the model privacy code to work together to develop meaningful oversight.

These are all thoughtful suggestions from a group of experts who took the time to study the issue in some significant depth. I believe that we should wait for the government response to these recommendations before we jump the gun and attempt to start legislating privacy protection.

I would like to share with the House a letter given to me which I think speaks to the issue:

> Please share the following message with government MPs who will be speaking today on Bill C–315.
> Members of the Canadian Direct Marketing Association agree that a legislated comprehensive set of privacy principles is needed to guide business in their activities to respect the rights of the individual. There is an excellent model to accomplish this in the 10 principles of the new code for the protection of personal information of the Canadian Standards Association.
> The current bill before Parliament, Bill C–315, while formatted with the best of intentions, is so fundamentally flawed that it cannot be saved by any amendments. The bill would not accomplish the fundamental purpose of protecting personal privacy; would seriously limit an individuals' freedom of choice and would be an unnecessary and destructive interference in the marketplace.
> CDMA is very concerned that if this bill is allowed to proceed to committee, the consensus among business, consumer groups and government which produced the CSA code after two years of hard work and compromise, will entirely collapse.

It is signed John Gustavson, president and chief executive officer.

It is up to the members now to decide how to proceed.

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill C–315. I should begin my complimenting the hon. member for having put the bill before the House. I believe that its intent is good and that the idea of trying to protect consumers and ensure that the personal information we supply as individuals to corporations and other entities is not just used willy–nilly in whatever fashion somebody other than an individual may decide.

• (1815)

It no doubt is disconcerting for consumers to go to large institutions and buy a product or get a service of some sort and all of a sudden appearing in their mailboxes the next month, and oftentimes for the next decade, are solicitations of one sort or another. Obviously consumers are not anxious to see that happen. They are not anxious to have that practice continue to the extent it obviously is. In that respect, I want to compliment the hon. member for putting together a private member's bill to deal with that.

The bill and the process of correcting the problem needs to go beyond the recommendations that are in front of us here today. We need to continue a process that has already been undertaken by the government. There is a consultative process that many of my colleagues have talked about previously in the House, where the industry department is working on this issue and in coming up with the solution is trying to be as comprehensive as possible to deal with this problem in a way that finds a good workable solution and finds a solution in a way that is not going to by itself create a burden for the consumer, is not going to create new government bureaucracy, is not going to result in a situation where adherence to the new rules will be so expensive that invariably and inevitably that kind of increased expense would be passed on to the consumer.

In reviewing the bill, there are a couple of places where I think we need to step back and ensure the problem is dealt with more comprehensively. As has been mentioned by a number of government speakers previously, one of the concerns with the bill in the format it is being presented to the House is that the definition of personal information is too narrow. We want to make sure that when we address the issue of privacy and confidentiality we do it in as broad a manner as possible and capture as many of the situations that are occurring out there as possible. We do not want to deal with this piecemeal, where we deal with one aspect of the problem and then have to come back and deal with others. We want to make sure that the definition of personal information is indeed as broad as possible.

We also want to make sure that in solving the problem we do not create a new problem. I know the hon. members of the third party would agree with me that the last thing we want to do is create a new regulatory regime, a new regulatory infrastructure that places an enormous burden on businesses. The way this bill is drawn up and the amount of consultation and notification that would have to take place when we are trying to delete specific information would create an enormous burden for individual businesses. There is probably a more efficient way to do it, a way that would not create quite as much of a workload and create such additional burdens on the private sector.

In coming up with the solution for the problem in this bill, it is going to call for a whole new amount of direct mailing as you ask for permission from the consumer to use their particular name. If the list is being sold then people have to write to the consumer and ask for their permission and then they have to write back. That seems like a very difficult and cumbersome type of situation.

There is a concern about capturing a very narrow portion of the market, those corporations that are federally incorporated. Obviously there are a lot of other entities that exchange and use information, right from an individual through partnerships, provincially incorporated entities.

It is important we ensure we have as broad a scope as possible in the bill. As I mentioned earlier, we have to ensure we address as vast a range as possible of consumer privacy concerns. I really believe we have to deal with this problem in as comprehensive a manner as we possibly can, making sure all of the issue is dealt with.

As I said in my opening remarks, obviously the intent of the bill, the desire to ensure consumer protection, is excellent. It is one the constituents in my riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka and I am sure all Canadians want to have addressed. They are genuinely concerned, particularly in these days of computerization. Information can be transferred electronically and in great amounts from one institution to another. They are concerned in that kind of environment that their privacy be protected.

As the hon. member who introduced the bill knows, it is important that the consumer receive protection in this respect. That is why I believe it is important to broaden this initiative. When we address the problem we must ensure that we address it in the fullest possible way. When we have done our work we must ensure we have covered as much ground as possible in order to protect the greatest number of consumers we possibly can.

Ms. Bonnie Brown (Oakville—Milton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we consider Bill C–315 we should review what the government is doing in this area.

Industry Canada and the Department of Justice are working on a comprehensive approach to privacy protection to respond to the recommendations of the information highway advisory council. For this reason, I do not want to support Bill C–315. I would rather wait until the Minister of Industry tables his response to the information highway advisory council.

Both that council and the Canadian Direct Marketing Association have called for comprehensive legislation based on the Canadian Standards Association's model privacy code. It seems to be more advisable to start from this consensual base and start the work that needs to be done to get broad–based support in the full community for action in this area.

I understand that the ministries of industry and justice are examining the recommendations I just mentioned. They are trying to come up with a broad based approach to the issue that both consumers and business would prefer. Any such approach would encompass existing voluntary efforts and the many excellent codes business has already put in place in a voluntary fashion. We should take the time to allow this process to unfold and not start working on quick fixes to one problem after another.

This is not to underestimate the work of my hon. colleague who brought forward the legislation, but rather to pull the threads together of work that is being done in many areas of government on this issue. For example, my colleague, the hon. member for Nickel Belt, has also called for a national privacy law, building on the work of the Canadian Standards Association. He has also called for a working group to be struck to work on the drafting of such legislation, ensuring that it is enforceable and that there is an independent body for oversight. I commend his interest in this issue and I would suggest that we build on the work that is already going on in government.

• (1825)

Bill C–315 would require that an organization notify each individual on a mailing list each time that list is sold to another organization and ensure that the individual's consent has been received. In addition, it requires that the organization selling the list also notify that same individual that his or her name has been obtained. The legislation deals only with the sale of mailing lists.

Organizations would have 10 days to comply with requests from individuals to have their names or certain elements of information removed from the list. Fines for repeated offences could reach $20,000.

This legislation would affect the marketplace narrowly, in that it focuses only on personal information linked to mailing lists. It does not provide protection for personal information involving the vast majority of marketplace transactions.

The role of the federal government could be open to constitutional challenge, in that the regulation of personal information provided as part of a contract could be interpreted as a provincial responsibility. Quebec has already made such a claim in establishing privacy legislation applicable to all personal information gathered as a result of marketplace transactions.

A government infrastructure would be required to enforce the legislation. The sheer number of names contained in mailing lists suggests that there would be numerous complaints to be handled by the federal government. The resulting bureaucracy could be very costly.

Some have said this legislation is too narrowly focused to provide adequate protection of personal information. Lists are more commonly rented than sold today, and the legislation fails to address rentals. The legislation would be costly to enforce and cannot deal with nominative lists originating with organizations based outside of Canada.

A recommendation from the information highway advisory council on establishing framework privacy legislation is currently under consideration.

I know the minister does not support the passage of the bill at this stage, as he is hoping for a broader response to this very current issue that affects consumers. As a result, I am not going to be supporting this bill, although I would like to thank the hon. member for bringing this important issue forward to the front burner of our national agenda. I believe we should ask the Minister of Industry to report back to the House on the work that is in progress rather than cut short his efforts and those of the justice minister by starting fresh work in a new and more limited direction.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I had understood Reform Party members wanted to put up an additional speaker. I was leaving that time available. However, if they do not intend to speak then I would certainly wish to debate this bill. If they could perhaps indicate whether they do have another speaker, I would be happy to stand down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I am not here as a negotiator, just as a Speaker. I am simply putting the question to the House.

Mr. Mayfield: Mr. Speaker, it was my understanding there would be another speaker from my party. If the debate has come to a conclusion, I would like an opportunity for a brief summary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There may come a time for that to transpire, but right now we are simply resuming debate. I give the floor to the chief deputy whip and there is approximately one minute remaining.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one obviously cannot speak a great deal on this important issue in one minute. However, let me take a minute to acknowledge the importance of the issue that has been brought forward: the protection of the privacy of individuals in an increasingly technologized world.

I do not think any of us can go through a day without being aware of how much very personal information about us is available to a myriad of people without our knowledge and the fact that the putting together of that information can jeopardize our privacy extensively. That is precisely why the Minister of Industry is addressing this extremely important issue and fully anticipates bringing measures forward to the House earlier in the new year.

• (1830)

The bill is well intentioned. It has some flaws in it, however. It would be appropriate for the proposer of the bill to engage in another hour's debate on the matter, to make some points as have been made in the debate so far that he believes need to be considered by the government in drafting the bill, and to take the points forward in debate on legislation that will come before the House. Potentially there will be amendments. We are open to having appropriate action on the matter for the protection of Canadians and their privacy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93 the order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved

COMMITTEE CHAIRED BY THE MINISTER OF INTERGOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on November 24, I put a question to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. I asked him whether the interim report he transmitted to the Prime Minister on behalf of this committee included the option of putting before the House a simple resolution on the distinct society concept and whether that option was the one favoured by his committee.

As usual, the minister evaded the issue, saying it was not up to him to reveal the results of the work of this committee and that later on, at the appropriate time, the opposition would see whether that was the Liberal government's option.

We asked this question because we wanted to warn the government against proposing to the House a simple resolution to recognize Quebec as a distinct society within Canada. We simply wanted to tell the Liberal government that it was useless, that it was an entirely symbolic gesture that would in any case fail to satisfy Quebec because it did not go far enough and would be rejected by English Canada because it would involve too many changes, according to them.

We wanted to say this because in Quebec, the distinct society issue was raised in the Liberal Party's platform around 1984 or 1985. Robert Bourassa, who was subtle in his approach, had found this expression and used it as a synonym of the concept of the Quebec people, to make it palatable to English Canada. Basically, Mr. Bourassa thought that Quebecers would agree, saying that it was in fact a synonym of the Quebec people and that English Canada would agree in the belief that it meant nothing. History has shown that English Canada was right.

At one point the concept surfaced in the Meech Lake accord. It has often been said that this particular concept was more important than the one in the federal government's current proposal, the claim being that it would affect the way the Constitution was interpreted and that the concept of distinct society in the Meech Lake accord would even take precedence over the charter of rights and freedoms.

This was far from obvious. Eminent legal experts in English Canada, including Professor Peter W. Hogg at York University, claimed the opposite was true, and said quite clearly: "The new section does not take precedence over the charter of rights and freedoms. In fact, as a straightforward interpretative clause, it is subject to the charter".

• (1835)

Had the Meech Lake accord been accepted in its day, we would have found ourselves again before the Supreme Court, which would—contrary to what Premier Bourassa said—again have concluded that the agreement Quebec had signed in good faith did not take precedence over a fundamental element of the Constitution, namely the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Obviously we have nothing against a constitution's containing sections aimed at defending citizens' rights, but nevertheless the Charter of Rights and Freedoms has been useful to those wishing to block the aspirations of Quebec, to restrict its development culturally and linguistically.

That charter has helped these people, whom I could almost describe as malevolent, to hobble the development of Quebec and to make it so that today Quebec has no other solution than to promptly and firmly reject any notion of a distinct society and to come up with the proposition that was ours during the last referendum, which is to state loud and clear that Quebec is not a distinct society but a people, period.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on November 24, the member for Jonquière asked the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs a question on the federal government's intentions regarding Quebec.

The Minister responded, quoting the Prime Minister, who had said the following:

> To ensure the change and modernization of Canada, no change is excluded.

The Prime Minister promised he would act on the matter of a distinct society and the matter of a veto. He acted on these two promises very quickly, and Quebecers have seen that the Prime Minister is a man of his word, who keeps the promises he makes.

The committee discussed the matters of a distinct society and a right of veto, and we have already seen the initial results, which the Prime Minister announced Monday. The distinct society clause is one Quebec has long sought.

The Prime Minister of Canada's resolution finally accords Quebec Canada's full recognition, because Parliament is the only place representing all Canadians from all regions.

The Prime Minister had promised during the last week of the campaign that he would act to reinstate the right of veto that René Lévesque had lost. We will reinstate it, and this is a big step toward resolving Canada's problems.

The changes required can and must be made within Canada. This is the message sent to all Canadians, including the members of the official opposition, by the October 30 vote.

As the minister said yesterday in the House, his committee is currently studying other questions, including rationalizing powers among the provinces and Canada, and will submit recommendations to the Prime Minister when they are ready.

Our aim is not to destroy Canada, but to build it. This is what the majority of Canadians and Quebecers have asked us to do, and, because we believe in democracy, we will try to continue to build Canada.

CONFEDERATION LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, following on my question to the Secretary of State for Financial Institutions, I wish to emphasize that many of my constituents in the riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka have had their retirement savings jeopardized by the collapse of Confederation Life. They have come to ask for assistance because as every day passes they are suffering financial uncertainty as a result of the collapse of this financial institution.

Obviously what has happened as a result of the collapse of Confederation Life has affected each and every one of them, but some are paying a higher price for the collapse because of their own personal financial circumstances. It is for these people that I urge a speedy dissolution of the assets of Confederation Life, an expedited liquidation process, so that all Canadians affected by the collapse receive their money as quickly as possible.

Not long ago I presented a petition in the House with over 500 signatures on behalf of a group of Bell Canada pensioners who were frustrated not only with the collapse of Confederation Life but also with their inability to convince their employer, Bell Canada, that it had an added responsibility to the company's pensioners. These pensioners believe that because Bell Canada not only chose Confederation Life as the administrator of its group RRSP but also encouraged its employees to participate in the plan, it must now take responsibility for those actions.

The petition I presented calls upon Parliament to initiate an investigation into the collapse of Confederation Life with particular reference to Bell Canada's responsibility toward its employees' funds. I too would like to see this matter resolved expeditiously.

Unfortunately this whole matter is essentially in the hands of the liquidator and the government's ability to intervene is somewhat limited as a result. We know that when a financial institution goes into liquidation it ceases to be a regulated financial institution and responsibility for the distribution of the estate passes to the liquidator under the court's supervision.

My concern right now is with the length of time it is taking to get through this liquidation process. One of the greatest priorities is to recover as much per dollar as is possible by getting the best price on the sale of assets. That is a given. It is my hope this process can be hastened in the interests of those who have been affected by the collapse. We need to get those funds that are guaranteed paid back to the investors, the men and women in this country who put their faith in this company, Confederation Life.

Retirees with the Bell group RRSP investments below the CompCorp limit will eventually be fully compensated for the time value of their money. The failure of Confederation Life did not affect Bell's principal pension plan, but in the case of amounts above the $60,000 CompCorp limit, until the liquidation process is completed it is impossible to determine the proportion of benefits that will eventually be paid.

Granted, in the two previous liquidations of life insurance companies in Canada, policyholders received a significant portion of the benefits owed by the companies, but this is small comfort to those whose life savings are now in jeopardy. These funds are of significant concern to my constituents and many other Canadians. I appreciate their difficulties and I want to do all I can to help resolve this issue and to encourage Bell Canada to accept the fact that it has an obligation to work with its employees and former employees to come to some kind of understanding or compromise.

It is my sincere hope that Bell Canada will address this issue with its present and past employees and will work judiciously to resolve what has become a contentious matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I realize that this is a particularly touchy subject for my colleague and for those affected by this problem, of course.

[English]

I recognize this is a very difficult issue for those Canadians, including Bell pensioners, who had investments in Confederation Life. There are several factors that should serve to diminish the adverse consequences of the failure of Confederation Life on Bell pensioners.

First, the funds at issue were part of a supplemental savings plan that were intended to augment pension income for Bell pensioners. Bell's principal pension plan is separately managed and was not affected by the failure of Confederation Life.

Second, I am informed by the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Compensation Corporation, CompCorp, that the group RRSP in question is guaranteed by CompCorp to a maximum of $60,000, including principal and interest. Amounts over $60,000 will be recoverable through the liquidation process.

Finally, a hardship committee has been established by the liquidator to review requests in cases of unusual financial hardship. The intention is to ensure that funds are immediately available to those most in need.

Regarding whether anything can be done to speed up the liquidation, responsibility for the liquidation of Confederation Life is a matter for the liquidator under the supervision of the court. As such it would be inappropriate to intervene.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS ACT

BILL C-110—MOTION FOR TIME ALLOCATION

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.) moved:

That in relation to Bill C-110, an act respecting constitutional amendments, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the second reading stage of the bill and, fifteen minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the allotted day of the second reading consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required for the purpose of this order, and in turn every question necessary for the disposal of the second reading stage of the bill shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

The Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

[English]

CONSIDERATION OF SECOND READING

The House resumed from November 30 consideration of the motion that Bill C–110, an act respecting constitutional amendments, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a country is what citizens make it. Therefore we can take collective pride that Canada has been deemed by the United Nations as the number one country in the world in which to live.

Today we are challenged once more to reaffirm our faith in our country. We are asked to reaffirm our trust in each other. We are called to creative leadership. Either we are for Canada or we are not.

It is with great pride that I rise today during this historic debate to offer my full support of the unity package unveiled by the government and now before the House.

A key component of this package is Bill C–110, an act respecting constitutional amendments. The bill commits the Government of Canada to obtain the approval of all four regions of the country, namely, the western region comprising Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, the Atlantic region comprising Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and the provinces of Ontario and Quebec as two separate regions.

Ottawa commits itself, before constitutional amendments can be proposed to Parliament, to first obtain the consent of at least six provinces, namely, Quebec, Ontario and two provinces from the Atlantic region representing more than 50 per cent of the region's population and two provinces from the western region representing more than 50 per cent of the west's population.

When Bill C–110 becomes law, the federal government could not proceed to table a constitutional amendment if any one of the four regions refused to give its consent, even if seven provinces representing 50 per cent of Canada's population pass resolutions in favour of such a constitutional amendment.

Although the present bill does not amend the Canadian Constitution which stipulates four legal amending processes as provided for in sections 38 to 44 of part V, it is as an act of the federal Parliament binding on current and succeeding governments.

The western region makes up nearly 30 per cent of Canada's population, larger than Quebec's and smaller than Ontario's. Taking into account the population of each of the four western provinces, the bill affects the western region in this fashion: first, Alberta would require either British Columbia or a combination of Saskatchewan and Manitoba to exercise the veto; second, Manitoba and Saskatchewan would require British Columbia or each other and Alberta to exercise the veto; third, British Columbia would require only one other western province to exercise its right to say no.

The regional veto envisioned in this bill gives greater strength to each of the western provinces than can be obtained under the existing amending formula.

It is a significant step forward. It illustrates the flexibility of federalism to which the government is committed. It is this sort of political creativity and ingenuity that should summon in us a sense of pride in our Canadian citizenship, which should be a forum for transcending differences and considering the common good of all.

Most Canadians became citizens by birth. For me, becoming Canadian was a conscious choice, a choice informed by a strong commitment to the values, goals and vision Canada has for herself in the world community.

In January 1968 I braved my first Canadian winter in Winnipeg as a new immigrant. Coming from the tropical climes of the Philippines, the country of my birth, the cold winds and bitter frost of the North American prairie seemed particularly harsh. But the chill of the winter was quickly offset by the warmth of the welcome I received from the people of Manitoba. Winnipeg was my Canadian city of entry, a friendly place where I felt at home instantly. But Canada is the country I adopted.

• (1050)

My four sons were born on Canadian soil. Many of my dreams for my family and my career have been realized in Canada. My future goals, if they are achieved, will be achieved in this country.

This is a country which accommodates the dreams of individuals from all cultures, from all walks of life. This is a country that promotes and supports a fully integrated citizenship which takes these differences into account.

My constituency of Winnipeg North is a microcosm of Canada. People of aboriginal ancestry and people of Ukrainian, Jewish, Polish, Indian, Portuguese and Filipino origins, along with anglophone and francophones and many others, have made Winnipeg North their home. They are proud of their heritage and they are proud of their Canadian citizenship. These define our shared identity.

Beyond our shared identity, beyond our diversity there is a stronger force that socially binds us. It is a set of shared political values. Canadians share a belief in equality and fairness. They believe in consultation and dialogue. They share in the importance of accommodation and tolerance. They share compassion, generosity and an attachment to the natural environment. Together they support diversity. As a people we share a commitment to freedom, peace and non–violent change.

Canadians from coast to coast to coast told us four years ago that we share these seven values. It is certainly true that we in different regions, provinces, cities, communities and households may feel like a minority with different priorities and goals. Sometimes those differences can make us feel alienated from the majority.

I know that feeling. As a Filipino Canadian, I know that being a member of a visible minority makes me sometimes feel like an outsider. Occasionally I feel a sense of aloneness. But those feeling pass whenever one stops to consider the policies which inform the real discourse of this country.

Nearly a quarter of a century ago in this House, then Prime Minister Trudeau introduced a ground breaking policy which formalized the very values of which I spoke earlier. One of the chief aims of that policy was to enhance every Canadian's sense of belonging, in the process fostering the ties that bind us all together.

The policy has showcased, in a very real sense, the creativity, the ingenuity of the Canadian people. It sent a clear message to me as a Canadian of Filipino origin that I was as welcome in Canada as anyone else. It confirmed my initial impressions of Canada formed that first winter a few years earlier. It made me understand that, yes, I am different from some, but I am equal to all.

The bill before us today is the fulfilment of a promise, part of the promise that includes recognizing Quebec as a distinct society within Canada. We all know and have known since Confederation that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada, a distinctiveness defined by her unique culture, French speaking majority and civil law tradition.

As I mentioned before, differences can lead one to a sense of alienation. With this motion introduced by the Prime Minister, Canadians are sending the clear message to Quebecers that we not only respect the differences in their traditions, history, language and culture, we celebrate and value them. They make Canada whole.

We are reawakened to the spirit of partnership and collaboration which brought us together more than a century and a quarter ago. We want Quebecers to know that by working together, we can develop a national vision to confront with resolute confidence the challenges of today and tomorrow just as we triumphed when we faced the challenges of the past.

Our historical achievements in building this nation rightly give us a sense of national pride.

• (1055)

Our shared identity, our shared values, our collective sense of pride in the midst of our deep diversity, are the tools that shall preserve Canada as a nation, that shall propel us to prosperity. These are the tools that will translate our hope into reality.

The challenge before us today is whether we have the will to accommodate, the will to make sacrifices for our common national good, the goodwill to see us build on the partnership of the past 128 years. We cannot allow history to judge us harshly. We cannot allow the moment for national unity to pass. I therefore ask all colleagues to shed political partisanship for Canadian partnership. Long live Canada. Vive le Canada.

The Speaker: I wonder if rather than begin a speech, then break it up in the middle—

WORLD AIDS DAY

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the number one cause of death in men aged 19 to 44 in the major metropolitan areas of Canada is AIDS.

Today is World AIDS Day. The World Health Organization's theme this year is shared rights and responsibilities. This theme highlights the need for equality and solidarity in global responses to AIDS. Its message is clear. Everyone has the right to information, preventive skills and tools, to avoid infection. Everyone has the right to access to appropriate care free from the burden of discrimination.

The World Health Organization message balances these rights with the responsibility of the individual to protect self and others from infection, the responsibilities of families and communities to educate the public about HIV prevention and to care for those infected with AIDS.

Themes are usually rhetoric unless followed by action. Let us in the House commit ourselves to actively ensure those rights and responsibilities become reality. AIDS creates too much tragic waste of human life and potential to do otherwise.

MINISTER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House the Minister of Indian Affairs was unable to reply to questions concerning certain highly paternalistic and disdainful comments about aboriginal people made by his ADM. His reason: the memorandum in question was not addressed to the minister himself. What a lame excuse.

The contents of this memo were released by the Globe and Mail. In addition to expressing doubts about the professionalism of the reporters on this respected daily newspaper, and to describing his ADM's comments as "pretty silly", the minister has insulted the intelligence of the members of this House and of his constituents by refusing to answer questions on his departmental policy for ridiculous reasons.

It does not matter to whom the memo was addressed; he was at the very least clearly remiss in his duties.

FIREARMS

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, violent home invasions are becoming a serious problem in Canada. The Liberals say that they want a safer society, but by protecting criminals from decent citizens they make life more dangerous for us all.

The Prime Minister has on various occasions stated that it is somehow un-Canadian to possess firearms for home protection. That is easy to say when one is protected by armed guards. However a few weeks ago when the system broke down, the Prime Minister discovered that even the mighty are vulnerable.

I have this vision of the Prime Minister shivering in his nightshirt, clutching his soapstone carving. I wonder if as the long minutes dragged by he would not have felt more comfortable if he had been holding a .38.

The rest of us do not even have sleeping policeman around—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Denis.

WORLD AIDS DAY

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint-Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw attention on this first day of December to World AIDS Day. This day brings to mind the significant numbers of individuals affected by this disease, one for which to this day there is still no cure. In North America it is a dramatic fact that AIDS is the top ranking cause of death for people between the ages of 25 and 44.

• (1100)

[English]

Health Canada reports that last year alone almost 3,000 Canadians were reported as having contracted the AIDS virus. That is about eight Canadians per day. It is indeed a shocking amount, but what is more shocking is that we are not doing enough to find a cure.

The federal government must strengthen its national AIDS strategy and do more to help researchers across the country who are working to develop an AIDS vaccine, researchers like Dr.

Christos Tsoukas of the Montreal General Hospital whose research is seriously jeopardized by this lack of funding.

We owe it to Canadians, especially to young people.

TOURISM

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka, as well as in many other areas of the country, constituents depend on tourism. The weather this week has reminded us that tourism is not just a summer business but a year round business.

Tourism is a very important industry in the country. It contributes about $26 billion to our gross domestic product. It is estimated that every new $1 million of tourism expenditure results in 39 person years of employment. In my riding almost one of every two jobs is dependent on this industry.

When it snows, and has it ever snowed, the small businessmen and women in my riding look forward to a good winter season. We have some of the best trail systems in Canada. We attract those who cross–country ski, snowshoe or snowmobile.

If November's record snowfall is any indication, it will be a great season for all winter activities. I invite all Canadians to share in the experience of the great Canadian winter in my riding and across the country.

PROVINCE OF ONTARIO

Mr. Janko Peric (Cambridge, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday the people of Ontario finally learned that Mike Harris and his Conservative government do not know the meaning of the words common sense.

Ontarians will now have to wait longer for hospital services, if they can find an open hospital; pay up to 22 per cent more for a university education; and learn to live with fewer locally provided services.

The Waterloo region, which takes in my riding of Cambridge, will be faced with $9 million in hospital cuts. Those cuts will mean a reduction and possible elimination of services from three hospitals in the area.

The area will also see a cut of approximately $10 million to schools. Libraries in Cambridge will lose $120,000 and transit fares will go up.

While all Ontarians want to get their fiscal house in order, why is it that the sick, the elderly and children trying to get an education will be most hurt by the cuts? The premier's friends who have been promised a 30 per cent tax break will not.

While it is nice to see that the premier—

The Speaker: The hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster.

NATIONAL FARMERS UNION

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last week I met with farm leaders in Atlantic Canada and attended the annual meeting of the National Farmers Union in Charlottetown.

The following resolution was carried by the NFU membership:

> Whereas we supposedly live in a democratic country, and whereas much money is spent on getting MLAs and MPs elected to represent the people, therefore be it resolved that the NFU pressure all provincial premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada to allow elected officials to fairly represent the people who elected them by permitting free votes without fear of reprisal.

The hon. member for Malpeque seems to have forgotten what he did prior to being elected to the House. Let me think. Could it be the president of the National Farmers Union?

It appears as though there has been a change of mind for the hon. member for Malpeque since arriving in Ottawa. Instead of representing the wishes of his constituents, the member has decided to become a traditional politician, toe the Liberal Party line and become part of the Prime Minister's "Yes, whatever you say" club.

Now is the time for the hon. member for Malpeque and his seatmates to return to reality and recommit themselves to representing their constituents.

WORLD AIDS DAY

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is World AIDS Day. Sadly thousands of Canadians are all too personally familiar with the tragedy of AIDS and HIV.

The human cost of AIDS is immeasurable. Each day our communities lose valuable and talented members to this disease. Right now AIDS is one of the primary causes of premature death of Canadian men. We must devote greater resources to its control and elimination.

AIDS has preyed particularly severely on Canada's artistic community and this impoverishes every Canadian. Museums, galleries and art shops across the country will be closed today in commemoration of a day without art to honour artists lost to AIDS.

Recently, there have been breakthroughs in the fight against this terrible disease, but we now have a responsibility to guarantee stable and adequate funding for research, and to assist individuals and their families.

THE LATE JOHN ANGUS RANKIN

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last Monday hundreds of people gathered at the funeral of John Angus Rankin to say goodbye to this beloved parish priest and fiddler.

Born in Inverness, Reverend Rankin was ordained to the priesthood in 1946. In 1959 he became pastor of Saint Mary of the Angels Parish in Glendale and Holy Trinity Mission in Waycobah, where he stayed until his retirement in 1994.

During these years Reverend Rankin sparked a renaissance in Cape Breton fiddling and helped revive the Gaelic language. He combined an ear for fiddling with a genuine love for people, in particular the Micmac community of Cape Breton among whom he finally chose to lay at rest.

Reverend Rankin will be sorely missed by all, but his cultural and musical legacy will continue to live on long into the future.

LIBERATION OF HOLLAND

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a monument erected this remembrance week in Chatham's Legion Memorial Gardens is a constant reminder of how lucky we are to be Canadians.

More than 500 veterans and Kent's Dutch community paid tribute to the Canadian soldiers who fought and died to liberate Holland 50 years ago.

We can never take our freedom for granted. It is important that future generations realize how fortunate we are in Canada. Our soldiers gave their lives, the supreme sacrifice, so each of us could speak and live freely.

Thanks to the efforts of the Dutch in my riding who raised $12,000 to build the memorial, we have a permanent reminder of our soldiers' struggles. They did not die for a region or a province; they fought for Canada.

The Dutch community wanted me to point out that they are not hyphenated or distinct Canadians but Canadians only, true and proud. I salute their efforts at remembrance.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, once again the federal government is the last to catch the winds of change.

Canadians from coast to coast are calling for the government to deal with the issues that are truly important. At the top of the list in every region of the country are balanced budgets and tax relief.

The provincial governments are answering the call. Nine have balanced their budgets or plan to do so. A number have developed debt repayment schedules just as Canadian families would pay off a mortgage. By doing so these governments are also putting themselves in a position to offer tax relief in the near future.

The message is clear. Canadians are now holding their elected officials to higher fiscal standards than ever before and the litmus test they are applying is a balanced budget plan. It is telling that there are only two governments in all Canada which fail this test: the separatist government in Quebec and the Liberal government in Ottawa.

WORLD AIDS DAY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, today is World AIDS Day. As part of the national strategy, the national health research and development program budgets some $5.5 million to researchers working outside Health Canada. The Medical Research Council contributes another $2 million to this research.

Normally these programs issue calls for research applications twice each year. Because the federal government is not prepared to commit to funding AIDS research beyond March 1998, the two programs have decided to stop accepting applications. As a result, long term research will suffer and some of the best and brightest researchers may leave the field.

If the Minister of Health and the government are prepared to accept responsibility, it is essential that the Minister of Health and the Liberal government put their money where their mouth is. It takes money to do research. I call on the government to immediately introduce a funding base beyond 1998.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REFORM

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis-Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this government's performance on job creation is deplorable. This morning, Statistics Canada announced that 44,000 jobs were lost in November. Employment has remained practically at a standstill in Canada for the past twelve months. Although jobs are the main focus of the government's program, it has failed utterly to do anything about the labour market situation.

Since the Liberals came to power, the unemployed have been asked to make big sacrifices. The government said that its objective was to put people back to work. There again, it has failed. The Minister of Human Resources Development will table his second set of unemployment insurance reforms today. Like last time, he will say they are intended to give Canadians the dignity of work. However, the figures are there to tell us that the job done on unemployment insurance will not create jobs. The minister is not giving Canadians the dignity of work. He is taking it away from the unemployed.

WORLD AIDS DAY

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today, December 1, is the eighth annual World AIDS Day.

Since the global epidemic of this dreadful disease was first documented and up to the end of 1994, an estimated 19.5 million men, women and children have contacted HIV. The World Health Organization estimates that the total number could more than double by the year 2000.

AIDS is the most deadly scourge ever faced by humankind. Those who suffer with the ravages of this disease, their families and friends, indeed all of us can count ourselves among the victims of AIDS.

I urge all Canadians to continue to support the battle against this devastating illness. The efforts of every one of us are needed if we are ever to celebrate the last World AIDS Day, the day when we can finally claim victory over this deadly killer.

ROYAL ROADS

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I state in the strongest possible terms my objection to the fact that some 484 acres of pristine crown lands on the Royal Roads property in my riding of Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca are on the table for future development.

The Department of National Defence has already paid the city of Colwood $198,000 for a buy–in for 6,000 residential equivalency units of trunk sewer capacity with an application for a further 2,000 units. Plans for the development of the lands and the property are already under way by the Treasury Board.

Given this fact we deserve to know what are the plans for Royal Roads, who has been consulted and what is the time frame for this development.

Since April 1994 I have continued to advocate a plan put forth by the Royal Roads committee that I started which would see the development of only 60 acres of the land with the rest held forever, in perpetuity. Rest assured I will fight tooth and nail alongside my constituents to ensure that these beautiful lands are not bulldozed and concretized in the name of development.

WORLD AIDS DAY

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today is World AIDS Day, and I would like to make parliamentarians, Quebecers and Canadians more aware of the importance of this day.

No one should and no one can afford to remain indifferent to the seriousness of this disease and the physical and psychological suffering it causes.

Unknown until the end of the seventies, the AIDS virus has, in many western and developing countries, become public health problem number one. In 1993 the World Health Organization estimated that more than 14 million people throughout the world were or had been infected by HIV, and 7,000 people have died of AIDS in Canada.

It is still very important to educate the public about the risk of HIV infection. This terrible disease continues to strike down individuals of all ages, irrespective of gender or sexual orientation.

We must not give up in despair. We must persevere in our search for ways to wipe out this disease, because this is the only message of hope—

BANKS

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as a member of Parliament one of my greatest frustrations are banks and their limited interest in assisting small business.

My riding of Huron—Bruce thrives on the success of small and medium size businesses. Many Canadians are seizing the entrepreneurial spirit, some because it is their lifelong desire and others because they are unable to find employment. These people have skills, intelligence, energy and are willing to take risks to become financially independent.

Small businesses need to be given an opportunity. Canadian banks are making it difficult for entrepreneurs to realize their dreams. If entrepreneurs could afford to launch a new business or if every mature business could afford to employ one more person, Canada's unemployment rate would decline drastically.

The government has taken the initiative to help small businesses with measures such as Bill C–99, an act to amend the Small Business Loans Act.

I encourage all bankers to help remedy our unemployment problems by taking an invested interest in our financial future and by ensuring that new and existing entrepreneurs are given a fair and equal chance to prove that they can contribute to the economy of the country.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. A memo from Assistant Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs, Jack Stagg, recommends that Ottawa offer financial compensation to native peoples for supporting the federal system in the referendum and subsidies to try to silence the First Nations' constitutional claims while the so–called Quebec initiatives are announced.

When questioned yesterday, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development avoided the issue by saying that he had not read the memo, although the national media were talking about it.

How does the minister explain that, yesterday, not only did he not know what his own assistant deputy minister was doing, but he was unaware of what everyone else was fully aware of from reading the paper, namely the content of Mr. Stagg's memo.

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I explained yesterday, I have 3,000 civil servants in my department alone. A lot of them do a lot of writing. I did not ask for that note, I did not want that note, and I do not agree with that note.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I imagine the minister must have watched TV yesterday like everyone else; it was on all the networks.

Given the memo's unacceptable recommendations and its lack of respect for the First Nations, will the minister tell us clearly whether he and his government will dissociate themselves from the content of the memo by his assistant deputy minister? Let him say so clearly.

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I just did.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I understood the minister to say earlier that he was dissociating himself, and now he is saying it again. If this is true, since the memo was not well received by the various native groups and since the Department of Indian Affairs is supposed to protect the rights of these people, would the minister tell us if he plans to discipline his associate deputy minister for his fine memo?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the First Nation vote in Quebec does not have to be bought. They are standing up for Canada. When the Crees vote 96.3 per cent no against the separatists and the Inuit vote 95 per cent no against the separatists and the Montagnais vote 99 per cent no against the separatists, that should send a clearer message to the separatists than to the Liberal government.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is highly surprising that the minister would brag about accepting the results of referendums restricted to the Crees and Montagnais, an essentially ethnic referendum in which the other people living on these lands were not allowed to vote. That is a very interesting statement coming from this minister.

He was not asked whether or not referendums were held in Quebec. Rather, he was asked specifically whether he dissociates himself from his assistant deputy minister's memo. We are not talking about just anybody, about one of 3,000 public servants, but about the assistant deputy minister. Is the minister going to summon his ADM and take appropriate action? That is the question. We are not asking the minister for his life story. He should be responsible and answer the question.

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will associate myself with any civil servant in any department of the government who wants to help the aboriginal people of Quebec.

While I am on my feet, talking about association, there is a person called Pierre Blais who is a member of the separatist government in Quebec. He calls the aboriginal people of Quebec gypsies and nomads.

We are talking about disassociation. When the new leader of Quebec takes over as premier, and maybe when some of the A team go and leave the B team here, will the A team disassociate itself from comments like that?

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we disavowed such comments as soon as they were uttered. I do not know any Pierre Blais, but I do know that this minister is skirting the issue. Perhaps he needs videotapes to understand the reality, just as the defence minister understands only when he can see the evidence on videotape.

• (1120)

I ask him again the same question. His assistant deputy minister made unacceptable comments, mostly about native people. Will he punish his assistant deputy minister or does he only have a problem with the fact that there was a leak? Is this his sense of responsibility, that a leak is serious? What he said shows his inability to take action. If this minister is incapable of taking action against an assistant deputy minister who made such comments about Quebec and its native people, he should not be a government minister.

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will correct that. Pierre Blais is a former minister of justice.

We are talking about disassociation. I will be clear. Any provincial or federal civil servant or any provincial or federal cabinet minister who wants to do the just and honourable thing with aboriginal people will be followed and admired by me.

While we are on the subject of disassociation, what is this party going to do about a former leader who talks about "ethics"? What is this party going to do about a former deputy premier who goes into a hotel and says the same thing? What is this party going to do about racism in Quebec vis-a-vis the ethnic community? It is important to me because I come from ethnic stock, from the Italians and the Irish. If I am offended, I wonder how the aboriginal people feel, who have to face fivefold what we had to face in this country. What is the member going to do about that?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, after a year and a half of delays, flying trial balloons, and countless rewrites, the Minister of Human Resources Development is finally bringing down his watered down UI reform proposals. He has even promised job opportunities and more jobs. Unfortunately while he has been playing politics a very alarming circumstance has occurred. Statistics Canada reports that last month the number of working Canadians fell by 44,000. That is five months of job growth down the drain. I wonder what is happening here.

My question to the minister is as follows. What if anything are the minister's UI proposals doing to stimulate job growth in the private sector?

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is abundantly clear to those individuals who have been active participants in the debate about restructuring Canada's social security system that the Unemployment Insurance Act as it is today does not reflect the reality of the workplace. It is for this reason that the government embarked on a very ambitious project to modernize Canada's social security system with three major objectives.

The first objective is to help Canadians find and keep jobs by providing them with not only income support but also a set of tools that will allow them to get back to work quickly. The second objective is to provide protection for the most vulnerable in our society. I know how the Reform Party feels about that. The third objective is to develop a system that is sustainable.

The announcement the minister of human resources will make today will be something Canadians have been waiting for and it will address those three objectives.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, those objectives are certainly noble, but job growth has not occurred. When we saw the minister preparing his proposal, in the last few days he has been making political manipulation and changes instead of looking at sound policy.

If the minister is really serious about creating jobs and improving job opportunities in the country, why did he not slash the payroll taxes by more than the token five cents that was announced informally yesterday? My question is clear. The Minister of Finance has said in the House more than once that payroll taxes kill jobs. If that is true, why did the Minister of Human Resources Development not announce a slash greater than five cents?

• (1125)

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is becoming abundantly clear that the Reform Party simply does not understand even the measures taken in the past budget by the Minister of Finance.

The Minister of Finance has already reduced payroll taxes. Measures that will be announced later on by the minister will speak to the issue of job creation, which is an important and fundamental pillar of the jobs and growth agenda. Not only has the government created over 500,000 jobs, but we are modernizing the delivery services. We are engaging the private sector, working together in partnership with the government through things like national sectoral councils and youth internship programs, which have created over 30,000 jobs for young people.

We are modernizing the system and we are creating the climate that will speak to the issue of job creation.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Human Resources Development has promised that through the UI proposals there will be job opportunity and job growth. If you really look at it, what is the record?

Nothing in there will break the cycle of dependency. There will be nothing there for those 44,000 Canadians who just lost their jobs. There is going to be nothing there for the young people who are looking for jobs at the present time. There is a lot of politics, but not good, substantial policy.

My question is for the hon. parliamentary secretary. After a year and a half of dithering and political manoeuvring here and top down tinkering and made in Ottawa solutions, what is the government really going to do through this policy to reduce the number of unemployed in this country?

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Human Resources Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should be asking what the government has already done to create jobs in Canada. We have done a great deal. I have outlined a number of measures we have taken already.

I find it extremely surprising that a member of the Reform Party, the same party that does not support the summer job action plan of this government, which has created over 44,500 jobs, would get up and claim to be the defender of young people in this country.

It is abundantly clear to the people of Canada that the Reform members of the opposition have abdicated their responsibilities to give young people a chance.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs. In his memo, Indian Affairs assistant deputy minister Jack Stagg suggested that federal subsidies be granted to aboriginal people, first, as compensation for supporting the no side in the referendum and, second, as a way to silence native constitutional demands while the federal government is making pseudo–offers to Quebec.

In light of his ADM's memo, will the minister confirm that he did not commit and does not intend to commit any federal funds to cover the costs incurred by the Crees and the Inuit to hold their own referendums in October?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what I can guarantee is that in Quebec there will be a clear understanding that there is an 1898 line, that the northern two–thirds of Quebec was transferred to Quebec without the knowledge and consent of the aboriginal people.

What I will guarantee is that the people of Quebec and Canada will understand that there is a royal commission report. There is an opinion from Daniel Turp, which has been hidden by the Bloc, that states that the rights of the aboriginal people in Quebec are sovereign, that they are more important than even the rights of Europeans who came after they did. That is a fact that the separatists know and are hiding. They put a muzzle on their legal scholar who advised them of this.

What I will guarantee is that the voice of our Minister of Foreign Affairs will be heard in Quebec, as will the voices of the thousands of Canadians who came forward and said to Matthew Coon–Come and Zebedee Nungak and the Mohawk leaders: "We understand finally what you are saying and we are with you".

[Translation]

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): In that case, Mr. Speaker, will the minister give us formal assurances that, contrary to what his ADM suggested, his government did not and will not try to buy the First Nations' silence on their constitutional demands while Ottawa is making its so–called offers to Quebec?

• (1130)

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the silence or the voice of the aboriginal people is not for sale. Matthew Coon–Come said during the referendum: "We are not Canada's Crees; we are not Quebec's Crees. We are Crees and we are not cattle to be moved around indiscriminately by ideological separatists at will".

JUSTICE

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the federal–provincial financial agreements for the administration of justice expired over two and a half years ago. The Liberal justice minister has failed to renegotiate these agreements within that period.

I ask the justice minister: what is the status of these agreements? Are they in place and if not, why are they not?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member would be good enough to tell me to which agreements he is referring. Is he referred to the firearms agreements? Is he referring to the cost sharing agreements for young offenders or legal aid? If the hon. member would be more specific in his question, I have information I would be happy to share with him.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last week we asked the justice minister the same question. Of course the solicitor general responded by saying he would get back to us. He has not got back to us with the information. At that time we were quite specific on what we were referring to.

I will ask the justice minister about the alternative measures program. The program as defined under Bills C–37 and C–41 will place a tremendous financial challenge on the provinces which are tasked with the administration of the program. What financial agreements if any has the justice minister devised in co–operation with the provinces, or is he just going to ignore the cost of this legislation to the provinces and force this legislation on them together with the financial requirement?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is important that the hon. member refer specifically to the agreements he is asking about. There are many agreements between the federal government and the provinces by which we share the cost in the administration of justice.

The hon. member has now referred to one such program. I am proud to say that today happens to be the day when the provisions of Bill C–37 are proclaimed in force and come into effect across the country. The provisions make extremely important improvements to strengthen the Young Offenders Act, particularly in relation to violence.

As the solicitor general said in the House last week in response to the last question put by the hon. member on this subject, we are assembling detailed information for the member which we will give him in the coming days when it is ready. Many of the agreements which expired some 18 months or two years ago have since been renewed retroactively to the date of the expiry of the last set of agreements.

As always, we are continuing our efforts with the provinces to work toward a justice system that is properly financed, that works in co–ordination at the various levels of government and that serves the people of Canada.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs.

The Kahnawake band council has passed a resolution to expel Peter Jacobs, a resident of the reserve, simply because he is not of Indian blood, discriminating against him on essentially ethnic grounds. Mr. Jacobs was adopted when he was three weeks old and has been living on the reserve for 40 years.

Does the minister support the decision made by the Kahnawake band council to expel Mr. Jacobs for ethnic reasons?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is the same elitist strategy I heard during the referendum. This is back to blood quantum and the old Quebec. This is it again.

Let me talk about my experience in Kahnawake when I went there with Serge Ménard, David Cliche and the solicitor general. We could have walked in there in peace to sign a policing agreement but because there was so much animosity built up between the separatists and people at Kahnawake, the aerials were ripped off our cars. They jumped in our cars and tried to choke us. This tells me that the federal Liberals understand the aspirations of the Mohawk and are able to deal with them and that the path of elitism the separatists are going on will bring this country to destruction. These are the types of questions that are the strategies and policies of the separatist party.

• (1135)

[Translation]

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister has fiduciary obligations toward aboriginal people; he grants major subsidies to the various band councils. Therefore, he is duty–bound to take his responsibilities instead of throwing this kind of red herring at us.

Does the minister support the Kahnawake band council's decision and does he intend to take action to prevent Mr. Jacobs' expulsion, yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, now that I understand more about the Mohawks, I think this type of question is a shame. They are Quebecers who are part of the city of Montreal. Once again the separatist party wants to get on blood purity which is where we are heading with this type of question—

Mr. Leroux (Shefford): Yes or no?

Mr. Irwin: Yes or no.

If the Reform wants to go in there—I mean the Bloc, I mix them up these days; it was a Freudian slip—it should go in and talk to them and not do as the Bloc critic has done which is to surreptitiously go from door to door in the Mohawk community asking: "Are you happy? Do you have any guns?" He got kidnapped by the Mohawks until they found out who he was and then let him go.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–37 which amended the Young Offenders Act did not go far enough. Canadians said it and Reform said it, but the justice minister went ahead with it anyway. Bill C–37 just received royal assent and the committee is already off on another mission to uncover the inadequacies of his improved act.

For years Canadians have been telling governments what is wrong with the YOA but governments will not listen. The minister did not listen to witnesses appearing before the committee last time. What assurance can he give them that he will listen this time?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member demonstrates on this issue as on so many others his preference for volume over analysis and his preference for rhetoric over reality.

Bill C–37 is an effective and insightful advance for the youth justice system in this country. It helps us to deal far more appropriately with violence among young people especially in the 16 and 17–year old age group.

At the time we introduced Bill C–37 we said that it was only a beginning and that more was required. We asked the justice committee, on which the member's colleagues sit along with members of our party, to undertake across Canada a comprehensive full analysis of the youth justice system to see how else it could be improved. That is the work in which the committee is engaged. It is important work and will result in recommendations to which we will pay attention.

If the hon. member thinks there is some better way to go about it, I would like to hear from him.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the reason I might resort to volume from time to time is in the hope the message might get through to the minister.

The Minister of Justice has sent the justice committee packing. The committee is to cross the country seeking the opinions of Canadians on his new and improved Young Offenders Act. Will the justice minister commit today to the members of the standing committee, to all members of this House and more important, to all Canadians, that he will listen and pay attention to the recommendations of the committee, or will this be just another colossal waste of taxpayers' time and money?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member also demonstrates that he is unable to accept yes for an answer.

Had he spoken with members of his own party who were at the committee hearing when I addressed them two weeks ago, he would know that I told the committee that this is an open minded, no holds barred, top to bottom review of the youth justice system.

I have asked the committee members to speak to police officers, to parents, to school principals and to young people themselves. I have asked them to speak to the provinces to determine their experience with the Young Offenders Act and its administration and to return with recommendations for further change. That is the way the process works. That is the functioning of democracy. I urge the hon. member to take a responsible part in it.

FIGHT AGAINST AIDS

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health. Today is World AIDS Day. The epidemic, far from being under control, has reached unexpected proportions. From 1982 to 1995, 15,000 cases of AIDS were reported in Canada. Over the next five years, another 15,000 cases will be identified. In the meantime, the minister does nothing but make empty speeches and is incapable of pledging to maintain the national AIDS strategy.

Given the terrible ravages of that disease, how can the minister justify that she is contemplating saving $40.7 million per year, at the expense of people living with AIDS, by giving up the national AIDS strategy? Such a decision would be shameful.

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member very well knows the answer to his question which is that HIV/AIDS and the battle against it remains a priority for the government.

Phase two of the strategy is scheduled to end in 1998. In the two years we have been here we have made dramatic cuts in every other program, but that is one program which has not been touched. We continue to spend $40.7 million a year on this strategy. That being said, we will continue to think of this as a priority, but we must reorganize the financing.

At this time we are working out the ways by which we can continue financing this very worthwhile initiative. We have at least until the next budget to announce exactly how we will reallocate funds to continue to support these very worthwhile programs.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that, in spite of the growing epidemic, the minister has not even managed to spend all the moneys allocated to her for the fight against AIDS. I ask her to rise in this House and to promise on her honour to extend the strategy and to spend the funds allocated. This would be the best way for her to show solidarity with the victims, and I hope she will make that commitment.

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, every dollar is spent very carefully. As you know, the mere fact that we have a dollar in our pocket does not mean that we should waste it. This is why the government invests in good programs.

Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that the hon. member will be pleased to hear that at least half a million dollars will be allocated to programs in Quebec, including one in his riding. The hon. member should be thankful, instead of attacking us.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY ACT

Mr. Reg Alcock (Winnipeg South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry.

Recently Quebec's environment minister wrote to the federal Minister of the Environment suggesting amendments be made to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act to improve environmental protection. Can the minister tell me whether any action has been taken to prevent the dumping of contaminated buildings and worksites on local governments?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I was very pleased to table a bill containing many amendments to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, including ones that deal particularly with the issue the hon. member has mentioned.

This is the first time that the bankruptcy act has had provisions that have been intended to enable trustees in bankruptcy to take possession of assets that pose environmental risks.

We have given claims which stem from environmental damage priority over those of other creditors, both secured and unsecured, so that dealing with contaminated properties and properties that are adjacent to the property where the damage occurred and linked to the activity that caused the environmental damage will be able to be used as a priority claim in order to effect the clean-up. This will not only relieve some of the responsibility from local governments, but it will also ensure that trustees are willing to move in and take on some of these very difficult files.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, recently the Minister of Justice said that the primary objective of his department was for a fair and responsive system of justice.

• (1145)

It is over a year and a half since I asked the minister to review the Patrick Kelly case. Over two years ago the key witness in the case admitted she lied during the trial. This witness's false testimony put Mr. Kelly, a former RCMP officer, behind bars.

We could very well have put an innocent man in prison for the past 14 years. Now this witness, presently in the U.S., refuses to testify further.

What is the minister's department doing to ensure the interviews with this witness are completed in order that a section 690 review in the Kelly case can proceed?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for his question, for his continuing interest in this case which I know is genuine, and for his interest in the administration of justice.

Throughout the past months I have been advised by independent counsel I retained to help me with the assessment of this case. That independent counsel working with lawyers for the applicant, Mr. Kelly, and the witness have participated in interviews. There have been three attendances for that purpose.

I believe the work with that witness has now been virtually completed. I am awaiting a final report and recommendations from the independent counsel. I am keenly aware that time has past since the application has been brought, but I will publish with the eventual disposition of the case a chronology of the developments so that the member and everybody else can see for themselves how this case has been dealt with. I will of course take responsibility for that.

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's response.

The minister promised in response to my earlier questions in the House to release relevant files to Clayton Ruby, Mr. Kelly's lawyer. However, the justice minister has been stalling for two years and refuses to provide the files required for Mr. Kelly's defence.

There is little reason not to release the files as the information being withheld from Mr. Kelly's lawyer was collected at public expense by a public agency for use in a public prosecution.

The minister has stated that he wants a fair and responsive system of justice. Will the minister stop stalling and release the files to Mr. Kelly's lawyer?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the release of those files has given rise to an issue with respect to the terms on which the release should take place. The files are not the property of the Department of Justice. They belong to the metropolitan Toronto police. They were made available to us on certain conditions.

The justice department has said in effect to Mr. Kelly's counsel: "We will allow you access to what we've been given but on certain conditions". Mr. Kelly's counsel has not found those conditions acceptable. He has taken another position. Quite properly he is acting for his client diligently. We are discussing the terms under which we will release the documents.

Our purpose is not to stall. Our purpose is to ensure that if and when we do release documents, we do it showing proper respect to their origin and to our obligations as custodian to the people who generated them. I am certain we will be able to work out terms acceptable to all parties and make them available soon.

MARKETING OF 3TC

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond-Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health. The Food and Drug Administration has authorized the marketing of a drug, 3TC, in the U.S. before Canada has authorized it, although they both received applications at the same time and although the drug was discovered in Quebec, at Laval. Worse still, in both the U.S. and Canada, examination of the drug submission was fasttracked.

How can the minister explain that fasttracking of drugs moves faster in the United States than in Canada, and that the Canadian fast track looks more like a secondary road than a super highway?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can tell you we are hoping for a decision on this in the near future.

There is one thing that ought to be pointed out, which is that the Government of Canada ought to be receiving praise, along with Health Canada, for providing substantial funding to help in the development of this product.

• (1150)

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond-Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the member speaks of hoping for a decision and I must point out to her that what she is hoping for, we are hoping for even more, but it is our impression that our hopes are often in vain.

Is the minister aware that the administrative slowness of her department has resulted in a mere 2,500 patients being able to benefit from this drug, whereas if 3TC obtained commercial authorization from Health Canada all of the people living with AIDS, four times that figure, could have access to it?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat what I said. The scientists of Health Canada are doing their job, and they will be giving us a decision shortly. I believe, however, that the hon. member may not have her facts exactly right. The companies applied for drug approval in the U.S. first, before Canada. The Americans have just now given approval. Some time is needed for decisions to be reached on protocols that are not favourable. I believe the hon. member will not be disappointed. Health Canada is doing its job, and doing it well.

GRAINS INDUSTRY

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food is developing the reputation of being able to give nice, long, flowery speeches but not being able to make up his mind and he cannot meet his deadlines. Let us see if he can break this habit of indecision.

The minister's senior executive officer group, which is also called the May 16th group, has put forward a proposal to sell 13,000 hopper cars dedicated to the hauling of prairie grain by the railroads for $100 million.

Has the minister made up his mind? If he has it will be earth shattering. Has he made up his mind to accept the offer or reject it?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the difficulties in responding to questions from the Reform Party is that its members consistently get their facts wrong. Once again the hon. gentleman has done exactly that.

He refers to a group within the grains industry called the May 16th group. He also refers to an advisory group of grains industry executives called the SEO group. The hon. gentleman should know those are two quite separate things. They are not one and the same.

The SEO group has come forward with certain recommendations about grain car ownership and grain car allocation procedures. Those recommendations have been presented for consideration to the May 16th group, as well as to some western Canadian farm organizations.

Those farm organizations are still in the process of considering the set of recommendations from the SEO group. Until I have the considered opinion of the farm organizations it would be highly inappropriate to make a final decision before getting their advice.

The hon. gentleman talks about grassroots political consultation and discussion. He suggests that we should get advice from farm organizations, but in his question he suggests that we make a decision today which pre-empts the opportunity to get that advice through consultation, and that we will not do.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we just saw an excellent example of the flowery speech and no decision whatsoever.

The minister is waffling. He is sending strange signals to the industry. He is not listening to those who have been putting input into the whole process. Maybe we can give him the benefit of the doubt. Maybe he is trying to get a better deal for farmers.

Is he proposing that if the railroads buy the cars, worth over $300 million for the fire sale price of $100 million, that the railroads will then agree not to increase the freight rates by the $1 a tonne which they are currently proposing? Is that what he is working for? Why is he delaying?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. gentleman fails to appreciate is that the set of recommendations put forward by the group of senior executive officers in the grains industry is a package proposal which involves a number of recommendations that move in a variety of different directions.

He has spoken, for example, about the recommendation relating to the possible sale of hopper cars. What he has not referred to is the fact that another recommendation from that very same group of senior executive officers proposes that there ought to be some kind of maximum ceiling with respect to freight rates extending over a period of 10 years.

It is significant that the Reform Party has consistently opposed that kind of protection for farmers.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment.

• (1155)

The UN weather agency reported this week that the hole in the earth's ozone shield covers an area twice the size of Europe. The hole grew again this year at the highest rate ever, threatening the globe with increased exposure to deadly ultraviolet radiation.

What is the Canadian government doing to prevent the deadly environmental catastrophe of ozone depletion?

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment will be attending the seventh meeting of the Montreal protocol which starts on Monday in Vienna.

She will be reinforcing Canada's commitment to an accelerated ozone layer program which has already been endorsed by the Council of Canadian Ministers of the Environment. This means working toward zero discharge of ozone depleting substances. It means phasing out HCFCs by the year 2010. It means continuing to work with Agriculture and Agri-food Canada on methyl bromide. Most important, it means a committed research program into alternatives to ozone depleting substances.

PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board.

The first quarterly report on job cuts in the public service indicates that so far Quebec has received more than 28 per cent of federal job cuts. This situation discriminates against Quebec, which, before the cuts, had only 19.3 per cent of federal public service jobs.

Considering that Quebec's under-representation within the federal public service has already caused it to lose more than 22,500 full-time jobs, what justification does the minister have for letting Quebec absorb more than 28 per cent of the cuts in the federal public service?

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the cuts are proportional right across the country.

The first quarterly report of early departures from the public service are by and large on a voluntary basis. Some people went out under the early retirement incentive program. I do not think those numbers can be taken as any disproportion across the system. Overall the program is going quite well right across the country.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last October the deputy minister of immigration signed a memorandum of understanding in Vietnam which allowed for the return of criminal refugees and immigrants from that country.

However, this week when the Vancouver Sun requested a copy of that memorandum of understanding, the department refused to give it to them because it could potentially damage bilateral relations.

Will the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration assure the House that the agreement will be made public forthwith and explain to us what is in the memorandum of understanding which if it is made public might damage bilateral relationships?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the intent of the government is to seek as many removal agreements as possible so that individuals who are to be deported can be facilitated without any problems.

Through some diligent work, we have been able to obtain such agreements with Jamaica and Vietnam, among others. We were the first country to return individuals to Laos.

We have often heard from members of the third party about the whole question of trying to get these removal agreements and that we would never be able to obtain them. Now that we have them, they ask if they can see them.

In respect to the agreement we signed with Vietnam, it was at Vietnam's request that the agreement be kept confidential. The government and the department have no difficulty if the Vietnamese government agrees to make it public. We have no concerns whatsoever. It is at Vietnam's request and we have respected the confidentiality.

However, the question at the heart of this is the importance of removing individuals who should not be here in the first place. That is being done.

HEALTH CARE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

Today on World AIDS Day, she will know that there has been great concern about the prospects for long term research into the area of HIV and AIDS.

• (1200)

The funding at this point goes to 1998, but the minister will know that research has to be done in a longitudinal manner over a period of time. Would the minister today state specifically what her plans are to ensure that there is a long term plan and strategy in place for AIDS research?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question because it is a very serious matter, which we are working diligently to address.

We hope to have some resolution to that question and ensure there is ongoing funding within Health Canada for research and programs having to do with AIDS and HIV. It is something we will hopefully have resolved within the next few months.

FUEL ADDITIVES

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment.

Next Monday, December 4, Ethyl Corporation in the United States is to start shipping MMT to American refiners for use in gasoline. Having regard for the fact that the environment department has talked of the absolute necessity of uniform gasoline standards between Canada and the United States, can the parliamentary secretary tell us what uniform standards we are going to follow in Canada? Is it going to be with MMT or without MMT?

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the reason we have proceeded with Bill C–94, which is presently in third reading in the House and which would ban MMT, is essentially an environmental reason. MMT impairs catalysts and sensors in modern automobiles, which are supposed to lead to cleaner fuel emissions.

We want to ban MMT and follow the lead of states such as California, New York, New Jersey and Illinois, which are using reformulated gasoline without MMT. This is the option we have chosen, to use cleaner burning fuels, to use reformulated gasoline. So we are going to be committed to working very hard to make sure Bill C–94 becomes a reality very soon.

POINTS OF ORDER

DISTINCT SOCIETY MOTION

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with regard to the amendments relative to the distinct society motion. I am not pressing you for a timetable, but I was wondering if you could indicate to us whether you have a time line as to when you will be advising the House with regard to your ruling.

The Speaker: I have instructed the clerk of the House and our researchers to go over it. I wanted to take my time on this, as I believe it will be reintroduced next week. You will have my decision before we take up the debate again.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GOVERNMENT SERVICES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this petition is from movers or those involved with the industry.

They want the government to examine very carefully its policy with regard to household goods removal services. They obviously want to ensure a good deal for Canadian taxpayers. At the same time, they want a solution that will not destabilize their industry, their involvement, their small businesses.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present a petition that has been circulating all across Canada. This petition has been signed by a number of Canadians from Formosa, Ontario.

The petitioners draw to the attention of the House that managing the family home and caring for preschool children is an honourable profession, which has not been recognized for its value to our society. They also state that the Income Tax Act discriminates against families that make the choice to provide care in the home to preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill or the aged.

• (1210)

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to pursue initiatives to eliminate tax discrimination against families that decide to provide care in the home for preschool children, the disabled, the chronically ill and the aged.

ALCOHOL

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition which has also been circulating across Canada. It has been signed by a number of Canadians from Sarnia, Ontario.

The petitioners bring to the attention of the House that consumption of alcoholic beverages may cause health problems or impair ability, and specifically that fetal alcohol syndrome and other alcohol related birth defects are 100 per cent preventable by avoiding alcohol consumption during pregnancy.

The petitioners therefore pray and call on Parliament to enact legislation to require health warning labels to be placed on the containers of all alcoholic beverages to caution expectant mothers and others of the risk associated with alcohol consumption.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, today I am pleased to present two petitions sponsored by Sun Hope in memory of André Castet, with over 500 signatures from the residents of British Columbia, many in my own riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam.

These Canadians express the need for substantial revisions to the Young Offenders Act and reject the tinkering and posturing of the government in legislation and its inactivity such as we see in Bill C–37.

AIDS

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on this World AIDS Day I am honoured to present a petition signed by over 3,200 Canadians from every region of Canada.

The petitioners call on Parliament to consider a program of long term stabilized funding of AIDS research proportionate to the HIV population in Canada. Canada ranks third among G–7 countries in its incidence of HIV but ranks last in AIDS research funding.

I fully concur with the request of these petitioners.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present the petitions of 1,000 Winnipegers from my constituency of Winnipeg North and beyond who pray that the surety bond be not imposed on applicants for immigration and as well to have the landing fee collected at the time of the issuance of the visas of applicants.

They remind members of the House that immigrants provide a strength for our economic and social fabric.

BOVINE GROWTH HORMONE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring forward a petition from a great number of people in southern Ontario who are opposed to the approval of synthetic bovine growth hormone, the drug injected into cows to increase milk production.

They say there have not been sufficient studies to warrant this process, that there is a great risk to the health of people, not to mention the damage to the cows. Australia, New Zealand and the European Community have refused to approve BGH.

The petitioners want Parliament to take steps to keep BGH out of Canada through legislating a moratorium or stoppage of BGH use and sale until the year 2000 and to examine the outstanding health and economic questions through an independent and transparent review.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition signed by 182 residents of British Columbia, forwarded to me by Mrs. Margaret Wiens of 100 Mile House.

These petitioners call on the government to enact immediate legislation for freedom of choice in health care such as full integration of alternative practitioners, homoeopathic, herbal, naturopathic, et cetera, into the Canadian health care system with full and equal coverage for visits and necessary remedies.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise today to speak to the House on Bill C–110.

I have heard in recent days the speeches of a number of our colleagues in the Liberal Party and the other opposition party. I realized that I should perhaps offer a somewhat broader criticism of the bill.

Those who spoke from the Bloc Quebecois very successfully pointed out the extremely limited nature and scope of what is being called a sort of veto power, which will be loaned to Quebec and certain regions in Canada, so we can say that the Prime Minister has begun to fulfil the promise he made to Quebecers in the final days of the campaign.

I would like to make clear that the issues of the veto, the distinct society and the transfers of jurisdiction, do not only involve constitutional change. These issues are at the heart of what we Quebecers see as Quebec's destiny.

This week a paper reported a survey. Canadians in Quebec and elsewhere were asked about their perception of Canada, their vision of its future. Basically, they were asked whether, in their opinion, Canada comprised two groups, was the union of two equal language groups or was the juxtaposition of 10 provinces forming a country. The results differ significantly according to whether they come from Quebec, the west, Ontario or the Atlantic provinces.

I think this survey takes us to the heart of the debate, which involves defining Canada What was it in the past? What is it now? We see that Canadians are not agreed on how they view their country. We see that 64 per cent of Canadians believe basically that Canada is the union of 10 provinces. Twenty–four per cent think it is the union of two equal language groups: anglophones and francophones.

These figures are surprising. Yet, when we look at the distribution by region and province, we see that the split is quite substantial, even dramatic. We see that 70 per cent of Ontarians, 73 per cent of Maritimers, and 76 per cent of the people in the prairies think that Canada is the union of 10 provinces. In Quebec, however, 42 per cent of the people see Canada as the union of 10 provinces, 37 per cent as the union of two equal linguistic groups, and 15 per cent as neither.

These figures—42, 37 and 15 per cent—remind me of the results of some polls conducted during the referendum campaign. Some of the polls, perhaps those taken at the beginning of the campaign, showed that 42 per cent of respondents intended to vote no and 37 per cent to vote yes, with 15 or 20 per cent undecided.

As these figures demonstrate, the heart of the problem with Canada and Quebec is that Canadians and Quebecers do not see Canada in the same way. That is why we in Quebec talk about a veto, why we see this reality as important.

• (1220)

If we look at the people in the rest of Canada, we realize that they do not see all this as important. I have not heard people from B.C., Ontario or the Atlantic region say that they should have a veto on constitutional changes in Canada. Only Quebec makes this demand.

Why is Quebec making this demand? Because Quebec is basically a people who want to preserve their identity, who want to continue to be themselves. That is the reason why they want to have a say in any constitutional change. That is what lies at the heart of the debate on the right of veto.

It does not matter to us if this will be done this way or that way, if B.C. will have the same veto power as Ontario, if the Atlantic provinces will have a say, if Prince Edward Island will make special demands. To us, veto power is a matter of defending our distinctive culture, of defending what makes us a people. That is why, in the 30 years I have been following politics, Quebec has always had problems with respect to the right of veto. Not because we want to make trouble for Canada, but because it touches the very essence of who we are.

As you may recall, in the 1960s, there was the proposed constitutional amending formula called the Fulton–Favreau formula; there was the Victoria formula; there were the protests by certain Quebec movements when the Constitution was patriated. We were reminded yesterday that Quebec sovereignists voted against the Meech Lake accord. Just as well, since Meech was some kind of a reorganization of Canada designed to satisfy the very minimal demands put forward by the then Premier of Quebec, and those demands did not reflect in any way what I feel Quebec's basic needs are.

On the one hand, there were those who had a blueprint for nationhood and, on the other, there were those with nothing better to offer at the time than some vague revamping of the Canadian Constitution. In that context, I think that we sovereignists had a right—we did not have a choice really—to oppose this constitutional revamping.

I am puzzled about some of the attacks on us, when I hear people say about certain Bloc members: "So and so, who was sitting at the Quebec National Assembly at the time, voted against the Meech Lake accord". It is a good thing they did, because this accord was a way for the federalists, who do not recognize Quebec as a people, to revamp the Constitution in the hope that, slowly but surely, we would all die off and disappear.

That is why, when we Quebecers are offered amending formulas, our gut reflex is: "Watch out. Red alert. They are dealing with fundamental aspects that make us what we are". We want to remain what we are and, in the future, to develop our own identity, which makes us a part, as we see it, of the world community.

That is why, whenever the concept of a distinct society, a veto or administrative transfers are brought up, we consistently oppose them, because we believe that our future is in building in North America our own sovereign country, in order to be able to establish normal state–to–state relations with other peoples: the people of Canada, the people of the United States and the people of other sovereign countries of the world. That is the crux of the matter.

I can understand why many of our colleagues, members of both the government party or the third party, are tired of hearing our arguments because they take the same view of this issue as the other Canadians who tell us that Canada is a juxtaposition of ten provinces.

• (1225)

I can understand that they are tired of our arguments, of listening to us. I hope that, in the years to come, an agreement can be negotiated on new terms so that, in a spirit of mutual respect, we in Quebec can remain who we are and English Canada can continue to develop as it pleases, without either of us interfering with each other's growth, as the people of Canada and the people of Quebec.

Mr. Denis Paradis (Brome—Missisquoi, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to address Bill C–110, which I will refer to as the veto act. First, let us ask ourselves this basic question: Who speaks for whom, in Quebec? Let us look at that question in the context of the House of Commons.

Members of the Bloc Quebecois keep saying: "We are the ones speaking for Quebecers". I am sorry, but there are also Liberal members representing Quebec ridings. There are 20 of us here who speak for Quebec. Furthermore, an independent member, who sits next to me, as well as a Conservative member, also speak for Quebec. Therefore, Bloc members are not the only ones representing Quebec's interests in this House.

Let us not forget that Quebecers voted no in the referendum. Consequently, it is the Quebec Liberal members of this House, not the Bloc members, who won the referendum, albeit by a narrow margin. As member for Brome—Missisquoi, I can certainly speak on behalf of the majority of Quebecers who voted no.

It is true that those who voted no also expressed a strong desire for change. Not a desire to separate, but a desire for change. Even a leader of the yes side, Mr. Dumont, says so in today's issue of La Presse: "If Quebecers had said yes, we would be in the process of implementing the plan that had been drawn up. However, this is not the case. The no side won by pledging to make changes. Let us see what they have to offer. This is not my first choice, since I was on the opposite side during the referendum campaign".

The Leader of the Action Démocratique does not think that his party members will reject his position. He adds: "Our post–referendum strategy is simple. We must look after our economy and our public finances. As for Ottawa, it must define the changes promised during the campaign. We will let them work and, if they make a proposal, we will look at it". So, the desire for change expressed during the referendum campaign is definitely not a desire to separate.

The changes that people are asking for from their federal elected representatives are changes that affect them. They are not changes that would make Ottawa or Quebec bigger, but changes that reflect people's needs. This is what is important. Those who count are those who sent us here. We are accountable to them. But what changes do these people expect from us?

As I see it, there are two types. One year ago, I was campaigning to represent my party in Brome—Missisquoi. Then the by–election took place, followed by the referendum. In that one year, I spent more time campaigning in Quebec than I did in this House.

• (1230)

I talked to a lot of people during the past year. What kind of changes do people want? There are two kinds. First, a change in the way we do things and second, recognition of our way of life.

First, the way we do things. When you go out and meet people, they tell you: "We are fed up with taxes. We are being taxed out of existence. We are fed up with bureaucracy and red tape. So why not let Quebec and Ottawa get together and see whether something can be done about getting rid of all this duplication? Why not give a little more power to the private citizen?" People want to be involved.

As for recognition of our way of life, I think that is what people want, along with recognition of Quebec's language, culture, legal traditions and institutions.

A resolution was presented in this House to recognize the people of Quebec as a distinct society. A bill was introduced more or less at the same time—the bill we are debating now—that gives veto powers to Quebec and other regions in Canada. It is not perfect, but is perfection possible in this world? Is it be better to entrench this in the Constitution than to have a bill? Yes, it would be better. Soon, in 1997, there will be a meeting of provincial premiers. Yes, it is better.

Would it be better to have more rather than fewer regions? I am not sure. But I do think the government has made a very good start by putting something on the table quickly after the referendum.

So what do we do now? What do we do? After the veto bill we are debating now is adopted, we will see if by 1997 we can reach a consensus within this country, within Canada. We will see whether we can constitutionalize, perhaps by 1997 or whenever, the concept of distinct society.

But, as I said earlier, the citizen comes first. We will have to prepare a package of changes, changes that are crucial and thorough, and we will have to do it now, but we should keep it simple: look at duplication, decentralize administrations and standardize paperwork. I think we should go for solutions that have a direct impact on the public.

We must also make the citizens of this country proud to be Canadians. And part of that is teaching Canadian history in our schools. Part of it is young people knowing the words of our national anthem. Part of it is flying our flag everywhere. Part of it is encouraging Quebecers to meet people and travel in other provinces and vice versa.

The veto powers we are discussing today are like the oil I put in the hydraulic system of my backhoe so I can raise the shovel.

It is important that all of us in this House, irrespective of our political affiliations, have only the interests of the citizen at heart.

[English]

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this speech is not directed at the individuals in the House. It is directed at the people of Canada. The crisis we face today supersedes politics. It supersedes the gamesmanship we see in the House. It supersedes what goes on in committee. It is an issue that affects the very soul of Canada.

• (1235)

Never in the past 50 years has there been such a crisis in our midst, a crisis that will change the face of the country we know and love. Never have we needed leadership more but never have we seen such a dearth of leadership. It almost caused the country to fracture last October 30.

The current proposals in Bill C–110 are ineffective. They are meant to appease the separatists within this House and they are meant to appease the separatist leaders in Quebec. The separatist leadership wants one thing and one thing alone: a separate, independent Quebec.

Anything the government does is going to be ineffective. Therefore the proposals the government makes must not be addressed to the separatist leadership, not to the separatist party, but to the people of Quebec. That is the intent of what we are trying to accomplish here. We are trying to keep the country together, not for politicians, not for political parties, but for the people of Canada.

The fundamental overriding principle of being Canadian is equality for everyone. If we do not have equality for all of us then we have equality for no one. It is something that Canadians have fought for in two world wars, which the brave men and women in our armed forces fight for today, peace and equality in far off lands.

To the people of Quebec I say you are afraid of losing your culture, you are afraid of losing your language. You do not wish to become like the French culture in the southern United States. But your culture is important to us, your language is important to us. It enriches each and every one of us.

In the same vein our culture, our history and the culture and the history of the multiple ethnic groups that make up Canada must be important to you too. We in the Reform Party have proposed that culture and language be given to the provinces, all of the provinces, including Quebec. Here you can be the masters of your own cultural and linguistic destinies.

You are fed up with unnecessary duplication, you are fed up with unnecessary interventions by Ottawa. But so is the rest of the country. That is why in order to reduce waste and save taxpayers' money we have submitted proposals to decentralize various areas such as natural resources, manpower training, housing, tourism and such.

The people of Quebec are fed up with the high federal debt, but so is the rest of Canada. Understand one thing. If Quebecers leave Canada they must understand very clearly that they will walk away with their share of the national debt.

To the people of Quebec I say you are fed up with taxes which go to Ottawa and are wasted, but understand that so is the rest of Canada. The rest of Canada has the same interests that the vast majority of the people of Quebec have. It would be a shame to have the people of Quebec separate from Canada over an eventuality that will come to pass anyway. In most ways the same desires of the people of Quebec are shared by people in every province within our country. I ask them to work with everybody else in order to accomplish this.

The separatists want to secede to preserve the Quebec culture but they can only do this by preventing non–francophone people from coming into Quebec. That is why they want to control immigration. That is their intent. They want to create a pure laine population. Fantasy? Hardly. Bloc Quebecois members previous to the referendum said that the only true Quebecer is one that is a member of la pure laine.

This was confirmed by racist statements made by Mr. Parizeau and Mr. Landry that blamed them for the failure of Quebec to succeed in the referendum. They put that responsibility on the shoulders of hardworking immigrant populations in Quebec. Accidental? Not at all. They want to drive the immigrant population from Quebec to increase, relatively speaking, the yes vote for separation.

However, the people of Quebec do not want this. The people of Quebec are not xenophobes. They are not intolerant. They are not racist. Their leaders are but they are not. This is something they need remember. They would be embarrassed to know some of the things that have been said by some of their leaders.

• (1240)

I ask the people of Quebec why investors would want go to Quebec to start companies and create jobs in a climate of obsolete economic ideas, an enormously high debt and intolerance.

This brings me to the motivation of the separatist leadership. They warp history. They lie about economic facts. They muzzle their own people which prevents them from getting the facts. Why are they doing this? They are doing it for their own gain and the gain is power. It is power for the separatist leadership in Quebec and has nothing to do with benefiting the average citizen in Quebec.

The pursuit of the separatist leadership in Quebec has very little to do with the people of Quebec. The leadership knows its actions and activities are just going to drag down the average citizen in Quebec. Those who will be hurt the most are those who are the poorest in that province.

We agree with the people of Quebec in wanting to be the masters of their own linguistic and cultural destinies for it is their culture and their language that enriches us all. We are, after all, a part of a multi–ethnic mélange of different groups. French history is a part of our history and is a fundamental, important and integral part of Canada.

Canada needs leadership and it needs it now. It needs leadership to put this issue of Canadian unity beyond the realm and the arena of politics. If this issue is left to the politicians it will be lethal for Canadian unity. All the people of Canada must understand that.

I implore and beseech the people of this country to come together, francophones, allophones, anglophones, all the ethnic groups, all the cultures and all the languages, under the umbrella of understanding and tolerance. It is something that all Canadians are proud of. From outside Canada it is how we are seen. We are looked at as being a country that exhibits the best examples of culture and tolerance.

However, if ever there was a need for us to demonstrate this to its greatest extent it is now. We must all come together. Anglophones must travel to Quebec. Quebecers must travel into the rest of Canada to see the importance of having our cultures united, not separate.

There is no reason why the people of Quebec cannot have what they asked for in terms of preserving their culture and language in North America. The rest of Canada does not want that to be lost, it wants it to stay. It wants it to stay in the framework of equality, respect and tolerance for all Canadians.

Quite frankly, the policies that have been put forward in Bill C–110, rather than bringing people together, are actually divisive. The people in the rest of Canada see this as a way of making them second class citizens. I hope the people of Quebec understand this. They want nothing more than to be equal with Canadians and with Quebecers. They want nothing more and nothing less.

Canada is the greatest country in the world. It is a land of tolerance and unity. It is made up of a mélange of different ethnic groups of which the French Canadian heritage and culture is one of the most important. I ask the people of Quebec, not the politicians, to join us in unity to build a stronger, united Canada for all people.

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on the Prime Minister's unity initiative. I will address the distinct character of Quebec, the fact that it is different which is an obvious and inevitable reality. There are four simple and straightforward truths members of Parliament must keep in mind during this debate.

• (1245)

The first truth is very clear and it must remain at the heart of our debate: Canada is the best country in the world in which to live. Today we are discussing our future. We are discussing evolution. Anyone can discuss whatever they want in this land because we live in the most free and democratic country in which all of us are equal citizens with equal rights.

The second truth is that the Prime Minister, the government and Parliament have a duty to preserve the unity of Canada as a nation indivisible.
